As I have indicated in Part I, there is very little sentiment for independence among the people of Puerto Rico. Thus, it is very unlikely that Puerto Rico will attempt to declare its independence, even though there would probably be little opposition from the United States if it did. In any case, it would seem that the United States still feels that it has the power and authority to grant or deny independence to Puerto Rico. During a 1950 debate in the House of Representatives it was stated that "it will be Congress and Congress [*97] alone which ultimately will determine the changes, if any, in the political status of the island." [74] "This statement appeared to represent the consensus of opinion in the House." [75] In 1953, before the General Assembly of the United Nations, the United States Ambassador stated that if the Puerto Rican legislature adopted "a resolution in favor of . . . even absolute independence," he would "recommend to Congress that . . . independence be granted." [76] Again, this clearly indicates that the United States feels it has a veto power over Puerto Rican independence and nothing in the years since suggests any change in this view.

By the same token, since the United States seems to claim absolute power over the political status of Puerto Rico, it could presumably cast Puerto Rico adrift, unilaterally declaring that Puerto Rico is henceforth an independent nation. There would seem to be no way that Puerto Rico could counter this and continue a relationship with the United States against the will of the latter. Nor is it likely, with the strong anti-colonial attitude in world opinion, that other countries or the United Nations would support Puerto Rico in its resistance to independence.

VII. Should Either Puerto Rico or the United States Act Unilaterally?

As I have indicated previously, there seems to be very little interest among Puerto Ricans in independence. What they want is an improvement in their status, with full Constitutional rights and full participation in all welfare programs. Although that is not likely to happen in the foreseeable future, the people of Puerto Rico are probably much better off in their present relationship with the United States than they would be as an independent nation. They are now United States citizens, free to enter any part of the United States at will, with the backing of a powerful nation anywhere in the world. In economic terms, i.e., taxation, welfare, investment, trade, etc., the balance is heavily in favor of Puerto Rico. Independence would immediately make Puerto Rico just another poor, struggling third world country, [77] with little hope of improvement in the years ahead.

On the other hand, it might well be in the best interest of the United States to cast off Puerto Rico and declare it to be an independent nation. In terms of taxation, welfare benefits, and so on, the United States would be way [*98] ahead financially without a relationship with Puerto Rico. As to trade and investment, it is virtually certain that an independent Puerto Rico would welcome economic relations with the United States on favorable terms. Puerto Rico would need that desperately. As to strategic and military concerns, Puerto Rico has little if any such value in today's world, and it would probably be fairly easy for the United States to arrange for any bases that might be needed in Puerto Rico.

While there may be some question as to the power of Congress to unilaterally revoke the citizenship of Puerto Ricans upon the happening of Puerto Rican independence, [78] there does not seem to be any Constitutional basis for such a revocation. Federal law provides that a United States national will lose his nationality by doing certain things with the intention of relinquishing United States nationality. [79] Most United States citizens who became citizens of an independent Puerto Rico would have no intention of relinquishing United States nationality, and thus would become citizens of both countries. Many United States citizens hold dual citizenship [80] and vote in both United States elections and those in another country. [81] In addition, descendants of these dual citizens would also often be entitled to dual citizenship. These descendants might be born in the United States; have parents who are both United States citizens, one of whom resided in the United States prior to the birth; have one parent who was present in the United States for a continuous period of one year prior to the birth, and the other parent is a United States national; and so on. [82]

REV_00258488

Perhaps the best answer would be to try to find an evolutionary process under which Puerto Rico could move gradually from its present status to complete independence. Puerto Rico could move to "free association," in which it would maintain close political, economic and security relations with the United States, but take on more and more sovereignty and responsibility for its own affairs. Citizens of Puerto Rico and their descendants would continue to be eligible for United States citizenship just as they are now, even [*99] after Puerto Rico became fully independent. And as was the case with the Philippines, Puerto Rico would eventually be ready to stand alone (probably with continuing relationships with the United States by treaty). It would then be an independent nation, with its own culture, language, and national identity, which are so highly valued by Puerto Ricans. [83] n1 See Frederick Merk, Manifest Destiny and Mission in American History: A Reinterpretation 24-27 (1963). This view was often justified by a belief in "the superior qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race and its democratic institutions." Juan R. Torruella, The Supreme Court and Puerto Rico: The Doctrine of Separate and Unequal 7 (1985).

FOOTNOTES:

As most readers are probably aware, there are conflicting views on most of the issues discussed in this article. As to many of them I have presented both sides. As to others, I have stated my personal view based on my study and analysis. I am well aware that my view is that of a mainland American, who has never been to Puerto Rico, and that many others would disagree, especially those who have lived in Puerto Rico or have ties to the island.

n2 Merk, supra note 1, at 24-27.

n3 Congress continued the use of the word "Porto" until it was finally corrected to "Puerto" in 1932. See Act of May 17, 1932, ch. 190, 47 Stat. 158 (1932).

n4 Treaty of Peace Between the United States of America and the Kingdom of Spain, Dec. 10, 1898, U.S.-Spain, 30 Stat. 1754.

n5 Id. art. IX.

n6 The United States did not annex Cuba, and expressly "disclaimed any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over Cuba." H.R.J. Res. 24, 55th Cong. (2d Sess. 1898).

n7 Christopher Columbus "discovered" Puerto Rico on November 19, 1493.

n8 History of Puerto Rico, http://welcome.topuertorico.org/history.html at *1 (last visited Feb. 25, 2001). These tribes migrated over a long period of time from South America. Ediberto Roman, The Alien-Citizen Paradox and Other Consequences of U.S. Colonialism, 26 Fla. St. U. L. Rev. 1, 6 n.34 (1998) (citations omitted).

n9 See History of Puerto Rico, supra note 8.

n10 See id. Many of the Spaniards were gold-seekers, and few of the new settlers brought women with them. Thus, it was natural for them to take Indian wives. See id.

n11 See Porto Rico Civil Government (Jones) Act, ch. 145, 39 Stat. 951, 953 (1917).

n12 See supra note 3.

n13 Letter from John Hay, United States Ambassador to England, to President Theodore Roosevelt (1898), quoted in Frank Freidel, The Splendid Little War 3 (1958).

REV_00258489

n14 See id. at 395.

n15 Huus v. New York & Porto Rico S.S. Co., 182 U.S. 392 (1901); Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 244 (1901); Dooley v. United States, 182 U.S. 222 (1901); Goetze v. United States, 182 U.S. 221 (1901); De Lima v. Bidwell, 182 U.S. 1 (1901) (holding that a territory acquired by the United States belongs to the United States and is subject to disposition by Congress).

n16 See Downes, 182 U.S. at 339-42 (White, J., concurring).

n17 See Dorr v. United States, 195 U.S. 138, 153 (1904).

n18 See Dorr, 195 U.S. at 149. The same result was reached as to Puerto Rico in Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 (1922).

n19 Downes, 182 U.S. at 244.

n20 See Dorr, 195 U.S. at 142.

n21 Id. at 144-45.

n22 See Porto Rico Civil Government (Jones) Act, ch. 145, 39 Stat. 951, 953 (1917).

n23 See Torres v. Puerto Rico, 442 U.S. 465, 471 (1979).

n24 See Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663, 668-69 n.5 (1974). The Court found it "unnecessary to determine which Amendment applied to Puerto Rico." Id.

n25 See Examining Bd. of Eng'rs, Architects and Surveyors v. Flores de Otero, 426 U.S. 572, 601 (1976) (declining to determine which amendment applied).

n26 See Balzac, 258 U.S. at 314.

n27 See Califano v. Gautier Torres, 435 U.S. 1, 4 (1978) (assuming without deciding).

n28 See Balzac, 258 U.S. at 313-14.

n29 See Igartua de la Rosa v. United States, 32 F.3d 8, 12 (1st Cir. 1994) (per curiam); Attorney General of Guam v. United States, 738 F.2d 1017, 1020 (9th Cir. 1984); Sanchez v. United States, 376 F. Supp. 239, 242 (D.P.R. 1974).

n30 See Harris v. Rosario, 446 U.S. 651 (1980); Califano, 435 U.S. at 4. Residents of Puerto Rico are not eligible for Supplemental Security Income (SSI) assistance for aged, blind and disabled people, and they receive lower levels of assistance under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program [hereinafter AFDC]. See infra text accompanying note 58.

n31 Harris, 446 U.S. at 651-52.

n32 48 U.S.C. § 731b (1951).

n33 Id. § 731b.

n34 See id. § 731d.

n35 See Act of July 3, 1952, ch. 567, 66 Stat. 327 (1952).

REV_00258490

REV_00258494

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Punitive Damages]

OA/NARA #: 1650/1518
9601

Box
Folder 50-9

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 64 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1089

*64 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1089, **

Copyright (c) 1996 University of Cincinnati Law Review University of Cincinnati

Spring, 1996

64 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1089

LENGTH: 32103 words

COMMENT: JUDGE OR JURY: WHO SHOULD ASSESS PUNITIVE DAMAGES?

Lisa M. Sharkey *

* Associate Member, 1994-95 University of Cincinnati Law Review.

SUMMARY:
... The constitutionality of judicial assessment has recently been addressed by the highest courts of Kansas and Ohio, with conflicting results. ... The Supreme Court reversed the Fourth Circuit, finding that the developer was entitled to a jury trial for a determination of liability, but was not entitled to a jury assessment of the civil penalty. ... Justice Wright, joined by Chief Justice Moyer, dissented. ... On the state level, the Kansas Supreme Court in Smith v. Printup interpreted its jury trial provision to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. ... Thus, the Kansas Supreme Court correctly concluded that the Kansas jury trial guarantee does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. ... However, a commentator advocating jury assessment of punitive damages has warned of the danger of judicial bias, arguing that judges may be influenced by political pressures and biased in favor of the wealthy and the government. ... Thus, if punitive damage awards are reduced, fewer plaintiffs may choose to expend the trouble and cost necessary to bring suit and vindicate their rights. ... The jury trial guarantees of the Kansas and Ohio constitutions, as discussed above, should be interpreted to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. ... Similarly, the jury trial provisions of the Kansas and Ohio constitutions should be construed to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. ...

TEXT:
[*1089]

I. INTRODUCTION

Over the past two decades, state legislatures throughout the nation have sharply altered the manner in which punitive damages are awarded. Many states have capped the total judgment that a plaintiff may receive, [1] heightened the standard of evidence for determining whether punitive damages should be awarded, [2] or permitted bifurcation of trials for the assessment of punitive damages. [3] As part of this trend, the state legislatures of several states took from jurors the power to assess punitive damages and placed it in the hands of the trial judge. [4]

This transfer of power from jury to judge has been controversial. Many commentators have contended that a judge has greater experience in meting out punishment and can therefore better assess punitive damages. [5] However, opponents of this shift of power argue that the punitive damages. [218] The recognized purpose of punitive damages in Ohio is to punish a defendant, not to compensate a plaintiff. [219] Thus, the dissent stated that the purpose of punitive damages differed from the essential purpose of a tort action, and an assessment of punitive damages is therefore outside the essential function of a jury in a tort action. [220] The dissent noted that punitive damages, unlike compensatory damages, are not fact sensitive. Instead, the decision-maker must have a broad perspective in order to fairly punish a defendant. [221] In this respect, the dissent argued that an assessment of punitive damages is analogous to criminal sentencing, and that the knowledge and experience of a judge should be called upon in both contexts to ensure adequate and fair punishment of a defendant. [222] Thus, an assessment of punitive dam- [*1114] ages should not be deemed a fundamental element. [223] Finally, the dissent argued that a plaintiff is not entitled to punitive damages as a matter of right. [224] In support of this argument, the dissent noted that an assessment of punitive damages in Ohio is permissive, not mandatory. [225] The dissent further noted that its argument is supported by the analysis of the Printup court, which reasoned that because a state legislature has the power to abolish punitive damages, it must also have the power to regulate them. [226] Thus, the dissent concluded that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury, and it argued that the statute at issue should be found constitutional. [227]

REV_00258495

In summary, the constitutionality of judicial assessment of punitive damages has been subject to dispute. On the federal level, the United States Supreme Court in Tull v. United States addressed the constitutionality of judicial assessment of one remedy--civil penalties--but the Court did not directly address judicial assessment of punitive damages. [228] Two circuit court cases have addressed the issue in light of the Tull opinion. The Fourth Circuit, in Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., [229] concluded that the Seventh Amendment did not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. However, the Fourth Circuit, sitting en banc, overruled Shamblin's in Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., [230] concluding that the Seventh Amendment barred judicial assessment of punitive damages. On the state level, the Kansas Supreme Court in Smith v. Printup [231] interpreted its jury trial provision to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. In contrast, however, the Ohio Supreme Court in Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co. [232] construed the Ohio jury trial guarantee to bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. [*1115]

IV. DISCUSSION

A resolution of the question of who should hold the power to assess punitive damages entails an examination of both constitutional and policy arguments. Thus, this Section first examines the constitutional arguments regarding the power to assess punitive damages, focusing on the constitutions of the United States, Kansas, and Ohio. Second, this Section evaluates the policy arguments that have been advanced regarding whether judge or jury should assess punitive damages. Finally, this section concludes with recommendations for the courts of the United States, Kansas and, Ohio regarding their practices for the assessment of punitive damages.

A. Constitutionality

An evaluation of the constitutional arguments regarding judicial assessment of punitive damages begins with a discussion of whether an assessment of punitive damages constitutes a fundamental element of trial by jury under the Seventh Amendment. This section proceeds to evaluate the decision of the Kansas Supreme Court in Smith v. Printup, holding that the Kansas Constitution does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. [233] Finally, this section examines the reasoning of the court and the dissent of the Ohio Supreme Court in Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co., in which the court held that the Ohio Constitution bars judicial assessment of punitive damages. [234]

1. Seventh Amendment

REV_00258504

a. Meeting the Definition of Fundamental Element

The United States Supreme Court has stated that the Seventh Amendment was not intended to preserve every characteristic of the common law right of trial by jury, but only the fundamental elements of trial by jury. [235] A fundamental element is one that is necessary to preserve the "substance of the common-law right of trial by jury." [236] Thus, the Court has evaluated elements to determine whether they are necessary to preserve the substance of the right to trial by jury. [237] It [*1116] should also be noted that the Court, in discussing what constitutes a fundamental element, has stated that nothing in the language of the Seventh Amendment or historical evidence presented to the Court indicates that the Seventh Amendment was intended to extend to the remedy phase of a civil trial. [238]

An evaluation of the nature and purpose of punitive damages indicates that an assessment of punitive damages does not meet the Court's definition of a "fundamental element" of trial by jury. [239] Regarding the nature of punitive damages, the United States Supreme Court has recognized that punitive damages do not serve to compensate a plaintiff. [240] Instead, the Court has recognized that punitive damages are by nature a penalty. [241] However, the Court has not deemed a penalty to be a fundamental element, [242] and it has not required jury assessment of other penalties. For example, the Court has explicitly recognized the similarity of the penal nature of punitive damages and civil penalties, [243] and it has concluded that civil penalties need not be assessed by a jury. [244] An assessment of punitive damages is also analogous to criminal sentencing, and criminal sentencing generally has not been performed by a jury. [245] Therefore, the nature of punitive damages indicates that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury because punitive damages are a penal remedy, [*1117] analogous to civil penalties and criminal sentencing, and thus failing to fall under the protection of the Seventh Amendment. [246]

Similarly, the purpose of punitive damages indicates that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. The fundamental role of a jury is to resolve questions of liability and compensation. [247] However, punitive damages are not a matter of liability or compensation; they serve to punish and deter wrongful conduct. [248] Therefore, because the purposes of punitive damages fall outside the fundamental role of a jury, it follows that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. [249]

b. Consistency of Judicial Assessment with Supreme Court Precedent

The conclusion that judicial assessment of punitive damages is not barred by the Seventh Amendment gains further support when judicial assessment of damages is compared to elements that the Court has evaluated in prior cases. First, judicial assessment of punitive damages can be compared to the twelve-member jury at issue in Colgrove v. Battin. [250] In Colgrove, the Court found that a twelve-member jury is not a fundamental element of trial by jury, reasoning that a twelvemember jury is not necessary to achieve fair and equitable resolution of factual issues. [251] Colgrove can be construed as protecting the interest of [*1118] a plaintiff in a fair and equitable resolution of his claim. [252] However, as discussed above, punitive damages generally focus not on a plaintiff's right to compensation, but instead on the reprehensibility of a defendant's conduct. [253] Therefore, jury assessment of punitive damages, like a twelve-member jury, is not necessary to resolve the factual issues of a plaintiff's claim, and judicial assessment of punitive damages can be deemed permissible under the Seventh Amendment consistently with Colgrove.

Second, an assessment of punitive damages can be compared to an assessment of civil penalties, which the Court addressed in Tull v. United States. [254] The Tull court concluded that an assessment of civil penalties was not a fundamental element of trial by jury, [255] and the Court's reasoning can be extended to an assessment of punitive damages. [256] Though some minor differences exist between civil penalties and punitive damages, their similarities overpower their differences. [257] Therefore, an assessment of civil penalties, like an assessment of puni- [*1119] tive damages, can be performed by a judge consistently with the Seventh Amendment. [258]

REV_00258505

Additionally, the Court's reasoning in Tull may be applicable in the area of punitive damages. [259] In Tull, the Court reasoned that because it is undisputed that Congress has the power to fix the amount of civil penalties, it follows that civil penalties need not be assessed by a jury to comply with the Seventh Amendment. Thus, the Court found that the assessment of civil penalties cannot be a fundamental element of trial by jury. [260] Applying this reasoning to the area of punitive damages, it appears that if Congress has the power to fix the amount of punitive damages without violating the Seventh Amendment, then it follows that punitive damages need not be assessed by a jury and are not a fundamental element of trial by jury. [261] Thus, the question is whether Congress has the power under the Seventh Amendment to set statutory caps on punitive damages. Although the United States Supreme Court has not addressed this issue, lower courts have argued persuasively that statutory caps do not violate the Seventh Amendment. [262] Therefore, because it appears that Congress has the power under the Seventh Amendment to set statutory caps of punitive damages, it follows under the Tull reasoning that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element. [263] [*1120]

c. Circuit Court Cases Addressing Judicial Assessment

A discussion of whether the Seventh Amendment bars judicial assessment of punitive damages would be incomplete without an evaluation of the opinions on this issue by the federal circuit courts of appeals. Although the weight of authority in the circuit courts holds that judicial assessment of punitive damages violates the Seventh Amendment, [264] only two circuit court cases have evaluated judicial assessment of punitive damages considering the Supreme Court's decision in Tull. [265] In the first case, Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., the Fourth Circuit concluded that judicial assessment of punitive damages does not violate the Seventh Amendment, [266] but the court overruled this decision in the second case, Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. [267] However, the Shamblin's decision was better reasoned and more consistent with precedent. [268]

The Shamblin's decision properly construed precedent in determining whether the Seventh Amendment barred judicial assessment of punitive damages. In Shamblin's, the Fourth Circuit correctly concluded that the United States Supreme Court's decision in Kennon v. Gilmer, which found that a court may not substitute its own judgment for a jury's verdict regarding compensatory damages, did not address punitive damages and was therefore not controlling. [269] The Fourth Circuit then correctly noted that the Supreme Court's reasoning in Tull was applicable to punitive damages. [270] As the Fourth Circuit observed, the [*1121] Tull reasoning that civil penalties are not fundamental elements of trial by jury is applicable because civil penalties are analogous to punitive damages. [271] Further, the Fourth Circuit properly argued that punitive damages should not be deemed a fundamental element of trial by jury because punitive damages are by nature a penalty designed to punish and deter misconduct. [272] Therefore, the court correctly held that the Seventh Amendment does not require jury assessment of punitive damages. [273]

However, the Fourth Circuit overruled Shamblin's in Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. [274] The Defender court conceded that Tull contained "rather broad language," but the court argued that Tull should not be broadly construed. [275] Instead, the Defender court contended that recent Supreme Court cases have recognized the fundamental role of punitive damages, and it quoted dicta from Supreme Court cases that purportedly supported this contention. [276] However, the reasoning of the court is flawed. [277] As discussed above, the reasoning of Tull should extend to an assessment of punitive damages. [278] The dicta quoted by the Defender court merely explains the traditional procedure regarding the doctrine of punitive damages. [279] The Court discussed the traditional role of appellate courts reviewing an assessment of punitive damages, but it never discussed any limitations on their power by the Seventh Amendment. [280] Further, the Court did not discuss the importance of an assessment of punitive damages to trial by jury. [281] Thus, the Defender court's reliance on this [*1122] dicta is misplaced. Although the court's conclusion is in line with the weight of authority on this issue, [282] the conclusion is inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent. [283]

REV_00258506

2. Kansas Right to Trial by Jury

The Kansas jury trial guarantee, like the Seventh Amendment, preserves the right to jury trial. [284] In determining whether a characteristic must be tried by a jury under the Kansas jury trial guarantee, the Kansas Supreme Court in Smith v. Printup examined whether the characteristic constituted a right at common law. [285] It should be noted that the Printup analysis is similar to the United States Supreme Court's analysis in Tull, which evaluated whether an element of a jury trial should be deemed a fundamental element of trial by jury. [286] Just as a characteristic must be tried by a jury if it is a fundamental element under the Seventh Amendment, [287] so must a characteristic be tried by a jury if it was a right at common law under the Kansas jury trial guarantee. [288]

The Printup court's reasoning in evaluating this issue was solid. The court properly considered the character of punitive damages to determine whether a plaintiff was entitled to them as a matter of right. [289] As the court correctly noted, an award of punitive damages is [*1123] generally dependent upon the recovery of compensatory damages. [290] Further, a plaintiff has no general right to punitive damages, and punitive damages serve to punish and deter misconduct. [291] Additionally, as the court indicated, punitive damages may be regarded as equitable in nature. [292] Thus, the court correctly concluded that the character of punitive damages indicates that they were not a right at common law. [293]

Having determined that a plaintiff was not entitled to punitive damages as a matter of right at common law, the court then correctly noted that it follows that a state legislature has the power to abolish punitive damages. [294] Further, as the court argued, because the state legislature can abolish punitive damages, it can accomplish anything short of that, such as requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages. [295] While the Tull court reasoned that an assessment of civil penalties was not a fundamental element of trial by jury because Congress can set the penalties and, therefore, can delegate this power, [296] the Printup court reasoned that a state legislature can abolish punitive damages and, therefore, can require that they be assessed by a judge. [297] Thus, the Kansas Supreme Court correctly concluded that the Kansas jury trial guaran- [*1124] tee does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. [298]

3. Ohio Right to Trial by Jury

Just as judicial assessment of punitive damages should be deemed constitutional under the constitutions of the United States and Kansas, so should it be deemed constitutional under the Ohio Constitution. As the dissent in Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co. argued, an assessment of punitive damages is not fundamental to trial by jury and is therefore not encompassed within the jury trial guarantee of the Ohio Constitution. [299] This conclusion must be reached, as the dissent noted, because the Ohio jury trial provision guarantees a jury determination of elements falling within the fundamental role of the jury, which is to resolve questions of liability and to ensure that a plaintiff is made whole. [300] However, punitive damages are not intended to benefit a plaintiff, but instead to punish a defendant, [301] and a recovery of punitive damages is generally contingent upon a plaintiff's receiving at least nominal damages. [302]

Further, an assessment of punitive damages, similar to criminal sentencing, requires a broad perspective so that the punishment and deterrence goals of punitive damages can be achieved. [303] Thus, as the Zoppo dissent correctly argued, the purpose and nature of punitive damages indicate that they are not within the jury's fundamental role [*1125] and are therefore outside of the Ohio right to trial by jury. [304]

REV_00258507

The decision of the Ohio Supreme Court in Zoppo that the Ohio jury trial guarantee bars judicial assessment of punitive damages, therefore, was mistaken. [305] The court focused in Zoppo on the historical treatment of punitive damages, [306] employing a method of analysis similar to that of prior cases interpreting the jury trial provision. [307] However, the fact that an element historically was part of trial by jury should not determine that the element must forever be part of trial by jury in Ohio. [308] Ohio has recognized some departures from the common law. For example, Ohio civil juries can consist of only eight members, [309] although juries historically consisted of twelve members. [310] Additionally, the Ohio Constitution was amended to permit non- [*1126] unanimous jury verdicts, although unanimity was required at common law. [311] Further, the Ohio Supreme Court, like the United States Supreme Court, has cited no historical evidence indicating that the jury trial provision was intended to extend beyond the liability phase of a civil trial. [312] Thus, instead of focusing on historical treatment in examining an element of trial by jury, the court should inquire whether an element constitutes part of the right of trial by jury. [313] This inquiry reveals, as discussed above, that an assessment of punitive damages is not encompassed within the Ohio right to trial by jury, and a judge can therefore assess punitive damages consistently with the Ohio jury trial guarantee.

In summary, the Seventh Amendment should be interpreted to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. An assessment of punitive damages fails to meet the Court's definition of a fundamental element, and this conclusion is reinforced when an assessment of punitive damages is compared to the elements at issue in Colgrove v. Battin [314] and Tull v. United States. [315] Thus, the Fourth Circuit's decision in Shamblin's Ready Mix. Inc. v. Eaton Corp. [316] was well-reasoned, and the court's decision in Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. [317] to overrule Shamblin's was mistaken. On the state level, the decision of the Kansas Supreme Court in Smith v. Printup [318] that judicial assessment of punitive damages was not barred by the Kansas Constitution was solid and consistent with the state's jury trial guarantee. However, the Ohio Supreme Court decision in Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co. [319] was wrongly decided, and the court should have construed the Ohio jury trial provision to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. [*1127]

B. Policy Arguments Regarding Power to Assess Punitive Damages

In addition to the constitutional arguments, commentators have debated whether judge or jury should be permitted to assess punitive damages as a matter of policy. [320] As a threshold matter, it is important to note that judges and jurors differ regarding the assessment of punitive damages. [321] Specifically, empirical studies have found, as many commentators have contended, that juries award higher punitive damages than judges. [322] Commentators have disagreed regarding whether the difference reflects bias by either jury or judge or simply indicates a difference in value judgments. [323]

The policy arguments regarding judicial assessment of punitive damages have addressed five distinct areas. First, they have centered on the respective roles of judge and jury, examining whether an assessment of punitive damages falls within the role of judge or jury. [324] In addressing this area, proponents of judicial assessment have noted that a judge often takes the role of performing highly discretionary calculations that require consideration of a multitude of factors. [325] Thus, although a determination of liability may be within the realm of a jury, [326] proponents of judicial assessment have argued it is the role of a judge to distinguish "wrong" from "very wrong" behavior and to mete out appropriate punishment. [327] In support of this argument, the commentators have noted that a judge metes out penalties in criminal sen- [*1128] tencing [328] and assesses civil penalties. [329] A judge performs a similar function in the assessment of punitive damages. [330] Thus, the commentators have argued that the judicial role of setting penalties is recognized when a judge is permitted to assess punitive damages. [331]

REV_00258508

Opponents of judicial assessment of punitive damages, in contrast, have argued that it is the role of a jury to determine whether conduct violates society's standards of decency. [332] In this respect, juries engage in "ad hoc norm elaboration"; in other words, juries draw inferences from facts and reach discretionary judgments, with their verdicts serving as measurements of the conduct deemed acceptable by society. [333] At least one commentator has argued that just as jurors reflect community values and establish norms in determining liability, they serve this same function in assessing punitive damages. [334] Thus, the commentator has argued that jurors can indicate the extent to which society condemns a defendant's conduct through the amount of punitive damages awarded. [335]

An evaluation of these arguments reveals that advocates of judicial [*1129] assessment of punitive damages have the stronger argument. [336] Punitive damages are by nature a penalty, [337] and an assessment of punitive damages is analogous to criminal sentencing. [338] Thus, an assessment of punitive damages is fundamentally a calculation of a penalty, rather than an indication of community values, and an assessment of punitive damages is within the role of a judge. [339]

In addition to debating the proper roles of judge and jury, commentators have disagreed regarding whether judge or jury can better achieve punishment and deterrence. [340] Regarding punishment, proponents of judicial assessment have argued that the greater experience and range of knowledge of a judge may enable a judge to reach a more suitable and fair determination of the quantity of a penalty. [341] Similarly, regarding deterrence, the commentators have argued that the experience and legal knowledge of a judge may better enable a judge to weigh social policy concerns and economic factors that must be considered in achieving deterrence. [342] Accordingly, they have argued that the experience of a judge enables the judge to better achieve punishment and deterrence.

In contrast, at least one commentator has argued that juries rival judges at achieving punishment and deterrence. [343] With regard to punishment, the commentator has argued that punishment is essentially a moral judgment, and judges are no better at reaching moral judgments than juries are. [344] Thus, he has argued, because it is the role of juries [*1130] to reflect community values, perhaps the moral judgment of the extent to which conduct should be punished with punitive damages is best left in the hands of the jury. [345]

With regard to deterrence, the commentator has argued that juries can make moral judgments and achieve total deterrence. [346] Many commentators have discussed deterrence as if it were a unitary concept, but tort law recognizes two types of deterrence, optimal and total. [347] Optimal deterrence is a system that "would determine the net social cost of the defendant's conduct, enhance that amount to reflect the improbability of detection and judgment, and require the defendant to pay the enhanced amount." [348] Because optimal deterrence focuses on social cost, rather than a defendant's state of mind, some defendants in an optimal deterrence system may choose to persist in their wrongful acts because they are willing to pay the cost. [349] Total deterrence, in contrast, imposes "a penalty tailored to ensure that [a defendant] cannot profit by her wrong, or an in terrorem penalty sufficient to deter virtually any potential tortfeasor." [350] The commentator has acknowledged that judges may be better at achieving optimal deterrence, [351] but he has contended that juries are clearly capable of achieving total deterrence. [352] In fact, the commentator has argued, when juries assess punitive damages, they can clarify society's view of conduct and establish norms regarding the amount of damages necessary to totally deter the conduct at issue. [353] Thus, if total deterrence is sought, jurors can achieve this goal and simultaneously fulfill their role of setting norms and indicating community values. [354]

An evaluation of these arguments reveals that proponents of judicial assessment of punitive damages have a stronger argument. It should be noted that even the proponents of jury assessment apparently do not contend that juries are better at achieving punishment and deterrence; they contend only that juries are not worse. [355] However, the arguments [*1131] that the greater experience of a judge enables a judge to effectively and fairly assess penalties carry weight; it seems reasonable that a more experienced decision-maker generally would be a more effective decision-maker. [356] Therefore, it appears likely that a judge would be better than a jury at achieving punishment and deterrence. [357]

REV_00258509

The policy arguments also have centered around historical intent. [358] In this regard, one commentator has argued that the party which fought for the adoption of the Seventh Amendment, the Anti-Federalists, intended for the functions of a jury to include preventing judicial bias and serving as a vehicle for direct self-government for the community. [359] The commentator has argued that jury assessment of punitive damages is necessary to carry out these functions envisioned by the Anti-Federalists. [360]

An evaluation of these arguments reveals that the issue of whether the framers intended for punitive damages to be assessed by a jury is open to debate. [361] The United States Supreme Court in Tull concluded that very little direct evidence existed concerning the intention of the Seventh Amendment, and the Court stated that it was presented with no evidence that the amendment extended to the remedy phase of a civil trial. [362] The commentator, however, disagreed with the Court and set forth evidence indicating that the framers may have intended for punitive damages to be assessed by a jury. [363] [*1132]

In addition to the issue of historical intent, commentators also have addressed the potential for avoiding judge and jury error in the assessment of punitive damages. Proponents of judicial assessment have identified two sources of jury error, confusion and bias, that may be decreased with judicial assessment of damages. [364] Regarding jury confusion, the commentators have noted that empirical studies indicate that it is not uncommon for juries to misunderstand the instructions given to them. [365] Because judges have greater experience working with the doctrine of punitive damages, the critics have contended that judges are less likely to be confused regarding the importance and purpose of punitive damages. [366]

Regarding jury bias, commentators have argued that jurors are biased against wealthy defendants and may play "Robin Hood" in assessing punitive damages against them, whereas judges are better able to avoid this bias. [367] As the commentators have noted, empirical studies confirm that juries assess significantly higher awards against wealthy defendants and the government. [368] Additionally, the commentators have argued that other factors, such as the attractiveness of the parties and the histrionics of the attorneys, may lead juries to be biased in favor of one of the litigants. [369]

However, a commentator advocating jury assessment of punitive damages has warned of the danger of judicial bias, arguing that judges [*1133] may be influenced by political pressures and biased in favor of the wealthy and the government. [370] In this regard, the commentator has noted that modern federal judges appear to be more likely than juries to find against a plaintiff in cases involving personal injury, constitutional tort and discrimination. [371] Further, the commentator has contended that judges are subject to political pressures which do not affect jurors, such as the pressures to secure re-election or an appointment to an appellate court. [372] A jury, in contrast, may be considered the only governmental agency without such political ambitions. [373] Additionally, because a jury award is the collective judgment of a group of people, the individual prejudice of any one juror may not be reflected in the award. [374]

An evaluation of these arguments reveals that advocates of judicial assessment of punitive damages have the stronger argument. A risk exists that either a judge or a jury will intentionally act upon bias. [375] However, the risk of indadvertantly acting upon bias appears greater with a jury. [376] In other words, judges may be more likely to recognize and avoid their own biases. [377] Further, because judges have greater experience, the risk that an award will reflect confusion appears greater with jury assessment of punitive damages. [378] Accordingly, the risk of jury error appears greater than that of judicial error, and the power of assessing punitive damages may be better placed in the hands of a judge. [379] [*1134]

REV_00258510

Finally, the policy arguments have addressed other concerns, such as the need to reduce uncertainty costs and preserve incentives for plaintiffs to vindicate their rights. Proponents of judicial assessment of punitive damages have argued that the experience and knowledge of judges allows for greater consistency in the assessment of punitive damages. [380] They have argued that a judge is more likely to have experience assessing punitive damages and, therefore, the judge may achieve greater consistency because the judge is in a better position to compare factors, such as egregiousness of the defendant's conduct, with those of past cases. [381] Further, if greater consistency is achieved in awarding punitive damages, then litigation costs may be reduced. [382] For example, when punitive damages are assessed by a jury, parties may differ greatly in their subjective expectations regarding appropriate punitive damages, and their differing expectations may increase the likelihood that they will be unable to reach an out-of-court settlement. [383] Thus, rather than reach a settlement, both parties may expend the money and resources for a trial. [384] Commentators have argued, therefore, that judicial assessment of punitive damages will result in greater consistency in punitive damages awards and a reduction of litigation costs. [385]

Proponents of jury assessment of punitive damages, however, have cited benefits of jury assessment, such as promoting democracy and en- [*1135] couraging vindication of rights. [386] With respect to promoting democracy, at least one commentator has argued that jury assessment of punitive damages provides the opportunity for jurors to participate in government. [387] Accordingly, the decision that the jurors reach constitutes their collective judgment, or a form of direct self-government by the people. [388] Additionally, as the commentator has argued, the decision of who assesses punitive damages may impact whether parties choose to bring suit and vindicate their rights. [389] Many commentators have agreed that juries will give higher awards than judges will, [390] and that a potential litigant will weigh the costs and trouble of litigation against the size of an expected award in deciding whether to settle a dispute, and, possibly, whether to litigate in the first place. [391] Thus, if punitive damage awards are reduced, fewer plaintiffs may choose to expend the trouble and cost necessary to bring suit and vindicate their rights. [392]

An evaluation of these arguments reveals that the arguments for judicial assessment of punitive damages are stronger. The arguments that judicial assessment of punitive damages benefits defendants and the community carry weight; it seems reasonable to seek consistency and fairness in the imposition of penalties. [393] However, arguments favoring jury assessment of punitive damages can be criticized because the goals of achieving democracy and vindicating plaintiffs' rights can be met with judicial assessment of punitive damages. Interests in democracy are served because a jury still determines liability for a cause of action, calculates compensatory damages and determines liability for punitive damages; only the power to assess punitive damages is taken [*1136] from the jury. [394] Additionally, plaintiffs still have incentive to vindicate their rights. In fact, the procedure for awarding compensatory damages is unaltered. [395] Only the procedure for assessing punitive damages, which generally are not intended to benefit plaintiffs, is altered. [396] Therefore, judicial assessment of punitive damages should be advocated because it may result in greater consistency and fairness, while still recognizing interests in democracy and permitting the vindication of the rights of plaintiffs.

In summary, judicial assessment of punitive damages should be advocated as a matter of policy. An assessment of punitive damages falls within the role of a judge. Further, judges likely will be better at achieving the goals of punitive damages, punishment and deterrence. The issue of whether the framers intended for jurors to assess punitive damages is open to debate. However, judicial assessment of punitive damages appears likely to redress the problems of jury confusion and bias. Finally, judicial assessment likely will benefit defendants and the community by establishing grater consistency in punitive damages awards and reducing uncertainty costs.

REV_00258511

C. Recommendations for Courts of the United States, Kansas and Ohio

It is the role of the legislature to determine which policy option will best suit the needs of citizens. [397] In attempting to fulfil this role, state legislatures throughout the nation have adopted several methods of tort reform, [398] including judicial assessment of punitive damages. [399] As a general rule, the policy decision of the legislature, as long as it can be implemented consistently with constitutional guarantees, should be respected. [400] [*1137]

1. Judicial Assessment of Punitive Damages in Federal Courts

The United States Congress has not enacted a general requirement that punitive damages must be assessed by a judge. [401] Furthermore, Congress has not expressed an intention to grant judges the power to assess punitive damages. In the absence of such federal legislation, federal courts may be hesitant to exercise the power to assess punitive damages. [402]

An example of a case in which a court should have been hesitant to exercise this power is Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. [403] In Defender, a jury awarded $ 5 million in punitive damages, and the trial judge, without submitting the issue to another jury, concluded the award was grossly excessive and reduced it to $ 10,000. [404] Such a drastic reduction of punitive damages, a reduction of more than ninety-nine percent of the award, without consulting a jury may have been an abuse of the court's discretion. [405]

However, a stronger argument for judicial assessment can be made under the facts of Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp. [406] Under the unusual facts of Shamblin's, the Fourth Circuit found that jury awards were excessive as a result of impropriety on the part of plaintiff's counsel on two prior occasions. [407] The court decided to assess punitive damages rather than remand for a third jury determination of punitive damages. [408] Under these facts, a strong argument can be made for judicial assessment; the court had already determined that [*1138] two prior jury awards of punitive damages were influenced by impropriety on the part of plaintiff's counsel, and the court's decision to conserve resources and assess an appropriate amount of punitive damages may have been a proper exercise of the court's discretion. [409]

2. Judicial Assessment of Punitive Damages in Kansas and Ohio

In contrast to the United States Congress, the legislatures of Kansas and Ohio have enacted statutes requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages. [410] The jury trial guarantees of the Kansas and Ohio constitutions, as discussed above, should be interpreted to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. [411] Additionally, it should be noted that the decision of the legislatures to require judicial assessment of punitive damages was a sensible policy choice. [412] Therefore, the courts of Kansas and Ohio should respect the choice of the legislatures and permit judicial assessment of punitive damages.

V. CONCLUSION

As states move toward tort reform, the merits of judicial assessment of punitive damages have been subject to debate. Although the weight of authority in the federal courts has concluded that judicial assessment of punitive damages violates the Seventh Amendment, these courts have misconstrued the Seventh Amendment and Supreme Court precedent. [413] The Seventh Amendment should not be interpreted to bar ju- [*1139] dicial assessment of punitive damages. [414] Similarly, the jury trial provisions of the Kansas and Ohio constitutions should be construed to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. [415]

REV_00258512

The policy arguments regarding judicial assessment of punitive damages also indicate that this practice is a sensible method of tort reform. Judges are likely to be better at achieving punishment and deterrence, [416] and judicial assessment of punitive damages is likely to result in a reduction of uncertainty costs. [417] Thus, in jurisdictions where the legislature constitutionally has chosen this method of tort reform, specifically in Kansas and Ohio, the courts should abide by the decision of the legislature and permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. [418] n1 States that cap punitive damages can be divided into two general categories. First, several states set a limit on the total monetary amount of damages. See, e.g., ALA. CODE section 6-11-21 (1993) (setting a cap of $ 250,000 on punitive damages, except in cases involving a pattern of intentional wrongful conduct, actual malice, libel, slander or defamation); VA. CODE ANN. section 8.01-38.1 (Michie 1992) (limiting punitive damages to $ 350,000). Second, several states limit punitive damages based on the amount of recoverable actual damages. See, e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. section 13-21-102 (1987) (requiring that punitive damages shall not exceed actual damages); FLA. STAT. ANN. section 768.73 (West Supp. 1995) (generally limiting punitive damages to three times compensatory damages).

FOOTNOTES:

n2 Numerous states have enacted the heightened standard of evidence through statutes. For statutes requiring a heightened standard of evidence, see, for example, ALASKA STAT. section 09.17.020 (1994); GA. CODE ANN. section 51-12-5.1 (Michie Supp. 1995); UTAH CODE ANN. section 78-18-1 (1992).

n3 When a case is bifurcated, the first phase involves a determination of liability by the trier of fact, and the second phase involves assessment of damages. For a discussion of this procedure, see generally 5 MARILYN MINZER ET AL., DAMAGES IN TORT ACTIONS, section 40.64[2] (1991). Many states have enacted statutes permitting bifurcation in cases involving punitive damages, and the majority of these states call for assessment of punitive damages by the trier of fact. See, e.g., GA. CODE ANN. section 51-12-5.1; MINN. STAT. ANN. section 549.20 (West Supp. 1995).

n4 See CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 52-240b (West 1991); KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701 (1994). Additionally, the Ohio legislature enacted a statute requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages, OHIO REV. CODE ANN. section 2315.21 (Anderson 1995), but the statute was found unconstitutional by the Ohio Supreme Court. See infra notes 196-206 and accompanying text.

n5 For commentators advocating judicial assessment, see Richard C. Ausness, Retribution and Deterrence: The Role of Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 KY. L.J. 1, 96-97 (1985) (discussing the benefits of judicial assessment in products liability actions); Elissa D. Cohen, Popular Disenchantment with our Current Tort System--Reforming Punitive Damages in Ohio, 14 U. DAYTON L. REV. 201, 224-25 (1988); Griffin B. Bell & Perry E. Pearce, Punitive Damages and the Tort System, 22 U. RICH. L. REV. 1, 2 (1987) (suggesting judicial assessment of punitive damages as one of three possible reforms for the tort system); Grant P. DuBois, Punitive Damages in Personal Injury, Products Liability and Professional Malpractice Cases: Bonanza or Disaster, 43 INS. COUNSEL J. 344, 353 (1976); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 ALA. L. REV. 975, 997-99, 1008 (1989) (discussing the benefits of judicial assessment in the context of advocating heightened evidentiary standards for the assessment of damages by juries); Jane Mallor & Barry Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 HASTINGS L.J. 639,

REV_00258513

[*1090] amount of punitive damages should reflect jurors' outrage at a defendant's conduct. [6] Further, they argue that a defendant's right to trial by jury is violated when a judge assesses punitive damages. [7]

The constitutionality of judicial assessment has recently been addressed by the highest courts of Kansas and Ohio, with conflicting results. In Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co., [8] the Ohio Supreme Court held that judicial assessment violates the right to trial by jury under the Ohio Constitution. [9] In contrast, the Kansas Supreme Court held in Smith v. Printup [10] that the Kansas Constitution does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. [11]

This Comment examines the practice of judicial assessment of punitive damages, both as a matter of constitutional law and as a matter of policy. In Part II, this Comment will provide an overview of the traditional doctrine of punitive damages and the move toward tort reform. In Part III, this Comment will examine the consistency of judicial as- [*1091] sessment of punitive damages with the right to trial by jury. Part III will examine the right to trial by jury under the United States Constitution, the Kansas Constitution, and the Ohio Constitution, discussing in detail the reasoning of the courts in Zoppo and Printup. Finally, in Part IV, this Comment will conclude that as a matter of constitutional law and as a matter of policy, judges should be permitted to assess punitive damages.

II. PUNITIVE DAMAGES

A. An Historical Overview

Punitive damages have been known as "exemplary damages," "vindictive damages," and "smart money." [12] The United States Supreme Court has stated that punitive damages are not compensation for an injury. [13] Instead, "they are private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence." [14] Thus, punitive damages focus primarily on the character of a defendant's conduct, rather than on the extent of a plaintiff's injuries. [15]

As a practical matter, an assessment of punitive damages generally involves two phases. In the first phase, a jury [16] determines whether a defendant is liable for punitive damages. [17] Specifically, defendants are liable for punitive damages only if their conduct is deemed worse than "mere negligence," such as a showing of spite or actual malice. [18] The [*1092] vast majority of jurisdictions generally require that a plaintiff also establish actual injury and be entitled to at least nominal damages before a defendant will be liable for punitive damages. [19]

In the second phase, the amount of punitive damages is assessed. A jury traditionally has discretion in determining the amount of the award. [20] A court often simply instructs jurors to award punitive damages sufficient to punish the defendant and to deter the defendant and others from similar misconduct. [21] Factors that jurors may consider in assessing punitive damages include the seriousness of the defendant's misconduct, the extent of the plaintiff's injury, and the wealth of the defendant. [22]

A defendant may seek judicial review of the amount of punitive damages assessed against him. A court reviewing the award will consider whether it was reasonable. [23] Courts have reversed awards of punitive damages, for example, after determining that an award was motivated by "passion" or "prejudice," [24] or that it "shocked the conscience" of the court. [25] Upon determining that punitive damages are excessive, a reviewing court generally has the power to order a remittitur [26] or a new trial. [27] At the appellate level, the usual standard [*1093] of review is whether the trial court's decision regarding the award constituted an abuse of discretion. [28]

B. The Rationale of Punitive Damages

REV_00258496

664-66 (1980); Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1158, 1171 (1966) [hereinafter Reappraisal]; David G. Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 103, 120-21 (1982) [hereinafter Owen, Public Good]; David G. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 52 (1982) (focusing on products liability actions); David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1320-21 (1976) (focusing on products liability actions) [hereinafter Owen, Products Liability]; Robert W. Pritchard, The Due Process Implications of Ohio's Punitive Damages Law--A Change Must be Made, 19 U. DAYTON L. REV. 1207, 1234-42 (1994); Dan Quayle, Civil Justice Reform, 41 AM. U. L. REV. 559, 565 (1992); James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 VAND. L. REV. 1117, 1167-68 (1984).

n6 For commentators arguing in support of jury assessment of damages, see generally Alan H. Scheiner, Judicial Assessment of Punitive Damages, the Seventh Amendment, and the Politics of Jury Power, 91 COLUM. L. REV. 142 (1991); Margaret M. Koesel, Invading the Province of the Jury: Section 2315.21(C) and Judicial Determination of the Amount of Punitive Damages, 15 OHIO N.U. L. REV. 55 (1988).

n7 See generally Scheiner, supra note 6; Koesel, supra note 6. See also STANTON G. DARLING II, OHIO CIVIL JUSTICE REFORM ACT 120-21 (1987).

n8 644 N.E.2d 397 (Ohio 1994). For a discussion of the majority and dissenting opinions in Zoppo, see infra notes 192-227 and accompanying text.

n9 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401.

n10 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993). For a discussion of the Printup opinion, see infra notes 165-85 and accompanying text.

n11 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994, 998.

n12 1 LINDA L. SCHLUETER & KENNETH R. REDDEN, PUNITIVE DAMAGES section 2.1(A) (2d ed. 1989); Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 517 (1957) (noting the usage of these different terms) [hereinafter Exemplary Damages].

n13 Gertz v. Welch, 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974).

n14 Id.

n15 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.10; see also Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 54 (1983). The doctrine of punitive damages was first articulated by an English court in 1763. See Wilkes v. Wood, 2 Wils. K.B. 205, 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763). For a discussion of the English common law recognition of punitive damages, see generally 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 1.3; Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 275 n.20 (1989). The American courts adopted the doctrine by the late eighteenth century. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 15 (1991). By the middle of the nineteenth century, the United States Supreme Court recognized that the doctrine of punitive damages was a wellsettled principle of American law. Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 363, 371 (1851) (stating that "to question the awarding of punitive damages will not admit of argument"). Id.

n16 In most cases at common law, jurors acted as triers of fact and assessed punitive damages. However, it should be noted that in some cases a trial judge can take the role of trier of fact and assess punitive damages in this capacity.

REV_00258514

n17 A plaintiff is not entitled to punitive damages as a matter of right; the jury has discretion to determine whether punitive damages should be awarded. 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 6.1(A); 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.11.

n18 The level of culpability varies with the jurisdiction, but courts generally require "circumstances of aggravation or outrage, such as spite or "malice,' or a fraudulent or evil motive on the part of the defendant, or such a conscious and deliberate disregard of the interests of others that the conduct may be called willful or wanton." W. PAGE KEETON ET AL., PROSSER AND KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS, section 2, at 9-10 (5th ed. 1984) (footnotes omitted).

n19 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 6.1(D)(3); 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.30.

n20 Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 15 (1991); see also 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 6.1.

n21 Haslip, 499 U.S. at 15 (noting that "under the traditional common law approach, the amount of the punitive award is initially determined by a jury instructed to consider the gravity of the wrong and the need to deter similar wrongful conduct"); see also 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.14 n.2 (listing examples of courts that have instructed jurors to assess punitive damages to punish the defendant and to deter the defendant and others).

n22 See 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.14.

n23 In determining whether a verdict is excessive, courts may consider the particular circumstances of a case and whether the award is consistent with the goals of punitive damages. 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.83.

n24 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 6.1(B); 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.82.

n25 See 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.82.

n26 Remittitur is defined as follows:

The procedural process by which an excessive verdict of the jury is reduced. If money damages awarded by a jury are grossly excessive as a matter of law, the judge may order the plaintiff to remit a portion of the award. In the alternative, the court may order a complete new trial or a trial limited to the issues of damages. The court may also condition a denial of a motion for new trial upon the filing by the plaintiff of a remittitur in a stated amount.

BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 1295 (6th ed. 1990) (citations omitted).

n27 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, sections 6.2-.3; see also Browning Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 279 (1989).

n28 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 6.1(A); 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.82; Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 279.

n29 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12. For cases noting the deterrence and punishment purposes of punitive damages, see, for example, Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 54 (1983); Gertz v. Welch, 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974). Other purposes of punitive damages have been recognized. For example, some states have recognized that punitive damages can serve the purpose of providing compensation to the plaintiff, such as for the plaintiff's attorney's fees. See generally 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12[3].

REV_00258515

n30 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 2.2(A)(1); 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12. For cases discussing the two purposes together, see, for example, Wade, 461 U.S. at 54; Preston v. Murty, 512 N.E.2d 1174, 1176 (Ohio 1987). A minority of jurisdictions recognize only one of the two rationales. See generally 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12.

n31 Dorsey D. Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 4-8 (1982). For a discussion of the level of culpability required for the imposition of punitive damages, see supra note 18 and accompanying text.

n32 Ellis, supra note 31, at 8. Punitive damages also may play a quasi-criminal role, creating a bridge between the tort policy of finding fault and the criminal law policy of punishing wrongs to society. 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12[1]. Further, punitive damages may provide adequate punishment when compensatory damages alone would not suffice. See Exemplary Damages, supra note 12, at 524.

n33 5 MINZER ET AL., supra note 3, section 40.12[2]; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS section 908 (1979); see also Wade, 461 U.S. at 54.

n34 Ellis, supra note 31, at 8; Charles T. McCormick, Some Phases of the Doctrine of Exemplary Damages, 8 N.C. L. REV. 129, 130 (1930) (noting that in some cases, compensatory damages are a great deterrent, but "the danger of the addition of punitive damages seems calculated to increase decidedly the deterrent value of the verdict").

n35 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 648.

n36 See id.; Exemplary Damages, supra note 12, at 522.

n37 For a discussion of the criticism, see Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, The Historical Continuity of Punitive Damages Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 AM. U. L. REV. 1269, 1275-76 (1993).

n38 See Quayle, supra note 5, at 564 (contending that if the traditional approach to punitive damages was not reformed, it would "continue to generate disproportionately high awards in a random and capricious manner").

n39 Justice O'Connor has criticized the traditional doctrine of punitive damages in several cases. See, e.g., Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 482 U.S. 257, 282 (1989) (O'Connor, J, concurring in part and dissenting in part) (stating that "punitive damages are skyrocketing"); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 113 S. Ct. 2711, 2728-29 (1993) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (contending that "arbitrariness, caprice, passion, bias, and even malice can replace reasoned judgment and law as the basis for jury decisionmaking. . . . This is especially true in the area of punitive damages . . .").

n40 Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 282 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). However, the issue of whether punitive damages are, in fact, skyrocketing has been subject to debate. See, e.g., RAND INSTITUTE FOR CIVIL JUSTICE, ANNUAL REPORT (1992-93) (finding that the frequency of punitive damages awards has increased, especially against businesses); Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 IOWA L. REV. 1 (1993) (presenting statistical data and contending that there is no crisis in punitive damages awards for products liability).

REV_00258516

n41 Quayle, supra note 5, at 564.

n42 For a discussion of states' approaches to tort reform, see generally 1 SCHLUETER & REDDEN, supra note 12, section 9.13.

n43 See Neil A. Lewis, Senate, 61-37, Approves Narrow Punitive-Damages Curb, N.Y. TIMES, May 10, 1995, at B10. The United States House of Representatives moved to limit punitive damages in all civil suits to $ 250,000 or three times the amount awarded for medical bills and lost wages, whichever was greater. Id. However, the Senate in May of 1995 instead adopted a measure that was narrower in scope, limiting damages only in products liability actions to $ 250,000 or twice the amount awarded for medical bills, lost wages, and pain and suffering. Id. A conference committee was to be established to attempt to reach a compromise. Id.

n44 See supra note 1.

n45 See, e.g., FLA. STAT. ANN. section 768.73; UTAH CODE ANN. section 78-18-1.

n46 Several states prohibit recovery of punitive damages unless a law expressly provides for recovery. See, e.g., CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 47-212 (West 1995) (applying to cases under the Common Interest Ownership Act); S.D. CODIFIED LAWS ANN. section 21-1-4 (1987); VT. STAT. ANN. tit. 9A, section 1-106 (1994) (applying to cases arising under the Uniform Commercial Code).

n47 See supra note 4.

n48 See CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 52-240b.

n49 See KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701; OHIO REV. CODE ANN. section 2315.21. However, the Ohio statute was found unconstitutional by the Ohio Supreme Court, see infra notes 192-206 and accompanying text.

n50 For a discussion of the Ohio Supreme Court's holding on the constitutionality of judicial assessment, see infra notes 192-206 and accompanying text. For a discussion of the Kansas Supreme Court's holding on the constitutionality of judicial assessment, see infra notes 165-85 and accompanying text.

n51 U.S. CONST. amend. VII.

n52 See Pearson v. Yewdall, 95 U.S. 294, 296 (1877).

n53 ALA. CONST. art. 1, section 11; ALASKA CONST. art I, section 16; ARK. CONST. art. II, section 7; CAL. CONST. art. I, section 16; CONN. CONST. art. 1, section 19; DEL. CONST. art. 1, section 4; FLA. CONST. art. 1, section 22; GA. CONST. art. 1, section 1 1 11; HAW. CONST. art. 1, section 13; IDAHO CONST. art I, section 7; ILL. CONST. art I, section 13; IND. CONST. art. I, section 20; IOWA CONST. art I, section 9; KAN. CONST. Bill of Rights section 5; KY. CONST. section 242; ME. CONST. art I, section 20; MD. CONST., Declaration of Rights art. 23; MASS. CONST. pt. I, art. 15; MICH. CONST. art. 1, section 14; MINN. CONST. art I, section 4; MISS. CONST. art. III, section 31; MO. CONST. art I, section 22(a); MONT. CONST. art. III, section 26; NEB. CONST. art. I, section 6; NEV. CONST. art I, section 3; N.H. CONST. pt. 1, art. 20; N.J. CONST. art. 1, 1 9; N.M. CONST. art. II, section 12; N.Y. CONST. art. I, section 2; N.C. CONST. art. I, section 25; N.D. CONST. art I, section 13; OHIO CONST. art. 1, section 5; OKLA. CONST. art. II, section 19; OR. CONST. art VII, section 3; PA. CONST. art. I, section 6; R.I. CONST. art. I, section 15; S.C. CONST. art. I, section 14; S.D. CONST. art. VI, section 6; TENN. CONST. art. I, section 6; TEX. CONST. art I, section 15; UTAH CONST. art. I, section 10; VT. CONST. ch. 1, art. 12; VA. CONST. art. 1, section

REV_00258517

11; WASH. CONST. art. 1, section 21; W. VA. CONST. art. III, section 13; WIS. CONST. art I, section 5; WYO. CONST. art. I, section 9.

n54 See, e.g., Digital & Analog Design Corp. v. North Supply Co., 590 N.E.2d 737, 742 n.1 (Ohio 1992); Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 403 n.2 (Wright, J., dissenting) (Ohio 1994).

n55 For a discussion of Printup, see infra notes 165-85 and accompanying text. For a discussion of Zoppo, see infra notes 192-206 and accompanying text.

n56 U.S. CONST. amend. VII.

n57 The two different approaches can be seen in the Tull opinion. See infra notes 71-93 and accompanying text.

n58 See Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 417-25 (1987).

n59 See, e.g., Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27; Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 156 n.11 (1973).

n60 413 U.S. at 149.

n61 Id. at 149-51. In Colgrove, a Montana district court empaneled a six-member jury for a diversity case in compliance with a local procedural rule. Id. at 150. The petitioner sought a writ of mandamus from the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, alleging, inter alia, that the rule violated the Seventh Amendment. Id. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals sustained the legality of the rule and denied the writ. Id. at 151. The United States Supreme Court, in an opinion written by Justice Brennan, affirmed the denial of the writ. Id. Four justices dissented from the Court's holding. See id. at 165-88.

n62 Id. at 152. The Court stated: "On its face, this language is not directed to jury characteristics, such as size, but rather defines the kind of cases for which jury trial is preserved, namely "suits at common law.' " Id. The Court also noted that it had found six-member juries constitutional in certain criminal cases. Id. at 151 (citing Williams v. Florida, 399 U.S. 78 (1970)).

n63 Id. at 152-56.

n64 Id. at 156-57.

n65 Id. at 156 (quoting Baltimore & Carolina Line, Inc. v. Redman, 295 U.S. 654, 657 (1935)).

n66 Id. at 156 (citing Galloway v. United States, 319 U.S. 372 (1943)). The court added that new devices may be used to adapt the institution to meet present needs, provided that the substance of the right to trial by jury is preserved. Id. at 157 (citing Ex Parte Peterson, 253 U.S. 300, 309-10 (1920); Funk v. United States, 290 U.S. 371, 382 (1933)).

n67 Id. at 157-60.

n68 Id. at 157 (citing Gasoline Prods. Co. v. Champlin Co., 283 U.S. 494, 498 (1931)).

n69 Id.

n70 Id. The Court went on to find that dicta stating trial by jury meant trial by a twelvemember jury was unpersuasive, id. at 157-58, and that a six-member jury was adequate to meet the mandates of the Seventh Amendment, id. at 158-60.

REV_00258518

n71 481 U.S. 412 (1987).

n72 Id. at 414. At issue was the Clean Water Act's prohibition of the discharge of dredged or fill material into navigable waters. Id. (citing 33 U.S.C. sections 1311, 1344 & 1362(7); 33 C.F.R. sections 323.2(a)(1)-(7) (1986)).

n73 Id. at 414-15.

n74 Id. at 415.

n75 Id. at 415-16. Of the fine, $ 250,000 was to be suspended upon restoration of a waterway. Id. at 415. However, the developer stated that he had no choice but to pay the entire fine because he would need to purchase land from third parties at a cost of more than $ 700,000 to complete the restoration. Id. at 415-16. The Court also ordered separate injunctive relief. Id. at 416.

n76 Id.

n77 Id. at 427.

n78 Id. at 417-25.

n79 Id. at 420. It concluded that the cause of action was analogous to both an action in debt, which required a jury trial at common law, and a public nuisance action, as the government contended. Id.

n80 Id. at 421 (citing Ross v. Bernhard, 396 U.S. 531, 538 n.10 (1970)).

n81 Id. at 422-25. The Court considered the nature of the remedy sought in Part IIB of its opinion. Id.

n82 Id. at 422.

n83 See id. at 422-23.

n84 Id. at 423, 425.

n85 Id. at 425-27.

n86 Id. at 426 (quoting Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 156 n.11, 157 (1973)).

n87 Id.

n88 Id. The Court noted, "Congress' authority to fix the penalty by statute has not been questioned, and it was also the British practice." Id. (citation omitted).

n89 Id. at 426-27. Therefore, according to the Court, Congress can delegate the power to assess civil penalties to a trial judge without violating the Seventh Amendment. Id. at 427. Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Stevens, concurred with the Court for Parts I and II but dissented from Part III. Id. at 427-28. He found fault with the majority's logic in Part III, contending that it does not follow that Seventh Amendment rights cannot be invoked in cases where Congress has not fixed the amount of a civil fine. Id. at 427. Justice Scalia further stated that the majority created a form of adjudication he had never before encountered by providing for jury determination of liability and judicial assessment of civil fines. Id. at 428.

REV_00258519

To that end, he stated that "even punitive damages are assessed by the jury" after a jury determination of liability. Id. Justice Scalia acknowledged that it was tempting to analogize judicial assessment of civil fines to the judicial role in criminal sentencing. Id. However, noting that a heightened standard of proof is used to determine liability in criminal trials, Justice Scalia stated the government must "take the bitter with the sweet." Id. In other words, the government takes the benefit of proving a case by only a preponderance of the evidence along with the disadvantage of accepting an assessment of civil fines by a jury. See id.

n90 Id. at 427.

n91 Id. at 426 n.9.

n92 Id. For an argument that the framers in fact intended to extend the Seventh Amendment to the remedy phase, at least with regard to punitive damages, see Scheiner, supra note 6, at 145-60.

n93 Id. The Court reiterated its statement from Colgrove that the history of the Seventh Amendment shows that the amendment was adopted because of fear that the civil trial would be abolished. Id. (citing Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 152 (1973)).

n94 The fact that the Court has not spoken to this issue has resulted in some confusion. For example, in Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., the Fourth Circuit concluded that judicial assessment of punitive damages is constitutional. 873 F.2d 736, 742 (4th Cir. 1989), overruled by Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc). However, the court overruled itself in Defender, concluding that judicial assessment of punitive damages violates the Seventh Amendment. Defender, 938 F.2d at 507.

n95 For example, in Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., the Court addressed whether an award of punitive damages was excessive under the Eighth Amendment or federal common law. 492 U.S. 257 (1989). Additionally, in Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, the Court addressed Due Process issues, concluding that the common law method of assessing punitive damages is not a per se violation of due process, 499 U.S. 1, 17-18 (1991), and that the amount of punitive damages assessed in that particular case did not violate due process, id. at 23-24. The Court has also issued TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., in which it concluded that the punitive damages award in that case did not violate due process, 113 S. Ct. 2711, 2722-23 (1991), and that the procedure used to award punitive damages also did not violate due process, id. at 2723-24.

n96 The first case is Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 740-42. However, the Fourth Circuit overruled this case in Defender, 938 F.2d at 507. Other circuits have addressed judicial assessment of punitive damages since the Tull decision was issued, but they have not examined judicial assessment of punitive damages in light of the Tull decision. See, e.g., Haluschak v. Dodge City of Wauwatosa, 909 F.2d 254, 256-57 (7th Cir. 1990) (finding that judicial assessment of punitive damages violates the Seventh Amendment); Morgan v. Woessner, 997 F.2d 1244, 1258-59 (9th Cir. 1993) (indicating that a judge should not assess punitive damages).

n97 The facts and reasoning of Shamblin's and Defender are discussed infra notes 102-28 & 129-52 and accompanying text, respectively.

n98 873 F.2d at 736.

n99 Id. at 740-42.

n100 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

REV_00258520

n101 Id. at 507.

n102 873 F.2d at 737-38.

n103 Id. at 737.

n104 Id.

n105 Id.

n106 Id. at 739. Specifically, a witness testified that the defendant had a policy of withholding equipment that was submitted for consideration of whether it was covered by a warranty until the defendant got payment for repair. Id. Cross-examination revealed, however, that the witness did not have personal knowledge of the defendant's policies. Id. Nevertheless, plaintiff's counsel stated to the jury in his closing argument:

What's scary about this case is not once did anyone get up here and tell you we've changed our corporate policies . . . . If your verdict is not large enough . . . what these people are going to do is they are going to laugh, they are going to say juries in West Virginia are going to condone our type of business practice, and they are going to continue to do it again and again until someone can stop it.

Id.

n107 Id. at 743.

n108 Id.

n109 Id. at 740-42.

n110 Id. at 740.

n111 Id. at 740-41.

n112 Id.

n113 Id. The cases mentioned by the court included Rowlett v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 832 F.2d 194, 207 (1st Cir. 1987) ($ 3,000,000 award reduced to $ 300,000), Bell v. City of Milwaukee, 746 F.2d 1205, 1267, 1279 (7th Cir. 1984) ($ 350,000 award reduced to $ 50,000), and Guzman v. Western State Bank, 540 F.2d 948, 954 (8th Cir. 1976) ($ 25,000 award reduced to $ 10,000). Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 740. In the fourth case the court cited, the original assessment of damages was reached by a judge in a bench trial. Id. at 740-41 (citing Shimman v. Frank, 625 F.2d 80, 102, 104 (6th Cir. 1980) ($ 75,000 award reduced to $ 20,000)).

n114 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741.

n115 Id. at 740 n.2 (citing McKinnon v. City of Berwyn, 750 F.2d 1383, 1391-92 (7th Cir. 1984)).

n116 Id.

REV_00258521

n117 Id. at 741-42.

n118 Id. at 741 (discussing Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U.S. 22 (1889)).

n119 Id. (citing Kennon, 131 U.S. at 28-30).

n120 Id.

n121 Id.

n122 Id. For a discussion of the purposes of punitive damages, see supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

n123 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741-42. The facts and reasoning of Tull are discussed supra notes 71-93 and accompanying text.

n124 Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9.

n125 Id. at 427.

n126 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741.

n127 Id. (citing Tull, 481 U.S. at 422 n.7).

n128 Id. at 741-42. The court proceeded to conclude that eighteenth century cases did not require it to distinguish Tull. Id. at 742. The court noted that eighteenth century juries could not award damages for intangible harms, such as pain and suffering, but, in light of the present law of damages that permits the compensation of parties for intangible harm, the compensatory function of punitive damages is now "vestigial." Id. The court concluded that no principled distinction exists between civil penalties and punitive damages. Id.

n129 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

n130 Id. at 503-04. The plaintiff originally brought suit for breach of contract, breach of contract accompanied by a fraudulent act, fraud, constructive fraud and negligence arising from misrepresentations and fraudulent statements by the defendant's agents. Id. at 504. The district court granted the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on all of the claims except for fraud and constructive fraud. Id.

n131 Id. The jury awarded compensatory damages in the exact amount the plaintiff had paid in premiums to the defendant while the insurance policy was in effect. Id.

n132 Id. The district court ordered, however, that if its award was vacated on appeal, a new trial would be held to determine the amount of punitive damages. Id. at 503.

n133 Id. at 505.

n134 Id. (citing Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736, 743 (4th Cir. 1989), overruled by Defender, 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc)).

n135 Id. at 505-06.

n136 Id.

n137 Id. at 506.

REV_00258522

n138 Id. at 506-07.

n139 Id.

n140 Id. at 506. As discussed above, the Fourth Circuit characterized Kennon differently in the Shamblin's opinion, concluding that the Kennon case spoke only to compensatory damages and was irrelevant to punitive damages. See supra notes 118-22 and accompanying text.

n141 Defender, 938 F.2d at 506-07.

n142 Id. (citing Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989)).

n143 Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 278-79 (cited in Defender, 938 F.2d at 506-07).

n144 The Defender court quoted the following portion of the Browning-Ferris opinion:

It is not our role to review directly the award for excessiveness, or to substitute our judgment for that of the jury. Rather, our only inquiry is whether the Court of Appeals erred in finding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant petitioners' motion, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 59, for a new trial or remittitur . . . .

. . . In a diversity action, or in any other lawsuit where state law provides the basis of decision, the propriety of an award of punitive damages for the conduct in question, and the factors the jury may consider in determining their amount, are questions of state law . . . .

In reviewing an award of punitive damages, the role of the District Court is to determine whether the jury's verdict is within the confines set by state law, and to determine, by reference to federal standards developed under Rule 59, whether a new trial or remittitur should be ordered. The Court of Appeals should then review the District Court's determination under an abuse-of-discretion standard.

Defender, 938 F.2d at 506 (quoting Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 278-79).

n145 Id. at 507 (citing Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991)).

n146 The Defender court quoted the following portion of the opinion:

Under the traditional common-law approach, the amount of the punitive award is initially determined by a jury instructed to consider the gravity of the wrong and the need to deter similar wrongful conduct. The jury's determination is then reviewed by trial and appellate courts to ensure that it is reasonable.

Id. (quoting Haslip, 499 U.S. at 15).

n147 Id. at 506.

REV_00258523

Most jurisdictions recognize that punitive damages serve both to punish defendants for past crimes and to deter the commission of future crimes. [29] Although courts often discuss punishment and deterrence in tandem, the two concepts provide differing rationales for the imposition of punitive damages. [30]

Once an actor has knowingly inflicted an injury, punishment serves to express society's shock and condemnation of such conduct. [31] Punishment is therefore retrospective and serves to penalize an actor. [32] Punitive damages also serve to deter a defendant and others from misconduct. [33] In contrast to the punishment rationale, the deterrence rationale of punitive damages is prospective and seeks to influence future conduct. [34]

Ideally, an award of punitive damages would simultaneously punish a defendant and deter the defendant and others. [35] Thus, the punishment and deterrence rationales of punitive damages are closely allied. [*1094] In fact, several commentators have maintained that these two purposes should be considered jointly because inflicting punishment for past actions also tends to deter future misconduct. [36]

C. Modifications of the Doctrine of Punitive Damages

Despite the recognized purposes of punitive damages, their use has been subject to great criticism in recent years. [37] The critics, who have included former Vice President Dan Quayle [38] and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, [39] have contended that punitive damage awards are "skyrocketing" [40] and have been awarded in a "random and capricious manner." [41] In this atmosphere of criticism, proponents of tort reform have strived to change the manner for imposing punitive damages at both the federal and state level. [42]

On the federal level, Congress has considered adopting across-theboard limits on punitive damages. [43] On the state level, state legisla- [*1095] tures have adopted several methods of reform. For example, some states have set statutory caps on the total amount of punitive damages that can be awarded, [44] have required that a portion of punitive damages be paid to the state or a state-sponsored fund, [45] or have enacted general prohibitions of punitive damages in specific types of cases. [46] Finally, three states--Connecticut, Kansas, and Ohio--have required judicial assessment of punitive damages. [47] The Connecticut statute, which is limited to products liability cases, has not been subject to much dispute. [48] In contrast, the Ohio and Kansas measures are broader in scope, [49] and their constitutionality has been addressed by the highest courts of their respective states. [50]

III. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF JUDICIAL ASSESSMENT OF DAMAGES

An examination of the constitutionality of judicial assessment of punitive damages begins with the Seventh Amendment of the United States Constitution. [51] The Seventh Amendment is not directly binding upon the states, [52] but nearly all of the states, including Kansas and Ohio, have jury trial provisions that are analogous to the Seventh Amendment. [53] Thus, Seventh Amendment jurisprudence is persuasive [*1096] authority in state actions and is instructive in discussing the right to trial by jury under the constitutions of the states. [54] Seventh Amendment jurisprudence is also important in understanding the differing approaches of the Printup and Zoppo courts when analyzing the right to trial by jury under their state constitutions. [55]

A. Federal Right to Trial by Jury

1. Analysis of the United States Supreme Court for Ascertaining Right to Jury Trial

The Seventh Amendment provides, "In Suits at common law . . . the right of trial by jury shall be preserved . . . ." [56] In interpreting the Seventh Amendment, the United States

REV_00258497

n148 Id. at 507.

n149 Id. These cases were cited in Shamblin's; see supra note 113 and accompanying text.

n150 Defender, 938 F.2d at 507. Neither of the cases that the Fourth Circuit mentioned discusses the Tull opinion. See O'Gilvie v. International Playtex, Inc., 821 F.2d 1438, 1447-48 (10th Cir. 1987); McKinnon v. City of Berwyn, 750 F.2d 1383, 1391-92 (7th Cir. 1984). The McKinnon opinion was issued three years prior to Tull; in fact, the Shamblin's court distinguished it, viewing it as inconsistent with Tull. See supra notes 115-16 and accompanying text. The second opinion, O'Gilvie, was issued just two months after Tull, and it discusses the Seventh Amendment issue very briefly. The court stated that in the ordinary case "the plaintiff must be offered a choice between a new trial and accepting a remittitur to avoid a serious problem under the Seventh Amendment . . . . " O'Gilvie, 821 F.2d at 1447. However, the court concluded that it was not dealing with an ordinary remittitur case because the trial court was without power to order a remittitur under the unusual circumstances of the case. Id. at 1447-48.

n151 Defender, 938 F.2d at 507.

n152 Id.

n153 Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 426 (1987).

n154 Id. at 426-27.

n155 Id. at 426 n.9.

n156 See Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 742; Defender, 938 F.2d at 507.

n157 See, e.g., Smith v. Printup, 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993) (concluding that judicial assessment of punitive damages is not barred by the Kansas jury trial provision); Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397 (Ohio 1994) (concluding that judicial assessment of punitive damages is barred by the Ohio jury trial provision).

n158 See supra note 157.

n159 866 P.2d at 997-98.

n160 For a discussion of the conditions that states have required before punitive damages will be awarded, see supra notes 18-19 and accompanying text.

n161 For example, the Kansas Supreme Court stated in Schippel v. Norton, 16 P. 804, 807 (Kan. 1888): "Where no actual damage is suffered, surely no exemplary damages can by allowed. Exemplary damages can never constitute the basis of a cause of action." Printup, 866 P.2d at 992.

n162 See Folks v. Kansas Power & Light Co., 755 P.2d 1319, 1323 (Kan. 1988). The purposes of punitive damages are discussed supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

n163 See Nordstrom v. Miller, 605 P.2d 545, 549 (Kan. 1980).

n164 KAN. CONST. Bill of Rights section 5. An example of a case interpreting this provision is Kansas Malpractice Victims Coalition v. Bell, 757 P.2d 251 (Kan. 1988). In that case, the Kansas Supreme Court concluded that a $ 100,000 cap on total recovery in medical malpractice actions violated the jury trial guarantee. Id. at 258.

REV_00258524

n165 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993).

n166 Id. at 990. In Printup, the driver of the van lost control and crossed the median of the Kansas Turnpike, crashing into the pickup truck. Id. The crash resulted in the deaths of the driver and passenger of the pickup truck. Id. The plaintiffs, including the administrator of the estate of the passenger in the pickup truck, brought suit against the driver of the moving van, his employer and the company that leased his services. Id.

n167 Id. The court awarded $ 20,000 against the driver and $ 100,000 against the company that leased his services. Id.

n168 Id. at 991. The constitutionality of the statute was one of the eleven issues the plaintiffs raised on appeal. Id. The statute provides:

In any civil action in which exemplary of punitive damages are recoverable, the trier of fact shall determine, concurrent with all other issues presented, whether such damages shall be allowed. If such damages are allowed, a separate proceeding shall be conducted by the court to determine the amount of such damages to be awarded.

KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701(a) (1994).

n169 Printup, 866 P.2d at 993.

n170 Id. at 992.

n171 Id.

n172 Id.

n173 Id.

n174 Id. The court stated: "The question we must resolve . . . is whether the fact that juries historically have determined the amount of punitive damages rises to the level of a right that existed at common law." Id.

n175 Id. at 993-94. The court stated that the right to a jury assessment of compensatory damages is guaranteed because it involves factual issues and because the presence of a claim for compensatory damages indicated a suit at law, which has traditionally been tried by a jury. Id.

n176 Id. at 994.

n177 Id.

n178 Id.

n179 Id.

n180 Id. The purposes of punitive damages are discussed supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

REV_00258525

n181 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994. The court cited Digital & Analog Design Corp. v. North Supply Co., 590 N.E.2d 737 (Ohio 1992). In that case, the Ohio Supreme Court indicated that punitive damages may be deemed equitable. See id. at 742. It should be noted, however, that the Ohio Supreme Court rejected some of the Digital decision's reasoning in Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 401-02 (Ohio 1994). See discussion of Zoppo infra notes 202-06 and accompanying text.

n182 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994. The court stated: "Given the character of a claim for punitive damages, the fact that juries historically determined punitive damages at common law does not establish that such determination was a right at common law." Id.

n183 Id.

n184 Id. Having raised the issue of the power of a legislature to alter the traditional doctrine of punitive damages, the court surveyed the practices in other jurisdictions regarding alterations of the traditional doctrine. Id. at 995-98. The court found, inter alia, that eight states required payment of a portion of punitive damages to the state or a state-sponsored fund. Id. at 995. Courts had addressed the constitutionality of four of the state statutes, finding two of the statutes unconstitutional and two constitutional. Id. at 995-96. The court stated, however, that none of these statutes or cases answered the relevant question, which was the extent to which the historical doctrine of punitive damages can be altered consistently with the Kansas Constitution. Id. at 996.

Additionally, the court discussed a case analogous to the present case, in which a dissenting judge made the argument that if the legislature has the power to abolish punitive damages, it must also have the power to modify the method of assessment of punitive damages. Id. at 997 (discussing Henderson v. Alabama Power Co., 627 So. 2d 878, 899 (Ala. 1993) (Maddox, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part)). Finding this argument persuasive, the court stated that nothing in the Kansas Constitution or in the common law prevents the legislature from requiring judicial assessment of damages. Id. at 996.

n185 Id.

n186 644 N.E.2d 397 (Ohio 1994).

n187 For a discussion of the traditional doctrine of punitive damages, see supra notes 12-40 and accompanying text.

n188 For a discussion of the traditional doctrine of punitive damages, see supra notes 12-40 and accompanying text; see, e.g., Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n189 See, e.g., Western Union Tel. Co. v. Smith, 59 N.E. 890, 892 (Ohio 1901) (noting the punitive damages are awarded to punish a guilty party for wrongful acts). It should be noted that most states recognize the dual purposes of punitive damages to punish and deter, see supra notes 32-40 and accompanying text, but Ohio case law has focused on their purpose of punishing a defendant. See Western Union, 59 N.E. at 892; Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n190 OHIO CONST. art. I, section 5. The provision states: "The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate, except that, in civil cases, laws may be passed to authorize the rendering of a verdict by the concurrence of not less than three-fourths of the jury." Id.

n191 Belding v. State ex rel. Heifner, 169 N.E. 301, 301 (Ohio 1929); Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 510 (Ohio 1994).

n192 The courts addressed the constitutionality of OHIO REV. CODE section 2315.21(C)(2)

REV_00258526

(Anderson 1995), which required judicial assessment of punitive damages. The statute provided: "In a tort action, whether the trier of fact is a jury or the court, if the trier of fact determines that any defendant is liable for punitive or exemplary damages, the amount of those damages shall be determined by the court." Id.

n193 See Zoppo, No. 62926, 1993 WL 262641, at *7 (Ohio Ct. App. July 8, 1993). For a discussion of the test, see Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 426 (1987). The appellate court opinion discussed the constitutionality of the statute under the Tull fundamental elements test, but the court never mentioned that the test had previously been reserved for Seventh Amendment cases, and the Seventh Amendment has not been applied to the states. See Zoppo, 1993 WL at *7. The facts of the Zoppo case were set forth by the Ohio Supreme Court when the case reached the court on appeal. Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 398. The defendant, an insurance company, insured a building belonging to the plaintiff. Id. The building was a restaurant-bar, and it was destroyed in a fire started with kerosene. Id. After investigating the fire, the defendant denied coverage to the plaintiff, alleging that evidence showed the plaintiff participated in starting the fire and that the plaintiff made material misrepresentations about his whereabouts at the time of the fire. Id. The plaintiff then brought suit for breach of contract and bad faith refusal to settle. Id. At trial, the jury awarded $ 80,000 in compensatory damages for breach of contract and $ 187,800 for bad faith. Id. Additionally, the jury found the defendant liable for punitive damages. Id. After the jury crucial determination of liability, the court assessed $ 50,000 in punitive damages against the defendant. Id.

n194 Zoppo, 1993 WL at *7. Specifically, the court of appeals stated, "we hold that plaintiff has not demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt that R.C. 2315.21(C)(2) is unconstitutional." Id.

n195 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401-02.

n196 See id. Justices Douglas and Resnick concurred. Id. at 402. Justice A. William Sweeney concurred in the syllabus and judgment only. Id.

n197 Id. at 401 (citations omitted). In the opinion, the court stated that it "must first determine" whether there existed a common law right to jury assessment of punitive damages. Id. The second issue, the court explained, was whether there were sufficient facts to justify awarding punitive damages. Id. at 402. The court then determined that the award was justified. Id.

n198 Id. The court stated:

Prior to the 1987 enactment of R.C. 2315.21(C)(2) . . . , juries in this state had the integral role of determining not only when punitive damages were justified but also of assessing the amount of such damages. Clearly, the assessment of punitive damages by the jury stems from the common law and is encompassed within the right to trial by jury. However, the legislature, by enacting R.C. 2315.21(C)(2) and by permitting only the court to determine the amount of punitive damages, has in effect abrogated the common-law right of the jury to assess the amount of punitive damages.

Id. (citation omitted).

n199 Id.

n200 Id.

REV_00258527

n201 590 N.E.2d 737 (Ohio 1992).

n202 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401-02.

n203 Digital, 590 N.E.2d at 741-42.

n204 Id. at 742.

n205 Id.

n206 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401-02 (citing Digital, 590 N.E.2d at 742-43).

n207 Id. at 403 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n208 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n209 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n210 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting). The dissent stated,

Appropriate analysis in the case cannot, and should not, end with the broad conclusion that an individual has a jury-trial right with respect to tort actions. This case presents a much narrower question: whether a plaintiff has a right to have a jury decide the amount of the punitive damages award. That is the issue and the majority simply fails to come to grips with it.

Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n211 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting) (citing Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412 (1987); Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149 (1973)).

n212 See id. at 403 n.2 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n213 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n214 Id. at 403 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n215 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n216 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n217 Id. at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n218 Id. at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n219 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting) (citing Preston v. Murty, 512 N.E.2d 1174, 1176 (Ohio 1987)).

n220 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting). The dissent noted that the Printup court had also concluded that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element. Id. (Wright, J., dissenting) (citing Smith v. Printup, 866 P.2d 985, 994 (Kan. 1993)). The Printup opinion is discussed supra notes 165-85 and accompanying text.

REV_00258528

n221 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n222 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting). The similarity between assessing punitive damages and criminal sentencing has been recognized by several commentators. See infra note 328 and accompanying text.

n223 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n224 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n225 Id. (Wright, J., dissenting).

n226 Id. (Wright J., dissenting) (citing Smith v. Printup, 966 P.2d 985, 994 (Kan. 1993)). The Printup case is discussed supra notes 165-85 and accompanying text.

n227 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting).

n228 See 481 U.S. 412, 425-27 (1987).

n229 873 F.2d 736, 742 (4th Cir. 1989), overruled by Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

n230 938 F.2d at 507.

n231 866 P.2d 985, 994, 998 (Kan. 1993).

n232 644 N.E.2d 397, 401 (Ohio 1994).

n233 866 P.2d 985, 994, 998 (Kan. 1993).

n234 644 N.E.2d 397, 401 (Ohio 1994).

n235 See Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 152-57 (1973); Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 426 (1987).

n236 Colgrove, 413 U.S. at 157 (quoted in Tull, 481 U.S. at 426).

n237 See, e.g., Colgrove, 413 U.S. at 157; Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27.

n238 Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9. The Court's statements are quoted in the text accompanying note 92, supra.

n239 See Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 403-04 (Ohio 1994) (Wright, J., dissenting); Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736, 742 (4th Cir. 1989) (concluding that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element), overruled by Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc); see also Colleen P. Murphy, Integrating the Constitutional Authority of Civil and Criminal Juries, 61 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 723, 802-03 (1993) (noting that punitive damages are penal in nature, similar to civil penalties and criminal sentencing, and arguing that the Seventh Amendment does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages); Jonathan Kagan, Comment, Toward a Uniform Application of Punishment: Using the Federal Sentencing Guidelines as a Model for Punitive Damage Reform, 40 UCLA L. REV. 753, 772 (1993) ("Efforts to restrict jury discretion in punitive damage determinations do not seem to run afoul of the Constitution."); Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1237-38 (stating that judicial assessment of punitive damages appears to be constitutional). But see Defender, 938 F.2d at 507 (concluding that an assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element of trial by jury); Scheiner, supra note 6, at 18497 (arguing that jury assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element because the framers intended for the jury to protect the interests of common people and because the amount of damages awarded may determine whether a plaintiff chooses to vindicate his rights).

REV_00258529

n240 Gertz v. Welch, 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974).

n241 Id.

n242 See Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27.

n243 Id. at 422 n.7.

n244 Id. at 425-27.

n245 For a discussion of the similarity between punitive damages and criminal sentencing, see infra note 328 and accompanying text.

n246 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that an assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772; Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 ("The Constitution should not be deemed to guarantee jury calculation of punitive damages, just as it does not guarantee jury participation in either civil penalty assessment or in certain aspects of sentencing.").

n247 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S. 149, 157 (1973) (stating that a 12-member jury is not a fundamental element of trial by jury because it is not necessary for a fair and equitable resolution of factual issues); Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9 (indicating that the Seventh Amendment may not extend to the remedy phase of a civil trial).

n248 Gertz v. Welch, 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974). For a discussion of the purposes of punitive damages, see supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

n249 Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 ("The typical purpose of punitive damages is not compensation to the plaintiff, but furthering public policy goals such as retribution and deterrence. Thus, the Constitution should not be deemed to guarantee jury calculation of punitive damages . . . ."). (footnotes omitted); Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that an assessment of punitive damages falls outside the fundamental role of a jury).

n250 413 U.S. 149 (1973). For a discussion of the case, see supra notes 60-70 and accompanying text.

n251 Colgrove, 413 U.S. at 157.

n252 Colgrove could conceivably be construed broadly to require jury resolution of all factual issues. See id. at 157 (stating "the purpose of the jury trial . . . in civil cases is to assure a fair and equitable resolution of factual issues . . . "). However, such a broad reading of Colgrove would be inconsistent with Tull. In Tull, the Court found that an assessment of civil penalties is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27. Although factual issues may be raised regarding the amount of civil penalties necessary to punish a defendant, the Court found that these issues need not be resolved by a jury. See id. In fact, the Court indicated that the Seventh Amendment may not extend to the remedy phase of a civil trial. Id. at 426 n.9. Thus, Colgrove may be construed as protecting only a defendant's right to have liability and compensatory damages determined by a jury. See id. (indicating that the Seventh Amendment may not extend to the remedy phase of a civil trial); Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that punitive damages may be assessed by a judge); Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736, 740-42 (4th Cir. 1989) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that punitive damages may be assessed by a judge), overruled by Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

REV_00258530

n253 See supra note 15 and accompanying text.

n254 481 U.S. 425-27 (1987). For a discussion of the case, see supra notes 71-93 and accompanying text.

n255 Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27.

n256 See Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741-42; Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03.

n257 One commentator has argued that punitive damages must be distinguished from civil penalties because punitive damages are awarded to a private plaintiff, rather than the government, and the risk of judicial bias in favor private wealth and power is therefore greater. Scheiner, supra note 6, at 209-12. However, the U.S. Supreme Court has explicitly recognized the similarity between civil penalties and punitive damages. Tull, 481 U.S. at 422 n.7 (noting that civil penalties are similar to punitive damages in that both exact punishment and are not fixed fines); see also Shamblin's, 783 F.2d at 741-42 (arguing that the Tull reasoning can be applied to punitive damages). Further, punitive damages and civil penalties should be likened because both are subject to discretion and serve the purposes of punishment and deterrence. Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that the Seventh Amendment should not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n258 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that judicial assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741-42; Murphy, supra note 347, at 802-03; see also Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 (stating that restrictions on jury discretion regarding punitive damages appear to be constitutional).

n259 The fact that this reasoning could extend to other areas was noted by one commentator, who stated: "There is nothing within Tull, however, that would limit its reasoning to civil penalties." Scheiner, supra note 6, at 208 (but arguing that Tull should be narrowly construed).

n260 See Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27. For a discussion of the case, see supra notes 71-93 and accompanying text.

n261 Cf. Tull, 481 U.S. at 425-27.

n262 See Davis v. Omitowoju, 883 F.2d 1155, 1162 (3d Cir. 1989); Franklin v. Mazda Motor Corp., 704 F. Supp. 1325, 1331 (D. Md. 1989). As one commentator explained:

The seventh amendment, however, could not bar damage caps. The amendment requires that actions and issues existing under the law be tried to a jury, not that certain actions and issues must be provided by law so that they can be tried to a jury. . . . When damages are capped, no legal issue exists concerning damages above that cap, and therefore there is no issue to be tried to a jury concerning damages above the cap.

REV_00258531

Scheiner, supra note 6, at 144 n.16 (citations omitted).

n263 See Tull, 481 U.S. at 426-27 ("Since Congress itself may fix the civil penalties, it may delegate that determination to trial judges.").

n264 Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502, 507 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc); O'Gilvie v. International Playtex, Inc., 821 F.2d 1438, 1447-48 (10th Cir. 1988); McKinnon v. City of Berwyn, 750 F.2d 1388, 1391-91 (7th Cir. 1984). However, several circuits have reduced punitive damages awards without remanding for a new trial, but they have not discussed the Seventh Amendment issue. See Rowlett v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 832 F.2d 194, 207 (1st Cir. 1987); Bell v. City of Milwaukee, 746 F.2d 1205, 1267, 1279 (7th Cir. 1984); Guzman v. Western State Bank, 540 F.2d 948, 954 (8th Cir. 1976).

n265 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 740-43; Defender, 938 F.2d at 505-07.

n266 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 742.

n267 Defender, 938 F.2d at 507.

n268 See Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); see also Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that judicial assessment of punitive damages should not be barred by the Seventh Amendment); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 (finding that restrictions of jury discretion regarding punitive damages do not appear to violate the Seventh Amendment).

n269 See Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741 (citing Kennon v. Gilmer, 131 U.S. 22, 28-30 (1889)). It should be noted that the Fourth Circuit construed Kennon differently in Defender, contending the case stands for the proposition that tort damages must be assessed by a jury. Defender, 938 F.2d at 506. However, as the Shamblin's court argued, the case should not be deemed controlling regarding judicial assessment of punitive damages because the case did not address punitive damages. See Kennon, 131 U.S. at 28-30.

n270 See Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 741-42. For a discussion of the applicability of the Tull fundamental elements test to punitive damages, see supra notes 235-49 and accompanying text.

n271 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 742. For a discussion of the similarities between civil penalties and punitive damages, see supra note 257 and accompanying text.

n272 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 742. For a discussion of the purpose and nature of punitive damages indicating that punitive damages are a fundamental element of trial by jury, see supra notes 235-49 and accompanying text.

n273 See Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 403-04 (Ohio 1994) (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that the Seventh Amendment does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n274 938 F.2d 502, 507 (4th Cir. 1991).

n275 Id. at 506.

REV_00258532

n276 See id.

n277 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that the Seventh Amendment does not bar judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n278 See supra notes 235-49 and accompanying text.

n279 See Defender, 938 F.2d at 506-07. The quotations are provided supra notes 144 & 146.

n280 See Defender, 938 F.2d at 506-07.

n281 See id.

n282 For a list of courts that found judicial assessment of punitive damages unconstitutional, see supra note 264.

n283 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 (arguing that restrictions on a jury's role in assessing punitive damages should be found constitutional); Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1239 ("Requiring the court to assess punitive damages after the jury finds liability appears to be constitutional."); Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that the reasoning of Tull should be extended to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n284 The Kansas jury trial guarantee provides: "The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate." KAN. CONST. Bill of Rights section 5.

n285 See Smith v. Printup, 866 P.2d 985, 993 (Kan. 1993) (stating that "the question that we must resolve, however, is whether the fact that juries historically have determined the amount of punitive damages rises to the level of a right that existed at common law").

n286 See Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 425-27 (1987). The approaches are similar in that both evaluate the element independent of other elements of the action. See id. at 426 (evaluating civil penalties without considering other elements of the plaintiff's suit); Printup, 866 P.2d at 993-94 (evaluating punitive damages without evaluating other elements of the plaintiff's suit). Further, under both approaches, courts evaluate the nature of the element. See Tull, 481 U.S. at 426-27 (considering whether the element at issue was fundamental); Printup, 866 P.2d at 994 (considering the character of the element at issue in determining whether it constituted a right).

n287 See Tull, 481 U.S. at 426.

n288 See Printup, 866 P.2d at 993.

n289 See id. at 994.

n290 See id. (observing that "punitive damages were not considered a remedy at common law, but merely incident to those causes of action in tort requesting compensatory damages"). For a discussion of this general rule, see supra note 19 and accompanying text.

n291 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994. For a discussion of the traditional doctrine and the recognized purpose of punitive damages, see supra notes 12-36 and accompanying text.

REV_00258533

Supreme Court has encountered two distinct issues: whether a particular cause of action requires a jury trial and whether a particular element of a cause of action mandates a jury trial. [57] In examining whether a cause of action requires a jury trial, the Court has considered both the historical analog of the action and whether the action was legal or equitable in nature. [58]

In examining an element of a cause of action, the Court has found that the right to trial by jury is invoked only if the element at issue is one of the "fundamental elements" of a jury trial. [59] Colgrove v. Battin [60] is an example of a case in which the Court considered whether an element of a jury trial was a fundamental element. The issue in Colgrove centered on whether a civil trial with a six-member jury complied with the mandates of the Seventh Amendment. [61] In considering [*1097] the issue, the Court discussed the language of the Seventh Amendment, noting that the language was intended to preserve the right to jury trial in suits at common law, but not to set in stone every characteristic of trial by jury. [62] The Court went on to examine the history of the Seventh Amendment, finding that the framers adopted the Seventh Amendment because they feared that the jury trial would be abolished, not because they sought to preserve every characteristic of the civil jury trial. [63]

The Court then set forth the standard for its analysis of the case before it. [64] Prior cases had held that the Seventh Amendment preserves " "the substance of the common-law right of trial by jury, as distinguished from mere matters of form or procedure . . . .' " [65] In Colgrove, the Court reaffirmed this statement, noting that the Seventh Amendment does not bind federal courts to the exact procedure or details of the common-law right of trial by jury. [66]

Having set forth the standard for analysis, the Court examined whether the Seventh Amendment required a twelve-member jury to preserve the substance of the right to trial by jury. [67] The Court noted that the purpose of a jury in a civil suit is to ensure fair and equitable resolution of factual issues, [68] and it stated that the reliability of jury verdicts is not a function of jury size. [69] Thus, the Court concluded that a twelve-member jury is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. [70]

In a subsequent case, Tull v. United States, [71] the Court examined both a cause of action and an element of a cause of action, clarifying [*1098] how the two types of cases interact. In Tull, the United States government had sued the petitioner, a real estate developer, alleging that the developer had violated the Clean Water Act. [72] The government sought injunctive relief and civil penalties. [73] At trial, the district court denied the developer's demand for a jury trial. [74] The court then found that the developer had violated the act and imposed $ 325,000 in civil fines. [75] On appeal, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, rejecting the developer's argument that he was entitled to a jury trial. [76] The Supreme Court reversed the Fourth Circuit, finding that the developer was entitled to a jury trial for a determination of liability, but was not entitled to a jury assessment of the civil penalty. [77]

The Court began by examining the developer's right to a jury trial for a determination of liability for the statutory cause of action. In resolving this issue, the Court first compared the action to the type of action that was tried by jury at common law and, second, evaluated the nature of the remedy sought. [78] Finding that the cause of action could be deemed analogous to either a legal or an equitable cause of action, [79] the Court stated, "We need not rest our conclusion on what has been called an "abstruse historical' search for the nearest 18th-century analog." [80] The Court therefore proceeded to examine the nature of the remedy sought, determining whether it was legal or equitable. [81] The Court noted that remedies aimed at punishing culpable individuals were historically issued by courts of law, where there was a right to a jury. [82] The Court further stated that the penalties issued under the Clean Water Act were punitive in nature. [83] Thus, the Court concluded [*1099] that the cause of action was legal, and the developer had a Seventh Amendment right to have liability determined by a jury. [84] n292 A difference of opinion exists regarding whether punitive damages should be deemed legal or equitable. Compare Scheiner, supra note 6, at 201-02 (arguing that punitive damages are a legal remedy) with Digital & Analog v. North Supply, 590 N.E.2d 737, 742-43 (Ohio 1992) (arguing that an award of attorney fees is a "punitive (and thus equitable) remedy") and Printup, 866 P.2d at 994 (stating that punitive damages may be an equitable remedy). The United States Supreme Court has indicated that damages that are punitive should be deemed legal. See Curtis v. Loether, 415 U.S. 189, 195-97 (1974); Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 422 (1987).

REV_00258498

n293 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994. The court's analysis is similar to that of the dissent in Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 403-04 (Ohio 1994) (Wright, J., dissenting) (concluding that the nature and purpose of punitive damages indicate that punitive damages need not be assessed by a jury under the Ohio Constitution).

n294 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994.

n295 Id. The court stated:

Because a plaintiff does not have a right to punitive damages, the legislature could, without infringing upon a plaintiff's basic constitutional rights, abolish punitive damages. If the legislature may abolish punitive damages, then it also may, without impinging upon the right to trial by jury, accomplish anything short of that, such as requiring the court to determine the amount of punitive damages or capping the amount of the punitive damages.

Id.

n296 Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 426 (1987).

n297 Printup, 866 P.2d at 994.

n298 See id. at 997-98. The result the court reached is similar to that of the United States Supreme Court in Tull, 481 U.S. at 426, and to that of the dissenting justices of the Ohio Supreme Court in Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (arguing that judicial assessment of punitive damages should be deemed constitutional under the federal constitution); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 (arguing that restrictions on jurors' discretion in assessing punitive damages do not appear unconstitutional under the federal constitution); Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1231, 123438 (stating that judicial assessment of punitive damages appears constitutional under the constitutions of Ohio and the United States).

n299 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1234-39 (stating that judicial assessment of punitive damages appears consistent with the Ohio Constitution). But see Koesel, supra note 6, at 78-81 (arguing that Ohio jury trial provision should be construed to bar judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n300 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting); Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9 (indicating that the federal jury trial guarantee may not extend to the remedy phase of a civil trial).

n301 Ohio cases have focused on the punishment goal of punitive damages. See, e.g., Preston v. Murty, 512 N.E.2d 1174, 1176 (Ohio 1987); Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting). For a discussion of the purposes of punitive damages, see supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

REV_00258534

n302 See Printup, 866 P.2d at 992-93; see also supra note 19 and accompanying text.

n303 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404. For a discussion of a judge's ability to achieve punishment and deterrence, see infra notes 340-57 and accompanying text.

n304 Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1234-30 (stating that judicial assessment of punitive damages appears to be permissible under the Ohio jury trial guarantee); Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (arguing that judicial assessment of punitive damages should be deemed constitutional under the federal constitution); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 (arguing that restrictions on jurors' discretion in assessing punitive damages do not appear unconstitutional under the federal constitution).

It should be noted that the mandate of prior cases that the jury trial be preserved for a cause of action historically tried by jury will continue to be recognized; such a cause of action could continue to be tried by jury. For cases stating that such causes of action must be tried by jury, see Sorrell v. Thevenir, 633 N.E.2d 504, 510 (Ohio 1994), Belding v. State ex rel. Heifner, 169 N.E. 301, 301 (Ohio 1929). Only an element that does not constitute a right of trial by jury could be removed from the province of the jury. See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 (noting that a non-fundamental element is not within the protection of the Seventh Amendment); Printup, 866 P.2d at 994 (indicating that the Kansas jury trial guarantee protected an element only if it constituted a right at common law).

n305 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1234-30 (finding that judicial assessment of punitive damages appears constitutional under the Ohio jury trial guarantee). But see Koesel, supra note 6, at 78-81 (arguing that the Ohio jury trial provision bars judicial assessment of punitive damages).

n306 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401-02.

n307 See Koesel, supra note 6, at 70 ("Ohio courts have generally applied the historical test to ascertain whether a claim may be tried to a jury."). However, the court has not focused exclusively on history. As early as 1888, the court noted that the right to trial by jury depends on the nature of the relief sought. See Gunsaullus v. Pettit, 17 N.E. 231, 231 (1888); see also Digital & Analog Design Corp. v. North Supply Co., 590 N.E.2d 737, 741-42 (Ohio 1992) (focusing upon the historical treatment and nature of an award of attorney fees, as well as discussing persuasive authority from the United States Supreme Court, in determining whether the right to trial by jury under the Ohio Constitution extended to awarding attorney's fees).

n308 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting); see also Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1234-39 (concluding that although an assessment of punitive damages historically was performed by a jury, the Ohio jury trial guarantee appeared to allow for judicial assessment of punitive damages); Colgrove v. Battin, 413 U.S 149, 156-57 (1973) (stating that the Seventh Amendment does not preserve every characteristic of trial by jury, but instead only the fundamental elements of trial by jury); Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 (noting that the federal constitution preserves only the fundamental elements of jury trial).

n309 See OHIO R. CIV. P. 38(B).

n310 See Colgrove, 413 U.S. at 157.

REV_00258535

n311 See OHIO CONST. art. I, section 5.

n312 See Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9; Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 401-02.

n313 See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Wright, J., dissenting) (examining whether an assessment of punitive damages was a fundamental element, thus constituting a right of trial by jury); see also Printup, 866 P.2d at 993-94 (examining whether an assessment of punitive damages was a right at common law); Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 (noting that the Seventh Amendment preserves only the fundamental elements of trial by jury).

n314 413 U.S. 149 (1973).

n315 481 U.S. 412 (1987).

n316 873 F.2d 736 (4th Cir. 1989), overruled by Defender Indus. v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co., 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

n317 Defender, 938 F.2d at 507.

n318 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993).

n319 664 N.E.2d 397 (Ohio 1994).

n320 See, e.g., Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664-66.

n321 See M. PETERSON ET AL., RAND INSTITUTE FOR CIVIL JUSTICE, PUNITIVE DAMAGES: EMPIRICAL FINDINGS 26-31 (1988). In the Rand Institute study, punitive damages were reduced in a significant number of cases for which post-verdict information was reported, with the likelihood of reduction having a relationship to the amount of the award. In cases with awards less than $ 50,000, damages were reduced 30 percent of the time. In contrast, in cases with awards greater than $ 50,000, damages were reduced 80 percent of the time. It should be noted that these numbers reflect both judicial reduction of damages when a case was appealed and settlements after a jury award, presumably because the parties expected damages would be reduced on appeal. See id.

n322 Studies show that juries assess higher damages awards against wealthy defendants. See, e.g., J. FLEMING, THE AMERICAN TORT PROCESS 111-12 (1988); James K. Hammitt et al., Tort Standards and Jury Decisions, 14 J. LEGAL STUD. 751, 753-56 (1985).

n323 See infra notes 364-79 and accompanying text.

n324 Compare Ellis, supra note 5, at 1008 ("The amount of punitive damages should be a decision for the judge, not the jury, as is the case with fines.") with Scheiner, supra note 6, at 187-89 (arguing that the decision should be made by a jury because it is the role of juries to engage in ad hoc norm elaboration).

n325 See Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412, 427 (1987); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664.

n326 See, e.g., Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 665.

n327 See, e.g., Owen, Public Good, supra note 5, at 120; Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664.

n328 The analogy between criminal sentencing and punitive damages has been noted by judges and commentators. E.g., Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 644 N.E.2d 397, 404 (Ohio 1994) (Wright, J., dissenting); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664-65; Reappraisal, supra note 5, at 1171. It should be noted that one commentator distinguished punitive damages from criminal sentencing because punitive damages are not sought by the government. See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 209-12. Additionally, he argued that judicial assessment of punitive damages is not constitutionally required, just as judicial sentencing is not constitutionally required. Id. However, those commentators who have compared punitive damages assessment with criminal sentencing are not arguing that the two are identical, nor that judicial assessment of punitive damages is constitutionally required; they argue only that a judge's role is similar in both contexts. See, e.g., Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 404 (Wright, J., dissenting); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664-65.

REV_00258536

n329 See Shamblin's Ready Mix v. Eaton Corp., 873 F.2d 736, 741-42 (4th Cir. 1989) (noting the comparison between civil penalties and punitive damages and citing Supreme Court cases recognizing the similarity). But see Scheiner, supra note 6, at 209-12 (distinguishing between civil penalties and punitive damages). For a discussion of the analogy between civil penalties and punitive damages, see supra note 257 and accompanying text.

n330 Punishment and deterrence are generally recognized as the primary goals of punitive damages. See supra notes 29-36 and accompanying text.

n331 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664; Owen, Public Good, supra note 5, at 120.

n332 See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 188-89.

n333 Id. However, at least one commentator has argued that the work of juries entails very few cases in which their knowledge of community standards is valuable. George L. Priest, Justifying the Civil Jury, in VERDICT: ASSESSING THE CIVIL JURY SYSTEM 103, 111-17 (Robert E. Litan ed., 1993). In fact, cases involving complex or conflicting social values or issues of governmental power comprised less than one-fourth of the cases heard by juries in a study of Cook County courts. Id. at 131. In contrast, juries spent the majority of their time resolving issues from routine accidents involving routine injuries. See id. at 111-17.

n334 See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 187-89.

n335 See id.

n336 See Ellis, supra note 5, at 1008.

n337 Gertz v. Welch, 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974) (stating that punitive damages are "private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence").

n338 For a discussion of this analogy, see supra note 328.

n339 Ellis, supra note 5, at 1006-08.

n340 Compare Owen, Public Good, supra note 5, at 120 ("Judges have more familiarity than do juries with distinguishing "wrong' from "very wrong' behavior (and fixing the appropriate level of punishment therefor) upon a formal social scale . . . .") with Scheiner, supra note 6, at 170-79 (arguing that juries rival judges at achieving punishment and deterrence).

n341 Commentators have argued that judges are better than juries at making this determination because judges are more experienced and less susceptible to bias and confusion. See, e.g., Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664; Ellis, supra note 5, at 1006-08; DuBois, supra note 5, at 353.

REV_00258537

n342 Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269, 302 (1983); Owen, Products Liability, supra note 5, at 132021; see also Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664 (arguing that judges are better at evaluating public policy concerns and economic factors).

n343 See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 170-79.

n344 See id. at 173. An example of a case in which judge and jury may differ is a breach of contract suit. Id. A judge may find that if the breach was an "efficient breach," or a breach resulting in a savings of money, large damages are not warranted to punish the conduct. Id. However, a jury may believe that it is morally wrong to break one's word, and it may assess damages to punish this moral wrong. Id. Because it cannot be proven that efficiency is more important than keeping commitments, it cannot be shown that the judge's conclusion is better than the jury's. Id.

n345 See id. at 171-73 & 188-89.

n346 Id. at 173-79.

n347 Id. at 173.

n348 Id. at 174 (footnotes omitted).

n349 Id. at 174-75.

n350 Id. at 175.

n351 Id. at 178 ("If optimal deterrence is the goal, jury assessment of the amount of the award makes little sense.").

n352 Id. at 178-79.

n353 Id. ("The jury serves its traditional function of norm elaboration.").

n354 Id.

n355 See id. at 170-79. With regard to meeting the goal of punishment, Scheiner stated: "Whether to inflict punishment is a purely moral judgement . . . . One cannot conclude that judges are right and juries are wrong." Id. at 173. With regard to achieving deterrence, he stated, "If optimal deterrence is the goal, jury assessment of the amount of the award makes little sense. . . . In contrast, jury assessment of punitive damages makes sense if the goal of total deterrence is adopted." Id. at 178. He then argued that a jury fulfills its traditional function of elaborating norms when it assesses punitive damages. Id. at 178-79. It should be noted, additionally, that Scheiner argued that greater uncertainty costs accompany jury assessment of punitive damages, and these uncertainty costs may result in increased deterrence. Id. at 179.

n356 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664.

n357 See id. at 664; Owen, Public Good, supra note 5, at 120.

n358 Scheiner, supra note 6, at 145-60.

n359 Id. The commentator discussed the views of the Anti-Federalists in arguing that the Tull case, discussed supra notes 71-93 and accompanying text, should not be extended to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. Scheiner, supra note 6, at 145-60 & 204-12.

REV_00258538

n360 Scheiner, supra note 6, at 145-60.

n361 Compare id. (arguing that the framers intended for punitive damages to be assessed by a jury) with Tull v. United States, 481 U.S. 412 (1987), which stated:

Although " 'we have almost no direct evidence concerning the intention of the seventh amendment itself,' the historical setting in which the Seventh Amendment was adopted highlighted a controversy that was generated . . . by fear that the civil jury itself would be abolished." We have been presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial.

Id. at 426 n.9 (citations and footnote omitted).

n362 Tull, 481 U.S. at 426 n.9.

n363 Scheiner, supra note 6, at 145-60.

n364 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664 (arguing that judges "are less likely to be impressed by the histrionics of counsel and so to be inflamed by passion or prejudice"); Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1241 (stating that jurors "may be less likely than a trial judge to fully comprehend the true purpose of punitive damages awards").

n365 See Robert MacCoun, Inside the Black Box: What Empirical Research Tells Us About Decisionmaking by Civil Juries, VERDICT: ASSESSING THE CIVIL JURY SYSTEM, supra note 333, at 137, 151 ("A growing body of studies indicates that some jurors may fail to comprehend as much as 50 percent of the judge's instructions regarding the law.") (citation omitted). See generally Walter W. Steele, Jr. & Elizabeth G. Thornburg, Jury Instructions: A Persistent Failure to Communicate, 67 N.C. L. REV. 77 (1988). But see Scheiner, supra note 6, at 164 n.120 (stating that claims that juries are typically irrational or ignorant "must be wrong in light of evidence that juries obey instructions and understand significance of expert testimony").

n366 See Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1241; Ellis, supra note 5, at 1006-07.

n367 DuBois, supra note 5, at 353; Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 665. The reason for jurors' willingness to assess higher verdicts against wealthy corporate defendants has been subject to debate. See MacCoun, supra note 365, at 162-64.

n368 MacCoun, supra note 365, at 162 (noting several studies have concluded that juries awarded significantly higher awards against corporate or government defendants than individual defendants).

n369 For a discussion of the effect of the attractiveness of a plaintiff on a civil jury, see WALTER F. ABBOTT ET AL., JURY RESEARCH: A REVIEW AND BIBLIOGRAPHY section 5.19 (1993). The behavior of counsel may also improperly sway a jury. See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664 (stating that judges are "less likely to be impressed by the histrionics of counsel").

n370 See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 159, 168-69.

REV_00258539

n371 Id. at 168 n.137.

n372 Id.

n373 Id. ("Jurors act free from any concern for the political ramifications of their decisions.").

n374 See Stephen A. Saltzburg, Improving the Quality of Jury Decisionmaking, in VERDICT: ASSESSING THE CIVIL JURY SYSTEM, supra note 333, at 162 ("A jury selected from a cross section of the community is likely to have members whose biases or prejudices cancel or neutralize each other, but nothing cancels or neutralizes those of a judge.").

n375 For example, a judge may intentionally award less in damages to benefit a wealthy defendant or the government, see Scheiner, supra note 6, at 159, while a jury may intentionally award greater damages against a wealthy defendant, see DuBois, supra note 5, at 353 (arguing that judicial assessment may remedy the "Robin Hood" philosophy of jurors).

n376 Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664; Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1240-41.

n377 Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664. As one commentator stated:

The judge very often perceives the stimulus that moves the jury, but does not yield to it. . . . The perennial amateur, layman jury cannot be so quickly domesticated to official role and tradition; it remains accessible to stimuli which the judge will exclude.

HARRY KALVEN, JR. & HANS ZEISEL, THE AMERICAN JURY, 497-98 (1966).

n378 Ellis, supra note 5, at 1006-07.

n379 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664; Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1240-41; Ellis, supra note 5, at 1006-07.

n380 See Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1240-41 ("The coupling of [the stimuli of passion and bias] and the fact that juries hear only one case create an environment of uncertainty and unpredictability that the trial judge can avoid."); Owen, Products Liability, supra note 5, at 1320; Peter H. Schuck, Mapping the Debate on Jury Reform, in VERDICT: ASSESSING THE CIVIL JURY SYSTEM, supra note 333, at 306, 312.

It should be noted that at least one commentator has argued that punitive damages awards would not be more predictable with judicial assessment. See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 180. Because of the vague instructions for the assessment of punitive damages and inconsistencies in the use of remittitur, the commentator argues that punitive damage awards would not be more predictable. Id. However, the commentator contends that punitive damage awards would be generally lower with judicial assessment of punitive damages. Id. It appears contradictory to argue that punitive damage awards would not be more predictable, and yet to argue that they would be generally lower; in other words, if punitive damages would be lower, that must mean that they would also be more predictable.

n381 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664.

REV_00258540

n382 Ellis, supra note 31, at 55-57. Commentators generally acknowledge that there is uncertainty regarding the amount of punitive damages that a jury will assess, and this uncertainty results in additional litigation costs. See, e.g., id. at 43-57; Scheiner, supra note 6, at 178-79. Many commentators have perceived these additional costs as a negative result of jury assessment of damages, see, e.g., Ellis, supra note 31, at 43-57, but one commentator has argued that the uncertainty costs may be perceived as a positive result because these costs may lead to greater deterrence of misconduct, see Scheiner, supra note 6, at 178-79.

n383 Ellis, supra note 31, at 56-57; George L. Priest, The Role of the Civil Jury in a System of Private Litigation, 1990 U. CHI. L. REV. 199.

n384 Ellis, supra note 31, at 56-57; Priest, supra note 383, at 199.

n385 See Priest, supra note 383, at 199. This may lead to greater trial delay. Id.

n386 See Scheiner, supra note 6, at 194-96.

n387 See id. at 195-96 (contending that jury assessment of damages is a form of democracy that should be preserved). However, at least one commentator has argued that the actual participatory and educational value of jury service is limited because of the small likelihood that citizens will be called for jury service. See Priest, supra note 333, at 120-24. In fact, a study of juries in Cook County indicated that jurors served, on average, once in every 260.2 years. Id. at 122.

n388 Scheiner, supra note 6, at 195-96.

n389 See id. at 194-96.

n390 See Koesel, supra note 6, at 79 ("Judges are thought to make more consistent, lower awards.").

n391 Scheiner, supra note 6, at 194-95 ("To both plaintiffs and defendants, the sum total of tort doctrine, jury preferences, judicial intervention and appellate decision is reflected in one variable--the expected verdict. . . . Thus, the allocation of discretionary power over damages determines who governs the civil litigation system. . . .") (footnote omitted).

n392 See id.

n393 See Ellis, supra note 5, at 1008 (arguing that judicial assessment would enhance fairness and predictability); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664 (arguing that judicial assessment will increase the likelihood that punitive damages will be applied in a "principled manner").

n394 See KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701(a) (1994) ("The trier of fact shall determine . . . whether punitive damages shall be allowed. If such damages are allowed, a separate proceeding shall be conducted by the court to determine the amount of such damages to be awarded."); CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 52-240b (1991) ("If the trier of fact determines that punitive damages should be awarded, the court shall determine the amount of such damages . . . .").

n395 See KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701; CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 52-240b.

n396 See KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701; CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. section 52-240b. For a discussion of the purposes of punitive damages, see supra notes 32-40 and accompanying text.

REV_00258541

n397 See Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 502 (1980) ("[Congress'] Constitutional role is . . . to make policy . . . .").

n398 For a discussion of different methods of tort reform, see supra notes 37-50 and accompanying text.

n399 For state statutes requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages, see supra note 4.

n400 See, e.g., Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 502 ("[Congress'] Constitutional role is . . . to make policy . . . ."); Kosak v. United States, 465 U.S. 848, 862 (1984) ("Petitioner and some commentators argue that [the statute at issue] should not be construed in a fashion that denies an effectual remedy to many persons. . . . That contention has force, but it is properly addressed to Congress, not to this Court.").

n401 Congress has, however, required judicial assessment of damages in certain areas. For federal statutes requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages, see, for example, Petroleum Marketing Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. section 2805(d)(2) (1988) (requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages); Patent Act, 35 U.S.C. section 284 (1988) (permitting judicial assessment of damages).

n402 As one commentator stated: "In the absence of legislation limiting the jury's participation in calculating punitive damages, federal courts perhaps should follow what Haslip called the "common-law method for assessing punitive awards': initial determination by the jury and judicial review for reasonableness." Murphy, supra note 239, at 803 (footnote omitted) (but adding that initial determination by a judge may be more sensible). The question of whether courts, in fact, have the constitutional power under the Seventh Amendment to assess punitive damages is discussed supra notes 235-83 and accompanying text.

n403 938 F.2d 502 (4th Cir. 1991) (en banc).

n404 Id. at 505. For a discussion of the facts of the case, see supra notes 129-32 and accompanying text.

n405 The standard on appeal for a punitive damages award has been abuse of discretion. See supra note 28 and accompanying text. The same standard of appeal would presumably apply to judicial assessment of punitive damages. See DuBois, supra note 5, at 353 (advocating judicial assessment and noting that "there remains the remedy of appellate review . . .").

n406 873 F.2d 736 (4th Cir. 1989), overruled by Defender, 938 F.2d 502.

n407 Shamblin's, 873 F.2d at 740.

n408 Id. at 742-43.

n409 See id. at 742 ("We conclude that remanding for yet a third trial would constitute an enormous waste of judicial as well as the parties' resources.") n410 See KAN. STAT. ANN. section 60-3701(a) (1994); OHIO REV. CODE ANN. section 2315.21(C)(2) (Anderson 1995) (found unconstitutional by the Ohio Supreme Court).

n411 For an argument agreeing with the Kansas Supreme Court's decision in Printup that judicial assessment of punitive damages can be implemented consistently with the Kansas jury trial guarantee, see supra notes 284-98 and accompanying text. For an argument disagreeing with the Ohio Supreme Court's decision in Zoppo that judicial assessment of punitive damages cannot be implemented consistently with the Ohio jury trial guarantee, see supra notes 299-313 and accompanying text.

REV_00258542

n412 For an evaluation of the policy arguments regarding judicial assessment of punitive damages, see supra notes 320-96 and accompanying text.

n413 Defender, 938 F.2d at 507; O'Gilvie v. International Playtex, Inc., 821 F.2d 1438, 1447-48 (10th Cir. 1988); McKinnon v. City of Berwyn, 750 F.2d 1388, 1391-91 (7th Cir. 1984). However, several circuits have reduced punitive damages awards without remanding for a new trial, but they have not discussed the Seventh Amendment issue. See Rowlett v. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 832 F.2d 194, 207 (1st Cir. 1987); Bell v. City of Milwaukee, 746 F.2d 1205, 1267, 1279 (7th Cir. 1984); Guzman v. Western State Bank, 540 F.2d 948, 954 (8th Cir. 1976). For a discussion of the consistency of judicial assessment of punitive damages with the Seventh Amendment, see supra notes 235-83 and accompanying text.

n414 See Zoppo v. Homestead Ins. Co., 664 N.E.2d at 403-04 (Ohio 1994) (Wright, J., dissenting) (applying the fundamental elements test and concluding that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element); see also Murphy, supra note 239, at 802-03 (concluding that the reasoning of Tull should be extended to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages); Kagan, supra note 239, at 772 ("Efforts to restrict jury discretion in punitive damage determinations do not seem to run afoul of the Constitution."); Pritchard, supra note 5, at 1239 ("Requiring the court to assess punitive damages after the jury finds liability appears to be constitutional.").

n415 The Kansas Supreme Court interpreted the state's jury trial provision to permit judicial assessment of punitive damages. See Smith v. Printup, 866 P.2d 985 (Kan. 1993). For a discussion of the case, see supra notes 165-85 and accompanying text. In contrast, the Ohio Supreme Court interpreted the Ohio jury trial provision to bar judicial assessment of punitive damages. See Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 397. For a discussion of the case, see supra notes 192-206 and accompanying text.

n416 Owen, Public Good, supra note 5, at 120; Mallor & Roberts, supra note 5, at 664. For arguments that judges are better at achieving punishment and deterrence, see supra notes 340-42 and accompanying text.

n417 See Ellis, supra note 5, at 1008 ("The amount of punitive damage should be a decision for the judge. . . . These changes in procedure would render the process less unfair. They would also reduce the uncertainty associated with punitive damages claims and enhance predictability . . . ."). For arguments that judicial assessment of punitive damages will result in a reduction of uncertainty costs, see supra notes 380-85 and accompanying text.

n418 See Printup, 866 P.2d at 994; Zoppo, 644 N.E.2d at 403-04.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 64 U. Cin. L. Rev. 1089
View: Full
Date/Time: Saturday, October 12, 2002 - 2:25 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

The Court also considered whether the Seventh Amendment guarantees trial by jury for the assessment of civil penalties, an element of a cause of action. [85] The Court, quoting Colgrove, stated that the question was whether the element involved the " 'substance of the commonlaw right of trial by jury' " or a " 'fundamental' " element of trial by jury. [86] The Court noted that fundamental elements must be tried by a jury, [87] but it stated that Congress could choose to set a fixed amount for civil fines without reference to judge or jury. [88] Because the element of fixing civil fines need not be presented to a jury, the Court reasoned that the element of fixing civil penalties is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. [89] The Court also noted that an assessment of civil penalties entails discretionary calculations with multiple factors, and such calculations are usually performed by a judge. [90]

In a footnote, the Court further clarified the reach of Seventh Amendment protections with regard to the remedy phase of a civil trial. [91] To that end, the Court stated, "Nothing in the Amendment's language suggests that the right to a jury trial extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial, . . . and we have been presented with no evidence that the Framers meant to extend the right to a jury to the remedy phase of a civil trial." [92] Thus, in the Court's view, neither the [*1100] language of the Seventh Amendment nor historical evidence showed that the founding fathers intended to extend the right to trial by jury to the remedy phase of a trial. [93]

2. Applying the Court's Analysis to the Assessment of Punitive Damages

The Court has not spoken directly to the issue of whether a judge may assess punitive damages consistently with the Seventh Amendment. [94] Since Tull, the Court has issued several noteworthy decisions regarding punitive damages, but none has addressed the issue of judicial assessment. [95] However, some guidance is available from the federal circuit courts of appeal. The Fourth Circuit has twice examined the practice of judicial assessment of punitive damages in light of Tull. [96] These cases specifically addressed the issue of whether a judge can remit a jury verdict of punitive damages without granting the plaintiff the option of a new trial for a jury determination of punitive damages. [97] Initially, in Shamblin's Ready Mix, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., [98] [*1101] the Fourth Circuit concluded that the Seventh Amendment does not prohibit judicial assessment of damages. [99] However, in Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co., [100] the court overruled Shamblin's and concluded that the Seventh Amendment does prohibit judicial assessment of punitive damages. [101] This section examines the reasoning of both Shamblin's and Defender.

In Shamblin's, the plaintiff brought equipment to the defendant for repair and sued in conversion when the defendant failed to return the equipment. [102] At trial, a jury awarded $ 3,531 in compensatory damages and $ 600,000 in punitive damages. [103] The defendant appealed, and the Fourth Circuit affirmed the compensatory damages award, but set aside the punitive damages award, finding that the punitive damages award was tainted by the plaintiff's improper and prejudicial closing argument. [104] On remand to determine the amount of punitive damages, a jury awarded $ 650,000. [105] The defendant appealed, and the Fourth Circuit determined that the award was excessive, finding that it was based on improper, prejudicial evidence and a misleading closing argument by plaintiff's counsel. [106] The court, without remanding for a third jury determination of punitive damages, reduced the award to $ 60,000. [107] The court deemed this amount appropriate to punish the company because relatively low-ranking employees were responsible for the misconduct. [108]

In rendering its decision, the court discussed the constitutionality of judicial assessment of punitive damages. [109] Specifically, the court examined whether the Seventh Amendment prohibits a reduction of a [*1102] punitive damages award by a judge without remanding for a new trial. [110] The court began by examining the practices of other federal circuit courts of appeals. [111] It noted that four circuits--the first, sixth, seventh, and eighth--had reduced an award of punitive damages without remanding for a new trial. [112] In three of those cases, the courts reduced awards that were determined by juries, [113] but none of the courts discussed the Seventh Amendment. [114] In a footnote, the Shamblin's court mentioned that the Seventh Circuit, in a subsequent case, concluded that the Seventh Amendment prohibits judicial assessment of damages. [115] However, the Fourth Circuit deemed this case contrary to Tull and declined to follow it. [116]

REV_00258499

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

Having discussed the opinions of the federal circuit courts, the court then examined relevant precedent from the United States Supreme Court. [117] First, it distinguished an 1889 case, Kennon v. Gilmer. [118] In that case, the Fourth Circuit explained, the United States Supreme Court found that the Seventh Amendment prohibits judicial assessment of compensatory damages, but the Court did not address the assessment of punitive damages. [119] The Fourth Circuit stated that Kennon was not controlling in Shamblin's because of the marked differences between compensatory damages and punitive damages. [120] Specifically, an award of compensatory damages is intended to make a plaintiff whole, and it involves findings of fact regarding the extent of harm to the plaintiff. [121] In contrast, punitive damages serve a public goal by punishing and deterring reprehensible conduct. [122]

After distinguishing Kennon, the Fourth Circuit discussed the Su- [*1103] preme Court's decision in Tull. [123] Reasoning that neither the language of the Seventh Amendment nor the historical evidence presented to the Court suggested that the Seventh Amendment extends to the remedy phase of a civil trial, [124] the Tull court found that the plaintiff was not entitled to an assessment of civil penalties by a jury. [125] The Fourth Circuit found this reasoning applicable to the assessment of punitive damages. [126] In support of its conclusion, the Fourth Circuit noted that the Supreme Court has recognized the similarity between civil penalties and punitive damages. [127] The court concluded that, like the assessment of civil penalties, the assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury. [128]

However, the Fourth Circuit reexamined its reasoning en banc in Defender Industries v. Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. [129] In Defender, the plaintiff brought an action for, inter alia, fraud stemming from a contract with the defendant, an insurance company. [130] At the district court level, a jury awarded $ 106,513.74 in actual damages and $ 5,000,000 in punitive damages. [131] The district court, without remanding for a new trial, found the award of punitive damages excessive and reduced it to $ 10,000. [132]

On appeal, the Fourth Circuit noted that the district court failed to follow traditional procedure in assessing punitive damages when it did not offer the option of a new trial. [133] Instead, the district court had [*1104] exercised authority as permitted under the Shamblin's decision. [134] The Fourth Circuit then questioned the underlying basis for its Shamblin's decision. [135] The Fourth Circuit noted that the Shamblin's court based its decision in large part on Tull, but it stated that the Tull decision was narrower than the Shamblin's court had believed. [136] The Fourth Circuit conceded that Tull contained "some rather broad language," but it maintained that Tull should be construed as applying to civil penalties, and not extending to punitive damages. [137]

Having expressed its doubt about the Shamblin's reasoning, the Fourth Circuit then undertook a new examination of whether an assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element of trial by jury. [138] Beginning its examination, the Fourth Circuit discussed decisions issued by the United States Supreme Court regarding punitive damages. [139] The Fourth Circuit stated that the Court's 1889 decision in Kennon, which it had discussed in Shamblin's, stood for the proposition that tort damages must be assessed by a jury. [140] The Fourth Circuit then discussed two decisions issued by the Supreme Court since Tull, though these cases did not speak directly to the Seventh Amendment issue. [141]

First, the Defender court discussed the opinion of the Supreme Court in Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc. [142] In Browning-Ferris, the Supreme Court addressed the application of the Eighth Amendment to the assessment of punitive damages, but it also discussed the procedure that has been followed in reviewing an award of punitive damages.

REV_00258500

[143] Specifically, the Court explained that the role of a district court is to determine whether a jury's verdict is within the confines of state law and to determine whether a new trial or remittitur should be ordered. The role of the appellate court, then, is to review lower court proceedings for an abuse of discretion. Finally, the traditional role of the United States Supreme Court is to determine whether the appellate court erred, but not to substitute its judgment for [*1105] that of a jury. [144]

Second, the Fourth Circuit also briefly referred to the United States Supreme Court's decision in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip. [145] In Haslip, the Court explained that the traditional commonlaw approach entailed assessment of punitive damages by a jury, with appellate review ensuring reasonableness of the award. [146] The Fourth Circuit contended that the Court's statements in Browning-Ferris and Haslip indicated that jury assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element of a civil trial. [147]

After discussing opinions issued by the United States Supreme Court, the Defender court examined the practice of other federal circuit courts with regard to judicial assessment of punitive damages. [148] The court noted that several circuits have reduced awards of punitive damages without remanding for a new trial and without discussing the Seventh Amendment issue. [149] However, the Fourth Circuit noted that only two circuits had considered the issue, and both concluded that the Seventh Amendment guarantees the right of jury assessment of punitive damages. [150] [*1106]

The Defender court, having discussed the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and federal circuit courts, concluded that the assessment of punitive damages by a jury is a fundamental element of trial by jury. [151] The court therefore overruled Shamblin's and held that the Seventh Amendment requires assessment of punitive damages by a jury. [152]

In summary, the United States Supreme Court in Tull concluded that, in determining whether an element of a civil trial must be tried by a jury under the Seventh Amendment, a court must consider whether the element is a fundamental element of trial by jury. [153] Further, the Court examined whether a specific remedy, a civil fine, was a fundamental element, [154] and the Court made general statements about the applicability of the Seventh Amendment to the remedy phase of a civil trial. [155] However, the Court has not spoken directly to the issue of the constitutionality of judicial assessment of punitive damages. The confusion that exists regarding this issue is evidenced by the strikingly divergent decisions of the Fourth Circuit in Shamblin's and Defender. [156]

B. Kansas Right to Trial by Jury

Like the federal courts, state courts have experienced confusion in their analyses of judicial assessment of punitive damages under their relevant jury trial provisions. [157] The highest courts of Kansas and Ohio have addressed the issue, reaching different results. [158] An examination of the Kansas analysis should include a discussion of the state's practice regarding punitive damages, the Kansas jury trial provision [*1107] and, finally, Smith v. Printup, the case in which the Kansas Supreme Court determined whether the Kansas jury trial provision barred judicial assessment of punitive damages. [159]

The Kansas practice regarding punitive damages is similar to approaches of other states. [160] Kansas courts have stated that a plaintiff has no general right to punitive damages; the right is generally dependent upon the receipt of at least nominal damages. [161] Additionally, Kansas courts, like a majority of other state courts, recognize that punitive damages serve to punish a defendant and to deter a defendant and others from future misconduct. [162] Thus, Kansas courts have stated that punitive damages are not compensatory in nature, but instead they are awarded by focusing on the character of a defendant's actions. [163]

The Kansas guarantee of trial by jury, section 5 of the Bill of Rights of the Kansas

REV_00258501

Constitution, provides, "The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate." [164] The Kansas Supreme Court interpreted this provision in addressing the constitutionality of judicial assessment of punitive damages in Smith v. Printup. [165] In that case, a jury determined that the driver of a moving van and the company leasing his services were liable for punitive damages after the driver lost control of the van and collided into a pickup truck, resulting in two deaths. [166] The court, pursuant to Kansas statute 60-3701, assessed punitive damages against the defendants. [167]

On appeal, the defendants alleged that Kansas statute 60-3701 vio- [*1108] lated the guarantee of trial by jury under the Kansas Constitution. [168] The court agreed with the defendants that punitive damages were available at common law, and they were assessed by a jury. [169] However, the court stated that punitive damages are not awarded as a matter of right, [170] but because the defendant deserves punishment. [171] Additionally, the court stated that a claim for punitive damages is not a cause of action; it is incident to and dependent upon an award for actual damages. [172]

The court then set forth the issue to be resolved. [173] The court stated that the issue was whether the historical assessment of punitive damages by a jury constitutes a right that existed at common law. [174] As a threshold issue, the court noted that compensatory damages must be assessed by a jury, but it stated that this fact does not indicate that punitive damages must be assessed by a jury. [175] Instead, the court found that it must examine the character of the claim to determine whether a right to trial by jury exists. [176]

With regard to the character of a punitive damages claim, the court noted that the amount of punitive damages may be regarded as a factual issue, but the court proceeded to set forth critical characteristics of punitive damages that distinguish them from actual damages. [177] The court stated that punitive damages were not considered a remedy at common law, but they were merely incident to a cause of action. [178] It added that punitive damages are not compensatory, and there is no [*1109] right to punitive damages. [179] Thus, the court noted, the purpose of awarding punitive damages is not to recognize any special merit in the plaintiff's case, but to punish a defendant and deter a defendant and others. [180] Further, it stated that punitive damages may be regarded as equitable in nature. [181] Thus, the Kansas Supreme Court concluded that, despite the fact that juries had historically assessed punitive damages, a claim for punitive damages was not a right at common law. [182]

The court then reasoned that because punitive damages do not constitute a right, the legislature could constitutionally abolish punitive damages. [183] Given this broad power to abolish punitive damages, the court concluded that the legislature must have the power to take less drastic steps, such as requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages or capping the amount of punitive damages. [184] The court therefore concluded that Kansas statute 60-3701, which permits judicial assessment of punitive damages, did not violate the state's guarantee of trial by jury. [185] [*1110]

C. Ohio Right to Trial by Jury

An examination of judicial assessment of punitive damages under the Ohio Constitution should include a discussion of the Ohio practice regarding punitive damages, the state's jury trial provision and, finally, a discussion of Zoppo v. Homestead Insurance Co., in which the Ohio Supreme Court addressed the consistency of judicial assessment of punitive damages with the Ohio jury trial guarantee. [186] Ohio's practice regarding punitive damages has been typical of that of other states. [187] Punitive damages have not been awarded as a matter of right for the plaintiff. [188] Instead, they are awarded to punish a defendant for misconduct. [189]

The Ohio guarantee of trial by jury, Section V of Article I of the Ohio Constitution, provides that the right to trial by jury "shall be inviolate. . . ." [190] The provision has been interpreted to guarantee trial by jury for those causes of action in which the right existed at common law at the time of the adoption of the Ohio Constitution, [191] and it was at issue in Zoppo, where courts considered its consistency with an Ohio statute requiring judicial assessment of punitive damages. [192] At the court of appeals level in Zoppo, the court employed the Tull fundamental elements test, which had not previously been used in interpreting the Ohio jury trial provision. [193] Applying the test, the appel- [*1111] late court found that assessment of punitive damages is not a fundamental element of trial by jury, and the court therefore held that the statute was constitutional. [194]

REV_00258502

On appeal, the Ohio Supreme Court did not adopt the Tull fundamental elements test. [195] In an opinion written by Justice Francis E. Sweeney, the court focused on the historical treatment of the assessment of punitive damages. [196] To that end, the court set forth its perception of the issue to be resolved, stating, "The right [to trial by jury] extends to those causes of action where the right existed at common law. Thus, in analyzing the validity of R.C. 2315.21(C)(2), we must . . . determine whether there existed a common-law right for a jury to assess the amount of punitive damages." [197] Having set forth the issue, the court noted that juries assessed punitive damages historically [198] and that punitive damages are an important part of a civil trial. [199] Thus, the court concluded that the statute violated the right to a jury trial under the Ohio Constitution because the statute interfered [*1112] with this traditional role. [200]

The court was unpersuaded by arguments that its reasoning in a prior case, Digital & Analog Design Corp. v. North Supply Co. [201] compelled a different result. [202] In Digital, the Ohio Supreme Court considered whether the Ohio jury trial provision guaranteed assessment of attorney fees by a jury. [203] Because there was no action to recover punitive damages historically and because an examination of the nature of attorney fees revealed that an award of attorney fees is "a punitive (and thus equitable) remedy that flows from a jury finding of malice and the award of punitive damages," [204] the Digital court held that the Ohio Constitution does not guarantee assessment of attorney fees by a jury. [205] However, the Zoppo court stated that any language in Digital regarding punitive damages was merely dicta, and the court rejected the reasoning in Digital to the extent that it equated attorney fees with punitive damages. [206]

Justice Wright, joined by Chief Justice Moyer, dissented. The Zoppo dissent contended that the court was thwarting the Ohio legislature's efforts to reform the tort system. [207] The dissent acknowledged that a litigant has the right to a jury trial in a tort action, in accordance with historical practice. [208] However, it argued that the analysis in this case should not end with this broad conclusion. [209] Instead, the dissent contended that the relevant issue, with which the court failed to come to terms, is whether a plaintiff has the right to an assessment of punitive damages by a jury. [210]

The proper inquiry, the dissent argued, is whether an assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element of trial by jury. [211] In a [*1113] footnote, the dissent acknowledged that the fundamental elements test has been used to interpret the Seventh Amendment, not the jury trial guarantee of the Ohio Constitution. [212] However, the dissent contended that the analysis in the Seventh Amendment cases is persuasive because of the similarity between the amendment and the Ohio jury trial guarantee. [213]

Beginning its examination, the dissent considered the role of a jury in a tort action. [214] The purpose of a tort action is to compensate a plaintiff, the dissent observed, and the role of a jury is to determine liability and the amount of damages necessary to compensate a plaintiff. [215] The dissent therefore acknowledged that the assessment of compensatory damages may be a fundamental element that must be performed by a jury. [216]

The dissent proceeded to examine whether an assessment of punitive damages is a fundamental element of trial by jury. [217] Specifically, the dissent discussed the nature of punitive damages, the purpose of punitive damages and whether a plaintiff has a right to

REV_00258503

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Racial Profiling [Folder 1] [1]

OA/NARA#: 1652/1520
9603

Box
Folder 50-10

REV_00258545

2ND ITEM of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

Copyright (c) 1999 Temple University of the Commonwealth System of Higher Education

Temple Law Review

Fall, 1999

72 Temple L. Rev. 597

LENGTH: 14646 words

ARTICLE: STATE CONSTITUTIONAL ANALYSIS OF PRETEXT STOPS: RACIAL PROFILING AND PUBLIC POLICY CONCERNS

The Honorable Phyllis W. Beck *, Patricia A. Daly, Esq. **

* Superior Court of Pennsylvania. J.D., Temple Law School (evening division), 1967; Temple Law School faculty, 1972-76; Vice Dean, University of Pennsylvania Law School, 1976-81.

 Deputy Judicial Clerk to the Honorable Phyllis W. Beck. J.D., Temple Law School, 1991.

SUMMARY:
... The primary concern with pretext stops is that they facilitate racial profiling, the process of singling out drivers based on their race. ... It is argued that most pretextual stops are race-based, and inherent in them is racial profiling. ... Finding this conduct unreasonable allows the court to exclude the evidence seized in the pretext stop and, according to logic, deter future stops based on racial profiling. ... It is argued that pretextual stops do not necessarily involve racial profiling. ... Scholarly support for the practice of racial profiling is predictably slim. ... The practice of racial profiling is widely reported - and criticized - in the media. ... Legislation aimed at preventing systemic racial profiling is being proposed on both federal and state levels. ... Even organizations beyond the police department are being accused of and investigated for engaging in racial profiling. ... Closer analysis of this proposition shows that a racial profiling claim under the Equal Protection Clause is difficult, if not impossible, to prove. ... While racial profiling may be confronted under the rubric of the Equal Protection Clause, it is not necessarily resolved. ...

TEXT:
[*597]

Introduction

A unanimous United States Supreme Court made itself quite clear in Whren v. United States: <=2> n1 motor vehicle stops based on pretext are not prohibited by the Fourth Amendment. <=3> n2 The primary concern with pretext stops is that they facilitate racial profiling, the process of singling out drivers based on their race. Although the Supreme Court was careful to point out that such a practice is unconstitutional, <=4> n3 the Court instructed that an attack on the practice must be made using the Equal Protection Clause, not system.

Those supporting pretext stops argue that eliminating them is unwise, even though they are based on a fundamentally unfair factor like race. <=133> n132 Precluding the use of pretext altogether prevents police officers from using their knowledge of the street to interrupt criminal conduct even when their suspicions are not based on impermissible factors. <=134> n133 While the actual number of officers who operate on intuition without reliance on race would likely prompt an endless [*612] debate, <=135> n134 supporters of pretext stops urge that these police officers are invaluable assets to the communities they serve. <=136> n135 Preserving their ability to act for the greater public good is a desirable goal. The supporters assert that society can continue to permit officers of this type to root out crime by using pretext stops, since evils like racial profiling can be attacked under the Equal Protection Clause. Intuitive police officers can zealously conduct their business without fear that they are transgressing the Fourth Amendment.

Justice Scalia made it clear in his opinion in Whren that race-based stops are wrong and, indeed, unconstitutional. <=137> n136 According to the Justice and his colleagues, such stops do not offend the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable searches; instead, they are prohibited by the Equal Protection Clause, <=138> n137 an avenue of relief apparently not pursued by Michael Whren.

VI. Remedies: Getting the Proof and Making a Claim Under the Equal Protection Clause

While racial profiling is widely condemned, the supporters of pretext stops claim that the problem can be addressed via the Equal Protection Clause, while giving police greater latitude to operate legally within the Fourth Amendment. Closer analysis of this proposition shows that a racial profiling claim under the Equal Protection Clause is difficult, if not impossible, to prove. In assessing whether and to what extent the Equal Protection Clause is a viable avenue of relief, one must consider, in practical terms, what actions an accused would have to take to establish that her constitutional rights have been violated.

The Equal Protection Clause prohibits the discriminatory application of laws and precludes law enforcement agencies, exercising discretion, to go forward with a case based on "an unjustifiable standard such as race, religion or other arbitrary classification." <=139> n138 It is easy for an accused to allege that she was subjected to police interference based on race, but it is difficult to support the allegation.

In such cases, the accused will make a pre-trial attempt to prove that the officer in her case used race as a guide, thus violating the Equal Protection Clause, i.e., the officer stopped her because she was black and would not have stopped a white person under similar circumstances. It is safe to assume that there will be few admissions by police officers that a driver's race was the basis [*613] for a stop that ultimately yields contraband or evidence of criminal activity. <=140> n139 If the defendant is "fortunate" enough to have been stopped by someone like the two New Jersey state troopers who recently were indicted for falsifying their official paperwork, she might prevail. <=141> n140 In such a case, the officer's past transgressions based on race would be on the record. <=142> n141

REV_00258555

The more likely scenario, however, is that the accused will request an enormous amount of documents from the prosecution, including a demand for the officer's prior arrest records and personnel records. She may also request documents from the law enforcement agency's files, items like department-wide arrest and investigation statistics, formal policies and procedures, and training manuals and techniques used by the agency.

Making the requests for these documents, however, is quite different from actually getting them. In the few cases deciding this issue, a rather stringent standard has developed. In general, discovery is permitted only when the accused has established that the "police agency has an officially sanctioned or "de facto' policy of selective enforcement against minorities." <=143> n142 Of course, even if the requests are granted, the documents may not provide the answers sought. The kind of information necessary for a pretext analysis simply has not been gathered on a regular basis. <=144> n143 While great strides have been made on both state and federal levels, it is only very recently that local governments and agencies have begun generating data regarding traffic stops and race. <=145> n144

[*614] When it comes to the breadth of a discovery request of this type, the scope of such an inquiry may be limitless. Is the accused entitled to look into the personal life of the officer? After all, there may be relevant and probative evidence from the officer's conduct outside of the police department from which one could conclude that she might target individuals of a certain race. If personal conduct is fair game, how far back can an accused go? Simply because an officer has not been involved in questionable conduct recently does not mean that she does not harbor racist tendencies. Are interviews of and subpoenas for the officer's friends, colleagues, neighbors, and supervisors off limits? Certainly, if an accused has a good faith basis to believe that testimony from these or other people will establish an officer's tendency to engage in racial profiling, how could a court preclude her from presenting it?

Of course, all of these inquiries make the pre-trial process more burdensome for all parties. Defense attorneys would have a much more complex task. Their burden will no longer be simply to establish that the reasonable officer would not have made the stop. Instead, they will be expected to probe any and all aspects of an officer's conduct, training, and habits, as well as those of his colleagues and supervisors. Failure to conduct a complete inquiry may give rise to an ineffective assistance of counsel claim.

The prosecution also will be burdened with additional tasks. Enormous discovery requests will mean not only more work culling documents, but also will likely prompt protracted litigation on the relevance and probative value of the items sought. Further, participation by the police department, state police, or other agency will be necessary, since much of the information requested will not be in the hands of the district attorney. Legal representation on behalf of those agencies or the officer himself may be appropriate, particularly if evidence of prior conduct in other cases is being sought or assessed. The introduction of additional parties and interests, of course, invites further delay.

These changes in turn burden the court system and hamper the judicial process. The sealing or sharing of evidence may become an issue. Proceedings may be further delayed by the need for an extended briefing schedule, further discovery, or oral argument. The court will be forced to allot a significant amount of court time to pre-trial matters. It must decide what is and is not discoverable, what is and is not admissible, and ultimately, what effect all of the evidence has in the context of the case.

Throughout these lengthy proceedings, an accused's right to a speedy trial will invariably be put on hold. Admittedly, an in-depth analysis of a police [*615] officer's race-based conduct is the proper focus of a legislative committee hearing or a class action civil suit aimed at effecting a major change in a law enforcement agency's tactics and techniques. Making such an analysis part of any one criminal proceeding, however, is burdensome.

Further, even if an accused establishes that she was the victim of racial profiling and thereby proves that her constitutional rights under the Equal Protection Clause were violated, to what remedy is she entitled? While a violation of the Fourth Amendment has as its sanction the suppression of all evidence seized as a result of the violation, identical relief is not necessarily granted to the individual who has suffered a violation of her equal protection rights.

It seems fair to accord the victim of improper police conduct deemed a violation of the Equal Protection Clause the very same remedies accorded those who have sustained a Fourth Amendment violation via improper police conduct, namely, suppression of the evidence procured by unlawful means. There is no Supreme Court precedent, however, for such relief. <=146> n145 Instead, the Court has declined to state just what remedy, if any, a criminal defendant is entitled to if he establishes that he is the victim of racial profiling. <=147> n146

New Jersey courts have made compelling arguments that the purposes of the exclusionary rule in the Fourth Amendment context apply with equal force in a pretextual stop scenario, and in fact, have imposed such sanctions. <=148> n147 Both [*616] before and after Whren, those courts opined that improper police conduct must be met with the sanction of evidence exclusion "to deter future insolence... by those charged with enforcement of the law." <=149> n148 As one court explained, "the objective is to compel respect for the constitutional guaranty in the most effective way - by removing the incentive to disregard it." <=150> n149 Despite New Jersey's enlightened approach, which has now been joined by Washington, <=151> n150 other state courts simply are not bound to suppress the evidence seized in a pretext stop. <=152> n151

Alternative remedies are likewise uncertain. The dismissal of criminal charges is a possible, but not assured, remedy for a violation of this type. <=153> n152 In most selective prosecution claims brought under the Equal Protection Clause, the petitioner requests dismissal of the indictment against him based on the unconstitutional conduct of the prosecutor. <=154> n153 A pretext case, however, does not necessarily fit neatly within the selective prosecution model. <=155> n154

The bulk of selective enforcement claims is made against the prosecuting attorney's office. <=156> n155 The claims typically focus on the office's policy, not on the conduct of the individuals on staff. Racial profiling, on the other hand, often focuses on the conduct of a single officer who may or may not have been encouraged by de facto or de jure policy of the police department. <=157> n156 An individual rogue officer, acting without departmental approval, may engage in racial profiling outside the knowledge of fellow officers or supervisors. The standards set forth in selective enforcement claim cases, which consider the [*617] policy of the prosecuting office, may be inadequate in dealing with racial profiling by a single officer. For instance, even though the New Jersey trial court has been willing to grant suppression as a sanction for selective enforcement, its appellate court continues to disregard the actions of single officers in the field and instead directs that only cases addressing agency-wide violations are actionable. <=158> n157 While statistical analyses of police department policy are indeed important evidence, such data cannot establish whether an individual officer conducting a pretext stop violated the driver's equal protection rights. Absent broad, new interpretations of the exclusionary rule, or specific sanctions for racial profiling on both an individual and agency-wide basis, there may be no direct consequence for the violation of equal protection rights in this context. <=159> n158

In sum, neither Pennsylvania nor any other state court can rely on the United States Supreme Court's equal protection safety net to rescue victims of racial profiling. Indeed, that net has a gaping hole. In the unlikely chance that documentary proof of racial profiling is acquired by the victim, admitted by the court, and accepted by a judge or jury, a forceful and effective remedy for the underlying constitutional violation simply is not in place.

The impracticalities of the equal protection alternative militate against adopting Whren in the state constitutional context. While racial profiling may be confronted under the rubric of the Equal Protection Clause, it is not necessarily resolved.

The fourth prong in Edmunds, consequently, appears to support divergence from the rule in Whren. <=160> n159 A bright-line rule finding pretext stops unreasonable and, therefore, unconstitutional, will no doubt impinge upon an officer's ability to detect crime through intuition and a keen sense of the street. That same rule, however, arguably serves the public interest in a significant manner in that it avoids extensive, protracted, and perhaps futile litigation, while reassuring a leery public that racial profiling is constitutionally intolerable. <=161> n160

Conclusion

Whether the impact of racial profiling is real or perceived, damaging or [*618] benign, underreported or overblown, it remains a public policy concern that must be confronted, both in the federal and state courts. A state constitutional evaluation of Whren is essential in responding to this very important social issue. Not only does racial profiling harm the individual, it also undermines the integrity of the state by making it a tool for discriminatory behavior against a group. This practice is unacceptable. In addressing Whren, state courts must recognize that resolution of the problem in the context of equal protection may only be theoretical. Furthermore, even if the matter can be addressed under the Equal Protection Clause, a resolution may be neither swift nor effective.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. 517 U.S. 806 (1996).

n2. See Whren, 517 U.S. at 819 (upholding stop where officers had probable cause to believe traffic code violated irrespective of officers' motivation).

n3. See id. at 813 ("We of course agree with petitioners that the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race.").

n4. Id.

n5. See infra notes 113-30 and accompanying text for a discussion of the public response to Whren.

n6. 453 U.S. 454 (1981).

n7. 669 A.2d 896 (Pa. 1995).

n8. See infra notes 42-67 and accompanying text for a discussion of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court state constitutional analysis in Commonwealth v. White, 669 A.2d 896 (Pa. 1995), and Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887 (Pa. 1991).

n9. See infra notes 91-100 and accompanying text for a discussion of Pennsylvania's willingness to diverge from federal standards.

n10. See Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887, 896 (Pa. 1991) (exploring unique history of article I, section 8 and noting prominence of Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights in state's original constitution of 1776). Article I, section 8 provides:

The people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions from unreasonable searches and seizures, and no warrant to search any place or seize any person or things shall issue without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation subscribed to by the affiant.

Pa. Const. art. I, 8.

n11. New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 455 (1981).

n12. Id. at 456.

n13. Id.

n14. Id. at 459.

n15. 395 U.S. 752 (1969).

n16. Belton, 453 U.S. at 457. In Chimel, police officers entered the home of burglary suspect with a warrant for his arrest. Chimel, 395 U.S. at 753. The suspect's wife permitted the officers to enter the home and wait for the suspect who was due to arrive from work shortly. Id. After the suspect returned home, the officers handed him the arrest warrant and proceeded to search the entire residence of the suspect's three-story home. Id. at 754. The Court found that the "search incident to arrest" principle does not include "searching any room other than that in which an arrest occurs." Id. at 763.

n17. Belton, 453 U.S. at 458.

n18. Id. (quoting Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979)).

n19. Id. at 457.

n20. See id. at 460 ("Our reading of the cases suggests the generalization that articles inside the relatively narrow compass of the passenger compartment of an automobile are in fact generally, even if not inevitably, within "the area into which an arrestee might reach in order to grab a weapon or evidentiary item'.... We read Chimel's definition... in light of that generalization.") (quoting Chimel, 395 U.S. at 763) (emphasis added).

n21. The Court fashioned this definition despite its recognition that the rule in Chimel was based on "the need "to remove any weapons that [the arrestee] might seek to use in order to resist arrest or effect his escape' and the need to prevent the concealment or destruction of evidence." Belton, 453 U.S. at 457 (quoting Chimel, 395 U.S. at 763).

n22. Id. at 462.

n23. Id. at 460 n.4.

n24. See id. ("Our holding encompasses only the interior of the passenger compartment of an automobile and does not encompass the trunk.").

n25. Belton, 453 U.S. at 466 (Brennan, J., dissenting). Justice Marshall joined in the dissent. Id. at 463.

n26. Id. at 468 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

n27. Id. at 465 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (citations omitted).

n28. Id. at 469 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

n29. Id. at 471-72 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (citations and footnotes omitted). Justice White, joined by Justice Marshall, also filed a dissenting opinion. He characterized the majority's decision as "an extreme extension of Chimel" to which he could not subscribe. Id. at 472 (White, J., dissenting).

n30. Commonwealth v. White, 669 A.2d 896, 898 (Pa. 1995).

n31. Id.

n32. Id.

n33. Id.

n34. Id.

n35. White, 669 A.2d at 898.

n36. Id.

n37. Id.

n38. Id.
n39. Id.

n40. White, 669 A.2d at 898.

n41. Id.

n42. Id. at 901. The Pennsylvania Superior Court accepted this argument. Id. The other proffered bases for denying suppression were the automobile exception, a finding of exigency under the circumstances, and an inventory search. Id. at 898-99. All were rejected by the court. Id. at 902-03.

n43. Id. at 902.

n44. Id. at 898.

n45. See White, 669 A.2d at 901-02 (discussing holding in Commonwealth v. Timko, 417 A.2d 620 (Pa. 1980), that warrantless search of automobile incident to arrest is limited to individual's clothing and areas within his immediate reach).

n46. Id. at 902.

n47. Compare Commonwealth v. White, 669 A.2d 896, 902 (Pa. 1995) (suppressing evidence found in paper bag found between front seats of car), and Commonwealth v. Timko, 417 A.2d 620, 623 (Pa. 1980) (suppressing evidence found in zippered valise seized from automobile), with New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 460 n.4 (1981) (defining area within arrestee's immediate control to include glove compartments, consoles, luggage, boxes, bags, and all other receptacles found in passenger compartment).

n48. White, 669 A.2d at 902. The court found that the arrestee's privacy interests remained "intact" and the officer was permitted to search only for the limited purpose of preventing the arrestee from obtaining weapons or destroying evidence. Id.

n49. Id.

n50. Id. at 903 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n51. Id. (Montemuro, J., concurring). Justice Montemuro believed that dealing with the issue in summary fashion "weakened" the court's prior state constitutional decision in Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887 (Pa. 1991). White, 669 A.2d at 903 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n52. Id. at 903-04 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n53. White, 669 A.2d at 904 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n54. 586 A.2d 887 (Pa. 1991).

n55. Edmunds, 586 A.2d at 895.

n56. In Commonwealth v. Swinehart, 664 A.2d 957 (Pa. 1995), the court characterized the Edmunds factors as "helpful," but not mandatory. Id. at 961 n.6. The majority in White reiterated this characterization of Edmunds in response to the prosecution's claim that appellant waived his state constitutional claim by failing to set forth an Edmunds analysis. White, 669 A.2d at 899.

n57. White, 669 A.2d at 904 (Montemuro, J., concurring). Justice Montemuro also suggested that the court engraft onto the Edmunds test the prerequisite finding of "important and substantial reasons" for departing from decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Id. (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n58. Id. (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n59. Id. at 908 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n60. Id. at 904 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n61. Id. at 904-05 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n62. White, 669 A.2d at 905-07 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n63. Id. at 907-08 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n64. Id. at 908 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n65. Id. (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n66. Id. (Montemuro, J., concurring). See Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752, 768 (1969) (holding unconstitutional warrantless search beyond suspect's person of area not within his immediate reach).

n67. White, 669 A.2d at 908 (Montemuro, J., concurring).

n68. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 808 (1996).

n69. Id.

n70. Id.

n71. Id. at 809.

n72. Id.

n73. Whren, 517 U.S. at 809. Among the charges was one prohibiting distribution of drugs in a school zone or other protected area. Id. In such circumstances, the statutory maximum punishment is doubled and there is a mandatory minimum one-year prison term. 21 U.S.C. 860(a) (1994).

n74. Whren, 517 U.S. at 810.

n75. Id.

n76. Id. Whren argued that civil traffic regulations present a "unique context" that allows police to stop virtually anyone they wish. Id. Hence, Whren argued, the Fourth Amendment test in such circumstances should not be probable cause, "but rather, whether a police officer, acting reasonably, would have made the stop for the reason given." Id.

n77. Id.

n78. See, e.g., United States v. Cannon, 29 F.3d 472, 476 (9th Cir. 1994) (clarifying test as whether reasonable officer "would have" made stop regardless of other suspicions); United States v. Smith, 799 F.2d 704, 708 (11th Cir. 1986) (concluding proper inquiry to determine whether traffic stop was pretextual is whether reasonable officer would have made stop absent other motivation).

n79. The majority of circuits, including the one from which Whren came, followed the rule ultimately set forth in Whren, that is, any traffic stop based on an observed traffic violation is permissible. See, e.g., United States v. Botero-Ospina, 71 F.3d 783, 787 (10th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (holding traffic stop does not violate Fourth Amendment where police officer had reasonable suspicion traffic violation occurred); United States v. Ferguson, 8 F.3d 385, 392-93 (6th Cir. 1993) (en banc) (finding traffic stop does not violate Fourth Amendment where officer had probable cause to believe traffic violation occurred). The Ninth and Eleventh Circuits, however, considered whether the traffic stop "would have" occurred absent the officers' unrelated suspicions. See, e.g., Cannon, 29 F.3d at 476 (finding traffic stop constitutional if reasonable officer "would have" made stop regardless of suspicions of other criminal activity); Smith, 799 F.2d at 708 (concluding proper inquiry to determine whether traffic stop was pretextual is whether reasonable officer would have made stop absent other motivation).

n80. See Smith, 799 F.2d at 711 (excluding evidence obtained from traffic stop where evidence suggested that "reasonable officer would not have" stopped defendants absent illegitimate purpose). Whren wanted the United States Supreme Court to adopt the "would have" standard of Cannon and Smith. Whren, 517 U.S. at 810.

n81. Whren, 517 U.S. at 814-16. The Court reasoned that such an approach would be impermissibly "driven by subjective considerations." Id. at 814. The Fourth Amendment, instructed the Court, is concerned with reasonableness - a wholly objective principle that clearly is satisfied whenever there exists probable cause to believe a traffic law has been violated. Id.

n82. Id. at 819. The Court concluded that there was no "realistic alternative to the traditional common-law rule that probable cause justifies a search and seizure." Id.

n83. Id. at 810.

n84. Id. at 819.

n85. Id. at 818.

n86. Whren, 517 U.S. at 811. The Whren Court distinguished Florida v. Wells, 495 U.S. 1 (1990) (involving inventory search), and New York v. Burger, 482 U.S. 691 (1987) (discussing administrative searches), as cases "addressing the validity of a search conducted in the absence of probable cause." Id.

n87. Id. at 813. Apparently, the only legal issue before the Court was suppression under the Fourth Amendment. See id. at 808 (framing issue as validity of temporary detention given Fourth Amendment prohibition against unreasonable seizures).

n88. See supra notes 53-55 and accompanying text for a discussion of Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887 (Pa. 1991).

n89. See supra note 10 for the relevant text of the Pennsylvania Constitution.

n90. Commonwealth v. White, 669 A.2d 896, 904 (Pa. 1995) (Montemuro, J., concurring) (relying on Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887, 895-96 (Pa. 1991)).

n91. Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887, 896 (Pa. 1991).

n92. Commonwealth v. Miller, 518 A.2d 1187, 1191-92 (Pa. 1986).

n93. See Commonwealth v. DeJohn, 403 A.2d 1283, 1291 (Pa. 1979) (rejecting United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)).

n94. Id. at 1289.

n95. See Commonwealth v. Sell, 470 A.2d 457, 468 (Pa. 1983) (rejecting United States v. Salvucci, 448 U.S. 83 (1980)).

n96. Id.

n97. See Commonwealth v. Melilli, 555 A.2d 1254, 1260-61 (Pa. 1989) (rejecting Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)).

n98. See Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887, 895 (Pa. 1991) (rejecting United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)).

n99. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Matos, 672 A.2d 769, 776 (Pa. 1996) (departing from California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621 (1991), in holding police officers' pursuit of individual approached without reasonable suspicion or probable cause constitutes seizure under Pennsylvania Constitution); Commonwealth v. Smith, 615 A.2d 321, 325 (Pa. 1992) (diverging from Oregon v. Kennedy, 456 U.S. 667 (1982), in finding Pennsylvania's double jeopardy clause prevents retrial of defendant where prosecutor intentionally sought to deny defendant fair trial).

n100. Melilli, 555 A.2d at 1258.

REV_00258564

the Fourth Amendment. <=5> n4

Scholars, journalists, and lawyers promptly and vociferously assailed the Whren decision as legally incorrect, technically flawed, and fundamentally unfair. <=6> n5 Forgotten in the resulting melee was an assessment of the practical application of Whren, that is, the degree of difficulty - throughout the entire criminal justice system - in addressing the issue of racial profiling via an equal protection analysis, rather than under the Fourth Amendment.

In order to examine the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's possible response to the principles established by the Whren Court, this Article reviews the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's past reliance on the state constitution to deviate from established Fourth Amendment jurisprudence. To illustrate the point, this Article explores the broad police power the United States Supreme Court endorsed in New York v. Belton, <=7> n6 as compared to the limits placed on that power by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court relying on the state constitution in [*598] Commonwealth v. White. <=8> n7 There is precedent for the Pennsylvania courts to rely on the state constitution in interpreting Whren-like cases. <=9> n8 In addition, as part of its public policy consideration, the court should take into account the positive practical consequences of diverging from the rule in Whren.

In analyzing Fourth Amendment cases, appellate courts are faced with complex fact patterns where only minute details serve to distinguish cases. This point is particularly true of auto search cases. The task is to decide whether or not those details are significant enough to warrant departure from what one party insists is binding precedent and what another party argues is clearly inapplicable.

In those matters when Fourth Amendment law, as dictated by the United States Supreme Court, is quite clear and an accused cannot prevail regardless of what factual differences exist, the generally greater protection afforded by the state constitution is the only remaining potential avenue of relief. In such cases, the accused must persuade the state court that deviating from the rationale of the United States Supreme Court is not only logical, but also mandatory under the state's most important and overriding body of law, its constitution.

In Pennsylvania, the state supreme court has not hesitated to depart from federal standards on the basis of its state constitution. <=10> n9 The reasons for so doing are based on heightened protections inherent in article I, section 8 of the Pennsylvania Constitution, the state's counterpart to the Fourth Amendment. <=11> n10 The Whren case is certain to provoke additional requests for deviation from Fourth Amendment law in Pennsylvania. If the state supreme court stays the course it has already charted, it will decide this issue under the state constitution, and perhaps provide greater protection than the federal norm.

I. The United States Supreme Court Broadens Police Power: New York v. Belton

In the spring of 1978, Roger Belton was a passenger in a car that was stopped by New York State police officers for speeding. <=12> n11 Upon discovering marijuana, the troopers ordered the occupants outside of the car, placed them [*599] under arrest, and conducted a warrantless automobile search. <=13> n12 They discovered Belton's jacket in the rear seat; inside the jacket's n101. In one instance, the state court did not reach the state constitutional issue. In Whitehead v. Maryland, 698 A.2d 1115 (Md. Ct. Spec. App. 1997), the Maryland appellate court found that where a police officer stops a vehicle and ultimately determines that no traffic laws have been violated, the officer's continued detention of the motorist cannot be rationalized as falling within Whren. Id. at 1120.

n102. See State v. McBreairty, 697 A.2d 495, 496 (N.H. 1997) (using federal and state case law to reject defendant's claim that stop was illegal).

n103. See State v. Ladson, 979 P.2d 833, 842 (Wash. 1999) (noting state court's prior rejection of precedents relied on by Whren).

n104. See id. at 837 (quoting Wash. Const. art. 1, 7).

n105. Id. at 839.

n106. Id.

n107. See supra note 10 for the relevant text of the Pennsylvania Constitution.

n108. See infra notes 113-37 and accompanying text for additional discussion of the public policy response to pretext stops and racial profiling.

n109. See supra note 10 for the relevant text of the Pennsylvania Constitution.

n110. See, e.g., Jeffrey Goldberg, The Color of Suspicion, N.Y. Times Mag., June 20, 1999, at 51, 53 (describing traffic stop with hope of criminal interdiction).

n111. See Jackson Toby, "Racial Profiling' Doesn't Prove Cops Are Racist, Wall St. J., Mar. 11, 1999, at A22 (describing crackdown on minor offenses to prevent serious felonies as "one of the most important ideas in modern criminology").

n112. See supra note 87 and accompanying text for a discussion of the Supreme Court's suggestion in Whren that the basis for objecting to race-based state action is the Equal Protection Clause.

n113. Joseph Wambaugh, Trust Cops' Intuition, Wall St. J., May 19, 1998, at A22.

n114. Id.

n115. Id.

n116. Toby, supra note 111, A22.

n117. See, e.g., David A. Harris, Car Wars: The Fourth Amendment's Death on the Highway, 66 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 556, 561 (1998) (asserting Whren gives law enforcement carte blanche to engage in racial profiling); Patricia Leary & Stephanie Rae Williams, Toward a State Constitutional Check on Police Discretion to Patrol the Fourth Amendment's Outer Frontier: A Subjective Test for Pretextual Seizures, 69 Temp. L. Rev. 1007, 1025 (1996) (describing Whren as "a rickety piece of judicial scholarship"); David O. Markus, Whren v. United States: A Pretext to Subvert the Fourth Amendment, 14 Harv. BlackLetter L.J. 91, 96-97 (1998) (arguing Whren encourages police officers to engage in arbitrary invasions of privacy).

n118. See infra notes 119-26 and accompanying text for examples of media coverage on the issue of racial profiling.

n119. See Tom Avril, et al., N.J. Admits that Race Played Role in Some Police Stops on Turnpike, Phila. Inquirer, Apr. 21, 1999, at A1 (reporting on news conference in which New Jersey governor and attorney general acknowledged racial profiling by state troopers). Governor Christine Todd Whitman reportedly said that "the broader problem is the result of well-intentioned troopers who simply thought they were engaging in good police work." Id. The report issued by the state attorney general's office revealed that 53 percent of persons searched during turnpike stops were black and 24 percent were Latino, despite the fact that "blacks make up about 14.5 percent of New Jersey's overall population, and... those "of Hispanic origin' make up 11.9 percent." Id.

n120. Actually, Governor Whitman requested that the superintendent of the state police tender his resignation prior to the release of the Attorney General's report on racial profiling. Diane Mastrull, et al., New Jersey's Top Trooper Is Forced Out, Phila. Inquirer, Mar. 1, 1999, at A1. Some thought Williams was asked to leave because the report was soon to be released and Williams had refused to admit his agency's racial profiling tactics; others believed his ouster was the direct result of public comments he made regarding the types of crimes committed and the types of people who commit them. Id. While insisting that racial profiling was something the state police would not tolerate, Williams also told reporters that the methamphetamine market was controlled by whites, while the heroin market was primarily controlled by Jamaicans. Id.

n121. See Howard Goodman, Gloucester County Turnpike Arrests in Doubt, Phila. Inquirer (South Jersey edition), Apr. 21, 1999, at B1 (describing class action suit and effect of state concession of racial profiling). In 1996, a Gloucester County judge suppressed evidence seized in the arrests of nineteen people on the New Jersey Turnpike when those individuals asserted that they were targeted for traffic stops on account of their race. Id. The Attorney General's Office promptly appealed the decision, but dropped the appeal after issuing its report on racial profiling practices within the state police force. Id.

n122. See id. It was expected that most, if not all, of the drug charges against the 19 African Americans stopped on the turnpike in Gloucester County would be withdrawn by the prosecution, since the suppression order would preclude it from offering evidence seized during the improper stop. Id. Cases in other New Jersey counties, wherein similar accusations against police were made, were put on hold. Id.

n123. See Robert Cohen, Racial Profiling Allegations Spur Lawmakers to Call for U.S. Study, Star-Ledger (Newark, N.J.), Apr. 14, 1999, at 7, available in 1999 WL 2970986 (reporting New Jersey State Police revelations prompted legislation on racial profiling); North Carolina Legislation Mandates Statistics to Prove/Disprove Profiling, 1 Crim. Just. Wkly. 1, June 1, 1999, at 20 (noting North Carolina became first state to sign criminal statistics bill into law); Sonya Ross, Clinton Orders Officers to Collect Racial Data on Stops, Arrests, Phila. Inquirer, June 10, 1999, at A22 (reporting President ordered federal law enforcement agencies to collect race and gender data from all stops or arrests).

n124. See Tom Avril & Douglas A. Campbell, N.J. Troopers Indicted in Racial Profiling Probe, Phila. Inquirer, Apr. 20, 1999, at A1 (describing charges). The indictment alleges that the troopers falsified their stop and arrest records to make it appear that the minorities they stopped were instead white. Id. The two troopers, John Hogan and James Kenna, are the same officers involved in a 1998 incident on the New Jersey Turnpike. Id. Hogan and Kenna allegedly fired on four unarmed men, three black and one Hispanic, during a traffic stop. Id. See also Mastrull, et al., supra note 120, at A7 (describing shooting incident as bringing issue of racial profiling to forefront, eventually leading to resignation of superintendent of state police).

n125. See George Berkin, Black Cops Vow to Follow, Tape Troopers, Star-Ledger (Newark, N.J.), May 22, 1998, at 30, available in 1998 WL 3417389 (describing response to turnpike shooting). Three African-American police officer groups organized a 1998 Memorial Day weekend outing that involved off-duty police officers patrolling the New Jersey Turnpike and videotaping traffic stops. Id.

n126. See, e.g., Justice Department to Probe Accusations of "Racial Profiling,' Chi. Trib., Mar. 10, 1999, at 8 (reporting meeting between deputy attorney general and New Jersey black and hispanic leaders); John Kifner, N.J. Traffic Shootings Follow Racism Allegations Police "Targeting Blacks' on Turnpike, Ariz. Rep., May 10, 1998, at A20, available in 1998 WL 7770245 (describing shooting incident and racial profiling controversy).

n127. See David Harris, Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on Our Nation's Highways, An ACLU Special Report (visited June 2, 1999) <http://www.aclu.org/profiling/report> (stating practice of police looking for drug criminals by stopping drivers based on color is so common "that the minority community has given it the derisive term, "driving while black or brown' - a play on the real offense of "driving while intoxicated'"). See also David A. Harris, "Driving While Black" and All Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops, 87 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 544, 546 & n.10 (1997) (relating "driving while black" was "standard way" black clients in Washington, D.C. area described "common experience of constant stops and harassment" by police).

n128. ACLU, Driver Profiling Complaint Form (visited June 2, 1999) <http://www.aclu.org/profiling/report<uscore>incident>.

n129. ACLU, ACLU "Bustcard': Pocket Guidelines on Encounters With the Police (visited June 2, 1999) <http://www.aclu.org/profiling/bustcard>. The "Bustcard" instructs users on what to do when stopped by police. In addition to warning drivers to be polite, respectful, and calm, the ACLU advises them to "write down everything you remember ASAP," "make [no]... statements regarding the incident," and "ask for a lawyer immediately upon your arrest." Id.

n130. See Al Frank, P.A. Looking into Claims of Profiling on the PATH, Star-Ledger (Newark, N.J.), Mar. 13, 1999, at 11, available in 1999 WL 2962478

(reporting investigation of Port Authority PATH police alleged to have engaged in racial profiling); Howard Goodman, Profiling Allegations Expanded, Phila. Inquirer, Apr. 30, 1999, at B1 (reporting New Jersey Attorney General's Office investigation of state police program that trains hotel employees to spot possible drug dealers near turnpike).

n131. Wambaugh, supra note 113, at A22. The suspicions of the officers in Whren certainly were founded. See Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 806-07 (1996) (noting officers' "suspicions were aroused," causing them to pull over vehicle found to contain illegal drugs).

n132. See Wambaugh, supra note 113, at A22 (suggesting certain criminals, including white lawbreakers in black neighborhoods, would "cruise... unmolested" if police could not use profiling).

n133. See id. ("As police attempt to cull potential lawbreakers from honest citizens, sex, age, race, clothing and lots of subtleties go into the process.").

n134. While researching an article for the New York Times Magazine, author Jeffrey Goldberg rode with police officers from various cities, including Philadelphia. Some officers denied relying on race in deciding whom to stop; others admitted the practice. The officers alternatively decried and defended the practice. The wide use of racial profiling, however, was unmistakably clear throughout the fascinating piece. See generally Goldberg, supra note 110.

n135. See Toby, supra note 111, A22 (asserting stopping people who violate minor laws helps prevent major crimes such as drug trafficking).

n136. Whren, 517 U.S. at 813.

n137. The Whren Court agreed that race-based stops are wrong, but noted that it was necessary to present such claims under the Equal Protection Clause, not the Fourth Amendment. Id.

n138. Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448, 456 (1962).

n139. See generally Goldberg, supra note 110. Despite their description of conduct that arguably constitutes racial profiling, most of the officers in Goldberg's article denied that race was the sole factor in a stop. Id. Similarly, two New Jersey state troopers indicted for falsifying records, who also denied that race was the sole factor, have been characterized by their lawyers as conducting "good police work." Avril & Campbell, supra note 124, at A6.

n140. In this context, "prevail" is a strong word. Actually, a driver stopped by one of these officers may simply have a very strong case for a race-based traffic stop. Whether there exists a viable remedy for such a claim, however, is the central issue in this Article. See supra notes 138-39 and infra notes 141-60 and accompanying text for a discussion of the difficulty in fashioning a legal remedy for race-based traffic stops.

n141. Of course, the accused would still be faced with establishing that a race-based pretext occurred in her case.

n142. State v. Smith, 703 A.2d 954, 958 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1997) (relying on United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996)). The use of a selective enforcement defense was approved by the United States Supreme Court in 1962, when in Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448 (1962), the Court held that prosecution based on race, religion, or another arbitrary classification violates the Equal Protection Clause. Id. at 456. See infra note 145 and accompanying text for a discussion of selective enforcement claims.

n143. Even if compelling evidence were gathered, its positive effect in the courts is questionable. For years, opponents of the death penalty have offered statistical studies and analyses in an effort to prove that the harsh sentence is imposed in a discriminatory manner, but the death penalty remains a constitutional form of punishment. See, e.g., Developments in the Law: Race and the Criminal Process, Part VIII: Race and Capital Sentencing, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1603, 1614-22 (1988) (describing Supreme Court's rejection of death penalty as violative of Equal Protection Clause despite strong statistical evidence); Douglas W. Vick, Poorhouse Justice: Underfunded, Indigent Defense Services and Arbitrary Death Sentences, 43 Buff. L. Rev. 329, 332-36, 410-12 (1995) (analyzing relation of race and socioeconomic status with imposition of death penalty).

n144. In Philadelphia, Police Commissioner John Timoney is not waiting for the enactment of mandatory legislation before confronting racial profiling among his staff. Instead, he has formed a ten member "Integrity Control Unit" that will conduct "random, unscheduled audits of all bureaus, divisions and units for any signs of trouble, including in the area of police compliance with departmental policies... such as racial profiling." Robert Moran, New Team to Monitor Police Conduct, Phila. Inquirer, June 11, 1999, at B2. Commissioner Timoney is also not naive about the daunting task he faces: "We cannot always detect, let alone change, the mindset or prejudices of certain people, but we can put systems in place to prevent those biases from affecting their performance as police officers." Telephone interview with the Offices of the Philadelphia Police Commissioner (June 30, 1999).

n145. Selective enforcement claims have been raised many times over the past several decades. See Oyler v. Boles, 368 U.S. 448, 456 (1962) (denying selective enforcement claim where no unjustifiable standard alleged); United States v. Schoolcraft, 879 F.2d 64, 68-69 (3d Cir. 1989) (rejecting equal protection claim where no evidence was offered supporting contended prosecution based on unjustifiable standard); Commonwealth v. Wells, 657 A.2d 507, 510 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1995) (denying alleged equal protection claim for selective prosecution where both prosecuted and non-prosecuted occupants of stopped vehicle were of same race). As the United States Supreme Court has explained:

A selective prosecution claim is not a defense on the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent assertion that the prosecutor has brought the charge for reasons forbidden by the Constitution. Our cases delineating the necessary elements to prove a claim of selective prosecution have taken great pains to explain that the standard is a demanding one.... A selective prosecution claim asks a court to exercise jurisdictional power over a "special province" of the Executive.

United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 463-64 (1996). However, as recently as 1996, in the same term the Court decided Whren, the Court explicitly stated in a footnote that it has "never determined whether dismissal... or some other sanction is the proper remedy if a court determines that a defendant has been the victim of prosecution on the basis of his race." Id. at 461 n.2.

n146. Id. In Armstrong, the defendants sought discovery of police documents to establish their claim of selective enforcement and the district court entered an order granting the defendants' request. Id. at 459. The police challenged the defendants' right to the documents and refused to comply with the discovery order. Id. at 461. Armstrong involved racial profiling of a type, although not in the context of a traffic stop. Instead, the Armstrong defendants argued that they had been singled out for federal prosecution, in lieu of prosecution in the state court system, simply because they were black. Id. at 458.

n147. See, e.g., State v. Kennedy, 588 A.2d 834, 838 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1991) (discussing racial profiling and propriety of suppression as sanction). In a landmark 1996 case in the New Jersey Superior Court, State v. Soto, 734 A.2d 350 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1996), Judge Robert Francis combined the suppression requests of nineteen criminal defendants, all of whom claimed that they were the victims of racial profiling by New Jersey troopers. Id. at 359. After hearing evidence of the agency's widespread racial profiling policy and practice, Judge Francis suppressed the evidence seized in the cases. Id. at 361. Thereafter, the Attorney General appealed the suppression order. Recently, in the wake of its admission that racial profiling indeed exists within the agency, the Attorney General's Office abandoned its appeal. Goodman, supra note 121, at B1.

n148. Kennedy, 588 A.2d at 838. See also Goodman, supra note 121, at B1 (reporting order of suppression in 19 consolidated cases asserting racial profiling on New Jersey Turnpike).

n149. Kennedy, 588 A.2d at 838-39.

n150. See supra notes 103-06 and accompanying text for a discussion of State v. Ladson, 979 P.2d 833 (Wash. 1999), and that state's rejection of Whren.

n151. See Armstrong, 517 U.S. at 461 n.2 (acknowledging that United States Supreme Court has not determined appropriate remedy for pretext stop).

n152. See id. (stressing Court has not determined whether dismissal is proper remedy). In Armstrong, the trial court dismissed the indictment not because it was bound to do so, but because the parties agreed that dismissal was the most efficient way to get the issue of discovery limitations before the appellate court. Id.

n153. See supra note 145 for a description of cases raising selective prosecution claims.

n154. See Sean Hecker, Race and Pretextual Traffic Stops: An Expanded Role for Civilian Review Boards, 28 Colum. Hum. Rts. L. Rev. 551, 587-89 (1997) (examining difficulties of bringing Fourteenth Amendment claim for pretextual stop).

n155. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Mulholland, 702 A.2d 1027, 1034-35 (Pa. 1997) (involving claim against prosecution and police officers' effort to bar their retrial where Commonwealth prosecuted only three of five officers involved in death of arrestee).

n156. See supra notes 119-24 and accompanying text for a discussion of racial profiling as an action of individual officers or department policy.

n157. See State v. Smith, 703 A.2d 954, 957-58 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1997) ("At best, the evidence proffered relates... Trooper Long had a hidden agenda and profiled Afro-American citizens.... The alleged motives of an individual police officer are not enough.").

n158. This conclusion is true even in Pennsylvania where the state supreme court has interpreted the exclusionary rule broadly. See Commonwealth v. Glass, 718 A.2d 804, 808-09 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1998) (describing purpose behind Pennsylvania's exclusionary rule as not just deterrence of police misconduct, but also as fundamental safeguard of privacy), appeal granted in part, 726 A.2d 1041 (Pa. 1999).

n159. See supra notes 53-55 and accompanying text for a discussion of Commonwealth v. Edmunds, 586 A.2d 887 (Pa. 1991).

n160. Admittedly, analysis of pretext under search and seizure reasonableness principles would not eliminate pre-trial litigation altogether. Courts still would be required to sift through what a police officer "would have done" absent her legally insupportable suspicions. The reasonableness test, however, sharply limits the inquiry by making it a narrower one. The issue is simply whether the stop would have occurred on the basis of the proffered reason, i.e., the minor traff ic violation.

```
****------------------------------------------------------------------------*

*     235 PAGES              8862 LINES              JOB  14338   100Y5T       *
*   1:00 P.M. STARTED     1:14 P.M. ENDED               03/01/02               *
****------------------------------------------------------------------------*
****------------------------------------------------------------------------*
*                          EEEEE      N   N      DDDD                          *
*                          E          N   N      D   D                         *
*                          E          NN  N      D   D                         *
*                          EEE        N N N      D   D                         *
*                          E          N  NN      D   D                         *
*                          E          N   N      D   D                         *
*                          EEEEE      N   N      DDDD                          *

****------------------------------------------------------------------------*

****------------------------------------------------------------------------*
```

SEND TO: BILYEAU, AMY
OFFICE OF ADMINISTATION LRSD
EOP- LIBRARY
17TH & PENNSYLVANIA AVE NW
OEOB, ROOM 308
WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA 20502

zippered pocket, they found cocaine. <=14> n13 After Belton's conviction on drug charges, the United States Supreme Court framed the issue as the "proper scope of a search of the interior of an automobile incident to a lawful custodial arrest of its occupants." <=15> n14 Recognizing that it already held, in Chimel v. California, <=16> n15 that a lawful arrest authorizes police to conduct warrantless searches of the person and "the immediately surrounding area," <=17> n16 the Belton Court nonetheless found this standard unworkable and "difficult to apply." <=18> n17 It highlighted the need for a "single, familiar standard... to guide police officers, who have only limited time and expertise to reflect on and balance the social and individual interests involved in the specific circumstances they confront." <=19> n18

The Belton majority reasoned that the cure for the uncertainty faced by police, as to whether a warrant was necessary, was a straightforward rule defining the "immediately surrounding area" of the arrestee. <=20> n19 The Court defined the phrase in general terms. <=21> n20 It asked not what area the arrestee had control over at the time of the search, but rather, what area the arrestee controlled prior to his arrest and custody. <=22> n21 Because Belton's jacket was "located inside the passenger compartment of the car in which [he] had been a passenger just before he was arrested," the jacket was deemed to be in an area within his immediate control. <=23> n22 The term "immediate area of control," Belton held, includes the entire passenger compartment and all of its contents, including closed containers and zippered jacket pockets. <=24> n23 After Belton, only the trunk of [*600] the car remained off-limits. <=25> n24

The dissent in Belton, led by Justice William Brennan, soundly disagreed. It labeled a fiction the majority's conclusion that the interior of a car is "within the immediate control of an arrestee." <=26> n25 Justice Brennan considered the majority's holding an expansion of Chimel that was inconsistent with search incident to arrest jurisprudence. <=27> n26 Chimel, he asserted, properly placed "a temporal and a spatial limitation on searches incident to arrest, excusing compliance with the warrant requirement only when the search "is substantially contemporaneous with the arrest and is confined to the immediate vicinity of the arrest.'" <=28> n27

Justice Brennan also eschewed the majority's underlying rationale: the purported need for a ""bright-line rule' to guide the officer in the field." <=29> n28 Instead, he reasoned, Chimel set forth a clear and effective rule for determining the proper scope of a warrantless search incident to arrest:

Under Chimel, searches incident to arrest may be conducted without a warrant only if limited to the person of the arrestee or to the area within the arrestee's "immediate control." While it may be difficult in some cases to measure the exact scope of the arrestee's immediate control, relevant factors would surely include the relative number of police officers and arrestees, the manner of restraint placed on the arrestee, and the ability of the arrestee to gain access to a particular area or container. Certainly there will be some close cases, but when in doubt the police can always turn to the rationale underlying Chimel - the need to prevent the arrestee from reaching weapons or contraband - before exercising their judgment. <=30> n29

Despite Justice Brennan's analysis, the Belton majority's view was sustained and the issue consequently fell to the states for resolution on state constitutional grounds.

II. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court Confronts Belton: Commonwealth v. White

Over a dozen years later, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court was asked to consider Belton in light of the state constitution. In February of 1990, William White, who had been identified to the police as a drug dealer some months earlier, was the subject of an investigation that involved the use of a confidential informant ("CI"). <=31> n30 White unwittingly sold cocaine to the CI, who later [*601] informed the police that a significant drug deal between White, his partner, and others was scheduled to take place. <=32> n31 The CI gave the police the date and location of the deal. <=33> n32 He also informed them that a blue car would be involved in the drug transaction. <=34> n33

With all of the information they gathered, the police were able to secure search warrants for White's residence and the residence and automobile of White's partner. <=35> n34 The police, however, did not seek a warrant for White's car. <=36> n35 At the expected location on the expected date, White appeared in his blue car and was joined in the car by another, unidentified man. <=37> n36 White's partner, who was in a second car, drove by a number of times and left the scene. <=38> n37 At least six police officers then converged on White's car, ordered the men from the vehicle, and placed them under arrest. <=39> n38 The police thereafter searched the empty car and retrieved a brown paper bag between the seats. <=40> n39 Inside the bag, they discovered cocaine. <=41> n40 Prior to facing trial on drug charges, White argued that the cocaine was seized illegally. <=42> n41

One of the many bases upon which the Commonwealth sought to justify the search of the paper bag, and thereby avoid suppression of the cocaine as evidence at trial, was as a search incident to arrest under Belton. <=43> n42 Clearly, the rationale in Belton authorized admission of the drugs. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court, however, refused to adopt Belton and instead relied on the state constitution to find that suppression was proper. <=44> n43 In a relatively brief opinion, the state court justices characterized Belton as proof that "the United States Supreme Court has de-emphasized the privacy interests inherent in the Fourth Amendment." <=45> n44 Without much analysis other than citation to Pennsylvania case law decided prior to Belton, <=46> n45 the White court held that "there is no justifiable search incident to arrest under the Pennsylvania Constitution save for the search of the person and the immediate area which the person occupies during his [*602] custody...." <=47> n46 In Pennsylvania, the "immediate area" was more limited than its federal counterpart. <=48> n47 It meant only those areas that the arrestee could reach at the time of the search. <=49> n48 Where an arrestee was secured outside of his vehicle or in the back of a police car, a search of the automobile's interior compartment was beyond the scope of a search incident to arrest. <=50> n49

In a concurring opinion, Justice Montemuro agreed that the Pennsylvania Constitution gave its citizens additional protections against the Belton rule. <=51> n50 Justice Montemuro, however, faulted the majority's summary treatment of the issue. <=52> n51 He believed that an in-depth analysis was warranted whenever the court considered deviation from the federal norm. <=53> n52 He urged his colleagues to return to the Edmunds test, <=54>

n53 a legal analysis that the court created in Commonwealth v. Edmunds. <=55> n54 Edmunds set forth what was originally thought to be a mandatory four-prong briefing format that addressed, in detail, the following factors:

(1) the text of the relevant state constitutional provision; (2) the history of the provision; (3) related case law from other states; and (4) policy considerations, including unique issues of state and local concern, and applicability within modern Pennsylvania jurisprudence. <=56> n55

Although the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had earlier made it clear that an Edmunds analysis was merely helpful, <=57> n56 Justice Montemuro called for reinstatement of Edmunds as a mandatory mode of analysis. <=58> n57 He suggested that Edmunds was "essential" to all state constitutional cases because it provided "a [*603] maximum amount of guidance to... lower courts and to litigants." <=59> n58

Justice Montemuro applied an Edmunds analysis to the facts in White and concluded that Belton was "seriously flawed and [had] no place in Pennsylvania jurisprudence." <=60> n59 Justice Montemuro began by analyzing the text of article I, section 8 of the state constitution, Pennsylvania's counterpart to the Fourth Amendment. <=61> n60 Justice Montemuro next examined the history of article I, section 8 and relevant Pennsylvania case law, concluding that Pennsylvania had been willing to depart from federal jurisprudence in the past. <=62> n61 In addressing the treatment of similar provisions in sister states, the third prong, Justice Montemuro compared the absence of sound state constitutional analysis from states that had adopted the Belton rule with the persuasive reasoning from those that had not. <=63> n62

The strength of Justice Montemuro's reasoning, however, was contained in his analysis of Edmunds's fourth prong, public policy. He carefully considered the current public view of Belton and the wide criticism it had received. <=64> n63 He weighed the risks and benefits of applying Belton's rule, balancing the privacy rights of Pennsylvania's citizens against the safety of its police officers. <=65> n64 He concluded that rejection of the Belton rule would not create "insurmountable law enforcement problems," while adoption of the rule would "dramatically curtail the privacy rights of motorists." <=66> n65 Contrary to the Belton majority's rationale, Justice Montemuro found no need for a bright-line rule in the wake of Chimel. <=67> n66 Instead, Justice Montemuro found that public policy interests commanded a state-based rejection of Belton. <=68> n67

III. The United States Supreme Court Further Broadens Police Power: Whren v. United States

On a summer evening in 1993, Michael Whren was a passenger in a sport utility vehicle on the streets of Washington, D.C. <=69> n68 A number of things prompted plainclothes vice-squad officers to be suspicious of Whren and the driver: the pair's youthful appearance, the truck's temporary license plate, and the fact that the vehicle remained at a stop sign in a "high drug area" for "an unusually long time" while the driver looked into the lap of his passenger. <=70> n69 [*604] When the officers made a U-turn in the direction of the truck, they observed the vehicle turn "suddenly to its right, without signaling, and speed off at an "unreasonable' speed." <=71> n70 At a traffic light, they approached the vehicle, with the asserted intention of giving the driver a warning about the traffic violation he had just committed. <=72> n71 Once at the driver's side window, the officers saw that Whren was holding two large bags of crack cocaine. <=73> n72 Whren was arrested and ultimately charged with several violations of federal drug laws. <=74> n73

In seeking to suppress the drugs as evidence at trial, Whren argued that the officers' purpose for the traffic stop was pretextual, that is, they were suspicious of Whren and his companion solely because of the men's race. <=75> n74 Whren argued that the officers used the minor traffic violation as a way to stop and investigate the pair. <=76> n75 Whren urged the Court to evaluate the officers' conduct objectively to determine whether, without their legally unsubstantiated suspicions, they would have made a traffic stop for failure to use a turn signal. <=77> n76 If they would not have done so, Whren argued, suppression was proper since seizure of the drugs would have been based on pretext, contrary to the Fourth Amendment. <=78> n77

Prior to Whren, some circuit courts suggested that pretext stops were unreasonable and, thus, improper under the Fourth Amendment. <=79> n78 These courts typically analyzed an officer's motives in order to uncover pretext. <=80> n79 If an officer "would not have" conducted the stop absent her legally unsupportable reason, [*605] the stop was deemed pretextual and, therefore, illegal. <=81> n80

To the surprise of many, the Whren Court rejected completely any analysis of the officers' underlying motivations. <=82> n81 Instead, the Court reasoned, the only relevant inquiry was whether it appeared that a traffic infraction - even a minor one - had occurred. <=83> n82 The unanimous Whren Court affirmed the notion that where police officers observe a traffic violation, they may stop the vehicle - even if their actual reason for stopping the car was not the violation they observed. <=84> n83 Essentially, Whren holds that pretext stops do not violate the Fourth Amendment. <=85> n84

Ignoring those circuit courts that found pretext stops to be an unreasonable course of action by police, the Court reasoned that the Fourth Amendment can never be offended when a traffic stop is made in the face of probable cause to believe a motor vehicle violation has occurred. <=86> n85

In response to defense claims that pretext has long been considered improper, the Court stated that previous cases dealing with law enforcement personnel who harbored ulterior motives did not include the existence of probable cause, unlike the scenario in Whren. <=87> n86 On the primary argument that permitting pretext stops enables police to engage in selective enforcement of traffic laws based on consideration of race, the Court made little comment. It noted only that while such a practice was wrong, "the constitutional basis for objecting to intentionally discriminatory application of laws is the Equal Protection Clause, not the Fourth Amendment." <=88> n87

IV. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court's Approach to the Breadth of Police Power: A Response to Whren

While it has yet to happen, the rule in Whren certainly will face a state constitutional challenge in Pennsylvania. And, although the state's supreme [*606] court no longer requires it, a full Edmunds analysis <=89> n88 may yield the very same result that it yielded in White, namely, a divergence from the established precedent of the United States Supreme Court based on the greater protections of the Pennsylvania Constitution. When the Pennsylvania Supreme Court is faced with a state constitutional challenge to Whren, it may find the Edmunds test a suitable mode of analysis from which to decide whether or not to diverge from federal law.

Edmunds's first prong, a textual analysis of the Fourth Amendment and its state counterpart, <=90> n89 militates neither in favor of nor against adherence to the Whren standard. In nearly every case in which the Pennsylvania Supreme Court has departed from the federal rule, it has recognized that article I, section 8 of the state constitution is "similar in language" to the Fourth Amendment but does not bind the courts to "interpret the two provisions as if they were mirror images" of one another. <=91> n90 Hence, prong one is not a barrier to divergence.

Edmunds's second prong, an analysis of the state constitutional provision and its history, results in a decided victory for departure from the federal norm. The protections afforded in article I, section 8 not only exceed, but precede, those set out in the Fourth Amendment. <=92> n91 The state provision has been interpreted as one "designed to protect [citizens]... from unwarranted and even vindictive incursions upon [their]... privacy," <=93> n92 a definition that aptly describes pretext stops.

Two decades ago, the state supreme court diverged from established federal law to rule that bank depositors have a legitimate expectation of privacy in their records held by the bank. <=94> n93 Characterizing the federal rule as "dangerous precedent," the court used the state constitution to afford state citizens greater privacy rights. <=95> n94

The court continued in this vein by rejecting the United States Supreme Court's reasoning and granting automatic standing to all criminal defendants accused of possessory offenses. <=96> n95 The state supreme court concluded that article I, section 8 "mandates greater recognition of the need for protection from illegal government conduct offensive to the right of privacy." <=97> n96

In yet other areas, Pennsylvania has refused to follow federal law, thereby granting an accused greater protection. Evidence gained from the use of a pen [*607] register was suppressed where the device was utilized without a prior court order. <=98> n97 The good faith exception to the exclusionary rule has been wholly rejected in the Commonwealth, based on state constitutional protections. <=99> n98 Other departures from Fourth Amendment jurisprudence have occurred, <=100> n99 establishing Pennsylvania as a state that "guards individual privacy rights more zealously than the federal government." <=101> n100 Clearly, the historical treatment of article I, section 8 militates in favor of divergence.

The third prong of analysis under Edmunds, consideration of related case law from other states, provides little direction to date. Due to the long road to appellate review, very few state courts have yet considered Whren. <=102> n101 Only New Hampshire has explicitly adopted Whren and held that its own state protections are equivalent to those granted by the federal constitution.

<=103> n102 Only Washington has explicitly rejected Whren on a state constitutional basis. <=104> n103 In doing so, the Supreme Court of Washington relied on a state constitutional provision that permitted an invasion of private affairs only under "authority of law." <=105> n104 That provision, reasoned the court, required one to look beyond the formal justification for a stop and to inquire into the actual reason. <=106> n105 Where the reason is pretextual, it is "inherently unreasonable" and violates the state constitution. <=107> n106 While the Washington case lends some support for rejecting Whren, the New Hampshire case does the contrary. Further, Pennsylvania's constitution does not contain a provision like the one relied on by the Washington court. <=108> n107

The final Edmunds prong, policy considerations, provides the most food for [*608] thought on this issue. <=109> n108 The primary public concern about constitutional validation of pretextual traffic stops is that the stops will be made disproportionately against an identifiable group, such as a racial minority. This practice of singling out a specific racial group for traffic stops, commonly known as racial profiling, causes persons of one race to be stopped repeatedly, while members of other racial groups avoid repeated police contact.

As always, there are two sides to the issue. Consider the balance of public policy interests. It is argued that most pretextual stops are race-based, and inherent in them is racial profiling. Where shown to be race-based, such stops are unreasonable, and therefore contrary to article I, section 8 of the Pennsylvania Constitution. <=110> n109 The unreasonableness of the stop stems from the fact that it is based on the officer's personal belief that people of certain races are more likely perpetrators of crime than are people of other races. The officer's beliefs are not based on anything the suspect has done. The officer's beliefs necessarily subject law-abiding citizens to unwarranted stops simply because of their race. Further, the officer does not seek to address and punish the minor traffic violation that serves as the legal basis for the stop, but is instead looking for other crimes, for which he has no legal basis. <=111> n110 Finding this conduct unreasonable allows the court to exclude the evidence seized in the pretext stop and, according to logic, deter future stops based on racial profiling.

On the other hand, characterizing pretextual stops as reasonable, and therefore not violative of article I, section 8, allows police officers to discover and apprehend criminals even when they do not commit significant crimes in the presence of police. This, according to logic, prevents more crime. <=112> n111 It is argued that pretextual stops do not necessarily involve racial profiling. To the extent that they do, the constitutional violation of such a race-based stop can be addressed effectively via alternative remedies, such as the Equal Protection Clause. <=113> n112 Whether that is true remains uncertain.

V. Public Policy Response: The State of Affairs in the Aftermath of Whren

Scholarly support for the practice of racial profiling is predictably slim. Few people find it acceptable, but one person who does is author and former police officer, Joseph Wambaugh. In an article addressing the public outcry that occurred after New Jersey state troopers fired on a van of minority youths [*609] stopped for a traffic violation on the turnpike, Wambaugh argued that a police officer's consideration of race is not necessarily a bad thing. <=114> n113 Like the Supreme Court in Whren, Wambaugh concedes that race as the sole reason for a stop is improper. <=115> n114 He argues, however, that inclusion of race as part of the probable cause mix has always been and continues to be appropriate. <=116> n115

Another approach adopted by commentators unopposed to pretext stops is the claim that even if practiced, the conduct known as racial profiling is not as "evil" as perceived. A recent editorial in the Wall Street Journal urged readers to have "a little perspective" and consider whether statistical information on traffic stops was evidence of racism or, simply, "efficiency" in the "targeting [of] potential drug traffickers." <=117> n116

On the other hand, Whren has prompted a flood of law review articles, legal reports, and editorials condemning the opinion. Authors have criticized the reasoning and logic of the opinion on legal grounds, citing the Court's failure to follow applicable precedent and its error in applying case law that is inapposite. <=118> n117 Further, the debate taking place in our public forum, and the current events fueling that debate, offer additional opposition to Whren.

The practice of racial profiling is widely reported - and criticized - in the media. <=119> n118 Accusations and confirmations of the practice are everywhere. Recently, New Jersey's Office of the Attorney General released a report in which it admitted the existence of racial profiling in the state's law enforcement organizations. <=120> n119 This admission triggered the resignation of the state police chief, <=121> n120 a concession in a lawsuit successfully brought against the state by the [*610] American Civil Liberties Union, <=122> n121 and the probable release of nineteen criminal defendants whose cases originated with a traffic stop. <=123> n122 Legislation aimed at preventing systemic racial profiling is being proposed on both federal and state levels. <=124> n123 White police officers stand indicted for falsifying official records to cover up a practice of racial profiling, <=125> n124 while officers of African-American descent are rallying together to end the racist practices of their colleagues. <=126> n125 Print media nationwide report the news of those directly affected. <=127> n126

"DWB" or "Driving While Black" is no longer a novel term; instead, its [*611] definition is widely known - and used - in the public forum. <=128> n127 In an effort to combat racial profiling, the ACLU maintains a website that offers users the opportunity to file an electronic Driver Profiling Complaint Form. <=129> n128 Users also are invited to download the ACLU "Bustcard," a "pocket guideline on encounters with the police" that advises citizens on their rights when stopped by law enforcement personnel. <=130> n129 Even organizations beyond the police department are being accused of and investigated for engaging in racial profiling. <=131> n130

In weighing the public policy risks and benefits pursuant to an Edmunds analysis, one must consider the value pretext stops have in our society, as well as the dangers they present. As Mr. Wambaugh so aptly instructs, a police officer's instinct and intuition is often right on the mark. <=132> n131 Clearly, society benefits from the officer who is skilled enough to recognize criminal conduct even absent the standard indicators accepted in our legal

Brief
Summer, 2001

*16 RACIAL PROFILING IN LAW ENFORCEMENT

The Defense Perspective on Civil Rights Litigation

Elizabeth A. Knight, William Kurnik [FNa1]

Copyright © 2001 by American Bar Association; Elizabeth A. Knight, William Kurnik

*17 A claim of discriminatory law enforcement practices challenges the integrity of the law enforcement agency and its officers. The accusation of biased and prejudicial conduct by a police officer is easily charged, not readily proven, and difficult to defend.

Because the issue of racial profiling only recently became one of significant controversy and debate, many police agencies have little or no information on the race and/or national origin of the persons its officers have encountered, stopped, or arrested in the past. Many agencies have begun to gather statistics and data, but in the authors' opinion, until the data is analyzed and appropriate benchmarks established, it is too early to reach any conclusions with respect to the nature, context, and extent of actual discriminatory law enforcement practices. Until such information is available, law enforcement must respond proactively to the perceived problem, with the goal of eliminating discriminatory practices where they do exist and deterring any possibility for future prohibited practices.

Instances of racial profiling or targeting are both perceived and observed. It has been reported that 60 percent of the population, without regard to race, believes that racial profiling exists. [FN1] Among blacks, the figure is eighty percent. [FN2] It has been admitted that the state police of two states have engaged in the practice, and both are now operating under consent decree. [FN3] The Supreme Court has commented that the perception of the existence of the practice offers an explanation why innocent people may flee simply at the sight of the police. [FN4] Municipalities, upon hearing the rattling of sabers, enter into consent decrees. [FN5] So it comes as no surprise that motions to dismiss claims of racial profiling are regularly being denied, and class actions are being certified. [FN6]

Our purpose is to identify issues and problems encountered by the authors in defending allegations of racial profiling. Because there is no binding racial profiling precedent, we will contrast Fourth Amendment and equal protection jurisprudence, burden of proof, and evidentiary issues.

Defining the act

Historically, the term "profile" as it has been used in law enforcement practices, in a broad sense, refers to the specific reasonable inferences that a police officer is entitled to draw from the facts in light of his experience, as set forth in Terry v. Ohio. [FN7] Law enforcement officers rely upon and are trained to rely upon their own experiences in detection and prevention of crime. Similarly, law enforcement instruction trains officers to rely upon the profession's collective experience. [FN8]

In 1974, the Department of Justice Drug Enforcement Administration, in instituting training programs for narcotics officers, defined "profile" as the collective or distilled experience of narcotics officers concerningcharacteristics repeatedly seen in drug smugglers. [FN9] A police officer is entitled to assess the totality of the circumstances in light of his own training and experience, and instruction on a drug courier profile would be part of the officer's accumulated knowledge. [FN10]

For purposes of this article, we define a "profile" as a set of circumstances, events, or behavior that, when combined with the experience of an officer, may cause heightened suspicion that affects the officer's exercise of discretion in stop and/or arrest decisions.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN4]. Id.

[FN5]. See, e.g., Ledford v. City of Highland Park, 2000 WL 1053967 (N.D. Ill. 2000).

[FN6]. Daniels v. City of New York, 198 F.R.D. 409 (S.D.N.Y. 2001).

[FN7]. 392 U.S. 1, 88 S. Ct. 1868, 20 L. Ed. 2d 889, 909 (1968).

[FN8]. United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 101 S. Ct. 690, 66 L. Ed. 2d 621 (1981).

[FN9]. Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491, 103 S. Ct. 1319, 75 L. Ed. 2d 229, 255 (1983) (Rehnquist dissenting, n. 6).

[FN10]. United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 100 S. Ct. 1870, 64 L. Ed. 2d 497 (1980).

[FN11]. United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 109 S.Ct. 1581, 104 L. Ed. 2d 1, 12 (1989).

[FN12]. 221 F.3d 329, 337 (2nd Cir. 2000).

[FN13]. Id.

[FN14]. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 116 S. Ct. 1769, 135 L. Ed. 2d 89, 97 (1996).

[FN15]. Id.

[FN16]. Id.

[FN17]. United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 328 U.S. 543, 96 S. Ct. 3074, 49 L. Ed. 2d 1116, 1131 (1976).

[FN18]. United States v. Stone, 73 F.Supp.2d 441 (S.D. NY 1999).

[FN19]. 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131, 1140 (N.D. Cal. 2000).

[FN20]. Price v. Kramer, 200 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 2000).

[FN21]. United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 109 S. Ct. 1581, 104 L. Ed. 2d 1, 12 (1989).

[FN22]. Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 111 S. Ct. 2382, 115 L. Ed. 2d 389, 403 n. 1 (1991).

[FN23]. Id. at 409 n. 4.

[FN24]. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 116 S. Ct. 1769, 135 L. Ed. 2d 89, 98 (1996).

[FN25]. 392 U.S. 1, 88 S. Ct. 1868, 20 L. Ed. 2d 889, 909 (1968).

[FN26]. 392 U.S. 1, 14-16, 88 S. Ct. 1868, 20 L. Ed. 2d 889, 901-03 (1968).

[FN27]. 137 F.3d 343, 353 (6th Cir. 1997)

[FN28]. Id. at 354.

[FN29]. Id. at 358.

[FN30]. Id. at 358.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN31]. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S. Ct. 2040, 48 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1976).

[FN32]. Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S. Ct. 555, 50 L. Ed. 2d 450, 468 (1977).

[FN33]. Ford v. Wilson, 90 F.3d 245, 248-49 (7th Cir. 1996).

[FN34]. Id. at 249.

[FN35]. Id. at 249.

[FN36]. 517 U.S. 456, 116 S. Ct. 1480, 134 L. Ed. 2d 687, 699 (1996).

[FN37]. Id.

[FN38]. Id.

[FN39]. 27 F. Supp. 2d 1053, 1066 (N.D. Ill. 1998).

[FN40]. Id.

[FN41]. Id. at 1067.

[FN42]. Id.

[FN43]. Id. at 1069.

[FN44]. Id. at 1070.

[FN45]. 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131 (N.D. Cal. 2000).

[FN46]. Id. at 1141.

[FN47]. 221 F.3d 329, 337 (2d. Cir. 2000).

[FN48]. 195 F.3d 111 (2d. Cir. 1999).

[FN49]. 75 F. Supp. 2d 154 (S.D. N.Y. 1999).

[FN50]. 191 F.R.D. 52 (S.D. N.Y. 1999).

[FN51]. United States v. Avery, 137 F.3d 343, 352 (6th Cir. 1997).

[FN52]. United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873, 886-87 (1975).

[FN53]. 90 F.3d 22 (2nd Cir. 1996).

[FN54]. Id.

[FN55]. Id.

[FN56]. Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U.S. 1 (1944).

[FN57]. Id. at 11-12.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN58]. Hameetman v. City of Chicago, 776 F.2d 636, 641 (7th Cir. 1985).

[FN59]. See, e.g., Farm Labor Organizing Comm. v. Ohio State Highway Patrol, 95 F. Supp. 2d 723 (N.D. Ohio 2000); Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131 (N.D. Cal. 2000); Maryland State Conf. of NAACP Branches v. Maryland Dept. of State Police, 72 F. Supp. 2d 560 (D. Md. 1999).

[FN60]. 28 C.F.R. § 42.104(b).

[FN61]. Guardians Assn. v. Civil Serv. Comm. of New York City, 463 U.S. 582, 103 S. Ct. 3221 (1983).

[FN62]. Adams v. Ameritech Serv., Inc., 231 F.3d 414, 423 (7th Cir. 2000).

[FN63]. Gebser v. Lago Vista Ind. Sch. Dist., 424 U.S. 274, 118 S. Ct. 1989, 141 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1998).

[FN64]. City of St. Louis v. Prapotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 108 S. Ct. 915, 99 L. Ed. 2d 107 (1988).

[FN65]. Gebser v. Lago Vista Ind. Sch. Dist., 424 U.S. 274, 118 S. Ct. 1989, 141 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1998)

[FN66]. 64 USCAA 2511.

[FN67]. Cong. Rec., Fed. 7, 1964, pp. 2480-83.

[FN68]. Cong. Rec., Fed. 7, 1964, p. 2484.

[FN69]. Cong. Rec., July 2, 1964, p. 15896.

[FN70]. Davis v. Monroe Bd. of Ed., 526 U.S. 629, 639-40, 119 S. Ct. 1661, 1669-70, 143 L. Ed. 2d 839 (1989).

[FN71]. One district court, perhaps erroneously relying upon Armstrong, has held that statistical evidence cannot be used to establish intentional discrimination in a targeting case. Chavez v. Illinois State Police, 27 F. Supp. 2d 1053 (N.D. Ill. 1998), appeal pending.

[FN72]. Int'l Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 339, 97 S. Ct. 1843, 1856 (1977).

[FN73]. Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 496 n. 17, 97 S. Ct. 1272, 1281, n. 17, 51 L. Ed. 2d 498 (1977) (prima facie case of underrepresentation of Mexican Americans on grand juries shown by 29 standard deviations).

[FN74]. Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. United States, 433 U.S. 299, 310-12, 97 S. Ct. 2736, 2743-46, 53 L. Ed. 2d 768 (1977); REFERENCE MANUAL OF SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE , FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER, 2000 (2d ed.),at 105.

[FN75]. In several questions posed by the judges during oral argument in Chavez, the judges seem to believe that the relevant benchmark was the racial breakdown of the operators of motor vehicles along the interstate highways where the alleged profiling occurred on the interstates. Dr. John Lamberth of Temple University gave a New Jersey Turnpike population census in connection with a motion to suppress where the defendant had alleged that he was targeted. David A. Harris, The Stories, The Statistics, and The Law: Why "Driving While Black" Matters, 84 MINN. L. REV. 265, 277-78 (1999).

[FN76]. Hazelwood Sch. Dist. v. United States, 433 U.S. 299, 310-12, 97 S. Ct. 2736, 2743-46 (1977). But it may no longer be a question of fact in this post-Daubert and -Kuhmo Tire era.

[FN77]. Always be cognizant that summaries may be misleading by choice of category. REFERENCE MANUAL OF SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE , FEDERAL JUDICIAL CENTER, 2000 (2d ed.), at 106.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Profiling has been recognized as a legitimate law enforcement tool in identifying suspicious and potentially criminal activity. The use of a profile has been held permissible for purposes of establishing the Fourth Amendment reasonable suspicion for an investigatory stop and detention. The U.S. Supreme Court has held that the fact that a drug courier profile was among the factors articulated for a Terry stop did not detract from its evidentiary significance as seen by a trained agent. [FN11]

In contrast, the term "racial profiling" appears to broadly connote discriminatory law enforcement practices. The courts have not yet developed a legal definition. The circumstances under which a law enforcement officer or official might exercise his or her judgmental discretion with discriminatory animus are varied. As the term "racial profiling" is legally applied to individual claims and circumstances, a more specific and concrete meaning of the term in a constitutional sense will evolve.

In the meantime, it is safe to assume that racial profiling generically references and seeks to encompass all prohibited discriminatory law enforcement practices and conduct. In this sense, racial profiling may be considered to include one or more of the practices listed in the sidebar below.

In constructing a definition of racial profiling, it is also important to include a requirement of self-initiation on the part of the officer. Racial profiling *18 is, therefore, intended to encompass, by definition, the elective decision-making process, as opposed to the officer's response to a citizen call in which the officer takes national origin, ethnicity, or race into account in decision making with respect to enforcement of the law. The Second Circuit implicitly adopted this reasoning in Brown v. City of Oneonta, New York. [FN12] The court concluded that there was no violation of the Equal Protection Clause in a case where plaintiffs charged that they were questioned solely on the basis of their race, where the physical description of the suspect provided by the victim of the crime contained race among other factors. The policy of the department, which included obtaining a description of the assailant and seeking out persons matching that description, was found to be race-neutral on its face. [FN13] For this reason, we exclude non-self- initiated encounters from the definition of racial profiling.

Fourth Amendment considerations

The term "racial profiling" necessarily implies a requisite degree of mental intent or discriminatory purpose. The constitutionality of police stops, detentions, and arrests has historically been measured and scrutinized by the Fourth Amendment yardstick. The objective criteria that measure the officer's reasonableness in forming a suspicion or probable cause do not include discriminatory animus. Because the claims of racial profiling arise in the stop, detention, and arrest context, it is still important to analyze each case from a Fourth Amendment standpoint.

In the Fourth Amendment analysis, an officer's motive does not invalidate objectively justifiable behavior, and subjective intent does not make otherwise lawful conduct illegal or unconstitutional. [FN14] In Whren v. United States, [FN15] the suspects (African American) were stopped for traffic violations in a high drug area and were charged with possession of cocaine, which was discovered during the stop. The suspects urged that the stop was pretextual, and it was also contended that the police officers decided which motorists to stop based upon decidedly impermissible factors such as the race of the car's occupants. The Supreme Court held that an officer's motive did not invalidate objectively justified behavior under the Fourth Amendment. [FN16] The Fourth Amendment does not provide an open avenue for challenging racially motivated stops and arrests because of the objective standard set forth in Whren, which does not require an analysis of the officer's intent or motive. Even before Whren was decided, the U.S. Supreme Court perceived no Fourth Amendment violation in the practice of referring motorists to check point locations at the discretion of the border patrol, even if it was assumed that referrals were made largely on the basis of apparent Mexican ancestry. [FN17]

Another Fourth Amendment decision held that the fact that an officer's initial approach may have been racially motivated did not render a Terry stop unreasonable as a matter of law, even assuming that the defendant was singled out for a closer inspection on the basis of his race, where the court was otherwise satisfied that the officer complied with the Fourth Amendment. [FN18]

Not all claims of a racially motivated stop and arrest, however, escape analysis under the Fourth Amendment. In

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, [FN19] the court, in a civil action, allowed a Fourth Amendment claim to survive a motion to dismiss that was premised upon alleged racial profiling, concluding that even if the stops were lawful under Whren, the facts alleged might support liability for violation of the Fourth Amendment due to the intrusiveness and duration of the searches and detentions. Additionally, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed a verdict in favor of plaintiffs where it was alleged that officers with racial bias stopped the plaintiffs' vehicle without probable cause or reasonable suspicion, conducted an illegal search, and used degrading and excessive force on the plaintiffs. [FN20] Thus, it is possible that racial bias might be an evidentiary consideration in the Fourth Amendment context to establish the absence of reasonable suspicion or probable cause, but conduct under the Fourth Amendment is still judged by an objective standard.

Although the Fourth Amendment does not require inquiry into the subjective state of mind of the officer, the potential for racially biased law enforcement practices has been noted previously. Justice Thurgood Marshall was critical of the use of police profiles in a dissenting opinion, suggesting that reliance on a profile runs a greater risk of subjecting innocent individuals to unwarranted police harassment and detention. [FN21] Justice Marshall dissented in another case, criticizing police sweeps of buses as being conducted in dragnet style. [FN22] Justice Marshall concluded that insisting that police officers explain their decision to single out a particular passenger for questioning would help prevent their reliance on impermissible criteria such as race. [FN23] The foreshadowing of the problem of racial profiling articulated in Justice Marshall's dissents arose in a Fourth Amendment context, but identifies the complex issue presently challenging the courts.

From the defense perspective, Fourth Amendment criteria and objectivity should be addressed in a racial profiling claim. In the presence of a valid Fourth Amendment encounter, it is not clear that an arrest or prosecution will be invalidated criminally due to a claim of discrimination. Whren supplies a legal basis for the stop 19 and/or arrest on objective criteria for Fourth Amendment purposes.

Equal Protection Clause bases

While subjective intentions play no role in the ordinary, probable-cause Fourth Amendment analysis, the Constitution prohibits selective enforcement of the law based on considerations such as race. The constitutional basis for objecting to intentional, discriminatory application of laws is the Equal Protection Clause, not the Fourth Amendment. [FN24]

Although the Fourth Amendment is implicated in the stop, detention, and arrest setting, the most direct constitutional avenue of relief for a racial profiling claim is the Equal Protection Clause. Where an arrest otherwise passes scrutiny for Fourth Amendment purposes, it is unknown how racial profiling-equal protection challenges will affect criminal prosecution and conviction. If a stop or arrest passes constitutional Fourth Amendment scrutiny, will equal protection-racial bias claims on the part of the arresting officer or agency invalidate the arrest? Whren provides no indication for the solution of the problem and simply suggests it be resolved in an equal protection setting. The answer to the question may impact criminal cases with motions to suppress focusing upon allegations of bigotry on the part of the arresting officer instead of traditional search and seizure requirements. Similarly, a determination that discrimination in an otherwise proper Fourth Amendment context invalidates the arrest will broaden the definition of false arrest in a civil context. Terry v. Ohio [FN25] was decided in a Fourth Amendment setting, but the Court observed in passing that the wholesale harassment of minority groups by certain elements of the police community will not be stopped by the exclusion of any evidence in a criminal trial. [FN26]

More recently, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Avery [FN27] suggested that an equal protection violation may occur at the pre-contact stage of the criminal process where an officer initially targets someone solely because of the person's race, without additional factors, and because of the person's race, follows and investigates that individual. The court in Avery concluded that such targeting would be constitutionally impermissible and violative of the Equal Protection Clause because a person cannot become the target of a police investigation solely on the basis of race. [FN28] In Avery, Judge Boggs wrote a separate concurring opinion, critical of the majority, noting that the contours of a violation in a pre-contact stage of the criminal process are difficult to discern in the abstract. [FN29] Even if a hypothetical defendant in the criminal setting presented compelling evidence that officers noticed, targeted, pursued, or investigated a person solely because of his race, the concurring opinion in Avery raises the question whether the pre-contact activity, which could be described as leading to evidence of a crime, would warrant suppression.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

On the other hand, the contours of the violation are difficult to discern in the abstract. In a paradigmatic case, an officer on routine foot patrol walks east on First Street, behind two men, one black and one white. First Street dead-ends into Main, so at the corner of First and Main each man, and the officer must turn right or left. The black man turns one way; the white man turns the other. The officer chooses to turn the corner to follow one of the men and, when questioned later, candidly admits that he had no reason for deciding to go right rather than left save the race of the man who also turned that way. However, within a block of turning of the corner, the officer sees the man rob a store, and arrests the man. My intuition is that the evidence of that robbery could not be suppressed. However, that intuition was no less dicta than most of the discussion in Part II B of the court's opinion. [FN30]

It is not clear how the exclusionary rule will be applied to violations of the Equal Protection Clause in the criminal context. Regardless of the impact racial profiling-equal protection challenges are determined to have in the criminal arena, the claim of racial profiling is presently being advanced in civil claims.

Procedural and evidentiary uncertainties in a claim for equal protection- racial profiling exist because from a substantive standpoint, the law has not yet clarified the elements of the plaintiff's burden of proof. Purposeful intent to discriminate must be present before there is a violation of equal protection in a racial setting. [FN31] In an equal protection claim, the plaintiff carries the burden of proving that discriminatory purpose was a motivating factor in the defendant's decisions and action. [FN32] The combination of an arbitrary traffic stop with a racial difference between the person stopped and the police officer, however, has been held insufficient to establish a prima facie case of race discrimination. [FN33] Otherwise, the floodgates would be opened to federal court any time "a black arrested a white or a white arrested a black." [FN34]

There are fundamental problems with adopting a Title VII employment discrimination approach to the burden of proof in a racial profiling-equal protection claim that arises in a stop-and-arrest setting. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals rejected such an approach in Ford v. Wilson, [FN35] noting:

We do not think, by analogy to the McDonnell-Douglas framework for deciding motions for summary judgment in employment cases, that the combination of an arbitrary stop ... with a difference in race between the person stopped and the officer establishes a prima facie case of racial discrimination. Otherwise any time a black arrests a white, or a white arrests a black, the person could, by testifying that the arrest had been groundless, obtain a trial in federal court under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. We used the example of an arrest but the principle would apply equally to traffic stops--and again the specter of millions of new claims of constitutional infringement looms.

There is presently a conflict in the courts with respect to the critical question whether the plaintiff must be able to demonstrate that similarly situated individuals in a non-protected class were not stopped or arrested for equal protection-racial profiling claims.

In United States v. Armstrong, [FN36] the criminal defendants were charged with conspiracy to possess with intent to distribute cocaine and alleged that 20 they were selected for federal prosecution based upon their race (African American). The defendants were able to demonstrate that all 24 crack cocaine cases closed in the previous year involved African-American defendants, and that 54 cases closed in the three previous years involved non-white defendants.

The requirements for a selective prosecution claim draw on ordinary equal protection standards, and the claimant must demonstrate that the federal prosecutorial policy had a discriminatory effect and that it was motivated by discriminatory purpose. [FN37] The court in Armstrong held that to establish a discriminatory effect in a race case, the claimant must show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted. [FN38] In Chavez v. Illinois State Police, [FN39] the district court applied Armstrong in a case that alleged that the Illinois State Police had engaged in the practice of stopping and detaining African-American and Hispanic motorists based upon their race without sufficient cause or justification.

Relying upon Armstrong the court in Chavez noted that the plaintiff must show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not subjected to the challenged conduct. [FN40] The failure to establish the similarly situated requirement in Chavez was fatal to the plaintiffs' equal protection claims. The plaintiffs in Chavez were not able to identify similarly situated white motorists who were treated differently from the plaintiffs. In Chavez, the plaintiffs argued that Armstrong does not apply to a law enforcement racial profiling case because Armstrong involved a claim of selective prosecution. Armstrong was premised upon general equal protection principles. The plaintiffs in Chavez also attempted to avoid the application of Armstrong by distinguishing the case with the great deference afforded to a prosecutor's decision of whom to charge, which is not afforded to a police officer's decision of whom to stop. The district court rejected the argument in Chavez applying traditional equal protection principles that require a plaintiff demonstrate he or she was treated differently than a similarly situated person of a different race. The answer to the question was not in the deference given to the decision maker in the respective situations, but in whether the decision made resulted in impermissible treatment of similarly situated persons. [FN41]

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

The plaintiffs in Chavez alternatively argued that if the burden of proof in Armstrong applied to racial profiling in law enforcement, statistical data demonstrating that persons subjected to the alleged wrongful conduct were of a certain race would be sufficient to establish the similarly situated requirement. Applying Armstrong again, the district court in Chavez held that the study showing that all persons prosecuted were black did not meet the similarly situated requirement, and explained that the required threshold for equal protection claims is a credible showing of different treatment of similarly situated persons. [FN42]

The plaintiffs in Chavez also offered other non-statistical evidence in support of their claims of discriminatory treatment. The other claims included: 1) that the Illinois State Police permit consideration of race as a factor in deciding which motorists to stop; 2) that Illinois State Troopers admit they use race as one of the indicators in determining whether to search a vehicle; 3) that State Police training manuals emphasize alleged predominance of Hispanics as drug couriers; 4) that testimony of African-American motorists recounts allegedly discriminatory law enforcement by the Illinois State Police; and 5) that Illinois State Police refused to open a case when a citizen complained he was stopped because of race. [FN43]

Additionally, one of the plaintiffs in Chavez testified that an officer referred to "you people" when asking permission to search the plaintiff's vehicle. Because racial remarks alone may not give rise to an equal protection violation, the plaintiffs' claim in Chavez under the Equal Protection Clause was deemed insufficient because it had not been demonstrated that he was treated differently than someone else due to racial animus. Other evidence offered by the plaintiffs in Chavez was also found to be inadequate because the plaintiffs failed to point to a white motorist who was treated differently. [FN44]

In Chavez, the court refused to infer that a specific similarly situated white motorist would not have been stopped because the inference would require the court to collapse the two prongs of equal protection analysis and, in essence, eliminate the requirement of establishing the comparative element.

Faced with a similar issue of racial profiling, Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol [FN45] rejected the application of Armstrong's similarly situated requirement in a law enforcement as opposed to a prosecutorial setting. The court in Rodriguez disagreed with the application of Armstrong in Chavez, noting that Armstrong is a case of critical importance in the criminal context but is less instructive in a civil case. In Rodriguez, the court also emphasized that the holding in Armstrong emphasized that the judiciary owes special deference to the prosecutorial office, concluding that such deference that is extended to a prosecutor's office is not extended to law enforcement officers. It is anticipated that the opinion of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals in Chavez will be significant in establishing the plaintiff's burden of proof in the civil context. If the plaintiff is held to be required to meet the similarly situated requirement of Armstrong, it will be difficult or, in some cases, impossible for the plaintiff to establish this element of the burden of proof. Unlike the records and data that would be available in a selective prosecution case, police agencies do not typically keep records of individuals who are not stopped or arrested. The court in Rodriguez expressed specific concern over the similarly situated requirement 21 as it might be applied in the civil context because it would be impossible to meet. Normally, similarly situated persons for whom records might be maintained would be the relatively small subset of individuals who were stopped and questioned by the police but not arrested; and even for this group, it is difficult to conceive what data plaintiffs could obtain. [FN46]

In Brown v. City of Oneonta, New York, [FN47] the court held that it was not necessary to plead the existence of a similarly situated non-minority group when challenging a law or policy that contains an express, racial classification. Such classifications are subject to strict judicial scrutiny. This opinion in Brown superceded the court's prior opinion in

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Brown v. City of Oneonta, New York. [FN48] Further conflict and inconsistent results have been occurring in the district courts with respect to the burden of proof. The district court opinion in National Congress for Puerto Rican Rights v. City of New York [FN49] originally applied Armstrong requirements to the plaintiff's action challenging the constitutionality of stop-and-frisks conducted by the street crime unit in New York. In originally granting the motion to dismiss the equal protection claim, the district noted that the plaintiff failed to show that similarly situated individuals of a different race were not subjected to the challenged conduct. The court found the district court opinion in Chavez instructive but not controlling with respect to the application of Armstrong to law enforcement allegations of targeting and profiling. Two months later, on the plaintiff's motion for reconsideration, the district court in National Congress for Puerto Rican Rights v. City of New York [FN50] reversed the prior ruling and reinstated the equal protection claim based upon Brown holding that the plaintiff need not identify similarly situated non-minority individuals where discriminatory policy contains an express racial classification. The court concluded that a boilerplate Monell allegation in the complaint--alleging that the defendants implemented and enforced a policy, practice, or custom of stopping and frisking members of the plaintiff class based on race and national origin constituted an express racial classification--obviated the need for the plaintiff to address the comparative element of similarly situated persons emphasized in Chavez.

The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals decision in Chavez should clarify and resolve some of the conflicting decisions with respect to the burden of proof. In addition to the unanswered questions surrounding the plaintiff's burden of proof, the law has not yet substantively defined the parameters of the Equal Protection Clause with respect to claims of racial profiling. It is clear that action taken solely because of an individual's race or national origin, regardless of the stage of the encounter with law enforcement, will violate the Equal Protection Clause. The definition of racial profiling previously provided herein includes activity more appropriately described as targeting. A person cannot become the target of a police investigation solely on the basis of race. [FN51] The extent to which race or national origin may be a factor or taken into account in law enforcement practices without causing a violation of the Equal Protection Clause is unknown. The airport and border cases involve distinguishable circumstances from a typical police encounter, including a qualitative Fourth Amendment difference. In addressing a border encounter, the United States Supreme Court refused to adopt, by analogy, the concept that "the likelihood that any given person of African ancestry is involved in drug trafficking is high enough to make African ancestry a relevant fact in investigating drug trafficking at the airport." [FN52]

To the extent that profiles are used as an investigatory law enforcement tool, the criteria should be based upon a pattern of conduct, repeated behavior and characteristics rather than membership in a particular class. In United States v. Al Jibori, [FN53] a post-Armstrong selective prosecution case, the assistant U.S. attorney admitted that the decision to prosecute included the defendant's place of origin as well as mode of entry since sufficient terrorist activity had originated in the Middle East. The defendant in Al Jibori was from Iraq, traveling with an altered Swedish passport. Ahmed Mohammed Ajaj was a Jordanian who traveled from Pakistan under his Swedish passport and was convicted in the World Trade Center bombing. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals characterized the similarities between the two fake passports as superficial and remanded the case for further inquiry to determine if there was commonality between the two defendants other than their national or regional origin. [FN54] In remanding, the court in Al Jibori suggested the lower court examine evidence that the defendant matched the alleged terrorist profile, as well as the government's newfound proactivity with regard to passport violations. If it could be demonstrated that this was not a one-time selective exercise or a showing that a substantial number of the prosecutions were of defendants from other areas of the world, it could be sufficient to pass constitutional scrutiny for selective prosecution. [FN55]

A definition of racial profiling in the context of the Equal Protection Clause will probably include the traditional equal protection concepts, in addition to reconciling claims of racial profiling with traditional principles regarding selective enforcement of the law. The unlawful administration by state officers of a state statute fair on its face--resulting in an unequal application to those who are entitled to be treated alike--is not a denial of equal protection unless there is an element of intentional or purposeful discrimination. [FN56] A construction of the Equal Protection Clause that would find a *22 violation of federal right in every departure by state officers from state law is not to be favored. [FN57]

The Constitution does not require states to enforce their laws (or cities their ordinances) with Prussian thoroughness at the price of being allowed to enforce them at all (citations omitted). Otherwise few speeders would have to pay traffic tickets. Selective, incomplete enforcement of the law is the norm in this country. [FN58]

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Although claims to enforce the Equal Protection Clause under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 first come to mind as the vehicle for remedying racial profiling or targeting, some district courts have sustained claims brought under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d. [FN59] Recognizing actions under Title VI affects the level of culpability necessary to obtain relief, the scope of liability, and the admissibility of evidentiary issues.

42 U.S.C. § 2000d was passed pursuant to Congress' power under the spending clause. The section provides: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

The Department of Justice promulgated regulations describing the prohibited discrimination. First, the regulations paraphrase the statutory authorization and then identify specific, discriminatory actions that are prohibited, including to "Deny an individual any disposition, service, financial aid or benefit provided under the program. ... subject an individual to segregation or separate treatment in any manner related to his receipt of any disposition, service, financial aid, or benefit under the program." [FN60]

Although claims brought under the Equal Protection Clause are limited to claims of intentional discrimination, actions under Title VI are broader in scope. Where monetary relief is not being sought, an action may be brought under Title VI to enforce the Justice Department's regulations on a disparate impact theory. [FN61] Although courts have observed that in disparate treatment or discriminatory pattern or practice cases, statistical evidence "will likely not be sufficient in itself" to establish the claim, [FN62] this is not so with a disparate impact claim.

Title VI operates like Title IX, and in construing both acts, because of their similarity, the same rules of construction apply in determining their scope and operation. [FN63] For liability to be imposed upon a public entity under Section 1983, the profiler must be a final policymaker, or notice of the existence of profiling must come to the attention of a final policymaker. [FN64] Not so under Title IX--and, therefore, not under Title VI. If notice of a violation of Title IX comes to the attention of a person with power to stop it, public entity liability is established. [FN65] A street sergeant or a shift commander should have the power to stop racial profiling, and notice to the supervisor may be sufficient to establish public entity liability. Absent delegation of final policy-making authority, only notice to the chief of police can establish liability under Section 1983. The evidentiary implications are obvious.

It seems that until the issue is foreclosed by binding precedent, the availability of Title VI as a vehicle for remedying racial profiling or targeting is an open question. Reviewing the congressional debates on Title VI indicates that the concern of Congress was that "citizens are denied the equal benefits from federal financial assistance programs because of their color." [FN66] Throughout the debates, Congress expressed its concern that funds were being used to perpetuate "segregation." [FN67] A comment was made: "Is not everyone entitled to his full share of benefits?" [FN68] Finally, on the date of the passage of the act by Congress, a sponsor of the House Bill commented that the bill addressed "programs administered on a segregated basis." [FN69] It seems that Congress wanted to ensure that everyone received a fair share of government largess. Nowhere in the debates on the title is there any mention made of any abuses in law enforcement activities or violence, as was the case for debates on Section 1983.

When Congress acts under its spending power, liability attaches "[o] nly where recipients of federal funding had adequate notice that they could be liable for the conduct at issue." [FN70] The focus of the Act is on persons being excluded from participation in a "program" or being denied the "benefits," of a program receiving federal aid. In a claim involving racial profiling and targeting, persons are not being denied a "benefit," nor are they being denied equal participation in a "program." The ultimate determination whether Title VI provides a remedy for racial profiling in the arrest context will probably turn upon this issue.

Statistical evidence

Not surprisingly, the use of statistics to establish intentional discrimination in racial profiling and targeting remains an open question. [FN71] In the employment context, the Supreme Court has held that statistics are, in general, admissible to prove the existence of a pattern or practice of discrimination. [FN72] Although no specific difference between the expected value and the observed number must be shown, two or three standard deviations may be sufficient to show

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

discrimination. [FN73]

In any statistical analysis, one must look at the proper community or group when making a comparison. [FN74] In racial profiling and targeting cases, this provides the first means for attacking the statistics. Particularly in small communities bordering large metropolitan areas, the racial makeup of the drivers along the streets of the community may have no correlation to the population of the community. It is the racial makeup of the operators of motor vehicles in the particular community that provides the relevant benchmark. [FN75]

If traffic stops are being analyzed, the benchmark needs to be adjusted to determine driving-age population. The plaintiffs will no doubt seek to make adjustments to reduce the driving population of minorities by making further reductions for the percentage of families that do not own motor vehicles. The plaintiffs may seek to increase the driving population of whites by considering multiple-vehicle households. Whether or not these adjustments are warranted is problematic. Although this may seem to be the best method of attack, the Supreme 23 Court has noted that the relevant market is a question of fact. [FN76]

Assuming that the department has not already begun data collection, the obvious sources of the data would be traffic citations, arrest reports, or logs of vehicle stops called in to the dispatcher. Depending upon the allegations, records of plates being run on vehicles that are not stopped would have to be reviewed. In connection with the compilation of the database from the sources, the consensus seems to be that the offenses must be quantified in light of the particular allegations. Non-discretionary offenses, for example, driving 10 miles per hour over the established speed limit or DUI, should be distinguished from discretionary violations, for example, improper lane change or obstructed vision. Again, depending upon the allegations, moving offenses and non-moving offenses can be distinguished and perhaps even further divided by observable versus non-observable offenses.

The next step in the statistical analysis is to analyze the data by categories to obtain a picture of exactly what is transpiring. [FN77] Comparisons may be based upon the overall numbers or broken down by gender, age group, and offense.

When faced with what may appear to be statistically significant discrimination, can it be explained by a "confounding variable?" [FN78] Is a particular type of vehicle being targeted--older versus newer, truck versus auto? Do day of the week, time of day, or commuting or work patterns tell us anything? Explanations to consider will vary in large part based upon the allegations of the complaint, as well as the size, location, and demographics of the community.

Aside from the evidentiary problems surrounding the use of statistics in a claim of this nature, it is important to identify the type of racial profiling alleged to be involved in a particular case, along with a preliminary determination as to the context in which the conduct arose. For example, an allegation that racial profiling was used in either a traffic stop at a particular location or place frequented by minorities or in a particular type of arrest such as domestic violence, may dictate different considerations from a preliminary investigative standpoint. Similarly, the proof required on an individual capacity claim against an officer will vary dramatically from a claim against the department for a municipal custom, policy, or practice brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. If statistical data is deemed sufficient to establish discriminatory purpose and intent or a Monell [FN79] custom, it is unlikely that such evidence can be properly admitted to prove the underlying constitutional deprivation on the part of the individual arresting officer. Similarly, in the absence of a certified class action, a statistical, pattern and practice analysis is not available to prove individual discrimination claims. [FN80]

The nature of an individual equal protection discrimination claim focuses on the evidence directed at the individual complainant and not at incidents of discrimination directed at others. The question of when statistics may be properly relied upon in a racial profiling-equal protection claim has not yet been resolved. The issue has been squarely addressed in Chavez, [FN81] which is pending before the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. Until the issue has been resolved, from a defense perspective, and in the absence of a certified class action, the use of statistics in the plaintiff's case should be challenged. Consideration should be given to the possibility of differentiating defendants sued in their individual capacities from claims filed against the police agency or municipality. Clarifying institutional claims of discrimination of racial profiling will avoid the obvious prejudicial effect the claimed departmental discrimination has on the individual defendant. If a plaintiff can successfully demonstrate a disproportionate number of minority police encounters in a particular agency, it does not logically follow that the individual defendant officer engaged in prohibited discriminatory practices in the course of a specific arrest.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

As noted above, statistics alone may not be sufficient to prove a pattern or practice claim. Some smoking-gun evidence may be necessary. Racial slurs directed at the arrestees are obvious, but who made them? Are statements made by non-supervisors, for example, the patrol officer, admissible in a Title VI case? Statements made by non-policymakers should not be admissible in a case under Section 1983. Analogies will have to be drawn from the case law in the employment setting addressing stray remarks, remarks made outside the decision- making process, and remarks made by non-decisionmakers.

Where the officer's actions are justified, the Mt. Healthy "no harm--no foul" rule, a rule of causation which is applied in the mixed-motive, free speech context, should have equal application. [FN82] In other words, from a damage standpoint, if Section 1983 causation rules are applied, the defense may prevail when it can be shown that the plaintiff would have been stopped, detained, or arrested even in the absence of racial profiling on the part of the officer.

Fourth Amendment reasonable suspicion or probable cause may serve as the basis for structuring a Mt. Healthy defense in profiling claims. Unlike any other claim of discrimination, racial profiling will require balancing the competing considerations embodied in the Equal Protection Clause and the Fourth Amendment.

We have struggled with the legal issues and evidentiary issues outlined above for the last 18 months. Because of the nature of both the perception of racial profiling and racial discrimination in the law enforcement context, we expect the law of racial profiling in law enforcement to develop explosively and completely within the next year. In the meantime, a decision in Chavez will probably provide us with more guidance as well as a legal roadmap for claims involving racial profiling.

Addendum

Following the preparation of this article, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals handed down its decision in Chavez v. Illinois State Police [FN83] on May 23, 2001. The opinion of the district court is affirmed in a lengthy opinion that outlines the plaintiff's burden of proof in a racial profiling, equal protection claim and addresses the complex evidentiary consideration surrounding the use of statistics.

What Is Racial Profiling?

Racial profiling may include one or more of the following: The practice of focusing enforcement efforts on a particular ethnic or racial class (probably more properly defined as "targeting");

Exercising judgmental discretion in law enforcement decisions based upon the individual's membership in a particular ethnic or racial class (also more appropriately referred to as "targeting");

The practice of using racial and ethnic stereotypes as part of the circumstances for making an investigatory stop, detention or arrest; and Using race or ethnicity as one factor among all the criteria of an established profile.

[FNa1]. Elizabeth A. Knight and William Kurnik practice with Knight, Hoppe, Fanning & Kurnik, L.L.C., in Des Plaines, Illinois.

[FN1]. GALLUP POLL RELEASE, Racial Profiling, December 9, 1999, p. 1.

[FN2]. Id.

[FN3]. Illinois v. Wardlow, 528 U.S. 119, 135 n. 10, 120 S. Ct. 674, 682 n. 10, 145 L. Ed. 2d 570 (2000).

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Federal Lawyer
November/December, 2001

68 UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Racial Profiling and the Backlash after Sept. 11

Farah Brelvi [FNa1]

Copyright © 2001 by Farah Brelvi

69 To all of my friends ...

I am writing this feeling so depressed and frustrated. I am sure you all know that I am Egyptian and of Muslim faith. I was also born and raised in America. Since September 11, my family and friends of the same background have been dealing with the feelings of fear and sadness like everyone else. But we've also been dealing with more ... you all know or have at least heard what has been happening to Muslims, Arabs, Pakistanis, or anyone who even looks like these ethnicities. I'm not going to go through all that. But I am going to tell you what just happened to me this past weekend on my way to and from Canada.

President Bush had come to Chicago and announced that everyone should fly again ... I was supposed to fly out to visit my friends in Toronto and Montreal the week of the tragedy, so I exchanged my ticket for this past weekend. I was nervous because of everything I was hearing about how Arabs and Muslims were being treated but I was not going to let that stop me and to be honest with you, I really didn't think that anything could happen to me because I do not cover my hair, or have an accent or look like any particular ethnicity (as you all know).

I got to O'Hare Airport and was going through the security. There was a group of people in front of me and behind me -- all pretty much white, conservative middle to upper-class looking. They all walked through, no problem. I walked through, they checked my bag, they frisked me and did another metal detector (hand-held), meanwhile, everyone else behind was going through, no problem. What happened to me next in Canada is more blatant and humiliating -- and, I must add, frightening. When I got to Toronto Pearson Airport, Canadian customs of course interrogated me as to why I was there and who I was visiting. When I told them I was visiting friends, the customs agent sarcastically said: "Oh, so you just became friends with these people like that and now you're coming to just visit?" ... When I finally told her I was visiting Esthero [author's note: Esthero is a well-known Canadian singer who has been compared to Billie Holliday and Bjork], she let me go.

From Toronto, I was traveling to visit a friend in Montreal. I go to check in and the ticket agent takes my AMERICAN passport and enters my name into the computer, hesitates, looks at me. ... I say, "Is there something wrong?", she says "No" and gives me my boarding pass. I go sit at the gate waiting with everyone else for my flight. I see four police officers appear. Minutes later, they all approach me and say that I need to come with them. "Why?" I ask. They say: "We'll tell you when you come with us." One officer said to me, "I'm sure you know what has happened in the U.S. We were given a terrorist suspect list from the FBI and were asked to pull you aside." I couldn't believe what I was hearing! I told him that I AM NOT A TERRORIST and that they know that my name is NOT on that list. One of the officers then said, "Well, your name is not on the list, but your name is similar to one on it:" So how can they treat me like a criminal, when I AM NOT? He said he needed to check my identity, et cetera. I showed him my passport and told him that what they are doing was wrong and racist and that I am insulted and humiliated. They let me go and five minutes later, the same police officer came up to me and said, "I just want you to know I was just doing my job. After you checked in, they called us and told us that we needed to pull you aside because of your last name. They are doing this to so many people and are pissing a lot of people off." He felt bad but all he could do was tell me this privately. I started to cry because the fact was that he knew the government was abusing this security situation but he couldn't do anything about it - and that was so scary to me.

I was one of the last people on the plane, and you could have cut the air with a knife. Everyone was quiet and either staring at me or trying not to stare at me in fear.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

When it was time for me to fly from Montreal back to Toronto, I was nervous so I asked my friend to come into the airport with me. I check in again. The counter ticket agent hesitates, calls someone on the phone and I say: "What's going on?" She says, "The computer is malfunctioning and you have to wait here until a technician comes to fix it because I cannot enter your info." I said to her: "I cannot miss this flight. I have to catch a connecting flight in Toronto to fly back home to Chicago and I have a job interview tomorrow." She said I wouldn't miss my flight in Toronto. The airline stopped checking everyone else in also. I see someone who looks like a sheriff standing about ten feet away and three police officers come walking up to me, AGAIN! I go through the same questioning and argue that, "This just happened to me two days earlier and obviously it was a mistake and I'm good" and "They let me on the plane so why are 70 you doing this to me when I am not on this FBI list?" The sheriff was French Canadian and apparently didn't feel the need to speak with me in English. My friend told him that this was racism and he told her if she didn't shut up he was going to arrest her. This was all done in front of the entire airport. They made me miss my flight. Meanwhile they are all talking in French about me and I heard the word "terrorist." (I ended up having to stay in Toronto an extra night, which was a problem because I had no money left for a hotel and had to crash at a friend's friend's place.) The next flight I could take the next day from Toronto on United Airlines was not going to get me back home in time for my interview so I missed it. I didn't sleep the night before for fear of what was going to happen to me coming back home. At the Toronto Pearson airport, I checked in, got my seat assignment, which was in first class, and boarded the flight. The flight attendant was staring at me and when I asked her to help put my bag up in the overhead compartment because I have back problems, she said, "No." I looked at her in shock and she said, "Well, I'll help you but you have to lift it, too." Then the Captain walked up and down the aisle looking at people. Five minutes later, everyone is seated, and I hear a couple of flight attendants talking to each other. "I think we should move her." The other one answers "I don't know if that's a good idea ..." and the first one says, "Fine, I'll move her." The flight attendant comes up to me and says, "Is your name Sonia Hassan?" I said, "Yes, why?" "We need to move you. To coach. Seat number ___." "But why?" I said. "Dress code reasons." "But I was wearing jeans when the ticket agent saw me and gave me this seat so what's the problem?" She said, "You need to move," and walked away from me. At that point, I was so emotionally drained and sick, and all I wanted to do was just go home, so I moved.

Thanks so much for taking the time to read this. I hope that you all can try to understand where I am coming from because I am feeling very isolated. I felt like I've been in a horrible dream state since September 11 and I'm not waking up.

I'm wishing you all PEACE AND LOVE FOR YOURSELF AND EVERYONE ELSE AROUND YOU.

Love, Sonia Hassan. Your non-terrorist friend.

At the same time that 28-year-old Sonia Hassan, [FN1] (whose e-mail letter to her friends appears above) was traveling, Rep. John Cooksey of Louisiana announced that any airline passenger wearing "a diaper on his head" should be subjected to extra questioning by airport security. Cooksey later apologized for his statement. Then he issued a re-election ad pronouncing that "We know the faces of terrorists and where they're from. Terrorist profiling is essential for our nation's security." "An Ugly Appeal," Editorial, Wash. Post, Oct. 11, 2001, at A32.

If terrorist profiling indeed is essential for our nation's security, I would like to encourage a different way of thinking about profiling so that the context of the debate about its merits and demerits can be informed by factors about which we do not always think as lawyers. We must be aware not only of the legal standards of strict scrutiny and suspect classifications but also of considerations that do not always make it into the law books. We must ask what role -- if any -- racial prejudice plays in such national security concerns and question the meaning of singling out certain groups in a time of fear. We must ask: What becomes of our civil society without this discussion?

Before Sept. 11, judging by the national opprobrium toward New Jersey's highway stops ("DWB" -- "driving while black") and high-level congressional attention, racial profiling [FN2] was among the constitutional issues of the moment. Today, following the most vicious attacks on the United States since the attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941, and when it appears that every one of the terrorists was a Muslim man from the Middle East, racial profiling is being rehabilitated as one of the law enforcement techniques of choice. We hope that Cooksey and others like him -- who conflate racism with law enforcement -- are outliers. But we must be able to distinguish between a legitimate consideration of race, ethnicity, or religion in law enforcement and plain racial animus. We also must examine critically the "profiling" that is under way to identify and weed out the bad apple of racism that will spoil the whole barrel of law enforcement and civil rights. This is the challenge to which we have no choice but to rise.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

Individual rights and due process are the cornerstones of our system of justice. Abandoning these principles for the expediency of national security is both wrong and -- despite the claims of defenders of profiling -- unproductive in the long run. "If we sacrifice our most basic principles of freedom in the name of saving our country, what have we saved, and who have we become?" David Cole, Commentary, "FBI Must Change: Guilt by Association Hinders Anti-Terrorism," Fulton County Daily Rep., 7 Sept. 19, 2001 (hereinafter "Cole, "FBI Must Change"). Those who would kick Sonia Hassan off three flights because her last name is "Hassan" must be reminded that "if any fundamental assumption underlies our system, it is that guilt is personal and not inheritable. Even if all of one's antecedents had 71 been convicted of treason, the Constitution forbids its penalties to be visited upon [her]." Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214, 243 (1944) (Jackson, J., dissenting).

Tragically, this is not the first time in our nation's history that fear has alienated us from our fundamental principles. The comparison of Sept. 11 to Dec. 7, 1941, is apt in more ways than just the obvious attack on American soil. After Pearl Harbor, in a nationwide application of guilt by association, Japanese-Americans were detained and imprisoned in internment camps. The Supreme Court upheld the internments in the culmination of a national refusal to view Japanese-Americans as individuals rather than as group members whose collective identity trumped any and all attempts at individuation.

The history behind Korematsu is worth repeating. In 1942, President Roosevelt issued Executive Order 9066, granting to the secretary of war the power to exclude all persons of Japanese ancestry from designated areas of special security concern, notably large areas of the Pacific coast. Approximately 120,000 people, including 70,000 U.S. citizens, were deported to 10 relocation camps scattered across the West. Korematsu upheld the constitutionality of a particular military order that excluded all Japanese and Japanese-Americans from San Leandro, Calif.

The Korematsu exclusion, the Supreme Court claimed, was premised upon "military imperative," not upon racial animus. 323 U.S. at 219. "[T]he need for action was great, and time was short." Id. at 223-224. To imply that racial prejudice was a factor > merely confuses the issue. ... [T]he properly constituted military authorities ... felt constrained to take proper security measures, because they decided that the military urgency of the situation demanded that all citizens of Japanese ancestry be segregated from the West Coast temporarily.

Id. at 223.

Notwithstanding the Court's protestations, even in 1945 there was evidence that the detentions were the product > in good measure of an erroneous assumption of racial guilt rather than bona fide military necessity [as] evidenced by the Commanding General's ... reference to all individuals of Japanese descent as "subversive," as belonging to "an enemy race" whose "racial strains are undiluted," and as constituting "over 112,000 potential enemies at large today."

Korematsu at 236. (Murphy, J., dissenting). Forty years later, a congressional commission concluded that "substantial credible evidence from federal, civilian, and military agencies" contradicted the military necessity argument behind the exclusions and detentions. See Dean M. Hashimoto, "The Legacy of Korematsu v. United States: A Dangerous Narrative Retold," 4 Asian Pac. Am. L.J. 72, 73 (1996). The "commission found that there had not been military necessity [but that] the causes of the internment were racial prejudice, war hysteria, and a failure of political leadership." Id., citing George Miller, Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians, 102d Cong., 2d Sess., "Personal Justice Denied" (Comm. Print 1992).

In direct contravention of the rule that individuals be judged solely upon their own acts, the named plaintiff in Korematsu was literally and figuratively excluded, an anonymous member of a group that retained only its collective identity, to a detention center. The Korematsu majority did not refer to Fred Korematsu by name until the penultimate page of the decision; none of his particulars was ever considered. At the end of its opinion, when the Court finally identified the petitioner as "Korematsu," it had already conflated him with the threat to "our shores." 323 U.S. at 220. Thus, according to the majority, "Korematsu was not excluded from the Military Area [San Leandro, Calif.] because of hostility to him or his race. He was excluded because we are at war with the Japanese Empire." Id. at 223. No matter that "[n]o question was raised as to petitioner's loyalty to the United States." Id. at 216. See also Hashimoto, supra, at 82.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

It is sobering to read Justice Murphy's Korematsu dissent in today's world:

The military necessity which is essential to the validity of the [interrogation or detention] order thus resolves itself into a few intimations that certain individuals actively aided the [terrorists], from which it is inferred that the entire group of [Muslims, or Arab Americans, or South Asians, or Middle Easterners] could not be trusted to be or remain loyal to the United States. No one denies, of course, that there were some disloyal persons of [Arab] descent [in the country] who did all in their power to aid [the terrorist cause]. Similar disloyal activities have been engaged in by many persons of German, Italian and even more pioneer stock in our country. But to infer that examples of individual disloyalty prove group disloyalty and justify discriminatory action against the entire group is to deny that under our system of law individual guilt is the sole basis for deprivation of rights. Moreover, this inference, which is at the very heart of the [interrogation or detention] orders, has been used in support of the abhorrent and despicable treatment of minority groups by the dictatorial tyrannies, which this nation is now pledged to destroy. To give constitutional sanction to that inference in this case, however well- intentioned may have been the [security requirements], is to adopt one of the cruelest of the rationales used by our enemies to destroy the dignity of the individual and to encourage and open the door to discriminatory actions against other minority groups in the passions of tomorrow.

323 U.S. 214, at 240.

It seems likely that today there is an intuitive understanding among the people of this country that the internment of an entire community -- including small children, older individuals, American citizens, and individuals who would otherwise be choosing to fight in the war -- was unwarranted72 and inexcusable, the product of ignorance and fear. However, Korematsu teaches more than this literal lesson. Today, we speak about statistics, about the importance of allowing discretion among law enforcement, and about "slight trade-offs" between individual liberty and security. However, it is easy to lose sight of the fact that racial profiling -- while seemingly more subtle, more marginal, more diffuse, and more tailored than internment -- rests on the identical premise. The considerable difference between locking up an entire population and allowing race or ethnicity to be, ostensibly, only one of a series of factors in certain kinds of otherwise necessary decision-making (i.e., security and law enforcement) should not obscure an honest assessment of what profiling is. It is guilt by association; it is guilt by inheritance.

There should be no mistake about this climate of guilt by association. Says Mona Charen of the mainstream media:

There are thousands of Arabs in the United States at this moment on student and travel visas. They should all be asked, politely and without prejudice, to go home. This will work hardships in many cases, and that is regrettable ... and this would not apply to citizens of Middle Eastern origin - though they, too, should receive some scrutiny .... As for those missing hazardous materials drivers, the only answer is ethnic profiling. Every Middle-Eastern-looking truck driver should be pulled over and questioned wherever he may be in the United States.

Mona Charen, "Survival Instincts vs. Political Correctness," Washington Times, Oct. 18, 2001, at A18.

Most of the racial profiling now discussed theoretically deals with the more specific "profile" of a young, male, Muslim of Middle Eastern or South Asian descent, as opposed to, for example, older females from Lebanon, who could be Maronite Christian, or Egyptian children who are Coptic Christians, etc. However, it has already become clear that these theoretical guidelines do not really apply. Sonia Hassan, whose experiences with racial profiling caused her to miss her job interview, does not fit the profile -- or, rather, she fits part of it, as do Brad Pitt (a young male), Muhammad Ali (a Muslim), and M. Night Shaymalan (the South Asian film director of The Sixth Sense). However, terrorist profiling will not lead the police to Brad Pitt's door, and the reason we all understand that it will not is that profiling is about race and ethnicity.

The juxtaposition of who Hassan is with who she was profiled to be highlights the problems of using identity traits as a proxy for actual behavior. The gap is so large that, one must assume, but for profiling, competent law enforcement agents would have used their valuable time doing something else. David Cole, a constitutional law professor at Georgetown Law School, has written on this nation's history of suspending civil liberties, including during times of national trauma and war. He explains that guilt by association is unconstitutional and unwise -- and also that it is too easy. See Cole, "FBI Must Change," supra. It is easier for law enforcement to establish that an individual is a member of a suspect organization than to prove criminal conduct. Of course, it is even easier to establish that someone is Japanese or Muslim than to prove criminal conduct. Suspecting individuals based upon group characteristics is not likely to advance our anti-terrorism investigations.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

In suspecting whole groups of people, one is likely to spend substantial resources investigating wholly innocent (and indeed constitutionally protected) activities, and thereby to miss the true threats. ... When law enforcement fails to draw careful lines and treats whole groups of people as presumptively suspect, those in the targeted groups are unlikely to cooperate with law enforcement, making it still more difficult to find the real criminals or terrorists.

Id.

Sonia Hassan's case is by no means isolated. By early October, one nongovernmental group had recorded over 25 instances of "Middle Eastern- looking" people being pulled off flights, but anecdotal evidence runs much higher. The business consultant brother of one Columbia Law School-educated lawyer I know was called by the FBI because he once stayed in the same hotel as someone with a name that was on the FBI's watch list -- and because his name is "Middle Eastern." When the FBI went to the northern California home of one prominent Muslim to question him, his wife informed them that he was at the White House meeting with the President. On Oct. 4, Mohamed Y.M. Mohamed, was pulled off a flight from Washington, D.C., to Atlanta because, a U.S. Customs official told him, he shared an initial and the last name "Mohamed" with someone on the watch list. When Mohamed was released and reboarded the flight, the captain announced, "Ladies and gentlemen, the young man you just saw walk down the aisle, well, he's from the Atlanta area, he's born and raised there. He had a name similar to someone on our watch list, but he's okay." Mohamed, a University of Georgia Law School graduate, is a Washington, D.C.-based attorney working for a federal agency, one that works to enforce constitutional and statutory protections.

Even if we assume that all of the real criminals and terrorists whom we are seeking fit a certain profile, the problem is that millions of people fit the profile as well. To target all members of the group is so inherently broad that it is akin to targeting none. To those who would use African-American to identify suspects because "so many" violent criminals are, for example, African-American, Ira Glasser of the ACLU responds: although most NBA players are African-American, if you were trying to put together a world-class basketball team, you would never randomly round up African-Americans off the street. Ira Glasser, "American Drug Laws: The New Jim Crow," Biennial Speech (June 1999).

Despite Mona Charen's hollow protestations that immediate expulsion of all Arabs will be "without prejudice," the fact is that to err on the side of overinclusiveness is not cost-free. Maybe, ex post facto, it will be true that all of the hijackers fit a certain profile. Ex ante, if we hold everyone 73 in that group in suspicion, will it have been worth it? Would the risk of continued terrorist attacks decrease if all Muslims or Arabs were interned and our borders were closed to "these people"? Are we willing to pay that price? Doing so would "violate basic constitutional principles of political freedom and individual responsibility," those freedoms that distinguish the United States the most from almost every other country, and those freedoms that every patriot must want to protect. Cole, "FBI Must Change," supra.

Benjamin Franklin famously pronounced that those who would sacrifice liberty for temporary security deserve neither. Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote, in declaring unconstitutional a federal law that barred Communists from working in national defense facilities:

It would indeed be ironic if, in the name of national defense, we would sanction the subversion of one of those liberties -- the freedom of association -- which makes the defense of the Nation worthwhile.

U.S. v. Robel, 389 U.S. 258, 264 (1967), cited in David Cole, "Secrecy, Guilt by Association, and the Terrorist Profile," 15 J.L. & Religion 267, 288 (2001).

Unfortunately, troubling early indicators point to the very subversions of liberty that our founders feared. The New York Times recently spotlighted the case of Dr. Al-Badr Al-Hazmi. Deborah Sontag, "Who Is This Kafka That People Keep Mentioning?" N.Y. Times, Oct. 21, 2001, (Magazine) at 54-57. The 34-year- old doctor from San Antonio, Texas, was arrested at home on Sept. 12, held for 13 days and finally released in Brooklyn, N.Y. Dr. Al-Hazmi apparently was arrested because two of the passengers on the plane that was crashed into the Pentagon shared the last name of "Al-hazmi" and the FBI believed the doctor was a relative, notwithstanding the fact that "Al-Hazmi is common like the Smith name in Saudi Arabia." Id. While he was detained, however, Dr. Al-Hazmi was publicly identified as a material witness to the attacks and even as a key suspect. Id. According to a news report, when he was released, the Justice Department stated that "he's been cleared." The FBI has now suggested that it was Dr. Al-Hazmi's invocation of his civil rights that exacerbated his ordeal:

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

We backed off when he requested an attorney. ... As soon as he lawyered up, we couldn't ask him to clear up our questions, and then the system took over and he was off to New York.

Id. at 57.

Hundreds of men are being held in Manhattan's Metropolitan Correctional Center.

They have no contact with each other or their families and limited access to their lawyers. Their names appear on no federal jail log available to the public. No records can be found in any court docket in New York showing why they are detained, who represents them or the status of their cases.

Lois Romano and David S. Fallis, "Questions Swirl Around Men Held in Terror Probe," Wash. Post, Oct. 15, 2001, at Al. On Oct. 18, the ACLU cited "unprecedented government secrecy" and asked the Justice Department to release to the American public "additional information about the more than 700 people held in detention since Sept. 11." The ACLU acknowledges that some aspects of the investigation are justly confidential. Reports that detainees have not been allowed to contact lawyers, however, raise fundamental due process issues. The American public needs to know that "the government's investigation is both thorough and fair." Press Release, ACLU (Sept. 17, 2001), available at www.aclu.org (Oct. 18, 2001).

The Washington Post quotes a "senior federal law enforcement official involved in the investigation, speaking on the condition of anonymity," who claims that the detention of these "material witnesses" is "pushing the envelope" of civil liberties. "Some of these people have done nothing more than give someone a ride in their car," the official said. Romano and Fallis, supra at Al. Yazeed al-Salmi, a university student in San Diego, was detained for 17 days and released after he testified before a federal grand jury. He was questioned about his relationship with hijacker Nawab Alhazmi, who was his housemate for six weeks. "Al-Salmi said he hadn't seen Alhazmi for 10 months." His San Diego-based lawyer, who also represents two other young men from the area who are being held in New York, said that his clients "had asked time and again to call me and they were not allowed to do so. Law school doesn't prepare you for this." Id.

Legal profiling creates a climate of fear and suspicion. The price that our nation pays for tolerating these erosions of fundamental principles is not confined to our institutions of justice. An inevitable relationship exists between state action in derogation of due process and the subtle imprimatur it gives to private violence. Thus, a large number of Americans believe that the appropriate way to respond to the Sept. 11 attacks is to lash out at their neighbors. When law enforcement throws the broadest possible dragnet around Arab and Muslim immigrants, why should it be surprising that other citizens feel the same way? The vigilantism that has swept the United States -- violent attacks on Arabs, Sikhs, Muslims, South Asians and those who look like them -- is creating an isolated and fearful minority population. Those authority figures, law enforcement officials, and other vigilantes who have turned the daily lives of so many Asians, Muslims, and other immigrants into a miasma of fear are either directly ordered to do so, encouraged to do so, or think that they are doing the right thing. Vigilantism always arises out of someone's idea that he or she is upholding the law or that the law is insufficient.

One independent report cites 645 individual incidents of backlash against Americans of South Asian or Middle Eastern descent reported in the press in the seven days following Sept. 11. South Asian American Leaders of Tomorrow, Special Report, "American Backlash: Terrorists Bring War Home in More Ways Than One" (2001) at 3 (hereinafter "American Backlash"). As of Oct. 2, the Council on American-Islamic Relations had received reports of 785 anti-Muslim74 incidents in the United States, more than one per hour. See Council on American Islamic Relations Web site at www.cair-net.org (Oct. 18, 2001).

The Department of Justice has a "Post September 11 Discriminatory Backlash" page on the Civil Rights Division Web site. As of Oct. 11, the DOJ, FBI, and the U.S. attorney's office were investigating over 150 acts involving force or threats of force committed against Arab Americans, Muslim Americans, and individuals perceived to be of Middle Eastern descent (such as Sikhs and South Asian Americans), in retaliation for the events of Sept. 11. The incidents have occurred in all regions of the country and the investigations are taking place in over 30 states and the District of Columbia.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

See U.S. Dept. of Justice, Civil Rights Division Web site at www.usdoj.gov/crt/legalinfo/discrimupdate.htm (Oct. 17, 2001). The DOJ's "priority" investigations include: (1) three shootings of people working at a Dallas, Texas, convenience store and gas stations, in which a Pakistani was seriously injured and another Pakistani and an Indian were killed; (2) the murder of a Sikh gas station attendant in Mesa, Ariz.; (3) a machete attack on an Arab-American gas station attendant in Palos Heights, Ill.; (4) three Molotov cocktail and shooting attacks on mosques in Dallas; and (5) an automobile attack on a mosque in Parma, Ohio. Id.

The attacks, the backlash, happen so daily and are so mundane and so everywhere that they are difficult to process. Many Middle Eastern and South Asian immigrants and second-generation citizens are still afraid to leave their homes, go to work, attend school, or practice their religion for fear that they will be targets of discrimination or attacks. Muslim law students have asked whether it will be harder for them to get jobs in the legal field. A litigator friend and graduate of the University of Pennsylvania Law School gets the entire seat to herself on the New York City subway; people get up and move away when she sits down because she fits some aspect of the profile. A Sikh taxi driver reported that his son, who also drives a taxi, picked up a passenger, who reached through the open partition and tried to beat him with an umbrella, yelling, "I hate you, I hate you and your turban." American Backlash, supra, at 23. At another end of the spectrum, the co-president of the University of Iowa Association of Muslims in America said she has received anonymous e-mail threats, but she is not taking them seriously. "They said 'go back to your country,' which is stupid, because I am an American," she said. "Where am I supposed to go?" See id. at 28.

This last plea frames how I would like to end this article: with a discussion of community. In recent weeks, there has been a buzz about the sacrifice of individual liberties in the service of community. However sincerely most of us feel this, and however theoretically prepared to sacrifice we think ourselves to be, what we are often really saying is that we are willing to trade others' liberty for our security. I am not criticizing an honest debate about civic duty and the impact of exigencies on policy. I only point out that we should ask ourselves the tough questions: Whose liberty? Whose security? The trumpeting of individual rights and interests may seem out of step with the current national mood. It appears to many to smack of the selfishness and self- indulgence of the recent past.

The point that is perhaps getting lost is that racial profiling does not pit individuals (i.e., individual Muslims and people of Middle Eastern descent) against community; it pits our community -- this nation -- against one of its constituent parts and against its own best principles. Whatever seductive voice seems to say that, at least on some level, certain communities are more expendable than others, is telling us to give up much more than any terrorist could take away.

We should think about racial profiling not only from the point of view of what is best for an individual who is concerned about his or her own security but also from the point of view of a member of a national community whose members include those we would profile. We need to reach for a more meaningful understanding of community, one in which different people join to ensure that the vulnerable are not cut off.

The danger in a time of high emotion is that we attribute deeds of individuals to an entire ethnic group or religion, as has been done in the past. ... When black motorists are stopped unfairly or the INS treats Latino citizens unequally, we see the dangers of racial and ethnic stereotypes by public officials and private citizens. Let us remember that when American freedom is threatened the protection of that freedom is ultimately the responsibility of everyone.

Statement of the Civil Rights Project Concerning Discrimination Against Muslims and Arab Americans, Sept. 14, 2001, Harvard Law School Civil Rights Project, available at www.law.harvard.edu (Oct. 18, 2001).

[FNa1]. Farah Brelvi is a litigation associate at Cravath, Swaine and Moore. She is a member of the Board of Directors of Amnesty International, the New York City Bar Association International Human Rights Committee, and the National Association of Muslim Lawyers. This article was prepared with the assistance of Rachel Geman, an associate at Lieff, Cabraser, Heimann & Bernstein, and Alexandra Wald, a litigation associate at Cravath, Swaine and Moore. The opinions expressed here are those of the authors.

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN1]. One of her friends sent her e-mail to the National Association of Muslim Lawyers' listserv. I interviewed her on Oct. 16 for this article. The "letter" to her friends that appears is a shorter version of her original e- mail. It has been edited based upon our conversation.

[FN2]. It has been argued that racial profiling uses race as a proxy for criminal behavior or an indicator of criminal propensity. See generally Randall Kennedy, Suspect Policy, New Republic, Sept. 13 & 20, 1999, at 30, 30-35.

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2002 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

15 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 207 printed in FULL format.

Copyright (c) 2001 Emory University School of Law
Emory International Law Review

Spring, 2001

15 Emory Int'l L. Rev. 207

LENGTH: 23741 words

COMMENT: RACIAL PROFILING AND INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS LAW: ILLEGAL DISCRIMINATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Maria V. Morris*

* Editor-in-Chief, Emory International Law Review; J.D., Emory University School of Law (2001); M.I.A., School of International and Public Affairs, Columbia University (1996); B.A., Barnard College (1990). The author thanks Professor Abdullahi An-Na'im for his invaluable advice and input during the preparation of this comment.

SUMMARY:
... As a result of an earlier lawsuit alleging racial profiling by the Maryland State Police, there were already statistics on the traffic stops and an awareness that racial profiling was inappropriate. ... Though the information about the race of drivers pulled over is limited, the information that has been collected strongly suggests that racial profiling, a form of racial discrimination, goes on in many police departments across the country. ... It goes on to analyze racial profiling in light of CERD's analysis, finding that the analysis suggests that CERD would find racial profiling to be impermissible racial discrimination. ... It applies the test to racial profiling in the form of pretextual traffic stops, and again finds that the practice is probably impermissible racial discrimination. ... Racial Profiling in Domestic Law: The United States ... Racial Profiling in International Law There is limited jurisprudence to assist in the determination of whether racial profiling constitutes impermissible racial discrimination under international law. ... A. Jurisprudence on racial profiling from CERD ... B. Racial profiling in light of Barbaro ... D. Racial Profiling under the ECHR Test ... Under this balancing test, racial profiling is not proportional and must be viewed as impermissible racial discrimination. ...

I obtained my driver's license in 1972 and I've been stopped by police every year since then... . As many as five times in one year and typically once or twice a year. <=2> n1

States Parties condemn racial discrimination and undertake to pursue by all appropriate means and without delay a policy of eliminating racial on race is discrimination. The definition also highlights the HRC's concern about effects of distinctions between members of different groups, rather than simply the purpose of such distinctions. Finally, the HRC's definition reinforces the notion that rights are to be protected and enjoyed equally by all.

The HRC has also explained that it "wishes to know if there remain any problems of discrimination in fact, which may be practised either by public authorities, by the community, or by private persons or bodies." <=61> n60 Thus, the HRC again focuses on the importance of what is actually [*224] happening to people in society, not just whether there are laws prohibiting discrimination. Similarly, the Committee explains that article 26 "prohibits discrimination in law or in fact in any field regulated and protected by public authorities." <=62> n61

C. Treaty Obligations

The obligations a state accepts in ratifying these two treaties are considerable. A state party to the ICCPR "undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in the present covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race ... ." <=63> n62 This statement is misleading in its apparent simplicity. Not only is a state thus obligated to refrain from violating the rights of individuals within its borders, it also has an affirmative duty to ensure that those rights are not violated by others.

In addition to the general obligation to protect and respect human rights, a state must "ensure that any person whose rights or freedoms as herein recognized are violated shall have an effective remedy ... develop the possibilities of judicial remedy[, and] ... ensure that the competent authorities shall enforce such remedies when granted." <=64> n63

Beyond substantive protection and enforcement of human rights, the ICCPR imposes reporting obligations on states. States parties are required to submit reports on the progress they are making in the protection of all the rights enumerated in the treaty. <=65> n64 The reports are to be submitted one year after the ratification of the treaty, and thereafter whenever the committee requests another report. <=66> n65 The [*225] reports should include information about laws, practices, customs, and efforts being made to eliminate violations of human rights. The HRC has explained the need for "information which would reveal discrimination in fact." <=67> n66 In one comment, the committee complained that when reporting ... States Parties usually cite provisions of their constitution or equal opportunity laws with regard to the equality of persons. While such information is of course useful, the Committee wishes to know if there remain any problems of discrimination in fact ..." <=68> n67

The HRC's concern for information about de facto discrimination suggests that the obligation to report includes a derivative obligation to collect information, so that a state party will actually be capable of providing the information about the progress it is making.

Like the ICCPR, the Race Convention requires a state party to both refrain from and prevent discrimination. <=69> n68 However, the Race Convention goes into much greater detail about what these obligations actually entail. A state party "undertakes to engage in no act or practice of racial discrimination ... and to ensure that all public authorities and public institutions, national and local, shall act in conformity with this obligation." <=70> n69 The State is also obligated not to "sponsor, defend or support racial discrimination." <=71> n70 States are also required to "take effective measures to review governmental, national and local policies, and to amend, rescind or nullify any laws and regulations which have the effect of creating or [*226] perpetuating racial discrimination." <=72> n71 Article 5 of the Race Convention obligates states parties to eliminate discrimination and to guarantee the right to equality before the law, highlighting certain areas in which this is particularly important. <=73> n72 Some of the areas of particular concern are:

.the right to equal treatment before the tribunals and all other organs administering justice; <=74> n73

.the right to security of person and protection by the State against violence or bodily harm; <=75> n74

.the right to freedom of movement ... within the border of the State; <=76> n75 and

.the right of access to any place or service intended for use by the general public, such as transport. <=77> n76

Besides being required to refrain from discriminating, states parties are also required to "ensure that all public authorities and public institutions, national and local, shall act in conformity with this obligation." <=78> n77 One of the key public institutions, in terms of ensuring equality before the law, is the police. Most encounters with the justice system begin with a police officer's decision to stop or arrest an individual. The police, like all officials of states parties, are bound not to discriminate. This is true both for individual officers and for police departments.

CERD recognized that the role of police raised important concerns. <=79> n78 Not only are police the entry point into the justice system, they are often in a position to exercise a [*227] great deal of discretion in deciding whom to stop or arrest. They also have discretion in determining how much force is appropriate to use in the process of stopping or arresting someone. Given the potential for abuse by police, CERD issued a General Recommendation on the training of law enforcement officials, a step it has taken for no other set of state officials. <=80> n79 In General Recommendation 13, CERD explained that a state's ability to fulfill its obligations under the Race Convention very much depends upon national law enforcement officials who exercise police powers, especially the powers of detention or arrest, and upon whether they are properly informed about the obligations their State has entered into under the Convention. Law enforcement officials should receive intensive training to ensure that in the performance of their duties they respect as well as protect human dignity and maintain and uphold the human rights of all persons without distinction as to race, colour or national or ethnic origin... . The Committee calls upon States Parties to review and improve the training of law enforcement officials so that the standards of the Convention ... are fully implemented. <=81> n80

In the event that a person is the victim of discrimination, the Race Convention requires that states parties ensure that effective remedies are available to the person through courts and other institutions. <=82> n81

Finally, like the ICCPR, the Race Convention requires states parties to report on "legislative, judicial, administrative or other measures which they have adopted and which give effect to the provisions of [the Race] [*228] Convention." <=83> n82 These reports are due one year after ratification and every two years thereafter. <=84> n83

D. American RUDs - U.S. Obligations

When the United States ratified the two treaties, it did so with numerous Reservations, Understandings and Declarations (RUDs). <=85> n84 The RUDs are controversial, in part because they call into question the genuineness of the U.S. commitment to the treaties and the rights contained within them. <=86> n85

1. The "Non-Self-Executing" Declaration

Common to both packets of RUDs was the provision that the treaties are not self-executing in the United States. <=87> n86 Therefore, the ratification of the treaties did not create any private right of action under municipal law. <=88> n87 However, the non-self-executing (NSE) clause is essentially an issue of domestic implementation and the American federal structure. <=89> n88 The federal government has explained to the Committee that it does not have the power to force state [*229] and local governments to comply with the provisions of the treaty, other than through constitutionally permissible legislation. Nonetheless, as the United States itself has acknowledged, the fact that treaties are not self-executing in the United States does not change the international obligations under the treaties. <=90> n89

Commentators have suggested that the NSE declaration is contrary to the object and purpose of human rights treaties. <=91> n90 The ICCPR expressly requires states parties to ensure the rights guaranteed in the treaty, to provide effective remedies in case of a violation of one of these rights, and to enact legislation if any of the rights are not already protected under municipal law. <=92> n91 The Race Convention requires states parties to examine governmental policies at all levels of government and fix any laws or regulations that violate the convention. <=93> n92 It also obligates states parties to "assure ... effective protection and remedies through the competent national tribunals and other State institutions... ." <=94> n93 The purpose of these two treaties is to protect individuals' rights against violations, <=95> n94 therefore, denying individuals a remedy would defeat the purpose of the treaties.

The United States is a party to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, which prohibits states parties from defeating the object and purpose of a treaty in the period between signature and ratification. <=96> n95 It was during this period that the President and the Senate attached the RUDs to the treaties. <=97> n96 Thus, it must be assumed that the [*230] United States did not intend for the NSE provision to defeat the object and purpose of the treaties. Similarly, reading the Vienna Convention together with the two human rights treaties, the United States bound itself to perform its duties under the Race Convention and the ICCPR in good faith. <=98> n97 Additionally, the Vienna Convention specifically forbids states parties to "invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty." <=99> n98 Thus, the United States cannot cite its federal system to justify its failure to perform its treaty obligations.

There is a simple way to avoid finding that the NSE declarations on the Race Convention and the ICCPR violate the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. It is possible to interpret the NSE declarations to mean that the treaties do not create new rights of action in U.S. law because the right of action is already guaranteed for the rights protected in the treaties. <=100> n99 There is support for this interpretation, both in statements made by U.S. officials and in international law. During the ratification process for the Race Convention, a State Department Legal Advisor testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, stating that "existing U.S. law provides extensive protection and remedies against racial discrimination sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the present Convention ... . There is thus no need for the establishment of additional causes of action to enforce the requirements of the Convention." <=101> n100 Similarly, the Bush Administration, during [*231] the ratification process for the ICCPR stated that the treaty provisions would not "by themselves create private rights enforceable in U.S. courts." <=102> n101 There was no assertion that these rights did not already exist.

These statements can be interpreted as meaning that the treaties do not provide new avenues for relief from violations of the rights guaranteed by the treaties, but rather allow those who have suffered rights violations, as defined by the treaties, to seek remedies for these violations through the avenues that are already available. <=103> n102 Thus, for example, courts could hear complaints of racial discrimination under currently existing civil rights law, but incorporate the meaning of racial discrimination under the ICCPR and the Race Convention. This would not require a new private cause of action, but it would fulfill the U.S. treaty obligations to provide effective remedies. Interpreting the NSE declaration in this way would show that the declaration was not contrary to the object and purpose of the treaties and that the United States was performing its duties under the treaties in good faith.

There is considerable support for this approach in international law. The Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties includes a provision stating that a treaty is to be interpreted "in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning ... given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose." <=104> n103 A member of the Human Rights Committee, in his comments on the first report of the United States to the Committee, noted that, when "interpreting domestic law ... the courts ... must take into account international human rights instruments [*232] and make domestic law accord with international human rights standards." <=105> n104 The Inter-American Court on Human Rights <=106> n105 has dealt head on with the problem of interpreting a reservation to avoid finding that it is contrary to the object and purpose of a human rights treaty. <=107> n106 The court found that, where the American Convention on Human Rights expressly listed some rights as non-derogable rights, to make a reservation allowing for derogation from one of the non-derogable rights would be contrary to the object and purpose of the Convention. <=108> n107 Therefore, it interpreted the reservation in question as "merely [restricting] certain aspects of a non-derogable right without depriving the right as a whole of its basic purpose." <=109> n108 Following this reasoning, the NSE declaration should be interpreted as restricting one aspect (the obligation to amend laws) of a non-derogable right (the right to an effective remedy), but not as a derogation of the obligation to provide an effective remedy.

Interpreting the NSE declaration to merely limit the obligation of the United States to create new private causes of action, but not to limit its obligation to provide effective remedies for violations of the rights guaranteed in the treaties is consistent with the United States' own statements and with international law. If the declaration is interpreted in this way, the United States can fulfill its international obligations under the treaties without passing new legislation if the courts incorporate the meaning of [*233] racial discrimination under international law into their assessments of complaints about civil rights violations.

2. The Understanding of Discrimination

Another of the RUDs dealt with the U.S. understanding of discrimination. <=110> n109 According to the ratification document, the United States understood distinctions on the basis of race and other factors as follows:

The Constitution and laws of the United States guarantee all persons equal protection of the law and provide extensive protections against discrimination. The United States understands distinctions based upon race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or any other status - as those terms are used in article 2, paragraph 1 and article 26 - to be permitted when such distinctions are, at minimum, rationally related to a legitimate governmental interest. <=111> n110

Nonetheless, when the United States presented its first report to the Committee in 1994, it explained that distinctions based on race "can be justified only by a compelling governmental interest, a standard that is almost never met." <=112> n111

The U.S. Constitution only allows distinctions based on race if the distinctions are "justified by a compelling governmental interest and [are] necessary to the accomplishment of [a] legitimate purpose." <=113> n112 On its face, it appears that this statement of domestic law requires a greater showing of the necessity of discrimination than does the U.S. statement of its understanding of the meaning of [*234] discrimination in its ratification of the ICCPR and the Race Convention.

However, since the object and purpose of the treaties are to promote the rights guaranteed by them, <=114> n113 it would be contrary to the object and purpose of the treaties to read the understanding as lowering the bar for discrimination in municipal law. Additionally, the ICCPR explicitly states that the Treaty should not be read to imply that a state party may engage in any activity or act that is aimed at the destruction of any rights in the treaty. <=115> n114 To read the understanding as binding the United States to refrain from discriminating on the basis of race only if it was not "minimally rational" would mean that the ratification process, including the drafting of the understanding, diminished the rights of individuals in the United States not to be victims of discrimination.

Thus, the standard for determining when discrimination is permissible, both under U.S. domestic law and under its obligations stemming from the treaties, must remain the standard of a compelling government interest necessary to the accomplishment of a legitimate interest. Given that the understanding itself mentions the protections provided by the Constitution and domestic legislation, this is a reasonable way to read the understanding. <=116> n115

[*235] Besides the impossibility of using to treaties to lower U.S. standards for determining when discrimination is permissible, there is also reason to interpret the understanding simply to clarify that the United States would not provide additional protections for categorizations that are not protected from discrimination under American law, such as birth, property or social origin. <=117> n116 In responding to requests from the Human Rights Committee for clarification about the meaning of the understanding, U.S. representatives explained that the understanding had been drafted with [the Committee's] general comment No. 18 [on the meaning of discrimination] in mind. It [is] difficult to conceive that a governmental objective could be legitimate under United States law if it contravened the fundamental civil and political rights which [are] protected by the Covenant... . Invidious discrimination based on status ... [is] never a legitimate governmental interest. <=118> n117

Thus it appears that the U.S. understanding was not an attempt to lower the level of justification necessary to below that of the HRC. Rather it seems that the understanding was simply an attempt to clarify that the United States did not understand itself to be bound to protect previously unprotected groups from discrimination.

[*236]

II. Racial Profiling in Domestic Law: The United States

Profiling by law enforcement officials is the process of describing the individuals likely to be engaged in certain types of criminal behavior, using a variety of indicators. The idea behind using profiles is that the profiles are a compilation of the experience and knowledge of many law enforcement officers, gleaned over years of law enforcement. <=119> n118 These profiles help determine who police or other law enforcement officers will stop, and may help establish probable cause. <=120> n119 Unfortunately, profiles may be so broad and vague that they may provide justification for stopping any person. <=121> n120 Additionally, law enforcement agencies keep their profiles as secret as possible, so that people engaging in crimes do not change their behavior to avoid fitting the profile. <=122> n121 That means, however, that it is very difficult to challenge the validity of the reasoning behind a profile.

Racial profiling is profiling using race as one of the factors. For example, a DEA agent in Florida reported that his drug courier profile included "blacks and Colombians wearing "lots of gold.'" <=123> n122 Even if a profile is race-neutral, the discretion provided by the use of profiles makes it likely that law enforcement officers will apply them in a racially biased way. <=124> n123 From the data that is available, the percentage of drug arrests of minorities is grossly disproportionate to the percentage of drug users that are [*237] members of minority groups. <=125> n124 The reasons for this are plentiful, and not all based on race. <=126> n125 Whatever the reason, the disproportionately high rate of arrest of minorities reinforces a stereotype that minorities are disproportionately involved in the drug trade. When police have discretion to stop almost anyone because they fit a vague profile, it is likely that the stereotype that minorities are dealing drugs in higher numbers than whites will come into play.

In the cases in which race is the sole indicator of criminal behavior, American courts have uniformly held that racial profiling is unconstitutional. <=127> n126 However, the courts have been much less clear when a law enforcement officer or a departmental policy only alludes to race or uses race as one of multiple factors.

This Part examines one particular form of racial profiling in the context of America's War on Drugs. In recent years, many police departments have instituted the practice of stopping people, particularly people of color, for minor traffic violations, primarily for the purpose of searching their cars for narcotics, guns or cash. These stops are commonly referred to as pretextual traffic stops, as the actual reason for the stop - searching for drug traffickers - [*238] has little to do with the justification for the stop - the traffic violation.

A. Pretextual Traffic Stops

There is little data on pretextual traffic stops, because only in the last few years have law enforcement agencies admitted to engaging in the practice at all. However, the practice is probably more widespread now than in previous decades. One reason that the practice appears to be so prevalent now is the War on Drugs, which has put pressure on police to arrest large numbers of people. Pretextual traffic stops are thought by some to be a reasonably effective means of finding drug couriers. <=128> n127

A second reason for the prevalence of the practice is that in 1996 the Supreme Court held that such pretextual traffic stops are constitutional. <=129> n128 In Whren v. United States, the two defendants in a drug trafficking case sought to have evidence suppressed on the grounds that it was obtained unconstitutionally. <=130> n129 The two defendants, young African-American men, were stopped by police after stopping too long at a stop sign, an infraction of Washington, D.C. traffic laws. <=131> n130 The two defendants claimed that the law was enforced selectively, targeting them because they were young black men in a new car. <=132> n131 The police acknowledged in court that they were not interested in enforcing the traffic laws, but were looking for drugs; they used the traffic violation as a pretext for stopping the two men they suspected of having drugs. <=133> n132 The Supreme Court held that as long as police witness a traffic violation, even if they do [*239] not intend to enforce the traffic laws, stopping the driver is constitutional. <=134> n133

There is even less data on the use of racial profiles in pretextual traffic stops than there is on the pretextual stops in general. There are two main reasons for this lack of information. First, law enforcement agencies do not generally keep statistics on the people they stop, the reasons for the stops, or the racial breakdown of drivers. <=135> n134 Instead, such statistics, when they are kept, reflect only those people who actually are arrested. <=136> n135 Second, when confronted with evidence of racial targeting in pretextual traffic stops, many police officers deny any knowledge of racial targeting or claim that they are simply engaged in effective police work and that any racial bias is in the numbers of stops or arrests is a reflection of reality. <=137> n136

However, as the practice of pretextual traffic stops has grown, so has media attention to the issue and litigation, resulting in more information being available. One of the first lawsuits to deal with the issue came out of Maryland. <=138> n137 This class action lawsuit was brought by Robert Wilkins, an African-American attorney, and three of his relatives, after police stopped them while they were returning from a family funeral. The police asked for consent to search the car for drugs and the driver refused. The police officer mused that if they had "nothing to hide, then what [was] the problem?" and then required the group to wait until another police officer arrived with drug-sniffing dogs. <=139> n138 Wilkins and his family were forced to stand in the rain [*240] while their car was searched for drugs, a search that turned up nothing. <=140> n139 Over the course of the ensuing litigation, a spokesperson for the police stated that the disproportionate number of African-Americans stopped was just "an unfortunate byproduct of sound police policies." <=141> n140 Additionally, a document, dated several days before the day Wilkins was stopped, turned up during discovery. The document informed police officers in the county where Wilkins was stopped that "dealers and couriers ... are predominantly black males and black females." <=142> n141

The eventual settlement agreement not only required the Maryland State Police to refrain from engaging in racial profiling, but also required them to keep computer records of all stops along one stretch of I-95 in which a driver consented to the search of her vehicle or a drug-detecting dog was used. <=143> n142 These records were to include, at a minimum, the date, time and location of the search, the name of the officer involved, the race of driver and any passengers, details about the car, and the reason for requesting consent to search the car or using a drug dog. <=144> n143

The information that emerged for the period of January 1995 through June 1996 was that "of the 732 citizens detained and searched by the Maryland State Police, 75% were African-Americans, and 5% were Hispanics." <=145> n144 Of the twelve police officers who carried out most of the stops and searches, two stopped only African Americans, one stopped just over 95% African-Americans, and six stopped more than 80% African-Americans. <=146> n145 An independent study carried out in November 1996, counted drivers on the same stretch of highway over a 42 hour period and categorized [*241] them by race and whether they were speeding or violating other traffic laws. The researchers counted 5,741 cars and were able to identify the race of 96.8% of the drivers. <=147> n146 Of the total number of drivers, 16.9% were African-American and 75.6% were white. <=148> n147 More than 90% of all the drivers were violating traffic laws and therefore could have been stopped by police. <=149> n148 Of the drivers violating traffic laws, 17.5% were African-Americans and 74.7% were white. <=150> n149 Assuming that the numbers of drivers of both races remained steady, this means that while African-Americans were less than one-fifth of the drivers eligible to be pulled over for traffic violations, they represented three-quarters of those actually stopped and searched.

Another lawsuit, this one in Florida, challenged the practices of the Selective Enforcement Team, a "drug squad" making traffic stops for the purpose of looking for drugs or money. <=151> n150 In this case, the Special Enforcement Team had videos mounted to the dashboards of some of their cars during some periods. <=152> n151 A local newspaper was allowed to view the tapes, amounting to approximately 148 hours of tape, showing 1,084 stops. <=153> n152 Fewer than 1% of the individuals stopped for traffic violations were actually given tickets. <=154> n153 The newspaper reported that almost 70% of the drivers stopped were African-Americans or Hispanics, whereas "the vast majority of drivers on the interstate are white." <=155> n154 Additionally, the tapes showed that more than 80% of the individuals whose cars were searched were [*242] African-American or Hispanic. <=156> n155 The average length of time a white driver was detained was 5.1 minutes, whereas the average time of the detention of an African-American or Hispanic driver was 12.1 minutes. <=157> n156 Under the Florida law, police could confiscate money believed to be connected to the drug trade; 90% of the drivers from whom police confiscated money were African-American or Hispanic. <=158> n157 One African-American man captured on videotape complained that this was the seventh time he had been stopped by police. <=159> n158

Besides the racial disparity shown in the videotapes, there was also direct evidence of a policy of targeting minorities. The plaintiffs' attorneys produced a memo entitled "Common Characteristics of Drug Couriers," instructed deputies to watch for "ethnic groups associated with the drug trade," and several deputies testified that the memo was widely circulated throughout the department. <=160> n159 Two deputies testified that the Sheriff had explicitly instructed deputies to target African-Americans for traffic stops on the highway. <=161> n160 Unlike the suit in Maryland, this suit reached the courtroom. The judge dismissed it when, having refused to certify a class of plaintiffs, he found that there was insufficient evidence demonstrating that the police could identify the race of the drivers. <=162> n161

B. The Costs

At first blush, the harm in traffic stops does not obviously rise to the level of a human rights violation. However, the [*243] more one looks at the problem, the greater the costs, both to the individuals and to society as a whole.

1. Costs to the Individual

For individuals singled out for traffic stops, the costs run high. Besides the time involved, <=163> n162 there is the deprivation of basic human dignity. Police stop people on the suspicion of being criminals because of the combination of the color of their skin, the clothes they wear, the cars they drive, and the areas in which they drive. Members of minority groups are often forced to get out of their cars, sometimes they are handcuffed or frisked, while their children or friends look on and strangers drive by. <=164> n163 A man reported watching police take his car apart by the side of the road in their search for drugs; when they found nothing they handed him a screwdriver to put the car back together and went on their way. <=165> n164 When police treat individuals as criminals for no reason other than the way they look, including the color of their skin, they deny those individuals the equality before the law guaranteed in the Race Convention and the ICCPR, and deprive them of their dignity.

Freedom of movement and association are also threatened by the practice of stopping members of minority groups. One of the reasons police make traffic stops is that a person does not "belong" in an area. <=166> n165 In a case in the mid-1970s, the Third Circuit stated that "the presence of two black males cruising in a car in a predominantly white neighborhood is, by itself, insufficient cause for a belief that [*244] those persons have participated in a recent crime in the neighborhood." <=167> n166 However, under current Supreme Court jurisprudence, if those two black males commit a traffic violation, which they will if they are like most drivers, <=168> n167 they can be stopped. Once stopped, the police can request to search their car and may use drug-sniffing dogs to try to find probable cause to search the car. <=169> n168 African-Americans come under suspicion for being in predominantly white neighborhoods and whites come under suspicion for being in predominantly African-American neighborhoods. <=170> n169 If it is easy to find a pretextual reason for stopping these individuals who go where they are deemed not to belong, the police can deprive them of the right of freedom of movement within their own country and also of the right to associate with whomever they wish.

In extreme cases, traffic stops even lead to death. Police realize that traffic stops, while usually uneventful, carry an inherent risk of violence. <=171> n170 They are a forcible intrusion on an individual's life, and, at the very least, one party to the interaction is armed. In recognition of the inherent danger, police departments have rules requiring police to identify themselves, and limiting the ability of plainclothes police or police in unmarked cars to make traffic stops. <=172> n171 In one New Jersey case, police stopped a van for speeding. <=173> n172 The occupants of the van were three young African-American [*245] men and one Hispanic man, going to a basketball camp. As the police walked toward the van, "it moved into reverse. The troopers responded with several rounds of gunfire, striking the van and its occupants 11 times," badly wounding three of the four young men. <=174> n173

2. Costs to Society

There are other, less direct costs as well. One of these is that to the extent that African-Americans feel that they are being unjustly targeted by police, the police and the criminal justice system become less legitimate in the eyes of African-Americans. As a result, in some communities law enforcement becomes very difficult as people may refuse to cooperate with the police. <=175> n174 discrimination in all its forms. <=3> n2

TEXT:
[*207]

Imagine an elderly couple driving across the country with a van full of their possessions. <=4> n3 It's their fortieth wedding anniversary. As they drive down I-95, they see the lights of a police car flashing behind them and they pull over. The police officer walks up to their van and tells them they were swerving on the road. Then the police ask to search the car. They bring a drug-sniffing dog to go through all of the couple's belongings, taking the contents of the van out and placing them on the side of the highway - the refrigerator, the table, the freezer, the clothes. Their daughter's wedding dress blows onto the highway and gets run over. The drug-sniffing dog urinates on the couple's belongings. After a while, the woman asks if she can relieve herself, but [*208] the police say no and tell her to sit down or she will be handcuffed. The officers say that she cannot go relieve herself because they are afraid she will try to escape. The man pictures it, "two black seniors running down 95 [followed by] three white cops and a dog." After three and a half hours, the police allow to the couple to continue on their way. The police have found no drugs, nor have they written out a citation for the alleged traffic violation that provided the constitutionally required basis for stopping the couple.

In a way, these two senior citizens, Charles and Etta Carter, were lucky. They were stopped in Maryland. The elderly couple filed a lawsuit against the Maryland State Police. As a result of an earlier lawsuit alleging racial profiling by the Maryland State Police, there were already statistics on the traffic stops and an awareness that racial profiling was inappropriate. <=5> n4 The 1993 settlement from the earlier lawsuit, brought by Robert Wilkins, an African-American lawyer, required the Maryland State Police to keep records of the race of the drivers they stopped and of the drivers they searched. <=6> n5 The records showed that, while minorities made up 21.8% of the drivers who could have legally been stopped by police, <=7> n6 they were 60% of those stopped. <=8> n7 Minority drivers were the subjects of 80.3% of all the searches conducted. <=9> n8 During this period, while the state police were well aware that they were being watched for signs of racial profiling, it remained much more likely for a black or Hispanic driver to be stopped and searched than it was for a white driver. Faced with this detailed and [*209] damning information, the Maryland State Police rapidly settled with the Carters. <=10> n9

The Carters would probably have had a much more difficult fight for relief in most other states. Few states maintain statistics on the racial breakdown of traffic stops and there are no national statistics. <=11> n10 Instead there are anecdotes. <=12> n11 Unfortunately, anecdotes are not the solid evidence needed to show a widespread practice. The lack of hard evidence makes it extremely difficult to challenge the practice of singling out minority drivers to stop and search when they commit minor traffic infractions. <=13> n12

There are currently few avenues of relief available to minorities who suspect that they have been stopped by police as a result of their race. <=14> n13 This Comment explores a new route for pushing for redress of this problem, redress that could come either from Congress and the state legislatures or from the courts.

Another cost of racial profiling is that it enhances societal divisions by reinforcing the sense among minority communities that the society treats them unfairly. More than thirty years ago, the government recognized the potential cost of minority communities' resentment of the police, in terms of social unrest, violence and property damage. In the late 1960s, two separate Presidential Commissions found that urban violence and unrest were related to the resentment of the police and the resentment stemmed from perceived harassment and "aggressive patrol" policies. <=176> n175

Racial profiling also probably leads to greater social divisions by increasing stereotypes among whites. If police [*246] focus more attention on black and Hispanic suspects, they will almost certainly arrest more black and Hispanic individuals and the prisons will continue to be disproportionately filled with black and Hispanic prisoners. This in turn reinforces stereotypical views of blacks and Hispanics as criminals.

Finally, there is no way to know how many criminals the police miss because they are targeting one or two racial groups. Though racial profiling has led to a high number of arrests for drugs, there is no way of knowing whether it is actually an effective tactic compared to other tactics. As one commentator explained, "agents who lie in wait for black females do not arrest white males." <=177> n176

C. Remedies

When the Supreme Court rejected the claim of the two African-American men in Whren v. United States that they had been stopped and searched by police because of their race, the Court sent a message to police departments that it was acceptable to stop motorists for trivial traffic violations, based on profiles, racial or otherwise. Since that time, many police departments have set up projects specifically to make pretextual traffic stops, reinforcing the patterns of racial bias that were already apparent.

There have been, and continue to be, very few criminal cases in which the courts suppress evidence found in the course of a pretextual traffic stop. In one, Derricott v. Maryland, decided under Maryland state law, the court suppressed evidence of cocaine possession when the arresting police officer testified that he stopped Derricott on the basis of a drug courier profile he had received from the police department that included race as one factor. <=178> n177 In [*247] another case, a district court judge in Massachusetts departed from the mandatory sentence guidelines, noting that the African-American defendant faced a long sentence as a result of convictions stemming from traffic stops. <=179> n178 However, cases in which a defendant gets any sort of relief for this discriminatory practice are extremely rare, particularly since Whren.

In the civil context, the results have been more mixed. Lawsuits have been filed in several states. A class-action suit in Colorado resulted in a judgment that the Eagle County Sheriff's Department unconstitutionally stopped individuals based on race, among other factors. <=180> n179 While the sheriff's department's appeal was pending, the case settled for $ 800,000. <=181> n180 The settlement also required the sheriff's department not to stop or search a person "unless there is some objective reasonable suspicion that the person has done something wrong." <=182> n181 The Wilkins suit in Maryland

<=183> n182 settled, requiring state police to keep records of traffic stops, including the race of the driver. <=184> n183 From the information gathered after the settlement, it appears that, even when the state police know that they are not supposed to be engaged in profiling, both the drivers stopped, and those subsequently searched, are still overwhelmingly black and Hispanic. <=185> n184

As described above, a suit in Florida was dismissed after the court found that there was insufficient evidence that [*248] police could identify the race of the driver, despite direct and circumstantial evidence that police were targeting minorities. There are lawsuits pending in several other states.

Although in most of these cases the individuals whose rights have been violated do not receive any direct remedy, the collection of information is a critical first step toward providing an effective remedy and ultimately stopping this discriminatory practice.

D. Reporting on Police Stops

Most police departments are not required to keep any records on the racial breakdown of their stops or their searches. Many that do, do so only as a result of litigation. <=186> n185 Generally, police departments are resistant to keeping records on racial breakdown of the stops police officers make and the actual arrests. <=187> n186 The reasons given are generally that it will take too much time and will heighten everyone's awareness of race, leading only to continued tensions. <=188> n187 There is also the fear on the part of many police officers that they will be stereotyped as racists. <=189> n188 Interestingly, the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives has endorsed legislation requiring police departments to keep such records. <=190> n189

[*249] The U.S. Congress has begun to look at the problem. In 1998, Representative John Conyers introduced a bill authorizing a study of traffic stops and searches, including information about the race of the drivers. <=191> n190 The bill passed unanimously in the House of Representatives only to be bogged down in a Senate committee. <=192> n191 The following year, the bill was introduced again in the House, and was also sponsored in the Senate by Senators Lautenberg and Feingold. <=193> n192 It again failed to pass. During the 2000 presidential campaign, Al Gore, the Democratic candidate for President, also spoke of the need for statistics, promising to issue Executive Orders requiring the collection of data and to lobby Congress to outlaw the practice of racial profiling by federal law enforcement agencies if he was elected. <=194> n193

E. A Comparison: Racial Profiling in the United Kingdom

One of the concerns about changing the practice of racial profiling is whether it is feasible, given the subjective nature of the practice and the importance of effective policing. <=195> n194 A recent British case, Hallam v. Avery, shows how the United Kingdom has dealt with racial profiling and suggests that it is possible to outlaw the practice, to hold people accountable, and to keep the prohibition from paralyzing the police. <=196> n195

In Hallam v. Avery, the court looked at whether concerns about maintaining order justified actions based on [*250] assumptions about the Roma ethnic group. <=197> n196 The case involved a Roma woman who was engaged to be married. <=198> n197 She and her mother made a contract with the Cheltenham Borough Council to rent a hall for the reception. <=199> n198 In her application, she stated that she expected about 150 guests. <=200> n199

In the half year before the wedding, local police experienced some trouble with the Roma, and it appears from the court opinion that the judges felt that the police may have had an exaggerated view of the problems. <=201> n200 The police learned of the upcoming wedding and were under the impression that there would be 1,000 to 1,500 people present. <=202> n201 The police went to the Cheltenham Borough Council, explained their concerns and suggested ways of preventing "any public disorder." <=203> n202 The council tried to impose a number of new conditions on the contract with the bride and her mother, including requiring all guests to have tickets that would have to be issued two weeks in advance. <=204> n203

The trial court found that the council had breached its contract with the two women. <=205> n204 It also found that the treatment of the two Roma women, as compared to the treatment of the organizers of another event "known to pose serious risks of disorder," was unfair. <=206> n205 The court "inferred that the mother and daughter were treated differently to the way in which they would have been treated had they not been gypsies, and that the council was [*251] in breach of ... the [Race Relations] Act." <=207> n206 The women were awarded damages under the Act in addition to damages for breach of contract. <=208> n207

The court did not find that the police violated the Race Relations Act because they did not participate in the decision reached by the council nor had they assisted in its implementation. <=209> n208 By refraining from discriminating themselves, instead suggesting ways of dealing with security for a large event, the police avoided liability. Nonetheless, both the trial court and the appellate court chastised the police at length for their conduct. <=210> n209

This case demonstrates the way courts handle racial profiling in the United Kingdom. The court recognized that all of the actors were concerned about a real problem - public disorder in an historic building. However, the court rejected the idea that it was legal (in the case of the council) or appropriate (in the case of the police) to assess the risk of public disorder on the basis of the plaintiffs' ethnicity. One of the appellate judges noted that the Race Relations Act defines discrimination as treating a person less favorably than others on racial grounds. <=211> n210 She went on to note that the Act does not require any proof of the motive behind discrimination; rather a person violates the Act if he or she treats someone less favorably "substantially or effectively on racial grounds." <=212> n211

Thus, it appears that in the United Kingdom, unlike in the United States, racial profiling has been illegal at least since the passage of the Race Relations Act in 1976. Even in the context of protecting public security and safety, the law in the United Kingdom does not allow police or other state actors to expect criminality from one group of people [*252] on the basis of their ethnic background. In the United States, however, police may take race into account with little fear of repercussion.

The law in the United Kingdom has been able to prohibit racial profiling without hamstringing the police in their efforts to protect the public. As seen in Hallam v. Avery, the police can look at the potential for problems, whatever the race or ethnic group of the people involved. They can act in response to threats to public safety, such as a gathering of 1,500 people, as long as they take no discriminatory action. In the United States when police act on race-based assumptions, there is little chance that the victim of the discriminatory act will be able to convince a court to look beyond the justification given by the police to examine the patterns of action.

III. Racial Profiling in International Law

There is limited jurisprudence to assist in the determination of whether racial profiling constitutes impermissible racial discrimination under international law. Nonetheless, the jurisprudence that does exist suggests that it would be. The strongest evidence is a case submitted to CERD in 1995 under Article 14 of the Race Convention, which provides for the consideration of complaints from individuals if the state party accused of discrimination has consented to the competence of CERD. Additionally, the European Court of Human Rights' test for determining whether differential treatment is impermissible discrimination, when applied to the practice of racial profiling, suggests that the practice is discriminatory.

[*253]

A. Jurisprudence on racial profiling from CERD

Paul Barbaro was a man of Italian origin living in Australia. <=213> n212 He had a temporary position with the Liquor Licensing Commissioner (LLC), a state body charged with overseeing the compliance with governmental rules on the operation and functioning of casinos. <=214> n213 As part of the LLC's prior background check on Barbaro, it contacted the Commissioner of Police. <=215> n214 The Commissioner of Police sent the LLC a report stating that Barbaro was "a member of a broad family group which, in my opinion, can only be described as a major organized crime group ... . Eighteen members of this group have been convicted of major drug offences ... . All are of Italian extraction. All are related by marriage or direct blood lines." <=216> n215 Elsewhere, the persons convicted of drug offenses are referred to as members of Barbaro's extended family. <=217> n216 Apparently as a result of this report, the LLC ended Barbaro's employment. <=218> n217 After complaining to the Australian human rights oversight body, where the LLC was not found to have done anything wrong, Barbaro brought his complaint to CERD. <=219> n218 CERD found that Barbaro had made specific allegations, notably in so far as they relate to the report of the Police commissioner ... to support his contention that his national and/or ethnic background influenced the decision of the LLC. In the Committee's opinion, the author has sufficiently substantiated, for [*254] purposes of admissibility, his claims under ... the Convention. <=220> n219

Though CERD essentially found that he had made out a prima facie case of racial/ethnic discrimination, the case was never decided because CERD also found that Barbaro had not exhausted his domestic remedies. <=221> n220

B. Racial profiling in light of Barbaro

The comparison between Barbaro's case and the more general issue of racial profiling are illuminating. First, Australia argued that Barbaro's ethnicity was only one factor, "relevant only in so far as it assisted in defining this cluster of [family and offense] associations." <=222> n221 Racial profiling is exactly this practice; race is used in conjunction with other characteristics or behavior to assist police in identifying persons they believe likely to be engaged in criminal activity.

Second, distinctions about Barbaro, due to his ethnicity and family ties, came in the context of crime prevention, and more specifically, concern about narcotics. Racial profiling in the United States, to the degree it is acknowledged, is justified by its proponents as an effective tool of crime prevention, and more specifically, in the war on drugs. As is the case with racial profiling in the United States, the authorities claimed that they had a legitimate purpose in considering Barbaro's ethnic background.

[*255] Third, it should be noted that Barbaro case involved much more specificity in the associations he had with criminals. The people with whom he was associated were a limited group. They were members of his extended family, and they were specific individuals who had been convicted of a certain category of crimes. With racial profiling, individuals come under suspicion because of their race. The police associate people of color with other people of color, including vast numbers of people, most of whom do not know each other, and most of whom have never been convicted of any crime. The discrimination against Barbaro was based on a somewhat individualized assessment of his family, including a consideration of his ethnic origin. Racial profiling takes place on a much more generalized level.

The Barbaro complaint and CERD's assessment of it suggest that when the state uses racial or ethnic origin as one of several factors in deciding how to treat an individual, that is racial discrimination and is prohibited by the law. However, CERD did not actually determine whether there had been discrimination, and there have not, as yet, been any other similar complaints to the treaty body.

C. Permissible Different Treatment or Impermissible Discrimination?

The United States might also claim that racial profiling by police, to the extent that it happens, is a permissible difference in treatment under the treaties. Not all differences in the treatment of people, even differences based on race, amount to impermissible discrimination. One of the clearest examples of different treatment that is not impermissible is affirmative action, which the Race Convention specifically recognizes as a way of eliminating existing racial discrimination. <=223> n222 There are also [*256] some differences of treatment that are acceptable because the government's aim is legitimate. The HRC explained in its General Comment on Non-Discrimination that different treatment is not discrimination "if the criteria for such differentiation are reasonable and objective and if the aim is to achieve a purpose which is legitimate under the Covenant." <=224> n223 Similarly, CERD noted that a differentiation of treatment will not constitute discrimination if the criteria for such differentiation, judged against the objectives and purposes of the Convention, are legitimate ... . To determine whether an action has an effect contrary to the Convention, [the Committee] will look to see whether that action has an unjustified disparate impact upon a group distinguished by race. <=225> n224

The United States, in its package of RUDs to the ICCPR, stated that it understood the non-discrimination clause to allow the state to treat different persons differently when distinctions are "rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective." <=226> n225

Unfortunately, the treaty bodies have given little guidance as to what are legitimate aims or objectives, and what are reasonable means to try to achieve those aims. However, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) has struggled with the issue of determining what is permissible differentiation and what is not, and gives some guidance on how to make such determinations.

The ECHR is a court of law that hears cases arising under the European Convention for the Protection of [*257] Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. <=227> n226 This court, established in 1953, has a more developed jurisprudence than the treaty bodies and most, if not all, regional human rights bodies. <=228> n227 Like CERD, the ECHR has not heard any cases specifically dealing with racial profiling. However, it has decided cases in which the state party admitted to differentiating between individuals, but claimed that it had legitimate reasons for doing so. The ECHR has set out a test for distinctions that are permissible under the European Convention.

The European Convention purports to be an attempt to enforce the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. <=229> n228 Its non-discrimination provision is similar to that of the ICCPR. It reads:

The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status. <=230> n229

The ECHR has developed a test for determining whether an action or policy is discriminatory. <=231> n230 First, it decides whether a state party has treated similarly situated individuals differently. If so, the court then goes on to decide whether the difference in treatment was "justified by a legitimate aim." <=232> n231 If the court finds the aim to be [*258] legitimate, it then decides whether the means employed are reasonably proportional to the aim.

Though the ECHR applies this test only to determine whether a state party has breached the European Convention, it would be reasonable to apply this test to determine whether there has been a violation of the non-discrimination clauses of other international human rights instruments. The purpose of the European Convention, as noted above, was to try to enforce the ideals of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Additionally, the wording of the non-discrimination clause of the European Convention is substantially similar to the wording of the non-discrimination clause in the ICCPR. Both documents require states to ensure that people enjoy the rights guaranteed in the respective treaties without discrimination on the basis of race or certain other characteristics.

D. Racial Profiling under the ECHR Test

To the extent that racial profiling exists in the United States, it cannot be denied that this practice treats people in similar situations differently. In several of the examples described above, the pool of lawbreakers was around 15% African-American and 65-85% white, yet the majority, often the large majority, of the people stopped or arrested were African-Americans. <=233> n232 Thus, it appears that African-Americans who break traffic laws are treated differently than whites who break traffic laws.

The question, therefore, is whether the state officials who engage in racial profiling have a legitimate aim that is justified, reasonable, or rationally related to the practice of profiling. Applying the test of the ECHR, the question breaks down into two parts: (1) Does racial profiling serve a [*259] legitimate government aim, and (2) Is racial profiling reasonably proportional to that aim?

The first question is relatively easy. Profiling in general, including racial profiling, is intended to make law enforcement officers more effective and efficient in fighting crime and particularly the drug trade. Few would argue that this is not a legitimate government objective.

The second question - whether racial profiling is proportional to the aim - is more difficult. Weighed against the considerable interest in effective and efficient crime control are the important rights of individuals guaranteed in the ICCPR and the Race Convention.

Racial profiling is a form of judging people on the color of their skin. The two treaties both forbid States Party from discriminating against people based on race or color. <=234> n233 The importance of this prohibition is evident in the article of the ICCPR that allows states to suspend certain rights in case of public emergency, but emphasizes that such a suspension cannot involve discrimination based on race. <=235> n234

However, to say that racial profiling is discrimination is conclusory, essentially saying that it is impermissible because it is not justified. Nonetheless, even without addressing this as discrimination, any difference of treatment in traffic stops that is based on skin color probably violates the right to be treated with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person. <=236> n235 Judging a person's likelihood of criminal activity on the color of his or her skin devalues the individual worth of the person.

Racial profiling also implicates the right to equality before the law. It is law enforcement officers that engage in [*260] this practice. As part of the criminal justice system, they are bound by both treaties to treat everyone equally. <=237> n236

Additionally, both treaties guarantee to everyone the right to security of person. <=238> n237 As seen in the case in New Jersey, in which police fired on four high school boys, racial profiling can result in the denial of this right too. <=239> n238 Though it is rare for profiling to have such horrendous results, there is always the possibility of violence in any police stop. <=240> n239

The practice of stopping a driver with little reason, peering into the car and attempting to find a cause to search the car may well also violate the right to privacy. <=241> n240 In 1996 the U.N. Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism issued a communication to the United States raising concerns from the minority communities that police unnecessarily invaded their privacy. <=242> n241

The rights of freedom of movement <=243> n242 and of access to public facilities, including public highways, <=244> n243 are also implicated. If African-Americans and Hispanics know that they are likely to be stopped in predominantly white areas (or if whites know that they are likely to be stopped in predominantly black or Hispanic neighborhoods), <=245> n244 they may feel the risk is not worth the trip and stop going to those areas. Similarly, they may stop using highways where they know they are likely to be stopped. One of the [*261] plaintiffs in the lawsuit in Colorado reported that she no longer travels as a result of police harassment on the roads. <=246> n245

Another aspect of the test for proportionality might be the number of people affected by the practice as compared to the number of arrests made. Statistically, African-Americans may be involved in criminal activity at higher rates than whites. <=247> n246 However this should never obscure the fact that the vast majority of every racial group is not involved in crime. As one commentator recently noted, "98 percent of blacks and 99.5 percent of whites are not arrested for any crime." <=248> n247 Even assuming that racial profiling may have been helpful in catching that 2% of blacks who are arrested, it is difficult to believe that the quotidian police harassment of the other 98% is a proportional means for finding and arresting that 2%.

Given the number of people whose rights are affected, and the importance and number of rights at issue in the practice of racial profiling and pretextual traffic stops, it is difficult to argue that racial profiling is proportional to the aim of fighting the drug trade. Therefore, the practice is impermissible racial discrimination under the ECHR test. This conclusion becomes even more certain when the societal costs of racial profiling are added into the equation, particularly the increased hostility between minority communities and law enforcement officers. Further weakening the argument that racial profiling is proportional to the aim of fighting the drug trade is the lack of evidence that racial profiling is actually an effective policing tool. Weighed against the aim of fighting the drug trade are the violation of rights of large numbers of individuals, the increased hostility between communities, the lessened cooperation of minorities with police and the [*262] missed opportunities to catch criminals that do not fit the profiles. Under this balancing test, racial profiling is not proportional and must be viewed as impermissible racial discrimination. As such, it is a violation of U.S. treaty obligations and therefore illegal.

IV. Meeting U.S. Treaty Obligations - Putting an End to Racial Profiling

If racial profiling is not discrimination, it does not implicate the Race Convention or the ICCPR at all. However, if it is impermissible discrimination, as suggested above, and it really is happening, not only is racial profiling a violation of the treaties in itself, it gives rise to other violations. A State has the obligation to refrain from discriminating and to ensure that it is not discriminating. It also has the obligation to provide remedies, amend discriminatory laws, eliminate discriminatory practices, and report on what is being done to fix problems. This section provides suggestions on how the United States can begin to fulfill its international obligations under the ICCPR and the Race Convention.

One of the ongoing debates is whether and to what degree law enforcement agencies engage in racial profiling. <=249> n248 For the U.S. government to ensure that state officials are not discriminating, it must find out if they are engaging in this discriminatory practice. This means that the government needs to collect data. This data should include the race of the drivers police stop, the reason(s) for the stop, whether the stop led to a release, ticket or arrest, the time involved in the stop, where the stop occurred, whether the police asked for consent to search, whether they used a drug-sniffing dog, and whether there was a search. <=250> n249 While this may appear to be a considerable amount of information for [*263] a police officer to record, this could be done quickly and easily with a form with boxes to check off. Additionally, compared to the very real possibility that the rights of a large section of the population is suffering from regular discrimination at the hands of state officials, the small amount of time involved in this type of data collection is trivial.

Though the federal government cannot force state governments to collect information, it can require federal law enforcement officers to do so, particularly Drug Enforcement Agency officers. <=251> n250 This would both begin to create solid data and would provide an example for the states to follow. The federal government could also provide incentives for the state governments to collect data. The obvious possibility would be to condition highway funds on gathering data about traffic stops, much as the government has in the past conditioned such funds on raising the drinking age. <=252> n251 With a clear nexus between the provision of highway funding and the desire to ensure that all people could enjoy them freely, there is little likelihood that such a condition would be found to be unconstitutional.

A second critical aspect of ensuring that individuals can enjoy their rights without distinction based on race is that the government must make it clear that racial profiling is a form of discrimination and that it is illegal. Currently, if a police officer stops someone for no reason other than his or her race, this would likely be unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment. However, the law is much less clear when police officers stop someone due to a combination of a minor traffic violation and race, particularly if the officer is savvy enough not to say that race played a factor. In order [*264] to ensure that police do not discriminate, the government needs to outlaw this practice, either by changing laws or issuing regulations on how current laws should be interpreted.

The United States took on the obligation to amend its laws to the extent necessary to eliminate racial discrimination, <=253> n252 the NSE declaration notwithstanding. It should pass laws clearly prohibiting racial profiling by federal law enforcement officers. In the specific context of pretextual traffic stops, the federal government is limited in what it can do, though again it can provide incentives to state governments.

The United States also has an obligation to provide remedies when a person's rights have been violated. Due to the decision in Whren, there is currently little hope for any judicial remedy. However, the Whren decision only looked at whether pretextual stops violated constitutional safeguards; the Court did not address whether the practice violates our treaty obligations. Courts should incorporate international standards of non-discrimination into their decisions and thereby find that the practice of pretextual traffic stops, when based on a racial profile, is illegal under the ICCPR and the Race Convention. Courts could do this without any change in the law.

These steps would go a long way toward meeting the obligations that the United States accepted when it ratified the ICCPR and the Race Convention.

Conclusion

The United States took on obligations not to discriminate and to ensure that state officials do not discriminate when it ratified the ICCPR and Race Convention. Despite claims by the U.S. government that it takes human rights [*265] seriously and therefore only ratifies what it intends to respect, there has been little movement toward fulfilling the obligations under the treaties.

One practice that raises serious human rights concerns in the United States is racial profiling by police. Under CERD's jurisprudence and the ECHR's test to determine whether differential treatment is impermissible discrimination, it appears that racial profiling in the context of pretextual traffic stops is discriminatory and unlawful. If indeed it is, the United States has an obligation to put a stop to the practice. While the federal government cannot single-handedly put an end to the practice, it can and should prevent its own law enforcement agencies from engaging in racial profiling and provide incentives for the states to end the practice. It should also collect information on traffic stops to find out how widespread the practice of targeting minorities is. Lastly, courts should incorporate international human rights standards of discrimination into their decisions when presented with a complaint that looks like racial profiling.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Nightline: America in Black and White - Fitting the Profile: Racial Profiling Practiced by Police on Highways (ABC television broadcast, Mar. 31, 1998), available at 1998 WL 5373016 (statement of Christopher Darden, an African-American lawyer).

n2. International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, adopted by the General Assembly Dec. 21, 1965, entered into force Jan. 4, 1969, art. 2, 660 U.N.T.S. 195 (1966), [hereinafter Race Convention]. The Race Convention entered into force in the United States on Nov. 21, 1994. 33 I.L.M. 1615 (1994). See also Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, After delaying for decades, the United States ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) in 1992 <=15> n14 and the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination (Race Convention) in 1994. <=16> n15 The two treaties are central pieces of the United Nations' human rights regime. In ratifying these human rights treaties, the United States took on [*210] international obligations. These treaty obligations are violated by racial profiling by police departments, the failure of governmental bodies and police departments to maintain statistics on police behavior, and by recent Supreme Court decisions allowing for broad police discretion in making traffic stops.

Racial profiling - the practice of using race as a factor in deciding who is suspicious - is less dramatic than the abuses the phrase "human rights violation" usually calls to mind. Nonetheless, racial profiling is a form of discrimination and the effect it has on the lives of millions of Americans who are members of minority groups should not be understated. <=17> n16 From the information that is available, it appears that African-Americans and Hispanics are more likely than whites to be stopped by police when driving, taking public transportation or walking. <=18> n17 The police stops are likely to take longer when police stop African-Americans or Hispanics than when they stop whites, and the police are more likely to ask to search an African-American or Hispanic's car, bag or person for drugs. <=19> n18 The vast majority of all people of any race are not involved in the drug trade. Thus, when police stop members of minorities as a result of racial profiling, the majority of those stopped are completely innocent. These people are subjected to harassment by state officials; the police may humiliate people they stop, and the stops may result in actual violence. <=20> n19 The stop, in itself, is a denial of the individual's right to dignity, right not to have the state [*211] discriminate against him, and the right to be equal before the law. <=21> n20

Racial profiling by the police is particularly problematic at the point of entry into the criminal justice system. Police make decisions about whom to stop and whom to arrest with little accountability. On the roads, where nearly every driver is guilty of numerous offenses every time he or she takes the wheel, <=22> n21 police discretion in deciding whom to stop is almost absolute. <=23> n22 This situation invites police officers, and entire police departments, to use impermissible and illegitimate biases in decisions about making traffic stops. Though the information about the race of drivers pulled over is limited, the information that has been collected strongly suggests that racial profiling, a form of racial discrimination, goes on in many police departments across the country. <=24> n23 As state actors, these police officers and police departments are violating U.S. treaty obligations to not discriminate and to treat all persons as equals before the law. Treaties are binding law, thus, the police are acting illegally.

Part I of this Comment examines the obligations of states parties to the ICCPR and the Race Convention, with a particular emphasis on the definition of discrimination, both in the treaties and in the statements of the treaty bodies. This part also explores the limits of U.S. obligations under the treaties, limits stemming from the reservations, [*212] understandings and declarations registered by the United States at the time of ratification of the two treaties. In particular, this section looks at the meaning and effect of the declaration that the treaties are not self-executing and the understanding of n3. Nightline, supra note 1 (statements of Charles Carter). See also American Civil Liberties Union, Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on our Nation's Highways 19 (1999) [hereinafter ACLU].

International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, S. Exec. Rep. No. 103-29 (1994) [hereinafter Race Convention Senate Report].

n4. ACLU, supra note 3, at 32-35.

n5. Id. at 32.

n6. Id.

n7. Scott Goldstein, Racial Profiling: Will Garden State Be Like Maryland?, N.J. Lawyer: the Weekly Newspaper, May 3, 1999, at 1.

n8. ACLU, supra note 3, at 32-33.

n9. Nightline, supra note 1.

n10. Id.

n11. See, e.g., Katheryn K. Russell, "Driving While Black": Corollary Phenomena and Collateral Consequences, 90 B.C. L. Rev. 717 (1999).

n12. See, e.g., Steve Berry, Bob Vogel Breezes Through Minorities' Legal Challenge, Orlando Sentinel, Jan. 15, 1995, at A1 (Florida judge refused to certify a class of minority drivers who had been stopped, later dismissing the complaint on finding that there was no evidence that the police officers could tell the race of the two plaintiffs).

n13. See infra, Part II.D.

n14. 31 I.L.M. 1596 (1992). See also Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, S. Exec. Rep. No. 102-23 (1992) [hereinafter ICCPR Senate Report].

n15. Race Convention Senate Report, supra note 2.

n16. While there is some indication that Asian-Americans are subject to racial profiling, most of the information gathered to date documenting racial profiling has focused on the profiling of African-Americans and Hispanics. Accordingly, most of the information in this Comment refers to profiling of the latter two groups.

n17. ACLU, supra note 3, at 27-35. See also David Cole, No Equal Justice: Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System 53 (1999); Russell, supra note 11, at 721-24.

n18. ACLU, supra note 3, at 34.

n19. See, e.g., Cole, supra note 17, at 34-35. See also Russell, supra note 11, at 719; and infra text accompanying notes 163-64.

n20. See International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, adopted by the General Assembly Dec. 16, 1966, entered into force Mar. 23, 1976, preamble, arts. 2, 26, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (1967) [hereinafter ICCPR]. The ICCPR entered into force in the United States on September 8, 1992. See ILM Reports: Senate Committee on Foreign Relations Report on the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 31 I.L.M. 645, 646 (1992).

n21. See, e.g., ACLU, supra note 3, at 32 (survey data showing that 93.3% of drivers on I-95 in Maryland violated traffic laws).

n22. David Harris, "Driving While Black" and all Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops, 87 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 544, 559 (1997).

n23. ACLU, supra note 3, at 14-26.

n24. U.N. Charter, art. 1, para. 3.

n25. Louis Henkin et al., Basic Documents Supplement to International Law: Cases and Materials 143 (3d ed. 1993).

n26. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217 A (III), U.N. GAOR, 3d Sess., U.N. Doc. A/810 (1948), arts. 1, 2.

n27. See, e.g., id. art. 2; U.N. Charter, art. 1, para. 3.

n28. Henkin, supra note 25, at 146, 151.

n29. See U.N. Charter, art. 1, para. 3; International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted by the General Assembly Dec. 16, 1966, entered into force Jan. 3, 1967, art. 2(1), 993 U.N.T.S. 3 (1967) [hereinafter ICESCR]; ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 2(1); Universal Declaration of Human Rights, supra note 26, art. 2.

n30. Henkin, supra note 25, at 165.

n31. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 1; ICCPR, supra note 20, arts. 2(1), 26.

n32. The Race Convention explicitly allows for affirmative action to eliminate the vestiges of past discrimination. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 1, para. 4. Thus, the word "disadvantage" here refers to a disadvantage from a position of equality and not from the status quo in any given country.

n33. See Race Convention, supra note 2, at preamble.

n34. Id. art. 2(1)(a).

n35. Id. arts. 2(1), 5 (referring to "racial discrimination in all its forms").

n36. Id. art. 2(1)(a) (emphasis added).

n37. Id. art. 2(1)(c) (emphasis added).

n38. Id. preamble (emphasis added).

n39. Id. art. 1(1). The Convention specifically allows affirmative action programs. Id. art. 1(4).

n40. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 5(2) (emphasis added).

n41. Id. art. 2.

n42. Id. arts. 4, 5.

n43. Id. art. 5 (emphasis added).

n44. Id. art. 17(1).

n45. Id. art. 26.

n46. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 9; ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 40.

n47. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 40; Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 9.

n48. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 11.

n49. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 41.

n50. There is no significant distinction between recommendations and comments.

n51. General Recommendation XIV on the Definition of Discrimination, Comm. on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 48th Sess., Supp. No. 18, para. 1, U.N. Doc. A/48/18 (1996) [hereinafter General Recommendation XIV].

n52. Id.

n53. Id. at para. 2. See infra section III for discussion of whether racial profiling as practiced in the United States is justifiable.

n54. General Recommendation XX on Non-discriminatory implementation of rights and freedoms, Comm. on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 48th Sess., Supp. No. 18, para. 2, U.N. Doc. A/51/18 (1996).

n55. See, e.g., Report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, CERD, 37th Sess., Supp. No. 18, para. 468, U.N. Doc. A/37/18 (1982).

n56. Report of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, CERD, 38th Sess., Supp. No. 18, para. 280, U.N. Doc. A/38/18 (1983).

n57. Consideration of Reports Submitted By States Parties Under Article 9 of the Convention: Madagascar, Comm. on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 48th Sess., para. 3, U.N. Doc. CERD/C/304/Add.6. (1996).

n58. General Comment 18 on Non-discrimination, Hum. Rts. Comm., 37th Sess., U.N. Doc. A/37/40 (1989) [hereinafter General Comment 18].

n59. Id. at para 7.

n60. Id. at para. 9.

n61. Id. at para 12.

n62. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 2(1).

n63. Id. art. 2(3).

n64. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 9; ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 40.

n65. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 9; ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 40;.

n66. General Comment 18, supra note 58, at para. 9

n67. Id.

n68. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 2.

n69. Id. art. 2(1)(a).

n70. Id. art. 2(1)(b).

n71. Id. art. 2(1)(c).

n72. Id. art. 5.

n73. Id. art. 5(a).

n74. Id. art. 5(b).

n75. Id. art. 5(d)(i).

n76. Id. art. 5(f).

n77. Id. art. 2(1)(a).

n78. General Recommendation XIII on the Training of Law Enforcement Officials in the Protection of Human Rights, CERD, 42nd Sess., U.N. Doc. A/42/18 (1993).

n79. Id.

n80. Id. at paras. 2, 3.

n81. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 6.

n82. Id. art. 9(1).

n83. Id. art. 9(1)(a), (b). The United States has not yet submitted its first report, which was due in 1995.

n84. See Initial Reports of States Parties due in 1993: United States of America, Annex III, U.N. GAOR, Hum. Rts Comm., U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/81/Add.4. (1994) [hereinafter Initial American Report].

n85. See Jordan J. Paust, Avoiding "Fraudulent" Executive Policy: Analysis of Non-Self-Execution of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 42 DePaul L. Rev. 1257, 1258-59 (1993). See also David Sloss, The Domestication of International Human Rights: Non-Self-Executing Declarations and Human Rights Treaties, 24 Yale J. Int'l L. 129, 133 (1999) ("Virtually all of the commentators have criticized the [non-self-execution] declarations on policy grounds").

n86. See Race Convention Senate Report, supra note 2, at 11; ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 9.

n87. For a discussion of the effect and legality of the "Non-Self-Executing" declaration, see generally Paust, supra note 85.

n88. ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 14.

n89. See, e.g., Initial American Report, supra note 84, at para. 4.

n90. See Paust, supra note 85, at 1258-59.

n91. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 2.

n92. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 2(1)(c).

n93. Id. art. 6.

n94. Race Convention, supra note 2, at preamble; ICCPR, supra note 20, preamble.

n95. Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, May 23, 1969, art. 18, 8 I.L.M. 679, 686 (1969).

n96. See Sloss, supra note 85, at 132. President Carter was the first president to formally suggest attaching the Non-Self-Executing Declaration, suggesting it when he signed both the Race Convention and the ICCPR. President Bush supported its inclusion at ratification of the ICCPR and President Clinton supported it at ratification of the Race Convention. Race Convention Senate Report, supra note 2, at 2, 25-26; ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 6-9, 19.

n97. Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, supra note 95, art. 26.

n98. Id. art. 27.

n99. This Comment does not address the less general RUDs that apply to specific articles of the treaties, particularly the articles on freedom of speech and the death penalty.

n100. International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 103d Cong. (1994) (testimony of Conrad Harper, Legal Adviser, Department of State), quoted in Sloss, supra note 85, at 170.

n101. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 102d Cong. (1991) (statement of Richard Schifter) (emphasis added) quoted in Sloss, supra note 85, at 166.

n102. See Sloss, supra note 85, at 166-68.

n103. Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, supra note 95, art. 31 (emphases added).

n104. Summary record of the 1402d meeting: United States of America, Hum. Rts. Comm., 53d Sess., 1402d mtg. at 6, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/SR.1402 (1995) (statement of Mr. Bhagwati).

n105. The Inter-American Court on Human Rights is a regional court established under the authority of the American Convention on Human Rights. The United States is not a State Party and cannot be brought before the court. Nonetheless, the approach of this well respected court provides a useful model for interpreting international human rights law.

n106. Advisory Opinion on Restrictions to the Death Penalty, Inter-Am. C.H.R., Adv. Op. No. OC-3 (1983) Ser. A, No. 3, 23 I.L.M. 320 (1984).

n107. Id. at 341.

n108. Id.

n109. ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 11-12.

n110. Id.

n111. Initial American Report, supra note 84, para. 821.

n112. Palmore v. Sidoti, 466 U.S. 429, 432 (1984).

n113. ICCPR, supra 20, at preamble; Race Convention, supra note 2, at preamble. See also Nadine Strossen, Recent U.S. and International Judicial Protection of Individual Rights: A Comparative Legal Process Analysis and Proposed Synthesis, 41 Hastings L.J. 805, 806 (1990) ("International human rights precepts should be invoked only to expand, rather than to limit, protections of individual rights under domestic law.").

n114. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 5(1).

the meaning of discrimination.

Part II describes the practice of racial profiling, focusing on the use of race in pretextual traffic stops. This section describes the practice, the harm caused by the practice, the remedies available to those injured, and the domestic reporting requirements that do exist. This part also looks at the way the United Kingdom has dealt with issues of racial profiling and compares the British response to racial profiling to the American response.

Part III looks at the analysis by the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) of a case from Australia that was essentially an ethnic profiling complaint. It goes on to analyze racial profiling in light of CERD's analysis, finding that the analysis suggests that CERD would find racial profiling to be impermissible racial discrimination. Part III also lays out the test used by the European Court of Human Rights to determine whether actions taken by a state are discriminatory. It applies the test to racial profiling in the form of pretextual traffic stops, and again finds that the practice is probably impermissible racial discrimination.

Finally, Part IV of the Comment notes the ways in which allowing this practice to continue violates U.S. treaty obligations under the ICCPR and the Race Convention and makes a series of suggestions as to how the United States can work to meet those obligations.

I. Discrimination in International Human Rights Law

After World War II, the victorious powers established the United Nations, largely in response to the atrocities visited upon Europe before and during the war. Among the central [*213] goals of the United Nations, as established by the Charter of the United Nations, was the protection of human rights. <=25> n24 In 1948, the U.N. General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights without a single vote cast against the declaration. <=26> n25 The declaration provided a list of universally recognized human rights. It was, however, not a binding treaty. Rather, it was something more akin to a statement of ideals. Leading up the list of rights were the statements that all people are equal in dignity and rights and are entitled to their rights without discrimination based on race. <=27> n26

It was not until the 1960s that the United Nations was able to draft and open for ratification binding human rights treaties codifying many of the rights set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. One important aspect of these treaties was the establishment of oversight bodies that receive reports from states parties to the treaties, and provide guidance on how to interpret the treaties.

A. The Treaties

The entire international human rights regime is based on the principle of non-discrimination on any of numerous characteristics, including race, color, and national or ethnic origin. <=28> n27 In 1966, the General Assembly adopted two general human rights treaties, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR). <=29> n28 Each of these treaties explicitly forbids state [*214] discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national or n115. This does not render the Understanding meaningless. The Understanding allows for discrimination on other bases (sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or any other status) that do not enjoy the same constitutional protections as race. These terms all appear together in the ICCPR. By saying that discrimination on any of these grounds must be "at minimum" rationally related to legitimate government interests, the Understanding should be read to mean that this is a floor below which government actions may not fall for any of these categorizations. That does not mean that every categorization is subject to the same test. Other categorizations, such as race and sex, may have higher tests. This reading is supported by the recognition in the Understanding that there are constitutional protections.

n116. ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 7. While the definitions of discrimination are worded somewhat differently in the two treaties, the Human Rights Committee has clarified that it defines discrimination in the same way as the Race Convention does. See supra text accompanying note 59.

n117. Summary record of the 1405th meeting: United States of America, Hum. Rts. Comm., 53d Sess., 1405th mtg., at 9-10, U.N. Doc. CCPR/C/SR.1405 (1995) (statements of Messrs.Harper and Patrick).

n118. Cole, supra note 17, at 47.

n119. Id.

n120. Id. at 47-8. Cole provides numerous examples of drug courier profiles that have been reported by federal agents. Taken together, the following three examples demonstrate the problem with such profiles:

.one of the first to deplane

.one of the last to deplane

.deplaned in the middle.

Id. at 48.

n121. Id. at 47.

n122. Id. at 49.

n123. Id. at 50.

n124. Human Rights Watch, Modern Capital of Human Rights? Abuses in the State of Georgia 70-71 (1996). The information available only counted whites and blacks. According to Human Rights Watch, in Georgia, from 1991 to 1994, blacks were between 13 and 17% of all drug users, whereas whites were 72 to 77%. During the same period, blacks were between 58 and 67% of drug arrests, while whites made up 32 to 42% of all drug arrests. Id. See also Cole, supra note 17. See generally ACLU, supra note 3.

n125. One of the primary reasons for the disparity between rates of use and rates of arrest is the difference in wealth between minority populations and whites, combined with the relative ease of arresting poorer people. In inner cities, where a great number of drug arrests take place, much of the drug trade goes on in public. It is easier to see the drug transactions taking place in such a situation than it is to locate a drug dealer and witness a transaction in a middle-class suburb. Human Rights Watch, supra note 124, at 75-77. Similarly, poorer people are more likely to take buses and buses and bus stations are prime areas for arrests for drugs. Cole, supra note 17, at 21.

n126. See, e.g., United States v. Avery, 137 F. 3d 343, 353 (6th Cir. 1997).

n127. Kathleen M. O'Day, Pretextual Traffic Stops: Protecting Our Streets or Racist Policy, 23 U. Dayton L. Rev. 313, 316 (1998).

n128. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996).

n129. Id. at 809.

n130. Id. at 810.

n131. Id.

n132. Id. at 812-13; see also Cole, supra note 17, at 39.

n133. Whren, 517 U.S. at 819.

n134. David A. Harris, The Stories, the Statistics, and the Law: Why "Driving While Black" Matters, 84 Minn. L. Rev. 265, 275-76 (1999) [hereinafter Harris, Stories].

n135. See, e.g., Andrew D. Leipold, Objective Tests and Subjective Bias: Some Problems of Discriminatory Intent in the Criminal Law, 73 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 559, 590 n.127 (1998).

n136. ACLU, supra note 3, at 5.

n137. Wilkins v. Maryland State Police, Civil Action No. MJG-93-468 (D. Md. 1993), cited in Harris, supra note 22, at 565.

n138. Id. at 564.

n139. Id.

n140. Id. at 565.

n141. Id.

n142. Id. at 565.

n143. Id. at 566.

n144. Id.

n145. Id.

n146. ACLU, supra note 3, at 32.

n147. Id.

n148. Id.

n149. Id.

n150. Jeff Brazil & Steve Berry, Color of Driver is Key to Stops in I-95 Videos: Tapes Show that Most Stops and Searches by Volusia County's Drug Squad Involve Minorities, Orlando Sentinel, Aug. 8, 1992, at A1, A10.

n151. Id.

n152. Id.; Henry P. Curtis, Statistics Show Pattern of Discrimination, Orlando Sentinel, Aug. 23, 1992, at A11.

n153. Brazil, supra note 150, at A10.

n154. Id. at A1; Curtis, supra note 152.

n155. Brazil, supra note 150, at A10.

n156. Id.

n157. Id.

n158. Id. at A1.

n159. Steve Berry, Judge Throws Out Suit Against Vogel, Orlando Sentinel, Jan. 14, 1995, at A11.

n160. Id.

n161. Washington v. Vogel, 880 F. Supp. 1542, 1544 (M.D. Fla. 1995).

n162. Salim Muwakkil, an African-American academic and journalist in Chicago, explained "I was getting stopped by police so much that I used to compute the time of my stop into my travel time." Michael A. Fletcher, Driven to Extremes: Black Men Take Steps to Avoid Police Stops, Wash. Post, Mar. 29, 1996, at A1.

n163. See, e.g., ACLU, supra note 3, at 9.

n164. Id. at 19.

n165. Sheri L. Johnson, Race and the Decision to Detain a Suspect, 93 Yale L. J. 214, 226 (1983).

n166. Johnson, supra note 165, at 228, citing U.S. v. Richard, 535 F.2d. 246, 248 (3rd Cir. 1976).

n167. ACLU, supra note 3, at 32. See also Harris, supra note 22, at 559 (quoting from a 1967 book of statements by police, "You can always get a guy legitimately on a traffic violation if you tail him for a while, and then a search can be made").

n168. Harris, supra note 22, at 573-75.

n169. Though this works in both directions, it should be noted that there is a disparate impact on minorities. Because there are many more predominantly white neighborhoods than predominantly African-American or Hispanic neighborhoods, whites have a greater area where they can circulate without arousing suspicions. See Johnson, supra note 165, at 244.

n170. See, e.g., Maryland v. Wilson, 117 S.Ct. 882, 885 (1997) (noting the high number of assaults on police officers and officer deaths arising out of traffic stops).

n171. Harris, supra note 22, at 549.

n172. Russell, supra note 11, at 719.

n173. Russell, supra note 11, at 719. On February 2, 2001, the New Jersey Attorney General announced that the young men settled their lawsuit against the New Jersey police for almost $ 13 million. On the same day, New Jersey also announced that it was dropping criminal charges against 128 individuals who alleged racial profiling. Tim O'Brien, Turnpike Shooting Settlement Is Turning P.I. Lawyers' Heads: $ 13 million payout dwarfs all other police injury awards, N.J.L.J., Feb. 12, 2001.

n174. Cole, supra note 17, at 169-71.

n175. Tracey Maclin, Race and the Fourth Amendment, 51 Vand. L. Rev. 333, 363 n.131-33 (1998).

n176. Johnson, supra note 165, at 240.

n177. Derricott v. Maryland, 611 A.2d 592, 597-98 (1992).

n178. U.S. v. Leviner, 31 F. Supp.2d 23, 33-34 (D. Mass. 1998); see also Russell, supra note 11, at 728.

n179. Patrick O'Driscoll, "Drug profile" lawsuit settled: Minority motorists stopped, Denv. Post, Nov. 10, 1995, at A1. There were 22 factors in the profile, including race. During a two year drug interdiction program on I-70, police stopped 402 people who fit the drug courier profile. The police did not ticket or arrest any of these people. ACLU, supra note 3, at 15.

n180. ACLU, supra note 3, at 15.

n181. Id. at 16.

n182. Wilkins v. Maryland State Police, Civil No. MJG-93-468 (D. Md. 1993). See supra text accompanying notes 137-43.

n183. ACLU, supra note 3, at 32.

n184. Id. at 33; see supra text accompanying notes 5-8.

n185. The police department of San Diego, CA announced in February 1999 that it would voluntarily collect data on traffic stops and the police department of San Jose, CA made a similar announcement several weeks later. ACLU, supra note 3, at 41.

n186. Russell, supra note 11, at 726-27. See also Harris, Stories, supra note 134, at 276. The National Association of Police Organizations, an umbrella organization of more than 4,000 police organizations, opposes congressional proposals to track traffic stops. Id.

n187. Id. See also Harris, supra note 22, at 581.

n188. David Crump, Evidence, Race, Intent, and Evil: The Paradox of Purposelessness in the Constitutional Racial Discrimination Cases, 27 Hofstra L. Rev. 285, 324 (1998); Harris, Stories, supra note 134, at 276.

n189. Russell, supra note 11, at 727.

n190. ACLU, supra note 3, at 38-39.

n191. Id. at 39.

n192. Id.

n193. Bob Davis, Bradley and Gore Attack Each Other On Issues of Race, Character, Liberalism, Wall St. J., Feb. 22, 2000, at B2.

n194. See Harris, supra note 22, at 580-81.

n195. No. CCRTF 1999/0678/2, 1999 WL 1142590 (CA) (2000), 97(1) L.S.G. 23, 2-07-2000 Times 1142,590 (1999) [hereinafter Hallam]. This case is an appeal on the finding that the police did not violate the Race Relations Act of 1976. The findings about the Council related in this section of the Comment were not appealed.

n196. Hallam, supra note 195, at 1.

n197. Id.

n198. Id.

n199. Id.

n200. Id.

n201. Id.

n202. Id.

n203. Id.

n204. Id.

n205. Id.

n206. Hallam, supra note 195, at 1.

n207. Id.

n208. Id.

n209. Id. at 3.

n210. Id. at 8.

n211. Id.

n212. Decision of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination Under Article 14 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Communication No. 7/1995: Australia, Comm. on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 51st Sess., Annex, para. 1, U.N. Doc. CERD/C/51/D/7/1995 [hereinafter Barbaro].

n213. Id. at para. 2(1).

n214. Id. at para. 2(2).

n215. Id. at para. 2(4).

n216. Id. at para. 2(5).

n217. Id. at para. 2(6).

n218. Id. at para. 4(3).

n219. Barbaro, at para. 10(2).

n220. Id. at para. 10(5). In November 2000, the CERD revisited this case, again finding that Barbaro had not exhausted domestic remedies. Decision of the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination under article 14 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, Communication No. 12/1998: Australia, Comm. on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 57th Sess., paras. 15, 16, U.N. Doc. CERD/C/57/D/12/1998.

n221. Id. at para. 6(1).

n222. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 4(d).

n223. General Comment 18, supra note 58, at para. 13.

ethnic origin, as do the U.N. Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. <=30> n29

Even as the United Nations drafted general human rights treaties, it recognized that there were certain problems that required more focused attention from the international community. The General Assembly drafted and adopted numerous treaties to address these human rights problems more specifically. One of these more specific treaties was the Race Convention, opened for ratification in 1966. <=31> n30

The Race Convention and ICCPR are two of the most important tools in the attempt of the international community to rid the world of discrimination, both in law and in practice. Both of these treaties expressly prohibit racial discrimination by the state. <=32> n31 The language of both treaties shows that the drafters were concerned not only with discrimination solely on the basis of one of the impermissible grounds, but also with any distinction that disadvantages individuals of protected groups. <=33> n32

1. The Race Convention

The general purpose of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination is clear from its title. In a period of world-wide upheaval, from decolonization of Africa, the civil rights movement in the United States, and emerging international opposition to [*215] apartheid, the U.N. General Assembly adopted this treaty in an attempt to delegitimize and eliminate racism, at least state-sponsored racism. <=34> n33 This treaty explicitly obligates states parties not to engage in racially discriminatory acts or practices. <=35> n34 However, while this express prohibition of discriminatory acts clearly prohibits discrimination based solely on race, the question in the racial profiling context is whether the treaty prohibits differential laws or practices based on race as one of several factors. This question has two aspects. The first part is whether the treaty prohibits only facially discriminatory laws, or whether it prohibits less obvious forms of discrimination by the state as well, arising from the application of laws or from customs. The second question is whether differential treatment is considered racial discrimination when there is only a partial deprivation of a right based on race.

a. Laws and Customs

The language of the Race Convention makes it very clear that the drafters of the treaty were concerned not only with facially discriminatory laws, but also with laws or customs that have discriminatory effects. Besides the use of the expansive phrase "all forms of racial discrimination" in both the title and the body of the treaty, <=36> n35 there are several references to the need to eliminate discriminatory customs and practices. Article 2 requires the states parties "to engage in no act or practice of racial discrimination." <=37> n36 The same article obligates states parties to "take effective measures to review governmental, national and local policies, and to amend, rescind or nullify any laws and regulations which have the effect of creating or [*216] perpetuating racial discrimination." <=38> n37 The preamble also describes the states parties' resolve to "prevent and combat racist doctrines and practices." <=39> n38 Given these references to acts, effects, and practices, it is clear that the drafters of the Race Convention intended that the treaty would have a n224. General Recommendation XIV, supra note 51, at para. 2.

n225. ICCPR Senate Report, supra note 14, at 14. As explained above, the wording in the first report to the HRC was less permissive, stating that the United States only allowed differentiation in treatment when there was a compelling government interest, the standard strict scrutiny test.

n226. European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Sept. 3, 1953, arts. 38-56, 213 U.N.T.S. 221.

n227. Though there is an American Court of Human Rights, the United States has not accepted its jurisdiction.

n228. European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, preamble, supra note 226, at preamble.

n229. Id. art. 14.

n230. Hoffman v. Austria, No. 15/1992/360/434, Eur. Ct. H. R., para. 33 (1992).

n231. Id.

n232. See supra note 124 and text accompanying notes 144-49.

n233. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 1; ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 2.

n234. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 4(1).

n235. Id. art. 10(1).

n236. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 5(a); ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 26.

n237. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 5(b); ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 9(1).

n238. See, supra, text accompanying note 171-72.

n239. Harris, supra note 22, at 559.

n240. ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 17(1).

n241. Implementation of the Programme of Action for the Second Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination: Report by Mr. Maurice Glele-Ahanhanzo, Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance, Comm'n on Hum. Rts., 53d Sess, para. 90, U.N. Doc. E/CN.4/1997/71 (1997).

n242. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 5(d)(i); ICCPR, supra note 20, art. 12(1). See also Fletcher, supra note 162, at A1.

n243. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 5(f).

n244. Johnson, supra note 165, at 226-27.

n245. O'Driscoll, supra note 179.

n246. Patricia J. Williams, Road Rage: Drug Smugglers Assumed to be Minorities, Nation, Mar. 22, 1999.

n247. Id.

n248. See generally Crump, supra note 188.

n249. See Harris, supra note 22, at 579.

n250. Much of the use of drug courier profiles, which often include race (either implicitly or explicitly), appears to have originated with the Drug Enforcement Agency in the late 1970s and 1980s. Johnson, supra note 165, at 233-34.

n251. See, e.g., South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203 (1987) (holding that a statute conditioning receipt of highway funds on adoption of minimum drinking age is a valid use of congressional spending authority).

n252. Race Convention, supra note 2, art. 2(c).

broader application than just prohibiting facially discriminatory laws.

b. Partial Deprivation of Rights on the Basis of Race

A second question is whether the Race Convention outlaws laws or practices that restrict, rather than eliminate, the enjoyment of a right on the basis of race. Article 1 of the Race Convention defines racial discrimination as "any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise, on an equal footing of human rights and fundamental freedoms." <=40> n39 The choice of words in this definition is important. The word "exclusion" suggests a complete denial of a right. The words "distinction," "restriction," and "preference" are more comparative, showing that this definition sought to prohibit laws or practices that put people in different positions in terms of exercising their rights. Similarly, the word "impairing" shows that the rights do not have to be eliminated altogether for something to qualify as discrimination.

For example, if a government has a law that bans one racial group from travelling at night, this is discrimination under the Race Convention's definition. A member of the racial group could exercise her freedom of movement during [*217] the day, so she is not entirely excluded from exercising her freedom of movement. However, she is restricted from exercising this right on an equal footing with others, who can travel whenever they like. Also, she will not be arrested for no reason. She will only be arrested if she travels at night, as a member of her racial group. There are two factors in the decision to arrest her: race and travelling at night. The use of race as one of the factors places her in a disadvantaged position as compared to people not of her racial group.

Thus, the Race Convention prohibits laws that restrict rights on the basis of race, as well as those that eliminate rights completely. It does not matter if race is only one of several factors used to differentiate between people. If race is considered at all in the wording or application of a law, it creates a restriction or preference based on race. Therefore, if race is a factor and its use as a factor impairs the exercise or enjoyment of human rights by one racial group, the action is discriminatory.

2. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

The ICCPR is less detailed about what constitutes discrimination than is the Race Convention. Nonetheless, it appears that the drafters of ICCPR were also concerned about discriminatory customs or practices, as well as discriminatory laws. Article 5 prohibits states parties from restricting the enjoyment of rights "pursuant to ... custom" on the pretext that the rights are not guaranteed by the treaty. <=41> n40

Also, like the Race Convention, the ICCPR seems to prohibit discriminatory actions that only impair the enjoyment of rights, as well as those that eliminate certain rights altogether. The ICCPR prohibits discrimination on [*218] numerous grounds, including race and color. <=42> n41 It also requires states parties to ensure the enjoyment of the rights protected and establishes the limits for derogation from these rights. <=43> n42 Article 5 reads:

1. Nothing in the present Covenant may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms recognized herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the present Covenant.

2. There shall be no restriction upon or derogation from any of the fundamental human rights recognized or existing in any State Party to the present Covenant pursuant to law, conventions, regulations or custom on the pretext that the present Covenant does not recognize such rights or that it recognizes them to a lesser extent. <=44> n43

Article 5 specifically recognizes the probability that a state might limit the enjoyment of certain rights, rather than denying the rights altogether, and prohibits this practice. Additionally, the use of language is telling. Article 5 uses the words "destruction ... or ... limitation" in the first paragraph and "restriction upon or derogation from" in the second. Of these four terms, only destruction implies a total denial of a right. The other three terms all suggest that a partial denial of rights was also considered and prohibited by the drafters.

There are also several other provisions in the ICCPR that indicate that the drafters were concerned about both total and partial denials of rights. Article 17 prohibits "arbitrary or unlawful interference with ... privacy, family, home or correspondence" and "unlawful attacks on ... honour and reputation." <=45> n44 The use of the word "interference," [*219] particularly in the context of these rights, suggests that the drafters were concerned about situations not rising to the level of a complete denial of privacy, home, family or correspondence. Interference suggests merely a hindrance or obstacle, that may or may not be overcome. Thus, the ICCPR prohibits acts that only impair the enjoyment of these rights, rather than limiting itself to prohibiting acts that eliminate their enjoyment altogether. Similarly, a person is protected from attacks on her honor or reputation, whether or not the attack actually destroys the individual's honor or reputation.

Finally, Article 26, states:

All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race ... <=46> n45

The repetitive use of the phrase "any discrimination" shows the importance the drafters attached to eliminating even the smallest, most insignificant acts of discrimination from the administration of the law. Additionally, the use of the phrase "equal and effective protection from discrimination" would have been excessively wordy if all the drafters envisioned was that states would either protect people from discrimination or they would not. This phrase suggests that the drafters considered the possibility that states might provide differing levels of protection to different groups and prohibited such a practice. Lastly, if it is assumed that all words in a law serve some purpose, the words "equal and effective protection" must have been an attempt to prevent states from providing unequal or ineffective protection.

[*220]

B. The Treaty Bodies

Both the ICCPR and the Race Convention have oversight bodies. The treaty bodies, the Human Rights Committee (HRC) and the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), have several functions. They receive periodic reports from states parties on the implementation of the treaties. <=47> n46 They also question delegates of the states parties in those reports and issue comments and recommendations to the states parties. <=48> n47 The CERD has the power to consider complaints from states parties that other states parties are not living up to the obligations of the Race Convention. <=49> n48 The HRC has a similar authority, though states parties must accept the committee's authority to consider complaints, in addition to ratifying the ICCPR. <=50> n49

In order to assist states parties both with implementing the treaties and with reporting on their progress, both treaty bodies occasionally issue recommendations or comments, explaining their interpretations of the respective treaties. <=51> n50 While these interpretations are not binding on states parties, they are generally viewed as extremely persuasive authority as to the meaning of the various provisions.

The two committees have made it clear that they are concerned about practices that have either a discriminatory intent or a disparate impact on one group of individuals. Additionally, they have expressed the view that customs and practices that allow entrenched discrimination to continue must be eliminated, even if they are facially neutral.

[*221]

1. The Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination

In its General Recommendation 14, CERD elaborated on the definition of discrimination laid out in Article 1 of the Race Convention. CERD explained that a distinction is contrary to the Convention if it has either the purpose or the effect of impairing particular rights and freedoms. This is confirmed by the obligation placed upon States Parties ... to nullify any law or practice which has the effect of creating or perpetuating racial discrimination." <=52> n51

CERD went on to explain that there are some limited situations in which different treatment based on race or one of the other factors might be permissible. If a state makes such distinctions, "the criteria for such differentiation, judged against the objectives and purposes of the Convention, are legitimate or fall within the scope of article 1, paragraph 4, of the Convention." <=53> n52 While there is no explanation of what legitimate means, the reference to article 1, paragraph 4 gives some guidance, as this is the provision of the Race Convention that allows states to undertake affirmative action to reduce racial or ethnic discrimination and its effects. In any case, a state may not take actions contrary to the purposes of the convention and CERD would examine any different treatment to see if there was an "unjustifiable impact upon a group distinguished by race, colour, descent, or national or ethnic origin." <=54> n53

[*222] In a later recommendation, CERD again tried clarify what sorts of distinctions were prohibited under the Race Convention. General Recommendation 20 explained that whenever a state imposes a restriction upon one of the rights [enumerated in] the Convention which applies ostensibly to all within its jurisdiction, it must ensure that neither in purpose nor in effect is the restriction incompatible with article 1 of the Convention... . To ascertain whether this is the case, the Committee is obliged to inquire further to make sure that any such restriction does not entail racial discrimination. <=55> n54

In these two recommendations, CERD reiterates the language of article 1, explaining that it is concerned about both laws and practices, and that it will look at their effects, as well as their purpose. It is also clear that CERD believes that it has the duty to look behind statutes and practices to examine their effects and evaluate the justification for actions that treat different groups in society differently.

Besides the general statements interpreting the Race Convention, the members of CERD have regularly stated their concerns about de facto equality, rather than merely de jure equality. <=56> n55 In particular, they have noted the problems of vestiges of discrimination remaining when neutral laws or practices are implemented. <=57> n56 They have also noted that impoverishment and dysfunctional social services can lead to racial or ethnic discrimination. <=58> n57

[*223]

2. The Human Rights Committee

The Human Rights Committee published a lengthy statement on non-discrimination, General Comment 18. <=59> n58 In this document, the HRC explains that the definition of discrimination of the ICCPR should be understood to be essentially the same as that of the Race Convention. The HRC explains that discrimination "implies any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference which is based on [any of several grounds] and which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing, of all rights and freedoms." <=60> n59 As explained above, the use of the words "restriction or preference," particularly when contrasted with "exclusion," is significant. It suggests that the HRC intends for the definition of discrimination to include acts or practices that create an advantage or a disadvantage for some individuals, rather than only those acts that entirely exclude members of one group from the enjoyment of a right. Similarly, the use of both nullify and impair suggests that the partial deprivation of rights based 114 Harv. L. Rev. 2098 printed in FULL format.

Copyright (c) 2001 The Harvard Law Review Association
Harvard Law Review

May, 2001

114 Harv. L. Rev. 2098

LENGTH: 11267 words

NOTE: CONSTITUTIONAL RISKS TO EQUAL PROTECTION IN THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

SUMMARY:
... A constitutional risk perspective would not necessarily change any underlying values or normative goals of the legal system, but it would enhance the law's ability to recognize a set of harms hidden by the current paradigm of particularity. ... The existence of an unexplained racial disparity - a constitutional risk - suggests that the criminal justice system may be according government actors too much discretion. ... Guidelines and Record-keeping. - The above observation suggests a modification of equal protection doctrine in the context of constitutional risk: if a defendant demonstrates a racial disparity for which no legitimate explanation exists, a court could grant dismissal unless the government could show that it had adopted decisionmaking guidelines and, where possible, required decisionmaking records. ... This test, which combines statistical and structural elements, is reminiscent of the doctrine dealing with jury discrimination in Castaneda v. Partida, which held that, when a jury selection procedure is susceptible to abuse, a significant racial disparity is sufficient to establish an equal protection violation. ... This Note has examined the consequences of a shift in the equal protection context - a move from a traditional particularized harm perspective to a constitutional risk perspective focused on systemic harms. ... Additionally, because one need not confine the constitutional risk perspective to equal protection, it may usefully be extended to inform other constitutional doctrines, such as facial challenges and prophylactic rules. ...

TEXT:
[*2098]

Historically, the Supreme Court has required a showing of particularized harm to prove an equal protection violation. For example, in McCleskey v. Kemp, <=2> n1 the Supreme Court found no equal protection violation <=3> n2 despite statistical studies showing that defendants charged with killing white victims were four times more likely to be sentenced to death than those charged with killing black victims. <=4> n3 The Court reasoned that these statistics did not demonstrate that racial considerations had played a role in McCleskey's particular sentence. <=5> n4 Although the requirement of particularized harm is consistent with the traditional common law view of causation, it necessarily causes courts to neglect more subtle, systemic risks created by the operation of government. Often a criminal defendant cannot identify a specific wrongdoer, nor can he prove that racial discrimination more likely than not tainted his particular conviction. <=6> n5 Sometimes, as in McCleskey, all that a defendant can show is that, after multiple-regression analyses have accounted for plausible non-racial explanations, disparities still remain.

therefore be more amenable to granting proportional relief for claims of constitutional risk.

Despite the possible benefits of a proportional remedy, this alternative suffers from a number of significant difficulties, the most obvious of which is that it amounts to a race-based remedy. Only defendants of the race at risk would receive reduced sentences, a situation that raises grave political and equal protection concerns. <=104> n103 Another serious problem is that proportional remedies may undermine public acceptance of court decisions. <=105> n104 Observers could find the remedy strange and the message ambiguous: courts would recognize the existence of racial discrimination, but rather than develop doctrines to deter or stop equal protection violations, they would merely cut the baby in half.

B. Structural Injunctions

One might view the mismatch between dismissal and constitutional risk as the predictable result of applying old fixes to new contexts. The constitutional risk perspective addresses systemic, not particularized harm. So although a traditional remedy may be preferable to advocates of judicial restraint, a more systemic remedy may be necessary.

If the goal is systemic change, then structural injunctions seemingly provide a ready answer. If the system creates constitutional risk, then why not require changes in the system? Rather than take the circuitous route of granting windfalls to guilty defendants to deter government discrimination and to eliminate racial disparities, courts could simply mandate an end to inexplicable racial disparities. <=106> n105 For example, [*2116] an injunction could require the ratcheting up of arrests and prosecutions of whites until the disparities disappeared. <=107> n106

A structural remedy, however, faces substantial obstacles. First, injunctions cannot realistically address jury discrimination because juries are one-time actors and because direct interference with their deliberations would raise Sixth Amendment concerns. <=108> n107 Second, unlike injunctions in the prison or school context, injunctions forcing increased prosecutions provide no benefit, and therefore no incentive, to defendants. <=109> n108 Third, as a race-based remedy, a "ratchet-up" injunction would itself raise equal protection problems. In fact, it would be far worse than proportional remedies because government actors would explicitly use race to target individuals for prosecution. <=110> n109

C. Discretionary Guidelines

Remedies can be arranged along a spectrum of increasing judicial activism. At one end, sanctions, representing more passive remedies, use deterrence to influence other branches of government indirectly. At the other end, structural injunctions are far more active and impose judicially desired results directly. Both have significant drawbacks in combating constitutional risks, leading one to search for a middle-ground solution that would address structural defects with minimal intrusiveness. A possible compromise would have courts sanction the government not for imposing constitutional risks, but for failing to minimize them through structural safeguards.

[*2117] 1. Reining In Discretion. - Discretion is often at the root of discrimination. <=111> n110 Theoretically, given a facially race-neutral statute, no discrimination could occur if government actors had an obligation to arrest, prosecute, and sentence everyone in exactly the same way. Discretion, however, is inevitable in practice: rules have gaps; <=112> n111 discretion is often desirable in contexts such as sentencing that involve complex judgment calls; <=113> n112 and broad criminal statutes coupled with limited resources make the prosecution of all crimes impossible. <=114> n113 But the fact that discretion is inevitable does not mean that it must be unbridled. Courts and legislatures can restrain discretion with guidelines and record-keeping requirements that reduce the risk of discrimination. <=115> n114

The existence of an unexplained racial disparity - a constitutional risk - suggests that the criminal justice system may be according government actors too much discretion. If one accepts this assertion, then the racial disparities discussed in section I.C should come as little surprise. Law enforcement, prosecutorial, and sentencing decisions are generally governed by few guidelines <=116> n115 and are often accompanied by little or no record of their decisionmaking processes. Without records or standards, appellate courts lack the tools for meaningful review of discretion; such a scenario, in turn, opens the door to latent discrimination.

2. Guidelines and Record-keeping. - The above observation suggests a modification of equal protection doctrine in the context of constitutional [*2118] risk: if a defendant demonstrates a racial disparity for which no legitimate explanation exists, a court could grant dismissal unless the government could show that it had adopted decisionmaking guidelines <=117> n116 and, where possible, required decisionmaking records. <=118> n117 In effect, statistical disparities would create a presumption of discrimination, but to rebut the presumption, the government would need only demonstrate that it has adopted procedural safeguards that limit discretion and the concomitant risk of discrimination. <=119> n118 This test, which combines statistical and structural elements, is reminiscent of the doctrine dealing with jury discrimination in Castaneda v. Partida, <=120> n119 which held that, when a jury selection procedure is susceptible to abuse, a significant racial disparity is sufficient to establish an equal protection violation. <=121> n120 The Court has subsequently attempted to confine Castaneda to the jury context, <=122> n121 but there is no a priori reason not to extend it to constitutional risks. <=123> n122

From a doctrinal standpoint, any judicially created requirements of record-keeping and guidelines would be essentially prophylactic rules to minimize constitutional risks. <=124> n123 Courts might impose these requirements with varying degrees of specificity depending on the success of early interventions. The substantive details of the guidelines would likely be left to state legislatures because of their polycentric, policy-based nature. <=125> n124 If ultimately unsatisfied, however, courts could [*2119] offer certain procedures as safe harbors or even as constitutional requirements. <=126> n125

The requirements of guidelines and record-keeping accomplish four important goals. First, guidelines constrain discretion by providing a decisionmaking framework. Concededly, guidelines cannot eliminate all racism in the criminal process, but they can at least minimize it by reducing the range of discretion available to government actors. <=127> n126 Second, record-keeping and guidelines create greater transparency, forcing government actors to make reasoned justifications and deterring them from using impermissible factors. <=128> n127 Third, decisionmaking standards and records provide appellate courts with the necessary tools for meaningful review. <=129> n128 Indeed, even if appellate courts are ill suited for reviewing executive discretion, <=130> n129 the mere threat of review has normative value and may alter behavior. <=131> n130 Finally, the implementation of guidelines benefits all defendants equally - unlike structural injunctions and proportional remedies, it is not a race-based remedy.

3. Potential Concerns. - Discretionary guidelines do, however, have some inherent drawbacks. Naturally, they limit prosecutorial discretion, which the Court has recognized as essential in a resource-constrained world. <=132> n131 Guidelines also limit the ability of all actors in the system - police, prosecutors, and judges - to dispense individualized justice. <=133> n132 The problem is that catering to the individual case [*2120] necessarily undermines the uniformity of legal rules. <=134> n133 Mercy may temper justice, but mercy requires discretion, and discretion allows discrimination. <=135> n134 Thus, the best one can hope to achieve is a balance, <=136> n135 and by retaining but narrowing discretion, discretionary guidelines reduce the risk of discrimination while preserving a modicum of individualized justice.

More fundamentally, critics may ask whether courts, as compared to legislatures, are the appropriate institutions to implement systemic changes. <=137> n136 Legislatures, however, have perverse incentives to draft overinclusive criminal statutes and to defer to prosecutors: broad criminalization maximizes politically popular "law and order" rhetoric, and extensive prosecutorial discretion minimizes legislatures' blame for perceived miscarriages of justice. <=138> n137 In addition, discretionary guidelines are not nearly as intrusive as the structural injunctions described in section II.B. A prophylactic rule requiring discretionary guidelines would mandate only that legislatures constrain discretion, either by legislating directly or by delegating the authority to develop guidelines to police, prosecutors, and trial courts. <=139> n138 A guidelines approach to constitutional risk would leave considerable leeway for local officials to develop their own systems to limit discretion. Only in the face of consistent failure would the judiciary need to increase its involvement. And even if courts shunned more intrusive measures as overly activist, the mere recognition of the problem might spur other branches to develop appropriate remedies. <=140> n139

[*2121]

III. Conclusion

This Note has examined the consequences of a shift in the equal protection context - a move from a traditional particularized harm perspective to a constitutional risk perspective focused on systemic harms. It has also acknowledged the significant remedial difficulties associated with constitutional risk, but by focusing on discretion as the source of most equal protection risks, this Note has proposed a moderate doctrinal change: discretionary safeguards.

To be sure, this Note leaves the project substantially incomplete.

Constitutional risk's focus on statistical evidence requires careful discussion of the pitfalls judges face in this area and of how they can develop expertise in response. Additionally, because one need not confine the constitutional risk perspective to equal protection, it may usefully be extended to inform other constitutional doctrines, such as facial challenges and prophylactic rules. <=141> n140 In extending constitutional risk, however, one should remember that shifting to a risk-based view of constitutional law represents a genuine policy decision. Never have laws protected every individual against every risk - to do so is neither practical nor possible. Therefore, one must determine which risks are substantial enough to warrant a remedy. Even more crucially, one must decide if constitutional risk is a transsubstantive doctrine, or whether only some constitutional harms are serious enough to require a more systemic and nuanced look. <=142> n141 All this remains for another day.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. 481 U.S. 279 (1987).

n2. Id. at 299.

n3. See id.

n4. See id. at 294-95, 297.

n5. See Alan David Freeman, Legitimizing Racial Discrimination Through Antidiscrimination Law: A Critical Review of Supreme Court Doctrine, 62 Minn. L. Rev. 1049, 1056 (1978) (noting the "impossible burden of isolating the particular conditions of discrimination produced by and mechanically linked to the behavior of an identified blameworthy perpetrator"); cf. Herskovits v. Group Health Coop. of Puget Sound, 664 P.2d 474, 475 (Wash. 1983) (addressing the causation problems when a doctor's negligent diagnosis reduced a cancer patient's chance of survival); Sindell v. Abbott Labs., 607 P.2d 924, 927-28 (Cal. 1980) (addressing the claims of a plaintiff who was unable to identify precisely which pharmaceutical company manufactured a defective drug).

n6. Some commentators additionally, albeit controversially, suggest that racism can exist unconsciously, caused by a lack of empathy. See, e.g., Paul Brest, The Supreme Court, 1975 Term - Foreword: In Defense of the Antidiscrimination Principle, 90 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 14-15 (1976) (describing the problem of "racially selective indifference"); Charles R. Lawrence III, The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism, 39 Stan. L. Rev. 317, 328-44 (1987). But cf., e.g., Md. Troopers Ass'n v. Evans, 993 F.2d 1072, 1077 (4th Cir. 1993) (distinguishing "cronyism" from racism in a Title VII action because, although selecting one's friends may result in numerical disparities, "it is not the same kind of iniquity as racial discrimination").

n7. See infra note 110.

n8. Cf. Laurence H. Tribe, The Curvature of Constitutional Space: What Lawyers Can Learn from Modern Physics, 103 Harv. L. Rev. 1, 12 (1989) (advocating a shift in state action doctrine from a Newtonian world view focused on "isolated forces acting on particular individuals" to a post-Newtonian, relativistic view focused on individuals' interactions with the entire fabric of a system).

n9. Cf. Herskovits, 664 P.2d at 481 (Pearson, J., concurring) (suggesting that the "injury" caused by a doctor's negligent diagnosis could be defined as the decreased chance of surviving cancer).

n10. Randall L. Kennedy, McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1388, 1406 (1988).

n11. See, e.g., Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 238-42 (1976).

n12. See McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 292 (1987); see also Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (holding that standing requires "personal injury fairly traceable to the [wrongdoer's] allegedly unlawful conduct"); David L. Faigman, Legal Alchemy: The Use and Misuse of Science in the Law 117 (1999) (criticizing the McCleskey Court for having introduced this new standard in discrimination cases).

n13. E.g., Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1405 (internal quotation marks omitted).

n14. See, e.g., Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 494 (1977) (grand jury); Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 1, 24-25 (1971) (school desegregation); see also Daniel R. Ortiz, The Myth of Intent in Equal Protection, 41 Stan. L. Rev. 1105, 1119-34 (1989) (arguing that in jury selection, voting, and education cases, the intent requirement is significantly attenuated).

n15. The Supreme Court typically accepts statistical evidence only when a law's application is so racially disparate that the numbers permit the inference of discriminatory intent. For example, in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960), the Court found unconstitutional a twenty-eight-sided voting district that redistricted all but four or five of 400 black voters, but no white voters. Id. at 341; see also Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356, 374 (1886) (finding an equal protection violation when city supervisors denied permits to two hundred Chinese laundries while granting permits to eighty non-Chinese laundries).

n16. See H.L.A. Hart & Tony Honor<?extend ascii 233>, Causation in the Law 64-71 (2d ed. 1985); Morton J. Horwitz, The Transformation of American Law 1870-1960: The Crisis of Legal Orthodoxy 52-57 (1992).

n17. Indeed, even if an act or occurrence can be shown to be more probable than not, under traditional causation principles such evidence, standing alone, is insufficient for recovery. See David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 849, 857 (1984).

n18. See Tribe, supra note 8, at 5-7 (describing Newtonian mechanics).

n19. See Abram Chayes, The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation, 89 Harv. L. Rev. 1281, 1285 (1976) (noting that intention and fault formed the foundation of the traditional private law system); Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 858.

n20. See Chayes, supra note 19, at 1282-83 (describing private law litigation as bipolar and as involving self-contained episodes confined to discrete parties).

n21. Cf. Freeman, supra note 5, at 1052-57 (describing this "perpetrator perspective" that causes courts to "view[] racial discrimination not as a social phenomenon, but merely as the misguided conduct of particular actors").

n22. McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 294 (1987).

n23. See id. at 295 n.15.

n24. See id. at 291 n.7.

n25. See Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 882-83.

n26. See Robert Nozick, Anarchy, State, and Utopia 76-77 (1974).

n27. These concerns probably underlie the well accepted tort doctrine that one cannot recover for "negligence in the air" (a negligent act that results in no injury). See, e.g., Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R. Co., 162 N.E. 99, 99 (N.Y. 1928) (Cardozo, C.J.). See generally Horwitz, supra note 16, at 56 (discussing the "negligence in the air" doctrine). Similarly, the infeasibility of awarding reversal for any de minimis trial mistake probably underlies the harmless error doctrine.

n28. See infra note 79. For a discussion of slippery slopes and the problem of line drawing, see Frederick Schauer, Slippery Slopes, 99 Harv. L. Rev. 361 (1985).

n29. The methods by which judges and juries handle statistical and probabilistic evidence would obviously be critical to the successful implementation of a constitutional risk perspective. A general discourse on these issues, however, is beyond the scope of this Note. For a discussion of the advantages of statistical data over experts' judgments, see William Meadow & Cass R. Sunstein, Statistics, Not Experts (Feb. 11, 2000) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Harvard Law School Library).

n30. See United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 469 (1996) (implying that different racial groups commit crimes with varying degrees of frequency); cf. City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 507 (1989) (rejecting the "assumption that minorities will choose a particular trade in lockstep proportion to their representation in the local population").

n31. See McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 327 (1987) (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("Multiple-regression analysis is particularly well suited to identify the influence of impermissible considerations in sentencing, since it is able to control for permissible factors that may explain an apparently arbitrary pattern.").

n32. See Richard H. McAdams, Race and Selective Prosecution: Discovering the Pitfalls of Armstrong, 73 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 605, 627-33 (1998) (discussing a method to account for correlations between non-racial factors and race and suggesting that collecting data on nonprosecutions is notoriously difficult).

n33. E.g., Armstrong, 517 U.S. at 470 (citing a lack of evidence regarding "similarly situated persons" of other races); McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 295 n.14 (distinguishing death penalty cases in which there is "no common standard by which to evaluate all defendants" from jury venire selection cases in which the number of factors is purportedly limited and, "to a great degree, objectively verifiable"); Stephens v. State, 456 S.E.2d 560, 562 (Ga. 1995) (finding statistical evidence insufficient and criticizing the potential omission of other race-neutral explanatory factors).

n34. Bazemore v. Friday, 478 U.S. 385, 400 (1986) (Brennan, J., concurring in part).

n35. See Joseph L. Gastwirth & Tapan K. Nayak, Statistical Aspects of Cases Concerning Racial Discrimination in Drug Sentencing: Stephens v. State and U.S. v. Armstrong, 87 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 583, 590-96 (1997) (suggesting a statistical technique to make this determination). Professor McAdams has made the related suggestion that, when relevant data is unavailable, trial courts should fill in "data gaps" with reasonable assumptions. See McAdams, supra note 32, at 634-40. For example, although numerical data may not exist on the number of nonblack drivers who speed, it is reasonable to assume that at least some do. See id. at 632, 637.

n36. But see United States v. Bell, 86 F.3d 820, 823 (8th Cir. 1996) (rejecting the defendant's claim of discriminatory enforcement of a bicycle headlamp law because, even if the law was enforced solely against blacks, the defendant failed to show that whites rode bicycles in violation of the statute).

n37. See, e.g., Md. Troopers Ass'n v. Evans, 993 F.2d 1072, 1077-78 (4th Cir. 1993) (defining the class in a Title VII disparate impact action as the available pool of workers).

n38. Cf. Garner v. Jones, 120 S. Ct. 1362, 1372 & n.1 (2000) (Souter, J., dissenting) (arguing that, in the ex post facto context, a court must examine the effect of a rule change on the class of defendants rather than on the particular defendant because the combination of rules and discretion involved in sentencing precludes ever proving harm in the individual case); James Gleick, Chaos: Making a New Science 44 (1987) (suggesting that, in the scientific context, looking analytically at individual pieces reveals little about global interactions or changes); Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 885 n.141 (suggesting that, in the tort context, case-by-case adjudication often overlooks aggregate or systemic problems).

n39. Cf. Abram Chayes, The Supreme Court, 1981 Term - Foreword: Public Law Litigation and the Burger Court, 96 Harv. L. Rev. 4, 39 (1982) (noting that "statistics on employment decisions that by themselves appear neutral or nonprobative may take on a different meaning when seen in the context of the company's overall employment activities").

n40. Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1419.

n41. Rose v. Mitchell, 443 U.S. 545, 559 (1979); id. ("But [the discrimination] is not less real or pernicious."); see Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1419 (discussing how the purposeful discrimination requirement "ignores the chameleonlike ability of prejudice to adapt unobtrusively to new surroundings").

n42. See, e.g., Laurence H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 16-20, at 1509 (2d ed. 1988) (observing that finding a "bigoted decision-maker" can be difficult).

n43. See, e.g., James Vorenberg, Decent Restraint of Prosecutorial Power, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 1521, 1521-22 (1981) (discussing how prosecutors have gained discretion while other actors such as magistrates, parole boards, and correctional officials have been constrained); infra note 115.

n44. Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985) (suggesting that prosecutorial discretion is necessary because of resource limitations and because of the "systemic costs" of judicial supervision, which include chilling law enforcement by scrutinizing prosecutorial motives and undermining prosecutorial effectiveness by "revealing the Government's enforcement policy").

n45. See infra note 110.

n46. See Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1416.

n47. Tribe, supra note 8, at 34; see id. at 33-34 (criticizing McCleskey on this ground); cf. id. at 30 (arguing that, in a school desegregation case, even if the Court "would have had no impact on judicial remedies, a judicial proclamation that inner city ghettoization was constitutionally infirm might have avoided legitimating this nationwide travesty").

n48. See id. at 38 (explaining that modernism teaches that "we can see more than we can do," but that "this does not mean that we should lie about what we see").

n49. Cf. Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 767 (1984) (Brennan, J., dissenting) (accusing the Court of manipulating standing to disguise a decision on the merits); Dan M. Kahan, The Secret Ambition of Deterrence, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 413, 428-35 (1999) (describing the use of deterrence-based arguments as a rhetorical strategy to pacify debates and to mask ideological preferences).

This observation does not mean that courts regularly use doctrinal manipulations to achieve desired substantive outcomes, but the threat that courts might do so nonetheless exists. For example, a skeptical observer of ex post facto doctrine could suggest that the Court has manipulated the required level of particularity to make relief more difficult to obtain: when particularized harm is easier to prove, the Court requires general systemic harm; when general systemic harm is easier to prove, the Court requires particularized harm. Compare Seling v. Young, 121 S. Ct. 727, 734-35 (2001) (requiring that "punitiveness" for ex post facto purposes be determined facially - that is, systemically - and finding that the defendant's particularized showing was insufficient), with Garner v. Jones, 120 S. Ct. 1362, 1370 (2000) (requiring a claimant to "show that as applied to his own sentence the law created a significant risk of increasing his punishment").

n50. See generally David C. Baldus, George Woodworth, David Zuckerman, Neil Alan Weiner & Barbara Broffitt, Racial Discrimination and the Death Penalty in the Post-Furman Era: An Empirical and Legal Overview, with Recent Findings from Philadelphia, 83 Cornell L. Rev. 1638, 1658-62 (1998) (citing U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Death Penalty Sentencing: Research Indicates Pattern of Racial Disparities (1990), which surveyed twenty-eight statistical studies and found strong evidence of race-of-the-victim discrimination but equivocal evidence of race-of-the-defendant discrimination); id. at 1676-1710 (discussing capital sentencing disparities in Philadelphia from 1983 to 1993).

The requirement of particularized harm is of special concern in equal protection cases today as social mores have largely driven racial animus underground, making discrimination far more likely to occur surreptitiously. <=7> n6 This problem is exacerbated in the criminal justice context, in which government actors often wield vast amounts of discretion - discretion that allows those who discriminate to mask their [*2099] impermissible motives. <=8> n7 Ironically, the harm that particularized inquiries are thus most likely to overlook is one that is especially damaging to the legitimacy of the law: systemic racial discrimination in the administration of criminal justice.

This Note examines the reasons for and the ramifications of a new equal protection perspective that would recognize not only traditional particularized harms, but also risks - uncertain, probabilistic representations of traditional harms. <=9> n8 Rather than ignoring risk as an unremediable possibility of harm, the new paradigm would view risk as a harm in itself. <=10> n9 A constitutional risk perspective would not necessarily change any underlying values or normative goals of the legal system, but it would enhance the law's ability to recognize a set of harms hidden by the current paradigm of particularity. It would allow a reassessment of "the legal significance of discrete, isolated decisions that are susceptible to a non-racial explanation when considered individually, but reveal a pattern clearly shaped by racial sentiment when considered en masse." <=11> n10

Part I summarizes the traditional requirement of particularity: its underlying reasons, its costs, and its effect on racial discrimination claims related to sentencing, prosecution, and policing. A brief examination reveals that the particularity requirement unnecessarily causes courts to ignore statistical data and to fail to remedy systemic discrimination. Part II conceptualizes a regime of constitutional risk and addresses the difficult problem of providing an appropriate remedy. In a regime that recognized risks as harms, defendants could make claims for less than certain, probabilistic harms, so delineating proper remedies would therefore be crucial to prevent a collapse of the system. Part II argues that guidelines for the exercise of discretion may create the right balance between security against discrimination and practical flexibility. Part III discusses the possibilities for a constitutional risk regime and suggests areas for further research.

[*2100]

I. The Particularity Requirement

Equal protection doctrine generally requires both a particularized actor and a particularized harm: a litigant must prove not only that a government actor was motivated by a discriminatory purpose, <=12> n11 but also that the discriminatory act affected the outcome of his case. <=13> n12 The Court has adhered rigidly to these particularity requirements, inducing some commentators to describe the doctrine as limiting equal protection violations only to cases in which a government official is "out to get" an individual based on impermissible grounds. <=14> n13 Except in a few select areas, <=15> n14 statistical evidence rarely furnishes a basis for a successful equal protection claim. <=16> n15

A. The Reasons for Particularity

n51. See Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1402 ("As far as reported cases disclose, no defendant in state or federal court has ever successfully challenged his punishment on grounds of racial discrimination in sentencing." (emphasis omitted)).

n52. McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 291 n.7 (1987). The empirical validity of racial disparities in sentencing has been a matter of ongoing controversy, but suspicions of racial discrimination in capital sentencing are not new. In Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), several Justices, including the dissenting Chief Justice Burger, all expressed concerns about racial discrimination in capital cases. See id. at 257 (Douglas, J., concurring) (blaming standardless statutes for the discriminatory imposition of the death penalty); id. at 310 (Stewart, J., concurring) ("If any basis can be discerned for the selection of these few to be sentenced to die, it is the constitutionally impermissible basis of race."); id. at 364 (Marshall, J., concurring) (stating that, "while the higher rate of execution among [blacks] is partially due to a higher rate of crime, there is evidence of discrimination"); id. at 389 n.12 (Burger, C.J., dissenting) (acknowledging disparities).

n53. McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 297.

n54. 426 U.S. 229 (1976) (requiring discriminatory intent for equal protection claims).

n55. McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 292 (emphasis added) (citations omitted) (quoting Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 608 (1985)).

n56. Id. at 292-93.

n57. Lower courts' treatment of racial disparities in capital sentences for rape prior to Coker v. Georgia, 433 U.S. 584 (1977), which abolished the death penalty for rape, further demonstrates the legal culture of particularity. See, e.g., Maxwell v. Bishop, 398 F.2d 138, 146-47 (8th Cir. 1968) (Blackmun, J.) (focusing on the aggravating factors in the particular case and downplaying statistical disparities); State v. Mayo, 87 So. 2d 501, 503 (Fla. 1956) (denying relief despite statistics showing that over a twenty-year period only one white man but twenty-three black men were sentenced to death for rape). See generally Marvin E. Wolfgang & Marc Riedel, Rape, Racial Discrimination and the Death Penalty, in Capital Punishment in the United States 99, 107-18 (Hugo Adam Bedau & Chester M. Pierce eds., 1976) (discussing empirical findings of racial disparities in capital rape sentencing from 1945 to 1965).

Despite the culture of particularity, the disturbing ramifications of statistical studies became increasingly apparent to jurists in the early 1960s. See Arthur J. Goldberg, Memorandum to the Conference: Re: Capital Punishment, October Term 1963, 27 S. Tex. L. Rev. 493, 504 n.17 (1986); see also Michael Meltsner, Cruel and Unusual: The Supreme Court and Capital Punishment 28-29 (1973). In fact, although Coker was ultimately decided on Eighth Amendment grounds and did not address racial concerns, such considerations were clearly in the background. See McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 332 (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("Although the [Coker] Court did not explicitly mention race, the decision had to have been informed by the specific observations on rape by both the Chief Justice and Justice Powell in Furman.").

n58. McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 291 n.7.

n59. See, e.g., Stephens v. State, 456 S.E.2d 560, 562 (Ga. 1995) (discounting racial disparities among prosecutorial requests for life sentences for repeat drug offenders due to the potential presence of other permissible explanatory factors). See generally Developments in the Law - Race and the Criminal Process, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1472, 1630-35 (1987) [hereinafter Developments] (tying disparities in noncapital sentencing to discriminatory parole board decisions). A well-known controversy about racial disparities in noncapital sentencing involves the Sentencing Guidelines' treatment of crack versus powder cocaine. David A. Sklansky, Cocaine, Race, and Equal Protection, 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1283 (1995). The crack/powder cocaine issue, however, is different from the one addressed in this Note. This Note addresses racial disparities that remain after regression accounts for possible race-neutral factors, while the other inquiry focuses on a disparate impact argument that disregards whether race may be merely correlated with a particular race-neutral trait (for example, crack cocaine use).

n60. See infra Part II.

n61. McCleskey v. Kemp, 753 F.2d 877, 927 (11th Cir. 1985) (en banc) (Clark, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("The societal imperative of maintaining a criminal justice system ... would outweigh the mandate that race or other prejudice not infiltrate the legal process."). Judge Clark's dissent, however, distinguished capital sentencing, in which any racial discrimination was impermissible, from noncapital sentencing, which was subject to this pragmatic consideration. See id.

n62. See id.

n63. See Randall Kennedy, Race, Crime, and the Law 354 n. (1997) (arguing that no American court has ever found a prosecutor to have engaged in racially selective prosecution). Concededly, besides the one in Armstrong, statistical studies for discriminatory prosecution have thus far been relatively unsophisticated and episodic. See, e.g., U.S. v. Figueroa-Rocha, No. CR-94-20103-JW, 1995 WL 253050, at 3 (N.D. Cal. April 27, 1995) (addressing raw numerical disparities in the enforcement of an immigration law); see also Angela J. Davis, Prosecution and Race: The Power and Privilege of Discretion, 67 Fordham L. Rev. 13, 55-56 (1998) (implying that a rigorous statistical study would be necessary for credible evaluation of prosecutorial practices). Given the high cost of such studies and the Court's unwillingness to rely on them even in death penalty cases, such a result is unsurprising.

n64. See McAdams, supra note 32, at 616 n.55.

n65. See, e.g., Butler v. Cooper, 554 F.2d 645, 647 (4th Cir. 1977) (denying relief despite studies showing that eighty-four percent of persons arrested for violating liquor laws were black in a county with only a thirty-three percent black population). But cf. State v. Kennedy, 588 A.2d 834, 840-41 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1991) (allowing statistical disparities to establish a colorable claim of discrimination and thus permitting discovery).

n66. 517 U.S. 456 (1996).

n67. Id. at 458-59.

n68. Id. at 459-61.

n69. Id. at 465.

n70. Id. at 470.

n71. Racial profiling remains a controversial issue, and a number of commentators deny its constitutionality. See Pamela S. Karlan, Race, Rights, and Remedies in Criminal Adjudication, 96 Mich. L. Rev. 2001, 2006-07 (1998) (suggesting that the use by many police departments of statistical profiles in which race is a factor is likely unconstitutional). The difficulty of determining the constitutionality of racial profiling is closely linked to the difficulty posed by disparate impact theories. See supra p. 2103. To the extent that certain minority groups may on average commit a greater percentage of certain crimes, profiling is strictly speaking "rational," but other societal values may make such stereotyping impermissible or undesirable. Cf. Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410 (1991) (rejecting the use of race as a proxy for bias in the peremptory challenge context). See generally Kennedy, supra note 63, at 136-67 (discussing the rationality, but undesirability, of using race as a proxy).

n72. See David A. Harris, "Driving While Black" and All Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops, 87 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 544, 561-69 (1997) (detailing studies in Florida, Maryland, Illinois, and Colorado).

n73. 517 U.S. 806 (1996).

n74. See id. at 810, 813 (acknowledging the danger of racially discriminatory pretextual searches but holding that the applicable provision is the Equal Protection Clause, not the Fourth Amendment).

n75. 461 U.S. 95 (1983).

n76. Id. at 105-06; see also id. at 111-12 (cautioning judicial restraint when interfering with state law enforcement in the absence of a substantial risk of irreparable injury). The Court has applied similar principles to discriminatory prosecution. See O'shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 495-99 (1974).

n77. See Herskovits v. Group Health Coop. of Puget Sound, 664 P.2d 474, 481, 485-86 (Wash. 1983) (Pearson, J., concurring); see also Nozick, supra note 26, at 75-77 (discussing various methods of compensating risk); cf. Joseph H. King, Jr., Causation, Valuation, and Chance in Personal Injury Torts Involving Preexisting Conditions and Future Consequences, 90 Yale L.J. 1353, 1364 (1981) (advocating "[a] more rational approach ... [that] would allow recovery for the loss of the chance of cure even though the chance was not better than even").

n78. See Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 884-87; cf. John Fabian Witt, Toward a New History of American Accident Law: Classical Tort Law and the Cooperative

First-Party Insurance Movement, 114 Harv. L. Rev. 690, 701-04 (2001) (recounting the changes in the law of unintentional torts that resulted from statistically inevitable industrial accidents).

n79. By conceiving of risks as harms, the law must, as a practical matter, deal only with "substantial" risks to prevent an explosion of claims. See Herskovits, 664 P.2d at 476 (suggesting that courts may need to limit recovery to "significant" risks). The line between "de minimis" risks and "substantial" risks is drawn as a matter of policy, just like the one delimiting "proximate" cause. See Palsgraf v. Long Island R.R. Co., 162 N.E. 99, 103 (N.Y. 1928) (Cardozo, C.J.); Nozick, supra note 26, at 76-77 & n..

n80. See Cass R. Sunstein, Standing and the Privatization of Public Law, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 1432, 1464-66 (1988) (explaining why the question of standing rests substantially on the characterization of the relevant injury).

n81. On a theoretical level, the systemic and aggregative approach of a constitutional risk perspective may also be more consistent with equal protection than is the particularity approach. Although the battle against racism has perhaps traditionally had a more individualistic tone, emphasizing each person as an individual and not as a stereotype, the concept of equal protection itself invites comparisons on a systemwide basis. It invites comparisons among sentences, prosecutions, and traffic stops. It invites an examination of whether justice is equally distributed.

n82. Acknowledging constitutional risks will invariably require greater use and acceptance of statistics, and therefore courts may have to develop greater familiarity with and expertise in this area. As in other fields, however, the use of statistics and probability should be unremarkable. In the natural sciences, scientists often resort to statistics and probability to describe the physical world when a system becomes too complex to model using cause and effect relationships. Described by some as a "mathematical theory of ignorance," when one cannot follow the behavior of every particle or actor in a system, science settles for describing it holistically through the use of statistics. See Morris Kline, Mathematics in Western Culture 340-58 (1953).

n83. See Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 166 (1803).

n84. See Karlan, supra note 71, at 2029 (suggesting that the problems regarding equal protection and the criminal justice system are "as much about remedies as about rights").

n85. Reversal remedies, however, are inappropriate for constitutional risks because the harm involved is systemic and therefore will persist even in a retrial.

n86. See, e.g., McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 348 (1987) (Blackmun, J., dissenting). But see United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 461 n.2 (1996) (noting that the Court has not yet ruled on the appropriate remedy for discriminatory prosecution).

n87. See, e.g., Akhil Reed Amar, Sixth Amendment First Principles, 84 Geo. L.J. 641, 646 (1996).

n88. See Karlan, supra note 71, at 2005 (suggesting that concerns about the dismissal remedy led the Court to use the intent standard to eviscerate equal protection doctrine in the area of selective prosecution).

n89. For a general discussion on the usefulness of granting windfalls to private attorneys general to enforce constitutional provisions, see Daniel J. Meltzer, Deterring Constitutional Violations by Law Enforcement Officials: Plaintiffs and Defendants as Private Attorneys General, 88 Colum. L. Rev. 247 (1988).

n90. Cf. Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 367 n.15 (1981) (Brennan, J., concurring) (acknowledging that if "less than 63 square feet of cell space per inmate were a per se violation of the Eighth Amendment, then approximately two-thirds of all federal, state and local inmates today would be unconstitutionally confined").

n91. See McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 293 (expressing concern that McCleskey's claim "would extend to all capital cases in Georgia, at least where the victim was white and the defendant [was] black"); id. at 314-15 (expressing concern that McCleskey's capital sentencing claim could easily be extended to all other types of penalty); see also McCleskey v. Kemp, 753 F.2d 877, 927 (11th Cir. 1985) (Clark, J., dissenting) (acknowledging that even if racial bias randomly arose in twenty percent of noncapital convictions, federal courts could not realistically strike down all prosecutions).

n92. In the aftermath of McCleskey, Congress considered allowing statistical proof to establish such a presumption in capital sentencing cases, but the bill ultimately failed. See Racial Justice Act of 1989, S. 1696, 101st Cong. 2922(b)(1) (1989); cf. Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 532.300(3), (5) (Michie 1999) (allowing a defendant to use statistics to prove racial discrimination by clear and convincing evidence).

n93. E.g., Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 96-98 (1986) (peremptory challenges); Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 1, 26 (1971) (previously segregated school district); see Sklansky, supra note 59, at 1318.

n94. This problem is one of the reasons that the rule against race-based peremptory challenges under Batson has essentially been eviscerated. See, e.g., United States v. Lorenzo, 995 F.2d 1448, 1454-55 (9th Cir. 1993) (permitting peremptory challenges to three potential jurors with Hawaiian surnames for race-neutral reasons such as lack of attentiveness, financial hardship, and having long hair and a beard); see also Karlan, supra note 71, at 2021 & nn.96-101 (reporting explanations such as weight, handwriting, clothing, and attitude).

n95. Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 624 (Marshall, J., dissenting).

n96. United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456, 465 (1996) (rejecting discovery for, inter alia, its possible chilling effect on law enforcement and its potential to reveal the government's enforcement policy).

n97. Cf. McAdams, supra note 32, at 658 (arguing that discovery is a useful sanction because it is costly to prosecutors and is an intermediate remedy); Anne Bowen Poulin, Prosecutorial Discretion and Selective Prosecution, 34 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 1071, 1090-98 (1997) (arguing for discovery as a form of "soft enforcement"). However, although discovery may impose costs on government actors and deter unconstitutional conduct, it is not a "true" sanction. Unless a reasonable opportunity for ultimate dismissal accompanies discovery, defendants will lack the adequate incentives to bring claims.

n98. See supra note 15.

n99. Karlan, supra note 71, at 2028. Civil damages, the common law remedy for rights violations, seem unhelpful to defendants facing death or incarceration, and defendants also face barriers such as prosecutorial immunity, see Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 431 (1976), and unsympathetic juries, see Karlan, supra note 71, at 2012.

n100. Professor William J. Stuntz suggested this insight in private conversation. Cf. Herskovits v. Group Health Coop. of Puget Sound, 664 P.2d 474, 487 (Wash. 1983) (Pearson, J., concurring) (suggesting a discount of full compensatory damages to reflect the level of risk imposed by the wrongdoer); Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 867 (same). For a related discussion in the context of verdicts, see Michael Abramowicz, A Compromise Approach to Compromise Verdicts, 89 Cal. L. Rev. 231 (2001).

n101. Prosecutors could not overcharge minority defendants to compensate for the sentencing discount, because such overcharging would itself theoretically exacerbate racial disparities that would justify greater proportional compensation in the future.

n102. See Rosenberg, supra note 17, at 881-85.

n103. See Md. Troopers Ass'n v. Evans, 993 F.2d 1072, 1076 (4th Cir. 1993) (stating that courts should employ race-based remedies only as a "last-resort" because "the use of race as a reparational device risks perpetuating the very race-consciousness such a remedy purports to overcome").

n104. Cf. Charles Nesson, The Evidence or the Event? On Judicial Proof and the Acceptability of Verdicts, 98 Harv. L. Rev. 1357, 1382-84 (1985) (explaining how "proportionate awards" may undermine attempts to shape behavior).

n105. Cf. Chayes, supra note 19, at 1292-96 (noting the rise of injunctions and other equitable relief in public law litigation).

n106. Courts could also use a "ratchet-up" injunction to address race-of-the-victim discrimination. See Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1390-91.

n107. Cf. Carol S. Steiker & Jordan M. Steiker, Sober Second Thoughts: Reflections on Two Decades of Constitutional Regulation of Capital Punishment, 109 Harv. L. Rev. 355, 420 (1995) (arguing that a "ratchet-up" is unavailable to enforce equality in capital sentencing because courts cannot compel decisionmakers to impose that penalty).

n108. Presumably, interest groups could take up the mantle, but only if they successfully overcame third-party standing obstacles.

n109. Structural injunctions also implicate concerns about judicial intrusiveness, which often explain the great reluctance of courts to impose them. See, e.g., Robert A. Burt, Disorder in the Court: The Death Penalty and the Constitution, 85 Mich. L. Rev. 1741, 1797-98 (1987) (discussing the McCleskey Court's reluctance to undertake a "wholesale restructuring" of the system); see also Tribe, supra note 42, 16-20, at 1510 (suggesting that the Court's use of the discriminatory intent standard in equal protection cases stems from a "trepidation about embracing the highly intrusive structural remedies that may be required to root out the entrenched results of racial subjugation"). By interfering with prosecutorial decisions, the judiciary meddles in a traditionally exclusive province of the executive branch, see, e.g., Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 364 (1978), and an area in which it is institutionally ill suited to make decisions, see, e.g., Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985). Sentencing may be a more appropriate area for judicial intervention. See Sklansky, supra note 59, at 1316 (arguing that criminal sentencing is "close to the core" of the judiciary's competence). But even in the sentencing context it is unclear whether appellate courts are well suited to such fact-based inquiries.

n110. See Kenneth Culp Davis, Discretionary Justice: A Preliminary Inquiry 170 (Illini Books 1971) (1969) ("The power to be lenient is the power to discriminate." (emphasis omitted)). The concern over the link between discretion and discrimination is not new in criminal law. It was a motivating factor for regulating grand jury selection, see Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 496-97 & n.17 (1977), capital sentencing, see Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 188-91 (1976), and federal sentencing more generally, see U.S. Sentencing Guidelines Manual ch. 1, pt. A (2000). Vagueness doctrine arguably also aims at preventing excessive police discretion and its accompanying risk of impermissible classifications. See, e.g., City of Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41, 71-72 (1999) (Breyer, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (expressing constitutional concerns about unlimited police discretion).

n111. See generally H.L.A. Hart, The Concept of Law 124-36 (2d ed. 1994).

n112. See, e.g., Woodson v. North Carolina, 428 U.S. 280, 303-04 (1976) (plurality opinion) (affirming the constitutional requirement of individualized sentencing in the death penalty context); see also Steiker & Steiker, supra note 107, at 381-83 (discussing the tension between discretion and nonarbitrariness in the death penalty context). In fact, a mandatory death penalty may actually exacerbate unbridled jury discretion because it may invite jury nullification. Woodson, 428 U.S. at 302-03.

n113. See, e.g., William J. Stuntz, The Uneasy Relationship Between Criminal Procedure and Criminal Justice, 107 Yale L.J. 1, 7 (1997).

n114. See Vorenberg, supra note 43, at 1562-72.

n115. See Davis, supra note 63, at 35 n.106 (reporting that "Washington is the only state with [statutory prosecutorial] guidelines"). The Sentencing Guidelines constrain sentencing discretion at the federal level, but the same cannot be said for all state sentencing. See Michael Tonry, Twenty Years of Sentencing Reform: Steps Forward, Steps Backward, 78 Judicature 169, 170 (1995) (reporting that, as of 1995, more than twenty states had guidelines).

n116. Cf. McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 365 (1987) (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (advocating the use of "guidelines" for prosecutorial discretion in the death penalty context).

n117. Record-keeping may not be possible, for example, in the jury context, given strongly held traditions regarding the secrecy of deliberations.

n118. Cf. Kolstad v. Am. Dental Ass'n, 119 S. Ct. 2118, 2129 (1999) (allowing an employer to evade punitive damages for workplace sexual harassment if the employer has an antiharassment policy and a grievance mechanism in place).

n119. 430 U.S. 482 (1977).

n120. Id. at 494-95. Although the Castaneda elements create only a presumption of discrimination, id., in the context of multiple actors the presumption is very difficult to refute.

n121. Cf. Sklansky, supra note 59, at 1311 (implying that the Court has largely confined Castaneda to the jury context).

n122. See Castaneda, 430 U.S. at 502 (Marshall, J., concurring) (suggesting

The reluctance of courts to grant relief based on statistical showings of inexplicable racial disparities is not without reasonable basis. The requirement of particularity is closely linked to traditional Enlightenment notions of moral responsibility and free will, and a rush to embrace statistical data could significantly compromise these widely held values. In addition, statistical analyses can be plagued with subtle technical flaws that are difficult to detect. When courts face these concerns as well as the problems of remedy discussed in Part II they are understandably hesitant.

1. Moral Responsibility and Free Will. - The requirement of particularity is not surprising in light of common law causation principles, [*2101] which are binary or mechanistic, <=17> n16 rather than probabilistic. <=18> n17 These principles arise from a Newtonian perspective - every action arises through the will of a free moral actor <=19> n18 - and accord with traditional notions of moral responsibility in the law <=20> n19 and the structure of private law litigation. <=21> n20 Thus, just as tort law requires a plaintiff to show that the defendant more likely than not caused his injury, constitutional law requires a party to show that a government actor's racial animus more likely than not changed the outcome of the case. This understanding of causation creates particularity requirements along two closely related veins: First, the law seeks to blame a specific actor, not societal conditions or the system in general. Second, the law requires that the actor have actually harmed the particular defendant.

The requirement of a particularized wrongdoer manifests itself in the equal protection requirement of purposeful discrimination and in the rejection of statistical proof of harm when a claimant cannot identify a specific wrongdoer. <=22> n21 For example, in McCleskey the Court cited jury uniqueness in denying McCleskey's claim. <=23> n22 Because the jury acted only once, no consistent pattern of racism could be imputed to it. <=24> n23 From the standpoint of individual responsibility, this conclusion makes logical sense - a single point, per se, cannot form a pattern. The systemic result, however, is that discriminatory decisionmakers go undetected, and structural safeguards that could prevent or impede racist decisionmaking are not considered.

The focus on actual harm to the particular defendant bars recovery when statistical studies can demonstrate only a risk of discrimination, not actual discrimination. <=25> n24 This doctrinal rule has normative and practical support. Normatively, denying recovery in the absence of actual [*2102] harm forgives transgressions in which no evil results <=26> n25 - "no harm, no foul." Practically, compensating every risk that government action imposes would involve enormous transaction costs and measurement difficulties and might well lead to an excessive level of rights enforcement and an overly cautious society. <=27> n26 Every government action theoretically harbors some risk of discrimination; to compensate for all such risks would be unmanageable, if not impossible. <=28> n27

The response to these arguments is two-fold. First, it is possible to distinguish between individual actors and the government. Forgiveness is less normatively appealing when applied to the government, especially because racial discrimination seriously undermines the legitimacy of the criminal justice system. Second, the practical difficulties of compensating all risks do not that, at least as of 1977, a statistical disparity and discretionary selection procedures always established a prima facie case of discrimination); Kennedy, supra note 10, at 1427-29 (criticizing McCleskey's distinction of capital sentencing from grand jury selection as "unpersuasive"); see also Developments, supra note 59, at 1552-54 (suggesting a modified version of the scheme proposed in this Note).

n123. See generally David A. Strauss, The Ubiquity of Prophylactic Rules, 55 U. Chi. L. Rev. 190 (1988) (observing that constitutional law is replete with prophylactic rules).

n124. See Lon L. Fuller, The Forms and Limits of Adjudication, 92 Harv. L. Rev. 353, 394-404 (1978) (suggesting that legislatures are the institutions most competent to make decisions that carry multiple and complex repercussions involving many actors). This partnership between courts and state legislatures would parallel the Supreme Court's intervention in capital sentencing in the 1970s. See Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 188-95 (1976) (plurality opinion).

n125. Compare Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 467-68 (1966) (suggesting a safe-harbor procedure that would satisfy Fifth Amendment requirements but encouraging legislatures to develop their own solutions), with Dickerson v. United States, 120 S. Ct. 2326, 2332-36 (2000) (interpreting Miranda as announcing a constitutionally mandated prophylactic rule).

n126. But see Rory K. Little, The Federal Death Penalty: History and Some Thoughts About the Department of Justice's Role, 26 Fordham Urb. L.J. 347, 478-81 (1999) (noting that despite the Department of Justice's elaborate death penalty review process, federal death sentencing exhibits even greater racial disparities than state death sentencing).

n127. If government actors remained undeterred, such records could be used for further litigation. See Harris, supra note 72, at 566 (reporting the statistical evidence of racial disparities that Maryland police generated after a settlement required greater record-keeping of certain traffic stops).

n128. See Strauss, supra note 123, at 196 (suggesting that "clear standards make it easier for a court reviewing the official's action to determine if it was influenced by an impermissible consideration"); cf. Indus. Union Dep't, AFL-CIO v. Am. Petroleum Inst., 448 U.S. 607, 685-86 (1980) (Rehnquist, J., concurring) (describing the need for intelligible principles to facilitate judicial review of administrative decisions).

n129. See Wayte v. United States, 470 U.S. 598, 607 (1985).

n130. For example, the constitutional ban on race-based peremptory challenges established by Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 100 (1986), may be a paper tiger, see supra note 94, but its "shadow effects" arguably have tangible value. Cf. Cass R. Sunstein, Law and Administration After Chevron, 90 Colum. L. Rev. 2071, 2112 (1990) (arguing that clear statement rules and the nondelegation doctrine operate as "second-best surrogates" in light of the "intrusiveness and unwieldiness" of large-scale judicial review).

n131. See, e.g., Wayte, 470 U.S. at 608-09 (1985).

n132. Cf., e.g., McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 314 n.37 (1987) (declaring "discretion essential to a humane and fair system of criminal justice").

n133. See Callins v. Collins, 510 U.S. 1141, 1144 (1994) (Blackmun, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("Experience has taught us that the constitutional goal of eliminating arbitrariness and discrimination from the administration of death can never be achieved without compromising an equally essential component of fundamental fairness - individualized sentencing." (citation omitted)).

n134. Cf. Steiker & Steiker, supra note 107, at 391 (explaining how standardless consideration of mitigating evidence makes discrimination possible in death penalty sentencing).

n135. See McCleskey, 481 U.S. at 313 n.35 (discussing the essential need to balance uniformity and discretion).

n136. See id. at 319 (maintaining that legislatures are the appropriate institutions).

n137. See William J. Stuntz, Substance, Process, and the Civil-Criminal Line, 7 J. Contemp. Legal Issues 1, 15-19 (1996).

n138. Cf. Strauss, supra note 123, at 200-01 (defending Miranda's prophylactic rule as less judicially imperialistic than rigid overbreadth doctrines in the First Amendment context because it allows for legislative alternatives).

n139. For example, instead of courts imposing prophylactic rules, Congress could legislate guidelines that were "congruent and proportional" to the harms involved. Cf. City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 530-33 (1997); Tribe, supra note 42, 16-20, at 1514 n.97 (speculating that McCleskey left room for Congress to regulate, under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, state death penalty procedures that discriminate against racial minorities).

n140. A cursory examination reveals that the idea of constitutional risk may be latent in many areas of constitutional law. For example, one can view overbreadth doctrine and some facial challenges not as redressing actual harm (as in the case of an as-applied challenge), but as removing a risk of constitutional harm from the plaintiff's environment. The same is true for prophylactic rules, which address not constitutional harms ex post, but the risk of future constitutional harms ex ante. See Strauss, supra note 123, at 198-200 (suggesting that levels of constitutional scrutiny are in effect prophylactic rules).

n141. Cf. Richard H. Fallon, Jr., As-Applied and Facial Challenges and Third-Party Standing, 113 Harv. L. Rev. 1321, 1342-56 (2000) (arguing that facial challenge doctrine is not transsubstantive but rather reflects specific doctrinal tests).

require courts to compensate no risks. By compensating some subset of "substantial" risks delineated as a matter of policy, the law can avoid the slippery slope. <=29> n28

2. Flawed Statistical Regressions. - From a practical standpoint, courts may be reluctant to open equal protection doctrine to statistical proof for technical reasons. <=30> n29 One of the most significant criticisms of statistical studies on discrimination is the inability of multiple regressions to account for all race-neutral explanations for racial disparities. Statistically, some crimes or behaviors may be more prevalent among members of certain minority groups; thus statistics showing disproportionate sentencing, prosecution, or policing may not reflect any discrimination at all. <=31> n30 Although regressions account for many race-neutral explanations and are thus more sophisticated than the raw numerical comparisons featured in disparate impact arguments, <=32> n31 regressions [*2103] can never be perfect, and some race-neutral factors may be omitted due to a lack of data. <=33> n32 Historically, courts have cited precisely this possible omission as a reason to disregard statistical showings of racial disparity. <=34> n33

This concern may be valid, but surely parties must do more than speculate about possible flaws to invalidate statistical evidence. The key question is whether the omission of potentially explanatory factors creates sufficient doubt in a study's accuracy to warrant the denial of all relief. Although the omission of variables may affect the probative value of a regression, it should not always render a study entirely inadmissible as evidence of discrimination. <=35> n34 As some statisticians suggest, courts need to consider just how significant a permissible "unknown" factor would have to be to account for the racial disparities observed. <=36> n35 For example, although there may be a five to one racial disparity in traffic stops, it is improbable that blacks are five times more likely to speed or to drive with a broken tail light than whites. <=37> n36

The other major problem with using statistical data in the equal protection context is the question of class definition: how one defines one's statistical sample can affect the results of a study. For example, there may be a racial disparity among murder sentences throughout a state, yet there may be no such disparity in a particular county. Courts do, however, face similar problems in mass-tort class actions as [*2104] well as in statutory discrimination actions, which suggests that this difficulty is manageable. <=38> n37

B. Costs

As already noted, the particularity requirement and its rejection of statistical evidence have substantial costs. The Court's cramped view of constitutional harm forces courts to examine only individual cases, which cannot reveal or redress patterns of racial discrimination. <=39> n38 Considered in isolation, nearly all decisions can be rationalized using permissible explanations; it is only when these decisions are considered in the aggregate that patterns may emerge that indicate the presence of impermissible discrimination. <=40> n39 As a result, the particularity requirement obscures the discriminatory decisions of government actors, making their already broad discretion effectively unreviewable.

It is true that overt discrimination is readily detectable under the traditional particularized harm framework. If a judge overtly relies on race in sentencing defendants to death, or if police departments target motorists because of their race, the discrimination is plain. But the particularized framework, though perhaps effective in past "conquests" <=41> n40 of overt discrimination, is wholly inadequate in a contemporary society in which "discrimination takes a form more subtle than before." <=42> n41 Contemporary mores and legal pressures have altered the appearance of racism. Gone are facially discriminatory statutes and prosecution policies. In their place has arisen a racism cloaked in non-racial explanations. <=43> n42 Thus, despite a facially neutral statute and the absence of an overtly discriminatory enforcement policy, regression [*2105] analysis may still show that, even after accounting for all relevant non-racial factors, minorities are more likely to be arrested, convicted, or sentenced more harshly. The particularity requirement, however, renders courts incapable of recognizing such risk-based harm.

The broad discretion traditionally afforded government actors in investigating, prosecuting, convicting, and sentencing defendants exacerbates the cloaking phenomenon. <=44> n43 Although some discretion is inevitable because of the resource allocation and complex balancing questions involved, <=45> n44 broad discretion facilitates the masking of impermissible motives. Together with the judicial deference that usually accompanies it, such discretion fosters an environment acutely susceptible to discrimination. <=46> n45

Moreover, the failure to recognize statistical evidence and constitutional risks of discrimination legitimizes government structures and practices and thereby inhibits not only courts, but also legislatures from examining them. <=47> n46 By denying the existence of discrimination altogether, courts absolve other "governmental and nongovernmental actors of responsibility for solving these problems" through alternative avenues. <=48> n47 The inability to remedy a harm does not justify the refusal to acknowledge its existence. <=49> n48 Finally, because requiring particularized harm will almost always result in a finding of nondiscrimination, courts can theoretically manipulate the required level of particularity to mask ideological preferences for or against greater equal protection. <=50> n49

[*2106]

C. Effects

A brief survey of equal protection doctrine in sentencing, prosecution, and policing evinces the pervasive culture of particularity and its consequences. Courts have generally declined to award relief on the basis of statistical racial disparities, focusing instead on the particular facts of each case.

1. Sentencing. - Despite various studies showing racial disparities in sentencing, <=51> n50 the bottom line is simple: no court has ever found an equal protection violation on the basis of racial disparities. <=52> n51 Although the reasons for this stark result are complex, the principal decisions leave little doubt that the particularity requirement has played a critical role. For example, in McCleskey, although the Court assumed the validity of the statistical studies arguendo <=53> n52 - thus allowing the discussion to venture beyond surface-level empirical debates - it still denied relief, focusing on the particulars of McCleskey's case. According to the Court, McCleskey could not claim discrimination because he was indeed guilty as charged - he had "committed an act for which the United States Constitution and Georgia laws permit imposition of the death penalty." <=54> n53 Furthermore, the Court emphasized that the corollary of the purposeful discrimination requirement of Washington [*2107] v. Davis <=55> n54 was that "a criminal defendant must prove that the purposeful discrimination "had a discriminatory effect' on him." <=56> n55 McCleskey had "offered no evidence specific to his own case that would support an inference that racial considerations played a part in his sentence," <=57> n56 and thus was not entitled to relief.

The McCleskey Court thus manifested a legal consciousness narrowly focused on particular acts. The statistical studies showing racial disparities in sentencing were discarded as irrelevant to the individualized determination of justice. <=58> n57 Even more telling was the Court's revealing statement in a footnote that "even a sophisticated multiple-regression analysis ... can only demonstrate a risk that the factor of race entered into some capital sentencing decisions and a necessarily lesser risk that race entered into any particular sentencing decision." <=59> n58 In other words, the risk of racial discrimination, in and of itself, was simply not enough.

Defendants claiming racial disparities in noncapital sentencing have fared no better. <=60> n59 After all, if the gravity of capital punishment [*2108] has not moved courts to consider statistical evidence, why would noncapital sentencing? Courts have predictably relied on the particularity requirement to deny discrimination claims, focusing especially on remedial difficulties. <=61> n60 As Judge Clark acknowledged in the lower court's consideration of McCleskey, even if racial bias randomly arose in twenty percent of all convictions, judges could not simply overturn them all. <=62> n61 Without a direct showing of discrimination in a specific case, little could be done. <=63> n62

2. Prosecution. - As in the sentencing context, defendants have rarely, if ever, brought successful claims for racially discriminatory prosecution. <=64> n63 Indeed, defendants have rarely succeeded in making any selective prosecution claim at all. <=65> n64 In denying relief, courts have focused less on a particular defendant's acts (as in the sentencing context) and more on the defendant's inability to show that prosecutors purposefully caused the racial disparities. <=66> n65 Only when the statistical disparities have been outrageous enough to make purposeful discrimination a virtual certainty have courts granted relief.

For example, in the only recent Supreme Court case dealing with alleged racially discriminatory prosecution, United States v. Armstrong, <=67> n66 the defendant argued that black crack-cocaine offenders were [*2109] disproportionately tried under harsher federal laws. <=68> n67 Statistics revealed that every one of the twenty-four federal crack cocaine cases tried by the local federal defenders office involved black defendants, and affidavits suggested that white offenders had been tried only in state court, in which penalties were considerably lighter. <=69> n68 Based on this evidence, the district court granted the defendant discovery of the prosecution's records. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the evidence failed to show that "similarly situated individuals of a different race were not prosecuted," <=70> n69 and thus that the evidence was insufficient to warrant discovery. <=71> n70

3. Policing. - Even if explicit racial profiling were to be found unconstitutional, <=72> n71 similar doctrinal problems would hinder redress of discriminatory police practices. For example, studies report that a disproportionate number of minority motorists are pulled over while acting no differently than their white counterparts. <=73> n72 Despite the danger of facilitating this practice, the Court in Whren v. United States <=74> n73 nonetheless validated pretextual stops and searches of cars under the Fourth Amendment. <=75> n74 In addition, under City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, <=76> n75 to obtain an injunction against a discriminatory police practice, a plaintiff must show a high likelihood that he in particular will be injured again. <=77> n76 Thus, the particularity requirement once again presents a sizeable obstacle to relief for targeted groups.

[*2110]

II. Constitutional Risk and the Remedy Problem

The shortcomings of the traditional particularized harm requirement can be ameliorated by a greater focus on and acknowledgment of constitutional risks. Drawing from the mass tort context, this shift can be achieved in two ways: Rather than viewing risk as an irremediable possibility of harm, one can view risk as a remediable harm in itself. <=78> n77 Or, one may presume that, given a large enough population, what is traditionally "only" a risk is statistically certain to materialize into an "actual" harm: <=79> n78 yet because the actual manifestation of harm may be difficult to locate, one may prefer to empower third parties or private attorneys general for enforcement purposes.

These alternatives are essentially two sides of the same coin, but this Note pursues only the first. <=80> n79 Seeing risk as a remediable harm in itself fits well with the current individualistic conception of causation. In addition, by characterizing risk as injury in fact, one can address constitutional risks while avoiding doctrinal standing obstacles. <=81> n80

Conceptualizing constitutional risks as remediable harms would address the racial disparity concerns raised in section I.C. <=82> n81 Greater acceptance of statistical evidence would better enable courts to see potential patterns of discrimination and to assess whether certain aspects of the criminal process are structured appropriately to minimize discrimination. [*2111] At a minimum, a constitutional risk perspective would ensure that courts recognize the problem of discrimination in the criminal justice system. <=83> n82 Even if an effective court-imposed remedy were unavailable, acceptance of statistical evidence in the courts would impress the problem of discrimination on both government actors and the public at large.

Ideally, however, constitutional rights should be enforceable by adequate remedies. <=84> n83 Thus, the principal difficulty with achieving judicial acceptance of the constitutional risk perspective will be finding effective but appropriately cabined remedies. <=85> n84 As the remainder of this Part demonstrates, the traditional remedy for constitutional violations (reversal or dismissal) seems ill suited to address constitutional risks, as does the more activist remedy of a structural injunction. The solution rests instead with tweaking the equal protection right itself to create a requirement of procedural safeguards.

A. Sanctions

1. Dismissal. - Dismissal or reversal <=86> n85 has ordinarily been the remedy used to redress constitutional violations in the criminal process. <=87> n86 A substantial problem with dismissal remedies, however, is the oft-heard complaint that they are windfalls to defendants. <=88> n87 Defendants are freed not because they are innocent, but rather because of some problem in the criminal system itself. For this reason, although equal protection challenges in the criminal law context are perhaps more in need of redress for reasons of legitimacy and justice, they are more difficult to vindicate than those in other contexts. Unlike in other contexts, in which claimants are at least occasionally sympathetic, in the criminal context the claimant is nearly always a convicted [*2112] defendant. Courts therefore unsurprisingly tend to narrow the circumstances under which a defendant can obtain a reversal. <=89> n88

Some might argue that the importance of vindicating equal protection rights in the criminal justice system justifies the social costs of releasing or retrying guilty defendants. Because defendants have the greatest incentive to monitor the system, they are needed as private attorneys general to deter state actors from unconstitutional behavior. <=90> n89 Nevertheless, the suitability of a private-attorney-general system in the constitutional risk context does not necessarily follow from its acceptance in the traditional context of proven, particularized discrimination. The right-remedy gap is even more pronounced when the harms suffered are constitutional risks - traditional harms discounted by probability. If dismissal for racially motivated prosecution of an otherwise guilty bank robber is already disproportionate, then dismissal when there was only a risk of racially motivated prosecution is even more problematic.

Constitutional risk presents an even more serious problem for dismissal remedies. Unlike the traditional particularized harm regime, a constitutional risk regime cannot limit dismissal to a small class of defendants. Because constitutional risk acknowledges a systemic problem, it would make dismissals available to all future defendants, calling into question the entire criminal justice system. <=91> n90 This kind of wide-ranging reductio argument weighed heavily in McCleskey. <=92> n91

2. Rebuttable Presumptions. - One solution to the dismissal problem would be to allow constitutional risks to create a rebuttable presumption of constitutional infirmity. <=93> n92 When a defendant demonstrates [*2113] an otherwise inexplicable racial disparity, a constitutional violation would be presumed unless the government could produce a neutral explanation for its behavior. Such presumptions have often been used in the jury selection and school segregation contexts. <=94> n93 Critics may argue, however, that such rebuttable presumptions create costly burdens on law enforcement and prosecutors given their limited resources, especially if the collection of statistical and other data justifying racial disparities is costly and difficult.

In addition, a rebuttable presumption still presupposes the existence of a particularized wrongdoer who can provide a race-neutral explanation. In the criminal justice system, such explanations are often unavailable. For example, jury deliberations are strictly confidential, making an allegation of racial discrimination impossible to rebut. In these instances, the rebuttable presumption would be no different than dismissal.

On the flip side, small sample sizes make race-neutral explanations impossible to refute. Even if juries had open deliberations, they still convict and sentence only once, and individual prosecutors try few cases with similar factual situations. In such circumstances, these actors can easily rationalize potentially discriminatory conduct by giving race-neutral explanations. <=95> n94 Rebuttable presumptions would therefore fail to remedy the constitutional risk.

3. Discovery. - Another alternative would be to grant discovery requests by defendants who raise plausible statistical claims, but to leave the burden of proof on them. "Most of the relevant proof in selective prosecution cases will normally be in the Government's hands," <=96> n95 so discovery will provide additional data for defendants seeking to satisfy the traditional requirement of discriminatory purpose. Armstrong, of course, rejected precisely this discovery remedy, <=97> n96 but that decision arguably rested on the Court's particularized view of harm: because Armstrong had proven no harm in his particular case, [*2114] he was not entitled to discovery. Were the Court to recognize constitutional risk as an actual harm, one could imagine the Court being more inclined to grant a discovery "sanction." <=98> n97

Although granting discovery on the basis of constitutional risk would be an improvement over the present Armstrong doctrine, discovery too suffers from reliance on particularized wrongdoers. Discovery is only useful to defendants if the information discovered can prove intent, but short of finding the proverbial "smoking gun," discovery will likely provide only more statistical data, and little will be gained. And as precedent suggests, only in extreme cases will courts infer intent solely from statistical disparities. <=99> n98

4. Proportional Remedies. - Within the realm of compensatory remedies, constitutional risk faces a dilemma. On the one hand, it is unclear what remedy other than dismissal or a sentence reduction would provide sufficient incentive for a defendant "to ferret out racial discrimination." <=100> n99 On the other hand, dismissal is an overly generous remedy for constitutional risk. Constitutional risk varies by degrees - the harm inflicted depends on the magnitude of the risk. Dismissal, however, is a binary remedy - either a defendant escapes conviction or he does not. Dismissal is thus a windfall because it cannot be discounted to fit varying levels of harm.

This mismatch between harm and remedy exists at most stages of the criminal process: decisions to prosecute, convict, or sentence to death are all binary. But at some stages, such as noncapital sentencing, differences of degree do exist, theoretically allowing courts to discount for uncertainty. As in the tort context, courts could discount what would otherwise be full compensation by awarding proportional remedies. <=101> n100 More specifically, if a statistical study (having sufficiently accounted for all nonracial explanatory factors) were to demonstrate [*2115] that the average black defendant received a twenty-five percent greater prison sentence for a particular crime than did the average white defendant, then courts could simply reduce a black defendant's sentence by twenty-five percent. Because all black defendants could prove this risk, they would all receive the twenty-five percent reduction. No overdeterrence or windfall would result, <=102> n101 and the compensation would be directly proportional to the imposed risk. <=103> n102 Courts might

REV_00258677

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Racial Profiling [Folder 1] [2]

OA/NARA#: 1652/1520
9603

Box _____

Folder 50-11

1ST ITEM of Level 1 printed in FULL format.

Copyright (c) 2001 University of Michigan Law School Michigan Journal of Race & Law

Fall, 2001

7 Mich. J. Race & L. 135

LENGTH: 11038 words

SPEECH: THE PROFILING OF THREAT VERSUS THE THREAT OF PROFILING

Frank H. Wu*

* Associate Professor of Law and Director of the Clinical Center, Howard University Law School. B.A. 1988, Johns Hopkins University; J.D. 1991, University of Michigan Law School. This speech was presented on April 2, 2001 at the University of Michigan Law School as part of the Michigan Journal of Race & Law's Speaker Series.

SUMMARY:
... Second, I would like to talk about the racial profiling that was used in this case. ... The nature of the problem is this: Racial profiling - that is the use of race by the government in its law enforcement - can be rational but wrong. ... So for those individuals who claim that they would like to follow the words of the late Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. when he said that he had a dream that we not be judged by the color of our skin but by the content of our character, those individuals who profess their faith in those inspirational words cannot then turn around and say "But I make an exception and engage in rational discrimination when it suits me. ... If you look at the cases in which the plenary power doctrine is created, where the court approved of the Chinese Exclusion Act, the court is very forthright in cases that remain good law, that haven't been overruled in saying "Here we're dealing with an obnoxious race - one that does not assimilate." ... This sounds a lot like affirmative action opponents who are frustrated by a race conscious remedy being used to compensate for past racial discrimination. ...

TEXT:
[*135]

You know I suppose it's only because I'm a law professor that I take joy in coming back to this room where thirteen years ago as a first year law student I sat where you now sit in the afternoons for my course on Public Law. I'm glad to be back and I am very happy to be here to talk to you about some very important issues that I think affect all of us and affect our legal system, whether or not we're Asian American, whether or not we're racial minorities.

Law professors, as you know, always like to make three points when they talk. So I am going to make three points this afternoon in discussing the Wen Ho Lee case. First, I would like to give you a very brief summary of this spectacularly failed federal criminal prosecution. Second, I would like to talk about the racial profiling that was used in this case. Third, and finally, I would like to

What this means is that in year three this rational discriminator, the police chief, behaving rationally, might decide to allocate 90% of law enforcement resources to African Americans. Well, it doesn't take long for you to understand that the more extreme racial profiling is, the more it justifies itself. If you devote 100% of your law enforcement efforts targeted toward African Americans - unless people who are not African American bizarrely just decide to turn themselves in for committing a crime - you will have a pool of people who is arrested, prosecuted, and incarcerated that is or approaches 100% African American. In other words, if you have perfect racial profiling it will appear to have entirely justified itself.

Now, the reason I've walked you through this exercise using these numbers is to show you how easily this escalates; how easy it is to create the illusion that a policy is rational when it's applied to a racial minority group. That is what we have going on in the Wen Ho Lee case where you initially make the assumption that there is some greater likelihood that someone who is of Chinese background will commit espionage for China, so you investigate people of Chinese background.

Well, it doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that if the only people you investigate are Chinese American, if those are your only suspects, then the people you prosecute and ultimately find guilty are also likely to be Chinese American, regardless of whether or not they were actually guilty.

6. Racial Profiling Creates Negative Incentives

The sixth and final reason racial profiling is problematic is because of the incentives it creates for society as a whole. Racial profiling has a corrosive effect as Randall Kennedy has noted. <=26> n25 Let me make this as concrete as possible: let us say that we adopt the same mode of analysis that rational discrimination asks us to adopt. Let's say each of us behaves as the perfect rational actor, okay, and our morality is judged merely by cost benefit analysis, by what's utilitarian from our perspectives and we do what will result in the greatest benefit and the least cost to us. We maximize our own happiness, for that is what the rational discriminator does. [*148] He says, "Well, it's rational for me to discriminate, therefore I'm going to do so." It's a racial tragedy of the commons.

What happens now if everyone who is African American and male behaves rationally in this regime? If they face rational discrimination, what is rational behavior? Well, rational behavior for the African American male is to be a criminal. It's rational behavior because if they are not a criminal, of course they don't get any of the benefits of being a criminal. They don't get the loot that they might steal. They don't get the cachet that accompanies being bad. They don't get all the other good things that you get from a life of crime. Yet, what do they suffer? They suffer all the costs. They suffer the stigma associated with criminality. They suffer being picked up by police, not being able to apply for jobs, not having cabbies pick you up.

Not having a cabbie pick you up, well, that by itself doesn't seem like anything unless you understand that that's just one incident, one small sign of a larger pattern.

So, if you are African American and male and you face this prejudice, the smartest thing for you to do, if all you're doing is behaving rationally, is to conform to the stereotype.

Likewise, in the Wen Ho Lee case, the most rational behavior for an Asian American who works for the federal government, who is believed to be engaged in espionage, is in fact to engage in espionage. After all, if you're going to be suspected of it and bear the burden why be innocent of it?

All right, I make this point which I hope is a little provocative to point out that mere rationality by itself is not a sufficient basis to provide a principle by which an individual can live, much less a principle by which a government would act.

So, for all of these reasons, the rational discrimination or racial profiling - call it what you will - that the government engaged in the Wen Ho Lee case is something we should condemn.

III. Asian American Activism

Now, let me turn to my third point - Asian Americans and activism in this case - because here too I think Asian Americans made a mistake. I say this as someone who is Asian American, who is an activist, who has worked with the individuals who are active on this case. The mistake they made is this: if you look at some of the quotes from Asian American leaders, or if you listen to the discussion within Asian American communities about the Wen Ho Lee case, especially within the Chinese American community, what you hear people saying is something like this: "Dr. Lee is not like drug dealers. He is not like people who are accused of those [*149] sorts of crimes." <=27> n26 I'm paraphrasing but that's roughly what one leader told the New York Times.

What's troubling about that is that it suggests that Dr. Lee is the good racial minority, not the bad racial minority. What's implicit in this is the notion that he was presumed guilty until proven innocent. What was wrong with the selective prosecution and the double standard here was its application against a respectable elderly Ph.D. holder who did research, who was Asian, and implicit in the comparison with drug dealers is the notion that he is not like African American males - young men, thugs, more dangerous felons. That's what's horrible about this, is the notion that he was treated the way that African Americans are treated on a daily basis. That's what's troubling about this activism; the failure to recognize that this is the same problem as driving while Black but with a different face put on it. Not only did Asian American activists not recognize but they actively sought to disassociate themselves from these other issues rather than build bridges and form coalitions so that groups together could condemn racial profiling.

Moreover, what else was interesting here is that as we talked about this case as a society, people made the following defense of the government: that none of the people involved were racist; they weren't bigots. It's not as if they were members of the KKK, although there were suspicions that one of the individuals who pursued Dr. Lee was someone who did have some problems with race based on a pattern of prior conduct. This person, who was White and male, had been involved in at least one lawsuit where an African American working with him as a colleague had sued, alleging that he had created a hostile work environment, and settled the case for several tens of thousands of dollars. There was some other evidence suggesting that this one individual may have had some racial animus toward Dr. Lee, that he had made some statements suggesting that no person of

Chinese descent could be trusted. <=28> n27

Nonetheless, for the most part, I think we can agree that the prosecutors who were involved - that the Department of Energy, that the Secretary of Energy, Bill Richardson, himself the highest ranking Hispanic in the federal government and someone who has spoken movingly about his own Hispanic background and having faced racial bias, and the U.S. attorney, who ultimately had responsibility for this case and who himself was Asian American - that these are people of good faith.

It's important to understand, though, that just as rationality doesn't excuse anything, neither does good faith. It is possible to engage in rational discrimination while sincerely believing that you are not a racist; while sincerely believing that all you're doing is relying on rational processes and [*150] facts. That's what's especially troubling about this form of racial bias: it's a form of racial bias that we don't recognize because we're prone to say "Well, it's true." We accept the defense of truth without asking why it is that something true of an abstract group should also be extended to cover individuals simply on the basis of race. We accept, all too easily, the notion that mere rationality is sufficient.

IV. Conclusion

So let me close then finally on this thought: that in order to understand the Wen Ho Lee case, in order to understand racial profiling, we must look at what we learned in constitutional law that every first year law student knows: the strict scrutiny test. Strict scrutiny means that it is not enough to accept only rationality, that we must, when race is involved, give strict scrutiny to the actions of the government. When we give the actions of the government strict scrutiny, if that standard is to mean anything at all, if it is to mean more than rationality review, than what it must mean is that rationality by itself does not suffice. There must be something more compelling as the ends. There must be narrow tailoring of the means. Strict scrutiny ensures that we will look closely and carefully and examine to make sure that our supposed rationality isn't just a mask and a cover for preexisting racial bias. Only when we learn how to do this, only when we reject merely utilitarian calculuses for a moral understanding of the obligation and guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment, will we be able to prevent other examples of rational discrimination or racial profiling.

Thank you.

APPLAUSE

V. Audience Questions

FRANK WU: I'm happy to take questions. It's rare that you have the opportunity to ask a law professor questions and get a straight answer, as I'm sure you all know.

QUESTION: I have a question. You mentioned that racial profiling provides negative, but rational, incentives for persons being profiled. For instance, an African American being profiled as a criminal might as well receive the benefits of criminal behavior if they are going to be accused anyway. How does this translate to Asian Americans that we often describe as "model minorities?"

FRANK WU: Sure, one of the images of Asian Americans is "Oh, you're so polite" you know, and that sounds like a compliment but all racial stereotypes, even the ones that are complimentary are, I think, suspect, because what is it to be polite? Well, to be polite is to be submissive, deferential, weak, not assertive. You know the last thing you want in your [*151] lawyer, for example, is someone who is polite. You know if you need to hire someone to sue someone, you don't want to hire the most polite person you can find. So sometimes even these positive images can have their negative component just as the images of, for example, African Americans as natural athletes sounds on its face like a compliment but you don't have to go too far beneath the surface to find images of bestiality. The notion that, well, it's just brute strength, it's not individual merit. Or that African Americans are good in certain positions in sports but not as the quarterback or as the coach because that requires much more intelligence.

So, some of these positive stereotypes have negative components. This particular stereotype of Asian Americans as being polite, I think, is also linked to the notion of Asian Americans as perpetual foreigners.

You know what's interesting about the Wen Ho Lee case? Think for a moment about this argument: China tries to recruit spies from among people of Chinese descent, therefore, the U.S. government is entitled to investigate Chinese Americans or people of Chinese descent, selectively. What does that really say? Well, structurally that says a foreign government, through its unilateral actions, can deprive U.S. citizens of their civil liberties. Well, that's absurd. Other than the Japanese American internment, there is no other example that I am aware of, where any court, where any decision maker, has accepted the notion that the actions of a foreign government, with which I have nothing to do, can deprive me, a U.S. citizen, of my constitutional rights.

Yet, with Asians that logic seems to apply because Asians are regarded as somehow foreign, not belonging, not assimilating. You can see this, for example, if you look at all sorts of cases, constitutional cases. If you look at the cases in which the plenary power doctrine is created, where the court approved of the Chinese Exclusion Act, the court is very forthright in cases that remain good law, that haven't been overruled in saying "Here we're dealing with an obnoxious race - one that does not assimilate." I think it's captured very well by a phrase that Asian Americans sometimes hear, especially if they aren't polite and do dissent and are activists. The comment, which is sort of the flip side of the "When are you going home?," is the "If you don't like it here you can go back to where you came from."

Well, I came from the Midwest. You know, well, I came from Cleveland, so I'm not quite sure what that is meant to say, but I think it's meant to say that you're disenfranchised. You don't have a right to articulate your disagreement and if you articulate your disagreement, if you are not willing to accept the terms that are given to you because you are, after all, a guest who is here enjoying privileges and benefits not rights, well then you can just get lost. I often, if I have the privilege to debate something in a more public form, whether it's on a college campus, a t.v. show or a radio show, get fan mail, or more properly hate mail, with that message. [*152] You know: "Go back to where you came from," or asking "Well, what do they do in China?" as if that has anything to do with what I'm talking about.

QUESTION: You mentioned one commentator that tried to distinguish between an Asian American who had a doctorate and the average "driving while Black" victim. I want to be careful not to screw up and make that same separation because I think they're very linked. But as a practical matter as a movement against racial profiling, the "driving while Black" and other racial profiling of Blacks and Latinos seems to cover a wider variety of people on a daily basis, and I'm just wondering as a movement how that movement can include Asian Americans and African Americans.

FRANK WU: Sure, you know if anything, Asian Americans who are outraged at the Wen Ho Lee case are proving to some extent the government's case because their outrage is selective. Right? They're showing ethnic sympathies. And the last thing: one of the points I make to Asian American audiences is, you know, if you claim to be principled and claim to care about civil rights, where are you when there is a protest about "driving while Black?" You can't just suddenly discover the wonderful nature of due process and talk about all these different issues and how you're against police practices when it's someone who looks like you, because it's patently obvious to everyone that you only care, in this moment, for this particular case.And, I think you're right. If anything, it should be exactly the other way around. We should be much more concerned about the stereotyping of African Americans than Asian Americans, at least in this context, because law enforcement is only relatively, rarely targeted at Asian Americans and only when there is a national security issue or only when this image of foreignness comes into play. It's much more often targeted against African Americans, Hispanics, and other people of color. But the way to make people understand, the way to make them sympathetic, is not to attack them. I try not to do that. I try to say "Look, now that you're outraged about Wen Ho Lee, now that there's been a good result there, how about you come out to this rally next week about "driving while Black'? Because if you help other groups when the issue has their face on it, they will then help you. But if you're not going to help them, they're not going to help you and you're never going to be able to show that this is about anything other than raw self-interest."

In order to prevail, I think especially for racial minorities to prevail, the only way is through principle, not self interest. You can't just stand up and say "I care about Wen Ho Lee because of these lofty ideals" if you don't stand for those lofty ideals elsewhere. Because then people realize the real reason you care about Wen Ho Lee is because he is Asian like you and that's the worst message to send. That just confirms this view of racial minorities: sticking up for their own and only their own.

[*153] QUESTION: You mentioned that rational racial profiling and the idea of colorblindness are mutually exclusive. This sounds a lot like affirmative action opponents who are frustrated by a race conscious remedy being used to compensate for past racial discrimination. In the affirmative action context, how do you square this conflict between colorblindness and the need for race conscious pragmatism?

FRANK WU: Right. That is a very good point and that's a very difficult argument to make. Let me attempt to make the argument three different ways.

First, there's a difference between the original wrongdoing and the remedy to the wrongdoing. That is to say, that affirmative action is not the equivalent of chattel slavery. It is not the equivalent of Jim Crow. But, if you believe people who make the argument you're trying to respond to, they would wipe out all distinctions. In fact, that's what the court did in Adarand. <=29> n28 It said that there is no such thing as invidious racial classifications or benign classifications. There are only racial classifications. So if you take that reasoning at face value, if you accept that as saying exactly what its authors say it says and what you intend it to say, then what you're really saying is slavery and affirmative action are the same. You can't distinguish between them.

I think that while that sounds appealing in the abstract, it's just empirically wrong and morally reprehensible - that of course you can distinguish. I don't mean to put words into people's mouths. Take a look at the white papers written by the Regan era Justice Department where they make explicitly this argument. <=30> n29 They argue you can't distinguish between affirmative action and apartheid, and they argue you can't distinguish between affirmative action in Nazi Germany laws that classify people on the basis of whether they are Jewish or not, and you can't distinguish between affirmative action and Jim Crow. <=31> n30 So, my first response is: of course you can. In the abstract you can't if all you ask is the question "Is race involved?" Then I concede to you. You are right. Race is involved in the one case. Race is involved in the other case, but that's abstracting it to such a level that of course it's impossible to distinguish. That's like saying that the master and the slave are in the same position because each is in a relationship where race is involved. So, in the abstract, logically, yes, it is indistinguishable but historically and factually, I think, you can distinguish between a wrong and a remedy. So that's the first argument.

The second argument is that there is a difference, it seems to me, between inferring a person's conduct over which they have some control, [*154] and as to which we should treat everyone as individuals, and a person's status which they occupy as a result, not of their own free will, but just as a result of societal features. I'll explain what I mean. In the Wen Ho Lee case, the inference the government is making is one about conduct. They're inferring that because he is of Chinese descent, therefore he's more likely to betray the United States to China. It is not an inference about what is his status. It's an inference about what his conduct is likely to be. What will he do if offered the opportunity to sell secrets to China?

With affirmative action, it is not an inference about the conduct of Whites or African Americans or anyone else, it is rather an inference about the relative status of these groups and that, if you care about Kantian or these loftier notions of when it's proper to impose consequences on people. The answer is in a Kantian view. You can pose consequences when people out of their own free will have made choices. Otherwise, you can't attach moral consequences to things that people don't have control over. So, I think that distinguishes, if you want to talk in the most abstract philosophical way about these things, distinguishes between affirmative action on the one hand and invidious racial profiling on the other hand.

The third argument is this - and let me be absolutely clear about this - I support affirmative action. I testified in the Law School case on behalf of the student interveners on the defense side for the school. <=32> n31 I have written in favor of affirmative action, testified in favor of it, and done all sorts of things in favor of affirmative action. <=33> n32

I get called sometimes to debate affirmative action on television or go to a college campus to debate it. Whenever that call comes, I try to say no. I try to say no as a supporter of affirmative action. I would like to explain why I try to say no. I try to say no because to have a debate suggests that this is all figuratively black and white. That there is a pro and a con and that there are sound bites and slogans and it's an entertainment. You know you go and you watch and you see how clever and witty the one speaker is compared to the other speaker and you have a winner and a loser. And that seems to me entirely misguided. What we need is not a debate. We need dialogue and then, more importantly than that, we need action. This isn't the sort of thing that you just sit in a classroom and talk about. It's something where you roll up your sleeves and get out there and do something.

But more importantly than that, to debate affirmative action is to make a tremendous strategic mistake. The mistake is this: it is to start with the remedy. If you start with the remedy of course everyone can play on flaws to the remedy and then you're left talking about well, "Should we [*155] abolish this program? Should we amend that program?" The right place to start is with racial discrimination and to have a dialogue about racial discrimination. And then to take action about racial discrimination and to ask not "Should we abolish this program or that program?" but to ask instead "What will we do collectively and individually to address, not just statistical discrimination, not just historic discrimination, not just stuff you read about in books but contemporary day to day racial discrimination that we still see in the gross disparities in life expectancy or infant mortality or employment opportunities or educational outcomes?" How should we address disparities in every aspect of life that we still see in hate crimes such as those committed in L.A., Chicago, and Pittsburgh in the past two years in which gunmen have targeted people who are racial and ethnic minorities; shot at, wounded, and killed many of them for no reason other than the color of their skin? <=34> n33

The way to frame this, the way to talk about this, is to change the question, to have a new paradigm where we ask "What will we do?" And when we ask that, then it becomes apparent that affirmative action is just a means to an ends and affirmative action, I think that all supporters would agree, isn't perfect. It is not the best way to solve these problems. Ideally, there would be some other way to solve these problems. But it may be as the Bowen and Bok study showed of affirmative action with respect to colleges. <=35> n34 It may be the only way. If you don't take race into account, you just can't address racial problems. So that's what's different.

With affirmative action if you say, "Let's not take race into account" that's all affirmative action is: taking race into account in high stakes choices and decision making about who gets into this law school, for example. Then what you're doing is eliminating the very fact the problem is based on but not the problem itself. To do that would be like saying the way to cure cancer is we're just going to become cancer-blind. You know, that would be the equivalent of being color-blind; we're just going to deny that there is cancer and that will take care of the problem. Well, that, I think, is simply absurd and most people would agree. So there is a pragmatic argument.

So, I've given you a very concrete, factual one, an abstract theoretical one and now a pragmatic one that combines both of these which is, maybe, you're right. Maybe it is hard to distinguish, maybe it's almost impossible to distinguish between these cases, but if you don't allow the use of race for affirmative action, you simply end up with, for example, with University of California, Boalt Hall Law School, where you have one [*156] African American in the entire entering class and that's someone who deferred from the year before. <=36> n35

QUESTION: In situations like the information leak here, can't the government always use national security as a compelling justification for racial profiling? With this is in mind, what has the Wen Ho Lee case really changed?

FRANK WU: Right, right. National security is the great magical wand that the federal government gets to wave. When it says "national security" the courts cower in fear and say "Oh well, if it's national security you get to do anything." You know, look at Chief Justice William Rehnquist's book All the Laws But One, <=37> n36 a book published just two years ago, where he argues basically that the internment of Japanese Americans was - he doesn't say it's right but he says that that's just the way that it would have to have been done, and that he doubts that it would be done any differently today. So, I think to some extent you're right, that maybe the government would do these things anyway. You know there's an irony of course to the Wen Ho Lee case, and that is if there was a Chinese spy no one has caught him. You know, they pursued the wrong man, they wasted all these resources, so they didn't even advance the interests of national security. If you look at what the government's case was - by the time it was filed and it had indicted Wen Ho Lee, its case had nothing to do with nuclear warheads with weapons, with design systems. <=38> n37 It only had to do with mishandling data, and government witnesses testified that their case had nothing to do, no connection whatsoever, with the original investigation that was undertaken. It's sort of like Whitewater. You know, transforming into something else completely. So Wen Ho Lee was pursued for something unrelated to what he was initially investigated for.

So, as far as national security goes, I'm in favor of national security just like everyone else. I'm a loyal American. I don't want to see the country overrun or China bombing the U.S. or Washington, D.C., but the problem here is national security is just invoked and no relationship is shown between national security - this wonderful goal that we all agree with - and prosecuting and pursuing this particular person on the other hand.

Let me just make a quick point about words and then I'll answer your question. There is something very interesting in the designation of Wen Ho Lee as the Chinese spy. You know that's an ambiguous phrase that was used in headlines all the time because Chinese spy doesn't make it clear: Is it someone who is spying for China or is it someone who is ethnically [*157] Chinese? <=39> n38 You know you could be a Chinese spy that is working for the Chinese government and not be of Chinese background at all. In fact, the recent revelations about the worst spy scandal in U.S. history that we've been reading about for the past couple of weeks involved someone, who, it's not clear what he was motivated by, but he wasn't motivated by ethnic ties. <=40> n39 You know it's not as if it was just ethnicity that drove him to spy and perhaps as that case unfolds we'll learn more about it.

Now to answer your question "What will this case do?" I think this case has done two things. First, it has at least galvanized Asian Americans. It has at least made Asian Americans aware of these issues and second, it's made people realize they can win one sometimes. You know it's really remarkable. A year ago everyone figured Wen Ho Lee was this evil, terrible person, you know, who deserved, if not death, at least life in prison, and the only people speaking up on his behalf were cranks, lunatics - people like me. Or people who were thought of as, "Well of course their speaking up for him, they're also Asian like him." And what happened? The government case completely collapsed. A sitting federal judge admonished the Justice Department and said that the case shamed the nation. That rarely happens. So Wen Ho Lee's lawyers did a tremendous job and it shows that if you're persistent, if the facts are on your side, if you can prove a case the way that they were able to prove it, that you can win. And this is not just speculation, it's not just people sitting around and saying it looks like racial profiling. They got the director of counterintelligence who investigated Wen Ho Lee to come forward and say this was racial profiling. You know when that happens justice will be done.

So I think that we can be at least somewhat optimistic. It's a huge mistake for the case to have been brought but at least it resolved itself with an outcome that was right.

So with that I guess we're done and I'm happy to stay and chitchat.

APPLAUSE

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See, e.g., James Risen, Inquires Why Suspect At Atom Lab Kept Access, N.Y. Times, Apr. 23, 1999, at A7.

n2. See Matthew Purdy, The Making of a Suspect: The Case of Wen Ho Lee, N.Y. Times, Feb. 4, 2001, at A1; Matthew Purdy and James Sterngold, The Prosecution Unravels: The Case of Wen Ho Lee, Feb. 5, 2001, N.Y. Times, at A1.

n3. Id.

n4. Id.

n5. See, e.g., James Sterngold, U.S. to Reduce Case Against Scientist to a Single Charge, N.Y. Times, Sept. 11, 2000, at A1.

n6. See Robert Scheer, No Defense: How the New York Times Convicted Wen Ho Lee, Nation, Oct. 23, 2000, at 11, 12.

n7. See id.

n8. See id.; Purdy, supra note 2.

n9. Scheer, supra note 6, at 12.

n10. See, e.g., James Risen, Officials Disagree on How Lab Scientist Became Spy Suspect, N.Y. Times, Oct. 4, 2000, at A1, 24; Scheer, supra note 6, at 18.

n11. See Purdy, supra note 2.

n12. See id; Vernon Leob & Walter Pincus, Guilty Plea, Release Leave Unresolved Questions in Lee Case, Wash. Post, Sept. 17, 2000, at A12.

n13. See David A. Vise, Justice Study Faults FBI in Spy Case; Wen Ho Lee Probe too Slow and Sloppy, Report Says, Wash. Post, May 19, 2000, at A1.

n14. See, e.g., Deutch Faces New Security Inquiry, Documents Show, L.A. Times, Sept. 16, 2000, at A1.

n15. See id.; Deutch Seeks Plea Deal in Security Case, L.A. Times, Jan. 19, 2001, at A12; Secrets Weren't Compromised in Deutch Case, Pentagon Finds, L.A. Times, Feb. 2, 2001, at A20.

n16. See 18 U.S.C. 2381 (2001). The statute reads:

Whoever, owing allegiance to the United States, levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason and shall suffer death, or shall be imprisoned not less than five years and fined under this title but not less than $ 10,000; and shall be incapable of holding any office in the United States.

talk about the possibilities for Asian Americans and other racial minorities to engage in principled activism to overcome these unfortunate trends.
[*136]

I. The Wen Ho Lee Case

Let me begin though by summarizing a little bit of this case. You may recall that for more than a year there were spectacular allegations that Wen Ho Lee, a 60-year-old physicist, who had been forced to retire from the Los Alamos National Labs, where research and development work is conducted on our nuclear arsenal, was the so-called "Chinese spy." <=2> n1 This individual, working in the top secret Division X of the Los Alamos Labs, supposedly had downloaded hundreds of pages of top secret data, weapons design information and surreptitiously and illegally passed it on to the communist Chinese government. <=3> n2 For more than a year he sat in solitary confinement, allowed very few visitors, shackled at the hands and feet with a light bulb burning overhead at all hours, and under constant surveillance. He was said to have given away the "crown jewels" of our nuclear arsenal. <=4> n3

This was supposed to have been the worst breach of national security since the Rosenberg case some fifty years ago. <=5> n4 Yet, as quickly as the case against Wen Ho Lee had developed, it then evaporated. The federal government eventually agreed to a plea bargain where Wen Ho Lee was found to be guilty of one count that had nothing to do with espionage but that had to do merely with negligently mishandling data. He was sentenced to time already served. <=6> n5

Now this case was spectacular, not only because of its collapse, but also because of the reasons for its collapse. When the U.S. District Court Judge Parker, a Republican appointee, not a radical on matters of race, approved of the plea bargain, he said from the bench that this case, he thought, shamed the nation; <=7> n6 that the government's prosecutorial conduct here represented overreaching; <=8> n7 that it was overly zealous <=9> n8 and he raised questions about whether or not Wen Ho Lee had been the victim of selective prosecution and double standards. <=10> n9

[*137] Now if you look a little deeper at the case, if you look beyond the surface allegations, you find the sort of smoking gun evidence that you always wish for in trying to prove discrimination cases like this but which is hard to find. For example, Robert Vrooman, a former CIA agent who was the head of counter-intelligence at the Los Alamos Labs, said in public statements and in a sworn affidavit that there was no doubt in his mind that Wen Ho Lee was selected for investigation, in part because of his racial and ethnic background. <=11> n10 This statement, a brave statement to be made by a law enforcement official, is the equivalent of a sheriff or the head of some police department coming forward and admitting to racial profiling and stopping African American motorists on the highway. This was a statement that came from one of the people in charge of the investigation itself, who said that his colleagues, in pursuing this individual, targeted the individual, despite hundreds if not thousands of other leads that were not followed up despite numerous studies that showed that the Department of Energy in its labs had faulty security procedures. <=12> n11 Despite the fact that Wen Ho Lee's own wife worked as an FBI informant, they picked this single person to investigate because they feared that nuclear warhead plans had been lost to China; a claim which some have found not to be credible. <=13> n12

REV_00258679

Id.

n17. See Purdy, supra note 2; Scheer, supra note 6, at 20.

n18. See Gary S. Becker, The Economics of Discrimination (1971).

n19. See Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 615-26 (1986).

n20. See Richard A. Epstein, Forbidden Grounds, 59-78 (1992).

n21. See Clint Bolick, The Affirmative Action Fraud: Can We Restore the American Civil Rights Vision? (1996).

n22. See Dinesh D'Souza, The End of Racism: Principles for a Multicultural Society 245-87, 297, 539 (1995).

n23. Talk Back Live: Wen Ho Lee: Did the Government Mishandle the Case? (CNN television broadcast, Sept. 27, 2000), transcript available at http://www.cnn.com/ TRANSCRIPTS/0009/27/tl.00.html; see also Stuart A. Harrington, Is Wen Ho Lee a Tarnished Martyr?, San Diego Union-Tribune, Oct. 6, 2000, at B7.

n24. See Lisa Lollock, The Foreign Born Population in the United States: March 2000, U.S. Census Bureau Current Population Rep. No. P20-534 (2000); U.S. Census Bureau, Profile of General Demographic Characteristics for the United States: 2000, Table DP-1 (2000).

n25. See Randall Kennedy, Race, Crime, and the Law (1997); Randall Kennedy, Racial Profiling Usually Isn't Racist. It Can Help Stop Crime. And it Should Be Abolished, New Republic, Sept. 13, 1999, at 30.

n26. See James Sterngold, Coalition Fears an Asian Bias in Nuclear Case, N.Y. Times, Dec. 13, 1999, at A1.

n27. See Sterngold, supra note 5.

n28. See Adarand Contractors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200 (1995).

n29. See Office of Legal Policy, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Rep. to the Attorney General, Redefining Discrimination: Disparate Impact and the Institutionalization of Affirmative Action 16 (1987).

n30. Id.

n31. See Grutter v. Bollinger, 137 F. Supp.2d 821 (E.D. Mich. 2001).

n32. See Gabriel Chin et al., Beyond Self-Interest: Asian Pacific Americans Toward a Community of Justice, A Policy Analysis of Affirmative Action, 4 UCLA Asian Pac. Am. L.J. 129, 159 (1996).

n33. See, e.g., Lorraine Forte, Suit Alleges Hale Ordered Shootings, Chi. Sun-Times, Mar. 15, 2000, at 26; Cindi Lash & Gene Collier, Returning to the Scenes of the Crimes, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Apr. 30, 2000, at A19; Jeff Jacoby, Laws Send the Wrong Message, Boston Globe, June 22, 2000, at A25.

n34. See William G. Bowen & Derek Bok, The Shape of the River (1998).

n35. See Jerome Karabel, Commentary, Affirmative Action Had Real Merit; Education: Minority Students Accepted Under the Programs Did As Well As Their Regularly Admitted Counterparts, L.A. Times, July 10, 2000, at B7.

n36. William H. Rehnquist, All the Laws But One (1998).

n37. See, e.g., Purdy, supra note 2.

n38. See Marilyn Rauber, Feds Finally Slap Cuffs on China Nuke-Spy Suspect, N.Y. Post, Dec. 11, 1999, at 3; John Solomon, FBI Shifted China Spy Probe in "98, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Dec. 12, 1999, at A24; Chinese Spy Investigation Shifts to Defense, Associated Press State & Local. Wire, Oct. 19, 2000.

n39. See Philip Shenon, From Dour "Mortician' of F.B.I. To Suspected Russian Superspy, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 2001, at A1.

Independent studies, including one by a congressionally appointed oversight committee, chaired by former Senator Warren Rudman, concluded that the evidence was speculative at best and that there had not even been any breach of our nuclear weapons data and loss of that data. <=14> n13 Nonetheless, Vrooman's stepping forward to say that the target of investigation was targeted because of race is an extraordinary statement, for here you have an admission of selective prosecution by someone working for the prosecution team.

Not only that, there is a clear case of double standards in this case, which is so difficult to prove in most cases. At roughly the same time that Wen Ho Lee was incarcerated, was being deprived of his civil rights, the former Director of the CIA, John Deutch, admitted that he had committed similar transgressions - downloading highly sensitive data onto a laptop computer that was not secured, taking that computer home with him and accessing the World Wide Web and going to various websites, and signing on and downloading data and rendering the data on his laptop - jeopardizing the most highly, confidential, classified information [*138] that the government has, vulnerable to a breach of security. <=15> n14 The same problem with mishandling top-secret data is present as in the allegations against Wen Ho Lee. The difference: Deutch, who also was foreign-born, was not prosecuted. Instead, a cover-up was engaged in by some of his cronies at the CIA - something which was then later revealed, and at the very moment when he otherwise would have pled guilty also to a single count he was pardoned by President Clinton in the final round of pardons before Clinton left the White House. <=16> n15

What's interesting, then, about this case is that while a low level researcher who is a racial minority, who is the only person of Asian descent working in his division at Los Alamos Labs, faces the possibility not just of life imprisonment but of the death penalty, <=17> n16 a White male who is at the top of the establishment, who has committed the same breach, is let off with a slap on his wrist.

We also found out, through the testimony of various people involved with the prosecution of this case as the judge looked into these claims, that there had been this targeting on the basis of race, that the FBI in administering polygraph tests had lied not just to Wen Ho Lee but to the American public. They had said that this individual failed polygraph tests when in fact he had passed them. They had reminded him of the fate of the Rosenbergs, who were sent to their deaths, and tried to coerce out of him a confession, despite his efforts to help them before he realized that he was the target of their scrutiny. <=18> n17 So this was truly an unusual case and it offers a rare glimpse into the activities of law enforcement when it is investigating sensitive matters with racial overtones.

II. Racial Profiling

Let me now turn to the second part of my talk: racial profiling. I approach this topic as someone who believes quite strongly and fervently that Wen Ho Lee was done a wrong, a grievous wrong, by his own government, [*139] and that his lawyers worked a miracle in persuading the prosecution to accept the plea bargain and then the judge, that this wrong had been done. Let me say, though, this: That the responses in explaining what was wrong in the government's conduct have been seriously flawed. So while I agree that the government's conduct was wrong, I'd like to suggest that most of the discussion of this issue has entirely missed the point. That is, those individuals who have tried to criticize the government or defend Wen Ho Lee have misunderstood the nature of the problem.

REV_00258680

The nature of the problem is this: Racial profiling - that is the use of race by the government in its law enforcement - can be rational but wrong. It's important to understand that distinction between whether an act is rational and whether it is wrong. How an action can be both rational yet at the same time wrong, illegal or unconstitutional.

In talking about racial profiling let me make three subpoints. The first subpoint is this: We all do it. The second subpoint is in some instances racial profiling is rational or at least plausible; it passes a common sense test. The third subpoint is rationality is no defense.

A. We All Do It

Let me first talk about all of us engaging in racial profiling. Let me give you some simple examples of the ways in which we engage in racial profiling. We do this, if, for example, we're at the airport and we need to find someone who speaks a foreign language. I'm often traveling and I'm often at airports where there are a large number of Asians. Not Asian Americans but Asian Asians, people not whose ancestors but who themselves are from Asia. Tourists, business people, traveling here in the United States with limited English proficiency and quite often, as is true with tourists or business people from anywhere else, they're lost. They need help. They need to know how to use the telephone or where the bathroom is or how to find their rental car or their friends. Not everyday and not every time I fly, but often enough - two, three, five times a year - some Asian stranger will pick me out of the crowd as I'm walking through an airport and come up to me and start talking to me in Chinese or Japanese or Korean or some other Asian language. They will pick me, in particular, ignoring all the other individuals who walk by who are White or African American.

This is a simple form of racial profiling. They believe that it is much more likely that I, as someone who looks Asian, will have some sort of linguistic understanding; will be able to speak the language or at least muddle through; that I am a better bet for them than someone who is Caucasian or African American, despite the fact that my Mandarin Chinese is that of about a five year old and there are plenty of people who are White or who are African American who can speak Asian languages fluently. Nonetheless, if you had to pick, if you looked at the people [*140] sitting in this audience and asked "Who is most likely to be able to speak Chinese or Japanese or Korean?"; if you had only one person you could pick to help you out, you would have to be willful or obstinate not to pick someone with an Asian face. I make this point because I think it's important to understand the ways in which it's easy to make inferences; the ways in which we rely on race. We rely on generalizations all the time and not all of those are invidious. They can be, but not all of them are.

The point is simply this: That now, in addition to the old fashioned form of racial discrimination, a form of bias which simply seeks to subjugate people, there is another form of so-called rational discrimination and there are people who actually argue in favor of this. You can read the work of Nobel laureate Gary Becker; <=19> n18 you can read Richard Posner's work; <=20> n19 you can look at the work of Richard Epstein in Forbidden Grounds <=21> n20 or that of Clint Bolick, <=22> n21 an advocate against affirmative action, or that of Dinesh DeSouza, <=23> n22 all of who argue that irrational discrimination is wrong and should be avoided because it's inefficient. That is, when people make assumptions that turn out to be wrong for the most part, that's bad. But when people make assumptions that turn out to be right, for the most part, or right more often than not, then it's acceptable. Indeed, it's something we should praise and encourage and avoiding it would be inefficient behavior. We would cease to be rational actors.

This process of making assumptions based on race is the dilemma of the cabbie, who driving through a major city late at night looks at the fare standing at the street corner in the rain and sees that it's an African American male between eighteen and forty-five and passes that person up to pick up the White passenger a block further down the street. It's that sort of behavior which these writers not only condone, but encourage. Because this sort of behavior, they believe, is not intended to subjugate a people. Rather, it is using one trait, that of race, as a proxy for another trait, that of likely status as a felon or a criminal or likely conduct that is a propensity to engage in violent behavior. So they argue this is different than discriminating against a group without a "rational" reason.

B. Rationality of Racial Profiling

Now, in explaining why racial profiling is still wrong, I think it's important for us to understand that sometimes the pro-profiling arguments [*141] at least have a certain surface rationality. That takes me to my second subpoint: The rationality of racial discrimination in some instances. It is not easy to dismiss some of these arguments. For example, though I think that the internment of Japanese Americans during World War II was a tremendous wrong in violation of the Equal Protection Clause, I think it's also difficult to deny that at least it is plausible that Japanese Americans in the time of war might have some slightly greater propensity to be loyal to Japan than the United States, at least as compared to citizens of other racial backgrounds. Now don't misunderstand me here. I am strongly against the internment, against the prosecution of Wen Ho Lee, and against racial profiling of African American motorists as could possibly be - as I hope to explain and as I hope you'll see in a moment. But I'm against it not on the grounds of irrationality and I think that to argue this sort of conduct is irrational and utterly absurd and lacks any factual foundation is to make the wrong argument, because then what happens when you make that argument is you implicitly concede that when there is a rational basis the conduct is justified. You are then vulnerable whenever someone at least has a factual foundation, a plausible basis for a credible argument. They will have trapped you. You failed to have a fallback argument if all you say is this conduct is irrational. Because then you are attacking the very rationality of what someone has to say and engaged in what I would regard as an unwinnable argument about what the facts are rather than a legal argument or a moral argument or an argument over what the principles should be. That takes me to my third subpoint: What is wrong with the prosecution of Wen Ho Lee? What is wrong with racial profiling?

C. What Is Wrong With Racial Profiling?

I would like to give you six arguments as to what is wrong with racial profiling.

1. Attack the Premises

First, there is the easy argument, which is the premises don't obtain - the premises aren't true. In other words, you could accept that where behavior is rational, you should engage in that behavior. But then argue these premises aren't true. It isn't factually true that Japanese Americans are more likely to be loyal to Japan than the United States. Or it isn't true that there is a greater likelihood of that among Japanese Americans than among Whites. Or you could argue there is no reason to suspect that Wen Ho Lee would be more disloyal to the United States as a naturalized citizen from Taiwan than someone similarly situated who is White and native born.

[*142] You could contest the premises and that is an important argument to have. You should have that argument. But sometimes that argument is vulnerable. The Wen Ho Lee prosecution is vulnerable because there is at least some evidence that the government of China targeted, in its recruitment of potential spies and potential informants and sources of information, people of Chinese ancestry. So that allows the government to say "Well we're merely being defensive. We don't want to stereotype. We don't want to be racially biased. We don't want to be prejudiced, but after all, if the Chinese government is doing this we're only playing defense. We're only responding to what someone else is doing." This is the argument that was made by a former army intelligence officer who I debated on CNN, for example. He argued that if the Chinese government does this it makes perfect sense for the U.S. government to respond in turn. <=24> n23 So sometimes you can't contest the premise as strongly or as strenuously as you would like because there is a factual problem for you there.

Nonetheless, there are five other reasons that I think are quite compelling for rejecting racial profiling even when it is rational. So understand that this is a more robust argument. It allows you to make a strategic concession. You can say "I admit that there is at least a plausible basis for you to suspect this person rather than that person." For example, you find sometimes the same argument is made with reference to African Americans and the overall statistics of people who are incarcerated. People look at the incarceration rates and argue that African American men are incarcerated at much higher rates than White men. Of course they disregard the causes, disregard possible prejudice within the criminal justice system. They say, nonetheless, "We at least know that there are higher rates of incarceration."

You see this same problem, for example, with respect to alienage. Asian Americans are often offended by the assumption that we're foreigners. It creates this notion of being a perpetual foreigner. When people ask "Where are you from?" they don't accept your answer ... . Sometimes when I say I was born in Cleveland and grew up near Ann Arbor, used to live in San Francisco and now live in Washington, D.C., people shake their heads and say "No, I mean where are you "really' from?" That addition of the word really, a question that they ask only of people who look to them foreign, is selective, but in some ways has a rational basis. For after all, two-thirds of all Asians in the United States are foreign born. <=25> n24 So [*143] it is not just that there are higher rates of foreign birth among the Asian Americans than among White Americans. An absolute majority of people who are Asian American are in fact foreign born.

REV_00258683

So, what then makes that question still offensive? What makes it offensive to say to me "How do you like it in our country?" or "When are you going home?" or "My, you speak English so well." What is it about those statements that despite their rationality troubles us? Let me suggest that there are a variety of things that properly do trouble us.

2. Racial Profiling is Not Objective

The second reason that racial profiling is wrong is that you have to accept on good faith that the person who is engaged in what they claim to be rational discrimination, in fact, is objective. You must assume that the person engaged in racial profiling has done an analysis and is using statistics or is using some real evidence rather than just acting out of prejudice. Unfortunately, all too often, you find out that their analysis of the facts turns out to coincide neatly with their prejudice. In other words, they went in with one view and came out with that same view. So sometimes though their sincerity may not be doubted, nonetheless, the good faith of their conclusions may be suspect.

3. Racial Profiling Frustrates the Value of Being Color-Blind

Third, racial profiling is emphatically not color-blind and does not treat us as individuals. Note that you cannot be at the same time a rational discriminator and a proponent of color-blindness. It is impossible. You must choose. So for those individuals who claim that they would like to follow the words of the late Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. when he said that he had a dream that we not be judged by the color of our skin but by the content of our character, those individuals who profess their faith in those inspirational words cannot then turn around and say "But I make an exception and engage in rational discrimination when it suits me."

So, rational discrimination and color-blindness as an ideal are contradictory. For what rational discrimination does is it lumps us together and says we will treat individuals as members of groups and use aggregate statistics and deduce based on generalizations what is true about this person or that person. Not because we know anything about this person or that person, but rather because we know about their membership within a racial group.

[*144]

4. Racial Profiling is Often Based on Bad Information

Fourth, rational discrimination is wrong because it's often based on just bad estimates. All of us are bad with statistics. Social scientists who study this will tell you that people can't distinguish between the proposition most X are Y and most Y are X. So that when you tell them one, they easily confuse it with the other. They can't distinguish between the notion that one group has a greater propensity for a particular action than another group and the notion that an absolute majority of the former group has propensity to that action. We're just simply bad at making statistical inferences on a day to day basis. We tend to overestimate some risks and grossly underestimate other risks.

5. The Vicious Cycle of Racial Profiling

Fifth, rational discrimination or racial profiling creates a vicious cycle. It is a self fulfilling prophecy. It proves itself to be true. Let me give you a simple demonstration using the numbers I have on this chalkboard.

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

This is a demonstration, which if you know anything about statistics, should appall you and it is meant to appall you. It is meant to show a gross simplification and abuse of statistical analysis, but one that accords with our common sense. What I propose to do is demonstrate how if you, in good faith, as someone who is avowedly not a racist, decide to engage in rational discrimination for the purposes of controlling crime, how you will end up with a law enforcement policy which is hardly colorblind [*145] and certainly will have effects which cause the subjugation of a racial minority group.

Let us envision a regime in which we have a town and in this town there are ten thousand residents. Of these ten thousand residents a thousand are Black. Now, I'm just using arbitrary numbers. I'm using nice, neat numbers so you can see how this works. But this isn't too far off the mark. So I'm envisioning a town where 10% of the population is African American and we'll imagine that the rest, the remaining nine thousand, are White, although it really doesn't matter for our purposes whether they're White or whether it's more racially mixed. Just that nine thousand are non-Black.

Let's say you're the police chief in this town and let's say that you decide based on analysis, based on facts and figures, based on having looked at the Federal Bureau of Prisons statistics about who is incarcerated - not based on prejudice at all. Let's say you decide that you want to target your law enforcement in a manner that is appropriate to the problem and you say "Well, where is the problem?" And let's say by looking at the numbers you see that there are, in fact, more African American men who are incarcerated as a proportion of the prison population than there are as a proportion of the general population. The likelihood that an African American man has a criminal record is much higher than the likelihood of a similar White man, all other factors being equal. So let's say our hypothetical is based on these statistics, and these numbers that I'm giving you are true. I don't have the exact figures. But each of the statements that I have given you as a premise is actually true.

So let's say you decide to allocate your resources based on these numbers and let's say each percentage of your resource that you allocate results in the arrest of one person. Okay, now these are the sorts of assumptions that people make in this sort of statistical analysis all the time. So I'm not doing anything fancy and I'm not doing anything that would deviate from the way you would do this if you were a proponent of these methods.

All right, so you have 100% of your resources to allocate. Let's say that you decide to allocate 25% of your resources toward African Americans. That is, that you're going to allocate that many more patrol cars and officers on the beat to African American neighborhoods, to checking out African American bars, or places where you know larger numbers of African Americans congregate, etc. Twenty-five percent of your effort is going to be targeted at African Americans, 75% targeted at Whites. You're still going to target the majority at Whites, but you're going to overemphasize slightly African Americans.

What will happen at the end of the first year? What will happen at the end of the first year, if each percentage of this effort correlates to one arrest, is you will have arrested seventy-five Whites and twenty-five African Americans. Now what that means is the twenty-five African [*146] Americans out of the one thousand African Americans in the population constitute 2.5%; 97.5% of African Americans will still be good, decent, law abiding people. No arrest record whatsoever. Ninety-seven point five. That's the overwhelming majority.

REV_00258685

Nonetheless, because African Americans are a minority in this community, because they're so significantly outnumbered and make up only 10% of the population, what will happen if you have 25% of your pool of people who have been arrested out of those one hundred people who were arrested, twenty-five are African American. Let's say this town was just founded and no one else has any arrest record previously, etc. Two point five times more of your pool of people with arrest records will be African American than of the general population. Two and a half times. Not only that, your typical African American, just your average African American, your random African American. If you just pick someone who is African American based just on their race, they are three times more likely to have an arrest record than someone who is White, who is randomly picked. Three times more likely, and that's if you just allocated 25% of your law enforcement efforts toward African Americans, and you can do all the numbers to double check my figures if you want.

So now let's say in year two. You look at these numbers that you get at the end of year one and you say "Wow, there really is more of a problem than I thought there was." Because look at this: African Americans are three times as likely as Whites to have criminal records. Three times as likely. You might then say, "Well, I'm going to adjust my law enforcement strategy accordingly. I'm going to focus three quarters of my law enforcement resources toward African Americans and one quarter toward Whites." Why? Because, after all, African Americans are three times more likely than Whites to have criminal records. Now again, this is an utter and total abuse of these numbers, but I will leave it to you as clever law students to figure out exactly why because this is doing what rational discrimination asks us to do. That is, to look at the numbers. You'll see exactly how pernicious the results turn out to be.

In year two, at the end of year two, you will have arrested a total of one hundred African Americans and one hundred Whites. You will have arrested those totals because you'll arrest another twenty-five Whites added to the original seventy-five year one arrests. Seventy-five African Americans added to your original twenty-five African Americans for one hundred from each group. (We'll ignore people who get picked up more than once, which is also the sort of thing that you can do for ease of use with an abstract model like this.)

What then happens is 90% of African Americans in this fictional town are still law abiding people. Still the overwhelming majority, 90%, okay, because one hundred have been arrested out of a thousand. Nine hundred have not been. Yet, despite that, African Americans are now overrepresented within this pool at five times their rate in the general [*147] population. The general population of African Americans is 10%. In this pool they are 50%; overrepresentation is by five fold. That's significant overrepresentation. Not only that, it is nine times more likely that any random African American who you pick up has a criminal record than it is of Whites. Nine times more likely. Almost an order of magnitude more likely.

3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 296 printed in FULL format.

Copyright (c) 2001 Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law

February, 2001

3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 296

LENGTH: 35020 words

ARTICLE: LAW ENFORCEMENT BY STEREOTYPES AND SERENDIPITY: RACIAL PROFILING AND STOPS AND SEARCHES WITHOUT CAUSE

David Rudovsky*

* David Rudovsky is a Senior Fellow at the University of Pennsylvania Law School. He is a founding partner in Kairys, Rudovsky, Epstein, Messing & Rau. I am grateful for the comments and suggestions provided by Seth Kreimer, Leonard Sosnov, Susan Herman, Paul Messing, Michael Avery and the members of the Legal Studies Workshop at the University of Pennsylvania Law School. Susan Marcus provided excellent research assistance and David Rush was a resourceful Journal editor. And a word of gratitude to my colleagues who have been litigating the issues covered in this Article, with special thanks to Stefan Presser, Alan Yatvin, and Reginald Shuford. Finally, by way of disclosure, I am counsel on some of the cases discussed in this article.

SUMMARY:
... The "driving while black" phenomenon has been the subject of much scholarly and popular analysis, but for the most part these accounts of racial profiling have focused on highway stops and searches and have not addressed the role that race plays in pedestrian stop and frisk practices. ... The powerful combination of governmental investigations, judicial findings, anecdotal evidence, and statements by law enforcement officials leave little doubt about the existence of racial profiling and other stops without cause. ... In June, 1999, President Clinton condemned this practice as "morally indefensible" and requested record-keeping and studies to determine the extent of racial profiling in law enforcement. ... Racial Profiling: The Law Enforcement Justifications ... Since 1994, the DOJ has taken legal action against five law enforcement agencies: it has reached consent decrees with the City of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, the City of Steubenville, Ohio, and the State of New Jersey (with respect to the racial profiling on the New Jersey Turnpike). ...

TEXT:
[*296]

I. Introduction

On a summer evening in 1991, four young African-Americans were driving on I-95, returning to Delaware from a church service in Philadelphia. <=2> n1 Although the driver had committed no traffic violations, the car was stopped just south of the Philadelphia International Airport by police officers from Tinicum

REV_00258700

Empirical evidence gained from the review of car stops and searches supports this view. On the New Jersey Turnpike, seizures of contraband made incident to traffic stops were made at a rate of 10.5% from white drivers and 13.5% from black drivers. <=91> n90 In Maryland, searches on I-95 resulted in "find rates" that were roughly equal by race. <=92> n91 In both states, the large majority of seizures were of relatively [*312] small amounts of drugs, indicating possession for personal use. <=93> n92 In Illinois, searches of Hispanics yielded a lower percentage of narcotics than of whites. <=94> n93

Defenders of these practices have argued that the data does not disprove the assertion that the police are engaged in rational discrimination and efficient law enforcement practices in focusing on minority motorists. For example, a study of the Maryland I-95 searches concluded that the equal rates in the seizure of drug contraband from all African-American and white motorists who had been stopped and subjected to a search demonstrated that the "equilibrium" between these races was the product of police targeting of minority motorists who previously were transporting drugs at a significantly higher rate than whites. <=95> n94 The study is questionable on both methodological and legal grounds. First, as a statistical matter, the study assumes that the extremely small number of searches (compared to the motoring population and to the number of motorists actually stopped) was sufficient to deter African-American drivers from transporting drugs (there are no data to show the rate of transportation pre-racial profiling). <=96> n95 The study also assumes that the police are accurately reporting searches where nothing is recovered even though there is evidence to suggest the contrary. <=97> n96

Second, as a matter of constitutional law, the study proceeds on the theory that the police intentionally targeted African-American drivers for disproportionate stops and searches <=98> n97 (an assumption contradicted by the state police who have maintained that African-Americans have not been targeted). But even if there was solid evidence that African-Americans violated the drug laws on I-95 more often than whites, the state is prohibited from implementing formal sanctions that differentiate between the races. Thus, it would be unconstitutional for the state to enact criminal laws that provide for harsher prison terms for African-Americans convicted of the same drug offenses as whites, even in the face of an econometric model [*313] that would suggest that this differentiation would ultimately reduce the disproportionate drug violations by African-Americans as a class. <=99> n98 The same must be true for an official policy that targets African-Americans for a highly disproportionate rate of stops and searches based solely on their race and the alleged criminal propensities of very small numbers of African-Americans. <=100> n99

Moreover, given the fact that, on a relative scale, so few persons among the millions of drivers who use these transportation facilities each day are engaged in illegal drug activity - black or white - and so few stops or searches result in seizures of contraband, it is hard to justify the stops of large numbers of innocent blacks to enable the police to make the occasional seizure.

As Ira Glasser has stated:

Even if most of the drug dealers in the Northeast corridor or in any particular neighborhood or city are black or Latino, it does not follow that most blacks and Latinos are drug dealers ... . Think about it for a minute. Most players in the NBA are black. But if you were trying to get a team together, you wouldn't go out in the street and round up random African Americans.

... .

It's a very simple, logical fallacy. The fact that most drug dealers are X does not mean that most X are drug dealers. <=101> n100

[*314] Of course, while playing the numbers may be good strategy at the card tables at Atlantic City, several miles away on the New Jersey Turnpike the consequences of such a numbers game can be corrosive of legal and moral norms. As David A. Harris has stated:

Behind the race-neutral reasons police give lies a stark truth. When officers stop disproportionate members of African-Americans because this is "just good police work," they are using race as a proxy for the criminality or "general criminal propensity" of an entire racial group. Simply put, police are targeting all African-Americans because some are criminals. In essence, this thinking predicts that all blacks, as a group, share a general propensity to commit crimes. Therefore, having black skin becomes enough - perhaps along with a minimal number of other factors, perhaps alone - for law enforcement to stop and detain someone. <=102> n101

No one denies that the crime rates of young urban minorities are higher than those of elderly whites. But to jump from this obvious fact, to the use of race as a general proxy for crime, ignores the equally significant fact that very few minorities commit crimes (and thus an entire class is stigmatized and subjected to harsher treatment for the acts of a few). Further, such a racial proxy fails to consider the enormous damage (even to law enforcement interests) that is done by the resentment and anger that is stirred by this type of policing. Quality of life policing carries with it the strong potential for undermining the legitimacy of police operations, and when race becomes a factor in the exercise of police discretion, the potential is very likely to become manifest.

Finally, racial profiling must be considered in the context of this country's escalating incarceration rates. The statistics regarding race and incarceration rates are stark and deeply troubling. African-American men constitute approximately 7% of the population. <=103> n102 In 1930, they constituted 22% of all prison admissions; today they comprise 51% of admissions, a rate six times that of white men. <=104> n103 Nearly one in three black males aged 20-29 is under some form of criminal justice supervision on any given day. <=105> n104 A black male born in 1991 has a 29% chance of spending some time in prison during his lifetime. <=106> n105 [*315] The figure for whites is 4% and for Hispanics, 16%. <=107> n106

A major contributing factor in the escalating disparities in imprisonment is the War on Drugs. <=108> n107 Although African-Americans use and possess drugs in close approximation to their numbers in the overall population, they account for 37% of those arrested, 55% of those convicted and 74% of those incarcerated for drug offenses. <=109> n108 From 1985 to 1995, there was over a 100% increase in the number of drug offenders in state prison (38,900 to 224,900). <=110> n109 One in four inmates, as opposed to the 1980 rate of one in sixteen is a drug offender. <=111> n110 In the federal system, 59% of inmates are incarcerated on drug charges. <=112> n111 Overall, in 1995, of 1,700,000 inmates in state and federal prisons, 400,000 were held on drug charges. <=113> n112

Differentials in sentencing schemes and police practices contribute to the racial disparities. Mandatory federal sentencing statutes punish crack cocaine offense much more harshly than powder cocaine; 500 grams of powder cocaine will result in a five year mandatory sentence while only 5 grams of crack cocaine will trigger the same sentence. <=114> n113 Between 1989 to 1990, close to 90% of persons charged with crack cocaine offenses were African-American, but fewer than 35% of those was charged with federal powder cocaine offenses were African-Americans. <=115> n114

[*316] Race discrimination has also been documented in the critical decisions made by prosecutors and courts to transfer accused offenders from juvenile to adult court for trial. In a recent study in California, it was determined that minority juveniles were more than twice as likely to be transferred to adult court for case disposition than their white counterparts. <=116> n115 In Los Angeles, in 1996, of the 561 juvenile felony cases transferred to adult court, 5% were white, 6% were Asian, 30% were black and 59% were Hispanic. <=117> n116 The seriousness of the charges and criminal histories did not explain these disparities. <=118> n117 Further, once they entered the adult system, young African-Americans were 18.4, and Hispanics were 7.3 times more likely to be incarcerated than white offenders. <=119> n118 Finally, there is growing evidence of racially disproportionate disenfranchisement of African-Americans under state laws that suspend or forfeit the right to vote for persons convicted of crime. <=120> n119

There can be no doubting the fact that in policing - as in many areas of contemporary American life - race matters, and matters a [*317] lot. <=121> n120 The substantial racial disparities that have been documented in stop, frisk, and search practices cannot be fully explained or rationalized by crime patterns, police deployment, or policing tactics. Further, arguments of efficiency and rational discrimination flounder on empirical, constitutional, and moral principles. Yet, in the face of the growing evidence of arbitrary stops, frisks and searches, the courts have in many instances failed to order relief that is commensurate with the extraordinary deviation from legal norms. To understand this state of affairs, I turn to an examination of the legal standards that govern these police practices.

III. The Legal Framework: Racial Profiling and Stops and Searches Without Cause

Law enforcement's interest in maximizing the number of contacts, stops and searches of cars and pedestrians has prevailed over constitutionally-based claims of racial equality, privacy, and individual integrity. The Supreme Court has been highly deferential to order-maintenance policing and has imposed substantial limitations on the federal court's powers to remedy constitutional violations. In this Part, I discuss the governing federal substantive standards for car and pedestrian stops and the application of this doctrine to racial profiling and random stop practices. In the next part, I address the remedial issues. <=122> n121

A. Automobile Stops

The constitutional story with respect to Fourth Amendment principles has been told - and told well - by others, <=123> n122 so I will trace only the most significant legal developments as they relate to traffic stops and racial profiling. The Supreme Court has permitted stops of cars based on cause to believe that a crime has been committed, including any traffic violation. <=124> n123 Further, once a car has been permissibly stopped, the driver and passengers can be ordered to stand outside of the vehicle (for the officer's protection), without any objective showing of harm or danger. <=125> n124 At any time during the encounter, and even [*318] after a ticket or warning may have been issued, the police can secure consent to search the persons or the car without any statement that no consent need be given, or that they are free to leave. <=126> n125 Any contraband that is observed in "plain view," including detection by use of a flashlight, can be immediately seized and used as probable cause to arrest. <=127> n126 During the stop, any person who appears to present a danger to the officer (and the car itself), may be frisked for the officer's protection. <=128> n127 If cause is established to arrest any of the occupants, a full-scale search of the car including suitcases and other private containers, and of all other passengers is permissible. <=129> n128

The police may question the driver or occupants of the car without providing Miranda warnings, <=130> n129 even if they are seeking information about drugs. <=131> n130 Of course, this questioning is often a prelude to a request to search ("I understand that you say you do not have drugs; do you mind if we search?"), without any warning to the driver of his right to refuse consent. Further the police may use a trained dog to detect narcotics without any suspicion, cause, or consent. <=132> n131

Since virtually every driver commits violations of the traffic laws on a regular basis, <=133> n132 the police have enormous discretion to effectuate stops of a very high number of cars, thus presenting the critical issue of pretextual stops and searches. For some time the lower federal courts divided on this Fourth Amendment question: in circumstances where a traffic violation has occurred, thereby creating probable cause for a stop, should a court consider the officer's subjective intentions or motivations in effectuating the stop, including possible [*319] racial profiling of the driver? <=134> n133

The Supreme Court decided this issue in Whren v. United States. <=135> n134 There, Washington, D.C. police officers had made a traffic stop and observed two bags of crack cocaine in the hands of a front-seat passenger. <=136> n135 The police testified that the stop was made because the driver had violated several traffic laws, including pausing at a stop sign for an "unusually long time," turning without signaling, and then proceeding at an "unreasonable speed." <=137> n136 The defendants claimed that the stop was pretextual: that the police were suspicious because they observed two black men in a Nissan

Pathfinder in Southeast Washington and, lacking any cause for a stop to investigate drugs, decided to stop on the basis of alleged traffic violations to place them in the position where they could conduct a drug investigation. <=138> n137 In fact, the officers involved, on a vice-detail, were prohibited by departmental regulation from making routine traffic stops. <=139> n138

The Supreme Court ruled that from a Fourth Amendment perspective the "constitutional reasonableness of traffic stops" does not depend "on the actual motivations of the individual officers." <=140> n139 According to the Court, the only relevant question was whether, looking at the circumstances from an objective viewpoint, the officer had legal cause for the stop. <=141> n140 The Court rejected the claim that the Fourth Amendment requires consideration of whether "the officer's conduct deviated materially from usual police practices, so that a reasonable officer in the same circumstances would not have made the stop for the reasons given." <=142> n141

[*320] In response to the claim that pretextual stops could be racially motivated, the Court stated that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment would prohibit any intentional race discrimination in a car stop. <=143> n142 However, this perfunctory statement did not address the means by which an intentional race discrimination claim could be proven or what remedies might be available to either a criminal defendant or civil litigant. <=144> n143

Courts and commentators have correctly made the point that pretextual stops, and particularly those based on racial considerations, are inconsistent with the "reasonableness" requirements of the Fourth Amendment. <=145> n144 Assuming, however, that the Supreme Court continues to insist that subjective motivations, including racially motivated conduct, are not pertinent to the Fourth Amendment inquiry, <=146> n145 [*321] federal challenges to racial profiling must be mounted on grounds of racial discrimination under the Fourteenth Amendment or Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Challenges could also be made under state law in jurisdictions that do not follow Whren or that provide an exclusionary remedy in criminal prosecutions for racially discriminatory stops or searches. <=147> n146

[*322]

1. Intentional Race Discrimination Under the Fourteenth Amendment

A claim of impermissible racial discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment involves two broad areas of inquiry: whether the practice or policy expressly or intentionally classifies persons on the basis of race and, if so, whether the race based classification withstands strict judicial scrutiny. <=148> n147 A practice or policy based on an explicit racial classification is "immediately suspect," triggering detailed examination and may be upheld only when shown to be narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest. <=149> n148

Intentional race discrimination may be shown by a law that "expressly classifies persons on the basis of race," <=150> n149 or by a practice or policy that treats one differently from members of other racial groups to whom he is similarly situated, if applied in an intentionally discriminatory manner. <=151> n150 Thus, in the racial profiling context, established policies or practices authorizing stops based on racial characteristics will enable a plaintiff to proceed under the first theory. <=152> n151 But, as is usually the case, where there is no direct proof of such a policy or practice, statistical evidence will be necessary to show that the police acted with the intent to discriminate. Disparate impact alone is not sufficient, as the "invidious quality of a law claimed to be racially discriminatory must ultimately be traced to a racially discriminatory purpose." <=153> n152

REV_00258713

[*323] Use of statistical evidence to establish intentional race discrimination in criminal trial settings has met with mixed results. The Supreme Court has sustained attacks on racially discriminatory jury selection procedures and racially-based peremptory challenges upon statistical evidence that demonstrated that race played an impermissible role in these proceedings. <=154> n153 In these cases the Court established a base line for establishing a prima facie case of racial discrimination that could be satisfied by statistical evidence concerning the challenged practices. <=155> n154

In Hunter v. Underwood, <=156> n155 the Court sustained an equal protection claim by African-Americans who claimed that they were disenfranchised for convictions under an Alabama law that was adopted with the intent to discriminate on the basis of race, and which in fact had a racially discriminatory impact on African-Americans. <=157> n156 As proof of the impact, the Court noted that blacks were disenfranchised under this law at a rate 1.7 times more often than whites in certain counties, and up to 10 times more often in other areas of the state. <=158> n157 The Court did not require proof of the identity of white persons who were not disenfranchised because their convictions were for crimes not [*324] deemed to involve moral turpitude (the disenfranchising trigger). <=159> n158

However, in McCleskey v. Kemp, <=160> n159 the Court rejected, as insufficient under Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards, a statistical analysis concerning the application of the death penalty in Georgia. <=161> n160 Conducted by David C. Baldus, an expert in the area of statistics and criminal justice issues, the study used in McCleskey found that among all of the factors that might influence a jury to impose the death penalty, the race of the victim was the most consistent and central factor. <=162> n161 Without controlling for other factors, the defendant was eleven times more likely to receive the death penalty if the victim was white than if the victim was black. <=163> n162 Baldus's study, which considered 230 variables, including 39 non-racial variables, that could affect sentencing, demonstrated that the odds of a defendant receiving the death penalty where the victim was white was 4.3 times higher than for a black victim, a statistically significant number. <=164> n163

The Court distinguished McCleskey's claim from venire-selection and Title VII cases, where the courts have allowed statistics as proof of discriminatory intent. <=165> n164 In the Court's view, "the statistics related to fewer entities, and fewer variables [were] relevant to the challenged decisions." <=166> n165 Batson was different from McCleskey's situation because, "requiring a prosecutor to rebut a study that analyzes the past conduct of scores of prosecutors is quite different from requiring a prosecutor to rebut a contemporaneous challenge to his own acts." <=167> n166

The Court stated that the Baldus study showed only a "correlation" between the race of the victim and the death penalty decision. <=168> n167 It is evident, however, that the study established far more that a "correlation" between race and sentence; it demonstrated a strong causative relationship. The Court was simply unwilling to recognize the degree to which race influenced jurors in capital cases, where such a finding would call into question a large number of death penalties.

[*325] The Court also questioned how far the logic of the argument would carry: the claim, Justice Powell stated, "throws into serious question the principles that underlie our entire criminal justice system." <=169> n168 Unexplained by the Court was the acceptance of such discrimination in the most serious decision made in the criminal courts, notwithstanding the Court's insistence that it had engaged in "unceasing efforts to eradicate racial prejudice from our criminal justice system." <=170> n169 Justice Brennan commented that the Court's concern with the implications of the statistics for other aspects of the criminal justice system displayed "a fear of too much justice." <=171> n170

The Court took a similar hands-off approach in United States v. Armstrong, <=172> n171 where it reversed a ruling that would have permitted discovery in support of a motion to dismiss federal crack cocaine prosecutions against black defendants on grounds of racially selective prosecution. <=173> n172 The defendants sought to prove discriminatory intent by showing a racially disparate pattern of federal crack cocaine prosecutions. <=174> n173 In a preliminary submission, the defendant showed that every one of the twenty-four crack cocaine cases closed by the public defender's office in 1991 involved a black defendant. <=175> n174

The government responded by setting forth race-neutral criteria such as the quantity of drugs, firearms violations, the evidence, and the criminal histories of the defendants. <=176> n175 The government also submitted part of a 1989 Drug Enforcement Administration report stating that "large scale, interstate trafficking networks controlled by Jamaicans, Haitians and Black street gangs dominate the manufacture and distribution of crack." <=177> n176 The defendants answered with affidavits asserting that there were an equal number of Caucasian and minority users and dealers and that "many nonblacks are prosecuted in state court for crack offenses." <=178> n177

The Court ruled that the defendants were not entitled to discovery because they "failed to satisfy the threshold showing ... that the Government declined to prosecute similarly situated suspects of other races." <=179> n178 In a selective prosecution case, the Equal Protection Clause requires a showing that similarly situated suspects of other races were not prosecuted and "some evidence" of this essential proof must be produced. <=180> n179 The Court stated that prosecutors were entitled to a [*326] presumption of the proper performance of their duties and relied upon arrest statistics to reject the argument that blacks and whites commit drugs offenses at rates that would not justify the highly disproportionate federal prosecution of black crack cocaine offenders. <=181> n180 As discussed above, these arrest data are suspect, but the Court, which had so seriously questioned the data in McCleskey, and which has condemned racial stereotyping in other contexts, <=182> n181 seemed untroubled in using these statistics to dismiss the claim of unfair racial disparities in prosecutions. Thus, despite what appeared to be a reasonable prima facie showing, even a limited request for discovery was unavailing.

<=183> n182

McCleskey and Armstrong are troubling, but are not dispositive of racial profiling claims. In McCleskey the Court stressed the unique discretion given to juries to decide between life and death in requiring proof beyond statistical patterns for the system as a whole to show that the judgment in an individual case was infected by intentional discrimination. <=184> n183 It may be that courts will not permit the discriminatory intent to be inferred from the judgment of disparate juries and different prosecutors acting independently from each other, but will find that statistical evidence that law enforcement officers repeatedly target racial minorities is sufficient to establish a Fourteenth [*327] Amendment claim. As the Court stated in McCleskey:

The nature of the capital sentencing decision, and the relationship of the statistics to that decision, are fundamentally different from the corresponding elements in the venire-selection or Title VII [employment discrimination] cases ... . Each jury is unique in its composition, and the Constitution requires that its decision rest on consideration of innumerable factors that vary according to the characteristics of the individual defendant and the facts of the particular capital offense. <=185> n184

Armstrong's requirement that the defendant show that similarly situated white offenders were not subjected to federal prosecution, while questionable, should not bar selective policing claims. First, evidence that shows statistically significant disparities in the rates at which similarly situated black and white drivers are stopped and/or searched pursuant to alleged traffic violations establishes the factual predicate of similarly situated white drivers who have not been stopped and searched. <=186> n185

Second, Armstrong reaffirmed the rulings in Batson v. Kentucky <=187> n186 and Yick Wo v. Hopkins, <=188> n187 that statistical proof is sufficient where a challenged practice is characterized by a highly discretionary "selection procedure that is susceptible of abuse," <=189> n188 or where discrimination is sufficiently "clandestine and covert" that evidence other than naming white comparables is the "only available avenue of proof." <=190> n189 Several courts have sustained racial profiling equal protection claims based on this order of proof. <=191> n190 Where a racial profiling challenge is based on the theory that official policy contains an express racial classification, [*328] there should be no need to plead or prove the existence of a similarly situated non-minority group or person who was not subject to the complained of practices. <=192> n191 As the Second Circuit recently explained:

It is not necessary to plead the existence of a similarly situated non-minority group when challenging a law or policy that contains an express, racial classification. These classifications are subject to strict judicial scrutiny, see Able v. United States, 155 F.3d 628, 631-32 (2d Cir. 1998), and strict scrutiny analysis in effect addresses the question of whether people of different races are similarly situated with regard to the law or policy at issue. <=194> n192

Third, Armstrong was a selective prosecution case challenging a prosecutor's discretion in deciding to charge particular defendants. <=195> n193 As the Court emphasized, prosecutors are accorded a strong presumption in favor of the "regularity" of their decisions, rebuttable only by "clear evidence to the contrary." <=196> n194 Because of separation of powers concerns, courts are "properly hesitant to examine the decision whether to prosecute." <=197> n195 There is no such presumption of correctness accorded to police officers charged with racial discrimination or other violations of constitutional norms in law enforcement duties. <=198> n196

Equal Protection doctrine does not absolutely prohibit consideration of race in enforcement or implementation of governmental policies and a "compelling governmental interest" can justify the practice. <=199> n197 Certainly police can consider race where a physical description is provided, but absent that factor, or other self-limiting factors, race cannot be considered in the decision to stop, detain, or search. <=200> n198 Tactical deployment, surveillance operations, and policing [*329] methods might well reflect responses to patterns of crime, and result in more intrusive operations in minority communities, but race should not warrant forcible stops or searches.

2. Title VI and Disparate Impact

Under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, <=201> n199 regulations promulgated by the Department of Justice prohibit governmental action that have a disparate impact by reason of race:

A recipient [of federal funds] ... may not ... utilize criteria or methods of administration which have the effect of subjecting individuals to discrimination because of their race, color, or national origin, or have the effect of defeating or substantially impairing accomplishment of the objectives of the program as respects individuals of a particular race, color, or national origin. <=202> n200

[*330] Whether private parties may enforce this regulation through an implied right of action similar to that authorized by Cort v. Ash, <=203> n201 was recently addressed in Powell v. Ridge, <=204> n202 where the court set forth a three part test for determining whether Title VI regulations were enforceable by private parties: (1) whether a private cause of action exists under the enabling statute; (2) whether the agency rule is properly within the scope of the statute; and (3) whether implying a cause of action will further the purposes of the statute. <=205> n203 Title VI does permit private enforcement, <=206> n204 and the Department of Justice regulation appears to be well within the scope of the enabling statute. In Guardians Association v. Civil Service Commission, <=207> n205 regulations prohibiting discriminatory effects were approved by a majority of the Court. <=208> n206 And in Alexander v. Choate, <=209> n207 a unanimous Court confirmed that: "Title VI has delegated to the agencies in the first instance the complex determination of what sorts of disparate impacts upon minorities constituted sufficiently significant social problems, and were readily enough remediable, to warrant altering the practices of the federal grantees that had produced those impacts." <=210> n208

Since Guardians and Choate, federal courts of appeals have consistently found that Title VI implementing regulations prohibiting practices that cause an unjustified disparate impact provide a basis for private plaintiffs to sue recipients of federal funds on a discriminatory effects theory, without a showing of discriminatory intent. <=211> n209

Private enforcement of such regulations will further the purposes of the statute. Title VI "sought to accomplish two related, but nevertheless [*331] somewhat different, objectives. First, Congress wanted to avoid the use of federal resources to support discriminatory practices; second, it wanted to provide individual citizens effective protection against those practices." <=212> n210 In enacting the regulations, the Department of Justice determined that "disparate impacts upon minorities constituted sufficiently significant social problems, and were readily enough remediable, to warrant altering the practices of the federal grantees that had produced those impacts." <=213> n211

A plaintiff seeking to enforce the regulations must also establish standing given the particular state program and plaintiff's relationship to that program. Most state and local police agencies receive federal funds and the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987 defines "program or activity" to include all the operations of a governmental department or agency which receives federal funds. <=214> n212 Using this definition of "activity or program," traffic stops, searches, and arrests should be covered.

Whether a plaintiff has to demonstrate that she was a direct participant in or intended beneficiary of a covered "program or activity" in order to assert a claim under Title VI is not clear, but even if that were so, Title VI should still apply to traffic and pedestrian stops. The statute, as well as its implementing regulation, provides that "no person ... be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." <=215> n213 Were standing to be restricted only to direct beneficiaries or participants, claims asserted by persons "subjected to" discrimination by a federally funded entity who did not fall into either category would fail. The language of Title VI, however, prohibits any discriminatory conduct against an individual member of a protected class by a covered entity, including actions of a police officer. "The plain meaning of "activity' is a "natural or normal function or operation' ... . It is a catch-all phrase that prohibits all discrimination by a public entity, regardless of the context." <=216> n214

[*332] Finally, racial profiling plaintiffs come within the scope of prudential standing limits. The Supreme Court has recently reaffirmed the "zone of interests" test as a prudential limitation on standing in the context of an action brought under the Administrative Procedure Act. As the Court has articulated that test:

The proper inquiry is simply "whether the interest sought to be protected by the complainant is arguably within the zone of interests to be protected ... by the statute." Hence, in applying the "zone of interests" test, we do not ask whether, in enacting the statutory provision at issue, Congress specifically intended to benefit the plaintiff. Instead, we first discern the interests "arguably ... to be protected" by the statutory provision at issue; we then

Township. <=3> n2 The officers ordered the occupants out of the vehicle and proceeded to subject them, and the vehicle, to an intrusive search that included the use of a narcotics trained-police dog. <=4> n3 They were detained for almost an hour until the police were convinced that they were not transporting drugs. <=5> n4 To justify the initial stop, an officer issued a "warning" regarding an alleged obstruction of the car's windshield (a thin piece of string hanging from the rear view mirror, which could not have been observed by the officer before the stop). <=6> n5 In response to a question from one of the occupants of the car as to why they had been stopped, the officer answered with surprising candor: "because you are young, black and in a high drug-trafficking area, driving a nice car." <=7> n6

[*297] On a summer afternoon in August 1998, U.S. Army Sergeant Rossano Gerald and his young son Gregory were driving across Oklahoma. <=8> n7 A career soldier and highly decorated veteran of Desert Storm, Gerald, a black man, was stopped twice within thirty minutes. <=9> n8 As a report on the incident noted, "during the second stop, which lasted two-and-half hours, the troopers terrorized [Sergeant] Gerald's 12-year-old son with a police dog, placed both father and son in a closed car with the air conditioning off and fans blowing hot air, and warned that the dog would attack if they attempted to escape." <=10> n9

As the district court described the allegations:

Over the course of the two hour detention the troopers repeatedly searched the car, turning up nothing. Despite this, Trooper Perry removed parts of the headliner, floorboards, carpet, and other areas, causing $ 1089.21 in damage to the car. Perry removed the passenger side floorboard, claiming the bolts looked funny, like military bolts. According to the body shop that repaired the car, the bolts were the factory-installed bolts. Throughout the search Perry and the second trooper accused Sergeant Gerald of running drugs and laundering money. Sergeant Gerald denied the allegations and informed the troopers that his vehicle had recently passed inspection and had received military clearance. He also informed the troopers that due to the nature of his assignment he is subject to random urinalysis and did not use drugs.

At approximately 3:45 p.m., the troopers ceased their detention and prepared to let Plaintiffs leave with nothing but a warning ticket. When Sergeant Gerald complained his car and luggage were a mess, Perry informed him "We ain't good at repacking." <=11> n10

On July 16, 1999, Alton Fitzgerald White, a leading African-American actor in the Broadway production of "Ragtime," was standing in the doorway of his apartment building in Manhattan, when police arrived. <=12> n11 He opened the door to allow them to enter. <=13> n12 He was immediately handcuffed and taken to the police district where he was strip searched and held in a cell - all without probable cause - until the police finally determined he had nothing to do with a call concerning "Hispanic men" selling drugs from the apartment house. <=14> n13 Rather than being on stage, he found himself crying in a police holding cell, a circumstance dictated in no small part by the color of his inquire whether the plaintiff's interests affected by the agency action in question are among them. <=217> n215

Disparate impact theory avoids the difficult burden of proof of intentional discrimination. <=218> n216 Statistical evidence of the type assembled in New Jersey, Maryland, and Illinois would be sufficient to put the burden of justification for the use of racial characteristics on the law enforcement agency and would require substantial evidence as to the necessity and efficacy of racial profiling in the highway drug courier context. <=219> n217

B. Pedestrian Stops

The surge of attention to racial profiling on the highways has led to concern as well over similar police practices in stops of pedestrians and other travelers. Pedestrian stops, frisks and searches present some comparable legal issues. Thus, while the Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI standards discussed above will govern pedestrian stops as well, the policing interests and Fourth Amendment standards differ in significant respects from car stops and searches.

[*333]

1. Police Practices and Interests

Pedestrian stops are at the very core of policing. They are used to enforce narcotics and weapons laws, to identify fugitives or other persons for whom warrants may be outstanding, to investigate reported crimes and "suspicious" behavior, and to improve community "quality of life." They are also designed to secure intelligence information about criminal activities and to establish a police presence in, and physical control of, certain communities. The type of patrol sends a very strong message to the community, and stop and frisk practices are a key element of order-maintenance policing. As the New York Attorney General has reported:

Order maintenance theory encourages officers to intervene in instances of low-level disorder, whether observed or suspected, with approaches which fall short of arrest. A "stop" intervention provides an occasion for the police to have contact with persons presumably involved in low-level criminality - without having to effect a formal arrest, and under a lower constitutional standard (i.e., "reasonable suspicion"). Indeed, because low-level "quality of life" and misdemeanor offenses are more likely to be committed in the open, as a theoretical matter, the "reasonable suspicion" standard may be more readily satisfied as to those sorts of crimes. To the extent that "stop" encounters create points of contact between police and low-level offenders, such contacts can lead to the apprehension of persons already wanted for more serious crimes, or who might be prepared to commit them in the near future. <=220> n218

The pedestrian stop can be triggered by any number of diverse factors, although as a legal matter the police cannot forcibly stop or detain persons without reasonable suspicion to believe that criminal conduct may be afoot. <=221> n219 The complex and protean nature of street investigations, from both racial and crime control perspectives, makes legal and political judgments in this field highly controversial. The Supreme Court has addressed these issues in numerous cases over the years and has developed a methodology for balancing law enforcement and privacy interests. <=222> n220 This article is not the occasion to analyze or critique this very large body of case law (which is the subject of extensive commentary); <=223> n221 rather, the focus will be on the relevance to [*334] Fourth Amendment doctrine of the empirical data that has been collected with respect to pedestrian stop practices.

Law enforcement officials maintain that there is a direct relationship between the degree of discretion they may exercise in stops, frisks, and questioning of individuals, and the effectiveness of their crime fighting and intelligence efforts. <=224> n222 Of course, the greater the police power, the greater is the potential for abuse. And it is precisely at this intersection of crime, race and, police stop and frisk practices that the underlying social and legal conflicts most often are manifested, and not infrequently in sharp and violent confrontations. On February 4, 1999, in New York City, one of these incidents exploded in controversy and generated a searching inquiry into the nature of these police street practices, with particular emphasis on their impact on people of color. On that date four plain-clothed officers from the elite Street Crimes Unit, observed Amadou Diallo in the vestibule of his apartment building and decided to investigate his nighttime appearance at that location. <=225> n223 As they approached, Diallo remained in the vestibule with a wallet in one hand and the police, claiming that they thought the wallet was a gun and that Diallo had been acting "suspiciously," started shooting; forty-one bullets were fired and nineteen penetrated Diallo's body. <=226> n224 The death of Diallo, an immigrant street peddler with no criminal record and carrying no weapons, brought to a head the long simmering controversy over aggressive New York policing practices and led to widespread demonstrations and protests of racially-biased policing. <=227> n225

In the public debate, comparisons were inevitably drawn between the Diallo killing and the sadistic torture by New York police officers of Abner Louima some nineteen months earlier. <=228> n226 But whatever similarities exist between the two incidents on reference points of race and police aggressiveness, no one contends that the type of brutality in the Louima affair was anything but criminal. The killing of Diallo, however, has evoked reactions ranging from criminal indictment to a defense that the incident, while tragic, was an aberrant by- [*335] product of an essential police practice. <=229> n227

Brutality, however effective in establishing police hegemony, cannot be defended in a democratic society. <=230> n228 By contrast, aggressive street patrol is defended as an essential element of urban policing and the inevitable abuses that occur in the course of this police work are presented as costs to be endured if crime is to be effectively controlled. The contours of this debate were captured well by Elizabeth Kolbert:

If you are a black resident of New York City, your chances of being murdered are at least five times as high as they are if you are white, and the odds that you've been arrested for murder are more than ten times as high. This disparity means that the police will see more behavior by blacks that they will legitimately identify as suspicious. At the same time, it means that they will, almost inevitably, come to see criminal behavior as a black phenomenon, which is not only profoundly unfair but also unlawful. The more aggressive policing becomes - the more the cops try to anticipate crimes before they occur - the more such structural biases are brought out into the open.

Of course, the segregation of crime, by income, by neighborhood, and, especially, by race, is what makes such strategy politically practical in the first place. Crucial constituencies have little directly to lose from it. The cost of aggressive policing may be a collective erosion of civil rights, but only some groups feel the immediate impact.

...

[*336]

People sense, if only intuitively, the fundamental difference between the [Louima and Diallo] cases. Allegedly, as the cops beat Louima in their squad car on the way to the station and then tortured him inside it, they taunted him with racial epithets. The very explicitness of their racism was something to condemn, but also to take some comfort in: What those cops did to Louima, you could tell yourself, clearly had nothing to do with doing their job. It is much harder to say that about Diallo. <=231> n229

The constitutional seeds of this controversy were planted more than 30 years ago when the Supreme Court first decided how the Fourth Amendment would be applied to the street stop and frisk. Decided at a time of urban turmoil, bitter police/minority community relationships, and deep social conflict on a wide range of issues, the Court's opinion in Terry v. Ohio <=232> n230 established a doctrinal framework that has endured to this day. The Court ruled that a stop is "reasonable" under the Fourth Amendment if the facts and circumstances made known to the officer provide grounds for an objectively reasonable belief that criminal activity may be afoot. <=233> n231 Further, the Court decided that if the officer had a reasonable belief that the person stopped was "armed and dangerous," a pat-down frisk could be conducted, again on less than probable cause. <=234> n232 In some respects, this approach is the street equivalent to the Whren pretext doctrine for cars: just as the police use the traffic stop to place themselves in a position to search the vehicle and occupants, they use the stop of pedestrians to gain the opportunity to frisk.

The Court recognized the abuses that attend stop and frisk practices, including possible disproportionate impact on racial minorities, [*337] but thought that there was little that it could do to control these practices through the exclusionary rule. <=235> n233 After having ignored the racial factors in the case, <=236> n234 the Court addressed the role that aggressive stop and frisk practices have on racial tensions between the police and minority communities:

We have noted that the abusive practices which play a major, though by no means exclusive, role in creating this friction are not susceptible to control by means of the exclusionary rule, and cannot properly dictate our decision with respect to the powers of the police in genuine investigative and preventive situations. However, the degree of community resentment aroused by particular practices is clearly relevant to an assessment of the quality of the intrusion upon reasonable expectations of personal security caused by those practices. <=237> n235

The Court's observations of the racial tensions that surround stop and frisk practices in minority communities were not unique. Governmental commissions, law enforcement officials, and community organizers were asserting similar views <=238> n236 and, while the Court soon cast a blind eye to this issue, thirty years after Terry the conflict between law enforcement and racial minorities continues to be raw and pronounced. <=239> n237 Over this period of time, the Court has significantly expanded police powers (in many cases in deference to the "War on Drugs") <=240> n238 and complaints concerning racial bias and random, arbitrary stop and frisks have continued to mount. <=241> n239

[*338] The Court recently addressed the justifications for a Terry stop in a case where the police sought to justify a stop and frisk primarily on the basis of flight of the suspect. <=242> n240 According to the police testimony, as a police caravan of four cars investigating drug trafficking in a "high crime" neighborhood passed, the defendant Wardlow looked in the direction of the officers and immediately fled, carrying an opaque bag. <=243> n241 A stop and frisk of the defendant disclosed a handgun. <=244> n242 The Supreme Court rejected the state's claim for a per se rule that flight would always justify a stop, but held that evidence of unprovoked flight was a factor that could be considered, among others, as to whether there is reasonable suspicion to believe that an individual was involved in criminal activity. <=245> n243

The Court recognized that flight may be perfectly innocent activity ("not necessarily indicative of wrongdoing"), but is "certainly suggestive [of wrongdoing]." <=246> n244 The Court conceded that there was no empirical evidence concerning the relationship of flight to criminal activity, but repeated its prior rulings that reasonable suspicion depends upon "commonsense judgments and inferences about human behavior." <=247> n245 Terry itself "accepts the risk that officers may stop innocent people," <=248> n246 but the burden of showing something more than an "inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or "hunch' of criminal activity" is all that is required by the Fourth Amendment. <=249> n247

The majority ignored arguments concerning possible racial bias in the consideration of ambiguous factors like flight and presence in a high crime area. <=250> n248 Further, the Court did not consider whether minorities might be more likely to flee upon the arrival of police. By contrast, the dissent specifically pointed to the belief, "particularly [among] minorities," that contact with the police could be dangerous even for innocent persons, <=251> n249 and cited to law enforcement investigations, including those of the Attorneys General of New Jersey and Massachusetts, regarding racial profiling and stops without cause. <=252> n250 Justice Stevens noted that news reports in New York demonstrated "that society as a whole is paying a significant cost in infringement of liberty by these virtually random stops." <=253> n251

[*339] The Wardlow opinions simply pass each other by on the crucial issues of race and the relevance of empirical data on the standards that should control Fourth Amendment stop and frisk adjudication. What weight, if any, the Court would give to empirical evidence regarding the influence of race or the measurable relationship between alleged "suspicious" behavior and actual criminal conduct is not considered. <=254> n252

Scholarly commentary on the Court's stop and frisk jurisprudence has addressed the remarkable retreat from consideration of racial impact, but has often proceeded without attention to empirical data. A symposium entitled "Terry v. Ohio 30 Years Later," <=255> n253 presented analysis by 30 prominent judges, scholars and lawyers, of the legal and political impact of Terry and its progeny. These presentations reflected longstanding divisions over competing Fourth Amendment theory, <=256> n254 including the relevance of race in police street detentions. <=257> n255 But in the absence of empirical data, the articles did not address the racial impact or the Fourth Amendment compliance rate of Terry [*340] stops and frisks. Whether or not Terry represents "A Practically Perfect Doctrine," <=258> n256 cannot be answered on a purely theoretical level. Empirical evidence concerning the points of tension in Terry's balance of the needs of law enforcement, the privacy and autonomy rights of individuals, and the imperative of racial equality, is an essential element of the constitutional calculus.

Studies of pedestrian stops have been undertaken in New York City and Philadelphia. The Philadelphia study was made pursuant to a Settlement Agreement in a class action lawsuit against the Philadelphia Police Department that was filed in the wake of a federal criminal investigation that uncovered systemic corruption and misconduct in narcotics enforcement. The study considered stops of pedestrians and cars for selected periods and for selected police districts in Philadelphia in 1997. <=259> n257 For one-week periods in March and October, 1997, for four police districts in the City, every police-recorded stop of a car or a pedestrian was entered into a computer data base. <=260> n258 The data were then analyzed to determine whether there were racial patterns of enforcement and whether police were exercising their stop and frisk power with sufficient cause or suspicion. <=261> n259 The findings, though tentative in nature, raised serious questions concerning racial profiling and suspicionless stops and frisks. For example, in the Eighteenth District (West Philadelphia), where African-Americans constitute 70.3% of the population, for all pedestrian stops reported by the police for two different one-week periods in 1998, African-Americans were 93% of those stopped; whites constituted 4.7% of the stops. <=262> n260 Of the 214 stops of African-Americans pedestrians during these periods, 135 were conducted without a legally sufficient written explanation. <=263> n261

In the Eighth Police District, where the population was 91.2% white and 6.5% African-American, African-Americans constituted 26.8% of all those stopped. <=264> n262 Moreover, in this district, while a sufficient reason was provided by the police for approximately 40% of all whites stopped, only 15% of African-Americans were stopped with a [*341] stated legally sufficient reason. <=265> n263

While the statistical analysis did not control for crime rates and police deployment, the two factors that police officials and others have regularly cited as the primary reasons for any disparities in the gross numbers, <=266> n264 the study pointed to two sets of data that could be interpreted to show racial bias in street stops and frisks. First, the same patterns of highly disproportionate stops of minority drivers and pedestrians were observed.

<=267> n265 Second, in stops in which the police failed to provide any reason for their intervention, the racial disparity was greater than for stops made with a recorded reason. <=268> n266 Still, the Report recognized the need for further data collection and analysis. <=269> n267

On the issue of whether there were sufficient grounds under the Fourth Amendment and state constitutional principles for the stops and frisks, the data showed that over one-third of all stops either failed to state any reason for the police action or, if stated, the reasons were manifestly inadequate under governing constitutional standards. <=270> n268 In deference to the Police Department's response that many officers were simply not properly filling out the forms, as opposed to not having proper reasons for the stops, no conclusive findings were suggested. Commissioner Timoney has stated that the Department's review of stop data under the new police policies and practices shows a 50% reduction in the number of stops over comparable time periods. <=271> n269 This dramatic drop has occurred during a period of high numbers of arrests. <=272> n270 Significantly, the percentage reduction correlates with the large number of improper stops made under the "old regime." <=273> n271 A study of the stops and arrests made during a one-week period in July, 1999, after the reporting form and new training had been implemented, demonstrated continued evidence of racial [*342] bias in this area of police work. <=274> n272 In comparing the stops of African-Americans in largely black police districts to stops made in largely white districts, the statistical data showed hugely disproportionate stops by race in the white areas of the City, while stops in African-American areas were roughly proportionate to the population in those areas. <=275> n273 In some areas, there were more than ten times more stops of African-Americans as one would expect from the racial composition of the residential population. <=276> n274

In 1999, the Attorney General of New York State conducted a study of 175,000 stops made by New York City police over a fifteen-month period in 1998-1999. <=277> n275 This study was both broader in scope (analyzing every recorded stop made by the New York City Police Department for the 15 months), and statistically more sophisticated in its analysis of the data, including the use of regression analyses in its review of racial data, to ensure that the racial disparities reflected in the gross numbers were not explained by other factors, including differential crime rates among racial groups. <=278> n276 The results of this study parallel the findings made in Philadelphia and present compelling empirical data of racial profiling and large numbers of stops without legal justification. The Attorney General made the following findings:

During the covered period, minorities - and blacks in particular - were stopped at a higher rate than whites, relative to their respective percentages within the population of New York City. Specifically, the Attorney General found:

1.Blacks comprise 25.6% of the City's population, yet 50% of all persons "stopped" during the period were black. <=279> n277 Hispanics comprise 23.7% of the City's population, yet 33% of all "stops" were of Hispanics. <=280> n278 By contrast, whites are 43.4% of the City's population, but accounted for only 12.9% of all "stops." <=281> n279

2.This disparity in stop rates is particularly pronounced in precincts where the majority of the population is white. <=282> n280 In precincts in which blacks and Hispanics each represent less than 10% of the total population, individuals identified as belonging to these racial groups nevertheless accounted for more than half of the total "stops" during the covered period. <=283> n281 Blacks accounted for 30% and Hispanics accounted [*343] for 23.4% of all persons "stopped" in these precincts. <=284> n282

3.Precincts where minorities constitute the majority of the overall population tended to see more stop and frisk activity. Of the ten precincts showing the highest rate of "stop and frisk" activity (measured by "stops" per 1,000 residents), in only one (the 10th Precinct) was the majority of the population white. <=285> n283

4.Significantly, the rate at which stops led to arrests during the covered period also differed by race. Overall, only one out of nine stops resulted in an arrest. This stop/arrest rate differed, however, based on the race of the person stopped. <=286> n284 During the covered period, the NYPD "stopped" 9.5 blacks for every one "stop" which resulted in the arrest of a black, 8.8 Hispanics for every one "stop" that resulted in the arrest of an Hispanic, and 7.9 whites for every one "stop" that resulted in the arrest of a white suspect. <=287> n285 These data are a strong indicator of racial discrimination as they are not affected by crime rates, police deployment, or other factors that might explain the racial disparities in the gross data regarding stops.

5.To test the hypothesis that higher crime rates in minority communities fully explain the higher rate at which minorities are stopped, various regression analyses were conducted. <=288> n286 They demonstrated that differing crime rates alone cannot fully explain the increased rate of stops of minorities. For example, the Attorney General compared stop/arrest ratios for blacks to stop/arrest ratios for whites, and the same ratios for Hispanics and whites after accounting for the effect of differing crime rates. <=289> n287 During the covered period, and after accounting for these factors, blacks were "stopped" 23% more often than whites, across all crime categories. <=290> n288 In addition, after accounting for the effect of differing crime rates, Hispanics were "stopped" 39% more often than whites across crime categories. <=291> n289

6.With respect to the issue of whether "reasonable suspicion" existed for the stops, the Attorney General found that citywide, 15.4% of all "stops" forms contained insufficient factual statements to justify a "stop." <=292> n290 Further, the Attorney General noted that, "roughly one-quarter of all ['stop'] forms (23.5%) did not appear to provide sufficient information to allow a reader (including a police supervisor [*344] checking a junior officer's work) to determine whether the facts articulated amount to "reasonable suspicion.'" <=293> n291

The Attorney General's Report provides much reason for concern. The racial disparities are simply too large to ignore and thousands of persons are being stopped and frisked without any legal justification. <=294> n292 There are sound reasons for courts and police departments to take these findings seriously. As the Supreme Court has stressed, the "touchstone" of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence is the "reasonableness" of the governmental conduct. <=295> n293 Surely, if it is clear that the factors which the courts have endorsed as providing grounds for a "reasonable suspicion" of criminal activity or for suspecting that an individual is "dangerous," are empirically without foundation, the doctrinal calculus should be subject to modification.

The New York Attorney General's Report presents a significant challenge to the prevailing orthodoxy. First, by quantifying the arrest rates for persons stopped pursuant to investigative detentions and stop and frisk practices, we have a measure of the "success" rate for these police practices. Since reasonable suspicion is required to make these stops, there is now a statistical baseline from which we can judge whether the factors relied upon by the police sufficiently demonstrate this level of cause. Probable cause requires evidence that would lead a person of "reasonable prudence [to believe] that contraband or evidence of a crime will be found," <=296> n294 or to believe that there is a "fair probability" that the suspect has committed or is engaged in criminal activity. <=297> n295 Reasonable suspicion requires an objective and articulable belief that criminal activity is afoot, and a frisk requires a reasonable belief that the suspect is armed and dangerous. <=298> n296

[*345] The Court has not quantified these standards - other than to state that reasonable suspicion is "considerably less" than preponderance of the evidence <=299> n297 - but one would expect that where experienced police officers are engaging in practices that require a reasonable and articulable belief concerning possible criminal conduct, such conduct will be uncovered in more than a small percentage of the cases. If not, either the police are not being truthful in their assertions (a phenomenon that would not surprise those who have studied the criminal justice system), <=300> n298 or the standards for stops and frisks are not sufficiently demanding. There can be no precise delineation of a statistical standard for various police interventions (ranging from full scale searches and arrests to stops and frisks of persons engaged in "suspicious" conduct), but categorical estimates are possible. Thus, while the answer to this question will reflect a normative judgment, some attempts to quantify have been made. Professor Slobogin, for example, suggests that stops and frisks should result in a 20% to 30% rate of determination of criminal conduct. <=301> n299

In New York, only one in nine recorded stops resulted in an arrest <=302> n300 and there is good reason to believe that thousands of additional stops that disclosed no criminal conduct were not recorded. <=303> n301 Moreover, some of the arrests were for conduct that occurred during the stop [*346] and frisk. <=304> n302 The statistics with respect to the Street Crimes Unit are even more revealing. This Unit is composed of highly experienced officers, a characteristic that the courts repeatedly state requires substantial weight in determining whether the officer's actions were reasonable. <=305> n303 Not only was the success rate of this "experienced" unit poorer than the Department as a whole, but in the very category of policing in which they place their greatest emphasis - the removal of firearms from pedestrians - their record was the weakest. <=306> n304 In only 2.5 of every 100 stops in which the factual predicate was suspicion that a suspect was carrying a weapon did the police find a firearm. <=307> n305 There are two principle explanations for these troubling statistics. First, as discussed above, "reasonable suspicion" allows the police to effectuate stops and frisks on a relatively low quantum of evidence that permits broad "commonsense judgments" concerning human behavior. <=308> n306 Historically the Court has permitted stops in situations in which the conduct observed is likely to be innocent, or the source of the information on which the stop is based is highly questionable. <=309> n307 Thus, if the judgment is made that there are too many stops of innocent persons, a somewhat different calibration of the standards for these stops may be necessary.

Second, the police may be making stops without the requisite reasonable suspicion, by reason of misapplication of legal standards or the deliberate decision to ignore limitations on their powers. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that in departments that promote aggressive policing tactics without institutional safeguards sufficient to protect against abuses, a large number of the stops of innocent persons are the product of random, arbitrary stops, particularly of minorities. Remedying this problematic situation is far more difficult. It will require first and foremost a substantial change in policy and [*347] practice in police departments that have tolerated random and suspicionless searches and strict internal monitoring, and supervision and discipline of officers and supervisors who engage or acquiesce in this type of policing. <=310> n308 It will also require the courts to be far more skeptical of police testimony in both criminal and civil actions. And it will require a change in the application of legal doctrine, including substantive constitutional standards and remedial measures. <=311> n309

While the issues of race bias and cause for stops and frisks are often addressed as distinct constitutional matters, not infrequently police investigative detentions present concurrent consideration of both factors. For example, in Brown v. City of Oneonta, <=312> n310 a police manhunt followed the report of an assault of an elderly woman in the town of Oneonta, New York. <=313> n311 She informed the police that her attacker was a young black man and that he had cut himself on his hand during the incident. <=314> n312 Fewer than 300 blacks lived in this town, and at a nearby State University, approximately 2% of the students were black. <=315> n313 The police made a "sweep" of the town, stopping and questioning over 200 black men and inspecting their hands for cuts. <=316> n314

In a civil rights suit, the court ruled that a selection of all black men for investigation in a case in which they had a racial description and a relatively small number of possible suspects, even though there was no description of anything beyond race and age ("young" black man), did not constitute intentional race discrimination. <=317> n315 According to the court, the police had a racial description, and it was not intentional race discrimination to investigate all persons in that racial group. <=318> n316

Having isolated and rejected race as a constitutional problem, the court proceeded to analyze the Fourth Amendment claims to determine whether any of the plaintiffs were "seized" by the police in their respective encounters. <=319> n317 The Supreme Court has ruled that a seizure occurs (thus mandating application of Fourth Amendment "cause" standards) only where the "force or show of authority" is sufficient to lead a reasonable person to believe that she is not free to leave. <=320> n318 [*348] The circuit court recognized that the description of a young, black man was too vague to justify a stop, <=321> n319 and in assessing whether young, black men approached by the Oneonta police were subject to a "seizure," the court found such action where a police officer pointed a spotlight at the plaintiff, said, "what, are you stupid? Come here. I want to talk to you," <=322> n320 and instructed him to show his hands. <=323> n321

A second plaintiff was stopped and encircled by three police officers on the street, questioned as to whether he was a student and requested to produce his identification. <=324> n322 As he started to leave an officer asked him to come back and to see his hands. <=325> n323 Again the court found a seizure. <=326> n324 One can only speculate what would have happened to these individuals if they had refused the police command to stop and show their hands. <=327> n325

Brown's equal protection analysis finesses the difficult issues. The fact that a description of a suspect includes a racial characteristic should be the start and not the end of the analysis. Race is surely an appropriate consideration in such an investigation, but where it becomes the "predominant" factor, strict scrutiny applies, <=328> n326 Under this approach, a court should consider what other descriptive characteristics are known, the size of the potential community of "suspects," and the intrusiveness of the police investigation. Thus, it may be that a court should distinguish between benign forms of investigation (for example, a simple written inquiry to speak with the police) and a physical confrontation or forcible stop. Regardless of where the line should be drawn, the racial discrimination issue cannot be decided on the simplistic notion that any racial description permits a sweeping, intrusive inquiry. The disquiet that Brown produces results from of the artificial doctrinal lines that the Supreme Court has drawn around the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.

[*349] Of course, beyond the substantive doctrinal issues, consideration must also be given to the remedial measures that may be available to persons subjected to unconstitutional police stop and frisk practices. Here, too, as I now explain, a web of doctrinal, procedural and practical barriers make vindication of protected rights far from a certainty.

IV. The Remedial Framework

The principle that "the very essence of civil liberty certainly consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury," <=329> n327 has never been a truism in our constitutional framework, and both legislative and judicially imposed limitations on remedial mechanisms can preclude the relief necessary to vindicate the substantive legal claim. <=330> n328 In this section, I explore potential remedies for racial profiling and random stops and frisks (suppression of evidence, civil damage actions, and equitable relief) to determine their availability and efficacy in these cases. <=331> n329

A. Suppression of Evidence

The exclusionary rule will provide a remedy for some victims of illegal stops, but it is not well suited to provide systemic relief from racial profiling and random stop and frisk practices. First, as a doctrinal matter, if probable cause otherwise exists, racially discriminatory stops are not subject to the Fourth Amendment exclusionary rule, <=332> n330 and the Supreme Court has yet to recognize a suppression remedy under the Fourteenth Amendment. Second, since most persons who are subjected to these practices are not arrested, the matter is never subject to criminal adjudication.

Third, where the police fail to comply with the substantive standards of the Fourth Amendment, limitations on the application of the exclusionary rule may still permit use of the evidence. Thus, the [*350] "standing" requirement,

[*298] skin. <=15> n14

In 1997, Janneral Denson, an African-American woman returning from Jamaica to Fort Lauderdale, Florida, was pulled out of the arrival line by a U.S. Customs agent, taken to a local hospital, handcuffed to a bed rail and forced to drink four cups of a laxative. <=16> n15 She protested that she was not carrying drugs and was seven months pregnant. <=17> n16 Over twenty-four hours after her detention, when her bowels showed no sign of drugs, she was released. <=18> n17 Eight days later, after severe diarrhea and bleeding, she underwent an emergency Caesarean. <=19> n18 Her son was born weighing three pounds, four ounces. <=20> n19 In a similar incident, Amanda Buritica was held for twenty-five hours, subjected to a full strip search, x-rays, and forced to swallow laxatives in what she termed was "the most degrading, humiliating thing I have been through." <=21> n20

In June of 1998, Curtis Rodriguez, a Latino attorney, was driving on Highway 152 near San Jose, California, and observed five traffic stops by state police, all of Latino drivers. <=22> n21 He stopped to take photographs of two of these stops and was then followed and stopped by the state highway officers. <=23> n22 When Rodriguez refused consent to search his car, the officer replied "I am in fear for my life," and proceeded to search the vehicle. <=24> n23 No contraband was found. <=25> n24

These incidents - stops, searches, and arrests without cause and of persons of color based on their race - are repeated thousands of times every year throughout the United States, and in too many instances reflect official police policy or practice. The "driving while black" phenomenon has been the subject of much scholarly and popular analysis, but for the most part these accounts of racial profiling have focused on highway stops and searches and have not addressed the role that race plays in pedestrian stop and frisk practices. <=26> n25 Moreover, while there is substantial commentary regarding [*299] the Fourth Amendment standards that govern stop and frisk practices, <=27> n26 almost no attention has been given to the question of stops and frisks conducted without legal justification, independent from racial profiling concerns. Even if we could eliminate racial bias in street level policing, the problem of arbitrary stops and searches would still be present. Empirical studies demonstrate that while there is substantial operational and doctrinal overlap, the dual problems of racial profiling and stops and searches without adequate cause deserve separate consideration. <=28> n27

Consider the following recent studies:

In New Jersey, litigation and governmental investigations concerning allegations of racial profiling on the New Jersey Turnpike provide comprehensive and compelling data demonstrating a long standing [*300] pattern of racial profiling. In criminal litigation arising from drug arrests on the Turnpike, a court found substantial evidence that stops and searches on the Turnpike were highly disproportionate based on race. <=29> n28 The court determined that approximately 15% of all drivers on the Turnpike were minorities, that virtually all drivers violated the traffic laws (and in particular for speeding), and that blacks and whites violated traffic laws at almost exactly the same rate, but that 42% of stops and 73.2% of arrests were of blacks motorists, resulting in respective disparities of 16.35 and 54.2 standard deviations. <=30> n29 Further, the court found that while radar stops were relatively consistent with <=333> n331 the "good faith exception," <=334> n332 and narrow conceptions of an individual's expectation of privacy, <=335> n333 have significantly limited the potential remedial impact of the exclusionary rule.

Fourth, discovery in criminal cases is far more restricted than in civil litigation <=336> n334 and therefore the evidence necessary to demonstrate that racial profiling is a practice or policy (the data that can be collected from records of other stops by the police department) will not be available to individual defendants. Moreover, even if the criminal discovery rules mandated disclosure of the records in other stops and searches, most defendants will not have the resources, time, or expertise to retrieve and analyze the documents, or to make the requisite statistical showing in support of a constitutionally-based suppression of evidence claim.

Fifth, many suppression motions turn on credibility, and where such a determination against a police officer requires the suppression of critical evidence, courts frequently decide these cases in favor of the prosecution notwithstanding the not-infrequent occasions of police perjury. <=337> n335 The evidence that might persuade a court that an officer's version of the events is questionable or fabricated is normally not within the scope of the criminal discovery rules or within the investigative reach of a defense lawyer. For example, in litigation concerning car stops on I-95 in the Philadelphia area, civil discovery demonstrated that hundreds of cars were stopped without adequate cause; the police stopped cars at will and listed patently false reasons for the stop. <=338> n336 In many instances the police gave no adequate reason for a stop (where no contraband was recovered) or falsely asserted [*351] that a rear tail light was defective, a rear view mirror was obstructed by a hanging object, or that the driver was proceeding "recklessly." <=339> n337 Affidavits from persons who were stopped in these circumstances rebutted the asserted justifications for the stops and strongly suggested that the police were engaged in a widespread practice of racial profiling and random car stops without even the minimal basis for a stop required by Whren. <=340> n338 Further, police reports concerning alleged consent to search were seriously disputed by a large number of "innocent" subjects (and other witnesses) of these stops. <=341> n339 Had this information been available to defendants in criminal cases arising from the drug interdiction program, more persuasive arguments could have been made on the credibility issues. <=342> n340

A notable exception to the general ineffectiveness of the exclusionary rule as an antidote for pattern and practice violations is the litigation of suppression issues in State v. Soto, <=343> n341 the case that became the opening wedge in the New Jersey Turnpike racial profiling scandal. <=344> n342 Invoking New Jersey's comparatively liberal discovery procedures in cases alleging selective prosecution, <=345> n343 the defendants in a consolidated motion to suppress challenging stop and search practices on the southern end of the Turnpike presented evidence that African-Americans were being stopped at rates that far exceeded their use of the Turnpike and they were authorized by the trial court to discover a broad range of police documents relating to all stops and searches by state police for the relevant time period. <=346> n344 These documents, statistical studies of the data, and internal operating documents of the state police were sufficient to prove an extraordinary pattern of racial profiling and, under state law principles, the trial court suppressed the evidence in the cases. <=347> n345

REV_00258729

[*352] As the evidence concerning racial profiling continues to develop, some courts may be more receptive to pattern-and practice-type discovery and proof in the criminal suppression hearing. However, it is unlikely that the exclusionary rule will engender systemic change in police practices in these areas.

B. Civil Damage Actions

The federal civil rights act, 42 U.S.C. 1983, provides for damages for harm caused by unconstitutional stops and searches conducted by state or local officials. <=349> n346 Claims against federal defendants (usually in the context of border, customs and airport searches) can be maintained directly under the Constitution as a Bivens action, <=350> n347 or under the Federal Tort Claims Act. <=351> n348 The case law and commentary on Section 1983 and Bivens actions is extensive and I will comment briefly only on the potential uses and limitations of damage actions as a means of providing redress to persons unlawfully stopped or searched, and as a means of effectuating systematic reforms.

Damage awards have some potential for triggering institutional reforms. Large verdicts in cases involving unconstitutional practices or customs may deter future misconduct. Proof of racial bias has led to significant damages in the police misconduct context. <=352> n349 Where unconstitutional [*353] practices affect large numbers of persons, as is the case with racial profiling and random stops and searches, the potential damages exposure is commensurately substantial, and governmental agencies may seek to avoid large judgments by a change in practices and policies. Thus, while most commentators have correctly asserted that civil damage actions are not an effective means of achieving systemic or institutional change, <=353> n350 in selected areas, the conventional wisdom may not control.

Other limitations of the damages remedy are well recognized. First, not every violation of a Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment right will establish an entitlement to a damages remedy. The doctrine of qualified immunity provides a broad scope of protection from individual liability from damages where the right asserted was not "clearly established," <=354> n351 or where a reasonably well-trained officer would not have known that his conduct would violate the Constitution. <=355> n352 In Hunter v. Bryant, <=356> n353 the Court ruled that immunity would protect an officer if it was reasonable to believe that probable cause existed, even if it did not. <=357> n354 Chief Judge Newman has criticized this conceptual formulation:

It is not readily apparent how a police officer could have an objectively reasonable belief that conduct was lawful when the unlawfulness of that conduct rests on a determination that an objectively reasonable police office would not have acted. And the situation is especially perplexing in a case like the pending one where, for purposes of removing the first issue from the jury, it has been determined, correctly in our view, that no reasonable juror could fail to find that the officer's conduct was unlawful.

Nevertheless, we have been authoritatively instructed that the objective reasonableness component of the inquiry as to lawfulness is not the same as the objective reasonableness component of the inquiry as to qualified immunity. <=358> n355

[*354] Eleventh Amendment immunity and the statutory limitations on municipal liability may preclude recovery from the only sources that can actually satisfy a judgment. The Eleventh Amendment prohibits suit against a state or state entity (e.g., the Division of State Police) for damages, <=359> n356 and under the Court's section 1983 jurisprudence, a municipal employer is liable only if the constitutional violation was caused by a municipal law, policy, practice, or custom. <=360> n357

As a practical matter, very few violations of the rights of motorists or pedestrians are likely to be filed as civil rights actions. Where contraband is discovered and a criminal prosecution initiated, any civil case must normally await the outcome of the criminal process, and may be precluded by findings and judgments made in the criminal litigation. <=361> n358 Even if there is no legal preclusive effect, the fact of the criminal conviction may undermine any civil suit. Moreover, even where the criminal case is disposed of favorably to the defendant, if the contraband can still be fairly attributed to him, juries are unlikely to provide compensation, even for clear constitutional violations.

In cases in which no contraband is found, and a strong legal claim for damages can be stated, the damages may be too modest to justify full-scale litigation. Absent particularly harsh or malicious conduct, the damages that flow from a relatively short stop and incidental frisk or search, may appear to be nominal to some juries. <=362> n359 As a result, such cases are not likely to attract competent counsel. <=363> n360 Moreover, many civil rights plaintiffs are burdened by racial and class characteristics that may prejudice juries against them. Jurors tend to dismiss their allegations, often awarding them less than a full measure of [*355] compensation. <=364> n361

The prospects change radically, however, if claims can be joined, and particularly if a class action can be maintained. By the very nature of drug interdiction and related car and pedestrian stop operations, thousands of persons may be subjected to unlawful practices. The case for liability becomes exponentially stronger with the supportive allegations and testimony of hundreds or thousands of "innocent" victims of governmental overreaching, and the damage claims become substantial enough to sustain federal litigation. Fear of damages could cause governmental units to reconsider their practices and policies, but are generally insufficient, standing alone, to effectuate institutional change. <=365> n362

C. Injunctive Relief

Federal injunctive relief against state or local officers upon a showing of a violation of federal constitutional or statutory rights is potentially the most effective and far-reaching remedial mechanism for preventing future violations of rights. The injunctive action is not encumbered by personal immunities and the Eleventh Amendment bar is avoided under the Ex Parte Young doctrine. <=366> n363 However, the federal court's equitable powers are circumscribed by federalism, comity, and standing doctrines. <=367> n364 To establish a claim for equitable relief, the plaintiff must meet the ordinary requirements for an injunction: that legal remedies are inadequate and that plaintiff is in danger of sustaining substantial and immediate injury if the injunction is not granted. <=368> n365

REV_00258731

The requirement of a likelihood of future injury has been treated by the Supreme Court as a separate jurisdictional component: that the plaintiff must show a "credible threat" and not mere "conjectural" future injury. <=369> n366 In City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, <=370> n367 the plaintiff was stopped by Los Angeles police officers for a traffic violation. <=371> n368 After Lyons got out of his car, the officers drew their guns, ordered him to place his hands on top of his head and, without provocation, placed [*356] him in a chokehold causing damage to his larynx. <=372> n369 The Supreme Court ruled that Lyons had not proved a sufficient likelihood that he would again be subject to a police chokehold to make out a case or controversy on his request for an injunction. <=373> n370

The Court stated:

In order to establish an actual controversy in this case, Lyons would have had not only to allege that he would have another encounter with the police but also to make the incredible assertion either (1) that all police officers in Los Angeles always choke any citizen with whom they happen to have an encounter, whether for the purpose of arrest, issuing a citation, or for questioning, or (2) that the City ordered or authorized police officers to act in such manner. <=374> n371

While the first condition appears draconian, the alternative ground for standing, that the conduct sought to be enjoined is officially authorized, may be more easily established in racial profiling cases, where a pattern and practice of illegal stops of large numbers of persons is proven. <=375> n372 Where the alleged unconstitutional conduct is the product of official policy or practice, there is a far greater likelihood that the conduct will be repeated and that a plaintiff who engages in activities that will bring him into the purview of those practices will suffer future injury. The existence of a policy that will directly affect the plaintiff or members of plaintiff class may be sufficient to establish standing. <=376> n373

[*357] The Supreme Court distinguished Lyons in Friends of the Earth v. Laidlaw Environmental Services, <=377> n374 in granting Article III standing to plaintiffs in an environmental lawsuit challenging the pollution of a river. <=378> n375 The plaintiffs alleged that they had suffered "injury in fact" as they were deterred from using the river for recreational purposes. <=379> n376 The Court ruled that there was "nothing "improbable' about the proposition that a company's continuous and pervasive discharge of pollutants into a river would cause nearby residents to curtail their recreational use of that waterway and would subject them to other economic and aesthetic harms." <=380> n377 The Court ruled that Lyons did not bar the action as the unlawful conduct was occurring at the time of the filing of the complaint, <=381> n378 a holding that confirms the significant difference between allegations of occasional unlawful conduct and practice and policy cases. Of course, a polluted river can affect everyone using that water source while racial profiling on highways randomly affects thousands out of a much larger class of drivers. Thus, the question becomes whether once a policy of racial profiling is established, it would be "improbable" for minorities to avoid certain highways or for certain members of the minority group to be stopped on those roads. <=382> n379

Beyond the "official policy" argument, there are several grounds for distinguishing Lyons. First, the Court stressed that the past encounter would only repeat itself if Lyons would again violate the law, thus prompting a police stop, and the highly unusual improper application of a chokehold. <=383> n380 But as the courts have recognized, where for reasons beyond the control of the plaintiff, she is unable to avoid repeating the conduct that led to the original injury, there is a greater likelihood of future injury justifying injunctive relief. <=384> n381 In racial profiling cases where the claim is made that the stop is based on an immutable characteristic and that the plaintiff has not engaged in unlawful activity, this distinction may be sufficient to provide standing. <=385> n382

[*358] Moreover, the conduct adversely affects a class of persons by reason of the invidious characteristic of race. In Lyons, the Court may have been reluctant to make a definitive ruling on chokeholds (which are permissible in some circumstances) without the presence of a party who had a clear stake in the outcome. Racial bias in policing can never be justified and permitting a challenge to such practices by persons who might not otherwise have standing to challenge police policies would be consistent with the Court's willingness to grant broad standing to challenge racially discriminatory practices. <=386> n383

Second, Lyons was subjected to the chokehold on only one occasion and the record in the case demonstrated that this type of force, while serious and at times deadly, <=387> n384 was infrequently employed by the Department. <=388> n385 By contrast, racial profiling plaintiffs, either individually or as members of a class, may have been subjected to numerous stops. Thus, in cases where the plaintiffs alleged repeated stops and a pattern of unconstitutional stops and searches of others, the lower courts have found standing to invoke the court's equitable powers. <=389> n386 Where a class action is certified, standing should be determined by aggregating all of the factual claims of the class members. <=390> n387 Under current doctrine, however, a court may still view the likelihood of future injury as to any particular person to be remote (in profiling situations, given the large number of drivers even a policy of stopping racial minorities may not lead to repeated stops of a particular person), and for that reason rule that a practice that affects thousands of persons is insulated from judicial equitable review because most individuals are not likely to be the victim on more than one occasion. <=391> n388

[*359]

D. Federal Government Intervention

The Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 authorizes the United States, through the Attorney General, to bring civil actions for declaratory or equitable relief against police departments engaged in a pattern or practice of deprivation of constitutional or statutory rights. <=392> n389 The statute provides potentially broad grounds for intervention and relief, but until recently practical political realities muted the law's potential reach. <=393> n390 Since 1994, the DOJ has taken legal action against five law enforcement agencies: it has reached consent decrees with the City of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, the City of Steubenville, Ohio, <=394> n391 and the State of New Jersey (with respect to the racial profiling on the New Jersey Turnpike). <=395> n392 It has reached a Settlement Agreement with Montgomery County, Maryland (racial profiling on I-95) <=396> n393 and has initiated litigation against the Columbus, Ohio Police Department. <=397> n394

[*360] The Department of Justice and private litigators have crafted consent decrees and other settlement agreements that mandate sweeping structural and institutional reforms. <=398> n395 These settlements and consent decrees require police departments to collect and maintain a wide range of information (in computerized form) that is critical to the effective internal management of departments and to external monitoring of abuse and corruption issues. Properly designed and implemented, these monitoring systems have the potential for remedying misconduct in the same way that COMPSTAT systems have helped police recognize patterns of criminal conduct. <=399> n396 In the area of racial profiling, the decrees mandate that race not be considered in a decision to stop or search (unless the police are acting on a specific description) and that in all stops, searches, and arrests, the department record and maintain information as to the race of the suspect and the reasons for the police action. <=400> n397 Further, departments are required to computerize their record-keeping operations in a manner that creates accessible fields of relevant information. <=401> n398

Police departments are also mandated to initiate early warning systems to alert Commanders and outside monitors of troublesome trends or performances before they become acutely dangerous to the public. <=402> n399 Officers who are involved in a disproportionate number of [*361] questionable stops or searches, use of force, or other discretionary conduct, or who are the subject of repeated civilian complaints, can be identified and counseled and re-trained even before disciplinary action may be warranted. The consent decrees require departments to ensure the integrity and fairness of internal affairs investigations into civilian complaints. <=403> n400

The New Jersey Turnpike Agreement prohibits troopers from considering the race, nationality, or ethnicity of motorists or passengers in determining which vehicles to stop or in "enforcement action or procedure" (e.g., searches), unless race or national or ethnic origin was part of a description of a suspect. <=404> n401 To effectuate this policy, the Consent Decree requires officers to record data on motor vehicle stops, including the gender and race or ethnicity of the driver and any passenger who was the subject of a "procedure," and the reason for the stop and any search resulting from the stop. <=405> n402 Further, supervisors must review troopers' reports on stops and may also review the corresponding audio/visual tapes. <=406> n403 When such review reveals a possible violation of the provisions of the decree or shortcomings in meeting the reporting or recording requirements, "nondisciplinary" action such as counseling or more training may be ordered. <=407> n404

New Jersey is also required to develop a "Management Awareness Program" that uses the data collected by troopers, the results of investigations, and other sources to "identify and modify potentially problematic behavior" by troopers. <=408> n405 Data analyses under the MAP must include:

REV_00258734

[A] comparison of racial/ethnic percentages of motor vehicle stops (by reason for the stop ...) and racial/ethnic percentages of enforcement actions and procedures taken in connection with or during the course of such stops, with a benchmark racial/ethnic percentage if available;

[A] comparison of racial/ethnic percentages for such stops with the racial/ethnic percentages for enforcement actions taken in connection with or during the course of such stops;

[*362]

[A] comparison of racial/ethnic percentages for consent searches of vehicles, and requests for consent to search vehicles, with "find" rates by race/ethnicity for motor vehicle consent searches;

[A] comparison of racial/ethnic percentages for non-consensual searches of motor vehicles with "find rates" by race/ethnicity for motor vehicle non-consensual searches. <=409> n406

The New Jersey Decree does not remedy all problems (for example, it does not prohibit pretextual stops), but if fully implemented it has the very strong potential of ending racial profiling on the New Jersey Turnpike. The combination of detailed data collection and analysis, limits on consent searches, and mandatory internal and external audits provide powerful tools for reform. <=410> n407

The Philadelphia Police Department Agreement covers a broader range of police practices. Among other provisions, it requires (1) computerization of standard police paperwork and all information relating to citizen complaints, use of force, firearms discharges, and other police activities that may disclose misconduct in a format that permits retrieval of information by officer, district, special squads, and category of police work, <=411> n408 (2) close reviews and audits of narcotics officers, including their applications for search warrants, "find" rates and use of force during searches, surveillance records, and use of informants, <=412> n409 (3) a substantial reform of the procedures of the Internal Affairs Division, <=413> n410 (4) accountability of supervisors for the preventable misconduct of police officials, <=414> n411 and (5) procedures and policies to counter racial bias in policing. <=415> n412 On this last issue, the Agreement provides:

A. Specific and detailed training with respect to equal treatment of citizens [and] promulgation of disciplinary regulations for racially biased police work.

B. A Deputy Commissioner [must] (1) monitor police records and complaints as they involve minorities and allegations of racial discrimination, (2) act as a liaison to representatives of minority communities and to officials in the Department dealing with race related issues, and (3) [*363] monitor programs with respect to hiring and promotion of minorities.

REV_00258735

C. Pedestrian and vehicle stops [are to] be recorded ... even if the stop does not yield information, detention, evidence or an arrest. Each document must state the reason for the stop, for any police action taken (e.g., frisk, search, questioning), and the race of the person(s) stopped.

[A] review and audit, on a regular basis, [of] the patterns of these stops to determine whether impermissible racial factors are involved. Individuals identified on the police reports, but against whom no charges have been made, should be contacted on a random basis to determine if the police conduct was justified and to examine any possible racial patterns.

D. Individual officers' and supervisors' files (as computerized) should contain any allegations or findings of racial bias. In addition, the records of stops, searches, arrest and civilian complaints in the files should be periodically reviewed to determine whether racial bias or patterns are evident. <=416> n413

V. The Elements of Reform

Three developments have converged in the past few years with the distinct potential of altering the legal and political landscape of contemporary policing practices. First, there is almost universal condemnation of "racial profiling" and, while the debate as to the proper definition of this term will continue, there is growing support for the principle that race cannot be used to any degree to support a discretionary judgment by a police officer to stop, frisk, or search a suspect, except where a description of a suspect has been provided. Police departments will be pressed to adopt and implement policies prohibiting racial profiling and the courts are likely to intervene where patterns of racial profiling are proven.

Second, for the first time, reliable data are being collected and analyzed with respect to both racial disparities in stops and searches and whether adequate cause exists for the police intrusions. These data are essential to any serious effort to reconsider constitutional doctrine and to address the remedies necessary for racial profiling and other arbitrary police conduct.

Third, effective judicial remedial measures that reflect a more progressive police management philosophy have been adopted and, if properly implemented, hold the promise for significant amelioration of past abuses. Notwithstanding the serious obstacles that make federal injunctive relief far too problematical, strong pleadings and evidentiary showings have resulted in some preliminary adjudications sustaining complaints, certifying class actions, and permitting discovery of critical police department records. Further, the Department of Justice has begun to exercise its powers to litigate pattern and practice [*364] cases of police misconduct and the Department as entered into a number of state of the art consent decrees.

These developments create the potential for bridging the enormous gap between the promises of the Constitution and the realities of street level policing. Ultimately, the abuses will be significantly reduced only where there are fundamental reforms in police policies and practices. The following are essential elements of a reform agenda.

A. Legislative and Administrative Measures

. Racial profiling should be prohibited. Race should not be a permissible factor in the discretionary decision to stop, search, or arrest, unless the police have specific descriptive racial information concerning a suspect.

. Law enforcement agencies should be mandated by law to collect, maintain, and report all relevant data concerning the race of persons stopped and searched, the legal cause for traffic and pedestrian stops and searches, and all relevant circumstances surrounding the stop (e.g., requests for consent, use of narcotics dogs, use of force). The provisions of the pending federal legislation on traffic stop statistics and the terms of the Consent Decrees entered into by the Department of Justice and State of New Jersey should provide models for legislatures and law enforcement agencies.

. Analysis of these data should include a comparison of all relevant categories of racial/ethnic percentages for car stops and searches and of all police investigatory methods used during these stops (with a benchmark racial/ethnic percentage if available).

. Analysis of data concerning pedestrian stops should include the same types of racial/ethnic comparisons for stops, frisks, and searches. Audits should be performed to determine whether stops are being made with adequate cause.

. Pretextual stops should be prohibited. Traffic stops should be made only for observed traffic violations or where adequate cause supports a criminal investigatory stop. The decision to stop should be made independent of race and should not be made on the mere suspicion of drug possession.

. In all circumstances in which consent to search is requested, the person should be informed of her right to refuse consent. All consent requests should be recorded, and all consents should be in writing and signed by the driver, passenger, or pedestrian who was stopped.

[*365]

B. Doctrinal Reform

. The Fourth Amendment should be construed to prohibit pretextual stops based on the race of the "suspect."

. Statistical evidence of significant racial disparities in stops and searches (controlled for relevant non-racial factors) should be sufficient to state a prima facie case of Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI claims of race discrimination.

. Constitutional standing principles for raising constitutional claims of racial discrimination and for lack of cause of stops and searches should be adjusted to permit federal lawsuits where patterns or practices of unconstitutional conduct are alleged and where plaintiffs have been subjected to the complained-of practices.

. An evidentiary showing of significant numbers of stops without legal justification should provide grounds for class monetary and injunctive relief.

. Discovery rules in criminal procedure proceedings should be substantially broadened to require disclosure of pattern and practice evidence.

. Where categories of conduct that have been recognized as permissible grounds for an investigative stop are demonstrated by empirical evidence to result in extremely low rates of determined criminal conduct, the Court should reconsider the Fourth Amendment standards associated with this conduct.

C. Enforcement

. The Department of Justice should vigorously investigate and litigate pattern and practice police misconduct and should continue to draft and implement consent decrees that advance "best practices" and which effectively control unconstitutional practices.

. Police Departments should ensure that their Internal Affairs Unit conduct investigations of police misconduct with impartiality, integrity, and with the necessary resources. There should be "early warning systems" capable of detecting patterns of misconduct by individual officers or units within the Department. Supervisors should be held accountable for preventable misconduct of line officers.

. Civilian review should be established to ensure competent and vigorous external oversight of allegations of individual and institutional (pattern and practice) misconduct.

[*366] * * *

Policing by racial stereotypes and by serendipity has long been the norm in too many locations. The challenge to these long established practices must be multi-faceted and include political, administrative, and legal reform. The integrity of the constitutional framework hangs in the balance.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Wilson v. Tinicum Township, No. Civ. A. 92-6617, 1993 WL 280205, at 2 (E.D. Pa. July 20, 1993) (Opinion on Class Action Certification).

n2. Id.

the percentage of minority violators, discretionary stops (made by patrol officers involved in drug interdiction) resulted in double the number of stops of minorities. <=31> n30 Of all stops resulting in the issuance of a traffic citation, 88% involved cars with a minority driver or passenger and 63% involved a black male 30 years or younger. <=32> n31

A study conducted by the Attorney General of New Jersey confirmed and expanded upon these findings. The Attorney General determined that searches of cars on the Turnpike were even more racially disparate than the initial stops: 77.2% of all "consent" searches were of minorities and blacks. <=33> n32 The Attorney General concluded that the use of arrest statistics could not justify racially disparate stops and searches, as those arrests were the product of racially discriminatory law enforcement practices. <=34> n33

In Volusia County, Florida, where Sheriff's cars were fitted with video cameras that recorded routine traffic stops, 148 hours of videotape documenting over 1,000 stops of cars on a stretch of I-95 where 5% of the drivers were African-American or Latino, revealed that nearly 70% of the persons stopped by the police were minorities. <=35> n34

In Illinois, the state police initiated a drug interdiction program ("Operation Valkyrie") in which they used aggressive enforcement of traffic laws on interstates to stop motorists and then examine them and their cars for indicators of drug trafficking. <=36> n35 A statistical study of the racial impact of these stops on Hispanic drivers showed the following. <=37> n36

[*301] While Hispanics comprise less than 8% of the Illinois population, and take fewer than 3% of the personal vehicle trips in Illinois, they comprise approximately 30% of the motorists stopped by drug interdiction officers for discretionary offenses such as failure to signal a lane change or driving one to four miles over the speed limit. <=38> n37

Troopers assigned to Valkyrie teams stop Hispanic motorists for traffic violations two or three times more frequently than other troopers patrolling the same highways and charged with enforcing the same laws. <=39> n38 For example, in three counties in northern Illinois, where Hispanics comprise less than 3% of the local driving-age population, Hispanics make up 25% of the persons stopped by Valkyrie officers, while the rate for non-Valkyrie officers is 8%. <=40> n39

While Hispanics compromise 27% of the searches conducted by Valkyrie officers, troopers find contraband in a lower percentage of the vehicles of Hispanic motorists than in the vehicles of white motorists. <=41> n40

Statistical studies conducted of car and pedestrian stops in Philadelphia also demonstrate patterns of stops without cause and racial profiling. <=42> n41 For a one-week period in July, 1999, for car and pedestrian stops made in predominantly white police districts, the ratio of African-Americans who were stopped was up to ten times higher than one would expect from population data. <=43> n42 In predominantly minority police districts, stops were closely aligned to population data. <=44> n43 Further, one-third of all pedestrian stops were made without sufficient written explanation. <=45> n44

[*302] In Ohio, a study of the traffic ticketing of several police

n3. Id.

n4. Ann Stewart, Black Motorists Sue Police for Stopping Them on Highway, Gannett News Service, Nov. 19, 1992, available at 1992 WL 9397933.

n5. See Wilson 1993 WL 280205, at 2.

n6. Id. As to the officer's statement, see Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 298 (1999) (suspect's admission made with "refreshing candor").

n7. Gerald v. Oklahoma Dep't of Pub. Safety, CIV-99-676-R, slip op. at 1 (W.D. Okla. Dec. 21, 1999); ACLU, Driving While Black: Racial Profiling on our Nation's Highways 3 (1999) [hereinafter ACLU Report]; Kevin Johnson, ACLU Campaign Yields Race Bias Suit, USA Today, May 19, 1999, at 4A.

n8. ACLU Report, supra note 7; Johnson, supra note 7.

n9. ACLU Report, supra note 7.

n10. Gerald, slip op. at 6.

n11. Bob Herbert, In America: Attention Must be Paid, N.Y. Times, Sept. 30, 1999, at A29; Dinitia Smith, Actor Resumes Role After Ordeal, N.Y. Times, July 22, 1999, at B3.

n12. Smith, supra note 11.

n13. Id.

n14. Id.

n15. Stephen Barr, Two Allege Racial Bias by Customs, Wash. Post, May 21, 1999, A29.

n16. Id.

n17. Id.

n18. Id.

n19. Id.

n20. Id.

n21. Gary Webb, DWB, Esquire, Apr. 1999, at 120; see also Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131 (N.D. Cal. 2000) (addressing the litigation that resulted from these events).

n22. Webb, supra note 21, at 120.

n23. Id.

n24. Id.

n25. See, e.g., David Cole, No Equal Justice: Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System 34-41 (1999) (discussing pretextual traffic stops of minority motorists); ACLU Report, supra note 7 (reporting on the problem of racial profiling during highway traffic stops); Angela J. Davis, Race, Cops, and Traffic Stops, 51 U. Miami L. Rev. 425 (1997) (discussing the discretionary nature of pretextual traffic stops and their discriminatory effect on minority motorists); David A. Harris, "Driving While Black" and All Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops, 87 J. Crim. L. &

Criminology 544 (1997) [hereinafter Harris, Driving While Black] (discussing the effects of Whren v. United States on pretextual traffic stops); David A. Harris, The Stories, the Statistics, and the Law: Why "Driving While Black" Matters, 84 Minn. L. Rev. 265 (1999) [hereinafter Harris, The Stories] (discussing the experiences of African-American drivers who were stopped for pretextual traffic violations); Sheri Lynn Johnson, Race and the Decision to Detain a Suspect, 93 Yale L.J. 214 (1983) (discussing the interplay between the determination of probable cause and race); Christo Lassiter, Eliminating Consent from the Lexicon of Traffic Stop Interrogations, 27 Cap. U. L. Rev. 79 (1998) (discussing the validity of consent interrogations that occur after a traffic stop in the state of Ohio); Tracey Maclin, Race and the Fourth Amendment, 51 Vand. L. Rev. 333 (1998) [hereafter Maclin, Race] (discussing the role of race during pretexual traffic stops); Reginald T. Shuford, Anyway You Slice It: Why Racial Profiling is Wrong, 18 St. Louis U. Pub. L. Rev. 371 (1999); David A. Sklansky, Traffic Stops, Minority Motorists, and the Future of the Fourth Amendment, 1997 Sup. Ct. Rev. 271 (discussing the effect of traffic stops of minority motorists on Fourth Amendment jurisprudence); Anthony C. Thompson, Stopping the Usual Suspects: Race and the Fourth Amendment, 74 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 956 (1999) (discussing the constitutional and policy implications of racially motivated searches and seizures); Jennifer A. Larrabee, Note, "DWB (Driving While Black)" and Equal Protection: The Realities of an Unconstitutional Police Practice, 6 J.L. & Pol'y 291 (1997) (arguing that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment should bar the consideration of race when police decide who to detain for a traffic violation); Henry Louis Gates, Jr., Thirteen Ways of Looking at A Black Man, The New Yorker, Oct. 23, 1995, at 56, 58-59 (discussing "war stories" of famous African-American men stopped by police).

Courts have also addressed the issue. For example, the Ninth Circuit described a series of stops of African-American celebrities:

The police ... erroneously stopped businessman and former Los Angeles Laker star Jamaal Wilkes in his car and handcuffed him, and stopped 1984 Olympic medalist Al Joyner twice in the space of twenty minutes, and once forcing him out of his car, handcuffing him and making him to lie spread-eagled on the ground at gunpoint. Similarly, actor Wesley Snipes was taken from his car at gunpoint, handcuffed, and forced to lie on the ground while a policeman kneeled on his neck and held a gun to his head. Actor Blair Underwood was also stopped in his car and detained at gunpoint. We do not know exactly how often this happens to African-American men and women who are not celebrities and whose brushes with the police are not deemed newsworthy.

Washington v. Lambert, 98 F.3d 1181, 1182, n.2 (9th Cir. 1996) (citations omitted). See also, Price v. Kramer 200 F.3d 1237, 1240 (9th Cir. 2000) (sustaining award of $ 245,000 to two African-Americans stopped and abused by police).

n26. See infra notes 122-145 and accompanying text.

n27. I use the term racial profiling to mean any stop, search, or arrest of a person based in whole or in part on the race of the suspect, except where police are acting on a racial description of the perpetrator of a crime. Arbitrary stops, searches, or arrests refer to police investigatory practices without the requisite cause or suspicion required by the Fourth Amendment.

n28. State v. Soto, 734 A.2d 350, 360 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1996) (noting that the statistical disparities between African-American and white motorists stopped for traffic offenses were "stark").

n29. Id. at 352-55; Harris, The Stories, supra note 25, at 278-90.

n30. Soto, 734 A.2d at 354.

n31. Id. at 356.

n32. Peter Verniero, Attorney General of New Jersey, Interim Report of the State Police Review Team Regarding Allegations of Racial Profiling 26-28 (Apr. 20, 1999), available at http://www.state.nj.us/lps/intm<uscore>419.pdf [hereinafter Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey].

n33. Id. at 67-68.

n34. Jeff Brazil & Steve Berry, Color of Drivers is Key to Stops on I-95 Videos, Orlando Sentinel, Aug. 23, 1992, at A-1; Harris, Driving While Black, supra note 25, at 561-62.

n35. ACLU Report, supra note 7, at 27.

n36. Id. The statistical evidence is set forth in Plaintiffs' Experts' Reports, Chavez v. Illinois State Police, 27 F. Supp. 2d 1053, 1069 (N.D. Ill. 1998) (No. 94 C 5307) (on file with author).

n37. ACLU Report, supra note 7, at 27.

n38. Id. at 28.

n39. Id.

n40. Id. at 27-28. In the highway drug interdiction field, a little known federal program, "Operation Pipeline," financed by the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) and administered by over 300 state and local law enforcement agencies, has had substantial influence on profiling practices. Gary Webb, DWB, Esquire, Apr. 1999, at 118. The DEA has trained thousands of officers in drug interdiction practices that rely heavily on pretextual traffic stops of "suspicious" vehicles. Id. at 123-24. This "volume" approach to law enforcement sweeps an overwhelming number of innocent drivers. In 1997, the California Highway Patrol stopped 34,000 cars and ultimately seized contraband in 2% of these stops. Id. at 122. As one California Highway Patrol sergeant explained, "it's sheer numbers ... . Our guys make a lot of stops. You've got to kiss a lot of frogs before you find a prince." Id.

n41. Plaintiffs' Fourth Monitoring Report, Pedestrian and Car Stop Audit, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, C.A. No. 96-CV-6045 (E.D. Pa. July, 1998) [hereinafter Fourth Philadelphia Report]; Plaintiffs' Fifth Monitoring Report, Pedestrian and Car Stop Audit, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, C.A. No. 96-CV-6045 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 7, 2000) [hereinafter Fifth Philadelphia Report].

n42. Fifth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 9-10, 22-26.

n43. Id. at 20-25.

n44. Id. at 13-14.

n45. Harris, The Stories, supra note 25, at 281-88.

n46. Office of the Attorney General of New York State, Report on the New York City Police Department's "Stop & Frisk" Practices 88-89 (1999), available at http://www.oag.
state.ny.us/press/reports/stop<uscore>frisk/stop<uscore>frisk.html [hereinafter

Report of Attorney General of New York].

n47. Id. at 95.

n48. Id. at 105-06.

n49. Id. at 111.

n50. Id. at 121, 126.

n51. Id. at 160-62

n52. Id. at 162-64.

n53. Amadou Diallo was shot and killed on February 4, 1999 when four officers mistook a wallet he as holding for a gun and fired 41 shots at him. The officers were acquitted of criminal charges in February, 2000. See infra notes 223-225 and accompanying text.

n54. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 117 n.23.

n55. James M. Shannon, Attorney General of Massachusetts, Report of the Attorney General's Civil Rights Division on Boston Police Department Practices 60-61 (Dec. 18, 1990).

n56. U.S. General Accounting Office, U.S. Customs Service: Better Targeting of Airline Passengers for Personal Searches Could Produce Better Results 2, 40 (Mar., 2000). See also, Anderson v. Cornejo, No. 97 C 7556, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 519 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 11, 1999) (denying class certification of African-American women who claimed that they were improperly searched when going through customs at O'Hare International Airport).

n57. United States General Accounting Office, supra note 56, at 40.

n58. Id. at 2.

n59. E.g., Lassiter, supra note 25, at 115-19 (listing studies, newspaper articles, and reports). For additional data, see Tanya Albert, Chief Acknowledges Racial Profiling, Cincinnati Enquirer, Feb. 1, 2000, at 1; Barbara Whitaker, San Diego Police Found to Stop Black and Latino Drivers Most, N.Y. Times, Oct. 1, 2000, 1, at A31.

n60. Will Lester, Americans Think Racial Stops are Widespread, Phila. Inquirer, Dec. 11, 1999 at A14. In a survey of Philadelphia residents, the Pew Center for Civil Journalism found that 60% of whites, but only 39% of blacks believed that the police "treat everyone the same." Chris Brennan, Crime is a Local Concern, Phila. Daily News, Feb. 11, 2000, at 12.

n61. Lester, supra note 60.

n62. E.g., Jeffrey Goldberg, The Color of Suspicion, N.Y. Times, June 20, 1999, 6 (Magazine), at 51. On January 17, 2000, Democratic Presidential candidates Al Gore and Bill Bradley promised to end racial profiling if elected as President. Excerpts From Bradley-Gore Debate in Des Moines, N.Y. Times, Jan. 18, 2000, at A20.

n63. See infra notes 64 and 76 and accompanying text.

n64. For commentary on community policing, police discretion, and constitutional limits, see David Cole, Discretion and Discrimination Reconsidered: A Response to the New Criminal Justice Scholarship, 87 Geo. L.J. 1059 (1999) (discussing legal scholarship supporting police discretion); Dan M. Kahan & Tracy L. Meares, The Coming Crisis of Criminal Procedure, 86 Geo. L.J. 1153 (1998) (discussing the constitutional scrutiny used to evaluate community policing); Debra Livingston, Police Discretion and the Quality of Life in Public Places: Courts, Communities and the New Policing, 97 Colum. L. Rev. 551 (1997) (critiquing police discretion in community policing); Tracey Maclin, What Can Fourth Amendment Doctrine Learn From Vagueness Doctrine?, 3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 399 (2001); Dorothy E. Roberts, Foreword: Race, Vagueness, and the Social Meaning of Order-Maintenance Policing, 89 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 775 (1999) (arguing that order-maintenance policing can reinforce racist presumptions regarding the criminal behavior of minorities).

n65. E.g., Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Sourcebook of Criminal Justice Statistics - 1997 (Kathleen Maguire & Ann L. Pastore eds., 1997). Moreover, with the increase of "hate-crime" legislation, law enforcement officials must analyze certain criminal conduct from the perspective of race and must keep records that reflect the race (and other statutorily covered characteristics) of victims and alleged offenders.

n66. See infra note 76 and accompanying text.

n67. For an interesting analysis of the ways in which the courts and other institutions have avoided confronting institutional patterns of misconduct by reducing evidence to anecdotes, see Susan Bandes, Patterns of Injustice: Police Brutality in the Courts, 47 Buff. L. Rev. 1275, 1307-09 (1999).

n68. See infra notes 359-361 and accompanying text.

n69. Kevin Johnson & Gary Fields, Police Chiefs Resist Race-Related Tallies, USA Today, Apr. 8, 1999, at 7A; Robert L. Jackson, Push Against Bias in Traffic Stops Arrested, L.A. Times, June 1, 1998, at A5.

n70. See ACLU Report, supra note 7, at 39-40; Harris, The Stories, supra note 25, at 321-22. Currently, Missouri, Connecticut, North Carolina, Washington, and Kansas require data collection. See supra note 70.

n71. H.R. 118, 105th Cong. 1 (1998). The Act provided that:

The Attorney General shall conduct a study of stops for routine traffic violations by law enforcement officers. Such study shall include collection and analysis of appropriate available data. The study shall include consideration of the following factors, among others:

(1) The number of individuals stopped for routine traffic violations.

(2) Identifying characteristics of the individual stopped, including the race and or ethnicity as well as the approximate age of that individual.

(3) The traffic infractions alleged to have been committed that led to the stop.

(4) Whether a search was instituted as a result of the stop.

(5) How the search was instituted.

(6) The rationale for the search.

(7) Whether any contraband was discovered in the course of the search.

(8) The nature of such contraband.

(9) Whether any warning or citation was issued as a result of the stop.

(10) Whether an arrest was made as a result of either the stop or the search.

(11) The benefit of traffic stops with regard to the interdiction of drugs and the proceeds of drug trafficking, including the approximate quantity of drugs and value of drug proceeds seized on an annual basis as a result of routine traffic stops.

n72. See supra note 69 and accompanying text. In 1999 the International Association of Chiefs of Police ("IACP") announced its opposition to "proactive traffic enforcement that is race or ethnic-based," but defined such activity as stops and searches made "simply because of race," and refused to endorse federal legislation requiring maintenance of data on these practices. IACP, Recommendations from the First IACP Forum on Professional Traffic Stops 2-8 (Apr. 6, 1999) (on file with author). The IACP recommended "voluntary" local efforts to collect data on traffic stops. Id. at 7-8. At a conference called by the Attorney General of the United States, "Strengthening Police-Community Relationships," in June 1999, several police officials opposed data collection regarding racial characteristics of car stops, expressing concerns about cost, officer integrity in collecting the data, "legal questions" concerning asking drivers questions about race, and use of the data in performance and other officer evaluations. U.S. Dep't of Justice, Summary Report of Attorney General's Conference: Strengthening Police-Community Relationships 35 (June 1999) (on file with author).

The Department of Justice currently supports collection and maintenance of this data, but for many years declined the authority to do so. See Peter L. Davis, Rodney King and the Decriminalization of Police Brutality in America: Direct and Judicial Access to the Grand Jury as Remedies for Victims of Police Brutality when the Prosecutor Declines to Prosecute, 53 Md. L. Rev. 271, 274 n.4 (1994) (noting that the Justice Department, while conducting a study of police brutality on its own, had previously opposed legislation requiring similar studies because of fears that such measures would hamper efforts to improve local police agencies).

n73. Harris, The Stories, supra, note 25, at 276; Alan Jenkins, See No Evil, The Nation, June 28, 1999, at 15. On March 1, 2000, the House Judiciary Committee approved an updated version of the racial profiling legislation. 146 Cong. Rec. H 930 (2000); H.R. 1443, 106th Cong. 1 (1999). See also, Hearing on S. 821, 106th Cong. 1 (1999), Subcommittee on Constitution, Federalism, and Property Rights, 146 Cong. Rec. D292 (2000).

n74. While most of the recent attention has focused on the "driving while black" phenomenon, racial bias in pedestrian stops, and the problem of random stops regardless of race present equally serious challenges. See infra Part III.

n75. See supra text accompanying note 62.

n76. The debates over "broken window" theories, zero tolerance of "quality of life" crimes, drug enforcement policies and aggressive patrol tactics reveal deep philosophical and operational divides. On the policing practices, see, for example William Bratton & Peter Knobler, Turnaround: How America's Top Cop Reversed the Crime Epidemic (1998) (discussing Bratton's role in reducing crime as New York City's Police Commissioner); Randall Kennedy, Race, Crime, and the Law, 138-63 (1998) (discussing police use of race as an indication of increased risk of criminality); Robert C. Ellickson, Controlling Chronic Misconduct in City Spaces: Of Panhandlers, Skid Rows, and Public-Space Zoning, 105 Yale L.J. 1165, 1168-69 (1996) (discussing the history and legal responses to chronic street nuisances); Judith A. Greene, Zero Tolerance: A Case Study of Police Policies and Practices in New York City, 45 Crime & Delinq. 171 (1999) (discussing the policing practices introduced in New York City by police commissioner William Bratton); Bernard E. Harcourt, Reflecting on the Subject: A departments demonstrated that African-Americans were two to three times more likely to receive traffic tickets than their white counterparts. <=46> n45

The Attorney General of New York conducted a study of 175,000 pedestrian stops by the New York City Police Department and found a highly disproportionate rate of stops of minorities. <=47> n46 The Attorney General determined that (1) African-Americans were stopped six times more frequently than whites, <=48> n47 (2) in precincts with a white population of 80% or more and where African-Americans constitute 10% or less of the population, stops of African-Americans comprised 30% of all stops, more than ten times their percentage of the population, <=49> n48 (3) stops of African-Americans were less likely to result in arrests than stops of whites, <=50> n49 and (4) adjusting for crime rates by race, the differences in stops of minorities compared to stops of whites is statistically significant, with African-Americans stopped twice as often as whites. <=51> n50

The Attorney General also reported that where a full factual statement concerning the stop was provided by the police, 15.4% of the stops failed to comply with Fourth Amendment standards. <=52> n51 In addition, 23.5% of the stops failed to provide a sufficient factual basis, on their face, to determine whether the stop was constitutionally proper. <=53> n52 Stops by the elite "Street Crime Unit" (that was involved in the death of Amadou Diallo) <=54> n53 based on suspicion of possession of a weapon, yielded a weapon in only 2.5% of all stops. <=55> n54

The Massachusetts Attorney General investigated claims of racial bias and illegal stops in Boston and reported:

We conclude that Boston police officers engaged in improper, and unconstitutional, conduct in the 1989-90 period with respect to stops and searches of minority individuals ... . Although we cannot say with precision how widespread this illegal conduct was we believe that it was sufficiently common to justify changes in certain Department practices.

Perhaps the most disturbing evidence was that the scope of a number of Terry searches went far beyond anything authorized by that case and indeed, [*303] beyond anything that we believe would be acceptable under the federal and state constitutions even where probable cause existed to conduct a full search incident to an arrest. Forcing young men to lower their trousers, or otherwise searching inside their underwear, on public streets or in public hallways, is so demeaning and invasive of fundamental precepts of privacy that it can only be condemned in the strongest terms. The fact that not only the young men themselves, but independent witnesses complained of strip searches, should be deeply alarming to all members of this community. <=56> n55

Stops and searches by customs officials also disclose racial bias. In 1998, there were approximately 52,000 people selected for body searches (ranging from hand frisks to strip and cavity searches) by customs officials. <=57> n56 No contraband was found in 96% of these searches and almost half of all persons selected for search were African-American or Latino. <=58> n57 Further in Critique of the Social Influence Conception of Deterrence, the Broken Windows Theory, and Order-Maintenance Policing New York Style, 97 Mich. L. Rev. 291 (1998) (using empirical data to critique New York City's quality-of-life initiative); Symposium, Why is Crime Decreasing? 88 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 1173 (1998); Fox Butterfield, Rethinking the Strong Arm of the Law, N.Y. Times, Apr. 4, 1999, 4 (Week in Review), at 1 (promoting community policing as an alternative to the zero tolerance approach taken in New York City); Michael Massing, The Blue Revolution, New York Review of Books, Nov. 19, 1998, at 32 (reviewing several books discussing crime and the application of the broken windows theory); James Q. Wilson & George L. Kelling, Broken Windows: The Police and Neighborhood Safety, The Atlantic Monthly, Mar. 1982 (discussing police foot patrols and other efforts to improve community policing).

Claims that aggressive policing, including pretextual car stops, stop and frisks of pedestrians, and zero tolerance of low level criminal conduct have caused a reduction in crime are much disputed. For the proponents' view, see Bratton & Knobler, supra; Greene, supra. See also William J. Bratton, Why Lowering Crime Didn't Raise Trust, N.Y. Times, Feb. 25, 2000, at A19 (suggesting that the reduction in crime rates in New York City was the result of assertive policing strategies). Critics of this view dispute the effectiveness, necessity and legality of these practices. E.g., Harcourt, supra; Cole, supra note 25; Fox Butterfield, Cities Reduce Crime and Conflict Without New York-Style Hardball, N.Y. Times, Mar. 4, 2000, at A1 (comparing crime reduction rates by city and types of policing and reporting more reductions in "community oriented" policing in San Diego than in New York City); Roberts, supra note 64, at 811 ("In the same way that minor infractions of order ... can allegedly lead to serious crime, minor infringements of citizens' liberties can cause serious damage to the relationship between government and the governed ... ."). Indeed, if the broken windows theory is correct, it is fair to ask why police officials who advocate order-maintenance policing as the way to effectuate this theory are not equally vigilant in attempting to end low level abuses of citizens by police to prevent the more serious abuses that will surely follow under this theory of human behavior.

n77. Goldberg, supra note 62, at 51.

n78. See Thompson, supra note 25, at 999 (discussing the view in Dinesh D'Sousa, The End of Racism, Principles for a Multiracial Society 284 (1995), that using race as a proxy for suspicion may be a form of "rational discrimination"); Kennedy, supra note 76, at 145 (acknowledging higher crime rates among African-Americans, but strongly condemning use of race in determining suspicion). It is important to analyze the data concerning crime and arrest rates, by type of crime and reporting systems. Thus, while arrest records and victimization studies demonstrate that blacks commit more homicides and robberies than whites, see Bureau of Justice Statistics, supra note 65, at 338, drug arrest statistics are driven far more by law enforcement practices than actual use or distribution of drugs and, therefore, these statistics do not accurately measure the rate of "drug crimes." Human Rights Watch, Punishment and Prejudice: Racial Disparities in the War on Drugs (May, 2000), available at http://www.hrw.org/reports/2000/usa/.

n79. Race is an appropriate factor in stops where the police have been provided with a description of a criminal suspect. In the car stop context, however, descriptions are virtually never at play since almost all stops are made for alleged traffic violations. "Drug courier" profiles stops are made when there is no specific criminal information about any particular person. Pedestrian stops based on descriptions of alleged perpetrators were fewer than 30% of all stops in the New York City study. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 122 n.30.

n80. The Federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration's 1997 National Household Survey on Drug Abuse found that the rate of illicit drug use for blacks was 7.5%, for whites, 6.4%, and for Hispanics, 5.9%. U.S. Dep't of Health and Human Servs., Substance Abuse and Mental Health Servs. Admin., National Household Survey on Drug Abuse - 1997 (1997). See also, Sam Vincent Meddis, Is the Drug War Racist?, USA Today, July 23, 1993, at A1 (noting that while black and white drug use are nearly the same, the war on drugs has been fought mainly against blacks). As the Human Rights Watch has reported:

According to the most recent NHSDA [National Household Survey on Drug Abuse] survey, in 1998 there were an estimated 9.9 million whites (72 percent of all users) and 2.0 million blacks (15 percent) who were current illicit drug users in 1998. There were almost five times as many current white marijuana users as black and four times as many white cocaine users. Almost three times as many whites had ever used crack as blacks. Among those who had used crack at least once in the past year, 462,000 were white and 324,000 were black. Only among current crack users did the number of blacks exceed the number of whites - and this was a change from previous years in which the number of current white crack users had exceeded the number of black users. SAMHSA [Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration] also estimated that in 1998 there were 4,934,000 whites who used marijuana on 51 or more days in the past year, compared to 1,102,000 blacks, and 321,000 whites who had used cocaine on 51 or more days in the past year compared to 171,999 blacks. (citations omitted).

Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 20.

n81. Ron Harris, Blacks Feel Brunt of Drug War, L.A. Times, Apr. 22, 1990, at A1.

n82. Drew S. Days III, Race and the Criminal Justice System: A Look at the Issue of Selective Prosecution, 48 Me. L. Rev. 181, 186-87 (1996).

n83. Genaro C. Armas, War on Drugs Needs to Reach Small Towns, Rural Areas, Study Says, Phila. Inquirer, Jan. 27, 2000, at A9 (citing study released by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University).

n84. U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, 1990 Census of Population (1990), available at http://www.census.gov/prod/3/98pubs/CP1-US.PDF.

n85. Armas, supra note 83 (citing study released by the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University). Among African-Americans, use of drugs has consistently run at lower levels than among whites. Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 19-20.

n86. E.g., Meddis, supra note 80.

n87. Id.

n88. Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 20-21.

n89. Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey, supra note 32, at 67-68. See also, Developments in the Law - Race and the Criminal Process, 101 Harv. L. Rev. 1473, 1508 (1988) (asserting that use of arrest statistics to justify use of race creates self-fulfilling prophecy because it encourages the police to arrest minorities more frequently).

Empirical data regarding use of drug courier profiles at airports and other transportation hubs similarly expose the flaws in relying on factors unrelated to criminal conduct. See, e.g., United States v. Hooper, 935 F.2d 484, 500 (2d Cir. 1991) (Pratt, J., dissenting) (noting that in an operation at the Buffalo Airport, police were "correct" in their stops in fewer than two percent of their profile encounters). Similar results mark other profile based investigations. United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531, 557 (1985) (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("The available evidence suggests that the number of highly intrusive border searches of suspicious-looking but ultimately innocent travelers may be very high."); United States v. Montilla, 733 F. Supp 579, 580 (W.D.N.Y. 1990) (agents of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency observing bus passengers in New York made eighty stops per month, which resulted in only three to four arrests). See also Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429, 441-42 (1991) (Marshall, J., dissenting) (noting that only a small number of the numerous police sweeps for drugs actually result in a successful interdiction of drugs); Morgan Cloud, Search and Seizure by the Numbers: The Drug Courier Profile and Judicial Review of Investigative Formulas, 65 B.U. L. Rev. 843, 873-77 (1985) (noting the flaws in the drug courier profile when compared to the aircraft hijacker profile).

Professor David Cole has demonstrated how the drug courier profile can be manipulated to fit virtually any form of innocent activity of a person at an airport, including whether one is the first or the last to leave the plane, whether one appears nervous or calm, and whether one is dressed expensively or modestly. Cole, supra note 25, at 47-51. Further, his computer search of all federal cases involving drug courier profile stops over a four-year period showed that 80% of those stopped were minorities. Id. at 40.

In part, the approval of profile stops is a predictable consequence of the types of cases that actually reach the courts. For the most part, judges see only those cases in which drugs or other contraband are seized. In such cases, enormous pressure exists to ignore constitutional violations so as to avoid suppression of the evidence. In the thousands of cases where the individual stopped is innocent, even if that person was detained and searched illegally, it is unlikely that she will pursue legal remedies. See Tracey Maclin, The Central Meaning of the Fourth Amendment, 35 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 197, 244-45 (1993) (noting that individuals who have been searched illegally are unlikely to complain). Thus, the case law develops on a highly skewed notion of reality, subject to the distorting effect of discovery of contraband in the specific case. See, Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445, 463 (1989) (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the plurality has allowed its analysis ... to be colored by its distaste for the activity in which [the defendant was involved].").

n90. Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey, supra note 32, at 26-28.

n91. Expert Reports of John Lamberth, Maryland State Conference of NAACP Branches v. Maryland Department of State Police, 72 F. Supp. 2d 560 (D. Md. 1999) (Civ. No. CCB-98-1098), available at http://www.aclu.org/court/lamberth.html (on file with author). See also Maclin, Race, supra, note 25, at 349-51 (1998) (noting that the percentage of traffic stops that resulted in the discovery of contraband was the same for black and white motorists).

n92. See supra note 91; Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey, supra note 32, at 36-37 (noting that "major" drug seizures on the New Jersey Turnpike were rare).

n93. See supra notes 35-40 and accompanying text.

n94. John Knowles, et al., Racial Bias in Motor Vehicle Searches: Theory and Evidence 27 (Feb., 2000) (unpublished manuscript on file with author). The disparities in searches was profound: on a highway on which African-Americans constituted less than 20% of all drivers, of 1,590 searches, 1,007 African Americans were searched (63.4%) and 466 whites were searched (29.3%). Id. at 16. The remaining searches were of Hispanics (97 searches or 6.1% of all searches). Id.

n95. Id. at 1-3.

n96. Id. In New Jersey, two troopers have been indicted for deliberately falsifying records concerning the race of the drivers who were stopped and searched. They are alleged to have recorded "white" on the form where the driver was black. E.g., Mark Hosenball, "It is Not the Act of a Few Bad Apples," Newsweek, May 17, 1999, at 34.

n97. John Knowles, et al., supra note 94, at 1-3.

n98. See infra text accompanying notes 147-149.

n99. See infra text accompanying note 150. It is noteworthy that the Racial Bias study confirmed that similar results could be achieved without the kind of racial profiling that was practiced in Maryland. John Knowles, et al., supra note 94, at 23-26.

n100. Ira Glasser, ACLU Biennial Speech (June, 1999), available at http://www.aclu.org/ issues/racial/bispeech99.html (on file with author). In Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976), the Court found unconstitutional, under intermediate equal protection review, a gender classification that prohibited sale of 3.2% alcohol to men under 21 and to women under 18. The state attempted to justify the discrimination by studies that showed that of 18-20 year olds who were arrested for drunk driving, .18% of females and 2% of males in that age group had been arrested. Id. at 201. The Court did not deny the disparity in the statistics, but found that, "if maleness is to serve as a proxy for drinking and driving, a correlation of 2% must be considered an unduly tenuous "fit.'" Id. at 201-02. See also, id. at 213-14 (Stevens, J., concurring) ("It does not seem to me that an insult to all of the young men of the state can be justified by visiting the sins of the 2% on the 98%.").

For an incisive discussion of police stereotyping, police discretion, and order maintenance, see M. Gottfredson & D. Gottfredson, Decision Making in Criminal Justice: Toward the Rational Exercise of Discretion (2d ed. 1988); Jerome H. Skolnick, Justice Without Trial: Law Enforcement in Democratic Society 80-81 (MacMillan 3d ed. 1994) (1966); Samuel Walker, Taming the System: The Control of Discretion in Criminal Justice, 1950-1990 (1993); Roberts, supra note 64, at 811 (discussing the potential for reinforcing racist norms in order-maintenance policing); Thompson, supra note 25, at 986-87 (discussing the role of stereotyping in police investigations); Wayne R. LaFave, Controlling Discretion by Administrative Regulations: The Use, Misuse, and Nonuse of Police Rules and Policies in Fourth Amendment Adjudication, 89 Mich. L. Rev. 442 (1990) (discussing police rulemaking and judicial interpretations of police discretion). The role of subconscious racism has also been explored. See, e.g., Charles R. Lawrence III, The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism, 39 Stan. L. Rev. 317 (1987) (discussing unconscious racism and a new test for establishing race-based behavior); Sheri Lynn Johnson, Comment, Unconscious Racism and the Criminal Law, 73 Cornell L. Rev. 1016 (1988) (discussing how the Supreme Court has ignored unconscious racism in its decisions).

n101. Harris, Driving While Black, supra note 25, at 572. For discussion of the legality of these practices, see discussion infra Part III. Randall Kennedy has likened racial profiling to "a type of racial tax for the war against drugs that whites and other groups escape," Kennedy, supra note 76, at 159. During the Jim Crow era, courts expressly permitted juries to consider race as evidence of criminal intent. Id. at 89-90; see McQuirter v. State, 63 So. 2d 388, 390 (Ala. Ct. App. 1953) (stating that a jury in determining whether black man intended to rape a white woman, "may consider social conditions and customs founded upon racial differences, such as that the prosecutrix was a white woman and defendant was a Negro man").

n102. National Crim. Just. Comm'n, The Real War on Crime, 102 (Steven R. Donzinger ed., 1996).

n103. Id. at 102-03.

n104. Marc Mauer, Race to Incarcerate, 124-25 (1999).

n105. Id. at 125.

n106. Id. While there is a disproportionate number of African-Americans in jail, much of this disproportionality can be explained by racial differences at arrest. Alfred Blumstein, Racial Disproportionality of U.S. Prison Populations Revisited, 64 U. Colo. L. Rev. 743, 750-54 (1993) (noting at 76% of the disproportionality can be explained by racial differences at arrest).

n107. E.g., Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 13; Blumstein, supra note 106, at 756-59 (discussing the racial implications of the war on drugs).

n108. ACLU Report, supra note 7, at 11.

n109. Mauer, supra note 104, at 35.

n110. Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 13-16.

n111. Id. at 14.

n112. ACLU Report, supra note 7, at 10. In 1996, of all admissions to state prisons for drug offenses, blacks constituted 62.6%, while whites constituted 36.7%. Human Rights Watch, supra note 78, at 17.

n113. 21 U.S.C. 841 (1994).

n114. National Crim. Just. Comm'n, supra note 102, at 118-119. The argument that these statistics simply reflect prosecutions of high level crack dealers runs counter to data from the United States Sentencing Commission. In 1992, of all crack offenders, only 5.5% were classified as high level dealers. 63.7% were listed as street-level dealers or couriers and 30.8% as mid-level dealers. Marc Mauer, supra note 104, at 156. For commentary on the crack/powder cocaine dispute, see Cole, supra note 25, at 8, 141-44 (discussing the racially disparate effects of federal sentencing for crack cocaine); Days III, supra note 82, at 189-93 (discussing the Federal Sentencing Guidelines for cocaine and crack); David A. Sklansky, Cocaine, Race and Equal Protection, 47 Stan. L. Rev. 1283 (1995) (discussing the mandatory federal sentences for trafficking crack cocaine and arguing that such sentences violate the Equal Protection Clause because the brunt of the sentences fall on African-Americans). To date, every court of appeals to consider the issue has determined that there is no equal protection violation presented by the application of these statutes. See, e.g., United States v. Then, 56 F.3d 464, 466 (2d Cir. 1995) (noting that the Second Circuit had joined six other circuits in holding that the Federal Sentencing Guidelines' 100 to 1 ratio of powder cocaine to crack cocaine in determining jail time has a rational basis and does not violate equal protection principles); United States v. Williamson, 53 F.3d 1500, 1530 (10th Cir. 1995) (rejecting claim that the section of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines that deal with powder cocaine and crack cocaine violates the constitutional guarantee of equal protection, noting that a disparate racial impact does not necessarily imply intentional discrimination); United States v. Singleterry, 29 F.3d 733, 741 (1st Cir. 1994) (holding that there is insufficient evidence to find that the sections of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines that deal with powder and crack cocaine violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment); Days III, supra note 82, at 189 (noting that each of the twelve circuit courts to examine the issue found that the Sentencing Guidelines that deal with crack cocaine and powder cocaine do not violate the Equal Protection Clause).

n115. Tamar Lewin, Discrepancy By Race Found In the Trying Of Youths, N.Y. Times, Feb. 3, 2000, at A21 [hereinafter Lewin, Discrepancy]. See also George S. Bridges & Sara Steen, Racial Disparities in Official Assessments of Juvenile Offenders: Attributional Stereotypes as Mediating Mechanisms, 63 Am. Soc. Rev. 554 (1998) (noting the "pronounced differences in [police] officers' attributions about the causes of crime by white versus black youths"); Tamar Lewin, Study Finds Racial Bias in Public Schools, N.Y. Times, Mar. 1, 2000, at A14 (discussing report of Applied Research Center of Oakland which found that blacks are 3-5 times more likely to be expelled from high school than whites for similar offenses).

n116. Lewin, Discrepancy, supra note 115, at A21.

n117. Id.

n118. Id. This is not to suggest that the mere disparity in numbers is conclusive on the question of racial bias. For example, differential enforcement patterns can contribute to the disparities. Inner city drug dealing is more likely to occur on the street with the attendant hazards and crime associated with open market drug dealing, while drugs in the suburbs tend to be distributed and used behind closed doors. The inner city drug operations tend to be minority-run; suburban to be white. It is far easier to police the street markets and, because of the secondary criminal and quality of life impact street sales create, there is more demand for police intervention in these areas. William J. Stuntz, Race, Class and Drugs, 98 Colum. L. Rev. 1795 (1998); Kennedy, supra note 75, at 378n.. Further, it has been argued that differences in usage and trafficking patterns explain the disparate racial arrest statistics. Days III, supra note 82, at 187-88.

Policing policies in minority communities have generated sharp disagreements. Compare Kennedy, supra note 76, at 138-63 (discussing policing policies in minority neighborhoods), with Paul Butler, (Color) Blind Faith: The Tragedy of Race, Crime, and the Law, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 1270 (1998) (critically reviewing Randall Kennedy, Race, Crime, and the Law (1998)).

n119. George P. Fletcher, Disenfranchisement as Punishment: Reflections on the Racial Uses of Infamia, 46 UCLA L. Rev. 1895 (1999).

n120. See Cornel West, Race Matters (1993) (discussing the continuing issues of race and racism in the United States).

n121. State law may provide broader remedies than those available under federal law. David A. Harris, Addressing Racial Profiling in the States: A Case Study of the "New Federalism" in Constitutional Criminal Procedure, 3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 368 (2001).

n122. E.g., Wayne R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment (3d ed. 1996); Maclin, Race, supra note 25 (discussing the competing concerns involved in Fourth Amendment analysis and application); Sklansky, supra note 25. For a recent comprehensive historical analysis of the Fourth Amendment, see Thomas Y. Davies, Recovering the Original Fourth Amendment, 98 Mich L. Rev. 547 (1999).

n123. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806, 816-19 (1996).

n124. Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 410 (1997); Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106, 111 (1977)

n125. Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33 (1996) (holding that a lawfully seized defendant need not be advised that he is "free to go" before his consent to search will be recognized as voluntary).

n126. Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128, 133-37 (1990) (reviewing the "plain view" doctrine); United States v. Lee, 274 U.S. 559, 563 (1927) (asserting that use of a searchlight to discover contraband does not violate the Fourth Amendment).

n127. Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 1035 (1983) (holding that a protective search of the passenger compartment of a motor vehicle during lawful investigatory stop of an occupant of the vehicle was reasonable).

n128. Wyoming v. Houghton, 526 U.S. 295, 302-07 (1999) (holding that police officers with probable cause to search a car may inspect passengers' belongings found in the car that are capable of concealing the object of the search); California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565, 574 (1991) (holding that police may search container located within automobile without a search warrant); New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454, 460 (1981) (upholding the search of the passenger compartment of a vehicle and examination of the contents of any container found within the passenger compartment when the search is contemporaneous to a lawful arrest of an occupant).

n129. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

n130. Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 440-41 (1984) (holding that roadside questioning is not custodial and therefore Miranda warnings are not required).

n131. United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696, 698 (1983) (holding that a dog sniff of luggage located in a public place is not a search under the Fourth Amendment). In City of Independence v. Edmond, 121 S. Ct. 447 (2000), the Supreme Court found unconstitutional the practice of using roadblocks to stop cars to allow for dog drug sniffs of the car.

n132. Harris, Driving While Black, supra note 25 at 545.

n133. See Sklansky, supra note 25, at 285-91 (discussing Justice Scalia's opinion in Whren and noting the split decisions in the lower and state courts regarding the subjective intent of the officer making the stop). Specifically, the lower courts had divided over whether a stop was justified where an officer could have made a proper traffic stop, see for example, United States v. Botero-Ospina, 71 F.3d 783, 786-88 (10th Cir. 1995) (rejecting the "would have" standard), or only where a reasonable officer would have done so, see for example, United States v. Cannon, 29 F.3d 472, 474-76 (9th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (accepting the "would have" standard after discussing the circuit split).

n134. 517 U.S. 806 (1996).

n135. Id. at 808-09.

1998, black women were nine times more likely than white women to be subjected to x-rays, yet they were less than half as likely to be found carrying contraband as their white counterparts. <=59> n58

The powerful combination of governmental investigations, judicial findings, anecdotal evidence, and statements by law enforcement officials leave little doubt about the existence of racial profiling and other stops without cause. <=60> n59 In December, 1999, a Gallup poll found that 56% of whites and 77% of blacks believe racial profiling to be widespread. <=61> n60 Almost three-quarters of all young black men polled believed that they had been stopped based on their race. <=62> n61 In June, 1999, President Clinton condemned this practice as "morally indefensible" and requested record-keeping and studies to determine the extent of racial profiling in law enforcement. <=63> n62

[*304] It may seem curious that the President would have to order federal law enforcement agencies to collect and analyze data on the racial characteristics of stops and searches. After all, law enforcement places heavy reliance on car and pedestrian stops as part of proactive, order - maintenance policing, <=64> n63 and the courts have vested broad discretion in the police in these areas. <=65> n64 Further, police and prosecutorial agencies maintain comprehensive data on reported crime, arrests and convictions, with specific documentation concerning race. <=66> n65

The failure of most law enforcement agencies to collect and analyze data concerning car and pedestrian stops, or to conduct comprehensive reviews of the legality of stops and searches - as to both racial profiling and stop and searches made without cause, regardless of race - has undermined efforts to make sound empirical judgments. Many police agencies have authorized or tolerated racial profiling and random, suspicionless stops and searches, as part of policing programs that operate on the theory that the more stops and searches that are conducted, whether in compliance with the Constitution or not, more drugs, weapons, and intelligence will be secured. <=67> n66 Law enforcement is well aware that it is far easier to discount anecdotal evidence of constitutional violations than it is to rebut statistical data that reflect entrenched patterns of unlawful practices. <=68> n67

Without hard data to prove that racial profiling and random stops are integral parts of street level policing, the police have every reason to be confident that if an improper stop is made there will likely not be any negative consequences. If contraband is recovered, it will be confiscated regardless of the legality of the stop or search. Moreover, factual assertions sufficient to justify the stop and search can be created [*305] to avoid the exclusionary rule or other sanctions. Even if nothing is found, the person stopped is highly unlikely to pursue any administrative or legal remedies. <=69> n68 To the degree that empirical evidence undermines these claims, law enforcement's broad discretionary powers and the practice of stopping as many cars and pedestrians as possible are placed in some jeopardy.

Police officials have fought legislative initiatives that would require record-keeping regarding the racial characteristics of police stops and searches. <=70> n69 Out of twenty states in which legislation has been drafted that would require data collection and analysis, only five have imposed these requirements. <=71> n70 On the federal level, the House of Representatives passed the Traffic Stops Statistics Study Act of 1998, authorizing the

n136. Id. at 808.

n137. Id. at 808-09.

n138. Id. at 815.

n139. Id. at 813.

n140. Id. at 813-14.

n141. Id. at 814. Justice Kennedy dissented from the Court's later decision in Maryland v. Wilson to permit police to order all occupants out of a stopped car, without suspicion:

The practical effect of our holding in Whren, of course, is to allow the police to stop vehicles in almost countless circumstances. When Whren is coupled with today's holding, the Court puts tens of millions of passengers at risk of arbitrary control by the police. If the command to exit were to become commonplace, the Constitution would be diminished in a most public way. As the standards suggested in dissent are adequate to protect the safety of the police, we ought not to suffer so great a loss.

Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408, 423 (1997) (Kennedy, J., dissenting).

n142. Whren, 517 U.S. at 813.

n143. As Professor Paul Butler has noted, Justice Scalia authored both Whren and the dissent in Morrison v. Olson, 487 U.S. 654, 728 (1988), in which Justice Scalia quoted Justice Robert Jackson on the dangers of selective prosecution:

If the prosecutor is obligated to choose his case, it follows that he can choose his defendants. Therein is the most dangerous power of the prosecutor: that he will pick people that he thinks he should get, rather than cases that need to be prosecuted. With the law books filled with a great assortment of crimes, a prosecutor stands a fair chance of finding at least a technical violation of some act on the part of almost anyone ... . It is in this realm - in which the prosecutor picks some person whom he dislikes or desires to embarrass, or selects some group of unpopular persons and then looks for an offense, that the greatest danger of abuse of prosecuting power lies. It is here that law enforcement becomes personal, and the real crime becomes that of being unpopular with the predominant or governing group.

Paul Butler, Starr is to Clinton as Regular Prosecutors Are to Blacks, 40 B.C. L. Rev. 705, 709-10 (1999) (citing Olson, 487 U.S. at 728).

n144. See, e.g., State v. Ladson, 979 P.2d 833 (Wash. 1999) (rejecting the use of pretextual traffic stops, holding that the provision of the state constitution prohibiting the invasion of private affairs or the home without authority of law forbids use of pretext as a justification for a warrantless search); Thompson, supra note 25, at 983-999 (pointing to the history behind the Fourth Amendment and social scientific research regarding racial stereotyping to show the conflict between racial profiling and the reasonableness standard of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence); Tracey Maclin, Terry v. Ohio's Fourth Amendment Legacy: Black Men and Police Discretion, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1271, 1285-86 (1998) [hereinafter Maclin, Terry v. Ohio] (arguing that the Terry decision was flawed because it opened the door for the consideration of race as an element in the reasonableness of a search under the Fourth Amendment); Maclin, Race, supra note 25, at 362 (suggesting that pretextual traffic stops based on race don't meet the Fourth Amendment "reasonableness" standard); Harris, Driving While Black, supra note 25 at 549-550 (chastising the Whren Court for ignoring the fact that racially motivated pretexutal stops could be unreasonable); Sklansky, supra note 25, at 327 (stating that "there is nothing new in the suggestion that equality is the proper concern of more than one provision of the Constitution"). See also Akhil Reed Amar, Fourth Amendment First Principles, 107 Harv. L. Rev. 757, 808 (1994) ("In a variety of search and seizure contexts, we must honestly address racially imbalanced effects and ask ourselves whether they are truly reasonable."); Sherry F. Colb, The Qualitative Dimension of Fourth Amendment "Reasonableness," 98 Colum. L. Rev. 1642 (1998) (arguing that the qualitative basis for establishing probable cause is incomplete and requires both procedural and substantive safeguards); Pamela S. Karlan, Race, Rights, and Remedies in Criminal Adjudication, 96 Mich. L. Rev. 2001 (1998) (discussing the problems of shifting racial profiling analysis from Fourth Amendment jurisprudence to jurisprudence based on the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

n145. There are decided similarities between profile stops and the notorious "writs of assistance," the general warrants employed by British soldiers to enter colonial residences to search for violations of customs and duties provisions. Nelson B. Lasson, The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution (1937); Morgan Cloud, Searching Through History, Searching for History; 63 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1707, 1737-39 (1996) (reviewing William John Cuddihy, The Fourth Amendment: Origins and Original Meaning (1990) (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation available from UMI Dissertation Services, 300 N. Zeeb Road, Ann Arbor, Michigan 48106)); see also David Rudovsky, The Impact of the War on Drugs on Procedural Fairness and Racial Equality, 1994 U. Chi. Legal F. 237, 242-45 (1994) (comparing the use of the writs of assistance by the British during the colonial period to the present methods used in fighting the War on Drugs); Sklansky, supra note 25, at 286 (discussing the writs of assistance and comparing them to pretextual traffic stops). These writs were issued by the Crown without a showing of cause and the colonial reaction to the practice of searches without judicial authorization is widely regarded as a highly significant factor in the adoption of the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Stanford v. Texas, 379 U.S. 476, 481-88 (1965) (discussing the origins of the Fourth Amendment); see also M.H. Smith, The Writs of Assistance Case 5-6, 493-97 (1978). While the writs of assistance marked an invasive and harassing program against the colonists, they were not without a "profile" justification: there was a large conspiracy among the colonists to thwart the collection of duties and evidence of this conduct was regularly found in the searches conducted by British agents. Id. at 1-7.

In many respects, racial profiling and random stops are the contemporary equivalents of the writs of assistance. They are based on the same assumptions and proceed on the notion that even without specific reason to believe that any particular person is engaged in illegal activity, the "profile" limits the universe of suspects and will in some cases lead to evidence of criminal conduct. See Commonwealth v. Rodriguez, 722 N.E.2d 429, 435 (Mass. 2000) (stating that roadblocks used to search for evidence of drug trafficking was comparable to writs of assistance); Commonwealth v. Lewis, 636 A.2d 619, 625 (Pa. 1994) ("The facile reliance on drug courier profiles is reminiscent of ... the general warrants of the British."). See also Thompson, supra note 25, at 992-98 (discussing relationship of the writs of assistance during the colonial period, the purposes of the Fourth Amendment, and race discrimination); Maclin, Race, supra note 25, at 334-36 (noting the broad search authority of slave patrols during the colonial period and comparing mild colonial reaction to these patrols with fierce resistance to the writs of assistance).

n146. An argument could be made that a showing of intentional race discrimination under the Fourteenth Amendment should result in the exclusion of evidence derived from that misconduct. E.g., United States v. Jennings, No. 91-5942, 1993 WL 5927, at 4 (6th Cir. Jan. 13, 1993) (affirming conviction based on consent search but suggesting that racial bias in stop is grounds for exclusion of evidence). Surely, this type of violation is at least as serious as the violation of Fourth Amendment rights and the need for deterrence would appear to be as strong. Karlan, supra note 144, at 2009-11 (arguing that suppression of evidence is one of the only remedies to deter police misconduct); see Andrew D. Leipold, Objective Tests And Subjective Bias: Some Problems of Discriminatory Intent in the Criminal Law, 73 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 559, 571 (1998) (noting the difficulty that a defendant faces in trying to exclude evidence obtained based on a racially motivated stop).

State courts have suppressed evidence as a result of findings of racial profiling. E.g., Commonwealth v. Gonsalves, 711 N.E.2d 108, 115-16 (Mass. 1999) (Ireland, J., concurring) (supporting the suppression of evidence gathered as a result of racial profiling by police); State v. Donahue, 742 A.2d 775, 782 (Conn. 1999) (suppressing evidence gathered during investigatory stop, noting that the case raises the "insidious specter of ""profiling'"); State v. Soto, 734 A.2d 350 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1996).

n147. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227 (1995) (holding that racial classifications in affirmative action program must be analyzed under strict scrutiny).

n148. Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 642-43 (1993) (finding that North Carolina's redistricting legislation was so irregular that it could only be rationally viewed as an attempt to segregate races for voting purposes).

n149. Hayden v. County of Nassau, 180 F.3d 42, 48 (2d Cir. 1999) (citing Adarand, 515 U.S. at 227-29). See also Rice v. Cayetano, 120 S. Ct. 1044 (2000) (striking down a provision of Hawaii Constitution limiting by ancestry the right to vote for trustees of agency that administers programs for descendants of Polynesians who occupied island before 1778, finding that the provision violated the Fifteenth Amendment).

n150. E.g., Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886).

n151. Brown v. City of Oneonta, 221 F.3d 329 (2d Cir. 2000) (holding that when criminal perpetrator is described as African American, no Fourteenth Amendment violation results from the stopping of all blacks in community because the expressed policy for the stops was racially neutral); United States v. Avery, 128 F.3d 974, 985 (6th Cir. 1997) (holding that a violation of the Equal Protection Clause results if law enforcement personnel "adopt[] a policy, employs a practice, or in a given situation takes steps to initiate an investigation ... based solely upon that citizen's race"); Alexis v. McDonald's Restaurants, 67 F.3d 341, 353-54 (1st Cir. 1995) (finding that use of excessive force to effect a forcible removal from the restaurant was motivated by a discriminatory animus).

n152. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 240 (1976). See also, Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 264-68 (1977) (holding that discriminatory intent can be shown by a combination of factors, including impact, historical context, substantive departures from norms, and administrative practices; plaintiff must show race was "a motivating factor," not the "sole" or "primary" reason). Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541 (1999) (noting that legislative motivation is a central question in determining claims of racial gerrymandering; circumstantial and statistical evidence may be used to prove racial motivation). The Supreme Court has also permitted a finding of discriminatory intent where the law or policy promotes racial stereotypes. City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493 (1989); Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 104 (1986) (Marshall, J., concurring) (stating that "the Equal Protection Clause prohibits a State from taking any action based on crude, inaccurate racial stereotypes"); Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614, 630-31 (1991) (cautioning against "automatic invocation of race stereotypes" in determining that peremptory challenges excluding jurors based on race in private civil cases was unconstitutional). In Rice v. Cayetano, 120 S. Ct. 1044 (2000), the Court found that ancestral voting restrictions were based on a "demeaning premise that citizens of a particular race are somehow more qualified to vote on certain matters," id. at 1060, and were "corruptive of the ... legal order," id. at 1046.

n153. Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 94-98 (1986). See also Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991) (holding that criminal defendant may object to race-based exclusion of jurors effected through peremptory challenges whether or not defendant and excluded jurors share same race); Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482 (1977) (holding that a showing that the population of the county was 79.1% Mexican-American, but that over an 11-year period only 39% of the persons summoned for grand jury service were Mexican-American, established a prima facie case of discrimination against Mexican-Americans in grand jury selection); Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625 (1972) (holding that statistics may establish a prima facie case of invidious racial discrimination in the selection of the grand jury).

n154. As an example of how a plaintiff may prove an inference of discrimination, the Batson Court noted that a "pattern" of strikes against black jurors included in the particular venire might give rise to an inference of discrimination, and further stated:

In cases involving the venire, this Court has found a prima facie case on proof that members of the defendant's race were substantially underrepresented on the venire from which his jury was drawn, and that the venire was selected under a practice providing "the opportunity for discrimination." This combination of factors raises the necessary inference of purposeful discrimination because the Court has declined to attribute to chance the absence of black citizens on a particular jury array where the selection mechanism is subject to abuse.

476 U.S. at 95 (citations omitted).

n155. 471 U.S. 222 (1985).

n156. Id.

n157. Id. at 227.

REV_00258763

n158. Id. at 232-33.

n159. 481 U.S. 279 (1987).

n160. Id.

n161. Id. at 286-87.

n162. See id. at 286.

n163. Id. at 287.

n164. Id. at 294-95.

n165. Id. at 295.

n166. Id. at 296, n.17. The Court further distinguished the venire selection and Title VII cases on the ground that:

The decisions of a jury commission or of an employer over time are fairly attributable to the commission or the employer. Therefore, an unexplained statistical discrepancy can be said to indicate a consistent policy of the decisionmaker. The Baldus study seeks to deduce a state "policy" by studying the combined effects of the decisions of hundreds of juries that are unique in their composition. It is incomparably more difficult to deduce a consistent policy by studying the decisions of these many unique entities.

Id. at 295, n.15.

n167. Id. at 312.

n168. Id. at 314-15.

n169. Id. at 309 (citation omitted).

n170. Id. at 339 (Brennan, J., dissenting).

n171. 517 U.S. 456 (1996).

n172. Id. at 458, 470-71.

n173. Id. at 459.

n174. Id.

n175. Id. at 460.

n176. Id. (citation omitted).

n177. Id. at 460-61.

n178. Id. at 458.

n179. Id.

n180. Id. at 464-69. The Supreme Court cited statistics compiled by the Sentencing Commission:

The Court of Appeals reached its decision in part because it started "with the presumption that people of all races commit all types of crimes - not with the premise that any type of crime is the exclusive province of any particular racial or ethnic group." 48 F.3d, at 1516-1517. It cited no authority for this proposition, which seems contradicted by the most recent statistics of the United States Sentencing Commission. Those statistics show: More than 90% of the persons sentenced in 1994 for crack cocaine trafficking were black, United States Sentencing Comm'n, 1994 Annual Report 107 (Table 45); 93.4% of convicted LSD dealers were white, ibid.; and 91% of those convicted for pornography or prostitution were white, id. at 41 (Table 13). Presumptions at war with presumably reliable statistics have no proper place in the analysis of this issue.

Id. at 469-70.

The Court's willingness to accept the proposition that rates of drug convictions by race and type of substance reflect actual rates of drug possession or trafficking is inconsistent with empirical data and Supreme Court pronouncements in related contexts. As the Attorneys General of New Jersey and New York have concluded, drug arrest statistics are highly misleading. See Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46; Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey, supra note 32. Further, as Professor Karlan has noted, in no other area of equal protection jurisprudence has the Court been willing to make this kind of judgment. Karlan, supra note 144, at 2024-25. Thus, the Court has rejected as demeaning the notion that black voters "think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls." Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 911-12 (1995) (quoting Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 647 (1993)). See also, Rice v. Cayetano, 120 S. Ct. 1044, 1060 (2000) ("Under the Fifteenth Amendment voters are treated not as members of a distinct race but as members of the whole citizenry.").

n181. See supra text accompanying notes 153-158.

n182. Armstrong, 517 U.S. at 470-71. For critical commentary on Armstrong, see Richard H. McAdams, Race and Selective Prosecution: Discovering the Pitfalls of Armstrong, 73 Chi.-Kent L. Rev. 605 (1998).

n183. McCleskey v. Kemp, 481 U.S. 279, 293-94, 308-11 (1987).

n184. Id. at 294.

n185. See Hunter v. Underwood, 471 U.S. 222 (1985) (relying on statistics in finding that a facially neutral disenfranchisement statute violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

n186. 476 U.S. 79 (1986).

n187. 118 U.S. 356 (1886).

n188. Castaneda v. Partida, 430 U.S. 482, 494 (1977).

n189. International Bhd. of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 339 n.20 (1977) (citations omitted). As the Court stated:

Statistics showing racial or ethnic imbalance are probative ... because such imbalance is often a telltale sign of purposeful discrimination; absent explanation, it is ordinarily to be expected that nondiscriminatory hiring practices will in time result in a work force more or less representative of the racial and ethnic composition of the population in the community from which employees are hired.

Id.

n190. See, e.g., Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131 (N.D. Cal. 2000) (allowing equal protection claim based in part on statistical evidence); Maryland State Conference of NAACP Branches v. Maryland Dep't of State Police, 72 F. Supp. 2d 560 (D. Md. 1999) (noting that plaintiffs have standing based on continuing practice of racial profiling by police); National Cong. for Puerto Rican Rights v. City of New York, 191 F.R.D. 52 (S.D.N.Y 1999) (holding that allegation that police stopped and frisked black and Latino men based on their race and national origin was sufficient to state equal protection claim, notwithstanding that complaint failed to identify similarly situated non-minority individuals who were not stopped and frisked). But see Chavez v. Illinois State Police, 27 F. Supp. 2d 1053, 1065 (N.D. Ill. 1998) (statistical evidence alone was insufficient to satisfy "similarly situated" requirement applicable to equal protection claim).

n191. Brown v. City of Oneonta, 221 F.3d 329, 337 (2d Cir. 2000); National Cong. for Puerto Rican Rights v. City of New York, 191 F.R.D. 52 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

n192. Brown, 221 F.3d at 337.

n193. United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996).

n194. Id. at 464.

n195. Id. at 465.

n196. See City of Chicago v. Morales, 119 S. Ct. 1849 (1999) (voiding as vague a city ordinance that prohibited "criminal street gang members" from loitering in public places); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 358 (1983) (finding loitering statute void, because it "vests virtually complete discretion in the hands of the police to determine whether the suspect has satisfied the statute and must be permitted to go on his way in the absence of probable cause to arrest"); Allee v. Medrano, 416 U.S. 802, 813 (1974) (police prohibited from "using their authority as peace officers to arrest, stop, disperse, or imprison [labor organizers] ... without "adequate cause'").

n197. See City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 485 (1989) (citation omitted).

n198. E.g., United States v. Alarcon-Gonzalez, 73 F.3d 289, 293 (10th Cir. 1996) (to detain suspect for questioning, "police must be able to articulate something more than an inchoate and unparticularized suspicion or hunch."); United States v. Ornelas-Ledesma, 16 F.3d 714, 717 (7th Cir. 1994) ("The "suspicious' circumstances [relied upon by the police in stopping the defendants would mean] ... that a very large proportion of all Hispanic Americans would be vulnerable to being stopped on suspicion of drug trafficking."); United States v. Anderson, 923 F.2d 450, 455 (6th Cir. 1991) ("Suspicions based solely on race of person stopped cannot give rise to a reasonable suspicion justifying a Terry stop." (citation omitted)). In United States v. Taylor, 956 F.2d 572, 581 (6th Cir. 1992) (en banc) the dissent asserted:

The disproportionate number of African-Americans who are stopped indicates that a racial imbalance against African-Americans does exist and is implicitly sanctioned by the law enforcement agency. The assumption that seventy-five percent of those persons transporting drugs and other contraband through public modes of transportation are African-American is impermissible. It flies in the face of reason and legitimates a negative stereotype of African-Americans. Surely, this practice must "be subjected to the strictest scrutiny and [can be] justified only by the weightiest of considerations.'

collection and analysis of information relating to the age, race, and ethnicity of drivers stopped by the police. <=72> n71 Law enforcement agencies lobbied hard against this legislation, asserting that the data would be misused or misinterpreted and would adversely affect law enforcement. <=73> n72 The bill failed to gain Senate approval. <=74> n73

[*306] The systematic collection and analysis of data pertaining to police stops and searches, including the often ignored pedestrian stops, <=75> n74 is an essential component of any long term reforms of these practices. However, the fact that all police departments do not maintain this data cannot excuse law enforcement agencies or the courts from exercising their powers to remedy current unlawful or misinformed policies. Studies and litigation consistently demonstrate significant racial disparities and the failure to act cannot be rationalized on a "lack of data" theory. Unfortunately, while we might expect that "morally indefensible" <=76> n75 and "deeply corrosive" practices would be taken seriously by governmental agencies and the courts, experience to date does not meet that expectation.

To explore these issues, this article considers the legal and social ramifications of racial profiling and random police stops and searches. In Part II, I discuss the justifications provided for the continued disparate treatment of African-Americans and other racial minorities in drug, weapons, and quality of life law enforcement. In Part III, I review the relevant federal constitutional and statutory law, including Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment standards, as it applies to the different policing practices involved in car and pedestrian stops. Part IV presents an analysis of the remedial framework. In Part V, I recommend legislative, administrative, and judicial reforms.

II. Racial Profiling: The Law Enforcement Justifications

The debate over racial profiling has shifted ground. Virtually everyone agrees that it is impermissible to stop or search someone solely on the basis of race. However, the extent and pervasiveness of this practice is sharply disputed. While there has been a movement towards exclusion of race as a legitimate factor in any police stop or [*307] search, unless in response to a description of a suspect, many law enforcement officials and courts continue to assert that race is a legitimate factor in policing decisions, even where there is no specific racial description of a suspect. The racially disparate impact of police practices are defended on a number of grounds: (1) that minorities commit more crime than whites, which explains and justifies, at least in part, the racial disparities that appear in data concerning stops, searches, and arrests; (2) that enforcement of criminal laws that are violated by whites and minorities in roughly proportionate numbers is disproportionate as to minorities because the location and social impact of the same types of crimes justifies a more aggressive response in minority communities; and (3) that current practices work: aggressive policing and targeting of minority communities, with increased numbers of pedestrian and car stops and searches, has led to a significant number of seizures of contraband, weapons, and fugitives, and a reduction of crime. <=77> n76

[*308] As stated by one commentator, based on his interviews with and observations of police officers:

Id. at 581 (Keith, J., dissenting) (citation omitted).

In United States v. Weaver, 966 F.2d 391, 392 (8th Cir. 1992), the court upheld a stop of a black drug courier suspect at the Kansas City Airport based on information that "a number of young roughly dressed black males from street gangs in Los Angeles frequently brought cocaine into the Kansas City area." Id. at 392-93. The court ruled that DEA agents can rely upon racial characteristics if objective crime trend analysis validates use of these characteristics as "risk factors' in predicting criminal activity. Id. at 394. In the same view Los Angeles Police Chief Bernard Parks has stated:

We have an issue of violent crime against jewelry salespeople ... . The predominant suspects are Colombians. We don't find Mexican-Americans, or blacks or other immigrants. It's a collection of several hundred Colombians who commit this crime. If you see six in a car in front of the Jewelry Mart, and they're waiting and watching people with briefcases, should we play the percentages and follow them? It's common sense.

Goldberg, supra note 62.

United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 563 (1976), upheld stops of persons at fixed border checkpoints that were based in part on Mexican ancestry. However, in United States v. Montero-Camargo, 208 F.3d 1122 (9th Cir. 2000) (en banc), the court ruled that it is impermissible to take Hispanic origin into account in stops in Southern California. The court noted both significant "demographic changes" and "changes in the law restricting the use of race as a criterion in government decision-making." Id. at 1134.

n199. 42 U.S.C. 2000(d) (1994) provides: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." See also, Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. 3789(c) (repealed 1984) (prohibiting discrimination on basis of race, color, national origin, sex, or religion by law enforcement agencies that receive federal funding).

n200. 28 C.F.R. 42.104(b)(2) (1999). The regulations also require that "every application for Federal financial assistance ... shall, as a condition to its approval and the extension of any Federal financial assistance ... contain or be accompanied by an assurance that the program will be conducted ... in compliance with all requirements imposed by or pursuant to this subpart." 28 C.F.R. 42.105(a)(1) (1999).

n201. 422 U.S. 66, 74-77 (1975) (discussing standards for determining whether a right of action should be implied under a federal statute).

n202. 189 F.3d 387 (3d Cir. 1999).

n203. Id. at 397-98.

n204. Cannon v. University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 710-16 (1979); Cf. Sandoval v. Hagan, 197 F.3d 484 (11th Cir. 1999) (upholding private challenge under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964), cert. granted sub nom. Alexander v. Sandoval, 121 S. Ct. 28 (2000) (accepting petition of certiorari challenging Title VI ruling).

n205. 463 U.S. 582 (1983).

n206. See 463 U.S. at 584 n.2 (White, J.); id. at 623 n.15 (Marshall, J., dissenting); id. at 642-45 (Stevens, Brennan, Blackmun, JJ., dissenting).

n207. 469 U.S. 287 (1985).

n208. Id. at 293-94.

n209. See, e.g., Powell v. Ridge, 189 F.3d 387 (3d Cir. 1999) (holding that regulations promulgated under Title VI prohibiting discriminatory effects in educational programs gave rise to an implied private right of action); Chester Residents Concerned for Quality Living v. Seif, 132 F.3d 925 (3d Cir. 1997) (holding that a private right of action exists under Title VI regulations), cert. granted 524 U.S. 915, vacated as moot, 524 U.S. 974 (1998); Villanueva v. Carere, 85 F.3d 481, 486 (10th Cir. 1996) (finding that while Hispanic parents had a private cause of action under Title VI to challenge decision of school district to close neighborhood elementary schools and a open new charter school, because parents failed to show a disparate impact, their claims were denied); New York Urban League, Inc. v. State of New York, 71 F.3d 1031, 1036-37 (2d Cir. 1995) (noting that riders of the New York City Transit Authority subway and bus system, the majority of whom are members of protected minority groups, had a private cause of action under Title VI).

n210. Cannon v. University of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 704 (1979).

REV_00258770

n211. Choate, 469 U.S. at 293-94. There is substantial evidence of congressional intent to permit private plaintiffs to enforce the discriminatory effects standard set forth in Title VI regulations. Since Guardians and Choate were decided, Congress has amended Title VI to broaden the scope of the statute's coverage while acknowledging the existence of a privately enforceable discriminatory effects standard. Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987, 42 U.S.C. 2000d-4a(1) (1994).

n212. 42 U.S.C. 2000(d)-4a (1994). See, Cureton v. NCAA, 198 F.3d 107, 115 (3d Cir. 1999) (finding that the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987 applies only to specific programs receiving federal aid).

n213. 42 U.S.C. 2000(d) (emphasis added)

n214. Innovative Health Sys., Inc. v. City of White Plains, 117 F.3d 37, 44-45 (2d Cir. 1997) (citations omitted). See also Bryant v. New Jersey Dep't of Transp., 998 F. Supp. 438 (D.N.J. 1998) (holding that African-American residents whose homes may be destroyed as a result of a federally funded highway project allegedly allocated in a discriminatory manner had standing under Title VI).

n215. National Credit Union Admin. v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 522 U.S. 479, 492 (1998) (citations omitted). See also, Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Envtl. Servs., Inc., 120 S. Ct. 693 (2000) (holding that environmental plaintiffs adequately alleged injury in fact, for standing purposes, when they aver that they use the affected area and are persons for whom the aesthetic and recreational values of the area will be lessened by the challenged activity).

n216. Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 431 (1971) (holding that intentional discrimination need not be shown under a Title VI claim).

n217. See Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131, 1140-42 (N.D. Cal. 2000) (finding that statistical evidence could be used by plaintiffs in a racial profiling case to support claim based on an equal protection violation). Of course, the United States may invoke Title VI regulations directly to terminate federal funding of police departments that engage in practices that result in unjustified disparate impact on racial minorities. As I discuss below, in the past year the Department of Justice, pursuant to powers provided by Congress in 1994 to sue to enjoin unconstitutional patterns and practices by law enforcement agencies, has obtained consent decrees in New Jersey and Montgomery County, Maryland, that prohibit racial profiling on highways.

REV_00258771

n218. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 57.

n219. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

n220. The standards under the Fourth Amendment are far easier to state than to apply in specific factual contexts. In summary, consensual encounters between the police and civilians (defined as situations where a reasonable person would feel free to decline to answer questions or to leave the area) can be made without any showing of cause or suspicion, investigative stops (forced stops where an individual is not free to leave) may be effectuated upon "reasonable suspicion" of criminal conduct, a frisk (protective pat down for the officer's protection, but not as a search for contraband) is permissible incident to an investigative detention where the officer has articulable grounds for such action, and an arrest and full scale search are justified only upon a showing of probable cause. See generally, Wayne R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment (3d ed. 1996).

n221. E.g., Terry v. Ohio 30 Years Later: A Symposium on the Fourth Amendment, Law Enforcement and Police-Citizen Encounters, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 721 (1998).

n222. See supra note 76 and accompanying text.

n223. See infra notes 225-227.

n224. Id.

n225. See, e.g., Dan Barry & Marjorie Connelly, Poll in New York Finds Many Think Police Are Biased, N.Y. Times, Mar. 16, 1999, at A1; Michael Cooper, Safir May Use Data on Frisks to Back Unit, N.Y. Times, Apr. 19, 1999, at B1 (reporting that the New York City Police Commissioner was attempting to deflect attacks that stops and frisks were racially biased); Robert. D. McFadden, Four Officers Indicted for Murder in Killing of Diallo, Lawyer Says, N.Y. Times, Mar. 26, 1999, at A1 (noting that the killing had led to a storm of protests against the police). On February 25, 2000 all four officers were acquitted on the criminal charges. Jane Fritsch, 4 Officers in Diallo Shooting are Acquitted of All Charges, N.Y. Times, Feb. 26, 2000, at A1. See also, Kevin Flynn, Shooting Raises Scrutiny of Police Anti-Drug Tactics, N.Y. Times, Mar. 25, 2000, at A1 (reporting criticism of narcotics enforcement in the wake of shooting of Patrick Dorismond, an unarmed man).

n226. E.g., Elizabeth Kolbert, The Perils of Safety, The New Yorker, Mar. 22, 1999, at 50.

n227. E.g., Joyce Purnick, Central Issue is Left Unsaid in Diallo Case, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 2000, at B1 (suggesting that the aggressive tactics used by the Street Crime Unit of the New York Police Department was a major factor in the death of Diallo); Clyde Haberman, When Doing Wrong Isn't Wrongdoing, N.Y. Times, Feb. 27, 2000, 4 (Week in Review), at 3 (reporting the spectrum of public responses in the wake of the jury acquittal of the police officers charged in the killing of Diallo).

n228. Patterns of brutality, even torture, are not mere vestiges of the past. In recent years, evidence of brutal and sadistic conduct by officers and groups of officers in major police departments across the country have demonstrated how insidious are these practices. See, Bandes, supra note 67, at 1307-09 (analyzing ways in which the courts and other institutions have avoided confronting institutional patterns of police misconduct by reducing evidence to anecdotes); Todd S. Purdum, Los Angeles Police Officer Sets Off Corruption Scandal, N.Y. Times, Sept. 18, 1999, at A9 (reporting that a dozen police officers were suspended after an investigation uncovered cases in which the police had shot an unarmed and handcuffed gang member, and then framed him); see also, Report of the Independent Commission of the Los Angeles Police Department (1991) [hereinafter Christopher Commission] (reporting on the excessive use of force in the Los Angeles Police Department in the wake of the Rodney King beating); Report of the City of New York Commission to Investigate Allegations of Police Corruption and the Anti-Corruption Procedures of the Police Department (July 7, 1994) (Milton Mollen, Chair) [hereinafter Mollen Commission], reprinted in 6 New York City Police Corruption Investigation Commissions, 1894-1994 (Gabriel J. Chin ed., 1997) (investigating police corruption in the New York City police department). Police officials are almost always quick to deny allegations of brutality, and the code of silence and other entrenched practices in the police culture often make it difficult to prove these matters. Myriam E. Gilles, Breaking the Code of Silence: Rediscovering "Custom" in Section 1983 Municipal Liability, 80 B.U. L. Rev. 17 (2000).

n229. Kolbert, supra note 226, at 50, 56-57; see, Brent Staples, Editorial, How a Black Man's Wallet Becomes a "Gun," N.Y. Times, Mar. 12, 2000, 4 (Week in Review), at 14 ("The root of the problem is the tendency of white police officers - and white Americans generally - to associate blackness with criminality ... .").

n230. 392 U.S. 1 (1968).

n231. Id. at 30.

n232. Id. at 27. See generally, 4 Wayne R. LaFave, Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment 9.4(a), 137-43, 9.5(a), 246-70 (3d ed. 1996). Over the years, the Court has expanded the power to stop and frisk. See, e.g., United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989) (drug enforcement agents had reasonable suspicion to conduct investigative stop of suspected drug courier who flew from Honolulu and spent 48 hours in Miami, paid for two plane tickets with $ 2,100 from roll of $ 20 bills containing nearly twice that much; never checked his luggage, and agents had reasonable ground to believe that suspected courier was traveling under an alias); United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675 (1985) (holding that a twenty-minute detention of a criminal suspect is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment); United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981) (holding that stop based on "inferences and deductions that might elude an untrained person" was justified on less than probable cause); Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972) (holding that where an informant had advised a police officer that an individual seated in a nearby vehicle was carrying narcotics and had a gun at his waist, that the officer acted justifiably in reaching in and removing a loaded gun from the occupant's waistband after the occupant had rolled down his window rather than complying with the officer's request to open the car door). But see, Florida v. J.L., 120 S. Ct. 1375 (2000) (anonymous tip of man with gun is an insufficient basis for stop and frisk).

n233. 392 U.S. at 13-15.

n234. See, Thompson, supra note 25, at 966-68 (discussing testimony that established that two of the three men thought to be acting suspiciously were black, a fact that first led the officer to observe their conduct).

n235. Terry, 392 U.S. at 17 n.14.

n236. E.g., Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders (1968) (Kerner Commission); President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, Task Force Report: The Police (1967).

n237. The Court's refusal to consider racial bias in the development of Fourth Amendment doctrine is well documented. E.g., Maclin, Race, supra note 25, at 336-38; Thompson, supra, note 25, at 962-83; Sklansky, supra note 25, at 316-17. At the same time, the evidence of the corrosive impact of racial bias in street level policing has been similarly well documented. E.g., Christopher Commission supra note 228; Mollen Commission supra note 228; Kennedy, supra note 76.

n238. See, e.g., Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct 673, 676 (2000) (holding that flight of individual from police is a strong factor to be considered in determining reasonableness of stop); Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325 (1990) (holding that anonymous telephone tip, corroborated by independent police work, provided reasonable suspicion to make investigatory stop of defendant's vehicle); United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989) (holding that stopping a suspect based on drug courier profile was reasonable under Fourth Amendment standard); Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973) (holding that consent to a search can be voluntary even if suspect did not know that he could refuse search); Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972) (holding that a police officer making a reasonable stop can conduct a limited protective search for weapons); David Rudovsky, The Impact of the War on Drugs on Procedural Fairness and Racial Equality, 1994 U. Chi. Legal F. 237 (1994) (arguing that judicial deference to aggressive police tactics in the War on Drugs has had a negative impact on certain constitutional principles).

n239. E.g., Maclin, Race, supra note 25, at 336-38; Mollen Commission, supra note 228.

n240. Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673 (2000).

n241. Id. at 674-75. The officer could not recall whether the cars were marked. Id. at 683 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

n242. Id. at 675.

n243. Id. at 676-77.

n244. Id. at 676.

REV_00258775

n245. Id.

n246. Id. at 677.

n247. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 27 (1968).

n248. Brief of Amici Curiae NAACP Legal Defense Fund at 4-5, 17-19, Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673 (2000) (No. 98-1036).

n249. 120 S. Ct. at 680 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

n250. Id. at 680-81, nn.8, 9 and 10 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

n251. Id. at 680-81 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Justice Stevens' comment that African-Americans may tend to fear police more than whites, id., received very little attention. By contrast, Federal District Judge Harold Baer was vilified for suppressing evidence in a narcotics case in an opinion that discounted the flight of the suspect from police on the ground that residents of minority communities in New York City may believe the police to be "corrupt, abusive and violent." See United States v. Bayless, 913 F. Supp. 232, 242 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). After calls for his impeachment, e.g., Stephen B. Bright, Political Attacks on the Judiciary: Can Justice be Done Amid Efforts to Intimidate and Remove Judges from Office for Unpopular Decisions?, 72 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 308, 310-11 (1997), Judge Baer vacated his ruling. United States v. Bayless, 921 F. Supp. 211 (S.D.N.Y. 1996), aff'd., 201 F.3d 116 (2d Cir. 2000).

n252. Judgments as to the relevancy and weight that should be assigned to particular human behavior are necessarily often subjective and imprecise. The Federal Rules of Evidence define as "relevant" any evidence that has "any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable." Fed. R. Evid. 401. This extremely broad definition allows for the "common sense judgments" the Court approved of in Wardlow, but also for consideration of empirical and statistical data. See Frost v. Symington, 197 F.3d 348, 356 (9th Cir. 1999) ("Scientific studies can have a corrective effect by establishing an apparently implausible connection or refuting an apparently obvious one, but, subject to such corrections, conformity to commonsensical intuitive judgments is a standard element of both reasonableness and rationality." (citation omitted)); Commonwealth v. Santoli, 680 N.E.2d 1116 (Mass. 1997) (noting social science studies that show that there is no relationship between strength of the belief of the accuracy of one's identification and the actual accuracy of the identification in holding that jury instructions could not include a statement that the strength of identification may be taken into consideration in determining accuracy).

n253. 72 St. John's L. Rev. 721 (1998).

n254. E.g., Maclin, Terry v. Ohio, supra note 144; Akhil Reed Amar, Terry and Fourth Amendment First Principles, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1097 (1998) (discussing the conflicting understandings of the Terry decision); Christopher Slobogin, Let's Not Bury Terry: A Call for Rejuvenation of the Proportionality Principle, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1053 (1998) (promoting a conceptual framework for the Fourth Amendment based on the "proportionality principle").

n255. Several of the articles discussed the racial tensions surrounding the stop and frisk practices, e.g., Maclin, Terry v. Ohio, supra note 144; Jack B. Weinstein & Mae C. Quinn, Terry, Race and Judicial Integrity: The Court and Suppression During the War on Drugs, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1323 (1998), and others addressed application of the doctrine in lower court adjudication, e.g., George C. Thomas, III, Terry v. Ohio in the Trenches: A Glimpse at How Courts Apply "Reasonable Suspicion," 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1025, 1026-27 (1998).

n256. Stephen A. Saltzburg, Terry v. Ohio: A Practically Perfect Doctrine, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 911 (1998).

n257. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 1. It should be noted that there is even less reliable information made available by police departments concerning racial demographics and "cause" for pedestrian stops and frisks than for car stops and searches. Many departments require reports only when an arrest occurs and no department to my knowledge maintains a computer data base of this information. Indeed, in the two studies discussed in this Article, the information regarding pedestrian stops had to be individually transferred from handwritten police forms to computerized data fields.

n258. Id. at 1-4.

n259. Id.

n260. Id. at 21-22, 26-27.

n261. Id. at 26-27. The police reporting form (the "75-48") requires the officer to provide a reason for any stop, frisk or arrest. Id. at 1-7.

n262. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 28.

n263. Id.

n264. See, e.g., New York City Police Commissioner Howard Safir, Statement to the New York City Council Public Safety Committee (Apr. 19, 1999).

n265. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 18-28.

n266. Id.

n267. Id. at 31. The Report was issued at the time that a new Commissioner, John Timoney, was appointed to head the Police Department. Commissioner Timoney ordered that a revised form be developed for recording stops and frisks and that officers be specially trained with respect to their responsibilities in accurately recording all stops of cars and pedestrians. Fifth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 4-10.

n268. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 10. For the Narcotics Strike Force, 57% of the recorded stops were facially deficient under the Fourth Amendment. Id. at 13. As I discuss below, it is both ironic and disturbing that it is the officers often credited with the most "expertise" who most frequently make stops of innocent persons.

n269. Francis X. Clines, Philadelphia Police Chief Borrows from Bronx Beat, N.Y. Times, Jan. 16, 2000, 1, at 16.

n270. E.g., Mark Fazlollah, Arrests in Rapes Up 46% in 1999, Phila. Inquirer, Mar. 20, 2000, at A-1.

This is what a cop might tell you in a moment of reckless candor: in crime fighting, race matters. When asked, most cops will declare themselves color blind. But watch them on the job for several months, and get them talking about the way policing is really done, and the truth will emerge, the truth being that cops, white and black, profile ... . [They say] African-Americans commit a disproportionate percentage of the types of crimes that draw the attention of the police. Blacks make up 12 percent of the population, but accounted for 58 percent of all carjackers between 1992 and 1996. (Whites accounted for 19 percent.) Victim surveys - and most victims of black criminals are black - indicate that blacks commit almost 50 percent of all robberies. Blacks and Hispanics are widely believed to be the blue-collar backbone of the country's heroin - and cocaine - distribution networks. Black males between the ages of 14 and 24 make up 1.1 percent of the country's population, yet commit more than 28 percent of its homicides. Reason, not racism, cops say, directs their attention.

Cops, white and black, know one other thing: they're not the only ones who profile. Civilians profile all the time - when they buy a house, or pick a school district, or walk down the street. <=78> n77

These observations reflect widely held views - within and without law enforcement circles - that African-Americans and other minorities commit a disproportionate number of crimes and, therefore, they are justifiably targeted not only where race is part of a reported criminal incident, but also in situations where police have a wide range of possible targets (e.g., pretextual traffic stops) or where their suspicion of criminal activity would not otherwise justify a stop or search. <=79> n78

In the context of drug interdiction car stops, these defenses of racial profiling do not withstand empirical and legal scrutiny. <=80> n79 First, [*309] the empirical data does not support the notion of a minority-dominated drug trade. According to national drug abuse studies, minorities possess and use drugs just slightly more frequently than whites. <=81> n80 Former "Drug Czar" William J. Bennett has stated that "the typical cocaine user is white, male, a high school graduate employed full time and living in a small metropolitan area or suburb." <=82> n81 Drew S. Days, III, as Solicitor General, defended federal drug charging patterns, but has stated that "there appears to be a significant disparity" between drug usage by race and arrest rates. <=83> n82 A recent study found that the rate of drug abuse among adolescents was significantly higher in rural as opposed to urban areas. <=84> n83 Thus, eighth graders in rural areas, who are far more likely to be white, <=85> n84 are 104% more likely to use amphetamines, 50% more likely to use cocaine, 83% more likely to use crack cocaine, and 34% more likely to use marijuana than their urban counterparts. <=86> n85

In response, law enforcement officials assert that whatever the rates for use and possession, traffickers and couriers are disproportionately black or Hispanic and, therefore, profiling on the highways is justified. <=87> n86 But there is scant data on the racial composition of highway [*310] drug traffickers or couriers. The former Chief of DEA could not be any more specific than his assertion that it is "probably safe to say whites ... [constitute] the majority of traffickers." <=88> n87 Human Rights Watch has reported:

n271. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 12-15.

n272. Plaintiffs' Fifth Monitoring Report, supra note 41, at 1-2, 9-10, 20-26.

n273. Id. at 20-25.

n274. Id. at 26-27.

n275. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 88.

n276. Id.

n277. Id. at 94.

n278. Id.

n279. Id. at 94-95.

n280. Id. at 106.

n281. Id.

n282. Id.

n283. Id. at 100-01. For a discussion of "neighborhood" and crime, see Margaret Raymond, Down on the Corner, Out in the Street: Considering the Character of the Neighborhood in Evaluating Reasonable Suspicion, 60 Ohio St. L.J. 99 (1999) (noting that the character of a neighborhood is often taken into consideration when establishing a reasonable suspicion that would justify a Terry stop).

n284. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 111.

n285. Id.

n286. Id. at 119-24, 130.

n287. Id. at 123.

n288. Id.

n289. Id.

n290. Id. at 160-62.

n291. Id. at 162.

n292. Notwithstanding the substantial evidence of arbitrary police investigatory stops and searches, there is no indication of a change in official policy or practice. David Barstow, View From New York Streets: No Retreat by Police, N.Y. Times, June 25, 2000, 1, at 1.

n293. Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39 (1996). See also, Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673, 675 (2000) (reiterating Terry's holding that a police officer may stop a suspect upon a reasonable belief that criminal activity is afoot without violating the Fourth Amendment); Skinner v. Ry. Labor Executives' Ass'n., 489 U.S. 602 (1989) (holding that alcohol and drug tests established by the Federal Railroad Administration were reasonable and thus did not violate the Fourth Amendment); United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989) (upholding stop of suspect by police officer based on reasonable suspicion that criminal activity was afoot). There has been a longstanding debate between a "probable cause/warrant preference" and a "reasonableness" interpretation of the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Amar, supra note 144, at 801 (suggesting that the core of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness, not probable cause); Anthony G. Amsterdam, Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment, 58 Minn. L. Rev. 349 (1974) (discussing in detail the development of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence); Scott E. Sunby, "Everyman"'s Fourth Amendment: Privacy or Mutual Trust Between Government and Citizen?, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 1751 (1994) (criticizing the greater reliance on the reasonableness doctrine in Fourth Amendment jurisprudence).

n294. Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 696 (1996).

n295. Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213, 238 (1983) (defining probable cause required to secure a search warrant).

n296. E.g., Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 30-31 (1968); United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 417-18 (1981); Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673, 675 (2000).

n297. United States v. Sokolow 490 U.S. 1, 7 (1989). The Court has insisted on information that distinguishes wrongdoers from the universe of innocent persons. Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438, 441 (1980).

n298. For a discussion of police perjury, particularly in the context of suppression hearings, see H. Richard Uviller, Tempered Zeal 115-16 (1988) (noting the temptations for police to commit perjury); Morgan Cloud, The Dirty Little Secret, 43 Emory L.J. 1311, 1311 (1994) ("Police perjury is the dirty little secret of our criminal justice system."); Donald A. Dripps, Police, Plus Perjury, Equals Polygraphy, 86 J. Crim. L. & Criminology 693 (1996) ("Criminal procedure scholars agree that police perjury is not exotic."); Maclin, Race, supra note 25, at 379-86 (arguing that police perjury is a legitimate concern in pretextual traffic stops based on race); Christopher Slobogin, Testilying: Police Perjury and What to do About it, 67 Colo. L. Rev. 1037 (1996) (discussing police perjury and ways to reduce it); Scott Turow, Lying to Get the Bad Guys, N.Y. Times, Feb. 20, 2000, 4 (Week in Review), at 13; Irving Younger, The Perjury Routine, The Nation, May 8, 1967, at 596 (discussing police perjury during probable cause hearings). The "code of silence" may also place substantial obstacles in proving improper police conduct. E.g., Gabriel J. Chin & Scott C. Wells, The "Blue Wall of Silence" as Evidence of Bias and Motive to Lie: A New Approach to Police Perjury, 59 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 233 (1998); Gilles, supra note 219; Jerome H. Skolnick, Code Blue, The American Prospect, March 27, 2000, at 49.

n299. Christopher Slobogin, Let's Not Bury Terry: A Call for Rejuvenation of the Proportionality Principle, 72 St. John's L. Rev. 1053, 1082-84 (1998); see also, C.M.A. McCauliff, Burdens of Proof: Degrees of Belief, Quanta of Evidence, or Constitutional Guarantees?, 35 Vand. L. Rev. 1293, 1328-32 (1982) (survey of 164 federal judges disclosed a predominant range of 10%-50% level of certainty for establishing "reasonable suspicion," with an average of 29.59%). On the issues presented by probabilistic proof compare Michael J. Saks & Robert F. Kidd, Human Information Processing and Adjudication: Trial by Heuristics, 15 L. & Soc'y. Rev. 123 (1980-81) (arguing that mathematics has a role in the trial process), and Laurence H. Tribe, Trial by Mathematics: Precision and Ritual in the Legal Process, 84 Harv. L. Rev. 1329 (1971) (discounting the use of mathematical techniques in the trial process).

n300. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 111.

n301. See id. at 66.

n302. Id. at 80-82.

n303. It is almost a mantra of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence that the "experience" of the officer is a significant factor. See, e.g., Ornelas v. United States, 517 U.S. 690, 699 (1996) (noting that "a reviewing court should take care ... to give due weight to inferences drawn from ... local law enforcement officers," when determining whether a stop based on probable cause is reasonable); United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411, 418 (1981) ("[A] trained officer draws inferences and makes deductions - inferences and deductions that might well elude an untrained person."); Brown v. Texas, 443 U.S. 47, 52 n.2 (1979) (noting that the situation in the case should be, "distinguished from the observations of a trained, experienced police officer who is able to perceive and articulate meaning in given conduct which would be wholly innocent to the untrained observer."); Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 22-23 (1968) ("It would have been poor police work indeed for an officer of 30 years' experience ... to have failed to investigate ... further.").

n304. Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46, at 117-18.

n305. Id. at 117 n.23.

n306. See Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673, 676 (2000).

n307. See, e.g., Illinois v. Wardlow, 120 S. Ct. 673 (2000) (flight in itself can be a major factor for stop); United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1, 3 (1989) (upholding stop of airplane passenger based on drug courier profile factors); Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 352 (1990) (upholding a stop based on information detailing normal daily activity from anonymous source).

n308. For a more detailed analysis of effective remedial measures, see infra Part IV.

n309. Id.

n310. 221 F.3d 329 (2d Cir. 2000).

n311. Id. at 334.

n312. Id.

n313. Id.

n314. Id.

n315. Id. at 337-38.

n316. Id.

n317. Id. at 340.

n318. Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 19 n.16 (1968); United States v. Mendenhall, 446 U.S. 544, 554 (1980) (a person is "seized" within meaning of Fourth Amendment only when by means of physical force or show of authority his freedom of movement is restrained and in view of all of the circumstances a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave). In Florida v. Bostick, 501 U.S. 429 (1991), the Court found no coercive conduct sufficient to establish a seizure of an interstate bus passenger who, at a scheduled stop, was surrounded in the bus by armed narcotics officers, and "consented" to a search of her luggage. The Court ruled that a "reasonable person" could have felt free, "to decline the officers' requests or otherwise terminate the encounter." Id. at 436.

n319. Brown, 221 F.3d at 340.

n320. Id. at 340.

n321. Id.

n322. Id.

n323. Id.

n324. Id.

n325. One commentator, incredulous that a federal court could uphold the stop of every black man in this town on the basis of the information in this case, described the affair as "Breathing While Black." Bob Herbert, Breathing While Black, N.Y. Times, Nov. 4, 1999, at A29. The court in Brown v. City of Oneonta did state that it recognized the "sense of frustration that was doubtlessly felt by those questioned," and cautioned that police should "always be cognizant of the impressions they leave on a community," but thought these concerns had nothing to do with equal protection analysis. 195 F.3d at 120.

n326. See Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 905 (1996) (determining that strict scrutiny applies when race is the "predominant" consideration in drawing congressional district lines); City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493 (1989) (applying strict scrutiny in analyzing affirmative action programs that awarded city construction projects).

n327. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 163 (1803).

n328. As Professor Burbank has stated, "substantive rights ... are worth no more than the procedural mechanisms available for their realization and protection." Stephen B. Burbank, The Bitter with the Sweet: Tradition, History, and Limitations on Federal Judicial Power - A Case Study, 75 Notre Dame L. Rev. 1291, 1293 (2000).

n329. This article does not address potential state causes of action or remedies for racial profiling and arbitrary stop and frisk practices. As has been well documented, however, state courts, interpreting state constitutions, have often provided greater protections from arrest and search practices than are required by the federal Constitution. See, e.g., David A. Harris, Addressing Racial Profiling in the States, 3 U. Pa. J. Const. L. 368 (2001).

n330. Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996) (holding that police stops for traffic violations based upon probable cause do not violate the Fourth Amendment, even if the stops were pretextual). Some state courts have rejected Whren or otherwise held that racial bias in a stop or arrest is grounds for exclusion of evidence under search and seizure principles. E.g., State v. Soto, 734 A.2d 350 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1996).

n331. See, e.g., Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978) (standing to contest the legality of a search restricted to persons who had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the items or premises searched); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980) (possessory interest in items seized not enough to confer standing; defendant must have legitimate expectation of privacy with respect to someone else's purse and its contents).

n332. See, e.g., United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897, 922-24 (1984) (evidence of search not excluded where reasonable officer would believe search warrant stated probable cause, even though it did not).

n333. See, e.g., California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in trash); Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979) (no legitimate expectation of privacy in phone number dialed); Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984) (open fields beyond the curtilage are not protected by the Fourth Amendment).

n334. United States v. Armstrong, 517 U.S. 456 (1996) (limiting discovery on claim of selective prosecution based on race to instances where there is credible evidence that similarly situated defendants of other races had been treated differently); Andrew E. Taslitz, Slaves no More!: The Implications of the Informed Citizen Ideal for Discovery Before Fourth Amendment Suppression Hearings, 15 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 709 (1999) ("Pre-trial discovery in criminal cases is extraordinarily limited.").

n335. See supra note 298.

n336. See Wilson v. Tinicum Township, No. Civ. A. 92-6617, 1993 WL 280205, at 2 (E.D. Pa. July 20, 1993) (noting police excuse used to establish a "legitimate" stop); Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law in Support of Their Motion for Class Certification at 7-9, Wilson v. Tinicum Township, No. Civ. A. 92-6617, 1993 WL 280205 (E.D. Pa. July 20, 1993) (No. 92-6617) (detailing incidents of illegal stops of cars and "routine" searches for drugs).

n337. Plaintiffs' Memorandum at 3-6, Tinicum Township (No. 92-6617).

n338. Exhibits to Plaintiffs' Memorandum, Tinicum Township (No. 92-6617).

n339. Id.

n340. Review of the files in which contraband was found disclosed that the courts rejected suppression motions in great majority of the cases. Occasionally, however, a trial judge found the police testimony simply too incredible. In one case, the court found a stop of a car with three black males made on the allegation that a small ornament from a rear view mirror "materially obstructed" the driver's view through the windshield to be insufficient to establish cause for the stop. Commonwealth v. Miller, No. 4627-91 (Pa. Ct. Com. Pl. of Del. County Crim. Div. Sept. 9, 1992).

n341. 734 A.2d 350 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1996).

n342. See William H. Buckman & John Lamberth, Challenging Racial Profiles: Attacking Jim Crow on the Interstate, Champion, Sept.-Oct. 1999, at 14.

n343. See State v. Kennedy, 588 A.2d 834 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1991) (statistical survey was sufficient to raise colorable claim of selective enforcement of traffic laws against minorities and to permit discovery of internal state police records).

n344. Soto, 734 A.2d at 352.

n345. Id. at 352-58, 361. The state filed a notice of appeal but subsequently withdrew its appeal at the time that the Attorney General of New Jersey issued the "Interim Report" on racial profiling on the Turnpike. See also Commonwealth v. Gonsalves, 711 N.E.2d 108 (Mass. 1999) (rejecting the doctrine of Maryland v. Wilson, 519 U.S. 408 (1997), stating that the doctrine creates a police power providing, "a clear invitation to discriminatory enforcement"). Justice Ireland noted the widespread public concern with racial profiling and stated that the broad discretion provided by Wilson would contribute to this problem. Id. at 669-700 (Ireland, J., concurring).

n346. See generally, Michael Avery, Karen Blum & David Rudovsky, Police Misconduct: Law & Litigation (3d ed. 1999); Sheldon Nahmod, Civil Rights and Civil Liberties Litigation (4th ed. 1999).

n347. Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents, 403 U.S. 388 (1971) (holding that plaintiffs can sue federal defendants in federal court for Fourth Amendment violations). See also, Carlson v. Green, 446 U.S. 14 (1980) (holding that a remedy was available directly under the Constitution even though allegations could also support a suit under the Federal Tort Claims Act); Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296 (1983) (unique disciplinary structure of military establishment and Congress' activity in field constitute "special factors" which dictate that it would be inappropriate to provide enlisted military personnel a Bivens-type remedy against their superior officers).

n348. Federal Tort Claims Act, Pub. L. No. 79-601, 60 Stat. 842 (codified as amended in scattered sections of 28 U.S.C.).

n349. E.g., Price v. Kramer, 200 F.3d 1237 (9th Cir. 1999) (affirming award of $ 245,000 for racially-motivated arrest and use of excessive force); Morgan v. Woessner, 997 F.2d 1244 (9th Cir. 1993) (allowing $ 90,000 compensatory damages for unlawful arrest and excessive force, while award of $ 450,000 in punitive damages remanded for further consideration by the district court); Hall v. Ochs, 817 F.2d 920 (1st Cir. 1987) (where racially motivated conduct had a "profound and lasting effect" on plaintiff, court sustains award of $ 375,000 plus attorneys' fees). In the highway racial profiling cases, there have been significant settlements (often joined with affirmative relief by way of consent decree) that have been effective in changing practices. See, e.g., Robert Jackson, Eagle County Must Pay for Stopping Motorists, Rocky Mountain News, Nov. 10, 1995, at A4 (reporting $ 800,000 settlement of racial profiling claim based on litigation, Whitfield v. Board of County Comm'rs, 837 F. Supp. 338 (D. Colo. 1993)); Settlement Agreement, Wilson v. Tinicum Township, No. 92-6617 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 19, 1995). By contrast, an initial settlement in the I-95 litigation in Maryland in Wilkins v. Maryland State Police, C.A. No. 93-468 (D. Md. 1996), failed to end racial profiling and new litigation has been initiated. See Maryland State Conference of NAACP Branches v. Maryland Dep't of State Police, 72 F. Supp. 2d 560 (D. Md. 1999).

n350. E.g., Seth F. Kreimer, Exploring the Dark Matter of Judicial Review: A Constitutional Census of the 1990s, 5 Wm. & Mary Bill Rts. J. 427, 499-503 (1997).

n351. Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982).

n352. Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987).

n353. 502 U.S. 224 (1991) (per curiam).

n354. Id. at 227-28.

n355. Oliveira v. Mayer, 23 F.3d 642, 648 (2d Cir. 1994); see also Karnes v. Skrutski, 62 F.3d 485, 491n.3 (3d Cir. 1995) ("There is no conflict in saying a police officer who acted unreasonably nevertheless reasonably (but mistakenly) believed his conduct was reasonable.") By contrast, where a claim is based on intentional race discrimination, qualified immunity should not be a bar to recovery, since the prohibition against intentionally biased conduct has been so widely and emphatically established. E.g., Wade v. Hegner, 804 F.2d 67 (7th Cir. 1986); Hobson v. Wilson, 737 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1984). On the Court's qualified immunity jurisprudence, see, Alan K. Chen, The Ultimate Standard: Qualified Immunity in the Age of Constitutional Balancing Tests, 81 Iowa L. Rev. 261 (1995); Kit Kinports, Habeas Corpus, Qualified Immunity, and Crystal Balls: Predicting the Course of Constitutional Law, 33 Ariz. L. Rev. 115 (1991); David Rudovsky, The Qualified Immunity Doctrine in the Supreme Court: Judicial Activism and the Restriction of Constitutional Rights, 138 U. Pa. L. Rev. 23 (1989).

There are no comparable annual statistics on the estimated number and race of drug sellers nationwide. Nevertheless, such data as exists indicates whites constitute a far greater share of the drug selling population than of the population arrested for drug selling. For example, during the period 1991-1993, SAMHSA included questions about drug selling in the annual NHSDA surveys. Although the responses are best seen as a rough approximation of drug selling activity, they are nonetheless highly suggestive. On average over the three year period, blacks were 16 percent of admitted sellers and whites were 82 percent. According to research on patterns of drug purchase and use in selected major cities, drug users reported that their main drug sources were sellers of the same racial or ethnic background as they were. A large study conducted in the Miami, Florida metropolitan area of 699 cocaine users (power and crack) revealed that over 96 percent of the users in each ethnic/racial category were involved in street-level drug dealing, which again would suggest a racial profile of sellers that is comparable to that of users. General Barry McCaffrey has stated that drug transactions between youth are generally intra-racial, that is, youth tend to buy from sellers of the same race. ONDCP's [Office of National Drug Control Policy] former periodic report on drugs trends, Pulse Check, also indicated a high frequency of intra-racial drug transactions, that is, that whites tended to buy from white sellers and minorities from minority sellers. <=89> n88

Moreover, arrest statistics are notoriously misleading, particularly where profiling is practiced. The Attorney General of New Jersey directly addressed the assumption that minorities are disproportionately positioned among couriers, thus justifying highway racial profiling:

The evidence for this conclusion is, in reality, tautological and reflects as much as anything the initial stereotypes of those who rely upon these statistics. To a large extent, these statistics have been used to grease the wheels of a vicious cycle - a self-fulfilling prophecy where law enforcement agencies rely on arrest data that they themselves generated as a result of the discretionary allocation of resources and targeted drug enforcement efforts.

The most obvious problem is relying on arrest statistics, of course, is that these numbers refer only to persons who were found to be involved in criminal activity (putting aside for the moment the presumption of innocence). Arrest statistics, by definition, do not show the number of persons who were detained or investigated who, as it turned out, were not found to be trafficking drugs or carrying weapons. Consistent with our human nature, we in law enforcement proudly display seized drug shipments or "hits" as a kind of trophy, but pay scant attention to our far [*311] more frequent "misses," that is, those instances where stops and searches failed to discover contraband. (Recall that among the universe of stops, searches are quite rare, and searches that reveal evidence of crime are rarer still.) Logically, of course, one cannot hope to judge the overall effectiveness of any practice or program by looking solely at its successes, any more than by looking only at its failures. <=90> n89 n356. Hans v. Louisiana, 134 U.S. 1 (1890). But see Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21 (1991) (holding that state officials, sued in their individual capacity, are not immune under the Eleventh Amendment).

n357. Board of County Comm'rs v. Brown 520 U.S. 397 (1997); City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989); Monell v. Department of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978). Section 1983 has also been interpreted to bar civil rights actions by persons convicted of crimes whose convictions have not been reversed or vacated, if success of the civil rights claims, "would necessarily imply the invalidity of the [plaintiff's] conviction." Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 487 (1994). See also, Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 17 (1998) (noting that section 1983 actions are not available where plaintiff's claim would imply the invalidity of his parole revocation). This doctrine may bar suits by persons who have been convicted based on events that transpired during the car or pedestrian stop, where the civil damage claim is based on alleged constitutional violations that occurred during the same incident. E.g., Covington v. City of New York, 171 F.3d 117 (2d Cir. 1999) (noting that plaintiff's complaint would be barred if it would suggest that plaintiff's criminal conviction was invalid); Hudson v. Hughes, 98 F.3d 868 (5th Cir. 1996) (affirming dismissal of section 1983 complaint based on false arrest and excessive force during an arrest where plaintiff had been convicted of possession of a firearm and battery of an officer based on the same event).

n358. See, e.g., Heck, 512 U.S. at 487 (holding that plaintiff cannot bring a section 1983 claim that would challenge the plaintiff's underlying conviction).

n359. See David Rudovsky, Police Abuse: Can the Violence be Contained?, 27 Harv. C.R.-C.L. Rev. 465, 490-91 (1992).

n360. Id.

n361. Id. (citation omitted).

n362. It seems clear that many jurisdictions consider payments to victims of misconduct part of the "cost of policing." See Bandes, supra note 67, at 1337-38 (noting that New York City paid over $ 31 million dollars in settlements and judgments in 1998, but failed to take action against officers responsible for the misconduct).

n363. Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908); Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21, 30-31

(1991).

n364. Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343 (1996); City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983); Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362 (1976); O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488 (1974).

n365. Lyons, 461 U.S. at 103; Allee v. Medrano, 416 U.S. 802, 814 (1974).

n366. Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352, 355 n.3 (1983); O'Shea v. Littleton, 414 U.S. 488, 494-96 (1974).

n367. 461 U.S. 95 (1983).

n368. Lyons, 461 U.S. at 97.

n369. Id. at 114-15 (Marshall, J., dissenting)

n370. Id. at 110.

n371. Id. at 105-06.

n372. See, Lyons, 461 U.S. at 113-37 (1983) (Marshall, J., dissenting); Allee v. Medrano, 416 U.S. 802, 815 (1974) (holding that where there is a pattern of police misconduct in suppressing organized labor activities, injunctive relief is appropriate); Richard H. Fallon, Jr., Of Justiciability, Remedies and Public Law Litigation: Notes on the Jurisprudence of Lyons, 59 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 1 (1984) (noting that under the standing test set out in Lyons, a plaintiff must show present and continuing injuries).

n373. See, e.g, Deshawn E. v. Safir, 156 F.3d 340 (2d Cir. 1998) (noting that police interrogation practices subject to equitable relief, but court dismisses claim based on failure of proof); Easyriders Freedom F.I.G.H.T. v. Hannigan, 92 F.3d 1486 (9th Cir. 1996) (finding that the fourteen named plaintiffs have standing to obtain statewide injunctive relief against the state police where illegal citation practices were the result of official practice and policy); Thomas v. County of Los Angeles, 978 F.2d 504 (9th Cir. 1993) (finding that plaintiffs had standing where "numerous instances of police misconduct have occurred in a small six by seven block area, [and] some minority residents of the area have been mistreated by deputies more than once"); Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp. 2d 1131, 1135-36 (N.D. Cal. 2000) (finding that NAACP and LULAC have standing in racial profiling suit). In Maryland State Conference of NAACP Branches v. Maryland Department of State Police, 72 F. Supp. 2d 560, 565 (D. Md. 1999), the Court stated:

Here, the plaintiffs' likelihood of injury depends only on their status as a member of a minority group and their need to travel on I-95. An "illegal" action on their part associated with the future stop need be no more than a minor, perhaps unintentional, traffic infraction; indeed, according to their allegations, they may be stopped even if no traffic violation has been committed. The plaintiffs also have reason to expect they will continue to travel on I-95. This combination of alleged past injury, an earlier pattern and practice finding, and the plaintiffs' likely future travel is sufficient to confer standing. (emphasis added).

n374. 120 S. Ct. 693 (2000).

n375. Id. at 705-06.

n376. Id. at 704-06.

n377. Id. at 706; see also Friends of the Earth v. Gaston Copper Recycling Corp., 204 F.3d 149, 156-61 (4th Cir. 2000) (en banc) (following Laidlaw in determining that plaintiff had standing where plaintiff's use of a waterway was reduced by defendant's actions).

n378. Laidlaw, 120 S. Ct. at 706.

n379. In City of Erie v. Pap's, A.M., 120 S. Ct. 1382 (2000), the Court, citing Laidlaw, found an appeal not moot even in the face of a party's declaration that it would not seek to engage in the challenged conduct in the future. The mere possibility of renewed conduct was deemed sufficient to permit adjudication. Id. at 1390.

n380. City of Los Angles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95, 105-06 (1983).

n381. Honig v. Doe, 484 U.S. 305, 320 (1988) (finding that emotionally handicapped individual cannot conform his conduct to socially acceptable norms; therefore, it is reasonable to expect that he will again engage in classroom misconduct); see also, Church v. City of Huntsville, 30 F.3d 1332, 1337-78 (11th Cir. 1994) (homeless persons had standing to seek injunction preventing city from implementing policy of isolating and/or removing homeless persons).

n382. E.g., Anderson v. Cornejo, No. 97 C 7556, 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 519 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 11, 1999); National Cong. for Puerto Rican Rights v. City of New York, 191 F.R.D. 52 (S.D.N.Y. 1999).

n383. See, Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 904-05 (1996) (noting that plaintiff who resides inside a district that was created through "a gerrymandered districting scheme" had standing); Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400 (1991) (holding that white defendant had standing to object to exclusion of black prospective jurors from his trial); Trafficante v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 409 U.S. 205 (1972) (finding that tenants who sued owner for racial discrimination under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 had standing through the Court's "generous construction" of the Act).

n384. See Lyons, 461 U.S. at 113-15 (Marshall, J., dissenting).

n385. Id. at 110.

n386. See id. at 111-13 (noting that injunctive relief is available upon a showing that there is "a sufficient likelihood that [plaintiff] will again be wronged in a similar way"). By contrast, in Hodgers-Durgin v. De La Vina, 199 F.3d 1037, 1044 (9th Cir. 1999) (en banc) the court ruled that two individuals who had each been stopped once over a several-year period and who regularly drove in the area in which they claimed illegal "border" stops were being made, lacked standing to challenge the actions of the Border Patrol.

n387. See e.g., Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 397-403 (1975) (upholding standing of class even where individual who brought the suit no longer met the class requirements); Nicacio v. INS, 797 F.2d 700 (9th Cir. 1985) (upholding class action lawsuit brought by minorities against the INS). However if the plaintiff lacks standing, the case may be dismissed prior to class certification. Hodgers-Durgin, 199 F.3d at 1042.

n388. E.g., Hodgers-Durgin, 199 F.3d at 1042; Chavez v. Illinois State Police, 27 F. Supp. 2d 1053 (N.D. Ill. 1998). Another potential bar to injunctive relief is the decision in Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362, 380 (1976), where the Court, relying heavily on principles of federalism, reversed an injunction requiring a police department to more effectively investigate and adjudicate civilian complaints of abuse. The Court was not persuaded that the evidence was sufficient to demonstrate a pattern and practice of misconduct within the police department and cautioned against intrusive federal court intervention in local government operations. Id. However, in Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), the Court ruled that an evidentiary showing that a municipality's policy, practice, or custom caused the constitutional violation is sufficient to warrant a judgment against the municipality. See also, City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989) (municipal liability is established where city is deliberately indifferent in its training of police and lack of training causes a constitutional violation). Under this standard, it would appear that the municipality would be liable for damages and would be subject to equitable relief for a proven unconstitutional practice, policy, or custom.

As noted above, the barriers created by Lyons and Rizzo v. Goode have been overcome in some cases, and consent decrees and settlement agreements have provided effective remedial mechanisms. E.g, Settlement and Monitoring Agreement and Stipulations of the Parties, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, C.A. No. 96-6045 (E.D. Pa. 1996) (on file with author); Julia C. Martinez, Settlement Reached in Tinicum Suit, Phila. Inquirer, Oct. 6, 1994, at B1; see, Wilson v. Tinicum Township, No. Civ. A. 92-6617, 1993 WL 280205 (E.D. Pa. July 20, 1993) (granting motion for class certification based on racial profiling on highway stops). As I discuss in the following section, the United States has also entered into Consent Decrees requiring reform of police practices.

n389. 42 U.S.C. 14141 (1995). For a discussion of the implementation of the Act by the Department of Justice, see Myriam E. Gilles, Reinventing Structural Reform Litigation: Deputizing Private Citizens in the Enforcement of Civil Rights, 100 Colum. L. Rev. 1384 (2000); Debra Livingston, Police Reform and the Department of Justice: An Essay on Accountability, 2 Buff. Crim. L. Rev. 815 (1999); Marshall Miller, Note, Police Brutality, 17 Yale L. & Pol'y Rev. 149 (1998).

n390. Livingston, supra note 389, at 841-850.

n391. Id. at 815-16.

REV_00258793

n392. See infra note 395 and accompanying text.

n393. Id.

n394. Livingston, supra note 389, at 815-16. The federal government (as well as local prosecutors) may bring criminal prosecutions against police officers who violate or conspire to violate civil rights. 18 U.S.C. 241, 242 (1994). However, these criminal statutes require the government to prove a specific intent to deprive the victim of a constitutional right, United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 760 (1966), a factor that the Department of Justice often cites in refusing to prosecute police officers. But even without this difficult burden of proof it is unlikely we would see many more prosecutions. Prosecutors do not embrace the prosecution of fellow law enforcement officers and even when they are motivated to act, the code of silence within most departments and jury sympathy for police officers may make the prosecution highly problematic. In the area of stops and searches, unless the incident escalates into the use of deadly force, the significance of any one case will be relatively minor, thus presenting an additional reason for federal officials to pass on criminal prosecution.

n395. E.g., Settlement and Monitoring Agreement and Stipulations of the Parties, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 388; Consent Decree, United States v. City of Pittsburgh, C.A. No 97354 (W.D. Pa. 1997); Consent Decree, United States v. State of New Jersey, C.A. No. 99-5970 (D.N.J. 1999); Memorandum of Agreement Between United States Department of Justice and Montgomery County, Md., et al., Jan. 18, 2000. Much of the incentive for change resulted from unconscionable acts of brutality and corruption, including the Rodney King beating, the shooting of Amadou Diallo and the brutalization of Abner Louima in New York, the massive corruption and misconduct scandals in the New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, and New Orleans Police Departments, and the growing sentiment and expressions of resentment and anger in minority communities over the day to day practices and policies of police agencies. And, as recent events powerfully demonstrate, pervasive corruption and misconduct continues in some departments. E.g., Christopher Commission, supra note 228; Mollen Commission, supra note 228; Settlement and Monitoring Agreement and Stipulations of the Parties, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395; Interim Report of Attorney General of New Jersey, supra note 32; Report of Attorney General of New York, supra note 46; Todd S. Purdum, Los Angeles Police Officer Sets off Corruption Scandal, N.Y. Times, Sept. 18, 1999 at A9 (describing largest corruption scandal in 60 years, involving framing of defendants); James Sterngold, Police Corruption Inquiry Expands in Los Angeles, N.Y. Times, Feb. 11, 2000, 1, at 16.

n396. See Bratton & Knobler, supra note 76, at 233-239.

n397. Consent Decree, United States v. New Jersey, supra note 395; Memorandum of Agreement Between the United States Department of Justice and Montgomery County, Md., United States v. Montgomery County, supra note 395.

n398. See supra note 395.

n399. Consent Decree, United States v. City of Pittsburgh, supra note 395, at 6-9.

n400. Id. 23-33

n401. Consent Decree, United States v. State of New Jersey, supra note 395.

n402. There are significant limitations on consent searches: state troopers may request consent to search a motor vehicle only where troopers can articulate a reasonable suspicion that a search would reveal evidence of a crime; every consent search of a vehicle must be based on written consent of the driver or other person authorized to give consent which precedes the search; the scope of the consent is limited to the scope of the consent that is given by the driver or other person authorized to give consent; the driver or other person authorized to give consent is advised of such right; that the driver or other person authorized to give consent who has granted written consent may orally withdraw that consent at any time during the search without giving a reason; and state troopers immediately must stop a consent search of a vehicle if and when consent is withdrawn. Id. These provisions are more restrictive than Fourth Amendment doctrine. See, e.g., Ohio v. Robinette, 519 U.S. 33, 39 (1996) (searches under Fourth Amendment must be reasonably based on the totality of the circumstances).

n403. Consent Decree, United States v. State of New Jersey, supra note 395, at 18-24.

n404. Id. at 23-33.

n405. Consent Decree, United States v. State of New Jersey, supra note 395, at 18-23.

n406. Id. at 21.

n407. Without a prohibition on pretextual stops, law enforcement agencies can continue to profile by race, and attempt to "even out" the statistics by stopping sufficient numbers of white drivers.

n408. Settlement Agreement, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395, at 2; City of Philadelphia's Response to Plaintiffs' Proposals for Reforms Within the Philadelphia Police Department, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, C.A. No. 96-6045 (E.D. Pa. 1996), at 7-8 (on file with author).

n409. Settlement Agreement, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395, at 3-4; City of Philadelphia's Response to Plaintiffs' Proposals, supra note 408, at 16-20.

n410. Settlement Agreement, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395, at 2; City of Philadelphia's Response to Plaintiffs' Proposals, supra note 408, at 3-6.

n411. Settlement Agreement, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395, at 2; City of Philadelphia's Response to Plaintiffs' Proposals, supra note 408, at 3-6.

n412. Settlement Agreement, NAACP v. City of Philadelphia, supra note 395, at 2; City of Philadelphia's Response to Plaintiffs' Proposals, supra note 408, at 21-29.

n413. Fourth Philadelphia Report, supra note 41, at 3.

DATE: MARCH 1, 2002

CLIENT: WHO LIBRARY: LAWREV
FILE: ALLREV

YOUR SEARCH REQUEST IS:
STATE CONSTITUTIONAL ANALYSIS OF PRETEXT STOPS: AND TEMPLE LAW REVIEW

NUMBER OF ITEMS FOUND WITH YOUR REQUEST THROUGH:
LEVEL 1... 2

A History of Foreign Assistance

Summary

Historical Perspective

The 1961 Foreign Assistance Act

Post-1960s Efforts to "Reform" Foreign Assistance

Brief Chronology and Highlights of the History of U.S. Foreign Assistance Activities

Tuesday, 15-Jan-2002 10:52:00 EST

Summary

On September 4, 1961, the Congress passed the Foreign Assistance Act, which reorganized the U.S. foreign assistance programs including separating military and non-military aid. The Act mandated the creation of an agency to administer economic assistance programs, and on November 3, 1961, President John F. Kennedy established the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID).

USAID became the first U.S. foreign assistance organization whose primary emphasis was on long-range economic and social development assistance efforts. Freed from political and military functions that plagued its predecessor organizations, USAID was able to offer direct support to the developing nations of the world.

The agency unified already existing U.S. aid efforts, combining the economic and technical assistance operations of the International Cooperation Agency, the loan activities of the Development Loan Fund, the local currency functions of the Export-Import Bank, and the agricultural surplus distribution activities of the Food for Peace program of the Department of Agriculture.

While some could argue that the creation of USAID simply represented a bureaucratic reshuffling, the agency, and the legislation creating it, represented a recommitment to the very purposes of overseas development. USAID was established to unify assistance efforts, to provide a new focus on the needs of a changing world, and to assist other countries in maintaining their independence and become self-supporting

Historical Perspective

The 1961 reorganization of America's foreign aid programs resulted from an increasing dissatisfaction with the foreign assistance structures that had evolved from the days of the Marshall Plan, to which USAID and U.S. foreign assistance policy traces its roots.

By the end of World War II, Europe had suffered substantial loses, physically and economically. Responding to Europe's calls for help, the international community established the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (the World Bank) on December 27, 1945. On April 2, 1948, through the enactment of the Economic Cooperation Act, the United States responded by creating the Marshall Plan. While the IMF and the World Bank were created as permanent institutions, the goal of the Marshall Plan was specific: To stabilize Europe, not as a permanent program for European recovery but as an emergency tool of assistance.

When the Marshall Plan ended on June 30, 1951, Congress was in the process of piecing together a new foreign aid proposal designed to unite military and economic programs with technical assistance. On October 31, 1951, this plan became a reality when Congress passed the first Mutual Security Act and created the Mutual Security Agency.

In 1953, the Foreign Operations Administration was established as an independent government agency outside the Department of State, to consolidate economic and technical assistance on a world-wide basis. Its responsibilities were merged into the International Cooperation Administration (ICA) one year later.

REV_00258798

The ICA administered aid for economic, political and social development purposes. Although the ICA's functions were vast and far reaching, unlike USAID, ICA had many limitations placed upon it. As a part of the Department of State, ICA did not have the level of autonomy the USAID currently maintains. At the time, multilateral donors (such as those affiliated with the United Nations and the Organization of American States) were playing a greater role in foreign assistance.

The Mutual Security Act of 1954 introduced the concepts of development assistance, security assistance, a discretionary contingency fund, and guarantees for private investments. The Food for Peace program was implemented that year, introducing food aid.

Congressional approval of a revised Mutual Security Act in 1957 lead to the creation of the Development Loan Fund (DLF), which acted as the ICA's lending arm. The DLF's primary function was to extend loans of a kind that the Export-Import Bank and other donors were not interested in or prepared to underwrite - those repayable in local currencies. The DLF financed everything other than technical assistance but was most noteworthy for financing capital projects.

Neither the ICA nor the DLF addressed the need for a long-range foreign development program. That led to the creation of the U.S. Agency for International Development.

The 1961 Foreign Assistance Act

By 1960, the support from the American public and Congress for the existing foreign assistance programs had dwindled. The growing dissatisfaction with foreign assistance, highlighted by the book The Ugly American, prompted Congress and the Eisenhower Administration to focus U.S. aid to developing nations, which became an issue during the 1960 U.S. presidential campaign.

The new Kennedy Administration made reorganization of, and recommitment to, foreign assistance a top priority. It was thought that to renew support for foreign assistance at existing or higher levels, to address the widely-known shortcomings of the previous assistance structure, and to achieve a new mandate for assistance to developing countries, the entire program had to be "new."

In proposing a new United States foreign assistance program in 1961, President Kennedy provided a justification based on three premises: (1) then current foreign aid programs, "America's unprecedented response to world challenges", were largely unsatisfactory and ill suited for the needs of the United States and developing countries, (2) the economic collapse of developing countries "would be disastrous to our national security, harmful to our comparative prosperity, and offensive to our conscience", and (3) the 1960s presented an historic opportunity for industrialized nations to move less-developed nations into self-sustained economic growth.

Today, when foreign economic assistance programs are under scrutiny, it is worth quoting President Kennedy's remarks at length:

> "For no objective supporter of foreign aid can be satisfied with the existing program--actually a multiplicity of programs. Bureaucratically fragmented, awkward and slow, its administration is diffused over a haphazard and irrational structure covering at least four departments and several other agencies. The program is based on a series of legislative measures and administrative procedures conceived at different times and for different purposes, many of them now obsolete, inconsistent, and unduly rigid and thus unsuited for our present needs and purposes. Its weaknesses have begun to undermine confidence in our effort both here and abroad.
>
> "Although our aid programs have helped to avoid economic chaos and collapse, and assisted many nations to maintain their independence and freedom--nevertheless, it is a fact that many of the nations we are helping are not much nearer sustained economic growth than they were when our aid operation began. Money spent to > meet crisis situations or short-term political objectives while helping to maintain national integrity and independence has rarely moved the recipient nation toward greater economic stability."

REV_00258799

Why, then, should the United States continue a foreign economic assistance program?

> "The answer is that there is no escaping our obligations: our moral obligations as a wise leader and good neighbor in the interdependent community of free nations--our economic obligations as the wealthiest people in a world of largely poor people, as a nation no longer dependent upon the loans from abroad that once helped us develop our own economy--and our political obligations as the single largest counter to the adversaries of freedom.
>
> "To fail to meet those obligations now would be disastrous; and, in the long run, more expensive. For widespread poverty and chaos lead to a collapse of existing political and social structures which would inevitably invite the advance of totalitarianism into every weak and unstable area. Thus our own security would be endangered and our prosperity imperiled. A program of assistance to the underdeveloped nations must continue because the Nation's interest and the cause of political freedom require it."

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 that was enacted as a result of the legislative process begun by President Kennedy was a relatively concise document that recognized the economic and political principles expressed in the President's transmittal message. Development assistance consisted primarily of two programs: (1) a Development Loan Fund whose primary purpose was to foster plans and programs to "develop economic resources and increase productive capacities" (i.e., a significant amount of capital infrastructure), and (2) a Development Grant Fund, to focus on "assisting the development of human resources through such means as programs of technical cooperation and development" in less developed countries.

Three other significant economic assistance programs were included in the new FAA: (1) a guaranty program (now the Overseas Private Investment Corporation) to provide protection assuring United States business against certain risks of doing business overseas, (2) a "supporting assistance" program (now the Economic Support Fund program) to support or promote economic or political stability, and (3) an appropriated contingency fund.

The new directions most emphatically stressed were a dedication to development as a long-term effort requiring country-by-country planning and a commitment of resources on a multi-year, programmed basis. The new focus of development was to achieve economic growth and democratic, political stability in the developing world to combat both the perceived spread of ideological threats such as communism and the threat of instability arising from poverty. The economic development theory of W.W. Rostow, which posited "stages of economic development," most notably a "takeoff into growth" stage, provided the premise for much of the development planning in the newly-formed U.S. Agency for International Development.

In the final analysis, the greatest achievement of USAID and the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 was that they addressed the goals of setting up country-by-country planning and long-term development planning mechanisms through solving the organizational problems in the then-existing foreign assistance programs.

Fowler Hamilton, who was appointed as USAID's first administrator, assumed his primary goal was to establish an agency founded on good, strong organizational principles that would stand the test of time.

One of the first programs undertaken by the fledgling USAID was the Alliance for Progress. Conceptually set-up in the fall of 1960 by the Act of Bogota and confirmed by the Charter of Punta del Este (Uruguay) in early 1961, the Alliance was a hemisphere-wide commitment of funds and effort to develop the nations of the Americas. The Alliance became the basis for USAID's programs in Latin America throughout the 1960s. President Kennedy promoted the Alliance in trips to Colombia and Venezuela in 1961.

In Asia, USAID's first emphases were on countering the spread of communism, particularly the influence of the People's Republic of China. This quickly ballooned into a large program of assistance based on counter-insurgency and democratic and economic development in Vietnam, which lasted until the withdrawal of American troops in 1975. In Africa, USAID focused on such initiatives as the education of the leadership of the newly-independent countries and meeting other economic and social imperatives.

REV_00258800

Post-1960s Efforts to "Reform" Foreign Assistance

The Foreign Assistant Act (FAA), as originally enacted in 1961, contained very few restrictions on how assistance may be provided, and contained only general prescriptions on the kinds of factors that were to be taken into account (e.g., the extent to which the recipient has taken effective self-help measures) prior to the provision of assistance.

In the early 1970s foreign aid fell on hard legislative times to the point that, in 1971, the Senate rejected a foreign assistance bill authorizing funds for fiscal years 1972 and 1973. The defeat of the 1971 bill represented the first time that either House had rejected a foreign aid authorization since the program was first initiated as the Marshall Plan after World War II. Several themes merged to cause the defeat of the bill: (1) opposition to the Vietnam War, (2) concern that aid was too concerned with short-term military considerations, and (3) concern that aid, particularly development aid, was a giveaway program producing few foreign policy results for the United States.

Attempts to reform the foreign assistance program -- particularly the economic assistance program -- were led by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Assistance for the poorest sectors of developing nations ("basic human needs") became the central thrust of the reform. To extend assistance directly to the recipient nation's population, Congress replaced the old categories of technical assistance grants and development loans with new functional categories aimed at specific problems such as agriculture, family planning, and education. The aim of bilateral development aid was to concentrate on sharing American technical expertise and commodities to meet development problems, rather than relying on large-scale transfers of money and capital goods, or financing of infrastructure. The structure of the FAA remains today pretty much the way it was following these 1973 amendments.

Attempting to address concerns similar to those raised in 1961 by President Kennedy, legislation drafted at the request of Senator Hubert Humphrey was introduced in 1978 to reorganize the foreign assistance management structure. In the Humphrey bill, an International Development Cooperation Agency was established to coordinate foreign assistance activities as they related to bilateral programs administered by USAID, multilateral programs of international lending institutions then under the purview of the Department of the Treasury, voluntary contributions to United Nations agencies then administered by the Department of State, food programs then administered by USAID, and the activities of OPIC. An International Development Institute would be established within IDCA to address, among other things, private and voluntary organizations and with one of the Institute's constituent parts being the Peace Corps.

The Humphrey bill was not enacted into law. Bureaucratic obstacles within the Executive branch and in Congress operated to limit the statutory impact of the bill to changes in the policy statements contained in the FAA and less sweeping administrative changes.

The IDCA, however, was established by Executive Order in September, 1979. Up until that time, all authority to administer FAA programs had been vested in the Secretary of State by delegation from the President. The establishment of IDCA changed this relationship. With the establishment of IDCA, FAA authorities were delegated in part to the Director of IDCA (those dealing with the provision of economic assistance), most of which were redelegated to the Administrator of USAID. Generally, those authorities dealing with security assistance were delegated to the Secretary of State. (The Economic Support Fund is the point at which the development and security programs "meet", so that the Secretary is empowered to determine what countries receive ESF assistance and the amounts, the USAID Administrator implements the ESF programs.) To give effect to some of these changes, the President submitted a reorganization plan (Reorganization Plan No. 2) which delegated certain economic assistance functions to the Director.

IDCA, to be charitable, was not the coordinating mechanism envisaged either by Senator Humphrey or, in all likelihood, President Carter. The only entity it coordinated was USAID and, since it was staffed with fewer than 75 people, could make only a marginal impact on overall bilateral and multilateral assistance policy. In the Reagan Administration no staff were provided to IDCA and, functionally, it faded quickly from the scene. The Executive Order creating IDCA remained intact, however, defining some of the lines of authority in the administration of foreign assistance. Some of the other coordinating functions that had been expected to be exercised by IDCA (but not contained in the Executive Order) were initially exercised instead by USAID, but over time the functions fell into disuse.

REV_00258801

At the same time that IDCA was established, President Carter also attempted to give new life to the Development Coordination Committee (DCC). Organized into subgroups (e.g., multilateral assistance, food assistance), the DCC was an effort at inter-agency coordination on a consensus basis of all foreign assistance activities. This effort also failed. The DCC rarely met as a whole, and only two of its subcommittees ever functioned. Today, it exists only as an unimplemented provision in the FAA.

Beginning in late 1988, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs (HFAC) began an examination of the foreign assistance program generally and, in particular, the continued relevance of the Foreign Assistance Act. At the same time, numerous outside interest groups also began a similar review. The product of the HFAC review was a report (the so-called "Hamilton-Gilman report") which contains certain findings and recommendations. The findings restate many of the same themes that President Kennedy had raised almost thirty years earlier in his transmittal of the first Foreign Assistance Act:

- Foreign assistance is a valuable foreign policy tool in terms of promoting U.S. security interests and its economic interests.
- The interrelationship and interdependence of Nations means that the United States will continue to be affected--for good or bad--by economic and political events in other parts of the world and, increasingly, economic issues dominate the international agenda.
- Moreover, the world is changing to become more urbanized and with an increasing recognition of the value of market-oriented solutions to social and economic problems.
- But the program does not enjoy broad public support. ("U.S. public support for helping poor people remains strong, but the public does not view the aid program as doing this effectively. The public has very little concept of the aid program as an instrument of foreign policy, used to advance U.S. interests.")
- Foreign aid legislation and administration impede the effectiveness of the program thereby confirming the public's view of the value of these programs: there are too many objectives in the FAA, so numerous in fact that they "cannot provide meaningful direction or be effectively implemented"; too many earmarks, reporting requirements, and restrictions hamper the effectiveness of programs and forces the Executive branch to focus on "anticipating how assistance will be used, rather than on how effectively it has been used"; the economic assistance program is spread out over too many countries in too many projects; there is little coordination of U.S. economic, security, and development policies. The DCC seldom meets at a high level and then principally for ceremonial purposes, and IDCA "exists in name only"; non-governmental organizations have a lot to offer to the foreign assistance process, and their value is increasing over time.

The report's major recommendation was to repeal the FAA and start fresh with an act that was far more focused than current law. The legislation that was drafted (although not immediately introduced) by the Committee to address the report's findings, had as its major economic assistance themes economic growth, poverty alleviation, environmental sustainability, and promotion of political pluralism, which were designed to give focus to the economic assistance objectives of our foreign assistance programs. The bill also attempted to be more results-oriented in its approach by streamlining congressional notification procedures and encouraging a more active role for program evaluation. However, even as originally drafted the bill contained a considerable process or input-directed orientation. Authorities to enhance flexibility in program administration (an improvement over current law but, of course, not nearly as flexible as the FAA as originally enacted in 1961) were included in the draft bill, as was encouragement to better coordinate foreign assistance activities among the many agencies of the United States Government doing business overseas.

REV_00258802

The draft legislation was vetted informally with the Executive branch which, although leery about the ultimate outcome, did not discourage the process from continuing. Unfortunately, Chairman Fascell and Hamilton were unable to sell the product to the rest of the Committee. The bill wound up as a hodgepodge of certification requirements, earmarks, and micromanagement, bearing little resemblance to the draft bill first reviewed informally with the committee and offering no inducement for the Administration to continue its support for the authorization process. This effort at a rewrite was unsuccessful, but the flame still flickered.

While efforts were made the next year, and failed, to rewrite the FAA, a more serious attempt was made in 1991. In April, 1991, the Bush Administration transmitted to the Congress its comprehensive rewrite of the Foreign Assistance Act. The bill attempted to return the legislative framework of the program, to a considerable extent, to the early years of the Foreign Assistance Act. Some elements in Congress, however, criticized the effort for providing the Executive branch with too much discretion, and it was not seriously considered.

However, the HFAC again renewed its quest for a new FAA by merging its earlier efforts with some of the initiatives proposed in the Administration's bill to yield a product that the Administration thought, from its perspective, would offer more in the way of flexibility than it took away. The Administration actively pursued the issue with the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations which produced a product with a far greater number of the "flexibility items" (e.g., greater authority to waive provisions of law and to transfer funds, reduction in the number of statutory limitations on the provision of assistance, etc.) than it had requested in its own bill.

The conference on the bill produced a product that the Administration threatened to veto due to provisions not central to the overall restructuring of the FAA (e.g., abortion-related provisions and provisions expanding merchant marine subsidies). It was hoped that the bill, once passed and vetoed, would be re-passed without the offending provisions and sent to the President for signature. The conference report, however, although passed in the Senate was defeated in the House. There were many reasons: a "free" vote against foreign aid given the President's outstanding veto threat and the economic circumstances in the United States at the time of the House vote were only two of these.

Subsequently, the Clinton administration took its hand to rewriting the FAA. In 1994, the Peace, Prosperity, and Democracy Act (PPDA) was introduced which would have repealed the FAA and substituted in its place a radical new account structure for foreign assistance programs. Based on program objectives, its authorizations would have merged previously separate programs into the same account. Thus, development assistance and those international organizations with a development focus would have been funded from the same account. Considerable flexibility was provided in the way in which assistance could be provided and legislative limitations overcome. The bill was never introduced in the Senate and never reported out of committee in the House.

No further efforts to rewrite the FAA wholesale have been attempted.

REV_00258803

Request for Leave or Approved Absence

1. Name (Last, first, middle)	2. Employee or Social Security Number

3. Organization

4. Type of Leave/Absence

Check appropriate box(es) and enter date and time below)	Date		Time		Total Hours
	From	To	From	To ☐ Accrued annual leave
☐ Restored annual leave
☐ Advance annual leave
☐ Accrued sick leave
☐ Advance sick leave

Purpose:
- ☐ Illness/injury/incapacitation of requesting employee
- ☐ Medical/dental/optical examination of requesting employee
- ☐ Care of family member, including medical/dental/optical examination of family member, or bereavement
- ☐ Care of family member with a serious health condition
- ☐ Other

☐ Compensatory time off
☐ Other paid absence (specify in remarks)
☐ Leave without pay

5. Family and Medical Leave

If annual leave, sick leave, or leave without pay will be used under the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA), please provide the following information:

☐ I hereby invoke my entitlement to family and medical leave for:

- ☐ Birth/Adoption/Foster care
- ☐ Serious health condition of spouse, son, daughter, or parent
- ☐ Serious health condition of self

Contact your supervisor and/or your personnel office to obtain additional information about your entitlements and responsibilities under the FMLA. Medical certification of a serious health condition may be required by your agency.

6. Remarks

7. Certification: I certify that the leave/absence requested above is for the purpose(s) indicated. I understand that I must comply with my employing agency's procedures for requesting leave/approved absence (and provide additional documentation, including medical certification, if required) and that falsification of information on this form may be grounds for disciplinary action, including removal.

7a. Employee signature	7b. Date signed

8a. Official action on request ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved (If disapproved, give reason. If annual leave, initiate action to reschedule.)

8b. Reason for disapproval

8c. Signature	8d. Date signed

Privacy Act Statement

Section 6311 of title 5, United States Code, authorizes collection of this information. The primary use of this information is by management and your payroll office to approve and record your use of leave. Additional disclosures of the information may be: To the Department of Labor when processing a claim for compensation regarding a job connected injury or illness; to a State unemployment compensation office regarding a claim; to Federal Life Insurance or Health Benefits carriers regarding a claim; to a Federal, State, or local law enforcement agency when your agency becomes aware of a violation or possible violation of civil or criminal law; to a Federal agency when conducting an investigation for employment or security reasons; to the Office of Personnel Management or the General Accounting Office when the information is required for evaluation of leave administration; or the General Services Administration in connection with its responsibilities for records management.

Public Law 104-134 (April 26, 1996) requires that any person doing business with the Federal Government furnish a social security number or tax identification number. This is an amendment to title 31, Section 7701. Furnishing the social security number, as well as other data, is voluntary, but failure to do so may delay or prevent action on the application. If your agency uses the information furnished on this form for purposes other than those indicated above, it may provide you with an additional statement reflecting those purposes.

Request for Leave or Approved Absence

1. Name (Last, first, middle)	2. Employee or Social Security Number

3. Organization

4. Type of Leave/Absence

Check appropriate box(es) and enter date and time below)	Date From	Date To	Time From	Time To	Total Hours
☐ Accrued annual leave
☐ Restored annual leave
☐ Advance annual leave
☐ Accrued sick leave
☐ Advance sick leave
☐ Compensatory time off
☐ Other paid absence (specify in remarks)
☐ Leave without pay

Purpose:
- ☐ Illness/injury/incapacitation of requesting employee
- ☐ Medical/dental/optical examination of requesting employee
- ☐ Care of family member, including medical/dental/optical examination of family member, or bereavement
- ☐ Care of family member with a serious health condition
- ☐ Other

5. Family and Medical Leave

If annual leave, sick leave, or leave without pay will be used under the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA), please provide the following information:

☐ I hereby invoke my entitlement to family and medical leave for:

- ☐ Birth/Adoption/Foster care
- ☐ Serious health condition of spouse, son, daughter, or parent
- ☐ Serious health condition of self

Contact your supervisor and/or your personnel office to obtain additional information about your entitlements and responsibilities under the FMLA. Medical certification of a serious health condition may be required by your agency.

6. Remarks

7. Certification: I certify that the leave/absence requested above is for the purpose(s) indicated. I understand that I must comply with my employing agency's procedures for requesting leave/approved absence (and provide additional documentation, including medical certification, if required) and that falsification of information on this form may be grounds for disciplinary action, including removal.

7a. Employee signature	7b. Date signed

8a. Official action on request ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved (If disapproved, give reason. If annual leave, initiate action to reschedule.)

8b. Reason for disapproval

8c. Signature	8d. Date signed

Privacy Act Statement

Section 6311 of title 5, United States Code, authorizes collection of this information. The primary use of this information is by management and your payroll office to approve and record your use of leave. Additional disclosures of the information may be: To the Department of Labor when processing a claim for compensation regarding a job connected injury or illness; to a State unemployment compensation office regarding a claim; to Federal Life Insurance or Health Benefits carriers regarding a claim; to a Federal, State, or local law enforcement agency when your agency becomes aware of a violation or possible violation of civil or criminal law; to a Federal agency when conducting an investigation for employment or security reasons; to the Office of Personnel Management or the General Accounting Office when the information is required for evaluation of leave administration; or the General Services Administration in connection with its responsibilities for records management.

Public Law 104-134 (April 26, 1996) requires that any person doing business with the Federal Government furnish a social security number or tax identification number. This is an amendment to title 31, Section 7701. Furnishing the social security number, as well as other data, is voluntary, but failure to do so may delay or prevent action on the application. If your agency uses the information furnished on this form for purposes other than those indicated above, it may provide you with an additional statement reflecting those purposes.

Request for Leave or Approved Absence

1. Name (Last, first, middle)	2. Employee or Social Security Number
3. Organization

4. Type of Leave/Absence

Check appropriate box(es) and enter date and time below)	Date From	Date To	Time From	Time To	Total Hours
☐ Accrued annual leave
☐ Restored annual leave
☐ Advance annual leave
☐ Accrued sick leave
☐ Advance sick leave
☐ Compensatory time off
☐ Other paid absence (specify in remarks)
☐ Leave without pay

Purpose:
- ☐ Illness/injury/incapacitation of requesting employee
- ☐ Medical/dental/optical examination of requesting employee
- ☐ Care of family member, including medical/dental/optical examination of family member, or bereavement
- ☐ Care of family member with a serious health condition
- ☐ Other

5. Family and Medical Leave

If annual leave, sick leave, or leave without pay will be used under the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1993 (FMLA), please provide the following information:

☐ I hereby invoke my entitlement to family and medical leave for:

- ☐ Birth/Adoption/Foster care
- ☐ Serious health condition of spouse, son, daughter, or parent
- ☐ Serious health condition of self

Contact your supervisor and/or your personnel office to obtain additional information about your entitlements and responsibilities under the FMLA. Medical certification of a serious health condition may be required by your agency.

6. Remarks

7. Certification: I certify that the leave/absence requested above is for the purpose(s) indicated. I understand that I must comply with my employing agency's procedures for requesting leave/approved absence (and provide additional documentation, including medical certification, if required) and that falsification of information on this form may be grounds for disciplinary action, including removal.

7a. Employee signature	7b. Date signed

8a. Official action on request ☐ Approved ☐ Disapproved (If disapproved, give reason. If annual leave, initiate action to reschedule.)

8b. Reason for disapproval

8c. Signature	8d. Date signed

Privacy Act Statement

Section 6311 of title 5, United States Code, authorizes collection of this information. The primary use of this information is by management and your payroll office to approve and record your use of leave. Additional disclosures of the information may be: To the Department of Labor when processing a claim for compensation regarding a job connected injury or illness; to a State unemployment compensation office regarding a claim; to Federal Life Insurance or Health Benefits carriers regarding a claim; to a Federal, State, or local law enforcement agency when your agency becomes aware of a violation or possible violation of civil or criminal law; to a Federal agency when conducting an investigation for employment or security reasons; to the Office of Personnel Management or the General Accounting Office when the information is required for evaluation of leave administration; or the General Services Administration in connection with its responsibilities for records management.

Public Law 104-134 (April 26, 1996) requires that any person doing business with the Federal Government furnish a social security number or tax identification number. This is an amendment to title 31, Section 7701. Furnishing the social security number, as well as other data, is voluntary, but failure to do so may delay or prevent action on the application. If your agency uses the information furnished on this form for purposes other than those indicated above, it may provide you with an additional statement reflecting those purposes.

REV_00258807

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Racial Profiling [Folder 2]

OA/NARA#: 1825/1743
9633

Box
Folder 50-12

REV_00258808

Binder - Randolph, Judge Arthur Raymond

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2173/2084
9793

Box
Folder 50-13

REV_00258809

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Records - 1500 (Information Security Oversight Office) Position

OA/NARA#: 2180/2091
9800

Box
Folder 50-14

POSSIBLE QUESTIONS SUITABLE FOR ALL CANDIDATES

1. IN YOUR VIEW, WHAT PARTICULAR CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES, IF ANY, DO YOU FACE FOLLOWING A DIRECTOR WHO WAS IN THE POSITION FOR MORE THAN TWENTY YEARS? HOW DO YOU APPROACH THOSE CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES?

1. DESCRIBE HOW YOU APPROACH YOUR FIRST SEVERAL MONTHS IN THE POSITION OF ISOO DIRECTOR, HIGHLIGHTING HOW YOU INITIALLY INTERACT WITH THE VARIOUS CONSTITUENCIES WITHIN AND OUTSIDE GOVERNMENT WITH WHOM THE ISOO DIRECTOR ROUTINELY DEALS.

2. THROUGH THE POLICY COORDINATING COMMITTEE FOR RECORDS ACCESS AND INFORMATION SECURITY AND ITS CLASSIFICATION MANAGEMENT WORKING GROUP, THE ISOO IS CURRENTLY COORDINATING A REVIEW OF POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS TO EXECUTIVE ORDER 12958. DESCRIBE YOUR CONCEPTION OF THE ISOO DIRECTOR'S ROLE IN THIS PROCESS. IF YOU AS THE ISOO DIRECTOR PERCEIVE THAT THE REVIEW PROCESS IS HEADING IN THE WRONG DIRECTION, HOW DO YOU ATTEMPT TO CHANGE ITS DIRECTION TO ONE WITH WHICH YOU ARE IN AGREEMENT?

1. DO YOU HAVE ANY PARTICULAR VIEWS ON HOW E.O. 12958 SHOULD BE AMENDED? WHAT HAVE BEEN ITS STRENGTHS AND WEAKNESSES?

1. IF THE CURRENT ADMINISTRATION DIRECTED YOU TO SCRAP THE REVIEW OF E.O. 12958 AND PROCEED WITH THE DEVELOPMENT OF A NEW SECURITY CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM, HOW DO YOU PERCEIVE THE BASIC TENETS AND STRUCTURE OF SUCH A SYSTEM? SHOULD THE PRESIDENT CONTINUE TO CONSTRUCT THE SECURITY CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM THROUGH EXECUTIVE ORDER OR SHOULD HE INSTEAD PROPOSE LEGISLATION?

1. ISOO IS CURRENTLY IN THE PROCESS OF SEEING ITS SIZE DOUBLE, FROM APPROXIMATELY A DOZEN TO TWO DOZEN EMPLOYEES. HOW WOULD YOU FOCUS THESE ADDITIONAL RESOURCES AMONG ISOO'S VARIOUS FUNCTIONS? WHAT SORT OF MANAGEMENT STRUCTURE AND STYLE DO YOU ENVISION FOR THIS SOMEWHAT LARGER OFFICE?

1. E.O. 12958 RADICALLY CHANGED THE DECLASSIFICATION PROGRAM IN GOVERNMENT. WHAT, IN YOUR VIEW, HAVE BEEN THE SUCCESSES AND FAILURES OF THESE CHANGES? WHAT IS, IN YOUR VIEW, THE APPROPRIATE EMPHASIS OF THE DECLASSIFICATION PROGRAM WITHIN THE LARGER SECURITY CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM?

1. THE UNITED STATES PLAYS A LEADERSHIP ROLE AMONG NATIONS IN MANY ASPECTS OF SECURITY POLICY. HOW DOES THE SECURITY CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM PLAY INTO THAT ROLE? HOW SHOULD WE DEAL WITH FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS IN THE MANAGEMENT OF WHAT WE CALL "FOREIGN GOVERNMENT INFORMATION" THROUGHOUT THE COURSE OF ITS RETENTION IN OUR RECORDS SYSTEMS?

1. DURING THE PRIOR DIRECTOR'S LONG TENURE, THE ISOO DIRECTOR CLEARLY BECAME THE PUBLIC SPOKESPERSON OR HUMAN FACE OF THE SECURITY CLASSIFICATION AND DECLASSIFICATION PROGRAM. HOW DO YOU ENVISION THAT ASPECT OF THE ISOO DIRECTOR'S FUNCTIONS AND RESPONSIBILITIES? HOW HAS YOUR PREVIOUS EXPERIENCE PREPARED YOU TO MEET THOSE FUNCTIONS AND RESPONSIBILITIES?

- ISCAP ⇒ RT → Practice (ABA Jher)
- Auto.
↳ Yr ago on

1

REV_00258812

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Records - Miscellaneous

OA/NARA#: 1824/1742
9632

Box

Folder 50 - 15

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
OFFICE OF ADMINISTRATION
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20503

December 5, 2001

1/10 - Save written approval by e-mail

MEMORANDUM FOR BRETT M. KAVANAUGH
ASSOCIATE COUNSEL

BRADLEY A. BLAKEMAN
DEPUTY ASSISTANT FOR SCHEDULING

THROUGH: ERNA GILES BEVERLY BRANCH CHIEF, SYSTEMS APPLICATION SUPPORT (SAS)

FROM: LEANNA F. TERRELL ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR
INFORMATION SYSTEMS AND TECHNOLOGY DIVISION

SUBJECT: REQUEST FOR SAMPLE DATA FROM PRESIDENTIAL DIARY SYSTEM

In August of 2000, funding was approved for the upgrade and redesign of the current DOS based/Advanced Revelation software Presidential Diary Computer System, which was established during the Reagan Administration. A new system was originally planned for the beginning of the Bush Administration. The project was deferred for 176 days due the transition and higher priority projects. Currently, a project schedule has been created to outline the research and development process for the Presidential Diary System with completion estimated in mid-January 2002.

A representative sample of records from the existing Presidential Diary system (approximately 1,000 records of 7,000 records) is needed to test the functionality and design of a new Window-based system. In addition, the sample data will be used to facilitate final data conversion to the new system. Although the entries are not classified, it is highly sensitive information and will be tested on a secure EOP workstation with access restricted to select IS&T personnel.

Ellen McCathran, the Presidential Diarist, has agreed to this proposal but has requested a memoranda outlining our needs be submitted to the White House Counsel's office for written approval.

Thank you for your consideration of this matter, we look forward to your written approval.

Counsel's Office, White House
Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Records Management at the NSC]

OA/NARA#: 2162/2073
9692

Box
Folder 50-16

REV_00258814

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

2/21/01

Brett,

We would like to distribute this to the NSC staff but seek your concurrence/comments first. Attached is our memo from the last administration.

Thank you.

Jack Scharfen

6-9116
NSC-Legal

Document Originally Attached to Following Page

REV_00258815

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL
WASHINGTON D C 20506

20352

1994
Memo

March 21, 1994

ACTION

MEMORANDUM FOR NSC STAFF

FROM: WILLIAM H. ITOH

SUBJECT: Electronic Communications Systems (Electronic Mail)

All National Security Council employees have ongoing responsibilities to create, maintain, and preserve records of their activities pursuant to the Federal Records Act (44 U.S.C., Chapters 29, 31, and 33) or the Presidential Records Act (44 U.S.C., sections 2201-2207), or both. Traditionally, the NSC has treated some of its records as federal and some as Presidential and filed them separately. The proper scope of that distinction (including definitions of relevant terms) is now in litigation. Until that question is resolved, we will retain copies of all record messages in a way that permits appropriate designation and filing of them at a later time by the staff of Records Management.

This memorandum provides guidance for fulfilling the NSC's legal obligations as they apply to records (either Presidential or federal) that are created on electronic communications systems. The guidance applies to the e-mail, word processing, and calendar functions of the VAX All-in-One and CC:Mail systems (which includes All-in-1 word processing documents sent via e-mail) and the calendar function of the PROFS (OfficeVision) system, as well as the e-mail, word processing, and calendar functions of the new e-mail system to be introduced later this year.

The staff of the NSC create records electronically, including by the use of electronic communications systems. The NSC preserves electronic mail messages that are records by filing them electronically and transferring them to magnetic tape in a software-independent format for long term preservation. The NSC also preserves essential transmission data for these records electronically, including the name of the sender and each addressee, plus the date and exact time of transmission, which are recorded with the text of each message. "Read receipts" that identify when a message is "opened" by each addressee also are preserved whenever requested.

Successful implementation of this policy requires each NSC employee to do five things: (1) determine the record/nonrecord status of any e-mail message at the time of creation (or, for word processing documents, at the time of transmission); (2) request read receipts whenever it is important to confirm the receipt of a message by a certain time; (3) for the time being, ensure that read receipts are preserved by printing them, attaching them to the originating message, and sending them to

REV_00258820

Records Management for filing; (4) print and file designated calendars and calendar authorization files monthly; and (5) print and file draft word processing documents that qualify as records. All other tasks associated with the proper maintenance and disposition of e-mail records will be performed by the staff of Records and Access Management and Systems and Technical Planning or WHCA.

DETERMINING RECORD STATUS

Electronic mail documents in the NSC (like all other documentary materials) fall into one of two categories: records or nonrecord materials (which includes personal materials). The only records management judgment that NSC staff must make when using e-mail is to determine whether a message is record or nonrecord in nature.

The Presidential Records Act defines Presidential records as:

> documentary materials, or any reasonably segregable portion thereof, created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individual in the Executive Office of the President whose function is to advise and assist the President, in the course of conducting activities which relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties of the President. (44 U.S.C. 2201(2))

Under this definition, Presidential records are documentary materials that meet all three of the following tests. First, the materials must have been created or received by the President, his immediate staff, or a unit or individual in the EOP whose function it is to advise and assist the President. Second, the materials must be created or received by such a unit or individual in the course of conducting activities that relate to or have an effect upon the carrying out of the President's constitutional, statutory, or other official or ceremonial duties. Third, they must not be federal records, which are specifically excluded from coverage by the Presidential Records Act.

The Federal Records Act defines federal records as:

> All books, papers, maps, photographs, machine readable materials, or other documentary materials, regardless of physical form or characteristics, made or received by an agency of the United States under federal law or in connection with the transaction of public business and preserved or appropriate for preservation by that agency or its legitimate successor as evidence of the organization, functions, policies, decisions, procedures, operations, or other activities of the Government or because of the informational value of data in them. (44 U.S.C. 3301)

Under this definition, electronically recorded data that satisfy two tests are federal records. First, the data must have been created or received by agency personnel in connection with the transaction of public business. Second, they must be preserved or appropriate for preservation as evidence of the agency's activities or because they contain information of value. "Preserved" in the context of the NSC's e-mail systems means that the data are deliberately filed, stored, or otherwise systematically maintained for future use, including being stored in electronic files, folders, or logs.

Numeric, graphic, or text data that satisfy either of these two definitions are records, regardless of the medium on which they are recorded or the type of computer system on which the data are recorded or transmitted. Thus, electronic messages or documents that satisfy either definition (Presidential or federal) are records. This includes:

- messages or documents containing information developed in preparing position papers, reports and studies;
- messages or documents reflecting official actions taken in the course of conducting NSC business;
- messages or documents conveying information on NSC programs, policies, decisions, and essential transactions;
- messages or documents that convey statements of policy or the rationale for official decisions or actions;
- messages or documents memorializing oral exchanges, such as meetings or telephone conversations, during which policy was discussed or formulated or other activities of the NSC were planned, discussed, or transacted.

Preliminary drafts of final documents, rough notes, and similar materials must be maintained for purposes of adequate and proper documentation if (1) they contain unique information, such as annotations or comments, that help explain the formulation and execution of basic policies, decisions, actions, or responsibilities, and (2) they were circulated or made available to employees other than the creator for the purpose of approval, comment, action, or to keep staff informed about NSC business.

This guidance about determining the record status of preliminary drafts transmitted via e-mail also applies to word processing documents shared on a network. Because drafts of such shared documents may be records, their record status must be reevaluated as changes are made. Substantive updates to such drafts that constitute records must be preserved by printing and filing with the final paper copy while minor changes do not need to be preserved. Such substantive updates should identify the author, recipient(s), and date of the draft, as well as similar data documenting substantive updates.

REV_00258822

When the same information appears in two different documents, both documents may be records. Moreover, multiple copies of the same document may all be records if they are used for different purposes in the conduct of official business or filed in different files. More than one office may take action on, or otherwise use, copies of a document, and in such cases each copy of the document is a record.

Nonrecord or Personal Materials.

Certain types of documentary materials created within the NSC are considered "nonrecord" because they do not meet the conditions of record status as explained above or because they are excluded from the status of records by statute. This includes:

- reminders about meetings and appointments that contain no information of value about such events;
- telephone messages (unless the message contains information of value);
- invitations to unofficial social functions during office hours;
- preliminary drafts of correspondence, memoranda, reports, and studies that are not circulated to any other individual;
- preliminary drafts, work sheets, informal notes, and similar materials that contain the same information reflected in final documents and that do not document policy development or execution.
- notes about exclusively personal matters, such as private political or professional activities.

Monitoring Record Status Designations

To assist the NSC staff in making proper record status determinations, the staff of Records and Access Management will periodically examine a sample of all electronic mail messages and documents transmitted via e-mail, including those designated as nonrecord materials. The purpose of the examination is to identify any problems in interpreting this guidance for distinguishing between record and nonrecord materials. The selected messages and documents will be examined monthly in order to correct improper designations as promptly as possible.

Materials designated as nonrecord that are saved for the purpose of monitoring do not become federal records simply because they are retained for that purpose. However, if the Records and Access Management staff, in the course of the monitoring review, determine that the content of the materials show that the nonrecord designation of a particular message or document is incorrect, the staff shall redesignate it as a record. The staff of Records Management will report their findings to me at least once annually and recommend any needed changes in current guidance or procedures.

REV_00258823

No copies of electronic mail documents (either electronic or paper) may be removed from the NSC unless they are determined to be exclusively personal materials. If a departing staff member wishes to retain such documents, the staff of Records and Access Management must review the documents before authorizing their removal.

PRESERVING ELECTRONIC MAIL MESSAGES

To facilitate the preservation of e-mail messages that are records, you are required to indicate whether the message is Record (R) or Nonrecord (N) each time you create a message or, for All-in-1 word processing documents, when you send the document. (For the NSC's new e-mail system you also will be required to make the same R/N determination whenever you respond to a nonrecord message.) You should make that determination by following the guidelines in this memorandum for identifying records, nonrecord materials, and personal materials (a personal message should be labeled nonrecord (N)). CC:Mail users should make the same determination for any message broadcast on the Bulletin Board function. When in doubt, designate a message as a record.

If you designate a message as a record, a copy automatically will be routed to Records Management for incorporation into the appropriate records system. Also, any response to a record message automatically will be labeled a record. All messages in individual e-mail accounts will be purged from the All-in-One and CC:Mail systems after one month, with the exception of extra copies placed in your "personal folder" because they need to be retained for more than one month for personal convenience.

Transmission and Receipt Data

All electronic mail messages contain certain "transmission data" regarding the sender, addressee(s), and transmission (date and exact time) of a document. The transmission information associated with an electronic mail message that is designated a record also must be preserved as a record. Consequently, all e-mail messages routed to Records Management as records will be filed electronically with the following transmission data included: the name of the sender and all recipients and the date and time of transmission.

Additionally, if you request a read receipt for an electronic mail record, the read receipt is also a record and must be preserved with the message. You should request read receipts whenever it is necessary to confirm that an addressee has read a message by a certain time, such as when you assign tasks with a deadline or need concurrence by a definite time. To the extent feasible, WHSSS will program the e-mail system to capture such read receipts electronically. However, until further notice, and as previously instructed in Will Itoh's 5/27/93 memorandum, you should print out read receipts whenever you request them, attach them to the originating message, and forward such materials to Records Management for filing.

REV_00258824

PRESERVING CALENDARS

Calendars created on the NSC's electronic mail systems that contain information about government business may also be records. They are records if they are circulated to others or placed in files that allow others in the NSC to access and view the calendars in connection with official business. Calendars that are not circulated to others, and are not made accessible to others, do not need to be preserved, and they may be updated, changed, or deleted at the individual's discretion. The NSC manages calendars on these systems that are records as follows:

1. Electronic calendars relating to the activities of the APNSA, the DAPNSA, the Staff Director, the Executive Secretary, the Deputy Executive Secretary, and Senior Directors are meant to be shared with NSC employees other than the individual's secretary and, therefore, must be treated as records. They should be printed out monthly by an NSC staff member with designated responsibility for printing the calendar and forwarded to Records Management for permanent preservation. Entries in these calendars may not be deleted or destroyed prior to printing. When printing calendars for preservation, also print and file a list of the individuals who had authorized access to the calendar for the previous month.

2. Calendars of other employees that contain information about NSC activities will be retained on the computer system for two years. Entries in the calendars, and associated data regarding authorized access, may not be deleted or destroyed during those two years unless the calendar has been previously printed and forwarded to Records Management.

*****

This memorandum supersedes all previous guidance on electronic mail issued prior to January 6, 1993, as well as the instructions on Electronic Federal Records on page 6 of the May 8, 1993 memo on "Federal Records." I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of staff compliance with this guidance in order to ensure that the NSC fulfills its legal obligations regarding the creation and preservation of federal and/or Presidential records. If you have any questions about this guidance, please contact the Office of Records and Access Management (53576) or the Office of the Legal Adviser (66538).

REV_00258825

REV_00258826

REV_00258827

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

VHS - Remarks on Judiciary Confirmation, 10/30/2002

OA/NARA#: 2168/2079
9698

Box
Folder 50-17

Transferred Material Marker
The George W. Bush Library

FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES /UNITS	DATE	TRANSFERRED TO
Video Cassette	Remarks on Judiciary Confirmation	1	10/30/2002	AV

This marker identifies the original location of the transferred item listed above.

COLLECTION:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett

FOLDER TITLE:
VHS - Remarks on Judiciary Confirmation, 10/30/2002

FRC ID:
9698

OA Num.:
2168

NARA Num.:
2079

FOIA IDs and Segments:
2017-0345-F

This Document was transferred on 6/27/2018 by VB

REV_00258829

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

Research - Commerce Clause Cases

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box

Folder 50-18

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 73 Va. L. Rev. 1387

*73 Va. L. Rev. 1387, **

Copyright © 1987 Virginia Law Review Association.

Virginia Law Review

NOVEMBER, 1987

73 Va. L. Rev. 1387

LENGTH: 34843 words

ARTICLE: THE PROPER SCOPE OF THE COMMERCE POWER.

Richard A. Epstein *

* James Parker Hall Professor of Law, University of Chicago. This Article was originally presented as a paper at a Conference on Economic Liberties and the Constitution held at the United States Department of Justice in June 1986. A revised version of the paper was presented at a Conference on the Constitution held at Bowling Green University in October 1987. I wish to give thanks to Professor Edmund Kitch of the University of Virginia School of Law and my colleague David Currie for their especially insightful comments on an earlier draft of this paper. I have also benefitted from discussions with Dennis Hutchinson and Michael McConnell.

SUMMARY:
... THE Congress shall have Power . . . To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" -- such is the clause in the Constitution to which most federal power can be traced in today's general welfare state. ... Chief Justice Marshall decided, first, that navigation among the several states was interstate commerce, and second (in order to avoid the question of whether any dormant commerce power could be identified) that a 1793 federal statute that licensed ships in the "coasting trade" had preempted the New York statute. ... More to the point, Gibbons' limits on the extent of the commerce clause would have been important because they would have limited the degree to which Congress could have used its commerce power to cartelize the entire railroad industry, as it did by amending the ICA after World War I. ... But the transaction at issue in E. C. Knight was a merger that was quite impossible for Congress to reach by a plan to regulate the interstate sales of the combined sugar business (even if these preliminary merger agreements were regarded as in interstate commerce) without necessarily intruding into the regulation of manufacture, which both the majority and the dissent expressly regarded as outside the scope of the commerce clause. ...

TEXT:
[*1387] THE Congress shall have Power . . . To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" [1] -- such is the clause in the Constitution to which most federal power can be traced in today's general welfare state. The labor statutes, the civil rights statutes, the farm and agricultural statutes, and countless others rest on the commerce power, or more accurately on a construction of the commerce

B. The Expansion of Commerce Clause Jurisdiction

There is a long road from Gibbons to modern doctrine of the broad reach of congressional power under the commerce clause. This section will trace the twists and turns in that road. In one sense Gibbons, for all its importance, is an odd place from which to begin the journey, because the case itself as much concerned the limitation of state power as it did the extent of congressional power under the coastal trading statute. Indeed, the negative, or dormant, commerce clause power that prohibits states from intruding on the federal authority over interstate commerce even absent any congressional legislation on the subject of the state action dates from Gibbons as well; Justice Johnson's concurring opinion argued that the commerce clause standing alone prohibited New York from passing the statute in question. [60] The primary purpose [*1409] of this Article is not, however, to trace the negative side of the clause, [61] which has proven quite stable in recent times. Rather, the purpose is to follow the expansion of the affirmative power of the clause. This development took place along three separate lines. [62] The first line took its cue from the narrow holding of Gibbons that navigation counted as commerce under the clause, and concerned the "instrumentalities of commerce." This Article follows the expansion of the clause, briefly in connection with navigable waterways, [*1410] and more extensively with the systematic and inexorable expansion of the federal power to regulate the railroads under the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887, as amended. [63]

The second line of cases involved the regulation of goods admittedly in interstate commerce (that is, goods in transit across state lines) in order to control the primary conduct of persons in either the sending or receiving state. This line of cases might be called the "indirect regulation" cases. The third line of cases, emanating from E. C. Knight itself, explored the distinction between manufacture and commerce among the several states.

Between 1870 and 1937 the scope of federal power under these three lines of case law continued to expand, but in ways that still left an extensive area of economic life outside the power of Congress. In particular, the distinction between manufacture and commerce laid down in E. C. Knight in 1895 retained its validity until it was at last overturned in 1937 by NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. [64] In general the expansion of the first and second heads of the commerce power fall within the general scheme set out by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons in that they address both the power of Congress to regulate the means by which goods are shipped in interstate commerce, as well as the types of goods that can be shipped. In my judgment, the scope of the federal power under these two heads moved, prior to 1937, a step or two beyond where proper argument would take them. But although these difficult cases can be argued at the margin, nothing in the case law under these two heads undermined the essential validity of the line between commerce, on the one hand, and manufacture and agriculture on the other, clearly adumbrated in Gibbons and accepted in E. C. Knight. It is only when that last distinction is rejected that a system of enumerated powers is dismantled. Yet there is no conceptual necessity for saying that power to regulate commerce among the several states must reach everything if it is to reach anything. The modern generation of negative commerce clause cases is instructive because it proves that it is possible, and sensible, to articulate an enduring conception of interstate commerce -- just as Chief Justice Marshall had insisted.

[*1411] 1. The Instrumentalities of Commerce

Gibbons itself laid down the distinction between the "internal commerce" or "interior traffic" of a state and commerce among the states. [65] Although Chief Justice Marshall articulated the distinction with confident assurance, its limits were not really tested until 1870, when the Court in The Daniel Ball [66] considered an 1852 inspection statute for steam passenger vessels operating on the navigable waters of the United States. The appellant questioned whether Congress had the power to inspect a ship that remained solely within a single state, even though it carried goods that had been shipped from other states, or were eventually destined for shipment into other states. [67] As framed, the case offered an instructive counterpoint to Gibbons, which had decided that the federal commerce power reached a single, continuous journey that started in one state and ended in another. The Court in The Daniel Ball asked what happened when that same journey involved two ships instead of one. If Chief Justice Marshall's view of the commerce clause was as expansive as the received wisdom has it -- if "plenary" had meant "wholly unbounded" -- then it is unintelligible why the Supreme Court should have paused a second to decide The Daniel Ball. It is only because Gibbons extended the scope of the commerce power to "intercourse," and kept it there, that there was any occasion to deliberate on the loose ends left open by Gibbons.

REV_00258839

Relative to the understandings of its time, The Daniel Ball gave Gibbons a modestly expansive interpretation. The opinion by Justice Field -- no friend of big government -- upheld the 1852 inspection statute because of the Court's explicit fear that any other interpretation of the commerce clause would strip the federal government of its fundamental powers. "Several agencies combining, each taking up the commodity transported at the boundary line at one end of a State, and leaving it at the boundary line at the other end," he wrote, "the Federal jurisdiction would be entirely ousted, and the constitutional provision would become a dead letter." [68]

[*1412] Justice Field's conclusion has assumed the status of a necessary truth. Nonetheless, there is reason to ask whether the decision is as impregnable as it seems. It appears that the commerce clause could well apply to goods destined for sale in another state as part of a continuous transaction, even if they are shipped by boats that operate solely within the territorial waters of one state. Where the transfer of goods from boat to boat is part of a comprehensive plan -- as when the various carriers have coordinated travel schedules -- then Congress should have jurisdiction. But it is far from self-evident that because the goods are in the interstate market the ships which carry them on parts of the journey are in interstate commerce as well. The states could regulate the safety of the boats on which the goods are carried, while the federal government could (as it has never seen fit to do) pass a statute dealing with the rights and duties of common carriers and their customers, as well as maintain jurisdiction over any ship that did cross a state line. There need be no gap in the system of regulation. And as long as ships remain within a single state, shipowners hardly need the federal power to protect them from inconsistent regulation. If state regulation became overly onerous, a shipowner could escape it by explicitly organizing his business to specialize in interstate transport, or by moving to another state. Deciding The Daniel Ball the other way would have promoted competition between state governments. Such an outcome would hardly have made the commerce clause a dead letter, as Justice Field insisted, even if it would have stopped the further expansion of federal power.

There is a danger in this alternative analysis of The Daniel Ball that federal jurisdiction will be less comprehensive than is needed to perform a particular regulatory task. The Court in The Daniel Ball and subsequent decisions reacted to this danger by weighing the risk of underinclusion within the federal power more heavily than the reverse danger of overinclusion. With the vantage of hindsight, The Daniel Ball originated the "protective principle" which, when pushed to its limit, finds that the use of federal power in a doubtful case is always "necessary," perhaps in the sense of the "necessary and proper" clause. [69] But there are some risks to the strategy, that although not evident here, must be kept in mind. Unless the countervailing principle of enumerated powers is [*1413] brought to the fore, then the basic structure may be lost in a series of small accretions, each one palatable on its own, even though the whole structure is not.

It is precisely that form of incrementalism that characterized the later cases involving the use of railroads in interstate commerce. The impetus for national regulation clearly came from the famous decision in Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway v. Illinois. [70] That case prevented state governments from regulating railroad fares from points within a state to points outside it. [71] There was a functional reason for the decision, given the risk that separate states could impose inconsistent obligations upon carriers. Congress attempted to solve this problem by passing the Interstate Commerce Act (ICA) [72] in 1887.

REV_00258840

Sensible economic concerns led to the passage of the first ICA, which was designed to prevent discrimination against short-haul carriers. The problem arose because of the structure of the railroad lines. Different carriers went by different routes from one population center to another. Thus there was competition on the long-haul routes (such as San Francisco to Chicago) because shippers had many choices. But, once out in the plains, any given line had a local monopoly that it could exploit against farmers and others. When it exacted monopoly profit, its short-haul rates could easily exceed its long-haul rates, even if the actual cost of long-haul shipment was greater. But simply preventing the price per segment from exceeding the price for the whole trip would have gone a long [*1414] way toward eliminating monopoly profit without getting the government involved in the ratemaking that characterized the Interstate Commerce Commission (ICC) after the "reforms" of this century, including the Transportation Act of 1920. [73]

One question was whether the ICC's authority reached trips that began and ended within a single state. In essence this was the land-based version of the question raised, and answered in the affirmative, in The Daniel Ball. Nonetheless, as a matter of first principle, one could forcefully insist that the proper answer should have been no. The obvious response to this assertion is that unprincipled exploitation of short-haul users would have continued on a limited scale even after the passage of the ICA. But that need not have been the case. The states could have had exclusive jurisdiction over these short-haul runs, and their local laws could have replicated the key substantive provision of the ICA, thereby protecting purely intrastate shippers: the railroad could not charge more for the intrastate run than it charged for any longer interstate run of which the intrastate segment was a part. The danger of radical state restrictions on the power of carriers to cover their costs for internal runs could have been avoided by constitutional protections against confiscation, such as those invoked during this period in Smyth v. Ames. [74] The jurisdictional balance between federal and state governments could have been quite stable if left where Gibbons had placed it. More to the point, Gibbons' limits on the extent of the commerce clause would have been important because they would have limited the degree to which Congress could have used its commerce power to cartelize the entire railroad industry, as it did by amending the ICA after World War I. [75]

Historically, however, the dividing line between interstate and intrastate journeys did not endure. It is instructive to trace the expansion of the commerce clause in the railroad cases. At each point the Supreme Court seemed aware that there must be some [*1415] limit to the commerce power, but on virtually every occasion it found the federal legislation at issue not to exceed the limit. The Court failed to understand that too much federal jurisdiction was as dangerous as too little. In this regard, Houston, East & West Texas Railway v. United States (The Shreveport Rate Case), [76] decided in 1914, marked an especially instructive watershed. This case has been read as an important step forward (the bias is implicit) for the commerce power. The facts were complicated, and the details have unfortunately been forgotten in modern times. Nonetheless they deserve close attention today.

Various points in East Texas were served by interstate carriers operating out of Shreveport, Louisiana on one end, and Dallas and Houston, Texas on the other. [77] Before the intercession of the ICC, the prices charged by these railroad lines were far higher for shipping goods from Shreveport to Texas than were the rates for shipping goods within Texas, where rates were set by a state body, the Texas Railroad Commission. [78] The ICC ordered adjustments to railroad rate structures that "unjustly discriminated in favor of traffic within the State of Texas and against similar traffic between Louisiana and Texas." [79]

The ICC proposed a compound remedy to alleviate the perceived ills. The first part of the ICC order imposed specific maximum rates that the carriers could charge on their interstate, i.e., Louisiana-Texas, routes. [80] The second part was a general nondiscrimination provision which held that the rates in interstate traffic could not be higher than those in intrastate traffic. [81] The order, however, left it to the railroads to decide whether they raised intrastate rates, lowered interstate ones, or did a little of both. All that was required was equalization of rates within the ceilings set by the first part of the ICC order. Given the structure of the order, it was possible for the railroads to comply in full with the ICC order [*1416] without changing their intrastate rates: the railroads simply had to reduce their interstate rates until they equalled the rates charged on the intrastate runs. Accordingly, the decision upholding the ICC order could be read not to involve a conflict between the rates established by the ICC for interstate traffic and those set by the Texas Railroad Commission for intrastate traffic, and as such the decision does not appear to have extended the scope of the commerce clause very far.

REV_00258841

This narrow reading of the case, however, is belied in at least two respects. First, the Shreveport Rate Case protected the railroads if they chose to raise their intrastate rates in defiance of the rates set by the Texas Railroad Commission. Although there was no necessary regulation of intrastate rates, the remedy envisioned made the state powerless to set any intrastate maximum below the ICC maximum if the railroads chose to raise their local rates to the ICC levels. The unmistakable thrust of the opinion was to make the congressional power paramount over state authority:

Wherever the interstate and intrastate transactions of carriers are so related that the government of the one involves the control of the other, it is Congress, and not the State, that is entitled to prescribe the final and dominant rule, for otherwise Congress would be denied the exercise of its constitutional authority and the State, and not the Nation, would be supreme within the national field. [82]

Second, the Shreveport Rate Case relied upon and extended earlier decisions that had sustained the power of Congress to regulate railroad safety, even when there was a "commingling of duties relating to interstate and intrastate operations." [83] Southern Railway v. United States, [84] had sustained the Safety Appliance Act [85] with respect to cars in interstate travel even though it necessarily embraced cars that were used in intrastate travel as well. In the Second Employers' Liability Cases, [86] the Court had sustained Congress' authority to allocate liability for accidents caused to employees in interstate commerce, even when they were caused by employees engaged in intrastate commerce. These cases arguably [*1417] could be justified under some protective principle as a response to the same hard choice faced by the Court in The Daniel Ball: if Congress were confined to matters that were purely in interstate commerce, then it could never legislate to the limit of its jurisdiction. [87] Yet for Congress to reach the full limits of its jurisdiction it must on some occasions go beyond it. The choice is necessarily either over- or underinclusion. It is hard to gainsay a judicial decision that opts for the former over the latter, at least in cases where interstate and intrastate commerce are inextricable, such as different railroad cars on the same train. A necessary and proper clause argument has evident force here. [88]

Justice Hughes (the same Justice Hughes who later as Chief Justice wrote NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.) [89] made it appear in the Shreveport Rate Case that there was a seamless web encompassing both the safety cases and the rate regulation cases. But the rate regulation case marked an expansion of the commerce power, although perhaps an inadvertent one, beyond the safety cases that preceded it. The commerce clause was at issue in the safety cases because railroad cars were used for both interstate and intrastate runs at different times, and were often mixed on the same train. There was thus a "commingling of duties relating to interstate and intrastate operations." [90] Yet no such commingling existed with respect to the rate structures, as it was surely possible to regulate interstate fares without regulating intrastate fares. The various rate schedules were distinct; it was possible for the ICC to set rates on the interstate runs without having to set them on intrastate activities. Indeed, it appears that this was Congress' intention in passing the original statute. [91] In order to uphold the expanded [*1418] jurisdiction sought by the ICC, the "commingled" approach of the safety cases had to yield to a broader formulation whereby Congress could extend "its control over the interstate carrier in all matters having . . . a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce." [92] At this point the Justices should have considered whether the risks of overextension of federal power were worth running. But, lacking an underlying theory of the risks of regulation, the Court acted as though any exercise of the congressional jurisdiction were benign. The path of broad construction and social virtue again coincided, in the Court's view.

REV_00258842

For all their nimble footwork, the authors of the Shreveport Rate Case did not necessarily commit the Court to an all-inclusive view of the commerce clause. The regulations in question were imposed upon the intrastate business of interstate carriers. Congress' commerce power did not yet necessarily reach intrastate carriers that did not engage in any interstate business. In addition, the Shreveport Rate Case tied federal regulation of local business to proof of discrimination against interstate commerce. The ICC could not have comprehensively regulated the entire railway business under its authority alone, for some local rates at least were not set in conjunction with discriminatory interstate rates. Yet this barrier too was quickly overrun by the Court in Wisconsin Railroad Commission v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, [93] which upheld the constitutionality of one of the worst pieces of modern economic legislation, the Transportation Act of 1920. [94] The Act replaced specific control of long-haul/short-haul problems with comprehensive regulation of the railroad industry, and helped cartelize an entire industry by imposing comprehensive rate of return regulation. [95] Yet, under the rationale of the Shreveport Rate [*1419] Case, the statute could not have been sustained in its entirety under the commerce clause because it reached local railroad runs that by no stretch of the imagination competed with interstate runs. [96] On these local routes a showing of nondiscrimination, so critical to the Shreveport Rate Case, could not be made. But the Court again took a benevolent view of an expansive statute, [97] finding that Congress could ensure that the costs of running railroads were properly distributed between interstate and intrastate carriers. [98]

The connection between federal jurisdiction, interest group politics, and substantive entitlements is clear. The Court adopted a benevolent, public interest interpretation of the 1920 statute, and hence saw no risk in extending federal power farther than prior law had taken it. But too much regulation is always at least as risky as too little. [99] Furthermore, the Court's extension of the commerce clause in the Shreveport Rate Case dictated the likely structure of future regulation, to which the Court also was to acquiesce. It was [*1420] not possible, or at least it was less possible, to have comprehensive rate-of-return regulation, complete with control over entry, if Congress could not touch the local portions of the railroad business. If the emphasis had remained on the long-haul/short-haul problem, then a system of federal and state regulation that limited congressional control to wholly interstate trips would have been adequate to the task. The original ICA thus was clearly superior to its 1920 version. It was only the judicial expansion of the commerce clause that made it possible for Congress to adopt its own unfortunate substantive provisions.

The game has still not run its course, for even the decisions of the Court in rate cases after the Shreveport Rate Case do not mandate the conclusion that the commerce clause is all-embracing. To see the remaining distinctions, consider the fate of one critical passage from the Shreveport Rate Case:

Congress is empowered to regulate, -- that is, to provide the law for the government of interstate commerce; to enact 'all appropriate legislation' for its 'protection and advancement;' to adopt measures 'to promote its growth and insure its safety;' 'to foster, protect, control and restrain.' Its authority, extending to these interstate carriers as instruments of interstate commerce, necessarily embraces the right to control their operations in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance. [100]

REV_00258843

This passage appears to say that the commerce clause supports congressional power over the instruments of commerce, that is, the railroads and the highways, because of the impossibility of disentangling the various threads of interstate and intrastate business, but extends no further. Federal jurisdiction over commerce would end at the railroad station, with the already bloated ICC of the 1920 Act. This judgment implies no preference for regulated over-competitive industries. The railroads have serious long-haul/short-haul problems that make the competitive solution difficult. In any event, the conflict is not between federal regulation and market competition. Instead it is a conflict between state and federal regulation, [*1421] and there is no reason to think a priori that one will be superior, by whatever measure, to the other.

One could therefore find a stable stopping point to the commerce power by limiting its reach to transportation by rail, river, road, and today, by air. Congressional power would be limited to commerce as traditionally understood, even though it would reach intrastate as well as interstate commerce with respect to those transportation facilities that were devoted to both.

It is possible, however, to unhinge the last fragment of the previous passage from the whole so as to make it appear that any competition, from whatever source, justifies federal regulation. Just that step was taken during the New Deal. But before we turn to this ultimate transformation of the Shreveport Rate Case line of cases, [101] it will be instructive to examine the other two lines of commerce clause cases.

2. What Goods May Be Shipped in Interstate Commerce?

The pre-New Deal expansion of the commerce clause did not stem solely from the federal regulation of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. It was also intimately connected to the types of goods that could be shipped in interstate commerce at all. These cases, it seems clear, did not necessarily involve only commerce among the several states, although the regulated goods were in transit from one state to another. But the relevant questions were, and remain, intractable because both the motive and effect of congressional regulation concerned matters that were themselves not within the "stream of commerce," at least as the phrase was understood before 1937. The true goal of these regulations was to govern -- "influence" is not a strong enough word -- the behavior of individuals and firms before their goods entered commerce or after they left it. In evaluating the statutes, the Court was required to consider the interaction between the commerce clause and the rest of the constitutional structure, in particular the principle that Congress possessed only the limited and enumerated powers conferred upon it by article I -- powers that did not allow it to intrude upon the reserved powers of the states. The drawing of the relevant lines is by no means an easy task. But there is on balance [*1422] good reason to believe that here too the Court, even before the 1937 revolution, construed the commerce clause in ways that extended the power of Congress beyond its proper scope.

The first case in the line was Champion v. Ames [102] in 1903. The question before the Court was whether Congress under the commerce clause could prohibit the transportation of lottery tickets across state lines. [103] The first Justice Harlan's opinion upheld the statute as a proper application of the commerce power. [104] But Justice Harlan's defense of federal power in Champion is problematic. Although the statute in question operated on articles of interstate commerce, its purpose surely was not to protect or to facilitate interstate commerce. Quite the opposite -- its purpose was designed to influence the primary conduct of individuals, either before the goods entered interstate commerce or before it left them. One tell-tale sign of the new aggressiveness to which the commerce power was turned was that Congress sought to prohibit, not to regulate, the transfer of lottery tickets in interstate commerce. In and of itself, this fact hardly seems dispositive, for it is doubtful that the commerce clause could be read so that "regulation" occupies a domain so narrow that all types of prohibition fall outside the power of Congress. Hamilton himself spoke of "prohibitory regulations" when addressing in The Federalist No. 11 the need to regulate commerce with foreign nations. [105] If these prohibitions are (regrettably) proper in the foreign context, then they cannot be wholly banished in the domestic one.

Analytically, too, it seems that regulations comprehend prohibitions. To be sure, regulation and prohibition do not mean the same thing, and the Constitution itself uses the two terms in clear opposition to each other. [106] It would be very odd indeed to say that [*1423] Congress had the power "to prohibit all commerce with foreign nations, among the states, or with the Indian tribes," for the total elimination of all trade seems hard to reconcile with the original vision of vibrant national markets unimpeded by petty local regulations. [107] But it is difficult to have the extreme case determine the principle, given the massive overlap between regulations and prohibitions in ordinary speech. The class of conditional prohibitions -- of the sort which say that no goods may travel in interstate commerce unless evidenced by a bill of lading -- is so extensive, and benign, that it is difficult to see how any jurisdictional limitation on congressional power could be erected on the strength of the verbal distinction alone.

The source of the uneasiness with Champion does not, however, disappear even if we acknowledge, however uneasily, that all prohibitions are regulations within the meaning of the commerce clause. Instead, the common concern with both regulations and prohibitions of the sort found in Champion and its progeny is that Congress will use its powers of regulation to upset the doctrine of enumerated powers. Stated otherwise, Champion is perhaps the first case in which Congress had consciously sought to exploit the outer reaches of the commerce clause in ways that might trench upon the power of the states. In one sense, the Congress stayed within the commerce clause because Chief Justice Marshall told us that the commerce power is "plenary" over everything that comes within its specified limits. But in another sense Congress used its plenary power to arrogate to itself matters reserved to the states. The uneasiness that one thus feels with Champion is quite similar to that which is provoked by the troublesome doctrine of unconstitutional [*1424] conditions, which no one quite understands, but which no one will nonetheless ignore. [108] One way to read unconstitutional conditions is an effort by the state to expand its power over the private activities of individuals by conditioning their access to public facilities, most typically roads: thus the doctrine has been invoked to hold that the state cannot allow a private carrier to use the public highways unless it first agrees (without compensation) to be regulated as a public carrier. [109] The clear function of the doctrine is to curb the state desire to use its power of public instrumentalities to control private behavior, even though it is allowed to exclude vehicles of certain classes from the highways altogether.

The Champion line of cases shows the same type of tensions at work, as the Court struggled to find the line that allowed the power of Congress to remain plenary, without undermining the reserved powers of the state. Some forms of regulations, and indeed prohibitions, seem not to threaten the delicate balance of the federal system. As the dissent in Champion suggested, for example, a clear instance of an acceptable prohibition is one preventing the shipment in interstate commerce of goods that are themselves a peril to interstate commerce:

The power to prohibit the transportation of diseased animals and infected goods over railroads or on steamboats is an entirely different thing, for they would be in themselves injurious to the transaction of interstate commerce, and, moreover, are essentially commercial in their nature. And the exclusion of diseased persons rests on different ground, for nobody would pretend that persons could be kept off the trains because they were going from one State to another to engage in the lottery business." [110]

REV_00258845

Here there is no concern that Congress by the use of a single enumerated power is trying to dominate the states in the exercise of [*1425] their reserved powers.

Similarly, a somewhat broader but wholly defensible line could stress the harmony between federal and state regulation. Suppose that the statute at issue in Champion prohibited the shipment of lottery tickets from any state in which their production was illegal or into any state in which their possession was illegal. Here the congressional statute would be in aid of valid legislation at the state level. It would reinforce, rather than contradict, state law. In Champion, however, the tie between state and federal regulation was nonexistent, or even negative. The shipment of lottery tickets was forbidden in interstate commerce although their use may have been wholly legal in the states from which and to which they were sent. To be sure, if congressional power under the commerce clause had been clearly established, the supremacy clause would have resolved the conflict between state and federal laws in Congress' favor. [111] But the supremacy clause is of no help until the proper scope of the commerce clause has been first determined, in light of the concerns raised by the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions. The narrower tests previously discussed would not seem to allow the Champion prohibition. These two tests -- "in aid of" state legislation, and the "noxious use" test -- would not make the commerce clause a dead letter, but they also respect the independent power of the states.

There was yet a third line of argument that could have prevailed in Champion. The case could have rested on a peculiar amalgam of the police power and the commerce clause, showing yet again the affinity between jurisdictional and substantive concerns. Lottery tickets were an issue toward which states had long taken a quite schizophrenic attitude. Sometimes the states prohibited lotteries; sometimes they allowed private firms to run them under state charter; sometimes they ran the lotteries themselves. [112] Generally speaking, gambling fell within the class of dubious private activities subject to police power regulation, along with, for example, prostitution. One possible stopping point under the commerce clause would provide that Congress could prohibit the transmission in interstate commerce of those goods which a state could ban [*1426] under its police power, as it was then understood, even if the state had not actually prohibited their use. Justice Harlan, who wrote the majority opinion in Champion, always gave an expansive, [113] and occasionally maddeningly extravagant, [114] scope to the police power whenever supposed issues of health and morals arose, though otherwise he was a tiger in defense of individual liberty and freedom of contract. [115] Justice Harlan's opinion in Champion emphasized the police power, stressing the iniquitous nature of lotteries and asking, "why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another?" [116] Harlan rejected the idea that the commerce clause "countenances the suggestion that one may, of right, carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals." [117]

The question then arises: Could the argument equating prohibition under the police power with prohibition under the commerce clause survive? Why not? It is an argument that could permit the federal government to regulate the transport of prostitutes across state lines, [118] whether or not prostitution was legal in the state to which they were sent, or to prohibit the sale of adulterated foods and drugs. [119] Note that each of these examples would be far more secure if the sale of the ultimate product or service were illegal in the state to which the goods were shipped, as was typically the [*1427] case. This somewhat broader conception, although perhaps less preferable than the more limited versions of the commerce clause discussed above, would still have left its scope less than comprehensive.

It was just this conception of the relationship between the commerce clause and the police power that held the line against federal power in Hammer v. Dagenhart. [120] In Hammer, federal legislation forbade the shipment in interstate commerce of any goods manufactured in any plant that used child labor in ways prohibited by the statute within a thirty-day period prior to the shipment. [121] There was no requirement that the actual goods shipped in interstate commerce had to have been made by child labor -- only that some goods made at the plant had been made with the use of child labor. The validity of the statute was hardly compelled by Champion, for the sale of ordinary clothing could not be prohibited as an illicit item of commerce under even the most extravagant version of the police power. Indeed, the Court understood the statute for what it was; it was not an effort to control the goods themselves, but to prescribe the internal rules governing their manufacture within the state. [122] The delicacy of this legislation was manifest in an age when direct federal regulation of manufacture had been precluded by the Supreme Court in United States v. E. C. Knight. [123] In Hammer the Supreme Court stuck to its guns, and by a narrow five-four decision refused to extend Champion beyond the noxious or dangerous products to which it applied.

REV_00258846

On balance, Hammer was correctly decided, assuming that the commerce clause must be understood within the larger structural context of the Constitution. Thus, if the child labor statute in Hammer had been good law, one can envision the following cycle of evasion and response: A firm using child labor now divides its business into two halves, subject to common stock ownership. One half makes goods for intrastate commerce using child labor, while the other half makes goods for interstate commerce without using [*1428] child labor. Congress then passes a new statute which says that no firm whose shareholders have a dominant interest in a second firm that uses child labor may send its goods into interstate commerce. The firm decides to go out of the interstate business altogether. Congress next passes a statute which says that no firm that acquires part of its supplies from any firm that uses child labor may ship its goods in interstate commerce, whether or not the goods made with child labor are incorporated into its own goods shipped interstate.

Why stop here? If the political will exists, Congress can pass a law which states that no firm in any state may ship its goods in interstate commerce unless every other firm within that state forswears the use of child labor. In each case the statute technically regulates only goods within the stream of interstate commerce. If prohibitions are simply forms of regulation, then Congress can raise the price of state independence so high that even the fool-hardy must capitulate. Congress can make any use of child labor a federal issue by redefining the keys that unlock the gates to interstate commerce. If child labor can be reached by Congress, then so can everything else reserved to the states. A "Congressional Marriage Act" could provide that "no manufacturer can ship its goods in interstate commerce unless its state legislature passes a statute under which all local marriages conform to the federal requirements." These concerns were indeed raised by Justice Day, who wrote the majority opinion in Hammer. [124] Justice Day correctly noted that prior cases were limited to cases in which the "use of interstate transportation was necessary to the accomplishment of harmful results," [125] and held that only the limited version of the commerce clause was consistent with the tenth amendment. [126] He noted that competition within the federal system was essential to the original constitutional design. [127]

[*1429] Justice Holmes in dissent wrote a spirited and perceptive defense of the congressional power:

The act does not meddle with anything belonging to the States. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like. But when they seek to send their products across the state line they are no longer within their rights. If there were no Constitution and no Congress their power to cross the line would depend upon their neighbors. Under the Constitution such commerce belongs not to the States but to Congress to regulate. [128]

Holmes surely overstated his point. No one doubted that Congress had the power to override any state effort to block the shipment of goods in interstate commerce. But the justification of one use of that power hardly demanded acceptance of any use of it. The child labor statute in Hammer was invalid because Congress had used its admitted powers over interstate commerce to eliminate a state's "internal affairs" completely. Holmes never addressed this limit to his principles, nor identified the expansive statutes that his views necessarily tolerated -- even though he had previously warned against interpreting the commerce clause so as to allow Congress to reach every productive endeavor of human life. [129] His observation that no statute should be upset because it has "indirect effects" upon the domestic affairs of the state [130] simply failed to address the structural threats that the child labor statutes posed to the distribution of state and federal power.

REV_00258847

Justice Day's majority opinion in Hammer was strong on the jurisdictional side, but apologetic on the substantive side. [131] The issue of child labor laws had long been an emotional one, and there was a powerful consensus in the Progressive movement that these statutes were absolutely necessary to counteract the evils of an unrestrained laissez-faire economic system which tolerated, and indeed encouraged, child labor. The Solicitor General, John W. Davis (who later represented the southern states in Brown v. Board of Education [132]), insisted that, although the need was pressing, individual [*1430] states were reluctant to enact their own child labor statutes because they feared that their manufacturers would be harmed by competition from industries in states still employing child labor:

The shipment of child-made goods outside of one State directly induces similar employment of children in competing States. It is not enough to answer that each State theoretically may regulate conditions of manufacturing within its own borders. As Congress saw the situation, the States were not entirely free agents. For salutary statutes had been repealed, legislative action on their part had been defeated and postponed time and again, solely by reason of the argument (valid or not) that interstate competition could not be withstood. [133]

The quoted passage was something of an overstatement, as every state in the Union, including North Carolina (the state at issue in Hammer), had some statute regulating child labor on its books. [134] The real question was whether the weaker North Carolina statute, which forbade child labor below the age of twelve, was preferable to the federal minimum of fourteen. [135]

Justice Day made no substantive attack on the child labor laws -- rather, he sympathized with them. [136] Justice Day was in the awkward position of having to defend jurisdictional limitations that worked against what he thought to be highly desirable social regulation.

The case takes on a different complexion, however, if one looks with even modest suspicion on child labor statutes, as I do, and thinks that as a general rule the only proper grounds for government intervention in family relations are abuse or neglect. Any reader of Laura Ingalls Wilder's Farmer Boy knows that child labor was not a creature of the industrial revolution. [137] Arduous labor, day and night, without any employer to regulate or to sue has always been the lot of farm children. The children in the factories were certainly not as well off as we would like, but they were probably [*1431] better off than they would have been back on the farm, or than if they had been left in the city without any opportunity to sell their labor. Their families had voted to leave the farm or the old country with their feet, as a matter of life and death. [138] Under this view, the substantive reforms may well have been misguided initiatives that inflicted harm upon the very persons they were ostensibly intended to benefit. Child labor changes in its character and intensity as changes occur in the means of production, the income level of parents, and the returns to children from more education. Restrictions on child labor may be proposed as ways to prevent child neglect and abuse, but the case for them is far from self-evident. Even if the police power is thought to be extensive enough to "protect" children from their parents as a constitutional matter, as it surely was by 1918, [139] there is a clear risk that the proper limits of the police power will be exceeded when legislation is used by interest groups that do not rely upon child labor to undercut rivals who do. Stated otherwise, child labor legislation could well be misguided paternalism or interest-group politics.

clause that grants the federal government jurisdiction so long as it can show (as it always can) that the regulated activity burdens, obstructs, or affects interstate commerce, however indirectly. Is this underlying interpretation of the commerce clause correct? [2]

The entire inquiry may be idle theoretical speculation, or it may have profound practical importance. I cannot say which, although at present I should guess the former; too much water has passed over the dam for there to be a candid judicial reexamination of the commerce clause that looks only to first principles. Still, in an age [*1388] in which the theory of government is again subject to general theoretical discussion, it is instructive to ask, as a matter both of first principle and of Supreme Court precedent: What is the proper construction of the grant of congressional power contained within article I, section 8, clause 3?

In Part I of this Article, I introduce the question of the scope of the commerce power by discussing its intended role in limiting government power and its relation to the individual rights protections of the Constitution. In Parts II and III, I analyze the text of the commerce clause and look at the place of the commerce clause in the overall constitutional structure. Finally, in Parts IV and V, I analyze the clause in light of the cases that have construed and extended its scope during our entire constitutional history. My analysis places special emphasis on the fifty-year period of the rise of the administrative state, from the onset of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887 to the height of the New Deal. My conclusion is clear enough. I think that the expansive construction of the clause accepted by the New Deal Supreme Court is wrong, and clearly so, and that a host of other interpretations are more consistent with both the text and the structure of our constitutional government.

I. THE PROBLEM: STRUCTURE AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

The commerce power is not a comprehensive grant of federal power. It does not convert the Constitution from a system of government with enumerated federal powers into one in which the only subject matter limitations placed on Congress are those which it chooses to impose upon itself. Nor does the "necessary and proper" clause work to change this basic design; although it seeks to insure that the federal power may be exercised upon its appropriate targets, it is not designed to run roughshod over the entire scheme of enumerated powers that precedes it in the Constitution. [3] If forced to summarize what the commerce clause means, I would [*1389] say that it refers more to "commerce" as that term has been developed in connection with the "negative" or "dormant" commerce clause cases, which concern the instrumentalities of interstate commerce and the goods that are shipped into it. Stated otherwise, the term commerce has a stable usage in various other contexts. Zoning for "commercial" uses, for example, is often used in opposition to zoning for "manufacturing" uses. The Uniform Commercial Code does not cover the law of manufacturers. More generally, the idea of commerce seems closer to the idea of "trade" than to other economic activities. It is in just this sense that the term was used in ordinary discourse at the time of the founding. Hume's essay Of Commerce, for example, explicitly places the idea of commerce in opposition to that of manufacturing. [4] The same usage, restrictive by modern standards, was adopted by Hamilton, who for example in the Federalist No. 11 uses commerce as a synonym for trade and navigation, and links his discussion of the commerce power with the need to have an American navy to police and protect the seas. [5] But whatever the uncertainties, commerce does not comprise the sum of all productive activities in which individuals may engage. There is at least a slight irony here, for the Uniform Commercial Code is enacted under state law, whereas everything from manufacturing to welfare is regulated comprehensively at the federal level.

Finding the proper interpretation is of course no easy task. One great problem has to do with the function of the commerce clause itself. The Constitution contains two general types of provisions; [*1390] the first class is structural and was designed to divide powers between state and federal government, and, at the federal level, between the different branches of

REV_00258831

This skeptical view of the substantive issues in Hammer should caution one against reading more into the commerce clause than its language, or its place in the overall constitutional structure, allows. There is no obvious reason to approach the jurisdiction question with the assumption that child labor laws are intrinsically good, if only we knew how to enact them. Their strength, far from being a given, should be tested in competition between states. Such competition would show the true importance of child labor laws to the state: Will a state impose the restriction even when local firms may be hampered in interstate competition? The legislative question surely is not an all-or-nothing one. Indeed, the difference between North Carolina's twelve-year limit and Congress' fourteen is surely only a question of degree, and it is far from self-evident [*1432] which minimum is better, assuming there should be child labor laws at all.

The relatively clean line in Hammer prevented Congress from using its power over the movement of goods in interstate commerce to regulate the terms and conditions of their production. The line of cases regarding what types of goods could be shipped in interstate commerce thus imposed real limitations on the power of Congress. To be sure, the ICC cases afforded Congress powerful jurisdiction over the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. [140] But even when broadly construed these still stopped with the railroads and navigable waters (and by obvious extension interstate highways and interstate airplane transportation). The line between state police power and the commerce clause had shifted, and there is reason to think that some of the shifts had already placed too many matters on the federal side of the line. But the case law was still a long way from giving Congress comprehensive powers to regulate all productive activities.

3. Manufacturing and Commerce

I now turn to the last line of cases necessary to complete the overall picture -- those that drew the sharp and structural line between commerce on one hand and manufacture (or production and agriculture) on the other. This line of cases began with United States v. E.C. Knight Co. [141] in 1895, and retained its overall validity until the 1937 term. What follows is an account of how that line of cases developed, and retained, its distinct position from the two groups of cases just considered.

E. C. Knight was the first constitutional challenge to the Sherman Act. [142] At issue was the acquisition by the American Sugar Refining Company, a New Jersey corporation, of four Pennsylvania corporations that manufactured refined sugar. The United States challenged the merger under the Sherman Act as "a combination or contract in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states." [143] The Court held that the merger could not be reached by the Sherman Act because it was not part of interstate commerce [*1433] and had no "direct" effect upon it. [144] Chief Justice Fuller made a conscious effort to delineate the respective spheres of the state police power and the commerce clause in his majority opinion in ways that harken back to Gibbons v. Ogden:

Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce.

It is vital that the independence of the commercial power and of the police power, and the delimitation between them, however sometimes perplexing, should always be recognized and observed, for while the one furnishes the strongest bond of union, the other is essential to the preservation of the autonomy of the States as required by our dual form of government; and acknowledged evils, however grave and urgent they may appear to be, had better be borne, than the risk be run, in the effort to suppress them, of more serious consequences by resort to expedients of even doubtful constitutionality.

Contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several States, the transportation and its instrumentalities, and articles bought, sold, or exchanged for the purposes of such transit among the States, or put in the way of transit, may be regulated, but this is because they form part of interstate trade or commerce. The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another State does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the control of the State and belongs to commerce. [145]

Chief Justice Fuller tried to raise a barrier between manufacture, on the one hand, and sale or shipment of goods in interstate commerce, on the other. But the barrier was not as well-defined as Chief Justice Fuller made it out to be. Justice Harlan forcefully made this point in his dissent, noting that this merger was designed to regulate not only the manufacturing of refined sugar [*1434] but also "selling sugar in different parts of the country." [146] The transaction in E. C. Knight had two purposes: manufacture, over which there could be a local monopoly that Congress could not reach, and a plan for restrictive interstate sale, designed to raise prices in interstate markets. The status of the sales plan element of the merger was the subject of dispute between the Justices. Chief Justice Fuller's majority opinion allowed federal regulation of the contracts by which the sugar was bought and sold. [147] Yet it reads as though it would not have allowed the regulation of a structural agreement made prior to actual sales, by which the parties agreed to sell only certain amounts in interstate commerce at certain prices. According to his view, this master agreement would fall outside of the scope of the commerce clause. Justice Harlan's dissent, on the other hand, did not attack Chief Justice Fuller's position that "commerce succeeds manufacture." Instead he argued that manufacture became commerce when the sugar was sold to be transported, not subsequently, when it actually was placed in interstate transport:

It is said that manufacture precedes commerce and is not a part of it. But it is equally true that when manufacture ends, that which has been manufactured becomes a subject of commerce; that buying and selling succeed manufacture, come into existence after the process of manufacture is completed, precede transportation and are as much commercial intercourse, where articles are bought to be carried from one State to another, as is the manual transportation of such articles after they have been so purchased. [148]

Justice Harlan never quite closed in on the essential issue in the case. The government did not attack the individual contracts for sale of sugar in interstate commerce, but only the prior structural arrangements that influenced the terms on which the interstate sales were made. In most antitrust cases the contracts for the division of markets or the maintenance of prices are separate and distinct from any contract arrangements for the manufacture or sale of goods. But the transaction at issue in E. C. Knight was a merger that was quite impossible for Congress to reach by a plan to regulate the interstate sales of the combined sugar business (even if [*1435] these preliminary merger agreements were regarded as in interstate commerce) without necessarily intruding into the regulation of manufacture, which both the majority and the dissent expressly regarded as outside the scope of the commerce clause. [149] E. C. Knight was thus an early version of the Shreveport Rate Case problem, in which the Court recognized that the regulation of interstate commerce was necessarily either over- or underinclusive. [150] The difference between the majority and dissenting opinions in E. C. Knight is best explained as a response to the issue of whether too much or too little regulation was desired. Justice Harlan in dissent thought that the regulation was appropriate, for the peril of national monopolies was too great to be ignored. [151] To Chief Justice Fuller, on the other hand, the decisive consideration was that the expansion of the commerce power to meet the danger of monopoly ran the far greater risk of upsetting the grand constitutional balance between the federal and the state governments. [152] That is why he was so eager to strike down any statute of "even doubtful constitutionality." [153]

REV_00258850

Unfortunately, these genuine substantive concerns were not incorporated into a careful analysis of the error costs of alternative jurisdictional rules. Instead the debate focused on the question whether the regulation had an impact on interstate commerce that was "direct or immediate" or "remote or indirect." [154] These abstract, largely nondescriptive terms simply could not carry the vast institutional weight placed upon them in future years. The E. C. Knight opinions, in retrospect, seem in large part to be simple word games or metaphysical abstractions rather than debates about important principles.

[*1436] The difference between the two sides, moreover, was not as great as might be supposed. The substantial common ground between Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Harlan is clearly borne out by looking at the next important case in the line, Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, [155] written for a unanimous Supreme Court by Justice Peckham, who is today largely remembered for his opinion in Lochner v. New York striking down New York's ten-hour maximum daily labor law for bakers. [156] Addyston Pipe upheld a federal attack on an explicit contract by cast-iron pipe producers to divide the territorial market for their product among themselves in order to create a set of local monopolies. [157] At one level the case appears indistinguishable from E. C. Knight, from which it differed solely by the method chosen by the parties to obtain their monopoly prices. A merger of manufacturing businesses was the method of choice in E. C. Knight, while an explicit cartelization was chosen in Addyston Pipe. If the sole question was whether there was a "direct" or "indirect" effect upon commerce, whether by the price or volume of goods shipped, the two cases could hardly be distinguished. If a merger designed to raise prices has only an "indirect" effect upon commerce, then so too does a cartel arrangement with that same purpose and effect.

[*1437] Yet if the distinction between the two cases is viewed in light of the underlying substantive concerns motivating the Court, then it makes perfect sense. E. C. Knight raised two questions: first, whether a preliminary step (be it merger or cartel) toward a proposed sale of goods in interstate commerce was itself part of interstate commerce; and second, even if a preliminary step was part of interstate commerce, could Congress reach it by regulating manufacture, which everyone conceded was not part of interstate commerce? Chief Justice Fuller found E. C. Knight an easy case because he was prepared to answer the second question in the negative, given his doubts about the first. Yet in Addyston Pipe the second question vanished, because the cartel arrangement reached only planned interstate sales and had no influence at all upon manufacturing. Only the first question had to be addressed. The difficult choice between necessary over- and necessary under-inclusion did not arise in Addyston. To apply the Sherman Act, it needed only to be said that preliminary agreements, designed by the parties to regulate their private sales in interstate commerce, were themselves part of interstate commerce. [158] It did not take a very inventive reading of Gibbons to say that these outward-looking contracts were not part of the purely internal commerce of the state. This refinement of E. C. Knight therefore did not challenge the view that manufacture and commerce were distinct spheres. Despite giving Congress its head in Addyston Pipe, the Court did not intrude upon the basic principle that the power to regulate commerce among the several states was only one of a list of enumerated powers. Addyston Pipe therefore hardly broke with the past. The Court reached a unanimous decision (with Fuller still Chief Justice) because the risk of excessive congressional power was not present.

The same can be said about the two other major early antitrust decisions that invoked the commerce clause. The issue in Northern Securities Co. v. United States [159] was whether Congress could reach a stock merger of two railroad lines. Congressional power was sustained by a five-four vote, with Justice Harlan writing for the Court and with Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Peckham (joined by Justices Holmes and White) in dissent. The latent disagreement [*1438] that divided the Court in E. C. Knight again came to the fore, albeit in somewhat different form. Justice Harlan's basic posture was unchanged. If a merger of gigantic manufacturing concerns was of federal concern because of its direct influence on prices, he had no reason to pause simply because the antitrust laws were applied to a transaction in shares of stock that was local in origin and governed by state law. [160] Indeed, the fact that the underlying assets were two interstate railroads could have only strengthened Justice Harlan's view that the transaction had to be reached by the antitrust laws. It was no longer necessary, after all, to tiptoe along the narrow line between manufacture and commerce, for the merger did not involve any regulation of manufacturing. If Congress could regulate the rates on interstate lines, then why should it not be able to stop the merger?

REV_00258851

The four dissenting Justices took a very different position. To them, the appropriate balance between state and federal power was as primary an issue as it had been to Chief Justice Fuller in E. C. Knight, given that the regulation of state corporate ownership, a local matter, was inseparable from the regulation of interstate transport. [161] A passage from Justice Holmes' dissent shows the interplay between two dominant motifs of the early decisions:

The point decided in [E. C. Knight] was that "the fact that trade or commerce might be indirectly affected was not enough to entitle complainants to a decree." Commerce depends upon population, but Congress could not, on that ground, undertake to regulate marriage and divorce. If the act before us is to be carried out according to what seems to me the logic of the argument for the Government, which I do not believe that it will be, I can see no part of the conduct of life with which on similar principles Congress might not interfere. [162]

In a single passage, Justice Holmes was able to merge and confuse two distinct ideas: first, that Congress could not regulate absent direct effects on interstate commerce; and second, that the federal-state balance of power under the founders' plan required that the commerce clause be given some effective limits, lest the independent powers of the states be undermined. In a sense the five-four [*1439] vote in Northern Securities is explained in that the case was a more powerful one for congressional action under the commerce power than was E. C. Knight. But the differences between the majority and dissent on the question of principle were minor, and at best Northern Securities identified the tipping point at which the interstate elements start to dominate the overall transaction.

In Swift & Co. v. United States [163] decided a year later, the consensus of Addyston Pipe reasserted itself. In Swift, the government brought an antitrust case against fresh food dealers who sought to organize bidding in livestock markets across the United States. [164] The distinction between this cartel and the one in Addyston Pipe was not worth pursuing, so Justice Holmes came out of his dissent in Northern Securities and wrote for a unanimous Court condemning this cartel for its effect on interstate commerce:

[I]t is a direct object, it is that for the sake of which the several specific acts and courses of conduct are done and adopted. Therefore the case is not like [E. C. Knight], where the subject matter of the combination was manufacture and the direct object monopoly of manufacture within a State. However likely monopoly of commerce among the States in the article manufactured was to follow from the agreement it was not a necessary consequence nor a primary end. Here the subject matter is sales and the very point of the combination is to restrain and monopolize commerce among the States in respect of such sales. [165]

Holmes's distinction between direct and indirect consequences is unpersuasive. To use a tort analogy, it was an effort to smuggle all the limitations on liability into the rules on remoteness of damages, without recognizing the independent status of the standard excuses and justifications in tort law. Imagine, to push the analogy, what tort law would look like without the defenses of consent, self-defense, contributory negligence, or assumption of risk. In tort, the consequence of this approach is to place incredible stress upon the idea of causation, with a consequent loss of analytical clarity. In constitutional law too the burden upon the idea of direct consequences was too great. What was needed was an explicit acknowledgment that the doctrine of enumerated powers played, in constitutional [*1440] discourse, a role parallel to the one that affirmative defenses play under tort law.

Whatever the weaknesses in basic theory, Swift and its predecessors articulated a set of boundary lines that was reasonably easy to apply. The Court read Swift as the decisive precedent in favor of federal power in both Stafford v. Wallace [166] and Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen. [167] In neither case was the line between manufacture and commerce tested, let alone overthrown.

REV_00258852

In Stafford, the court upheld the constitutionality of the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, [168] which regulated the middlemen who arranged the sale and shipment of cattle from the West to purchasers in the Chicago stockyards. [169] The Act gave to the Secretary of Agriculture the power to set maximum and minimum prices and to prohibit discriminatory and deceptive trade practices. [170] The Court relied heavily on an analogy to the "instrumentalities of interstate commerce":

The stockyards are not a place of rest or final destination. Thousands of head of live stock arrive daily by carload and trainload lots, and must be promptly sold and disposed of and moved out to give place to the constantly flowing traffic that presses behind. The stockyards are but a throat through which the current flows, and the transactions which occur therein are only incident to this current from the West to the East, and from one State to another. [171]

Olsen upheld the Grain Futures Act, [172] which regulated the sale of grain for future delivery on boards of trade under the rationale that manipulation of futures prices had burdened and obstructed interstate commerce. [173] Chief Justice Taft again emphasized the [*1441] link between trade in goods and the railroads. [174]

These two decisions, by involving matters ancillary to the actual shipment of goods by the railroads, clearly expanded the scope of the commerce power. General concern about fraud and manipulation (both of which are wrongs under state law) is not an obvious reason to allow federal regulation. It is possible therefore to argue that the statutes themselves were unconstitutional, despite the unanimous decisions of the Supreme Court. For the purposes of this Article, however, it is sufficient to note that nothing in either case challenged E. C. Knight's distinction between manufacture or production on the one hand, and interstate commerce on the other. As late as 1935 in Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, [175] Chief Justice Hughes wrote, in limiting the jurisdiction of Congress under the commerce clause, "The distinction between direct and indirect effects has been clearly recognized in the application of the Anti-Trust Act," and then used the distinction to strike down the National Industrial Recovery Act. [176] The next year, in Carter v. Carter Coal Co., [177] a majority of the Supreme Court struck down various provisions of the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 [178] on the ground that the commerce clause did not allow the federal government to regulate the terms of employment within the mines. [179] The Carter Court correctly distinguished Stafford as a "flow of commerce" case, in which Congress had regulated the "throat" of interstate commerce, and nothing more. [180] Elsewhere [*1442] in his majority opinion, Justice Sutherland wrote categorically that "[t]he relation of employer and employee is a local relation." [181]

E. C. Knight's basic distinction between manufacture and commerce thus held firm as late as Carter in 1936. The emerging pattern said, for example, that the Ford Motor Company did not manufacture goods in interstate commerce, but the Northern Pacific Railroad shipped them in interstate commerce. As constitutional principles go, this line was relatively clear. It is just the line that is observed today in the dormant commerce clause cases, [182] and it is as intelligible with the affirmative power cases as with the dormant power cases.

This third line of cases under the commerce clause added to congressional power, but it surely did not lead to the conclusion that Congress should have the comprehensive power to regulate the entire business of life. The Court had expanded the reach of earlier cases involving the "instrumentalities of interstate commerce." This broadened scope to the commerce power allowed Congress to regulate matters actually outside the scope of commerce in order to regulate what fell within its admitted power. But the over-breadth doctrine was applied only in cases that did not involve common carriers. And Congress' power to prohibit the shipment of certain kinds of goods in commerce was sharply, but correctly, limited by Hammer v. Dagenhart to those things noxious in themselves. [183] The totality of commerce clause jurisprudence as it emerged before the New Deal may not have been perfect; indeed it probably yielded a bit too much to federal power, at least under the power to regulate instrumentalities of commerce and the power to regulate the type of goods shipped in interstate commerce. But the set of rules was surely workable. This state of affairs was to change in the 1930's. The final Part of this Article will trace the rapid decline of the old distinctions, and will briefly note the regrettable social consequences that followed in the wake of departures from sound constitutional principle.

REV_00258853

[*1443] V. THE NEW DEAL TRANSFORMATION OF THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

The New Deal cases systematically removed each of the previous limitations on the scope of the commerce clause. This expansion of federal power was not driven by any textual necessity. Instead, it is better understood, but hardly justified, as a response to two separate but related forces. First, the 1936 Roosevelt mandate and the prospect of court packing could hardly have been lost on the Court. [184] Second, a narrow majority of the Court was in sympathy with the dominant intellectual belief of the time that national problems required national responses. The New Deal cases worked a revolution in constitutional theory as well as in textual interpretation. The original theory of the Constitution was based on the belief that government was not an unrequited good, but was at best a necessary evil. The system of enumerated powers allowed state governments to compete among themselves, thus limiting the risks of governmental abuse even absent explicit, substantive limitations on the laws that states could pass. The various limitations upon the federal power helped achieve this end. The New Deal conception, on the other hand, saw no virtue in competition, whether between states or between firms. The old barriers were stripped away; in their place has emerged the vast and unwarranted concentration of power in Congress that remains the hallmark of the modern regulatory state.

The first major case to test the traditional analysis of the commerce clause was NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., [185] which involved a challenge to the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act). [186] The Wagner Act in essence removed employers' power to hire and fire at will, instead requiring extensive collective bargaining in good faith between employers and unions if the union is approved by a majority of employees. [187] The unions were selected by a majority of workers, but had the power to bind workers who dissented. [188] Individual contracts inconsistent with the master agreement [*1444] were unenforceable, lest the union's power be undermined by dissatisfied workers. [189]

The Wagner Act was based squarely upon the commerce clause. The draftsmen sought to meet the fundamental challenge of jurisdiction by providing that federal jurisdiction extended not only to cases of "commerce" but also to cases "affecting commerce": "The term 'affecting commerce' means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce." [190]

This extended definition proves that Congress used a legal fiction to expand federal jurisdiction beyond its original grant. The commerce clause does not say "Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce, and all matters affecting commerce with foreign nations, among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." The statutory text, moreover, invited a favorable outcome on the jurisdictional question by smuggling into its expanded definition of commerce the desirable effects that the labor statute was intended to achieve. Yet there was no real evidence that local regulation of employment markets was incapable of achieving desired economic goals. It was only the distinct New Deal bias for worker monopolies protected by explicit barriers to entry (here, against rival workers who would work for less) that could have led to the conclusion that the Wagner Act would improve the free flow of commerce. How cartelization of labor markets would remove barriers or obstructions to interstate commerce has never been explained. Labor cartelization generally raises the level of wages and reduces the quantity of goods produced. When a cartel is legally protected against new entrants into its market, the new entrants are no longer able to take advantage of the price "umbrella" that an unregulated cartel necessarily creates for enterprising rivals. The Wagner Act surely had an effect on commerce, and that effect was negative.

REV_00258854

A system of limited government keeps local governments in competition with each other. This sensible institutional arrangement was wholly undermined by Congress' decision, in the teeth of the commerce clause, to subject all employment markets to nationally [*1445] uniform regulation. As in the case of child labor laws, the power of states to impose collective bargaining requirements on firms is effectively limited by the ability of old firms to leave the state and of new ones not to enter it. Also, since domestic firms can escape whatever misguided tariff barriers may be thrown up against international suppliers of goods and services, the level of state regulation is effectively curtailed, and the volume of goods and services in commerce increases.

The transformation in legislative and judicial thinking about the commerce clause is revealed by the reversal in substantive outcomes. Gibbons v. Ogden ensured free trade by overturning a state-granted legal monopoly. [191] The Sherman Act cases were also directed against private monopolies -- a lesser peril -- which were seen improperly as "regulating" interstate commerce. [192] Both Gibbons and the Sherman Act cases were attempts to facilitate free trade in open markets -- one at the constitutional, the other at the statutory, level. With the later expansion of congressional jurisdiction by such laws as the Transportation Act of 1920, however, the commerce clause became an instrument to suppress competition, rather than one to further it. [193] It is only if one thinks that government can neutrally determine when there is too much competition as well as when there is too little that the broader interpretation of the commerce power becomes plausible. And it is clear that the New Deal thinkers thought they understood the vices of competition. [194]

It is always, however, a precarious venture for judges to make independent normative judgments about the desirability of certain social arrangements when passing on the constitutionality of certain acts. In a sense, the task of interpretation should depend, as Chief Justice Marshall did in Gibbons v. Ogden, on the natural and ordinary sense of the word. [195] The approach also leads, however, to [*1446] the conclusion that the Wagner Act goes beyond the scope of the commerce clause under the authority of E. C. Knight and, most notably, Carter. [196] The three decisions of the United States Courts of Appeals that passed upon the Wagner Act declared it unconstitutional by applying the precedents mechanically. [197] Recall that the hard question in E. C. Knight was whether prospective restraints of trade in interstate markets could justify an intrusion into manufacture, an area normally regulated by the states. Jones & Laughlin, of course, involved no effort to monopolize an interstate market. Quite the opposite; the contracts at issue concerned only matters of local employment which, as the Court's opinion in Carter had confirmed, had never been thought a federal matter under any prior conception of the commerce clause. [198]

To respond to this difficulty, the Court in Jones & Laughlin resurrected the losing argument of Carter -- that anything which had a substantial effect upon interstate commerce could be regulated regardless of its source. [199] In so doing, the Court in effect borrowed the language of those cases concerned with the instrumentalities of interstate commerce [200] and applied it generally, as if the original subject-matter restriction had not been integral to the earlier decisions. Manufacture was no longer distinguishable from commerce, because the manufacturing process involved "a great movement of iron ore, coal and limestone along well-defined paths to the steel mills, thence through them, and thence in the form of steel products into the consuming centers of the country -- a definite and well-understood course of business." [201]

REV_00258855

To be sure, Chief Justice Hughes acknowledged in Jones & Laughlin that some "internal concerns" of the state remained [*1447] outside the power of Congress to regulate. [202] But it was all lip service; the companion cases to Jones & Laughlin showed that the "internal concerns of a state" had become an empty vessel. NLRB v. Fruehauf Co. applied the Wagner Act to a manufacturer of commercial trailers that obtained more than fifty percent of its material out of state and sold eighty percent of its output to out-of-state customers. [203] NLRB v. Friedman-Harry Marks Clothing Co. used the same logic, applying the statute to a clothing manufacturer that purchased most of its raw cloth out of state, and sold a majority of its finished garments there as well. [204] The commerce clause was thus hardly limited to the integrated multistate firms like Jones & Laughlin. And beneath the legal analysis lay the ultimate policy reason for the decisions: Congress and the NLRB believed that industry-wide unionizations could not succeed without federal assistance, and the Court accepted this belief, and the desirability of the substantive conclusion, at face value. [205]

The cases that followed Jones & Laughlin continued to sustain the power of the federal government to regulate interstate commerce expansively, on the ground that any competition among states necessarily restricted the scope of government action. The government's argument in United States v. Darby [206] in defense of the Fair Labor Standards Act (FLSA), [207] for example, was essentially identical to that made unsucessfully a generation before in [*1448] Hammer v. Dagenhart:

No State, acting alone, could require labor standards substantially higher than those obtaining in other States whose producers and manufacturers competed in the interstate market. Employers with lower labor standards possess an unfair advantage in interstate competition, and only the national government can deal with the problem. [208]

The Court's unanimous decision upholding the FLSA accepted the substantive case for the statute at face value, and regarded the FLSA as essentially public interest rather than interest-group legislation. [209] Arguments in favor of Hammer's limits on federal power were curtly dismissed: "The motive and purpose of a regulation of interstate commerce are matters for the legislative judgment upon the exercise of which the Constitution places no restriction and over which the courts are given no control." [210]

There remained only the question whether federal power extended to those goods of local manufacture which were not shipped in interstate commerce. In this regard Justice Stone cited the Shreveport Rate Case to support the proposition that a "familiar like exercise of power is the regulation of intrastate transactions which are so commingled with or related to interstate commerce that all must be regulated if the interstate commerce is to be effectively controlled." [211] Justice Stone omitted any reference to the desire to fight local discrimination against interstate commerce that was so critical to the earlier decision, or to any recognition that the Shreveport Rate Case did not apply to all "intrastate transactions" but only to the "instrumentalities" of interstate commerce -- in particular to interstate railroad operations. [212] Nor did Justice Stone acknowledge that the Shreveport Rate Case never challenged the distinction between commerce and manufacture defended in E. C. Knight. Justice Holmes in his Hammer dissent defending federal authority still recognized that some manufacture [*1449] was part of the purely internal commerce of the state. [213] Yet such was the strength of the federal tide that Justice Stone abandoned that vestige of state autonomy in Darby. [214] The question of state autonomy, so critical to E. C. Knight, also received back-of-the-hand treatment in Darby; the Court brushed aside the tenth amendment, and the principle of enumerated powers that it articulated, as "but a truism that all is retained which has not been surrendered." [215]

REV_00258856

Justice Stone's cavalier treatment of jurisdictional objections to the FLSA resulted from his powerful belief in the soundness of the basic social legislation involved. [216] To him, the suppression of "unfair" competition from exploited labor was the dominant "evil" the FLSA attacked. [217] The possibility that the minimum wage law could be a barrier to the entry of unskilled labor into the labor market, and hence the very evil to be avoided, was never assessed. What failed in Darby was not the language of the Constitution, but the willingness of the Justices to accept the theory of limited government upon which it rested.

The same failure was repeated in cases that sustained the powerful system of agricultural price supports and acreage restrictions that was introduced by the New Deal. The question in United States v. Wrightwood Dairy [218] was whether Congress could authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to set minimum prices for milk that was produced and consumed within a single state. The usual language which spoke of a transaction "which directly burdens, obstructs, or affects, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof," was duly set out in the statutory language. [219] Ironically, the anticompetitive effect of federal interstate milk regulation became the justification for a further expansion of federal power:

As the court below recognized, and as seems not to be disputed, the marketing of intrastate milk which competes with that shipped [*1450] interstate would tend seriously to break down price regulation of the latter. Under the conditions prevailing in the milk industry, as the record shows, the unregulated sale of the intrastate milk tends to reduce the sales price received by handlers and the amount which they in turn pay to producers." [220]

Even after Wrightwood plugged the loophole of intrastate sales, another obstacle remained to comprehensive federal agricultural regulation. Farmers could still influence the price of agricultural products in interstate commerce simply by keeping and using them on their own farms. The scope of agricultural regulation expanded to meet this challenge. Wickard v. Filburn [221] upheld the statutory authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to limit the consumption of wheat on the very farms that grew it. Here there was no sale transaction at all, but this did not matter to the Court. The government's ability to maintain artificially high regulated prices for goods shipped across interstate lines would surely have been compromised if local consumption had been allowed to expand supply to meet demand. The economic interdependence of the various activities was held to preclude any watertight division between production and commerce. [222] The Court regarded the distinction between direct and indirect effects on interstate commerce as quite beside the point (as indeed it was), and the entire issue of enumerated powers and state autonomy disappeared from view. [223] Once the Court decided to ignore the limitations of the Shreveport Rate Case, [224] it saw Wickard as a natural extention of the Shreveport Rate Case doctrine. This is just the approach that Justice Jackson took:

The opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes found federal intervention constitutionally authorized because of "matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance. [225]

[*1451] Carefully excised from the quotation was the beginning of Justice Hughes's sentence: "[Congress'] authority, extending to these interstate carriers as instruments of interstate commerce, necessarily embraces the right to control their operations in all matters . . . ." [226] This excision, doubtless deliberate, completed the transformation of the commerce clause.

The question then arises as to how is it possible to stand a clause of the Constitution upon its head. I do not think that the explanation comes from any vagueness in the language of the commerce clause. [227] If a Court innocent of political theory or of any predeliction on the merits of the underlying legislation approached a commerce case, it could not possibly parse the words of the clause so as to reach the extravagant interpretations of federal power accepted in Jones & Laughlin, Darby, Wrightwood, and Wickard. Could anyone say with a straight face that the consumption of home-grown wheat is "commerce among the several states?" A powerful principle must have led to so fanciful a conclusion. That principle has to go to the idea of what kind of government and social organization is thought to be just and proper for society at large.

REV_00258857

I have no doubt that the Justices of the Supreme Court who forged so powerful a doctrine had such a conception in mind. At one level they rejected the idea of limited federal government and decentralized power. That idea only made sense if there was a risk that governments could misbehave. If it was thought that they always acted in the public interest, then any effort to deny them substantive power would have hobbled the forces of virtue and enhanced those of wickedness. It is noticeable that all the key New Deal commerce clause opinions took the substantive findings of Congress at face value. None was prepared to identify the powerful interest group politics that were so evident in both the labor and agricultural cases -- the very policy areas in which the commerce clause reached its present scope. Once government is thought to be the source of risk, however, then competition between governments makes sense, and there is good reason to uphold the ideas of limited [*1452] government and enumerated federal powers that were part of the original design. The New Deal's change in attitude toward the commerce clause thus depended upon a radical reorientation of judicial views toward the role of government that in the end overwhelmed the relatively clean lines of the commerce clause.

In addition, the key federal laws of the New Deal cartelized either labor or product markets that would otherwise have been highly competitive absent government regulation. [228] Indeed, there were substantive challenges to each of these laws, usually under the due process clause. [229] These developments were not unrelated, for jurisdictional limitations upon the power of Congress only made sense if there was reason to think that use of the power would have been harmful. Yet once the idea that markets performed useful functions was cast aside, the jurisdictional limitations ceased to make any sense. The war cry became a call for Congress to act because, in an age of economic interdependence, national problems demanded national solutions. [230]

Yet the point about economic interdependence mistakes the disease for the cure. It is precisely because markets are interdependent that there is reason to fear comprehensive federal regulation. [231] Competitive markets are the best way to allocate scarce [*1453] goods and services. They promise to bring price into line with the marginal cost of production, and they hold out some hope that all the possible gains from trade will be achieved by voluntary transactions. Markets are not just a good in themselves. They are powerful instruments for human happiness and well-being.

Legal monopolies have precisely the opposite effect. They raise price above marginal cost and they prevent many voluntary transactions from taking place, so that the total social output is reduced by the deadweight loss that they cause. Worse still, the ability to obtain legal protection against competition invites individuals and groups to spend valuable resources in order to obtain (or resist obtaining) economic rents. [232] Even though no market is an ideal competitive market, there is absolutely no reason to impose economic regulations, such as minimum price laws or cartelization of labor markets, whose only effect is to drive quantity and price further from the competitive equilibrium. When viewed from this perspective, the Wagner Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, and the Agricultural Marketing Acts appear to be long-standing social disasters that could not long have survived with their present vigor solely at the state level.

There is a dangerous tendency to assume that competitive injury and physical injury form part of a seamless web, so that the power to regulate the one necessarily confers the government. The second class was designed to protect individual rights against wrongdoing by government. The two types of provisions are in some sense parts of an integral strategy to ensure that the government, state or federal, does not become the enemy of the very people whom it is organized to protect. But the provisions work in very different ways, and their proper construction proceeds along rather different paths.

In considering guaranties of individual rights, we address the highest ends of government and civilization. Generally it is possible to look to the common law, to a rich political theory, and to a long political tradition in order to gather hints about what these provisions mean and how they should function. The framers understood the protection of speech, contract, and property as ends good in themselves, as rights so "natural" and ends so clear that they did not receive the intellectual justification they so desperately needed -- and still need. In reading these provisions, we can draw upon a large body of materials to guide our interpretation: Hobbes, Locke, Hume, Montesquieu, and a host of lesser, but still able, writers. [6] The differences that emerge in dealing with these questions are often attributable to the richness and the centrality of their subject, not to the want of speculation about them.

Provisions that go to the question of jurisdiction are no less important to sound governance than those that govern individual rights. Yet jurisdictional principles have a very different intellectual pedigree. Jurisdiction is not part of ordinary moral discourse, or of our common understanding of right and wrong. Instead, jurisdiction is always regarded as a means towards an end rather than as an end in itself. Hamilton treated jurisdiction as a more effective guarantor of individual rights than a bill of rights, because he believed that it provided clear and powerful lines to keep government from straying beyond its appointed limits. [7] Hamilton's judgment [*1391] was, I think, wrong to the extent that it relied on jurisdictional provisions as the sole limit to government power. [8] But it contained a fair measure of good sense in using jurisdictional limitations as an important, indeed indispensable, limitation upon government power.

The difficulty lies in construing jurisdictional provisions to achieve this political end. Here there is no comparable tradition of political philosophy upon which to draw. The classical writers who extolled the virtues of liberty and property did not have the practical experience of the founders in forming governments. The great debates over the social contract always asked the question of how individuals in a state of nature could enter into a social contract for their mutual advantage. They never considered the possibility that in practice social contract theory would be tested in a world in which it was hardly clear whether Sovereign States or ordinary persons were the contracting parties. It is hardly surprising therefore that the classical writers never addressed federalism, enumerated [*1392] powers, and jurisdiction, even though these form fundamental features of our constitutional system. [9]

We must, therefore, examine this question in an artificial world devoid of theories of natural rights. We must take our cue from more immediate, technical considerations. Or so it seems. Appearances are deceiving, however, and I shall argue throughout this Article that the reasons for the expansion of the commerce clause were strongly substantive. The rationale for limited government became obscure in an age when the Progressive tradition of good government came to dominate American intellectual life. [10] Judges who were persuaded that national solutions were needed for national problems could hardly be expected to invoke the commerce clause as a barrier to federal action when they believed in the importance of popular democracy, the soundness of the underlying legislation, the need for national uniformity, or all three. A judge's view of the commerce clause might be very different, however, if the perils of collective choice and the wisdom of the underlying substantive legislation were called into question. A court which shared the framers' view of government as a necessary evil could, if it so chose, put more teeth into the commerce clause than has existing case law.

Cases from both the Progressive Era and the New Deal showed a close fusion between issues authority to regulate the other. It is as though the power to protect interstate commerce against robbers and thieves [233] is sufficient warrant for the far more extensive social controls that treat competitive activities undertaken within different states, when the social consequences of violence and competition are so radically different. [234] The ability to conceive of competitive injury as a justification for the exercise of federal power lies at the root of all the modern commerce clause [*1454] decisions. The ability to perceive the essential difference between violence and competition is all that is needed to respect the limitation on federal power that is implicit in the commerce clause.

REV_00258832

VI. CONCLUSION

I thus return to my original theme: Although questions of jurisdiction and substantive rights appear to be distinct, the unfortunate history of decisionmaking under the commerce clause shows how unbreakable is the link between them. The very distinction between violence and competitive harm that is necessary for organizing the private and public substantive law is critical to an understanding of the proper principles of federal jurisdiction. Hamilton may not have had it all correct when he said that sound limitations on government jurisdiction obviated the need for a bill of rights. [235] But he was surely correct when he said that the maintenance of those jurisdictional limitations is one essential bulwark to sound constitutional government. [236]

The problem of sovereignty remains: How do the people compel the holders of governmental monopoly power to act as though they could only obtain a competitive return for their services? [237] Federalism facilitates a solution by allowing easy exit, as well as by allowing voice. National regulation prevents unhealthy types of competition among jurisdictions, such as were present in Gibbons. Under this view, the old construction of the commerce clause makes sense; it facilitates national markets by preventing state balkanization. This was the achievement of Gibbons. The great peril of national regulation is that it may be taken too far, to impose national uniformity which frustrates, rather than facilitates markets. This was the New Deal. I cannot help thinking that a sound view of the commerce clause is one that returns to Gibbons. The affirmative scope of the commerce power should be limited to those matters that today are governed by the dormant commerce clause: interstate transportation, navigation and sales, and the activities closely incident to them. All else should be left to the states.

I realize that this conclusion seems radical because of the way [*1455] the clock has turned. One is hesitant to require dismantling of large portions of the modern federal government, given the enormous reliance interests that have been created. And I do not have, nor do I know of anyone who has, a good theory that explains when it is appropriate to correct past errors that have become embedded in the legal system. It is far easier to keep power from the hands of government officials than it is to wrest it back from them once it has been conferred. We had our chance with the commerce clause, and we have lost it.

Still, the argument from principle seems clear enough, even if one is left at a loss as to what should be done about it. And in a sense that is just the point. Congress and the courts can proceed merrily on their way if they are convinced that the basis for an extensive federal commerce power is rooted firmly in the original constitutional text or structure. But uneasiness necessarily creeps into the legislative picture if, as I have argued, the commerce clause is far narrower in scope than modern courts have held. There is a powerful tension between the legacy of the past fifty years and the original constitutional understanding. It is a tension that we must face, even if we cannot resolve it.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

n2 More accurately, the inquiry might be stated: How should the grant to Congress be understood when the commerce clause is construed in light of the necessary and proper clause? See infra notes 22-28 and accompanying text.

n3 This theme of limited and enumerated powers was central to the distinction between a federal and national government. It is evident on the face of article I, which begins with the words "All legislative powers herein granted" (without specifying who the grantor was), and it was reiterated in all the ratification debates. See, e.g., 2 The Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 435-36, 454, 540 (J. Elliot 2d ed. 1836) (dialogue of Wilson and McKean); 3 id. at 95, 246, 444, 553 (dialogue of Madison, Nicholas, and Marshall); 4 id. at 147-49, 259-60 (dialogue of Iredell and Pinckney).

n4 See, D. Hume, Of Commerce (1752), reprinted in Essays: Moral, Political, and Literary 252, 263-64 (Liberty Classics ed. 1985). Hume's basic theory was that nations that tolerate foreign commerce are able to realize gains from trade that permit them to accumulate greater wealth, and to achieve greater prosperity and political stability, than those that rely upon domestic manufacture and agriculture alone. Hume's essay mixes historical example with analytical propositions in a style that anticipates the Federalist.

n5 The Federalist No. 11 (A. Hamilton) ("Concerning Commerce and a Navy"). The opposition between commerce on the one hand, and agriculture and manufacture on the other, seems clear enough. Thus in speaking of the control over foreign commerce, Hamilton wrote:

By prohibitory regulations, extending, at the same Time throughout the States, we may oblige foreign countries to bid against each other, for the privileges of our markets. This assertion will not appear chimerical to those who are able to appreciate the importance of the markets of three millions of people -- increasing in rapid progression, for the most part exclusively addicted to agriculture, and likely from local circumstances to remain so -- to any manufacturing nation.
Id. at 63 (Modern Library College ed. 1937).

n6 See, e.g, T. Hobbes, Leviathan (Everyman's Library ed. 1950) (1651); D. Hume, supra note 4; J. Locke, An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (R. Wilburn ed. 1947) (1689); Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws (T. Nugent trans. 1949) (1748).

n7 The Federalist No. 84 (A. Hamilton). Hamilton continued:

I go further, and affirm that bills of rights . . . are not only unnecessary in the proposed Constitution, but would even be dangerous. They would contain various exceptions to powers not granted; and, on this very account, would afford a colorable pretext to claim more than were granted. For why declare that things shall not be done which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?
Id. at 559 (Modern Library College ed. 1937). Hamilton's argument presupposes that the doctrine of enumerated powers places substantial limitations upon all grants of power to the federal government, including those under the commerce power.

n8 Thus Hamilton thought that the principle of freedom of speech could not protect the press from arbitrary taxation:

It cannot certainly be pretended that any degree of duties, however low, would be an abridgment of the liberty of the press. . . . And if duties of any kind may be laid without a violation of that liberty, it is evident that the extent must depend on legislative discretion, regulated by public opinion; so that, after all, general declarations respecting the liberty of the press, will give it no greater security than it will have without them.
Id. at 560 n.

REV_00258860

Hamilton was clearly wrong on this issue. It may not be possible to use the first amendment to insist that the press be free of all general taxes, but it is possible to limit the nature of the taxes that are imposed, so that special taxes placed upon the press, but not other industries, are prohibited, or that special taxes placed on some portions of the press, but not others, are prohibited. Courts have intervened to prevent disproportionate taxation when public opinion has failed to do so. See, e.g., Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 U.S. 575 (1983); Grosjean v. American Press Co., 297 U.S. 233 (1936). Grosjean has had little development because its holding was clear enough to stop most forms of abusive taxes in their tracks.

n9 Some sense of the twist of history is found in Patrick Henry's speech in opposition to the ratification of the Constitution in the Virginia debates:

[W]hat right had they to say, We, the People? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask, who authorized them to speak the language of, We, the People instead of We, the States? States are the characterisitics, and the soul of a confederation. If the states be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated National Government of the people of all the States.

H. Storing, What the Antifederalists Were For 12 (1981) (quoting Henry). Henry was a better prophet than even his supporters would have allowed at the time. Storing rightly notes that the Anti-Federalists were on their strongest ground when they used a principle of ratification that put the Constitution into effect, at least as between the parties, when nine states ratified it. Under the Articles of the Confederation, each state had a blocking position against the changes, and Rhode Island had not bothered to send a delegate to the Philadelphia Convention.

n10 See A. Ekirch, Progressivism in America: A Study of the Era from Theodore Roosevelt to Woodrow Wilson (1974).

n11 It is no coincidence, for example, that West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379 (1937) (upholding minimum wage law for women), was decided in the same term as NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1 (1937), discussed infra notes 185-202 and accompanying text.

n12 See, e.g., Cohen, The Inevitable Constitutional Revolution of 1937 (speech to the AALS Constitutional Law Meeting, Washington, D.C., Oct. 8, 1987), written in response to my short paper, R. Epstein, Why the Revolution of 1937 Was a Mistake. Cohen places heavy reliance upon the Roosevelt landslide of 1936 as justification for the expanded construction of the commerce clause.

n13 U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

n14 Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 189 (1824). Chief Justice Marshall continued:

Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive of a system for regulating commerce between nations, which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals, in the actual employment of buying and selling, or of barter.
Id. at 189-90. Chief Justice Marshall may well have borrowed the term "intercourse" from Hamilton, who in speaking of "The importance of the Union, in a commercial light," also spoke of "our intercourse with foreign countries as well as with each other." The Federalist No. 11, at 62 (A. Hamilton) (Modern Library College ed. 1937). Note too that in The Federalist No. 11, Hamilton repeatedly stressed that navigation was comprehended in commerce, the very point that Chief Justice Marshall had emphasized in his decision.

REV_00258861

n15 This point was stressed by Hamilton in The Federalist No. 11, as in the sentence quoted supra note 5. For those of us who believe in free trade, the powers given Congress seem far too broad, as the debates over the current protectionist trade bills reveal. See also Kitch, Regulation and the American Common Market, in Regulation, Federalism, and Interstate Commerce 16, 51 (A. Tarlock ed. 1981).

n16 U.S. Const. art. I, § 9.

n17 Id. preamble.

n18 See id. art. VII.

n19 317 U.S. 111 (1942). For further elaboration, see infra notes 221-26 and accompanying text.

n20 See S. Morrison, H. Commager & W. Leutchenburg, A Concise History of the American Republic 188-91 (1977).

n21 See, for one illustration of this escape, a superb new casebook:

The Civil War and its aftermath inaugurated an era in which Congress began to act more vigorously. The very success of the national economy created problems. The economy became obviously interconnected; problems were no longer localized, so that it became difficult to imagine a purely internal commerce that affected no other states.

G. Stone, L. Seidman, C. Sunstein & M. Tushnet, Constitutional Law 138 (1986).

n22 U.S. Const. art. I, § 8.

n23 See infra notes 83-88 and accompanying text.

n24 See The Federalist No. 33, in which Hamilton gives a relatively narrow reading of the necessary and proper clause, when he tries to allay the fear that the necessary and proper clause will allow the national government to run roughshod over the states:

But SUSPICION may ask, Why then was it introduced? The answer is, that it could only have been done for greater caution, and to guard against all cavilling refinements in those who might hereafter feel a disposition to curtail and evade the legitimate authorities of the Union. The Federalist No. 33, at 200 (A. Hamilton) (Modern Library College ed. 1937). In the subsequent dispute over the clause in connection with the creation of a national bank, Hamilton gave a broader interpretation, similar to that put forward by Chief Justice Marshall. See D. Currie, The Constitution in the Supreme Court: The First Hundred Years, 1789-1888, at 160-69.

n25 McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 421 (1819).

n26 Id. at 406.

n27 Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 187 (1824). Note too that Chief Justice Marshall addressed the necessary and proper clause in order to show that it does not require a rule of strict construction.

n28 Thus Professor Tribe gives but one brief connection between the two clauses, where they are discussed in connection with the so-called protective principle, which allows Congress to reach matters outside the scope of the commerce clause in order to govern those matters that fall within it. See L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law § 5-7, at 240 (1978). The threat this principle poses to the doctrine of enumerated powers is ignored by Professor Tribe, but is discussed herein. See infra notes 69-73 and accompanying text.

REV_00258862

n29 See, e.g., L. Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-4, at 232-35.

n30 See id.

n31 156 U.S. 1 (1895).

n32 L. Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-4, at 234-35. He continued: "But with its watershed decision in NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp. [301 U.S. 1 (1937)], the Court acceded to political pressure and to its own sense of its doctrine's irrelevance and manipulability, abandoning the formally analytical approach to the commerce clause, and returning to Chief Justice Marshall's original empiricism." Id. at 235. Professor Tribe was not the first to develop this line of thought. It was documented in great detail in Stern, The Commerce Clause and the National Economy 1933-1946, 59 Harv. L. Rev. 645 (1946), a highly readable and happily partisan defense of the New Deal decisions written by a member of the Solicitor General's office, who had participated actively on the government's side.

n33 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1 (1824).

n34 See Chief Justice Marshall's discussion in McCulloch, where his famous phrase, "we must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding," was designed to show only the opposition between a document which spoke in great outlines and the detailed positions of, say, a commercial code. McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 407 (1819). See also his dissent in Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 213 (1827) (Marshall, C.J., dissenting), where his argument for the prospective application of the contract clause rested in part on his vision that individuals preserve in civil society the rights to contract that they have in the state of nature. Id. at 345-49. Chief Justice Marshall also wrote:

In framing an instrument, which was intended to be perpetual, the presumption is strong, that every important principle introduced into it is intended to be perpetual also; that a principle expressed in terms to operate in all future time, is intended so to operate. But if the construction for which the plaintiff's counsel contend be the true one [i.e. retroactive legislation only], the constitution will have imposed a restriction in language indicating perpetuity, which every State in the Union may elude at pleasure. The obligation of contracts in force, at any given time, is but of short duration; and, if the inhibition be of retroactive laws only, a very short lapse of time will remove every subject on which the act is forbidden to operate, and make this provision of the constitution so far useless.
Id. at 355.

It is at least a little ironic that Chief Justice Hughes refers to the Chief Justice Marshall of McCulloch in Home Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Blaisdell, 290 U.S. 398, 442-43 (1934), while ignoring the Chief Justice Marshall of Ogden.

I have given a modified defense of Chief Justice Marshall's position in Epstein, Toward a Revitalization of the Commerce Clause, 51 U. Chi. L. Rev. 703, 723-30 (1984). For criticism, see Kmiec & McGinnis, The Contract Clause: A Return to the Original Understanding, 14 Hastings Const. L.Q. 525, 557-59 (1987).

n35 Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 1, 1-2 (1824). Ogden was the assignee of the original franchisees, Robert Livingston and Robert Fulton.

n36 Id. at 4-5 (argument of Daniel Webster for appellant).

n37 Also at issue was whether the exclusive franchise was an impairment of contract by the state of New York. The conclusion that it was would seem quite plausible if the contracts clause was given the prospective interpretation that Chief Justice Marshall urged three years after Gibbons. See Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 213, 354-56 (1827) (Marshall, C.J., dissenting). But Chief Justice Marshall was in dissent in Saunders and the interpretation was lost. One might also note that Gibbons involved the conversion of public property (to which access is open and equal) to private property. It was a taking, albeit of public and not private property. The public trust issue surfaced in Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. 507, 572-573 (N.Y. 1812), in which New York Chief Justice Kent brushed aside the argument there was an impropriety in the grant under state law doctrine. On the vexing use of the public trust doctrine, see Illinois Central R.R. v. Illinois, 146 U.S. 387 (1892); Rose, The Comedy of the Commons: Custom, Commerce and Inherently Public Property, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 711 (1986); Sax, The Public Trust Doctrine in Natural Resource Law: Effective Judicial Intervention, 68 Mich. L. Rev. 471 (1970). For my views, see Epstein, The Public Trust Doctrine, 7 Cato J. (forthcoming 1987).

REV_00258863

n38 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 190-91, 213-17.

n39 L. Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-4, at 232 (footnotes omitted).

n40 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 195 (emphasis added).

n41 Id. Stern used the same selective powers of quotation, stating that "the Commerce Clause comprehended 'that commerce which concerns more states than one.'" Stern, supra note 32, at 648 (quoting Gibbons, 22 U.S. at 194-95). He then dropped the rest of the material quoted above and continued with the remainder of the passage, beginning "[t]he genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the states generally." Id. The passage reads more broadly without the omitted language.

n42 Marshall emphasized this point elsewhere in Gibbons:

But, in regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power, if it could not pass those lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations, is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate in it. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction, pass through the interior of almost every State in the Union, and furnish the means of exercising this right.
Gibbons, 22 U.S. at 195. Note that Marshall assigned to commerce a uniform meaning with regard both to commerce with foreign nations and to that among the several states.

n43 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 196.

n44 Id. at 197.

n45 Chief Justice Marshall wrote:

What do gentlemen mean, by a strict construction? If they contend only against that enlarged construction, which would extend words beyond their natural and obvious import, we might question the application of the term, but should not controvert the principle. If they contend for that narrow construction which, in support of some theory not to be found in the constitution, would deny to the government those powers which the words of the grant, as usually understood, import, and which are consistent with the general views and objects of the instrument; for that narrow construction, which would cripple the government, and render it unequal to the objects for which it is declared to be instituted, and to which the powers given, as fairly understood, render it competent; then we cannot perceive the propriety of this strict construction, nor adopt it as the rule by which the constitution is to be expounded.

REV_00258864

Id. at 188.

n46 Farnsworth writes: "An especially common rule of construction is that if language supplied by one party is reasonably susceptible to two interpretations, one of which favors each party, the one that is less favorable to the party who supplied the language is preferred." E. Farnsworth, Contracts § 7.11, at 499 (1982). The rule is widely used with standard form contracts, and even beyond them. Its major cost is that it biases the way in which the original documents are drafted, rendering them more complicated and less clear than they would under a rule of ordinary and natural meaning, without the presumption.

n47 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 187; see supra notes 22-28 for a discussion of the clause.

n48 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 194.

n49 9 Johns. 506 (N.Y. 1812).

n50 New York Chief Justice Kent wrote:

Our turnpike roads, our toll-bridges, the exclusive grant to run stage-wagons, our laws relating to paupers from other states, our Sunday laws, our rights of ferriage over navigable rivers and lakes, our auction licenses, our licences to retail spiritous liquors, the laws to restrain hawkers and pedlars; what are all these provisions but regulations of internal commerce, affecting as well the intercourse between the citizens of this and other states, as between our own citizens.
Id. at 579.

n51 See Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 203.

n52 Id.

n53 United States v. E.C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 12 (1895).

n54 One new casebook states: "Under the formal approach, the Court examines the statute and the regulated activity to determine whether certain objective criteria are satisfied. . . . In contrast, the realist approach attempts to determine the actual economic impact of the regulation or the actual motivation of Congress." G. Stone, L. Seidman, C. Sunstein & M. Tushnet, supra note 21, at 139.

n55 Robert Addie & Sons (Collieries), Ltd. v. Dumbreck, 1929 App. Cas. 358, 371 (H.L.). The passage continues:

When you come to the facts it may well be that there is great difficulty -- such difficulty as may give rise to difference of judicial opinion -- in deciding into which category a particular case falls, but a judge must decide and, having decided, then the law of that category will rule and there must be no looking to the law of the adjoining category. I cannot help thinking that the use of epithets, "bare licensees," "pure trespassers" and so on, has much to answer for in obscuring what I think is a vital proposition; that, in deciding cases of the class we are considering, the first duty of the tribunal is to fix once and for all into which of the three classes the person in question falls.
Id. at 371-72.

n56 The key case is still Rowland v. Christian, 69 Cal.2d 108, 443 P.2d 561, 70 Cal. Rptr. 97 (1968). Rowland was in a sense wholly gratuitous, as recovery could have been awarded under the traditional view holding hosts responsible for latent defects causing harm under ordinary usage. See id. at 115, 443 P.2d at 566, 70 Cal. Rptr. at 102. For a criticism of the modern tendency of balancing in the tort area, see Epstein, The Risks of Risk/Utility, 47 Ohio n57 312 U.S. 100 (1941); see discussion infra notes 206-17 and accompanying text. Note too that Darby's view of the clause makes hash of the reserved powers clause of the tenth amendment. If jurisdiction under the commerce clause is both plenary and unlimited, then there is nothing left to reserve. The tenth amendment thus really becomes a truism. Yet the amendment sharply confirms that the federal government has only delegated powers: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." U.S. Const. amend. X. Why bother with the amendment if Darby is correct? By contrast, the tenth amendment makes good sense if Chief Justice Marshall's view in Gibbons is followed.

REV_00258865

St. L.J. (forthcoming 1987).

n58 317 U.S. 111 (1942); see discussion infra notes 221-27 and accompanying text.

n59 Id. at 120. Justice Jackson went on to note that Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons warned that "effective restraints on its exercise must proceed from political rather than from judicial processes." Id. The passage in Gibbons reads in full:

The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely, in all representative governments.

The power of Congress, then, comprehends navigation, within the limits of every State in the Union; so far as that navigation may be, in any manner, connected with "commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with the Indian tribes." It may, of consequence, pass the jurisdictional line of New-York, and act upon the very waters to which the prohibition now under consideration applies.
Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 197. Justice Jackson thus confused two points. First, the need for political decisions for matters properly within the scope of the commerce powers, and, second, the scope of the clause itself. The latter was only held to "comprehend navigation" in New York waters, not all productive activities within the state.

n60 Justice Johnson wrote:

The power of a sovereign state over commerce, therefore, amounts to nothing more than a power to limit and restrain it at pleasure. And since the power to prescribe the limits to its freedom, necessarily implies the power to determine what shall remain unrestrained, it follows, that the power must be exclusive; it can reside but in one potentate; and hence, the grant of this power carries with it the whole subject, leaving nothing for the State to act upon.

It is impossible, with the views which I entertain of the principle on which the commercial privileges of the people of the United States, among themselves, rests, to concur in the view which this Court takes of the effect of the coasting license in this cause. I do not regard it as the foundation of the right set up in behalf of the appellant. . . . And I cannot overcome the conviction, that if the licensing act was repealed to-morrow, the rights of the appellant to a reversal of the decision complained of, would be as strong as it is under this license.
Gibbons, 22 U.S. at 227-32 (Johnson, J., concurring).

n61 It is strange to think of how little the commerce power moved in the decades that followed Gibbons. Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 53 U.S. (12 How.) 299 (1851), stood for the principle that the federal jurisdiction under the commerce clause comes in two parts. For those matters, such as pilotage in local waters, that fall within interstate commerce but that are of great local concern as well, the federal and state jurisdictions are concurrent. Id. at 319-20. For those matters for which there should be a uniform rule, the power of Congress is exclusive. Id. at 319. This delicate compromise is somewhat tricky to reconcile with the constitutional text, even if greater feats of legerdemain have been done in the name of constitutional construction. The power granted by the commerce clause seems to be unitary for all objects that fall within it; how then can federal jurisdiction be exclusive for some areas and concurrent for others?

REV_00258866

Nonetheless the Cooley solution does have a structural sense that makes it more durable than might appear at first blush. Local conditions easily could demand separate treatments, which do not threaten interstate commerce in the same way as did the New York statute at issue in Gibbons. Local practices shown to discriminate against outsiders could be addressed by the privileges and immunities clause of the Constitution, and arguably by other substantive provisions as well. U.S. Const. art. IV, § 2, cl. 1 n62 In analyzing this division, I do not discuss in depth United States v. Coombs, 37 U.S. (13 Pet.) 71 (1838), which upheld the constitutionality of a statute that imposed criminal penalties against "any person who shall plunder, steal or destroy any money, goods," etc. from a ship under the admirality jurisdiction of the United States. Justice Story sustained the constitutionality of that statute, writing that the commerce clause "extends to such acts, done on land, which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation with foreign nations and among the states." Id. at 78. Note that there are actions outside of interstate commerce that have evident effects upon interstate commerce. Yet the decision does little to threaten the system of enumuerated powers found in the constitution, because the train of physical effects is quite limited, and do not involve the federal government in the operations of the local economies. Coombs is another case for which the necessary and proper clause could sensibly make the difference. But, given its limited extent, it is not surprising that Coombs was not invoked in the subsequent expansionary period of the commerce clause.

n63 Ch. 104, 24 Stat. 379 (1887) (current version at 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 10101-11917 (Supp. 1987)).

n64 301 U.S. 1 (1937).

n65 Gibbons, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) at 194-95.

n66 77 U.S. (10 Wall.) 557 (1870).

n67 Id. at 562 (argument of appellant).

n68 Id. at 566.

n69 See infra notes 22-28; L. Tribe, supra note 28, § 5-6, at 238-39.

n70 118 U.S. 557 (1886).

n71 Id. at 577.

n72 Ch. 104, 24 Stat. 379 (1887) (current version at 49 U.S.C.A. §§ 10101-11917 (Supp. 1987)). Section 4 of the statute provided:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

REV_00258867

Id. § 4, 24 Stat. at 380.

A proviso to the section then gave the ICC the power to relieve carriers from this obligation "in special cases," but did not set out any standards which indicated when this general obligation should be suspended, and none are apparent as a general matter. Section 3 of the Act contained a prohibition against undue preferences, and § 5 prevented certain kinds of pooling of freight.

n73 Transportation Act of 1920, ch. 91, 41 Stat. 456 (current version at scattered sections of 49 U.S.C.A. (Supp. 1987)); see infra notes 93-101 and accompanying text. For a general account of the early changes in the Interstate Commerce Act, see Aitchison, The Evolution of the Interstate Commerce Act: 1887-1937, 5 Geo. Wash. L. Rev. 289 (1937).

n74 169 U.S. 466 (1898) (holding state railroad regulations to be violations of the 14th amendment).

n75 See Transportation Act of 1920, ch. 91, 41 Stat. 456 (current version at scattered sections of 49 U.S.C.A. (Supp. 1987)).

n76 234 U.S. 342 (1914). I am most indebted to Professor Edmund Kitch for pointing out to me the genuine complexities that this case raises, and for insisting that I deal more fully with the matter.

n77 Id. at 346.

n78 Id.

n79 Id. at 345. One example of the discrimination was that "a rate of 60 cents carried first class traffic a distance of 160 miles to the eastward from Dallas, while the same rate would carry the same class of traffic only 55 miles into Texas from Shreveport." Id. at 346.

n80 Id. at 346-47.

n81 Id. at 347.

n82 Id. at 351-52.

n83 Id. at 352.

n84 222 U.S. 20 (1911).

n85 Ch. 196, 27 Stat. 531 (1893) (current version at 45 U.S.C. §§ 1-7 (1982)).

n86 223 U.S. 1 (1912).

n87 See supra notes 65-69 and accompanying text.

n88 See supra notes 22-28 and accompanying text.

n89 301 U.S. 1 (1937); see infra notes 185-205 and accompanying text.

n90 The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 352.

n91 The actual language of the Interstate Commerce Act appears to have precluded the regulations that were sustained in the case. Section 3, which prevented "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" to one person over another, was subject to a proviso that read:

REV_00258868

of substantive rights and questions of federal jurisdiction. The very attitudes that led to the demise of substantive due process protection of economic liberties lay behind [*1393] judicial interpretation of the commerce clause. [11] To trace this history, it is necessary to discard the aura of inevitability that modern courts and writers have placed around the commerce clause. [12] At each stage in the historical analysis, the right question to ask is: Was this extension of federal power justified by the text and structure of the Constitution? There are no shortcuts in the journey. Let us start with the text.

II. THE TEXT

The first place to look to find the meaning of the commerce clause is the text of the clause itself. Here one notices that the word "commerce" governs three separate sets of relations -- those with foreign nations, among the states, and with Indian tribes. [13] One should assume that the word commerce applies with equal force to all three cases, and bears the same meaning with respect to each of its objects. One cannot, for example, assign a meaning to "commerce" which is intelligible only with respect to foreign nations. The asserted construction must make equally good sense for commerce among the states and for commerce with the Indian tribes.

Similarly, one does not want a meaning of the term commerce which renders any one of these three heads of the commerce power redundant or unnecessary. The modern view which says that commerce among the several states includes all manufacture and other productive activity within each and every state, because of the effect that such manufacture has upon commerce, violates this constraint. If commerce includes all that precedes trade with foreign nations, among the states, and with Indian tribes, then the three heads of jurisdiction cover the same ground; that is, each by itself covers manufacturing or agriculture within each of the states. The [*1394] scope of the clause would thus be plenary even if it said only that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or even with the Indian tribes, and remained silent about commerce among the several states. The level of industrial production within each state, after all, influences the amount, type, and price of goods available for the export trade or for the Indian trade. Granting Congress the power over commerce among the states thus accomplishes nothing that has not been already provided for elsewhere in the document. What possible sense does it make as a matter of ordinary English to say that Congress can regulate "manufacturing with foreign nations, or with Indian tribes," or for that matter "manufacturing among the several states," when the particular fabrication or production takes place in one state, even with goods purchased from another?

Taking the alternative position, that commerce means trade, or as Chief Justice Marshall said, "intercourse," [14] with or among the parties named, changes the situation dramatically. By Chief Justice Marshall's account, "intercourse" covered both shipping and navigation, and the contracts regulating buying and selling. Using that two-part definition it becomes clear that trade with foreign nations is not trade among the several states or with the Indian tribes. Each part of the clause attributes the same meaning to the term commerce, and each of the objects of the clause -- foreign nations, the states, and Indian tribes -- becomes an indispensable part of the constitutional structure. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, for example, is needed to ensure that trade negotiations with foreign nations are not conducted by each of the [*1395] several states in its own individual capacity. [15]

It is worth noting that this view of commerce as trade is consistent with the other prominent mention of the word commerce in the Constitution. Article I also states that "[n]o preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another . . . ." [16] The term "commerce" is used in opposition to the term "revenue," and seems clearly to refer to shipping and its incidental activities; this much seems evident from the use of the term "port." The clause itself would sound odd if it referred, for example, to preferences "given by any Regulation of Commerce, Manufacture or Revenue to the ports Provided, however, that the provisions of this act shall not apply to the transportation of passengers or property, or to the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of property, wholly within one State, and not shipped to or from a foreign country or to any State or Territory as aforesaid.

The Shreveport Rate Case, 234 U.S. at 356-57 (quoting the Interstate Commerce Act).

Yet this remnant of Chief Justice Marshall's "internal commerce" of the several states did not long survive. The Court concluded that the proviso did not apply "when the Commission finds that unjust discrimination against interstate trade arises from the relation of intrastate to interstate rates as maintained by a carrier subject to the act." Id. at 358. Certainly there was no reference to unjust discrimination in the proviso, which would have been wholly redundant if it reached only those cases in which no discrimination was present, for these were precisely the cases lacking conduct which the ICC could find unlawful.

n92 Id. at 355.

n93 257 U.S. 563 (1922).

n94 Transportation Act of 1920, ch. 91, 41 Stat. 456 (current version at scattered sections of 49 U.S.C.A. (Supp. 1987)).

n95 "The . . . most novel and most important feature of the act, requires the Commission so to prescribe rates as to enable the carriers as a whole, or in groups selected by the Commission, to earn an aggregate annual net railway operating income equal to a fair return on the aggregate value of the railway property used in transportation." Wisconsin R.R. Comm'n, 257 U.S. at 584. This is merely a nice way to describe cartelization of the railroad industry.

n96 See id. at 579-80.

n97 See id. at 583. Typically, expanded government authority during the First World War set the stage for expanded government authority after peace had returned.

n98 The Court wrote:

Congress in its control of its interstate commerce system is seeking in the Transportation Act to make the system adequate to the needs of the country by securing for it a reasonable compensatory return for all the work it does. The States are seeking to use that same system for intrastate traffic. That entails large duties and expenditures on the interstate commerce system which may burden it unless compensation is received for the intrastate business reasonably proportionate to that for the interstate business. Congress as the dominant controller of interstate commerce may, therefore, restrain undue limitation of the earning power of the interstate commerce system in doing state work. The affirmative power of Congress in developing interstate commerce agencies is clear.
Id. at 589-90.

n99 "Capture," whether by railroads wishing to cartelize their industry, or by shippers wishing to ship their goods below cost, is an inherent risk of all forms of regulation. The basic insight here is that regulation of all forms constitutes an implicit transfer of wealth among private individuals. The difficult question is to determine which interest group or groups will be able to take over, or capture the process. See McChesney, Rent Extraction and Rent Creation in the Economic Theory of Regulation, 16 J. Legal Stud. 101 (1987); Peltzman, Toward a More General Theory of Regulation, 19 J. Law & Econ. 211 (1976); Posner, Taxation by Regulation, 2 Bell J. Econ. & Mgmt. Sci. 22 (1971); Stigler, The Theory of Economic Regulation, 2 Bell J. Econ. & Mgmt. Sci. 3 (1971).

REV_00258869

of one State." The term commerce in this commerce provision does not carry with it the extensive baggage placed upon it by the better-known New Deal cases concerning the commerce clause.

III. THE STRUCTURE

One obtains the same interpretation of the commerce clause when considering the clause in light of the overall constitutional structure. Article I, section 8, contains an extensive list of separate, discrete, and enumerated powers granted to Congress, whereas article I, section 9, contains a comparable list of powers specifically denied to it. The lists of inclusion and exclusion suggest that the provisions contained in any one section should be read to recognize the existence and necessity of other specific powers and limitations contained elsewhere in article I, as well as the certainty that some matters are wholly beyond the power of Congress.

This view certainly appears to agree with the original theory of the Constitution. The federal government received delegated powers from the states and the individuals within the states. The exact source of the granting power might be somewhat unclear; after all, the preamble begins with "We the People," [17] yet ratification was by nine of the thirteen sovereign states. [18] Yet whatever the pedigree [*1396] of the Constitution, there was clearly no sense that either grantor conferred upon the Congress the plenary power to act as a roving commission, in order to do whatever it thought best for the common good. The looseness of vague grants of power would have given rise to the possibility of massive abuse, a possibility the framers seemed determined to control. The federal government was to have supremacy in the areas under its control, but the quid pro quo was that these areas were to be limited by specific jurisdictional grants. A system which says that the commerce clause essentially allows the government to regulate anything that even indirectly burdens or affects commerce does away with the key understanding that the federal government has received only enumerated powers. The doctrine of "internal relations" is not only a philosophical creed that says every event is related to every other separate event; it is also something of an economic truth in a world in which the price of any given commodity depends upon the costs of its inputs and upon the alternatives available to potential buyers. To say that Congress may regulate X because of its price effects upon any goods in interstate commerce, or because of its effects upon the quantity of goods so shipped, is to say that Congress can regulate whatever it pleases, a theory that cases such as Wickard v. Filburn [19] have so eagerly inferred.

On this score, moreover, there is no reason to distinguish the commerce of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries from that of the twentieth. Business in one state has always had profound economic effects upon the fortunes of other states. The pre-Civil War battles between North and South over the tariff show just how much the fate of each state has always depended upon national economic policies. [20] There was no economic revolution during the Progressive Era or the New Deal that justifies the convenient escape of saying that it is only the nature of business and trade that has changed, not the appropriate construction of the commerce clause. [21] The intimate interdependence between trade and national [*1397] economic conditions was as clear to the Phoenicians and the Romans as it is to ourselves. There has been no basic transformation of the economy that requires, or allows, a parallel transformation in the scope of the commerce clause. International trade is driven by the principle of comparative advantage and the costs of reaching distant markets. It did not begin with either the steamship or the railroad.

If the constitutional limitations on federal powers were designed to act as a substitute Bill of Rights, then the expansive interpretation of the commerce clause has done away with this protection completely. The necessary effect is that greater burdens are placed upon the substantive limitations, such as the Bill of Rights, found elsewhere in the Constitution. These limitations have met with varying fates themselves; one need only contrast the takings clause of the fifth amendment with the first amendment protection of the freedom of speech.

REV_00258834

In some cases, the second barrier against expanded government has held. In other cases, chiefly those concerning economic liberties, it has crumbled, leaving liberty at the mercy of the "good faith" of the Congress whose mischief the barrier was designed to constrain.

Nor is any of this understanding upset by the "necessary and proper" clause of the Constitution, which may expand the power of Congress, but does not provide for an unlimited grant of federal power. The necessary and proper clause provides that Congress shall have the power "[t]o make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof." [22] As drafted the clause does nothing to upset the balance of power between the federal and the state governments, nor to contravene the principle of enumerated powers on which the structure of article I, section 8 rests. What the necessary and proper clause does is to ensure that the Congress shall have all means at its disposal to reach the heads of power that admittedly fall within its grasp. [*1398] Such is the import of the phrase "for carrying into Execution": Congress shall not fail because it lacks the means of implementation. The clause does not, however, authorize the creation of new and independent heads of power, such as over local manufacture or agriculture, that obliterate the distinction between a federal and a national government. The necessary and proper clause thus permits the regulation of local affairs that are in a sense inseparable from national ones, as happens when local and interstate cars, for example, move along the same line. [23] But it is hardly "necessary" to regulate every form of local activity in order to regulate the three heads of commerce over which Congress has power. And it is surely not "proper" to do so. [24]

This reading of the necessary and proper clause may appear somewhat narrower than that given by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional." [25] Yet as stated, Chief Justice Marshall's broad reading of the clause does take into account the risks of overinclusion, by reference to matters which "consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution," which surely includes respect for the principle of enumerated powers, which Chief Justice Marshall acknowledged as being preserved in the tenth amendment. [26] More to the point, Chief Justice Marshall adopted just this limited interpretation of "necessary and proper" in Gibbons v. Ogden when he wrote: "In the last of the enumerated powers, that which [*1399] grants, expressly, the means for carrying all others into execution, Congress is authorized 'to make laws which shall be necessary and proper' for the purpose. But this limitation on the means which may be used, is not extended to the powers which are conferred." [27] In essence he treats the clause as a limitation upon means only, and surely not as an extension of permitted ends. So understood, the necessary and proper clause places a small but important weight upon the jurisdictional scales. But it is far from an automatic trump that overrides other jurisdictional limitations. Its historical role in the explication of the commerce clause is relatively small, and deservedly so. [28]

IV. THE CASE LAW BEFORE THE NEW DEAL: 1824-1936

The elaborate case law under the commerce clause can be profitably interpreted in light of the above understandings. Thus it is often said today that the New Deal does not represent violent revolution but prudent reformation [29] (one thinks of Martin Luther and that other reformation). More precisely, the newer cases are said only to have returned to the wisdom of Chief Justice Marshall, who understood the importance of an expansive interpretation of the commerce clause to the maintenance of the Union. [30] In between, in such cases as United States v. E.C. Knight Co., [31] the courts are said to have strayed from the original understanding to a view that effectively hampered the power of Congress to impose much-needed social and economic regulation. This set of insights has even been dressed up in plausible philosophical garb. Professor Tribe's treatise, American Constitutional Law, tells us that the Supreme Court between 1887 and 1937 substituted a "formal classification" [*1400] of economic activities for the "empiricism" [32] that characterized Chief Justice Marshall's great judgment in the pivotal case of Gibbons v. Ogden. [33]

The New Deal was not a reformation, but a sharp departure from previous case law, and one that moved federal power far beyond anything Chief Justice Marshall had in mind. Gibbons is often regarded as an expansive interpretation, and for its time so it was. Yet when the critical passages of the opinion are read as a whole, it seems quite clear that the case strongly adumbrated the subsequent holding in E. C. Knight, with which it is said to contrast so clearly. It is worth a minute to describe Chief Justice Marshall's logic, for the key to understanding his view is to understand that he found in the rigid and formal structures of the Constitution the materials that enabled it to be the foundation on which a perpetual Union could rest. His vision of the Constitution was not that of a living and changing organism, but of a great temple of government that, properly understood, could endure for the ages. [34]

[*1401] A. Gibbons v. Ogden

At issue in Gibbons v. Ogden was whether New York could grant an exclusive franchise that permitted steamships to ply between New Jersey and New York only with the franchisees' permission. [35] New Jersey had passed a retaliatory law; citizens of New Jersey sued in New York for violating New York law could recoup treble damages against the New Yorker in a New Jersey court. [36] The New York statute threatened massive commercial balkanization. [37] Chief Justice Marshall decided, first, that navigation among the several states was interstate commerce, and second (in order to avoid the question of whether any dormant commerce power could be identified) that a 1793 federal statute that licensed ships in the "coasting trade" had preempted the New York statute. [38]

Professor Tribe has summarized his view of the broad scope of Gibbons as follows:

[I]n an elaborate preliminary discussion, [Chief Justice] Marshall indicated that, in his view, congressional power to regulate "commercial [*1402] intercourse" extended to all activity having any interstate impact -- however indirect. Acting under the commerce clause, Congress could legislate with respect to all "commerce which concerns more states than one." This power would be plenary: absolute within its sphere, subject only to the Constitution's affirmative prohibitions on the exercise of federal authority. [39]

This passage suggests that Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons gave a very extensive reading to the reach of the commerce clause. But that is only because of the redactor's power of selection. Consider the fuller context of the quotation from Gibbons:

Commerce among the States, cannot stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior.

It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary.

Comprehensive as the word "among" is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended, would not have been made, had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State. [40]

REV_00258836

The passage gives a quite different sense of the commerce clause's scope than the one that Tribe suggests. It is hard to find in the phrase "commerce which concerns more States than one" a total jurisdiction over all commercial activity, especially when the phrase is preceded by the word "restricted." [41] Quite the opposite; [*1403] it looks as though Chief Justice Marshall wanted only to refute the argument (see his first sentence quoted) that interstate commerce can only take place on the narrow boundary between the two states. [42] Such a position, if carried into law, would have rendered the commerce clause a dead letter. Commerce between two states, or among many, must take place physically within the confines of one or both of them. It is therefore the nature of a transaction, rather than its location, that stamps it as part of interstate commerce. Navigation between states takes place at one instant in one state, and at another instant in another. Both portions of the journey are covered by the commerce clause, even if purely intrastate navigation is excluded. The power may be plenary, but it is surely limited as to its objects. Matters outside its scope are fully reserved to the states. Chief Justice Marshall did write, as Tribe suggests, of the "plenary" nature of the commerce power. But again his words must be set in context. Chief Justice Marshall thus wrote: "This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the constitution." [43] But he continued:

If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government, having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the constitution of the United States. [44]

It follows therefore that "plenary" powers were understood by [*1404] Chief Justice Marshall to be wholly consistent with powers "limited to specified objects."

This view is, moreover, reinforced when we take into account Chief Justice Marshall's own principles of construction, which should give caution to advocates of both judicial restraint and judicial activism. His attitude was essentially that the Constitution should be construed in its "natural sense." He was rightly suspicious of any effort to impose principles of "strict construction," but by the same token did not wish to give words an extravagant meaning given their function and purpose within the framework of the constitution. [45] He followed a middle course on the issue of construction, that of ordinary meaning, no different from that which a good contracts judge follows when he attaches ordinary meaning to contractual provisions. [46] Even with an explicit reference to the necessary and proper clause, [47] Chief Justice Marshall acknowledged that the commerce clause was itself directed toward specific ends, as was captured by the distinction between "internal" and "external" commerce, where internal commerce was that trade "between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State." [48] By that definition internal commerce is as commonplace in our own time as it was in Marshall's: every purchase [*1405] at a supermarket is internal commerce, even if the market itself acquired its own goods from a supplier out of state.

Nor is this balance between internal and external commerce undone because Chief Justice Marshall used the word "affects" to round out the scope of Congress' power. Those references to activities that "affect" interstate commerce cannot be read in isolation from the rest of the text, as an effort to nullify the basic doctrine of enumerated powers. Instead, his purpose was to counter prior contentions about the scope of internal commerce that had been stated by the New York court in Livingston v. Van Ingen. [49] There, New York Chief Justice Kent gave the commerce clause its narrowest possible construction, and thus treated as part of internal commerce any portion of an interstate journey that was undertaken wholly within local waters. [50] When Chief Justice Marshall spoke of local regulations that "affect" interstate commerce, he did so to reject the argument that New York could insist that all rival carriers be required to use sails in New York waters, even if they used steam elsewhere. So long as this local restriction "affected" the journey as a whole, the regulation reached commerce among the several states, notwithstanding that its "direct" impact was on New York waters alone. There is not the slightest hint that Chief Justice Marshall meant to have the "affects" qualification expand the specific objects to which the "plenary" commerce clause applies, beyond the control of interstate commercial transactions and the instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

REV_00258837

Further elaboration of Chief Justice Marshall's meaning appeared elsewhere in his opinion. At one point he addressed whether the states could pass inspection laws, or whether these laws fell solely within the domain of the congressional commerce power. [51] He finessed that question by giving a very narrow definition of what interstate commerce included:

[*1406] That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce, will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived, cannot be admitted. The object of inspection laws, is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labour of a country; to fit them for exportation; or, it may be, for domestic use. They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose. [52]

It is instructive to compare this passage with the most famous sentence of E. C. Knight, which has been cited as a sign of its narrow and indefensible rigidity: "Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it." [53] Chief Justice Marshall himself could have written that sentence, citing Gibbons as authority. His style was anything but "empirical," if that term is used to identify the necessary economic connection between intrastate and interstate commerce. Indeed the passage just quoted is wholly inconsistent with the indirect burden on interstate commerce approach taken in the modern law. Chief Justice Marshall's greatness rests upon his appreciation of the boundaries which should dominate the constitutional playing field. Individual cases may fall close to the boundary lines, and must be placed on one side or the other. Yet the position of the boundary lines must remain fixed if the power to adjudicate is to remain. Things cannot be partly in and partly out of interstate commerce. As long as one government or the other must regulate, the boundaries must be sharp -- such as the foul lines in baseball -- and not fuzzy. It has been said that modern constitutional law represents the triumph of "formalism" over "realism." [54] If this is true, then Chief Justice Marshall was the great formalist, not the precursor of the modern realists.

There is a good deal to be said for Marshall's categorical approach. If pressed to give a common law analogy to Marshall's way of thinking, I would offer the common law trilogy of the liabilities [*1407] of a landowner to the trespasser, the licensee, and the invitee. No judge ever thought that these categories were crystal clear, nor that individual cases would not give rise to honest disagreements of opinion. But it was thought that the categories were fixed and limited as a matter of principle: "There is no half-way house, no noman's land between adjacent territories. When I say rigid, I mean rigid in law." [55] And the modern disintegration of the categories has done little to produce any coherent law of occupiers' liability. [56] So it is with interstate commerce. The principle that the power of Congress did not extend to the internal commerce of the state was as important to the overall scheme as the recognition that the power of Congress extended to interstate commerce. Marshall well understood the fact that local events affected interstate commerce, but he rejected it as a basis for extension of congressional power over internal matters. Gibbons thus stands in sharp opposition to the very assertion of federal power that characterizes such cases as United States v. Darby [57] and Wickard v. Filburn. [58] In Wickard, [*1408] Justice Jackson captured the transformation of Gibbons when he wrote: "At the beginning Chief Justice Marshall described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded." [59] No way.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Supreme Court Cases & Materials : US Supreme Court Lawyers' Edition Cases
Terms: ("jones" and "united states") and lopez (Edit Search)

*529 U.S. 848, *; 120 S. Ct. 1904, **;*
2000 U.S. LEXIS 3426, ; 146 L. Ed. 2d 902

DEWEY J. JONES v. UNITED STATES

No. 99-5739

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

529 U.S. 848; 120 S. Ct. 1904; 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3426; 146 L. Ed. 2d 902; 68 U.S.L.W. 4422; 2000 Cal. Daily Op. Service 3961; 2000 Daily Journal DAR 5293; 2000 Colo. J. C.A.R. 2791; 13 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 356

March 21, 2000, Argued
May 22, 2000, Decided

NOTICE: [*1]

The LEXIS pagination of this document is subject to change pending release of the final published version.

PRIOR HISTORY: ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 178 F.3d 479, reversed and remanded.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Petitioner sought review of the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirming the judgment of the district court which convicted him of arson in violation of 18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994).

OVERVIEW: Petitioner criminal defendant tossed a Molotov cocktail through a window into a home owned and occupied by his cousin. Petitioner was convicted of arson, in violation of 18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994) and related crimes. The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the judgment. On appeal, petitioner argued the statute did not apply to buildings not used for commercial purposes, and challenged the constitutionality of such an application. Respondent argued the residence was "used" in the "activity" of receiving natural gas, a mortgage, and an insurance policy. The court avoided the constitutional question that would have arose if the statute were read to render the traditionally local criminal conduct a matter for federal enforcement. The court held that the provision covered only property currently used in commerce or in an activity affecting commerce and an owner-occupied residence not used for any commercial purpose did not qualify.

OUTCOME: Judgment reversed because the federal arson statute did not cover the arson of an owner-occupied dwelling not used for any commercial purpose; petitioner's conviction under the federal arson statute vacated; case remanded for further proceedings.

CORE TERMS: commerce, arson, owner-occupied, interstate, explosive, interstate commerce, foreign commerce, homeowner, destroy, natural gas, dwelling, damaged, cousin,

REV_00258870

CONCUR: JUSTICE STEVENS, with whom JUSTICE THOMAS joins, concurring.

Part II of the Court's opinion convincingly explains why its construction of 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) better fits the text and context of the provision than the Government's expansive reading. It also seems appropriate, however, to emphasize the kinship between our well-established presumption against federal pre-emption of state law, see Ray v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 435 U.S. 151, 157, 55 L. Ed. 2d 179, 98 S. Ct. 988 (1978), and our reluctance to "believe Congress intended to authorize federal intervention in local law enforcement in a marginal case such as this." United States v. Altobella, 442 F.2d 310, 316 (CA7 1971). The fact that petitioner received a sentence of 35 years in prison when the maximum penalty for the comparable state offense was only 10 years, Ind. Code [23] §§ 35-43-1-1, 35-50-2-5 (1993), illustrates how a criminal law like this may effectively displace a policy choice made by the State. Even when Congress has undoubted power to pre-empt local law, [*860] we have wisely decided that "unless Congress conveys its purpose clearly, it will not be deemed to have significantly changed the federal-state balance." United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971). For this reason, I reiterate my firm belief that we should interpret narrowly federal criminal laws that overlap with state authority unless [1913] congressional intention to assert its jurisdiction is plain. *

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

* See Landreth Timber Co. v. Landreth, 471 U.S. 681, 700, n. 2, 85 L. Ed. 2d 692, 105 S. Ct. 2297 (1985) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Bennett v. New Jersey, 470 U.S. 632, 654-655, n. 16, 84 L. Ed. 2d 572, 105 S. Ct. 1555 (1985) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Garcia v. United States, 469 U.S. 70, 89-90, 83 L. Ed. 2d 472, 105 S. Ct. 479 (1984) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); Bell v. United States, 462 U.S. 356, 363, 76 L. Ed. 2d 638, 103 S. Ct. 2398 (1983) (STEVENS, J., dissenting); McElroy v. United States, 455 U.S. 642, 675, 71 L. Ed. 2d 522, 102 S. Ct. 1332 (1982) (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [24]

JUSTICE THOMAS, with whom JUSTICE SCALIA joins, concurring.

In joining the Court's opinion, I express no view on the question whether the federal arson statute, 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) (1994 ed., Supp. IV), as there construed, is constitutional in its application to all buildings used for commercial activities.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Supreme Court Cases & Materials : US Supreme Court Lawyers' Edition Cases
Terms: ("jones" and "united states") and lopez (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Sunday, April 22, 2001 - 4:29 PM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

commerce-affecting, interpretive, expansive, everyday, mortgage, occupied, doubtful, rental, dwelling place, real estate, federal-state, destruction, reinforced, destroyed, convicted, cocktail, firearm

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Arson
See 18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994).

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Arson
In determining a violation of 18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994), the proper inquiry is into the function of the building itself, and then a determination of whether that function affects interstate commerce.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
The word "use," in legislation as in conversation, ordinarily signifies active employment.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
When terms used in a statute are undefined, the court gives them their ordinary meaning.

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Arson
By its terms, 18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994) applies only to property that is "used" in an "activity" that affects commerce.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
Judges should hesitate to treat statutory terms in any setting as surplusage, and resistance should be heightened when the words describe an element of a criminal offense.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
Where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, by one of which grave and doubtful constitutional questions arise and by the other of which such questions are avoided, the court's duty is to adopt the latter.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
Ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
When choice has to be made between two readings of what conduct Congress has made a crime, it is appropriate, before the court chooses the harsher alternative, to require that Congress should have spoken in language that is clear and definite.

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation
Unless Congress conveys its purpose clearly, it will not be deemed to have significantly changed the federal-state balance in the prosecution of crimes.

Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Property Crimes : Arson
18 U.S.C.S. § 844(i) (Supp. IV 1994) covers only property currently used in commerce or in an activity affecting commerce. The statute does not cover the arson of an owner-occupied dwelling used for everyday family living.

REV_00258871

♦ Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS: Petitioner Jones tossed a Molotov cocktail into a home owned and occupied by his cousin as a dwelling place for everyday family living. The ensuing fire severely damaged the home. Jones was convicted in the District Court of violating, inter alia, 18 U.S.C. § 844 (i), which makes it a federal crime to "maliciously damage or destroy, . . . by means of fire or an explosive, any building . . . used in interstate or foreign commerce or in any activity affecting interstate or foreign commerce." The Seventh Circuit affirmed, rejecting Jones's contention that § 844(i), when applied to the arson of a [2] private residence, exceeds the authority vested in Congress under the Commerce Clause.

Held: Because an owner-occupied residence not used for any commercial purpose does not qualify as property "used in" commerce or commerce-affecting activity, arson of such a dwelling is not subject to federal prosecution under § 844(i). Pp. 3-10.

(a) In support of its argument that § 844(i) reaches the arson of an owner-occupied private residence, the Government relies principally on the breadth of the statutory term "affecting . . . commerce," words that, when unqualified, signal Congress' intent to invoke its full Commerce Clause authority. But § 844(i) contains the qualifying words "used in" a commerce-affecting activity. The key word is "used." Congress did not define the crime as the explosion of a building whose damage or destruction might affect interstate commerce, but required that the damaged or destroyed property itself have been used in commerce or in an activity affecting commerce. The proper inquiry, therefore, is into the function of the building itself, and then into whether that function affects interstate commerce. The Court rejects the Government's argument that [3] the Indiana residence involved in this case was constantly "used" in at least three "activities affecting commerce": (1) it was "used" as collateral to obtain and secure a mortgage from an Oklahoma lender, who, in turn, "used" it as security for the loan; (2) it was "used" to obtain from a Wisconsin insurer a casualty insurance policy, which safeguarded the interests of the homeowner and the mortgagee; and (3) it was "used" to receive natural gas from sources outside Indiana. Section 844(i)'s use-in-commerce requirement is most sensibly read to mean active employment for commercial purposes, and not merely a passive, passing, or past connection to commerce. See, e.g., Bailey v. United States, 516 U.S. 137, 143, 145, 133 L. Ed. 2d 472, 116 S. Ct. 501. It surely is not the common perception that a private, owner-occupied residence is "used" in the "activity" of receiving natural gas, a mortgage, or an insurance policy. Cf. id., at 145. The Government does not allege that the residence here served as a home office or the locus of any commercial undertaking. The home's only "active employment," so far as the record reveals, was for the everyday living of Jones's cousin and his family. [4] Russell v. United States, 471 U.S. 858, 862, 85 L. Ed. 2d 829, 105 S. Ct. 2455 -- in which the Court held that particular property was being used in an "activity affecting commerce" under § 844 (i) because its owner was renting it to tenants at the time he attempted to destroy it by fire -- does not warrant a less "use"-centered reading of § 844(i) in this case. The Court there observed that "by its terms," § 844(i) applies only to "property that is 'used' in an 'activity' that affects commerce," and ruled that "the rental of real estate" fits that description, ibid. Here, the homeowner did not use his residence in any trade or business. Were the Court to adopt the Government's expansive interpretation, hardly a building in the land would fall outside § 844(i)'s domain, and the statute's limiting language, "used in," would have no office. Judges should hesitate to treat statutory terms in any setting as surplusage, particularly when the words describe an element of a crime. E.g., Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 140-141. Pp. 3-8, 126 L. Ed. 2d 615, 114 S. Ct. 655.

(b) The foregoing reading is in harmony with the guiding principle that where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, by [5] one of which grave and doubtful constitutional questions arise and by the other of which such questions are avoided, the Court's duty is to adopt the latter. See, e.g., Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575, 99 L. Ed. 2d 645, 108 S. Ct. 1392. In holding that a statute making it a federal crime to possess a firearm within 1,000 feet of a school exceeded Congress' power to regulate commerce, this Court, in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624, stressed that the area was one of traditional state concern, see, e.g., id., at 561, n. 3, and that the legislation aimed at activity in which neither the actors nor their conduct had a commercial character, e.g., 514 U.S. at 560-562. Given the concerns brought to the fore in Lopez, it is appropriate to avoid the constitutional question that would arise were the Court to read § 844(i) to render the traditionally local criminal conduct in which Jones engaged a matter for federal enforcement. United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 350, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515. The Court's comprehension of § 844(i) is additionally reinforced by other interpretive guides. [6] Ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity, Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812, 28 L. Ed. 2d 493, 91 S. Ct. 1056, and when choice must be made between two readings of what conduct Congress has made a crime, it is appropriate, before choosing the harsher alternative, to require that Congress should have spoken in language that is clear and definite, United States v. Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218, 221-222, 97 L. Ed. 260, 73 S. Ct. 227. Moreover, unless Congress conveys its purpose clearly, it will not be deemed to have significantly changed the federal-state balance in the prosecution of crimes. Bass, 404 U.S. at 349. To read § 844(i) as encompassing the arson of an owner-occupied private home would effect such a change, for arson is a paradigmatic common-law state crime. Pp. 8-9.

178 F.3d 479, reversed and remanded.

COUNSEL: Donald M. Falk argued the cause for petitioner.

Michael R. Dreeben argued the cause for respondent.

JUDGES: GINSBURG, J., delivered the opinion for a unanimous Court. STEVENS, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which THOMAS, J., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which SCALIA, J., joined.

OPINIONBY: GINSBURG

OPINION: [*850] [1907]

JUSTICE GINSBURG delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1A]
It is a federal [7] crime under 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) (1994 ed., Supp. IV) to damage or destroy, "by means of fire or an explosive, any . . . property used in interstate or foreign commerce or in any activity affecting interstate or foreign commerce." [1908] This case presents the question whether arson of an owner-occupied private residence falls within § 844(i)'s compass. Construing the statute's text, we hold that an owner-occupied residence not used for any commercial purpose does not qualify as property "used in" commerce or [*851] commerce-affecting activity; arson of such a dwelling, therefore, is not subject to federal prosecution under § 844(i). Our construction of § 844(i) is reinforced by the Court's opinion in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995), and the interpretive rule that constitutionally doubtful constructions should be avoided where possible, see Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575, 99 L. Ed. 2d 645, 108 S. Ct. 1392 (1988).

I

[2A]
On February 23, 1998, petitioner Dewey Jones tossed a Molotov cocktail through a window into a home in Fort Wayne, Indiana, owned and occupied by his cousin. No one was [8] injured in the ensuing fire, but the blaze severely damaged the home. A federal grand jury returned a three-count indictment charging Jones with arson, 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) (1994 ed., Supp. IV); using a destructive device during and in relation to a crime of violence (the arson), 18 U.S.C. § 924(c); and making an illegal destructive device, 26 U.S.C. § 5861(f). Jones was tried under that indictment in the Northern District of Indiana and convicted by a jury on all three counts. n1 The District Court sentenced him, pursuant to the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, to a total prison term of 35 years, to be followed by five years of supervised release. The court also ordered Jones to pay $ 77,396.87 to the insurer of the damaged home as restitution for its loss. Jones appealed, and the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit affirmed the judgment of the District Court. 178 F.3d 479 (1999).

REV_00258873

[2B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 The question on which we granted review refers solely to Jones's § 844(i) conviction. See infra, at 3. We therefore do not address his § 924(c) and § 5861(f) convictions.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [9]

[1B]
Jones unsuccessfully urged, both before the District Court and on appeal to the Seventh Circuit, that § 844(i), when applied to the arson of a private residence, exceeds the authority vested in Congress under the Commerce Clause of the [*852] Constitution, Art. I, § 8, cl. 3. Courts of Appeals have divided both on the question whether § 844(i) applies to buildings not used for commercial purposes, n2 and on the constitutionality of such an application. n3 We granted certiorari, 528 U.S. 1002 (1999), and framed as the question presented:
[*10]

"Whether, in light of United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995), and the interpretive rule that constitutionally doubtful constructions should be avoided, see Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Constr. Trades Council, 485 U.S. 568, 575, 99 L. Ed. 2d 645, 108 S. Ct. 1392 (1988), 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) applies to the arson of a private residence; [1909] and if so, whether its application to the private residence in the present case is constitutional."

Satisfied that § 844(i) does not reach an owner-occupied residence that is not used for any commercial purpose, we reverse the Court of Appeals' judgment.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n2 Compare United States v. Gaydos, 108 F.3d 505 (CA3 1997) (vacant, uninhabitable house formerly rented not covered by statute), United States v. Denalli, 73 F.3d 328 (CA11) (owner-occupied residence not covered), modified on other grounds, 90 F.3d 444 (1996) (per curiam), United States v. Mennuti, 639 F.2d 107 (CA2 1981) (same), with United States v. Ryan, 41 F.3d 361 (CA8 1994) (en banc) (vacant former commercial property covered), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1082, 131 L. Ed. 2d 721, 115 S. Ct. 1793 (1995), United States v. Ramey, 24 F.3d 602 (CA4 1994) (owner-occupied residence covered), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1103, 131 L. Ed. 2d 757, 115 S. Ct. 1838 (1995), and United States v. Stillwell, 900 F.2d 1104 (CA7) (same), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 838, 112 L. Ed. 2d 81, 111 S. Ct. 111 (1990).

n3 Compare United States v. Pappadopoulos, 64 F.3d 522 (CA9 1995) (application to owner-occupied residence unconstitutional), with 178 F.3d 479 (CA7 1999) (decision below), and Ramey, 24 F.3d at 602 (application constitutional).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00258874

II

Congress enacted 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) as part of Title XI of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, Pub. L. 91-452, § 1102, 84 Stat. 952, "because [11] of the need 'to curb the use, transportation, and possession of explosives.'" Russell v. [*853] United States, 471 U.S. 858, 860, n. 5, 85 L. Ed. 2d 829, 105 S. Ct. 2455 (1985) (citation omitted). The word "fire," which did not appear in § 844(i) as originally composed, was introduced by statutory amendment in 1982. n4 As now worded, § 844(i) (1994 ed., Supp. IV) reads in relevant part:

"Whoever maliciously damages or destroys, or attempts to damage or destroy, by means of fire [12] or an explosive, any building, vehicle, or other real or personal property used in interstate or foreign commerce or in any activity affecting interstate or foreign commerce shall be imprisoned for not less than 5 years and not more than 20 years, fined under this title, or both . . . ."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 See Pub. L. 97-298, § 2(c), 96 Stat. 1319 (amending § 844(i) to insert the words "fire or" before the words "an explosive"). The House Report accompanying the 1982 legislation explained that the original measure, which was confined to damage caused by "an explosive," had resulted in problems of practical application. H. R. Rep. No. 678, 97th Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1982). In particular, the Report noted a Circuit conflict on the question whether the measure covered use of gasoline or other flammable liquids to ignite a fire. Id., at 2, and nn. 5-6.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

We previously construed § 844(i) in Russell v. United States, 471 U.S. 858, 85 L. Ed. 2d 829, 105 S. Ct. 2455 (1985), and there held that § 844(i) applies to a building "used as rental property," ibid. The petitioner-defendant in Russell had unsuccessfully attempted to set fire to a two-unit apartment building he owned. He earned rental income from the property and "treated it as business property for tax purposes." Id., at 859. Our decision stated as the dispositive fact: "Petitioner was renting his apartment building to tenants at the time he attempted to destroy it by fire." Id., at 862. It followed from that fact, the Russell opinion concluded, that "the property was . . . being used in an activity affecting commerce within the meaning of § 844(i)." Ibid. n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 We noted in Russell that the original version of the bill that became § 844(i) applied to destruction, by means of explosives, of property used "for business purposes." Russell, 471 U.S. at 860, n. 5. After some House members indicated that they thought the provision should apply to the bombings of schools, police stations, and places of worship, the words "for business purposes" were omitted. 471 U.S. at 860-861. The House Report accompanying the final bill, we further noted in Russell, described § 844(i) as "a very broad provision covering substantially all business property." Id., at 861, and n. 8 (citing H. R. Rep. No. 91-1549, pp. 69-70 (1970)).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*854] [13]

We now confront a question that was not before the Court in Russell: Does § 844(i) cover property occupied and used by its owner not for any commercial venture, but as a private residence. Is such a dwelling place, in the words of § 844(i), "used in . . . any activity affecting . . . commerce"?

[1C]
[3]

REV_00258875

[4A]
[5]
In support of its argument that § 844(i) reaches the arson of an owner-occupied private residence, the Government relies principally on the breadth of the statutory term "affecting . . . commerce," see Brief for United States 10, 16-17, words that, when unqualified, signal Congress' intent to invoke its full authority under the Commerce Clause. But § 844(i) contains the qualifying words "used in" a commerce-affecting activity. The key word is "used." "Congress did not define the crime described in § 844(i) as the explosion [1910] of a building whose damage or destruction might affect interstate commerce . . . ." United States v. Mennuti, 639 F.2d 107, 110 (CA2 1981) (Friendly, J.). n6 Congress "required that the damaged or destroyed property must itself have been used in commerce or in an activity affecting commerce." Ibid. The proper inquiry, we agree, "is into [14] the function of the building itself, and then a determination of whether that function affects interstate commerce." [*855] United States v. Ryan, 9 F.3d 660, 675 (CA8 1993) (Arnold, C. J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). n7

[4B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 The defendants in Mennuti destroyed two buildings. One was the residence of the owner and her family, the other was a rental property. See 639 F.2d at 108-109, n. 1. The Second Circuit affirmed the District Court's dismissal of the entire indictment. Our decision in Russell v. United States, 471 U.S. 858, 85 L. Ed. 2d 829, 105 S. Ct. 2455 (1985), supersedes Mennuti with respect to the building held for rental. Regarding the family residence, we find Mennuti's reasoning persuasive.

n7 In Ryan, Chief Judge Arnold dissented from a panel decision holding that the arson of a permanently closed fitness center fell within § 844(i)'s prohibition. The panel majority considered adequate either of two interstate commerce connections: the building was owned and leased by out-of-state parties, and received natural gas from across state borders. The panel added, however, that it would not extend the decision "to property which is purely private in nature, such as a privately owned home, used solely for residential purposes." 9 F.3d at 666-667. Sitting en banc, the Eighth Circuit affirmed the panel's judgment. See United States v. Ryan, 41 F.3d 361 (1994), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1082, 131 L. Ed. 2d 721, 115 S. Ct. 1793 (1995).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [15]

The Government urges that the Fort Wayne, Indiana residence into which Jones tossed a Molotov cocktail was constantly "used" in at least three "activities affecting commerce." First, the homeowner "used" the dwelling as collateral to obtain and secure a mortgage from an Oklahoma lender; the lender, in turn, "used" the property as security for the home loan. Second, the homeowner "used" the residence to obtain a casualty insurance policy from a Wisconsin insurer. That policy, the Government points out, safeguarded the interests of the homeowner and the mortgagee. Third, the homeowner "used" the dwelling to receive natural gas from sources outside Indiana. See Brief for United States 19-23.

[1D]
[6]
The Government correctly observes that § 844(i) excludes no particular type of building (it covers "any building"); the provision does, however, require that the building be "used" in an activity affecting commerce. That qualification is most sensibly read to mean active employment for commercial purposes, and not merely a passive, passing, or past connection to commerce. Although "variously defined," the word "use," in legislation as in conversation, ordinarily signifies "active employment." [16] Bailey v. United States,

REV_00258876

516 U.S. 137, 143, 145, 133 L. Ed. 2d 472, 116 S. Ct. 501 (1995); see also Asgrow Seed Co. v. Winterboer, 513 U.S. 179, 187, 130 L. Ed. 2d 682, 115 S. Ct. 788 (1995) ("When terms used in a statute are undefined, we give them their ordinary meaning."). [*856]

[1E]
It surely is not the common perception that a private, owner-occupied residence is "used" in the "activity" of receiving natural gas, a mortgage, or an insurance policy. Cf. Bailey, 516 U.S. at 145 (interpreting the word "use," as it appears in 18 U.S.C. § 924(c)(1), to mean active employment of a firearm and rejecting the Government's argument that a gun is "used" whenever its presence "protects drugs" or "emboldens" a drug dealer). The Government does not allege that the Indiana residence involved in this case served as a home office or the locus of any commercial undertaking. The home's only "active employment," so far as the record reveals, was for the everyday living of Jones's cousin and his family. [1911]

Our decision in Russell does not warrant a less "use"-centered reading of § 844(i). In that case, which involved the arson of property rented out by its owner, see supra, at 4, the Court [17] referred to the recognized distinction between legislation limited to activities "in commerce" and legislation invoking Congress' full power over activity substantially "affecting . . . commerce." 471 U.S. at 859-860 and n. 4. The Russell opinion went on to observe, however, that "by its terms," § 844(i) applies only to "property that is 'used' in an 'activity' that affects commerce." 471 U.S. at 862. "The rental of real estate," the Court then stated, "is unquestionably such an activity." Ibid. n8 Here, as earlier emphasized, the owner used the property as his home, the center of his family life. He did not use the residence in any trade or business.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 Notably, the Court in Russell did not rest its holding on the expansive interpretation advanced by the Government both in Russell and in this case. Compare Brief for United States in Russell v. United States, O.T. 1984, No. 435, p. 15 ("Petitioner used his building on South Union Street in an activity affecting interstate commerce by heating it with gas that moved interstate."), with Russell, 471 U.S. at 862 (focusing instead on fact that "the rental of real estate is unquestionably . . . an activity" affecting commerce).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*857] [18]

Were we to adopt the Government's expansive interpretation of § 844(i), hardly a building in the land would fall outside the federal statute's domain. Practically every building in our cities, towns, and rural areas is constructed with supplies that have moved in interstate commerce, served by utilities that have an interstate connection, financed or insured by enterprises that do business across state lines, or bears some other trace of interstate commerce. See, e.g., FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 757, 72 L. Ed. 2d 532, 102 S. Ct. 2126 (1982) (observing that electric energy is consumed "in virtually every home" and that "no State relies solely on its own resources" to meet its inhabitants' demand for the product). If such connections sufficed to trigger § 844(i), the statute's limiting language, "used in" any commerce-affecting activity, would have no office. See United States v. Monholland, 607 F.2d 1311, 1316 (CA10 1979) (finding in § 844(i) no indication that Congress intended to include "everybody and everything"). "Judges should hesitate . . . to treat statutory terms in any setting [as surplusage], and resistance should be heightened when the words describe [19] an element of a criminal offense." Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 140-141, 126 L. Ed. 2d 615, 114 S. Ct. 655 (1994); accord, Bailey, 516 U.S. at 145.

III

[1F]
Our reading of § 844(i) is in harmony with the guiding principle that "where a statute is susceptible of two constructions, by one of which grave and doubtful constitutional questions arise and by the other of which such questions are avoided, our duty is to adopt the latter." United States ex rel. Attorney General v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 213 U.S. 366, 408, 53 L. Ed. 836, 29 S. Ct. 527 (1909), quoted in Jones v. United States, 526 U.S. 227, 239, 143 L. Ed. 2d 311, 119 S. Ct. 1215 (1999); see also DeBartolo, 485 U.S. at 575; Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 348, 80 L. Ed. 688, 56 S. Ct. 466 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). In Lopez, this Court invalidated the Gun-Free School Zones Act, former 18 U.S.C. § 922(q) (1988 ed., Supp. V), which made it a federal crime to possess a firearm within [*858] 1,000 feet of a school. The defendant in that case, a 12th-grade student, had been convicted for knowingly possessing a concealed handgun and bullets at his San Antonio, Texas, high school, in violation of the federal [20] Act. Holding that the Act exceeded Congress' power to regulate commerce, the Court stressed that the area was one of traditional state concern, see 514 U.S. at 561, n. 3, 567; id. at 577 (KENNEDY, J., concurring), and that the legislation aimed at activity in which "neither the [1912] actors nor their conduct has a commercial character," id. at 580 (KENNEDY, J., concurring); id. at 560-562 (opinion of the Court).

REV_00258877

Given the concerns brought to the fore in Lopez, it is appropriate to avoid the constitutional question that would arise were we to read § 844(i) to render the "traditionally local criminal conduct" in which petitioner Jones engaged "a matter for federal enforcement." United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 350, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971). Our comprehension of § 844(i) is additionally reinforced by other interpretive guides. We have instructed that "ambiguity concerning the ambit of criminal statutes should be resolved in favor of lenity," Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812, 28 L. Ed. 2d 493, 91 S. Ct. 1056 (1971), and that "when choice has to be made between two readings of what conduct Congress has made a crime, [21] it is appropriate, before we choose the harsher alternative, to require that Congress should have spoken in language that is clear and definite," United States v. Universal C. I. T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218, 221-222, 97 L. Ed. 260, 73 S. Ct. 227 (1952). We have cautioned, as well, that "unless Congress conveys its purpose clearly, it will not be deemed to have significantly changed the federal-state balance" in the prosecution of crimes. Bass, 404 U.S. at 349. To read § 844(i) as encompassing the arson of an owner-occupied private home would effect such a change, for arson is a paradigmatic common-law state crime. See generally Poulos, The Metamorphosis of the Law of Arson, 51 Mo. L. Rev. 295 (1986). [*859]

IV

[1G]
[7A]
We conclude that § 844(i) is not soundly read to make virtually every arson in the country a federal offense. We hold that the provision covers only property currently used in commerce or in an activity affecting commerce. The home owned and occupied by petitioner Jones's cousin was not so used -- it was a dwelling place used for everyday family living. As we read § 844(i), Congress left cases of this genre to the law enforcement authorities of the States. [22]

[7B]
Our holding that § 844(i) does not cover the arson of an owner-occupied dwelling means that Jones's § 844(i) conviction must be vacated. Accordingly, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

CONCURBY: STEVENS; THOMAS

REV_00258878

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3422

*529 U.S. 598, *; 120 S. Ct. 1740, **;*
2000 U.S. LEXIS 3422, ; 146 L. Ed. 2d 658

UNITED STATES v. ANTONIO J. MORRISON, ET AL.; AND CHRISTY BRZONKALA v. ANTONIO J. MORRISON, ET AL.

Nos. 99-5 and 99-29

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

529 U.S. 598; 120 S. Ct. 1740; 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3422; 146 L. Ed. 2d 658; 68 U.S.L.W. 4351; 82 Fair Empl. Prac. Cas. (BNA) 1313; 77 Empl. Prac. Dec. (CCH) P46,376; 2000 Cal. Daily Op. Service 3788; 2000 Daily Journal DAR 5061; 2000 Colo. J. C.A.R. 2583; 13 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 287

January 11, 2000, Argued
May 15, 2000, * Decided

* Together with No. 99-29, Brzonkala v. Morrison et al., also on certiorari to the same court.

NOTICE: [*1]

The LEXIS pagination of this document is subject to change pending release of the final published version.

PRIOR HISTORY: ON WRITS OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 169 F.3d 820, affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Petitioner victim appealed the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit declaring unconstitutional 42 U.S.C.S. § 13981, which provided a civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence, on the ground that Congress lacked the authority to enact the statue under either the Commerce Clause or U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5.

OVERVIEW: Petitioner victim brought an action against respondent offender under 42 U.S.C.S. § 13981, which provided a federal civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence. The lower court struck down § 13981 and concluded that Congress lacked constitutional authority to enact the statute under either the Commerce Clause or U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5. The court rejected petitioners' argument that § 13981 was a regulation of activity that substantially affected interstate commerce. The court affirmed the decision of the lower court and held that gender-motivated crimes of violence were not considered economic activity, and therefore, the Commerce Clause did not vest Congress with the authority to enact a statute regulating such. Moreover, the court affirmed that the civil remedy contained in § 13981 should be struck down as it was outside Congress's remedial power under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5. The civil remedy was not found to be corrective in its character nor adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or proceedings of state officers. Instead, the subject statute redressed private discrimination and was outside Congress' power to enact.

REV_00258880

broadly one might define those terms." 514 U.S. at 561. Reviewing our case law, we noted that "we have upheld a wide variety of congressional Acts regulating intrastate economic activity where we have concluded that the activity substantially affected interstate commerce." 514 U.S. at 559. Although we cited only a few examples, including Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942); Hodel, supra; Perez, supra; Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964); and Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, we stated that the pattern of analysis is clear. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 559-560. "Where economic activity substantially affects interstate commerce, legislation regulating that activity will be sustained." 514 U.S. at 560.

[5B]
Both petitioners and JUSTICE SOUTER's dissent downplay the role that the economic nature of the regulated activity plays in our Commerce Clause analysis. But a fair reading of Lopez shows that the noneconomic, criminal nature of the conduct at issue was central to our decision in that case. See, [22] e.g., id., at 551 ("The Act [does not] "regulate a commercial activity"), 560 ("Even Wickard, which is perhaps the most far reaching example of Commerce Clause authority over intrastate activity, involved economic activity in a way that the possession of a gun in a school zone does not"), 561 ("Section 922(q) is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity"), 566 ("Admittedly, a determination whether an intrastate activity is commercial or noncommercial may in some cases result in legal uncertainty. But, so long as Congress' authority is limited to those powers enumerated in the Constitution, and so long as those enumerated powers are interpreted as having judicially enforceable outer limits, congressional legislation under the Commerce Clause always will engender 'legal uncertainty'"), 567 ("The possession of a gun in a local school zone is in no sense an economic activity that might, through repetition [*611] elsewhere, substantially affect any sort of interstate commerce"); see also id., at 573-574 (KENNEDY, J., concurring) (stating that Lopez did not alter our "practical conception of commercial regulation" and that Congress [23] may "regulate in the commercial sphere on the assumption that we have a single market and a unified purpose to build a stable national economy"), 577 ("Were the Federal Government to take over the regulation of entire areas of traditional state concern, areas having nothing to do with the regulation of commercial activities, the boundaries between the spheres of federal and state authority would blur"), 580 ("Unlike the earlier cases to come before the Court here neither the actors nor their conduct has a commercial character, and neither the purposes nor the design of the statute has an evident commercial nexus. The statute makes the simple possession of a gun within 1,000 feet of the grounds of the school a criminal offense. In a sense any conduct in this interdependent world of ours has an ultimate commercial origin or consequence, but we have not yet said the commerce power may reach so far" (citation omitted)). Lopez's review of Commerce Clause case law demonstrates that in those cases where we have sustained federal regulation of intrastate activity based upon the activity's substantial effects on interstate commerce, the activity in question has been some sort of economic [24] endeavor. See id., at 559-560. n4

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 JUSTICE SOUTER's dissent does not reconcile its analysis with our holding in Lopez because it apparently would cast that decision aside. See post, at 10-16. However, the dissent cannot persuasively contradict Lopez's conclusion that, in every case where we have sustained federal regulation under Wickard's aggregation principle, the regulated activity was of an apparent commercial character. See, e.g., Lopez, 514 U.S. at 559-560, 580.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[6B]
The second consideration that we found important in analyzing § 922(q) was that [1751] the statute contained "no express jurisdictional element which might limit its reach to a discrete set of firearm possessions that additionally have [*612] an explicit connection with or effect on interstate commerce." Id., at 562. Such a jurisdictional element may establish that the enactment is in pursuance of Congress' regulation of interstate commerce.

REV_00258889

[6C]

[7]
Third, we noted that neither § 922(q) "'nor [25] its legislative history contains express congressional findings regarding the effects upon interstate commerce of gun possession in a school zone.'" Ibid. (quoting Brief for United States, O.T. 1994, No. 93-1260, pp. 5-6). While "Congress normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens that an activity has on interstate commerce," 514 U.S. at 562 (citing McClung, 379 U.S. at 304; Perez, 402 U.S. at 156), the existence of such findings may "enable us to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affects interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect [is] visible to the naked eye." 514 U.S. at 563.

[6D]
Finally, our decision in Lopez rested in part on the fact that the link between gun possession and a substantial effect on interstate commerce was attenuated. Id., at 563-567. The United States argued that the possession of guns may lead to violent crime, and that violent crime "can be expected to affect the functioning of the national economy in two ways. First, the costs of violent crime are substantial, and, through the [26] mechanism of insurance, those costs are spread throughout the population. Second, violent crime reduces the willingness of individuals to travel to areas within the country that are perceived to be unsafe." Id., at 563-564 (citation omitted). The Government also argued that the presence of guns at schools poses a threat to the educational process, which in turn threatens to produce a less efficient and productive workforce, which will negatively affect national productivity and thus interstate commerce. Ibid.

We rejected these "costs of crime" and "national productivity" arguments because they would permit Congress [*613] to "regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce." Id., at 564. We noted that, under this but-for reasoning:

> "Congress could regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens: family law (including marriage, divorce, and child custody), for example. Under these theories . . . , it is difficult to perceive any limitation on federal power, even in areas such as criminal law [27] enforcement or education where States historically have been sovereign. Thus, if we were to accept the Government's arguments, we are hard pressed to posit any activity by an individual that Congress is without power to regulate." Ibid.

[5C]
[8]
With these principles underlying our Commerce Clause jurisprudence as reference points, the proper resolution of the present cases is clear. Gender-motivated crimes of violence are not, in any sense of the phrase, economic activity. While we need not adopt a categorical rule against aggregating the effects of any noneconomic activity in order to decide these cases, thus far in our Nation's history our cases have upheld Commerce Clause regulation of intrastate activity only where that activity is economic in nature. See, e.g., id., at 559-560, and the cases cited therein.

REV_00258890

[6E]
[9]
Like the Gun-Free School Zones Act at issue in Lopez, § 13981 contains no jurisdictional element establishing that the federal cause of action is in pursuance of Congress' power to regulate interstate commerce. Although Lopez makes clear that such a jurisdictional element would lend support to the argument that § 13981 [1752] is sufficiently tied to [28] interstate commerce, Congress elected to cast § 13981's remedy over a wider, and more purely intrastate, body of violent crime. n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 Title 42 U.S.C. § 13981 is not the sole provision of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994 to provide a federal remedy for gender-motivated crime. Section 40221(a) of the Act creates a federal criminal remedy to punish "interstate crimes of abuse including crimes committed against spouses or intimate partners during interstate travel and crimes committed by spouses or intimate partners who cross State lines to continue the abuse." S. Rep. No. 103-138, p. 43 (1993). That criminal provision has been codified at 18 U.S.C. § 2261(a)(1), which states:

"A person who travels across a State line or enters or leaves Indian country with the intent to injure, harass, or intimidate that person's spouse or intimate partner, and who, in the course of or as a result of such travel, intentionally commits a crime of violence and thereby causes bodily injury to such spouse or intimate partner, shall be punished as provided in subsection (b)."

The Courts of Appeals have uniformly upheld this criminal sanction as an appropriate exercise of Congress' Commerce Clause authority, reasoning that the provision properly falls within the first of Lopez's categories as it regulates the use of channels of interstate commerce -- i.e., the use of the interstate transportation routes through which persons and goods move." United States v. Lankford, 196 F.3d 563, 571-572 (CA5 1999) (collecting cases) (internal quotation marks omitted).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*614] [29]

[6F]
[10]
In contrast with the lack of congressional findings that we faced in Lopez, § 13981 is supported by numerous findings regarding the serious impact that gender-motivated violence has on victims and their families. See, e.g., H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711, p. 385 (1994); S. Rep. No. 103- 138, p. 40 (1993); S. Rep. No. 101-545, p. 33 (1990). But the existence of congressional findings is not sufficient, by itself, to sustain the constitutionality of Commerce Clause legislation. As we stated in Lopez, "'Simply because Congress may conclude that a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce does not necessarily make it so.'" 514 U.S. at 557, n. 2 (quoting Hodel, 452 U.S. at 311 (REHNQUIST, J., concurring in judgment)). Rather, "'whether particular operations affect interstate commerce sufficiently to come under the constitutional power of Congress to regulate them is ultimately a judicial rather than a legislative question, and can be settled finally only by this Court.'" 514 U.S. at 557, n. 2 (quoting Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 273 (Black, J., concurring)). [*615]

In these cases, Congress' [30] findings are substantially weakened by the fact that they rely so heavily on a method of reasoning that we have already rejected as unworkable if we are to maintain the Constitution's enumeration of powers. Congress found that gender-motivated violence affects interstate commerce

"by deterring potential victims from traveling interstate, from engaging in > employment in interstate business, and from transacting with business, and in places involved in interstate commerce; . . . by diminishing national productivity, increasing medical and other costs, and decreasing the supply of and the demand for interstate products." H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711, at 385.

Accord, S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 54. Given these findings and petitioners' arguments, the concern that we expressed in Lopez that Congress might use the Commerce Clause to completely obliterate the Constitution's distinction between national and local authority seems well founded. See Lopez, supra, at 564. The reasoning that petitioners advance seeks to follow the but-for causal chain from the initial occurrence of violent crime (the suppression of which has always been the prime object of the States' [31] police power) to every attenuated effect upon interstate commerce. If accepted, petitioners' reasoning would allow Congress to regulate any crime as long as the nationwide, aggregated impact of that crime has substantial [1753] effects on employment, production, transit, or consumption. Indeed, if Congress may regulate gender-motivated violence, it would be able to regulate murder or any other type of violence since gender-motivated violence, as a subset of all violent crime, is certain to have lesser economic impacts than the larger class of which it is a part.

[11A]
[12A]
Petitioners' reasoning, moreover, will not limit Congress to regulating violence but may, as we suggested in Lopez, be applied equally as well to family law and other areas of traditional state regulation since the aggregate effect of [*616] marriage, divorce, and childrearing on the national econ omy is undoubtedly significant. Congress may have recognized this specter when it expressly precluded § 13981 from being used in the family law context. n6 See 42 U.S.C. § 13981(e)(4). Under our written Constitution, however, the limitation of congressional authority is not solely a matter of legislative grace. n7 [32] See Lopez, supra, at 575-579 (KENNEDY, J., concurring); Marbury, 1 Cranch at 176-178.

[11B]
[12B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 We are not the first to recognize that the but-for causal chain must have its limits in the Commerce Clause area. In Lopez, 514 U.S. at 567, we quoted Justice Cardozo's concurring opinion in A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935):

"There is a view of causation that would obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local in the activities of commerce. Motion at the outer rim is communicated perceptibly, though minutely, to recording instruments at the center. A society such as ours 'is an elastic medium which transmits all tremors throughout its territory; the only question is of their size.'" Id., at 554 (quoting United States v. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp., 76 F.2d 617, 624 (CA2 1935) (L. Hand, J., concurring)).

n7 JUSTICE SOUTER's dissent theory that Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824), Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985), and the Seventeenth Amendment provide the answer to these cases, see post, at 19-26, is remarkable because it undermines this central principle of our constitutional system. As we have repeatedly noted, the Framers crafted the federal system of government so that the people's rights would be secured by the division of power. See, e.g., Arizona v. Evans, 514 U.S. 1, 30, 131 L. Ed. 2d 34, 115 S. Ct. 1185 (1995) (GINSBURG, J., dissenting); Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 458-459, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991) (cataloging the benefits of the federal design); Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234, 242, 87 L. Ed. 2d 171, 105 S. Ct. 3142 (1985) ("The 'constitutionally mandated balance of power' between the States and the Federal Government was adopted by the Framers to ensure the protection of 'our fundamental liberties'") (quoting Garcia, supra, at 572 (Powell, J., dissenting)). Departing from their parliamentary past, the Framers adopted a written Constitution that further divided authority at the federal level so that the Constitution's provisions would not be defined solely by the political branches nor the scope of legislative power limited only by public opinion and the legislature's self-restraint. See, e.g., Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 176, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803) (Marshall, C. J.) ("The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the constitution is written"). It is thus a "'permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system'" that "'the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution.'" Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 922-923, 132 L. Ed. 2d 762, 115 S. Ct. 2475 (1995) (quoting Cooper v. Aaron, 358 U.S. 1, 18, 3 L. Ed. 2d 5, 78 S. Ct. 1401 (1958)).

REV_00258892

No doubt the political branches have a role in interpreting and applying the Constitution, but ever since Marbury this Court has remained the ultimate expositor of the constitutional text. As we emphasized in United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1039, 94 S. Ct. 3090 (1974), "In the performance of assigned constitutional duties each branch of the Government must initially interpret the Constitution, and the interpretation of its powers by any branch is due great respect from the others . . . . Many decisions of this Court, however, have unequivocally reaffirmed the holding of Marbury . . . that 'it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.'" Id., at 703 (citation omitted).

Contrary to JUSTICE SOUTER's suggestion, see post, at 19-21, and n. 14, Gibbons did not exempt the commerce power from this cardinal rule of constitutional law. His assertion that, from Gibbons on, public opinion has been the only restraint on the congressional exercise of the commerce power is true only insofar as it contends that political accountability is and has been the only limit on Congress' exercise of the commerce power within that power's outer bounds. As the language surrounding that relied upon by JUSTICE SOUTER makes clear, Gibbons did not remove from this Court the authority to define that boundary. See Gibbons, supra, at 194-195 ("It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States . . . . Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose; and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended, would not have been made, had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State").

----------End Footnotes---------- [*617] [33] [1754]

[13A]
[14A]
We accordingly reject the argument that Congress may regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce. The Constitution requires a distinction between what is [*618] truly national and what is truly local. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 568 (citing Jones & Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S. at 30). In recognizing this fact we preserve one of the few principles that has been consistent since the Clause was adopted. The regulation and punishment of intrastate violence that is not directed at the instrumentalities, channels, or goods involved in interstate commerce has always been the province of the States. See, e.g., Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 6 Wheat. 264, 426, 428, 5 L. Ed. 257 (1821) (Marshall, C. J.) (stating that Congress "has no general right to punish murder committed within any of the States," and that it is "clear . . . that congress cannot punish felonies generally"). Indeed, we can think of no better example of the police power, which the Founders denied the National Government and reposed in the States, than the suppression of violent crime and vindication of its victims. n8 See, e.g., [34] Lopez, 514 U.S. at 566 ("The Constitution . . . withholds from Congress a plenary police power"); id., at 584-585 (THOMAS, J., concurring) ("We always have rejected readings [*619] of the Commerce Clause and the scope of federal power that would permit Congress to exercise a police power"), 596-597, and n. 6 (noting that the first Congresses did not enact nationwide punishments for criminal conduct under the Commerce Clause).

REV_00258893

[14B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 JUSTICE SOUTER disputes our assertion that the Constitution reserves the general police power to the States, noting that the Founders failed to adopt several proposals for additional guarantees against federal encroachment on state authority. See post, at 19-22, and n. 14. This argument is belied by the entire structure of the Constitution. With its careful enumeration of federal powers and explicit statement that all powers not granted to the Federal Government are reserved, the Constitution cannot realistically be interpreted as granting the Federal Government an unlimited license to regulate. See, e.g., New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 156-157, 120 L. Ed. 2d 120, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992). And, as discussed above, the Constitution's separation of federal power and the creation of the Judicial Branch indicate that disputes regarding the extent of congressional power are largely subject to judicial review. See n. 7, supra. Moreover, the principle that "'the Constitution created a Federal Government of limited powers,'" while reserving a generalized police power to the States is deeply ingrained in our constitutional history. New York, supra, at 155 (quoting Gregory v. Ashcroft, supra, at 457; see also Lopez, 514 U.S. at 584-599 (THOMAS, J., concurring) (discussing the history of the debates surrounding the adoption of the Commerce Clause and our subsequent interpretation of the Clause); Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 196, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [35]

III

[1B]
[13B]
Because we conclude that the Commerce Clause does not provide Congress [1755] with authority to enact § 13981, we address petitioners' alternative argument that the section's civil remedy should be upheld as an exercise of Congress' remedial power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. As noted above, Congress expressly invoked the Fourteenth Amendment as a source of authority to enact § 13981.

[15]
The principles governing an analysis of congressional legislation under § 5 are well settled. Section 5 states that Congress may "'enforce,' by 'appropriate legislation' the constitutional guarantee that no State shall deprive any person of 'life, liberty or property, without due process of law,' nor deny any person 'equal protection of the laws.'" City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 517, 138 L. Ed. 2d 624, 117 S. Ct. 2157 (1997). Section 5 is "a positive grant of legislative power," Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 651, 16 L. Ed. 2d 828, 86 S. Ct. 1717 (1966), that includes authority to "prohibit conduct which is not itself unconstitutional and [to] intrude into 'legislative spheres of autonomy previously reserved to the States.'" Flores, supra, at 518 (quoting Fitzpatrick v. Bitzer, 427 U.S. 445, 455, 49 L. Ed. 2d 614, 96

REV_00258894

S. Ct. 2666 (1976)); [36] see also Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. , (2000) (slip op., at 16). However, as broad as the congressional enforcement power is, it is not unlimited." Oregon v. Mitchell, 400 U.S. 112, 128, 27 L. Ed. 2d 272, 91 S. Ct. 260 (1970); see also Kimel, supra, at - (slip op., at 16-17). In fact, as we discuss in detail below, several limitations inherent in § 5's text and constitutional context have been recognized since the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted.

Petitioners' § 5 argument is founded on an assertion that there is pervasive bias in various state justice systems against victims of gender-motivated violence. This assertion [*620] is supported by a voluminous congressional record. Specifically, Congress received evidence that many participants in state justice systems are perpetuating an array of erroneous stereotypes and assumptions. Congress concluded that these discriminatory stereotypes often result in insufficient investigation and prosecution of gender-motivated crime, inappropriate focus on the behavior and credibility of the victims of that crime, and unacceptably lenient punishments for those who are actually convicted of gender-motivated violence. See [37] H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711, at 385-386; S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 38, 41-55; S. Rep. No. 102-197, at 33-35, 41, 43-47. Petitioners contend that this bias denies victims of gender-motivated violence the equal protection of the laws and that Congress therefore acted appropriately in enacting a private civil remedy against the perpetrators of gender-motivated violence to both remedy the States' bias and deter future instances of discrimination in the state courts.

[16]
As our cases have established, ↑state-sponsored gender discrimination violates equal protection unless it "'serves "important governmental objectives and . . . the discriminatory means employed" are "substantially related to the achievement of those objectives."' " United States v. Virginia, 518 U.S. 515, 533, 135 L. Ed. 2d 735, 116 S. Ct. 2264 (1996) (quoting Mississippi Univ. for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718, 724, 73 L. Ed. 2d 1090, 102 S. Ct. 3331 (1982), in turn quoting Wengler v. Druggists Mut. Ins. Co., 446 U.S. 142, 150, 64 L. Ed. 2d 107, 100 S. Ct. 1540 (1980)). See also Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 198-199, 50 L. Ed. 2d 397, 97 S. Ct. 451 (1976). However, the language and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment place certain limitations on the manner in which Congress may attack [38] discriminatory conduct. These limitations are necessary to prevent the Fourteenth Amendment from obliterating the Framers' carefully crafted balance of power between the States and the National Government. See Flores, 521 U.S. at 520-524 (reviewing the history of the Fourteenth Amendment's enactment and discussing the contemporary belief [1756] that the Amendment "does [*621] not concentrate power in the general government for any purpose of police government within the States") (quoting T. Cooley, Constitutional Limitations 294, n. 1 (2d ed. 1871)). Foremost among these limitations is the time-honored principle that ↑the Fourteenth Amendment, by its very terms, prohibits only state action. The principle has become firmly embedded in our constitutional law that the action inhibited by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment is only such action as may fairly be said to be that of the States. That Amendment erects no shield against merely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful." Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1, 13, 92 L. Ed. 1161, 68 S. Ct. 836, and n. 12 (1948).

Shortly after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, we decided two cases interpreting the Amendment's provisions, [39] United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 27 L. Ed. 290, 1 S. Ct. 601 (1883), and the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835, 3 S. Ct. 18 (1883). In Harris, the Court considered a challenge to § 2 of the Civil Rights Act of 1871. That section sought to punish "private persons" for "conspiring to deprive any one of the equal protection of the laws enacted by the State." 106 U.S. at 639. We concluded that this law exceeded Congress' § 5 power because the law was "directed exclusively against the action of private persons, without reference to the laws of the State, or their administration by her officers." 106 U.S. at 640. In so doing, we reemphasized our statement from Virginia v. Rives, 100 U.S. 313, 318, 25 L. Ed. 667 (1880), that "'these provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.'"

REV_00258895

Harris, supra, at 639 (misquotation in Harris).

We reached a similar conclusion in the Civil Rights Cases. In those consolidated cases, we held that the public accommodation provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which applied to purely private conduct, were beyond the scope [40] of the § 5 enforcement power. 109 U.S. at 11 ("Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject-matter of the [Fourteenth] Amendment. See also, e.g., Romer v. [*622] Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 628, 134 L. Ed. 2d 855, 116 S. Ct. 1620 (1996) (It was settled early that the Fourteenth Amendment did not give Congress a general power to prohibit discrimination in public accommodations"); Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 936, 73 L. Ed. 2d 482, 102 S. Ct. 2744 (1982) ("Careful adherence to the 'state action' requirement preserves an area of individual freedom by limiting the reach of federal law and federal judicial power"); Blum v. Yaretsky, 457 U.S. 991, 1002, 73 L. Ed. 2d 534, 102 S. Ct. 2777 (1982); Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 172, 32 L. Ed. 2d 627, 92 S. Ct. 1965 (1972); Adickes v. S. H. Kress & Co., 398 U.S. 144, 147 n. 2, 26 L. Ed. 2d 142, 90 S. Ct. 1598 (1970); United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542, 554, 23 L. Ed. 588 (1876) ("The fourteenth amendment prohibits a state from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the [41] States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society").

The force of the doctrine of stare decisis behind these decisions stems not only from the length of time they have been on the books, but also from the insight attributable to the Members of the Court at that time. Every Member had been appointed by President Lincoln, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, or Arthur -- and each of their judicial appointees obviously had intimate knowledge and familiarity with the events surrounding the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Petitioners contend that two more recent decisions have in effect overruled this longstanding limitation on Congress' § 5 authority. They rely on United States v. [1757] Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 16 L. Ed. 2d 239, 86 S. Ct. 1170 (1966), for the proposition that the rule laid down in the Civil Rights Cases is no longer good law. In Guest, the Court reversed the construction of an indictment under 18 U.S.C. § 241, saying in the course of its opinion that "we deal here with issues of statutory construction, not with issues of constitutional power." 383 U.S. at 749. Three Members of the Court, in a separate opinion [42] by Justice Brennan, expressed the view that the Civil Rights Cases [*623] were wrongly decided, and that Congress could under § 5 prohibit actions by private individuals. 383 U.S. at 774 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part). Three other Members of the Court, who joined the opinion of the Court, joined a separate opinion by Justice Clark which in two or three sentences stated the conclusion that Congress could punish all conspiracies -- with or without state action -- that interfere with Fourteenth Amendment rights." Id. at 762 (concurring opinion). Justice Harlan, in another separate opinion, commented with respect to the statement by these Justices:

> "The action of three of the Justices who joined the Court's opinion in nonetheless cursorily pronouncing themselves on the far-reaching constitutional questions deliberately not reached in Part II seems to me, to say the very least, extraordinary." Id., at 762, n. 1 (opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part).

Though these three Justices saw fit to opine on matters not before the Court in Guest, the Court had no occasion to revisit the Civil Rights [43] Cases and Harris, having determined "the indictment [charging private individuals with conspiring to deprive blacks of equal access to state facilities] in fact contained an express allegation of state involvement." 383 U.S. at 756. The Court concluded that the implicit allegation of "active connivance by agents of the State" eliminated any need to decide "the threshold level that state action must attain in order to create rights under the Equal Protection Clause." Ibid. All of this Justice Clark explicitly acknowledged. See id., at 762 (concurring opinion) ("The Court's interpretation of the indictment clearly avoids the question whether Congress, by appropriate legislation, has the power to punish private conspiracies that interfere with Fourteenth Amendment rights, such as the right to utilize public facilities"). [*624]

REV_00258896

To accept petitioners' argument, moreover, one must add to the three Justices joining Justice Brennan's reasoned explanation for his belief that the Civil Rights Cases were wrongly decided, the three Justices joining Justice Clark's opinion who gave no explanation whatever for their similar view. This is simply not the way [44] that reasoned constitutional adjudication proceeds. We accordingly have no hesitation in saying that it would take more than the naked dicta contained in Justice Clark's opinion, when added to Justice Brennan's opinion, to cast any doubt upon the enduring vitality of the Civil Rights Cases and Harris.

Petitioners also rely on District of Columbia v. Carter, 409 U.S. 418, 34 L. Ed. 2d 613, 93 S. Ct. 602 (1973). Carter was a case addressing the question whether the District of Columbia was a "State" within the meaning of Rev. Stat. § 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 -- a section which by its terms requires state action before it may be employed. A footnote in that opinion recites the same litany respecting Guest that petitioners rely on. This litany is of course entirely dicta, and in any event cannot rise above its source. We believe that the description of the § 5 power contained in the Civil Rights Cases is correct:

> "But where a subject has not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular state legislation or state action in reference [45] to that subject, the power given is limited [1758] by its object, any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or proceedings of state officers." 109 U.S. at 18.

Petitioners alternatively argue that, unlike the situation in the Civil Rights Cases, here there has been gender-based disparate treatment by state authorities, whereas in those cases there was no indication of such state action. There is [*625] abundant evidence, however, to show that the Congresses that enacted the Civil Rights Acts of 1871 and 1875 had a purpose similar to that of Congress in enacting § 13981: There were state laws on the books bespeaking equality of treatment, but in the administration of these laws there was discrimination against newly freed slaves. The statement of Representative Garfield in the House and that of Senator Sumner in the Senate are representative:

> The chief complaint is not that the laws of the State are unequal, but that even where the laws are just and equal on their face, yet, by a systematic maladministration of them, or a neglect or refusal to [46] enforce their provisions, a portion of the people are denied equal protection under them." Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess., App. 153 (1871) (statement of Rep. Garfield).

> "The Legislature of South Carolina has passed a law giving precisely the rights contained in your 'supplementary civil rights bill.' But such a law remains a dead letter on her statute-books, because the State courts, comprised largely of those whom the Senator wishes to obtain amnesty for, refuse to enforce it." Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 2d Sess., 430 (1872) (statement of Sen. Sumner).

See also, e.g., Cong. Globe, 42d Cong., 1st Sess., at 653 (statement of Sen. Osborn); id., at 457 (statement of Rep. Coburn); id., at App. 78 (statement of Rep. Perry); 2 Cong. Rec. 457 (1874) (statement of Rep. Butler); 3 Cong. Rec. 945 (1875) (statement of Rep. Lynch).

[17]
But even if that distinction were valid, we do not believe it would save § 13981's civil remedy. For the remedy is simply not "corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or proceedings of state officers." Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 18. Or, as we have phrased [47] it in more recent cases, prophylactic legislation under § 5 must have a "'congruence [*626] and proportionality between the injury to be prevented or remedied and the means adopted to that end." Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Ed. Expense Bd. v. College Savings Bank, 527 U.S. 627, 639, 144 L. Ed. 2d 575, 119 S. Ct. 2199 (1999); Flores, 521 U.S. at 526. Section 13981 is not aimed at proscribing discrimination by officials which the Fourteenth Amendment might not itself proscribe; it is directed not at any State or state actor, but at individuals who have committed criminal acts motivated by gender bias.

In the present cases, for example, § 13981 visits no consequence whatever on any Virginia public official involved in investigating or prosecuting Brzonkala's assault. The section is, therefore, unlike any of the § 5 remedies that we have previously upheld. For example, in Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 16 L. Ed. 2d 828, 86 S. Ct. 1717 (1966), Congress prohibited New York from imposing literacy tests as a prerequisite for voting because it found that such a requirement disenfranchised thousands of Puerto Rican immigrants who had been educated in the Spanish language of their home territory. That [48] law, which we upheld, was directed at New York officials who administered the State's election law and prohibited them from using a provision of that law. In South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 15 L. Ed. 2d 769, 86 S. Ct. 803 (1966), Congress imposed voting rights requirements on States that, Congress found, had a history of discriminating against blacks in voting. [1759] The remedy was also directed at state officials in those States. Similarly, in Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 25 L. Ed. 676 (1880), Congress criminally punished state officials who intentionally discriminated in jury selection; again, the remedy was directed to the culpable state official.

Section 13981 is also different from these previously upheld remedies in that it applies uniformly throughout the Nation. Congress' findings indicate that the problem of discrimination against the victims of gender-motivated crimes does not exist in all States, or even most States. By contrast, the § 5 remedy upheld in Katzenbach v. Morgan, supra, [*627] was directed only to the State where the evil found by Congress existed, and in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra, the remedy was directed [49] only to those States in which Congress found that there had been discrimination.

[1C]
For these reasons, we conclude that Congress' power under § 5 does not extend to the enactment of § 13981.

IV

[1D]
Petitioner Brzonkala's complaint alleges that she was the victim of a brutal assault. But Congress' effort in § 13981 to provide a federal civil remedy can be sustained neither under the Commerce Clause nor under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. If the allegations here are true, no civilized system of justice could fail to provide her a remedy for the conduct of respondent Morrison. But under our federal system that remedy must be provided by the Commonwealth of Virginia, and not by the United States. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

REV_00258898

OUTCOME: The court affirmed and held that Congress lacked the authority to enact the subject statute under the Commerce Clause because the statute did not involve economic activity or interstate commerce. The court also affirmed that Congress lacked authority to enact said statute under U.S. Const. amend. XIV since the statute governed the conduct of private individuals instead of harm caused by the state.

CORE TERMS: interstate commerce, violence, commerce, commerce power, Fourteenth Amendment, gender-motivated, gender, regulation, interstate, rape, violent crime, federalism, intrastate, noneconomic, categorical, enact, domestic violence, framers, aggregate, gender bias, consumption, regulating, state regulation, federalist, plenary, gun, economic activity, national economy, state action, regulated

CORE CONCEPTS - ♦ Hide Concepts

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Sex
See 42 U.S.C.S. § 13981(b)-(e).

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties
Every law enacted by Congress must be based on one or more of its powers enumerated in the U.S. Constitution.

Constitutional Law : The Judiciary : Case or Controversy : Constitutionality of Legislation
Due respect for the decisions of a coordinate branch of Government demands that the Court invalidate a congressional enactment only upon a plain showing that Congress has exceeded its constitutional bounds.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Even modern-era precedents which have expanded congressional power under the Commerce Clause confirm that Congress' regulatory authority is subject to outer limits. The scope of the interstate commerce power must be considered in the light of the dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon interstate commerce so indirect and remote that to embrace them would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Modern Commerce Clause jurisprudence has identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate under its commerce power. First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce. Second, Congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities. Finally, Congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, namely, those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Where economic activity substantially affects interstate commerce, legislation regulating that activity will be sustained.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

REV_00258881

CONCURBY: THOMAS

CONCUR: JUSTICE THOMAS, concurring.

The majority opinion correctly applies our decision in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995), and I join it in full. I write separately only to express my view that the very notion of a "substantial effects" test under the Commerce Clause is inconsistent with the original understanding of Congress' powers and with this Court's early Commerce Clause cases. By [50] continuing to apply this rootless and malleable standard, however circumscribed, the Court has encouraged the Federal Government to persist in its view that the Commerce Clause has virtually no limits. Until this Court replaces its existing Commerce Clause jurisprudence with a standard more consistent with the original understanding, we will continue to see Congress appropriating state police powers under the guise of regulating commerce.

DISSENTBY: SOUTER; BREYER

DISSENT: [*628]

JUSTICE SOUTER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE GINSBURG, and JUSTICE BREYER join, dissenting.

The Court says both that it leaves Commerce Clause precedent undisturbed and that the Civil Rights Remedy of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, 42 U.S.C. § 13981, exceeds Congress's power under that Clause. I find the claims irreconcilable and respectfully dissent. n1

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 Finding the law a valid exercise of Commerce Clause power, I have no occasion to reach the question whether it might also be sustained as an exercise of Congress's power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [51]

I

Our cases, which remain at least nominally undisturbed, stand for the following propositions. Congress has the power to legislate with regard to activity that, in the aggregate, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. See Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 124-128, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942); Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., 452 U.S. 264, 277, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981). The fact of such a substantial effect is not an issue for the courts in the first instance, ibid., but for the Congress, whose institutional capacity for gathering evidence and taking testimony far exceeds [1760] ours. By passing legislation, Congress indicates its conclusion, whether explicitly or not, that facts support its exercise of the commerce power. The business of the courts is to review the congressional assessment, not for soundness but simply for the rationality of concluding that a jurisdictional basis exists in fact. See ibid. Any explicit findings that Congress chooses to make, though not dispositive of the question of rationality, may advance judicial review by identifying factual authority on which Congress relied. Applying those propositions in these cases can lead [52] to only one conclusion.

One obvious difference from United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995), is the mountain of data assembled by Congress, [*629] here showing the effects of violence against women on interstate commerce. n2 Passage of the Act in 1994 was preceded by four years of hearings, n3 which included testimony from physicians and law professors; n4 from survivors [*630] of rape and domestic violence; n5 and from representatives of state law enforcement and private business. n6 The record includes reports on gender bias from task forces in 21 States, n7 and we have the benefit of specific factual findings [*631] in [1761] the eight separate Reports issued by Congress and its committees over the long course leading to enactment. n8 Compare Hodel, 452 U.S. at 278-279 (noting "extended hearings," "vast amounts of testimony and documentary evidence," and "years of the most thorough legislative consideration"). [53] [54] [55]

REV_00258899

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 It is true that these data relate to the effects of violence against women generally, while the civil rights remedy limits its scope to "crimes of violence motivated by gender" -- presumably a somewhat narrower subset of acts. See 42 U.S.C. § 13981(b). But the meaning of "motivated by gender" has not been elucidated by lower courts, much less by this one, so the degree to which the findings rely on acts not redressable by the civil rights remedy is unclear. As will appear, however, much of the data seems to indicate behavior with just such motivation. In any event, adopting a cramped reading of the statutory text, and thereby increasing the constitutional difficulties, would directly contradict one of the most basic canons of statutory interpretation. See NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 30, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937). Having identified the problem of violence against women, Congress may address what it sees as the most threatening manifestation; "reform may take one step at a time." Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 489, 99 L. Ed. 563, 75 S. Ct. 461 (1955).

n3 See, e.g., Domestic Violence: Terrorism in the Home, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. (1990) (S. Hearing 101-897); Women and Violence, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. (1990); Violence Against Women: Victims of the System, Hearing on S. 15 before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. (1991) (S. Hearing 102-369); Violence Against Women, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Crime and Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (1992); Hearing on Domestic Violence, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (S. Hearing 103-596); Violent Crimes Against Women, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (S. Hearing 103-726); Violence Against Women: Fighting the Fear, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (S. Hearing 103-878); Crimes of Violence Motivated by Gender, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993); Domestic Violence: Not Just a Family Matter, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Crime and Criminal Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. (1994).

n4 See, e.g., S. Hearing 103-596, at 1-4 (testimony of Northeastern Univ. Law School Professor Clare Dalton); S. Hearing 102-369, at 103-105 (testimony of Univ. of Chicago Professor Cass Sunstein); S. Hearing 103-878, at 7-11 (testimony of American Medical Assn. president-elect Robert McAfee).

n5 See, e.g., id., at 13-17 (testimony of Lisa); id. at 40-42 (testimony of Jennifer Tescher).

n6 See, e.g., S. Hearing 102-369, at 24-36, 71-87 (testimony of attorneys general of Iowa and Illinois); id., at 235-245 (testimony of National Federation of Business and Professional Women); S. Hearing No. 103-596, at 15-17 (statement of James Hardeman, Manager, Counseling Dept., Polaroid Corp.).

n7 See Judicial Council of California Advisory Committee on Gender Bias in the Courts, Achieving Equal Justice for Women and Men in the California Courts (July 1996) (edited version of 1990 report); Colorado Supreme Court Task Force on Gender Bias in the Courts, Gender and Justice in the Colorado Courts (1990); Connecticut Task Force on Gender, Justice and the Courts, Report to the Chief Justice (Sept. 1991); Report of the Florida Supreme Court Gender Bias Study Commission (Mar. 1990); Supreme Court of Georgia, Commission on Gender Bias in the Judicial System, Gender and Justice in the Courts (1991), reprinted in 8 Ga. St. U. L. Rev. 539 (1992); Report of the Illinois Task Force on Gender Bias in the Courts (1990); Equality in the Courts Task Force, State of Iowa, Final Report (Feb. 1993); Kentucky Task Force on Gender Fairness in the Courts, Equal Justice for Women and Men (Jan. 1992); Louisiana Task Force on Women in the Courts, Final Report (1992); Maryland Special Joint Comm., Gender Bias in the Courts (May 1989); Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, Gender Bias Study of the Court System in Massachusetts (1989); Michigan Supreme Court Task Force on Gender Issues in the Courts, Final Report (Dec. 1989); Minnesota Supreme Court Task Force for Gender Fairness in the Courts, Final Report (1989), reprinted in 15 Wm. Mitchell L. Rev. 825 (1989); Nevada Supreme Court Gender Bias Task Force, Justice For Women (1988); New Jersey Supreme Court Task Force on Women in the Courts, Report of the First Year (June 1984); Report of the New York Task Force on Women in the Courts (Mar. 1986); Final Report of the Rhode Island Supreme Court Committee on Women in the Courts (June 1987); Utah Task Force on Gender and Justice, Report to the Utah Judicial Council (Mar. 1990); Vermont Supreme Court and Vermont Bar Assn., Gender and Justice: Report of the Vermont Task Force on Gender Bias in the Legal System (Jan. 1991); Washington State Task Force on Gender and Justice in the Courts, Final Report (1989); Wisconsin Equal Justice Task Force, Final Report (Jan. 1991).

REV_00258900

n8 See S. Rep. No. 101-545 (1990); Majority Staff of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Violence Against Women: The Increase of Rape in America, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. (Comm. Print 1991); S. Rep. No. 102-197 (1991); Majority Staff of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Violence Against Women: A Week in the Life of America, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (Comm. Print 1992); S. Rep. No. 103-138 (1993); Majority Staff of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, The Response to Rape: Detours on the Road to Equal Justice, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (Comm. Print 1993); H. R. Rep. No. 103-395 (1993); H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711 (1994).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

With respect to domestic violence, Congress received evidence for the following findings:

> "Three out of four American women will be victims of violent crimes sometime during their life." H. R. Rep. No. 103-395 p. 25 (1993) (citing U.S. Dept. of Justice, Report to the Nation on Crime and Justice 29 (2d ed. 1988)).
>
> "Violence is the leading cause of injuries to women ages 15 to 44 . . . ." S. Rep. No. 103-138, p. 38 (1993) (citing Surgeon General Antonia Novello, From the Surgeon General, [56] U.S. Public Health Services, 267 JAMA 3132 (1992)).
>
> "As many as 50 percent of homeless women and children are fleeing domestic violence." S. Rep. No. 101-545, p. 37 (1990) (citing E. Schneider, Legal Reform Efforts for Battered Women: Past, Present, and Future (July 1990)).
>
> "Since 1974, the assault rate against women has outstripped the rate for men by at least twice for some age groups and far more for others." S. Rep. No. 101-545, [*632] at 30 (citing Bureau of Justice Statistics, Criminal Victimization in the United States (1974) (Table 5)).
>
> "Battering 'is the single largest cause of injury to women in the United States.'"

REV_00258901

S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 37 (quoting Van Hightower & McManus, Limits of State Constitutional Guarantees: Lessons from Efforts to Implement Domestic Violence Policies, 49 Pub. Admin. Rev. 269 (May/June 1989).

"An estimated 4 million American women are battered each year by their [1762] husbands or partners." H. R. Rep. No. 103-395, at 26 (citing Council on Scientific Affairs, American Medical Assn., Violence Against Women: Relevance for Medical Practitioners, 267 JAMA 3184, 3185 (1992).

"Over 1 million women in the United States seek medical assistance [57] each year for injuries sustained [from] their husbands or other partners." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 37 (citing Stark & Flitcraft, Medical Therapy as Repression: The Case of the Battered Woman, Health & Medicine (Summer/Fall 1982).

"Between 2,000 and 4,000 women die every year from [domestic] abuse." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 36 (citing Schneider, supra).

"Arrest rates may be as low as 1 for every 100 domestic assaults." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 38 (citing Dutton, Profiling of Wife Assaulters: Preliminary Evidence for Trimodal Analysis, 3 Violence and Victims 5-30 (1988)).

"Partial estimates show that violent crime against women costs this country at least 3 billion -- not million, but billion -- dollars a year." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 33 (citing Schneider, supra, at 4).

"Estimates suggest that we spend $ 5 to $ 10 billion a year on health care, criminal justice, and other social costs of domestic violence." S. Rep. No. 103-138, at [*633] 41 (citing Biden, Domestic Violence: A Crime, Not a Quarrel, Trial 56 (June 1993)).

The evidence as to rape was similarly extensive, supporting these conclusions:

"[The incidence of] rape rose four times as fast as the total national [58] crime rate over the past 10 years." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 30 (citing Federal Bureau of Investigation Uniform Crime Reports (1988)).

"According to one study, close to half a million girls now in high school will be raped before they graduate." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 31 (citing R. Warshaw, I Never Called it Rape 117 (1988)).

"[One hundred twenty-five thousand] college women can expect to be raped during this -- or any -- year." S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 43 (citing testimony of Dr. Mary Koss before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Aug. 29, 1990).

"Three-quarters of women never go to the movies alone after dark because of the fear of rape and nearly 50 percent do not use public transit alone after dark for the same reason." S. Rep. No. 102-197, p. 38 (1991) (citing M. Gordon & S. Riger, The Female Fear 15 (1989)).

"[Forty-one] percent of judges surveyed believed that juries give sexual assault victims less credibility than other crime victims." S. Rep. No. 102-197, at 47 (citing Colorado Supreme Court Task Force on Gender Bias in the Courts, Gender Justice in the Colorado Courts 91 (1990)).

REV_00258902

> "Less than 1 percent of all [rape] victims have collected damages." S. Rep. No. 102-197, at [59] 44 (citing report by Jury Verdict Research, Inc.).
>
> "'An individual who commits rape has only about 4 chances in 100 of being arrested, prosecuted, and found guilty of any offense.'" S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 33, n. 30 [*634] (quoting H. Feild & L. Bienen, Jurors and Rape: A Study in Psychology and Law 95 (1980)).
>
> "Almost one-quarter of convicted rapists never go to prison and another quarter received sentences in local jails where the average sentence is 11 months." S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 38 (citing Majority Staff Report of Senate Committee on the Judiciary, The Response to Rape: Detours on the Road to Equal Justice, 103d Cong., 1st Sess., 2 (Comm. Print 1993)).
>
> "Almost 50 percent of rape victims lose their jobs or are forced to quit because of the crime's severity." S. Rep. No. 102-197, at 53 (citing Ellis, Atkeson, & Calhoun, An Assessment of Long-Term Reaction to Rape, 90 J. Abnormal Psych., No. 3, p. 264 (1981). [1763]

Based on the data thus partially summarized, Congress found that > "crimes of violence motivated by gender have a substantial adverse effect on interstate commerce, by deterring potential victims from traveling interstate, from engaging in employment in interstate [60] business, and from transacting with business, and in places involved, in interstate commerce . . . [,] by diminishing national productivity, increasing medical and other costs, and decreasing the supply of and the demand for interstate products . . . ." H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711, p. 385 (1994).

Congress thereby explicitly stated the predicate for the exercise of its Commerce Clause power. Is its conclusion irrational in view of the data amassed? True, the methodology of particular studies may be challenged, and some of the figures arrived at may be disputed. But the sufficiency of the evidence before Congress to provide a rational basis for the finding cannot seriously be questioned. Cf. Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 520 U.S. 180, 199, 137 L. Ed. 2d 369, 117 S. Ct. 1174 (1997) [*635] ("The Constitution gives to Congress the role of weighing conflicting evidence in the legislative process").

Indeed, the legislative record here is far more voluminous than the record compiled by Congress and found sufficient in two prior cases upholding Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 against Commerce Clause challenges. In Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964), [61] and Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964), the Court referred to evidence showing the consequences of racial discrimination by motels and restaurants on interstate commerce. Congress had relied on compelling anecdotal reports that individual instances of segregation cost thousands to millions of dollars. See Civil Rights -- Public Accommodations, Hearings on S. 1732 before the Senate Committee on Commerce, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., App. V, pp. 1383-1387 (1963). Congress also had evidence that the average black family spent substantially less than the average white family in the same income range on public accommodations, and that discrimination accounted for much of the difference. H. R. Rep. No. 88-914, pt. 2, pp. 9-10, and Table II (1963) (Additional Views on H. R. 7152 of Hon. William M. McCulloch, Hon. John V. Lindsay, Hon. William T. Cahill, Hon. Garner E. Shriver, Hon. Clark MacGregor, Hon. Charles McC. Mathias, Hon. James E. Bromwell).

REV_00258903

While Congress did not, to my knowledge, calculate aggregate dollar values for the nationwide effects of racial discrimination in 1964, in 1994 it did rely on evidence of the harms caused by domestic violence and sexual [62] assault, citing annual costs of $ 3 billion in 1990, see S. Rep. 101-545, and $ 5 to $ 10 billion in 1993, see S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 41. n9 Equally important, though, gender-based violence in the 1990's was shown to operate in a manner similar to racial [*636] discrimination in the 1960's in reducing the mobility of employees and their production and consumption of goods shipped in interstate commerce. Like racial discrimination, gender-based violence bars its most likely targets -- women -- from full participation in the national economy." Id., at 54.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n9 In other cases, we have accepted dramatically smaller figures. See, e.g., Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. 314, 325, n. 11, 69 L. Ed. 2d 40, 101 S. Ct. 2376 (1981) (stating that corn production with a value of $ 5.16 million "surely is not an insignificant amount of commerce").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

If the analogy to the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is not plain enough, one can always look back a bit further. In Wickard, we upheld the application of the Agricultural Adjustment Act to the planting and [63] consumption of homegrown wheat. The effect on interstate commerce in that case followed from the possibility that wheat [1764] grown at home for personal consumption could either be drawn into the market by rising prices, or relieve its grower of any need to purchase wheat in the market. See 317 U.S. at 127-129. The Commerce Clause predicate was simply the effect of the production of wheat for home consumption on supply and demand in interstate commerce. Supply and demand for goods in interstate commerce will also be affected by the deaths of 2,000 to 4,000 women annually at the hands of domestic abusers, see S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 36, and by the reduction in the work force by the 100,000 or more rape victims who lose their jobs each year or are forced to quit, see id., at 56, H. R. Rep. No. 103-395, at 25-26. Violence against women may be found to affect interstate commerce and affect it substantially. n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 It should go without saying that my view of the limit of the congressional commerce power carries no implication about the wisdom of exercising it to the limit. I and other Members of this Court appearing before Congress have repeatedly argued against the federalization of traditional state crimes and the extension of federal remedies to problems for which the States have historically taken responsibility and may deal with today if they have the will to do so. See Hearings before a Subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, 104th Cong., 1st Sess., pt. 7, pp. 13-14 (1995) (testimony of JUSTICE KENNEDY); Hearings on H. R. 4603 before a Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, 103d Cong., 2d Sess., 100-107 (1994) (testimony of JUSTICES KENNEDY and SOUTER). The Judicial Conference of the United States originally opposed the Act, though after the original bill was amended to include the gender-based animus requirement, the objection was withdrawn for reasons that are not apparent. See Crimes of Violence Motivated by Gender, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess., 70-71 (1993).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*637] [64]

II

The Act would have passed muster at any time between Wickard in 1942 and Lopez in 1995, a period in which the law enjoyed a stable understanding that congressional power under the

REV_00258904

Commerce Clause, complemented by the authority of the Necessary and Proper Clause, Art. I. § 8 cl. 18, extended to all activity that, when aggregated, has a substantial effect on interstate commerce. As already noted, this understanding was secure even against the turmoil at the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in the aftermath of which the Court not only reaffirmed the cumulative effects and rational basis features of the substantial effects test, see Heart of Atlanta, supra, at 258; McClung, supra, at 301-305, but declined to limit the commerce power through a formal distinction between legislation focused on "commerce" and statutes addressing "moral and social wrongs," Heart of Atlanta, supra, at 257.

The fact that the Act does not pass muster before the Court today is therefore proof, to a degree that Lopez was not, that the Court's nominal adherence to the substantial effects test is merely that. Although a new jurisprudence [65] has not emerged with any distinctness, it is clear that some congressional conclusions about obviously substantial, cumulative effects on commerce are being assigned lesser values than the once-stable doctrine would assign them. These devaluations are accomplished not by any express repudiation of the substantial effects test or its application through the aggregation of individual conduct, but by supplanting rational basis scrutiny with a new criterion of review. [*638]

Thus the elusive heart of the majority's analysis in these cases is its statement that Congress's findings of fact are "weakened" by the presence of a disfavored "method of reasoning." Ante, at 14. This seems to suggest that the "substantial effects" analysis is not a factual enquiry, for Congress in the first instance with subsequent judicial review looking only to the rationality of the congressional conclusion, but one of a rather different sort, dependent upon a uniquely judicial competence. [1765]

This new characterization of substantial effects has no support in our cases (the self-fulfilling prophecies of Lopez aside), least of all those the majority cites. Perhaps this explains why the majority is not content to [66] rest on its cited precedent but claims a textual justification for moving toward its new system of congressional deference subject to selective discounts. Thus it purports to rely on the sensible and traditional understanding that the listing in the Constitution of some powers implies the exclusion of others unmentioned. See Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 195, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824); ante, at 10; The Federalist No. 45, p. 313 (J. Cooke ed. 1961) (J. Madison). n11 The majority stresses that Art. I, § 8, enumerates [*639] the powers of Congress, including the commerce power, an enumeration implying the exclusion of powers not enumerated. It follows, for the majority, not only that there must be some limits to "commerce," but that some particular subjects arguably within the commerce power can be identified in advance as excluded, on the basis of characteristics other than their commercial effects. Such exclusions come into sight when the activity regulated is not itself commercial or when the States have traditionally addressed it in the exercise of the general police power, conferred under the state constitutions but never extended to Congress under the Constitution of the Nation, [67] see Lopez, 514 U.S. at 566. Ante, at 16.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n11 The claim that powers not granted were withheld was the chief Federalist argument against the necessity of a bill of rights. Bills of rights, Hamilton claimed, "have no application to constitutions professedly founded upon the power of the people, and executed by their immediate representatives and servants. Here, in strictness, the people surrender nothing, and as they retain every thing, they have no need of particular reservations." The Federalist No. 84, at 578. James Wilson went further in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, asserting that an enumeration of rights was positively dangerous because it suggested, conversely, that every right not reserved was surrendered. See 2 J. Elliot, Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 436-437 (2d ed. 1863) (hereinafter Elliot's Debates). The Federalists did not, of course, prevail on this point; most States voted for the Constitution only after proposing amendments and the First Congress speedily adopted a Bill of Rights. See Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 569, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985) (Powell, J., dissenting). While that document protected a range of specific individual rights against federal infringement, it did not, with the possible exception of the Second Amendment, offer any similarly specific protections to areas of state sovereignty.

REV_00258905

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [68]

The premise that the enumeration of powers implies that other powers are withheld is sound; the conclusion that some particular categories of subject matter are therefore presumptively beyond the reach of the commerce power is, however, a non sequitur. From the fact that Art. I, § 8, cl. 3 grants an authority limited to regulating commerce, it follows only that Congress may claim no authority under that section to address any subject that does not affect commerce. It does not at all follow that an activity affecting commerce nonetheless falls outside the commerce power, depending on the specific character of the activity, or the authority of a State to regulate it along with Congress. n12 My disagreement [*640] with the majority is not, however, confined to logic, for history has [1766] shown that categorical exclusions have proven as unworkable in practice as they are unsupportable in theory.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 To the contrary, we have always recognized that while the federal commerce power may overlap the reserved state police power, in such cases federal authority is supreme. See, e.g., Lake Shore & Michigan Southern R. Co. v. Ohio, 173 U.S. 285, 297-298, 43 L. Ed. 702, 19 S. Ct. 465 (1899) ("When Congress acts with reference to a matter confided to it by the Constitution, then its statutes displace all conflicting local regulations touching that matter, although such regulations may have been established in pursuance of a power not surrendered by the States to the General Government"); United States v. California, 297 U.S. 175, 185, 80 L. Ed. 567, 56 S. Ct. 421 (1936) ("We look to the activities in which the states have traditionally engaged as marking the boundary of the restriction upon the federal taxing power. But there is no such limitation upon the plenary power to regulate commerce").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [69]

A

Obviously, it would not be inconsistent with the text of the Commerce Clause itself to declare "noncommercial" primary activity beyond or presumptively beyond the scope of the commerce power. That variant of categorical approach is not, however, the sole textually permissible way of defining the scope of the Commerce Clause, and any such neat limitation would at least be suspect in the light of the final sentence of Article I, § 8, authorizing Congress to make "all Laws . . . necessary and proper" to give effect to its enumerated powers such as commerce. See United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 118, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941) ("The power of Congress . . . extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce"). Accordingly, for significant periods of our history, the Court has defined the commerce power as plenary, unsusceptible to categorical exclusions, and this was the view expressed throughout the latter part of the 20th century in the substantial [70] effects test. These two conceptions of the commerce power, plenary and categorically limited, are in fact old rivals, and today's revival of their competition summons up familiar history, a brief reprise of which may be helpful in posing what I take to be the key question going to the legitimacy of the majority's decision to breathe new life into the approach of categorical limitation. [*641]

Chief Justice Marshall's seminal opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, at 193-194, construed

REV_00258906

the commerce power from the start with "a breadth never yet exceeded," Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. at 120. In particular, it is worth noting, the Court in Wickard did not regard its holding as exceeding the scope of Chief Justice Marshall's view of interstate commerce; Wickard applied an aggregate effects test to ostensibly domestic, noncommercial farming consistently with Chief Justice Marshall's indication that the commerce power may be understood by its exclusion of subjects, among others, "which do not affect other States," Gibbons, 9 Wheat. at 195. This plenary view of the power has either prevailed or been acknowledged by this Court at every stage [71] of our jurisprudence. See, e.g., id., at 197; Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U.S. 96, 99-100, 32 L. Ed. 352, 9 S. Ct. 28 (1888); Lottery Case, 188 U.S. 321, 353, 47 L. Ed. 492, 23 S. Ct. 321 (1903); Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U.S. 352, 398, 57 L. Ed. 1511, 33 S. Ct. 729 (1913); United States v. California, 297 U.S. 175, 185, 80 L. Ed. 567, 56 S. Ct. 421 (1936); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 115, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941); Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. at 255; Hodel v. Indiana, 452 U.S. at 324. And it was this understanding, free of categorical qualifications, that prevailed in the period after 1937 through Lopez, as summed up by Justice Harlan: "'Of course, the mere fact that Congress has said when particular activity shall be deemed to affect commerce does not preclude further examination by this Court. But where we find that the legislators . . . have a rational basis for finding a chosen regulatory scheme necessary to the protection of commerce, our investigation is at an end.'" Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 190, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968) (quoting Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. at 303-304). [72]

Justice Harlan spoke with the benefit of hindsight, for he had seen the result of rejecting the plenary view, and today's attempt to distinguish between primary activities affecting commerce in terms of the relatively commercial or noncommercial character of the primary conduct proscribed [1767] comes with the pedigree of near-tragedy that I outlined in [*642] United States v. Lopez, supra, at 603 (dissenting opinion). In the half century following the modern activation of the commerce power with passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887, this Court from time to time created categorical enclaves beyond congressional reach by declaring such activities as "mining," "production," "manufacturing," and union membership to be outside the definition of "commerce" and by limiting application of the effects test to "direct" rather than "indirect" commercial consequences. See, e.g., United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325, 15 S. Ct. 249 (1895) (narrowly construing the Sherman Antitrust Act in light of the distinction between "commerce" and "manufacture"); In re Heff, 197 U.S. 488, 505-506, 49 L. Ed. 848, 25 S. Ct. 506 (1905) (stating that Congress could not regulate the intrastate [73] sale of liquor); The Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U.S. 463, 495-496, 52 L. Ed. 297, 28 S. Ct. 141 (1908) (invalidating law governing tort liability for common carriers operating in interstate commerce because the effects on commerce were indirect); Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161, 52 L. Ed. 436, 28 S. Ct. 277 (1908) (holding that labor union membership fell outside "commerce"); Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 38 S. Ct. 529 (1918) (invalidating law prohibiting interstate shipment of goods manufactured with child labor as a regulation of "manufacture"); A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 545-548, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935) (invalidating regulation of activities that only "indirectly" affected commerce); Railroad Retirement Bd. v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330, 368-369, 79 L. Ed. 1468, 55 S. Ct. 758 (1935) (invalidating pension law for railroad workers on the grounds that conditions of employment were only indirectly linked to commerce); Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 303-304, 80 L. Ed. 1160, 56 S. Ct. 855 (1936) (holding that regulation of unfair labor practices in mining regulated "production," not "commerce").

Since adherence to these formalistically contrived confines [74] of commerce power in large measure provoked the judicial crisis of 1937, one might reasonably have doubted that Members of this Court would ever again toy with a return to the days before NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., [*643] 301 U.S. 1, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937), which brought the earlier and nearly disastrous experiment to an end. And yet today's decision can only be seen as a step toward recapturing the prior mistakes. Its revival of a distinction between commercial and noncommercial conduct is at odds with Wickard, which repudiated that analysis, and the enquiry into commercial purpose, first intimated by the Lopez concurrence, see Lopez, supra, at 580 (opinion of KENNEDY, J.), is cousin to the intent-based analysis employed in Hammer, supra, at 271-272 but rejected for Commerce Clause purposes in Heart of Atlanta, supra, at 257 and Darby, supra, at 115.

REV_00258907

Why is the majority tempted to reject the lesson so painfully learned in 1937? An answer emerges from contrasting Wickard with one of the predecessor cases it superseded. It was obvious in Wickard that growing wheat for consumption right on the farm was [75] not "commerce" in the common vocabulary, n13 but that did not [1768] matter constitutionally so long as the aggregated activity of domestic wheat growing affected commerce substantially. Just a few years before [*644] Wickard, however, it had certainly been no less obvious that "mining" practices could substantially affect commerce, even though Carter Coal Co., supra, had held mining regulation beyond the national commerce power. When we try to fathom the difference between the two cases, it is clear that they did not go in different directions because the Carter Coal Court could not understand a causal connection that the Wickard Court could grasp; the difference, rather, turned on the fact that the Court in Carter Coal had a reason for trying to maintain its categorical, formalistic distinction, while that reason had been abandoned by the time Wickard was decided. The reason was laissez-faire economics, the point of which was to keep government interference to a minimum. See Lopez, supra, at 605-606 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). The Court in Carter Coal was still trying to create a laissez-faire world out of the 20th-century economy, and formalistic [76] commercial distinctions were thought to be useful instruments in achieving that object. The Court in Wickard knew it could not do any such thing and in the aftermath of the New Deal had long since stopped attempting the impossible. Without the animating economic theory, there was no point in contriving formalisms in a war with Chief Justice Marshall's conception of the commerce power.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Contrary to the Court's suggestion, ante, at 11, n. 4, Wickard applied the substantial effects test to domestic agricultural production for domestic consumption, an activity that cannot fairly be described as commercial, despite its commercial consequences in affecting or being affected by the demand for agricultural products in the commercial market. The Wickard Court admitted that Filburn's activity "may not be regarded as commerce" but insisted that "it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce . . . ." 317 U.S. at 125. The characterization of home wheat production as "commerce" or not is, however, ultimately beside the point. For if substantial effects on commerce are proper subjects of concern under the Commerce Clause, what difference should it make whether the causes of those effects are themselves commercial? Cf., e.g., National Organization for Women, Inc. v. Scheidler, 510 U.S. 249, 258, 127 L. Ed. 2d 99, 114 S. Ct. 798 (1994) ("An enterprise surely can have a detrimental influence on interstate or foreign commerce without having its own profit-seeking motives"). The Court's answer is that it makes a difference to federalism, and the legitimacy of the Court's new judicially derived federalism is the crux of our disagreement. See infra, at 18-19.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [77]

If we now ask why the formalistic economic/noneconomic distinction might matter today, after its rejection in Wickard, the answer is not that the majority fails to see causal connections in an integrated economic world. The answer is that in the minds of the majority there is a new animating theory that makes categorical formalism seem useful again. Just as the old formalism had value in the service of an economic conception, the new one is useful in serving a conception of federalism. It is the instrument by which assertions of national power are to be limited in favor of preserving a supposedly discernible, proper sphere of state autonomy to legislate or refrain from legislating as the individual [*645] States see fit. The legitimacy of the Court's current emphasis on the noncommercial nature of regulated activity,

REV_00258908

Congress normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens that an activity has on interstate commerce, but the existence of such findings may enable the Court to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affects interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect is visible to the naked eye.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Sex
Gender-motivated crimes of violence are not, in any sense of the phrase, economic activity.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Simply because Congress may conclude that a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce does not necessarily make it so. Rather, whether particular operations affect interstate commerce sufficiently to come under the constitutional power of Congress to regulate them is ultimately a judicial rather than a legislative question, and can be settled finally only by the Court.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Congress may not regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on that conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce. The U.S. Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local. The regulation and punishment of intrastate violence that is not directed at the instrumentalities, channels, or goods involved in interstate commerce is the province of the states.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection
See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 5.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Sex
State-sponsored gender discrimination violates equal protection unless it serves important governmental objectives and the discriminatory means employed are substantially related to the achievement of those objectives.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection
U.S. Const. amend. XIV, by its very terms, prohibits only state action. U.S. Const. amend. XIV erects no shield against merely private conduct, however discriminatory or wrongful.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties
Where a subject has not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular state legislation or state action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object, any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited state laws or proceedings of state officers.

Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS:

Petitioner Brzonkala filed suit, alleging, inter alia, that she was raped by respondents while the three were students at the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, and that this attack violated 42 U.S.C. § 13981, which provides a federal civil remedy for the victims of gender-motivated violence. Respondents moved to dismiss on the grounds that the complaint failed to state a then, does not turn on any logic serving the text of the Commerce Clause or on the realism of the majority's view of the national economy. The essential issue is rather the strength of the majority's claim to have a constitutional warrant for its current conception of a federal relationship enforceable by this Court through limits on otherwise plenary commerce power. This [78] conception is the subject of the majority's second categorical discount applied today to the facts bearing on the substantial effects test.

REV_00258882

B

The Court finds it relevant that the statute addresses conduct traditionally subject to state prohibition under domestic criminal law, a fact said to have some heightened significance when the violent conduct in question is not itself aimed directly at interstate commerce or its instrumentalities. Ante, at 9. Again, history seems to be recycling, for the theory of traditional state concern as grounding a limiting principle has been rejected previously, and more than once. It was disapproved in Darby, 312 U.S. at 123-124, and held insufficient standing alone to limit [1769] the commerce power in Hodel, 452 U.S. at 276-277. In the particular context of the Fair Labor Standards Act it was rejected in Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968), with the recognition that there is no general doctrine implied in the Federal Constitution that the two governments, national and state, are each to exercise its powers so as not to interfere with the free and full exercise of the powers of the other." Id., at 195 [79] (internal quotation marks omitted). The Court held it to be "clear that the Federal Government, when acting within delegated power, may override countervailing state interests, whether these be described as 'governmental' or 'proprietary' in character." Ibid. While Wirtz was later overruled by National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 49 L. Ed. 2d 245, 96 S. Ct. 2465 [*646] (1976), that case was itself repudiated in Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985), which held that the concept of "traditional governmental function" (as an element of the immunity doctrine under Hodel) was incoherent, there being no explanation that would make sense of the multifarious decisions placing some functions on one side of the line, some on the other. 469 U.S. at 546-547. The effort to carve out inviolable state spheres within the spectrum of activities substantially affecting commerce was, of course, just as irreconcilable with Gibbons's explanation of the national commerce power as being as "absolute as it would be in a single government," 9 Wheat. at 197. n14

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 The Constitution of 1787 did, in fact, forbid some exercises of the commerce power. Article I, § 9, cl. 6, barred Congress from giving preference to the ports of one State over those of another. More strikingly, the Framers protected the slave trade from federal interference, see Art. I, § 9, cl. 1, and confirmed the power of a State to guarantee the chattel status of slaves who fled to another State, see Art. IV, § 2, cl. 3. These reservations demonstrate the plenary nature of the federal power; the exceptions prove the rule. Apart from them, proposals to carve islands of state authority out of the stream of commerce power were entirely unsuccessful. Roger Sherman's proposed definition of federal legislative power as excluding "matters of internal police" met Gouverneur Morris's response that "the internal police . . . ought to be infringed in many cases" and was voted down eight to two. 2 Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, pp. 25-26 (M. Farrand ed. 1911) (hereinafter Farrand). The Convention similarly rejected Sherman's attempt to include in Article V a proviso that "no state shall . . . be affected in its internal police." 5 Elliot's Debates 551-552. Finally, Rufus King suggested an explicit bill of rights for the States, a device that might indeed have set aside the areas the Court now declares off-limits. 1 Farrand 493 ("As the fundamental rights of individuals are secured by express provisions in the State Constitutions; why may not a like security be provided for the Rights of States in the National Constitution"). That proposal, too, came to naught. In short, to suppose that enumerated powers must have limits is sensible; to maintain that there exist judicially identifiable areas of state regulation immune to the plenary congressional commerce power even though falling within the limits defined by the substantial effects test is to deny our constitutional history.

REV_00258909

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*647] [80]

The objection to reviving traditional state spheres of action as a consideration in commerce analysis, however, not only rests on the portent of incoherence, but is compounded by a further defect just as fundamental. The defect, in essence, is the majority's rejection of the Founders' considered judgment that politics, not judicial review, should mediate between state and national interests as the strength and legislative jurisdiction of the National Government inevitably increased through the expected growth of the national economy. n15 [1770] Whereas today's majority takes a leaf from the book of the old judicial economists in saying that the Court should somehow draw the line to keep the federal relationship in a proper balance, Madison, Wilson, and Marshall understood the Constitution very differently.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n15 That the national economy and the national legislative power expand in tandem is not a recent discovery. This Court accepted the prospect well over 100 years ago, noting that the commerce powers "are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances." Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 96 U.S. 1, 9, 24 L. Ed. 708 (1878). See also, e.g., Farmers Loan & Trust Co. v. Minnesota, 280 U.S. 204, 211-212, 74 L. Ed. 371, 50 S. Ct. 98 (1930) ("Primitive conditions have passed; business is now transacted on a national scale").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [81]

Although Madison had emphasized the conception of a National Government of discrete powers (a conception that a number of the ratifying conventions thought was too indeterminate to protect civil liberties), n16 Madison himself must have sensed the potential scope of some of the powers granted (such as the authority to regulate commerce), for he [*648] took care in The Federalist No. 46 to hedge his argument for limited power by explaining the importance of national politics in protecting the States' interests. The National Government "will partake sufficiently of the spirit [of the States], to be disinclined to invade the rights of the individual States, or the prerogatives of their governments." The Federalist No. 46, at 319. James Wilson likewise noted that "it was a favorite object in the Convention" to secure the sovereignty of the States, and that it had been achieved through the structure of the Federal Government. 2 Elliot's Debates 438-439. n17 The Framers of the Bill of Rights, in turn, may well have sensed that Madison and Wilson were right about politics as the determinant of the federal balance within the broad limits of a power like commerce, for they formulated the Tenth [82] Amendment without any provision comparable to the specific guarantees proposed for individual liberties. n18 In any case, this Court recognized the political component of federalism in the seminal Gibbons opinion. After declaring the plenary character of congressional power within the sphere of activity affecting commerce, the Chief Justice spoke for the Court in explaining that there was only one restraint on its valid exercise:

[*649]

> "The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this, as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they have relied, to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people must often rely solely, in all representative governments."

REV_00258910

Gibbons, supra, at 197.

[*83]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 As mentioned n. 11, supra, many state conventions voted in favor of the Constitution only after proposing amendments. See 1 Elliot's Debates 322-323 (Massachusetts), 325 (South Carolina), 325-327 (New Hampshire), 327 (Virginia), 327-331 (New York), 331-332 (North Carolina), 334-337 (Rhode Island).

n17 Statements to similar effect pervade the ratification debates. See, e.g., 2 id., at 166-170 (Massachusetts, remarks of Samuel Stillman); id., at 251-253 (New York, remarks of Alexander Hamilton); 4 id., at 95-98 (North Carolina, remarks of James Iredell).

n18 The majority's special solicitude for "areas of traditional state regulation," ante, at 15, is thus founded not on the text of the Constitution but on what has been termed the "spirit of the Tenth Amendment," Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. at 585 (O'CONNOR, J., dissenting) (emphasis in original). Susceptibility to what Justice Holmes more bluntly called "some invisible radiation from the general terms of the Tenth Amendment," Missouri v. Holland, 252 U.S. 416, 434, 64 L. Ed. 641, 40 S. Ct. 382 (1920), has increased in recent years, in disregard of his admonition that "we must consider what this country has become in deciding what that Amendment has reserved." Ibid.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Politics as the moderator of the congressional employment of the commerce power was the theme [84] many years later in Wickard, for after the Court acknowledged the breadth of the Gibbons formulation it invoked Chief Justice Marshall yet again in adding that "he made emphatic the embracing and penetrating nature of this power by warning that effective restraints on its exercise must proceed from political rather than judicial processes." Wickard, [1771] 317 U.S. at 120 (citation omitted). Hence, "conflicts of economic interest . . . are wisely left under our system to resolution by Congress under its more flexible and responsible legislative process. Such conflicts rarely lend themselves to judicial determination. And with the wisdom, workability, or fairness, of the plan of regulation we have nothing to do." Id., at 129 (footnote omitted).

As with "conflicts of economic interest," so with supposed conflicts of sovereign political interests implicated by the Commerce Clause: the Constitution remits them to politics. The point can be put no more clearly than the Court put it the last time it repudiated the notion that some state activities categorically defied the commerce power as understood in accordance with generally accepted concepts. After [85] confirming Madison's and Wilson's views with a recitation of the sources of state influence in the structure of the National Constitution, Garcia, 469 U.S. at 550-552, the Court disposed of the possibility of identifying "principled constitutional limitations on the scope of Congress' Commerce Clause powers over the States merely [*650] by relying on a priori definitions of state sovereignty," id., at 548. It concluded that > "the Framers chose to rely on a federal system in which special restraints on federal power over the States inhered principally in the workings of the National Government itself, rather than in discrete limitations on the objects of federal authority. State sovereign interests, then, are more properly protected by procedural safeguards inherent in the structure of the federal system than by judicially created limitations on federal power." Id., at 552.

REV_00258911

The Garcia Court's rejection of "judicially created limitations" in favor of the intended reliance on national politics was all the more powerful owing to the Court's explicit recognition that in the centuries since the framing the relative powers of [86] the two sovereign systems have markedly changed. Nationwide economic integration is the norm, the national political power has been augmented by its vast revenues, and the power of the States has been drawn down by the Seventeenth Amendment, eliminating selection of senators by state legislature in favor of direct election.

The Garcia majority recognized that economic growth and the burgeoning of federal revenue have not amended the Constitution, which contains no circuit breaker to preclude the political consequences of these developments. Nor is there any justification for attempts to nullify the natural political impact of the particular amendment that was adopted. The significance for state political power of ending state legislative selection of senators was no secret in 1913, and the amendment was approved despite public comment on that very issue. Representative Franklin Bartlett, after quoting Madison's Federalist No. 62, as well as remarks by George Mason and John Dickinson during the Constitutional Convention, concluded, "It follows, therefore, that the [*651] framers of the Constitution, were they present in this House to-day, would inevitably regard this resolution as a most [87] direct blow at the doctrine of State's rights and at the integrity of the State sovereignties; for if you once deprive a State as a collective organism of all share in the General Government, you annihilate its federative importance." 26 Cong. Rec. 7774 (1894). Massachusetts Senator George Hoar likewise defended indirect election of the Senate as "a great security for the rights of the States." S. Doc. No. 232, 59th Cong., 1st Sess., 21 (1906). And Elihu Root warned that if the selection of senators should be taken from state legislatures, "the tide that now sets toward the Federal Government will swell in volume and power." 46 Cong. Rec. 2243 (1911). "The time will come," he continued, "when the Government of the United States will be driven to the exercise of more arbitrary and unconsidered [1772] power, will be driven to greater concentration, will be driven to extend its functions into the internal affairs of the States." Ibid. These warnings did not kill the proposal; the Amendment was ratified, and today it is only the ratification, not the predictions, which this Court can legitimately heed. n19

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 The majority tries to deflect the objection that it blocks an intended political process by explaining that the Framers intended politics to set the federal balance only within the sphere of permissible commerce legislation, whereas we are looking to politics to define that sphere (in derogation even of Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803)), ante, at 16-17. But we all accept the view that politics is the arbiter of state interests only within the realm of legitimate congressional action under the commerce power. Neither Madison nor Wilson nor Marshall, nor the Jones & Laughlin, Darby, Wickard, or Garcia Courts, suggested that politics defines the commerce power. Nor do we, even though we recognize that the conditions of the contemporary world result in a vastly greater sphere of influence for politics than the Framers would have envisioned. Politics has legitimate authority, for all of us on both sides of the disagreement, only within the legitimate compass of the commerce power. The majority claims merely to be engaging in the judicial task of patrolling the outer boundaries of that congressional authority. See ante, at 16, n. 7. That assertion cannot be reconciled with our statements of the substantial effects test, which have not drawn the categorical distinctions the majority favors. See, e.g., Wickard, 317 U.S. at 125; Darby, 312 U.S. at 118-119. The majority's attempt to circumscribe the commerce power by defining it in terms of categorical exceptions can only be seen as a revival of similar efforts that led to near tragedy for the Court and incoherence for the law. If history's lessons are accepted as guides for Commerce Clause interpretation today, as we do accept them, then the subject matter of the Act falls within the commerce power and the choice to legislate nationally on that subject, or to except it from national legislation because the States have traditionally dealt with it, should be a political choice and only a political choice.

REV_00258912

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*652] [88]

Amendments that alter the balance of power between the National and State Governments, like the Fourteenth, or that change the way the States are represented within the Federal Government, like the Seventeenth, are not rips in the fabric of the Framers' Constitution, inviting judicial repairs. The Seventeenth Amendment may indeed have lessened the enthusiasm of the Senate to represent the States as discrete sovereignties, but the Amendment did not convert the judiciary into an alternate shield against the commerce power.

C

The Court's choice to invoke considerations of traditional state regulation in these cases is especially odd in light of a distinction recognized in the now-repudiated opinion for the Court in Usery. In explaining that there was no inconsistency between declaring the States immune to the commerce power exercised in the Fair Labor Standards Act, but subject to it under the Economic Stabilization Act of 1970, as decided in Fry v. United States, 421 U.S. 542, 44 L. Ed. 2d 363, 95 S. Ct. 1792 (1975), the Court spoke of the latter statute as dealing with a serious threat affecting all the political components of the federal [*653] system, "which only collective action by the National [89] Government might forestall." Usery, 426 U.S. at 853. Today's majority, however, finds no significance whatever in the state support for the Act based upon the States' acknowledged failure to deal adequately with gender-based violence in state courts, and the belief of their own law enforcement agencies that national action is essential. n20

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n20 See n. 7, supra. The point here is not that I take the position that the States are incapable of dealing adequately with domestic violence if their political leaders have the will to do so; it is simply that the Congress had evidence from which it could find a national statute necessary, so that its passage obviously survives Commerce Clause scrutiny.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The National Association of Attorneys General supported the Act unanimously, see Violence Against Women: Victims of the System, Hearing on S. 15 before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 102d Cong., 1st Sess., 37-38 (1991), and Attorneys [1773] General from 38 States urged Congress to enact the Civil Rights [90] Remedy, representing that "the current system for dealing with violence against women is inadequate," see Crimes of Violence Motivated by Gender, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess., 34-36 (1993). It was against this record of failure at the state level that the Act was passed to provide the choice of a federal forum in place of the state-court systems found inadequate to stop gender-biased violence. See Women and Violence, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 101st Cong., 2d Sess., 2 (1990) (statement of Sen. Biden) (noting importance of federal forum). n21 The Act accordingly offers a federal civil rights remedy aimed exactly [*654] at violence against women, as an alternative to the generic state tort causes of action found to be poor tools of action by the state task forces. See S. Rep. No. 101-545, at 45 (noting difficulty of fitting gender-motivated crimes into common-law categories). As the 1993 Senate Report put it, "The Violence Against Women Act is intended to respond both to the underlying attitude that this violence is somehow less serious than other crime and to the [91] resulting failure of our criminal justice system to address such violence. Its goals are both symbolic and practical . . . ." S. Rep. No. 103-138, at 38.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00258913

n21 The majority's concerns about accountability strike me as entirely misplaced. Individuals, such as the defendants in this action, haled into federal court and sued under the United States Code, are quite aware of which of our dual sovereignties is attempting to regulate their behavior. Had Congress chosen, in the exercise of its powers under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, to proceed instead by regulating the States, rather than private individuals, this accountability would be far less plain.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The collective opinion of state officials that the Act was needed continues virtually unchanged, and when the Civil Rights Remedy was challenged in court, the States came to its defense. Thirty-six of them and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico have filed an amicus brief in support of petitioners in these cases, and only one State has taken respondents' side. It [92] is, then, not the least irony of these cases that the States will be forced to enjoy the new federalism whether they want it or not. For with the Court's decision today, Antonio Morrison, like Carter Coal's James Carter before him, has "won the states' rights plea against the states themselves." R. Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy 160 (1941).

III

All of this convinces me that today's ebb of the commerce power rests on error, and at the same time leads me to doubt that the majority's view will prove to be enduring law. There is yet one more reason for doubt. Although we sense the presence of Carter Coal, Schechter, and Usery once again, the majority embraces them only at arm's-length. Where such decisions once stood for rules, today's opinion points to considerations by which substantial effects are discounted. Cases standing for the sufficiency of substantial effects are not overruled; cases overruled since 1937 are not quite revived. The Court's thinking betokens less clearly [*655] a return to the conceptual straitjackets of Schechter and Carter Coal and Usery than to something like the unsteady state of obscenity law between Redrup v. New York, 386 U.S. 767, 18 L. Ed. 2d 515, 87 S. Ct. 1414 (1967) [93] (per curiam), and Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 37 L. Ed. 2d 419, 93 S. Ct. 2607 (1973), a period in which the failure to provide a workable definition left this Court to review each case ad hoc. See id., at 22, n. 3; Interstate Circuit, Inc. v. Dallas, 390 U.S. 676, 706-708, 20 L. Ed. 2d 225, 88 S. Ct. 1298 (1968) (Harlan, J., dissenting). As our predecessors learned then, the practice of such ad hoc review cannot preserve the distinction between the judicial and the legislative, and this Court, in any event, lacks the institutional [1774] capacity to maintain such a regime for very long. This one will end when the majority realizes that the conception of the commerce power for which it entertains hopes would inevitably fail the test expressed in Justice Holmes's statement that "the first call of a theory of law is that it should fit the facts." O. Holmes, The Common Law 167 (Howe ed. 1963). The facts that cannot be ignored today are the facts of integrated national commerce and a political relationship between States and Nation much affected by their respective treasuries and constitutional modifications adopted by the people. The federalism of some earlier time is no more adequate to account [94] for those facts today than the theory of laissez-faire was able to govern the national economy 70 years ago.

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS joins, and with whom JUSTICE SOUTER and JUSTICE GINSBURG join as to Part I-A, dissenting.

No one denies the importance of the Constitution's federalist principles. Its state/federal division of authority protects liberty -- both by restricting the burdens that government can impose from a distance and by facilitating citizen participation in government that is closer to home. The question is how the judiciary can best implement that [*656] original federalist understanding where the Commerce Clause is at issue.

I

REV_00258914

The majority holds that the federal commerce power does not extend to such "noneconomic" activities as "noneconomic, violent criminal conduct" that significantly affects interstate commerce only if we "aggregate" the interstate "effects" of individual instances. Ante, at 17-18. JUSTICE SOUTER explains why history, precedent, and legal logic militate against the majority's approach. I agree and join his opinion. I add that the majority's holding illustrates the difficulty of finding a workable judicial Commerce Clause touchstone [95] -- a set of comprehensible interpretive rules that courts might use to impose some meaningful limit, but not too great a limit, upon the scope of the legislative authority that the Commerce Clause delegates to Congress.

A

Consider the problems. The "economic/noneconomic" distinction is not easy to apply. Does the local street corner mugger engage in "economic" activity or "noneconomic" activity when he mugs for money? See Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971) (aggregating local "loan sharking" instances); United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 559, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995) (loan sharking is economic because it consists of "intrastate extortionate credit transactions"); ante, at 9. Would evidence that desire for economic domination underlies many brutal crimes against women save the present statute? See United States General Accounting Office, Health, Education, and Human Services Division, Domestic Violence: Prevalence and Implications for Employment Among Welfare Recipients 7-8 (Nov. 1998); Brief for Equal Rights Advocates, et al. as Amicus Curiae 10-12.

The line becomes yet harder to draw given the need for exceptions. The Court itself would [96] permit Congress to aggregate, hence regulate, "noneconomic" activity taking place [*657] at economic establishments. See Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964) (upholding civil rights laws forbidding discrimination at local motels); Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964) (same for restaurants); Lopez, supra, at 559 (recognizing congressional power to aggregate, hence forbid, noneconomically motivated discrimination at public accommodations); ante, at 9-10 (same). And it would permit Congress to regulate where that regulation is [1775] "an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated." Lopez, supra, at 561; cf. Controlled Substances Act, 21 U.S.C. § 801 et seq. (regulating drugs produced for home consumption). Given the former exception, can Congress simply rewrite the present law and limit its application to restaurants, hotels, perhaps universities, and other places of public accommodation? Given the latter exception, can Congress save the present law [97] by including it, or much of it, in a broader "Safe Transport" or "Workplace Safety" act?

More important, why should we give critical constitutional importance to the economic, or noneconomic, nature of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause? If chemical emanations through indirect environmental change cause identical, severe commercial harm outside a State, why should it matter whether local factories or home fireplaces release them? The Constitution itself refers only to Congress' power to "regulate Commerce . . . among the several States," and to make laws "necessary and proper" to implement that power. Art. I, § 8, cls. 3, 18. The language says nothing about either the local nature, or the economic nature, of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause.

This Court has long held that only the interstate commercial effects, not the local nature of the cause, are constitutionally relevant. See NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 38-39, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937) (focusing upon interstate effects); Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 125, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942) (aggregating [*658] interstate effects of wheat grown for home consumption); Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, at 258 [98] ("If it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation which applies the squeeze'" (quoting United States v. Women's Sportswear Mfrs. Assn., 336 U.S. 460, 464, 93 L. Ed. 805, 69 S. Ct. 714 (1949))). Nothing in the Constitution's language, or that of earlier cases prior to Lopez, explains why the Court should ignore one highly relevant characteristic of an interstate-commerce-affecting cause (how "local" it is), while placing critical constitutional weight upon a different, less obviously relevant, feature (how "economic" it is).

REV_00258915

Most important, the Court's complex rules seem unlikely to help secure the very object that they seek, namely, the protection of "areas of traditional state regulation" from federal intrusion. Ante, at 15. The Court's rules, even if broadly interpreted, are underinclusive. The local pickpocket is no less a traditional subject of state regulation than is the local gender-motivated assault. Regardless, the Court reaffirms, as it should, Congress' well-established and frequently exercised power to enact laws that satisfy a commerce-related jurisdictional prerequisite -- for example, that some item relevant to the federally [99] regulated activity has at some time crossed a state line. Ante, at 8-9, 11, 13, and n. 5; Lopez, supra, at 558; Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, at 256 ("'The authority of Congress to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from immoral and injurious uses has been frequently sustained, and is no longer open to question'" (quoting Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 491, 61 L. Ed. 442, 37 S. Ct. 192 (1917))); see also United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 347-350, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971) (saving ambiguous felon-in-possession statute by requiring gun to have crossed state line); Scarborough v. United States, 431 U.S. 563, 575, 52 L. Ed. 2d 582, 97 S. Ct. 1963 (1977) (interpreting same statute to require only that gun passed "in interstate commerce" "at some time," without questioning constitutionality); cf., e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 2261(a)(1) (making it a federal crime for a person to cross state lines to commit [*659] a crime of violence against a spouse or intimate partner); § 1951(a) (federal crime to commit [1776] robbery, extortion, physical violence or threat thereof, where "article or commodity in commerce" is affected, obstructed or delayed); [100] § 2315 (making unlawful the knowing receipt or possession of certain stolen items that have "crossed a State . . . boundary"); § 922(g)(1) (prohibiting felons from shipping, transporting, receiving, or possessing firearms "in interstate . . . commerce").

And in a world where most everyday products or their component parts cross interstate boundaries, Congress will frequently find it possible to redraft a statute using language that ties the regulation to the interstate movement of some relevant object, thereby regulating local criminal activity or, for that matter, family affairs. See, e.g., Child Support Recovery Act of 1992, 18 U.S.C. § 228. Although this possibility does not give the Federal Government the power to regulate everything, it means that any substantive limitation will apply randomly in terms of the interests the majority seeks to protect. How much would be gained, for example, were Congress to reenact the present law in the form of "An Act Forbidding Violence Against Women Perpetrated at Public Accommodations or by Those Who Have Moved in, or through the Use of Items that Have Moved in, Interstate Commerce"? Complex Commerce Clause rules [101] creating fine distinctions that achieve only random results do little to further the important federalist interests that called them into being. That is why modern (pre-Lopez) case law rejected them. See Wickard, supra, at 120; United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941); Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., supra, at 37.

The majority, aware of these difficulties, is nonetheless concerned with what it sees as an important contrary consideration. To determine the lawfulness of statutes simply by asking whether Congress could reasonably have found that aggregated local instances significantly affect interstate commerce will allow Congress to regulate almost anything. [*660] Virtually all local activity, when instances are aggregated, can have "substantial effects on employment, production, transit, or consumption." Hence Congress could "regulate any crime," and perhaps "marriage, divorce, and childrearing" as well, obliterating the "Constitution's distinction between national and local authority." Ante, at 15; Lopez, 514 U.S. at 558; cf. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 548, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935) [102] (need for distinction between "direct" and "indirect" effects lest there "be virtually no limit to the federal power"); Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 276, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 38 S. Ct. 529 (1918) (similar observation).

REV_00258916

This consideration, however, while serious, does not reflect a jurisprudential defect, so much as it reflects a practical reality. We live in a Nation knit together by two centuries of scientific, technological, commercial, and environmental change. Those changes, taken together, mean that virtually every kind of activity, no matter how local, genuinely can affect commerce, or its conditions, outside the State -- at least when considered in the aggregate. Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 251. And that fact makes it close to impossible for courts to develop meaningful subject-matter categories that would exclude some kinds of local activities from ordinary Commerce Clause "aggregation" rules without, at the same time, depriving Congress of the power to regulate activities that have a genuine and important effect upon interstate commerce.

Since judges cannot change the world, the "defect" means that, within the bounds of the rational, Congress, not the courts, [103] must remain primarily responsible for striking the appropriate state/federal balance. Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 552, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985); ante, at 19-24 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); [1777] Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents, 528 U.S. , (2000) (slip op., at 2) (STEVENS, J., dissenting) (Framers designed important structural safeguards to ensure that, when Congress legislates, "the normal operation of the legislative process itself would adequately defend [*661] state interests from undue infringement"); see also Kramer, Putting the Politics Back into the Political Safeguards of Federalism, 100 Colum. L. Rev. 215 (2000) (focusing on role of political process and political parties in protecting state interests). Congress is institutionally motivated to do so. Its Members represent state and local district interests. They consider the views of state and local officials when they legislate, and they have even developed formal procedures to ensure that such consideration takes place. See, e.g., Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995, Pub. L. 104-4, 109 Stat. 48 (codified in scattered sections of 2 U.S.C.). Moreover, Congress often can [104] better reflect state concerns for autonomy in the details of sophisticated statutory schemes than can the judiciary, which cannot easily gather the relevant facts and which must apply more general legal rules and categories. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 7543(b) (Clean Air Act); 33 U.S.C. § 1251 et seq. (Clean Water Act); see also New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 167-168, 120 L. Ed. 2d 120, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992) (collecting other examples of "cooperative federalism"). Not surprisingly, the bulk of American law is still state law, and overwhelmingly so.

B

I would also note that Congress, when it enacted the statute, followed procedures that help to protect the federalism values at stake. It provided adequate notice to the States of its intent to legislate in an "area of traditional state regulation." Ante, at 15. And in response, attorneys general in the overwhelming majority of States (38) supported congressional legislation, telling Congress that "our experience as Attorneys General strengthens our belief that the problem of violence against women is a national one, requiring federal attention, federal leadership, and federal funds." [105] Id., at 34-36; see also Violence Against Women: Victims of [*662] the System, Hearing on S. 15 before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 102d Cong., 1st Sess., 37-38 (1991) (unanimous resolution of the National Association of Attorneys General); but cf. Crimes of Violence Motivated by Gender, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess., 77-84 (1993) (Conference of Chief Justices opposing legislation).

Moreover, as JUSTICE SOUTER has pointed out, Congress compiled a "mountain of data" explicitly documenting the interstate commercial effects of gender-motivated crimes of violence. Ante, at 2-8, 27-28 (dissenting opinion). After considering alternatives, it focused the federal law upon documented deficiencies in state legal systems. And it tailored the law to prevent its use in certain areas of traditional state concern, such as divorce, alimony, or child custody. 42 U.S.C. § 13981(e)(4). Consequently, the law before us seems to represent an instance, not of state/federal conflict, but of state/federal efforts to cooperate in order to help solve a mutually acknowledged [106] national problem. Cf. §§ 300w-10, 3796gg, 3796hh, 10409, 13931 (providing federal moneys to encourage state and local initiatives to combat gender-motivated violence).

REV_00258917

I call attention to the legislative process leading up to enactment of this statute because, as the majority recognizes, ante, at 14, it far surpasses that which led to the enactment of the statute we considered in Lopez. And even were I to accept Lopez as an accurate statement of the law, which I do not, that distinction provides a possible basis for upholding the law here. This Court on occasion has pointed to the importance of procedural limitations in [1778] keeping the power of Congress in check. See Garcia, 469 U.S. at 554 ("Any substantive restraint on the exercise of Commerce Clause powers must find its justification in the procedural nature of this basic limitation, and it must be tailored to compensate for possible failings in the national political process rather than to dictate a 'sacred province of state autonomy'" (quoting EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226, 236, 75 L. Ed. 2d 18, 103 S. Ct. 1054 (1983))); see [*663] also Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 460-461, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991) (insisting upon [107] a "plain statement" of congressional intent when Congress legislates "in areas traditionally regulated by the States"); cf. Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88, 103-105, 114-117, 48 L. Ed. 2d 495, 96 S. Ct. 1895 (1976); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 548-554, 65 L. Ed. 2d 902, 100 S. Ct. 2758 (1980) (STEVENS, J., dissenting).

Commentators also have suggested that the thoroughness of legislative procedures -- e.g., whether Congress took a "hard look" -- might sometimes make a determinative difference in a Commerce Clause case, say when Congress legislates in an area of traditional state regulation. See, e.g., Jackson, Federalism and the Uses and Limits of Law: Printz and Principle?, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 2180, 2231-2245 (1998); Gardbaum, Rethinking Constitutional Federalism, 74 Texas L. Rev. 795, 812-828, 830-832 (1996); Lessig, Translating Federalism: United States v. Lopez, 1995 S. Ct. Rev. 125, 194-214 (1995); see also Treaty Establishing the European Community Art. 5; Bermann, Taking Subsidiarity Seriously: Federalism in the European Community and the United States, 94 Colum. L. Rev. 331, 378-403 (1994) (arguing for similar limitation [108] in respect to somewhat analogous principle of subsidiarity for European Community); Gardbaum, supra, at 833-837 (applying subsidiarity principles to American federalism). Of course, any judicial insistence that Congress follow particular procedures might itself intrude upon congressional prerogatives and embody difficult definitional problems. But the intrusion, problems, and consequences all would seem less serious than those embodied in the majority's approach. See supra, at 2-7.

I continue to agree with JUSTICE SOUTER that the Court's traditional "rational basis" approach is sufficient. Ante, at 1-2 (dissenting opinion); see also Lopez, 514 U.S. at 603-615 (SOUTER, J., dissenting); id., at 615-631 (BREYER, J., dissenting). But I recognize that the law in this area is unstable and that time and experience may demonstrate both the unworkability of the majority's rules and the superiority [*664] of Congress' own procedural approach -- in which case the law may evolve towards a rule that, in certain difficult Commerce Clause cases, takes account of the thoroughness with which Congress has considered the federalism issue.

For these reasons, as [109] well as those set forth by JUSTICE SOUTER, this statute falls well within Congress's Commerce Clause authority, and I dissent from the Court's contrary conclusion.

II

Given my conclusion on the Commerce Clause question, I need not consider Congress' authority under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nonetheless, I doubt the Court's reasoning rejecting that source of authority. The Court points out that in United States v.

REV_00258918

claim and that § 13981's civil remedy is unconstitutional. Petitioner United States intervened to defend the section's constitutionality. In dismissing the complaint, the District Court held that it stated a claim against respondents, [2] but that Congress lacked authority to enact § 13981 under either § 8 of the Commerce Clause or § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which Congress had explicitly identified as the sources of federal authority for § 13981. The en banc Fourth Circuit affirmed.

Held: Section 13981 cannot be sustained under the Commerce Clause or § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Pp. 7-28.

(a) The Commerce Clause does not provide Congress with authority to enact § 13981's federal civil remedy. A congressional enactment will be invalidated only upon a plain showing that Congress has exceeded its constitutional bounds. See United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 568, 577-578, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624. Petitioners assert that § 13981 can be sustained under Congress' commerce power as a regulation of activity that substantially affects interstate commerce. The proper framework for analyzing such a claim is provided by the principles the Court set out in Lopez. First, in Lopez, the noneconomic, criminal nature of possessing a firearm in a school zone was central to the Court's conclusion that Congress lacks authority to regulate such possession. Similarly, gender-motivated crimes of violence [3] are not, in any sense, economic activity. Second, like the statute at issue in Lopez, § 13981 contains no jurisdictional element establishing that the federal cause of action is in pursuance of Congress' regulation of interstate commerce. Although Lopez makes clear that such a jurisdictional element would lend support to the argument that § 13981 is sufficiently tied to interstate commerce to come within Congress' authority, Congress elected to cast § 13981's remedy over a wider, and more purely intrastate, body of violent crime. Third, although § 13981, unlike the Lopez statute, is supported by numerous findings regarding the serious impact of gender-motivated violence on victims and their families, these findings are substantially weakened by the fact that they rely on reasoning that this Court has rejected, namely a but-for causal chain from the initial occurrence of violent crime to every attenuated effect upon interstate commerce. If accepted, this reasoning would allow Congress to regulate any crime whose nationwide, aggregated impact has substantial effects on employment, production, transit, or consumption. Moreover, such reasoning will not limit Congress [4] to regulating violence, but may be applied equally as well to family law and other areas of state regulation since the aggregate effect of marriage, divorce, and childrearing on the national economy is undoubtedly significant. The Constitution requires a distinction between what is truly national and what is truly local, and there is no better example of the police power, which the Founders undeniably left reposed in the States and denied the central government, than the suppression of violent crime and vindication of its victims. Congress therefore may not regulate noneconomic, violent criminal conduct based solely on the conduct's aggregate effect on interstate commerce. Pp. 7-19.

(b) Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, which permits Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the constitutional guarantee that no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process or deny any person equal protection of the laws, City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 517, 138 L. Ed. 2d 624, 117 S. Ct. 2157, also does not give Congress the authority to enact § 13981. Petitioners' assertion that there is pervasive bias in various state justice systems against victims of [5] gender-motivated violence is supported by a voluminous congressional record. However, the Fourteenth Amendment places limitations on the manner in which Congress may attack discriminatory conduct. Foremost among them is the principle that the Amendment prohibits only state action, not private conduct. This was the conclusion reached in United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 27 L. Ed. 290, 1 S. Ct. 601, and the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835, 3 S. Ct. 18, which were both decided shortly after the Amendment's adoption. The force of the doctrine of stare decisis behind these decisions stems not only from the length of time they have been on the books, but also from the insight attributable to the Members of the Court at that time, who all had intimate knowledge and familiarity with the events surrounding the Amendment's adoption. Neither United States v. Guest, 383 U.S. 745, 16 L. Ed. 2d 239, 86

REV_00258883

Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 27 L. Ed. 290, 1 S. Ct. 601 (1883), and the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835, 3 S. Ct. 18 (1883), the Court held that § 5 does not authorize Congress to use the Fourteenth Amendment as a source of power to remedy the conduct of private persons. Ante, at 21-23. That is certainly so. The Federal Government's argument, however, is that Congress used § 5 to remedy the actions of state actors, namely, those States which, through discriminatory design or the discriminatory conduct of their officials, failed to provide [1779] adequate (or any) state remedies for women injured by gender-motivated violence -- a failure that the States, and Congress, documented in depth. See ante, at 3-4, n. 7, 27-28 (SOUTER, J., dissenting) (collecting sources). [110]

Neither Harris nor the Civil Rights Cases considered this kind of claim. The Court in Harris specifically said that it treated the federal laws in question as "directed exclusively against the action of private persons, without reference to the laws of the State, or their administration by her officers." 106 U.S. at 640 (emphasis added); see also Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. at 14 (observing that the statute did "not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States" and that it established "rules for the conduct [*665] of individuals in society towards each other, . . . without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities").

The Court responds directly to the relevant "state actor" claim by finding that the present law lacks "'congruence and proportionality'" to the state discrimination that it purports to remedy. Ante, at 26; see City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507, 526, 138 L. Ed. 2d 624, 117 S. Ct. 2157 (1997). That is because the law, unlike federal laws prohibiting literacy tests for voting, imposing voting rights requirements, or punishing state officials who intentionally discriminated [111] in jury selection, Katzenbach v. Morgan, 384 U.S. 641, 16 L. Ed. 2d 828, 86 S. Ct. 1717 (1966); South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 15 L. Ed. 2d 769, 86 S. Ct. 803 (1966); Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339, 25 L. Ed. 676 (1880), is not "directed . . . at any State or state actor." Ante, at 26.

But why can Congress not provide a remedy against private actors? Those private actors, of course, did not themselves violate the Constitution. But this Court has held that Congress at least sometimes can enact remedial "legislation . . . [that] prohibits conduct which is not itself unconstitutional." Flores, 521 U.S. at 518; see also Katzenbach v. Morgan, supra, at 651; South Carolina v. Katzenbach, supra, at 308. The statutory remedy does not in any sense purport to "determine what constitutes a constitutional violation." Flores, supra, at 519. It intrudes little upon either States or private parties. It may lead state actors to improve their own remedial systems, primarily through example. It restricts private actors only by imposing liability for private conduct that is, in the main, already forbidden by state law. Why [112] is the remedy "disproportionate"? And given the relation between remedy and violation -- the creation of a federal remedy to substitute for constitutionally inadequate state remedies -- where is the lack of "congruence"?

The majority adds that Congress found that the problem of inadequacy of state remedies "does not exist in all States, [*666] or even most States." Ante, at 27. But Congress had before it the task force reports of at least 21 States documenting constitutional violations. And it made its own findings about pervasive gender-based stereotypes hampering many state legal systems, sometimes unconstitutionally so. See, e.g., S. Rep. No. 103-138, pp. 38, 41-42, 44-47 (1993); S. Rep. No. 102-197, pp. 39, 44-49 (1991); H. R. Conf. Rep. No. 103-711, p. 385 (1994). The record nowhere reveals a congressional finding that the problem "does not exist" elsewhere. Why can Congress not take the evidence before it as evidence of a national problem? This Court has not previously held that Congress must document the existence of a problem in every State prior to proposing a national solution. And the deference this Court gives to Congress' chosen remedy under § 5, Flores, supra, at 536, [113] suggests that any such requirement would be inappropriate.

Despite my doubts about the majority's § 5 reasoning, I need not, and do not, [1780] answer the § 5 question, which I would leave for more thorough analysis if necessary on another occasion. Rather, in my view, the Commerce Clause provides an adequate basis for the statute before us. And I would uphold its constitutionality as the "necessary and proper" exercise of legislative power granted to Congress by that Clause.

REV_00258919

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 2000 U.S. LEXIS 3422
View: Full
Date/Time: Sunday, April 22, 2001 - 3:35 PM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

REV_00258920

S. Ct. 1170, nor District of Columbia v. Carter, 409 U.S. 418, 34 L. Ed. 2d 613, 93 S. Ct. 602, casts any doubt on the enduring vitality of the Civil Rights Cases and Harris. Assuming that there has been gender-based disparate treatment by state authorities in this case, it would not be enough to save § 13981's [6] civil remedy, which is directed not at a State or state actor but at individuals who have committed criminal acts motivated by gender bias. Section 13981 visits no consequence on any Virginia public official involved in investigating or prosecuting Brzonkala's assault, and it is thus unlike any of the § 5 remedies this Court has previously upheld. See e.g., South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 15 L. Ed. 2d 769, 86 S. Ct. 803. Section 13981 is also different from previously upheld remedies in that it applies uniformly throughout the Nation, even though Congress' findings indicate that the problem addressed does not exist in all, or even most, States. In contrast, the § 5 remedy in Katzenbach was directed only to those States in which Congress found that there had been discrimination. Pp. 19-27.

169 F.3d 820, affirmed.

COUNSEL: Julie Goldscheid argued the cause for petitioner in No. 99-29.

Seth P. Waxman argued the cause for the United States in No. 99-5.

Michael E. Rosman argued the cause for respondents.

JUDGES: REHNQUIST, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which O'CONNOR, SCALIA, KENNEDY, and THOMAS, JJ., joined. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion. SOUTER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS, GINSBURG, and BREYER, JJ., joined. BREYER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS, J., joined, and in which SOUTER and GINSBURG, [7] JJ., joined as to Part I-A.

OPINIONBY: REHNQUIST

OPINION: [*601] [1745]

CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1A]
In these cases we consider the constitutionality of 42 U.S.C. § 13981, which provides a federal civil remedy for the [*602] victims of gender-motivated violence. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, sitting en banc, struck down § 13981 because it concluded that Congress lacked constitutional authority to enact the section's civil remedy. Believing that these cases are controlled by our decisions in United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. 549, 131 L. Ed. 2d 626, 115 S. Ct. 1624 (1995), United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. 629, 27 L. Ed. 290, 1 S. Ct. 601 (1883), and the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3, 27 L. Ed. 835, 3 S. Ct. 18 (1883), we affirm.

I

Petitioner Christy Brzonkala enrolled at Virginia Polytechnic Institute (Virginia Tech) in the fall of 1994. In September of that year, Brzonkala met respondents Antonio Morrison and James Crawford, who [1746] were both students at Virginia Tech and members of its varsity football team. Brzonkala alleges that, within 30 minutes of meeting Morrison and Crawford, they assaulted and repeatedly raped her. After the attack, Morrison allegedly [8] told Brzonkala, "You better not have any . . . diseases." Complaint P22. In the months following the rape, Morrison also allegedly announced in the dormitory's dining room that he "liked" to get girls drunk and . . . ." Id., P31. The omitted portions, quoted verbatim in the briefs on file with this Court, consist of boasting, debased remarks about what Morrison would do to women, vulgar remarks that cannot fail to shock and offend.

REV_00258884

Brzonkala alleges that this attack caused her to become severely emotionally disturbed and depressed. She sought assistance from a university psychiatrist, who prescribed [*603] antidepressant medication. Shortly after the rape Brzonkala stopped attending classes and withdrew from the university.

In early 1995, Brzonkala filed a complaint against respondents under Virginia Tech's Sexual Assault Policy. During the school-conducted hearing on her complaint, Morrison admitted having sexual contact with her despite the fact that she had twice told him "no." After the hearing, Virginia Tech's Judicial Committee found insufficient evidence to punish Crawford, but found Morrison guilty of sexual assault and sentenced him to immediate suspension for [9] two semesters.

Virginia Tech's dean of students upheld the judicial committee's sentence. However, in July 1995, Virginia Tech informed Brzonkala that Morrison intended to initiate a court challenge to his conviction under the Sexual Assault Policy. University officials told her that a second hearing would be necessary to remedy the school's error in prosecuting her complaint under that policy, which had not been widely circulated to students. The university therefore conducted a second hearing under its Abusive Conduct Policy, which was in force prior to the dissemination of the Sexual Assault Policy. Following this second hearing the Judicial Committee again found Morrison guilty and sentenced him to an identical 2-semester suspension. This time, however, the description of Morrison's offense was, without explanation, changed from "sexual assault" to "using abusive language."

Morrison appealed his second conviction through the university's administrative system. On August 21, 1995, Virginia Tech's senior vice president and provost set aside Morrison's punishment. She concluded that it was "'excessive when compared with other cases where there has been a finding of violation of [10] the Abusive Conduct Policy,'" 132 F.3d 949, 955 (CA4 1997). Virginia Tech did not inform Brzonkala of this decision. After learning from a [*604] newspaper that Morrison would be returning to Virginia Tech for the fall 1995 semester, she dropped out of the university.

In December 1995, Brzonkala sued Morrison, Crawford, and Virginia Tech in the United States District Court for the Western District of Virginia. Her complaint alleged that Morrison's and Crawford's attack violated § 13981 and that Virginia Tech's handling of her complaint violated Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 86 Stat. 373-375, 20 U.S.C. §§ 1681-1688. Morrison and Crawford moved to dismiss this complaint on the grounds that it failed to state a claim and that § 13981's civil remedy is unconstitutional. The United States, petitioner in No. 99-5, intervened to defend § 13981's constitutionality.

The District Court dismissed Brzonkala's Title IX claims against Virginia Tech for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. See Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., 935 F. Supp. 772 (WD Va. 1996). It then held that Brzonkala's [11] complaint stated a claim against Morrison and Crawford under § 13981, but dismissed the complaint because [1747] it concluded that Congress lacked authority to enact the section under either the Commerce Clause or § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., 935 F. Supp. 779 (WD Va. 1996).

A divided panel of the Court of Appeals reversed the District Court, reinstating Brzonkala's § 13981 claim and her Title IX hostile environment claim. n1 Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., 132 F.3d 949 (CA4 1997). The full Court of Appeals vacated the panel's opinion and reheard the case en banc. The en banc court then issued an opinion affirming the District Court's conclusion that Brzonkala stated a claim under § 13981 because her complaint alleged a crime of violence and the allegations of Morrison's crude and derogatory statements regarding his [605] treatment of women sufficiently indicated that his crime was motivated by gender animus. n2 Nevertheless, the court by a divided vote affirmed the District Court's conclusion that Congress lacked constitutional authority to enact § 13981's civil remedy. Brzonkala v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., 169 F.3d 820 (CA4 1999). [*12] Because the Court of Appeals invalidated a federal statute on constitutional grounds, we granted certiorari. 527 U.S. 1068 (1999).

REV_00258885

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 The panel affirmed the dismissal of Brzonkala's Title IX disparate treatment claim. See 132 F.3d at 961-962.

n2 The en banc Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court's conclusion that Brzonkala failed to state a claim alleging disparate treatment under Title IX, but vacated the District Court's dismissal of her hostile environment claim and remanded with instructions for the District Court to hold the claim in abeyance pending this Court's decision in Davis v. Monroe County Bd. of Ed., 526 U.S. 629, 143 L. Ed. 2d 839, 119 S. Ct. 1661 (1999). Brzonkala* v. Virginia Polytechnic and State Univ., 169 F.3d 820, 827, n. 2 (CA4 1999). Our grant of certiorari did not encompass Brzonkala's Title IX claims, and we thus do not consider them in this opinion.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Section 13981 was part of the Violence Against Women Act of 1994, § 40302, 108 Stat. 1941-1942. [13] It states that "persons within the United States shall have the right to be free from crimes of violence motivated by gender." 42 U.S.C. § 13981(b). To enforce that right, subsection (c) declares:

> "A person (including a person who acts under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage of any State) who commits a crime of violence motivated by gender and thus deprives another of the right declared in subsection (b) of this section shall be liable to the party injured, in an action for the recovery of compensatory and punitive damages, injunctive and declaratory relief, and such other relief as a court may deem appropriate."

Section 13981 defines a "crime" of violence motivated by "gender" as "a crime of violence committed because of gender or on the basis of gender, and due, at least in part, to an [*606] animus based on the victim's gender." § 13981(d)(1). It also provides that the term "crime of violence" includes any

> "(A) . . . act or series of acts that would constitute a felony against the person or that would constitute a felony against property if the conduct presents a serious risk of physical injury to another, and that [14] would come within the meaning of State or Federal offenses described in section 16 of Title 18, whether or not those acts have actually resulted in criminal charges, prosecution, or conviction and whether or not those acts were committed in the special maritime, territorial, or prison jurisdiction of the United States; and
>
> "(B) includes an act or series of acts that would constitute a felony described in subparagraph (A) but for the relationship between the person who takes such action and the individual against whom such action is taken." § 13981(d)(2). [1748]

Further clarifying the broad scope of § 13981's civil remedy, subsection (e)(2) states that

REV_00258886

"nothing" in this section requires a prior criminal complaint, prosecution, or conviction to establish the elements of a cause of action under subsection (c) of this section." And subsection (e)(3) provides a § 13981 litigant with a choice of forums: Federal and state courts "shall have concurrent jurisdiction" over complaints brought under the section.

Although the foregoing language of § 13981 covers a wide swath of criminal conduct, Congress placed some limitations on the section's federal civil remedy. Subsection (e)(1) states [15] that "nothing" in this section entitles a person to a cause of action under subsection (c) of this section for random acts of violence unrelated to gender or for acts that cannot be demonstrated, by a preponderance of the evidence, to be motivated by gender." Subsection (e)(4) further states that § 13981 shall not be construed "to confer on the courts of the United States jurisdiction over any State law claim seeking [*607] the establishment of a divorce, alimony, equitable distribution of marital property, or child custody decree."

[2A]
Every law enacted by Congress must be based on one or more of its powers enumerated in the Constitution. "The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the constitution is written." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 176, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803) (Marshall, C. J.). Congress explicitly identified the sources of federal authority on which it relied in enacting § 13981. It said that a "federal civil rights cause of action" is established "pursuant" to the affirmative power of Congress . . . under section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, as well as under section 8 of Article I of [16] the Constitution." 42 U.S.C. § 13981(a). We address Congress' authority to enact this remedy under each of these constitutional provisions in turn.

II

[2B]
Due respect for the decisions of a coordinate branch of Government demands that we invalidate a congressional enactment only upon a plain showing that Congress has exceeded its constitutional bounds. See United States v. Lopez, 514 U.S. at 568, 577-578 (KENNEDY, J., concurring); United States v. Harris, 106 U.S. at 635. With this presumption of constitutionality in mind, we turn to the question whether § 13981 falls within Congress' power under Article I, § 8, of the Constitution. Brzonkala and the United States rely upon the third clause of the Article, which gives Congress power "to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes."

[3]
As we discussed at length in Lopez, our interpretation of the Commerce Clause has changed as our Nation has developed. See Lopez, 514 U.S. at 552-557; id., at 568-574 (KENNEDY, J., concurring); id., at 584, 593-599 (THOMAS, J., [17] concurring). We need not repeat that detailed review of [*608] the Commerce Clause's history here; it suffices to say that, in the years since NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937), Congress has had considerably greater latitude in regulating conduct and transactions under the Commerce Clause than our previous case law permitted. See Lopez, 514 U.S. at 555-556; id., at 573-574 (KENNEDY, J., concurring).

Lopez emphasized, however, that even under our modern, expansive interpretation of the Commerce Clause, Congress' regulatory authority is not without effective bounds.

> Id., at 557.
> "Even [our] modern-era precedents which have expanded congressional power [1749] under the Commerce Clause confirm that this power is subject to outer limits. In Jones & Laughlin Steel, the Court warned that the scope of the interstate commerce power 'must be considered in the light of our dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon interstate commerce so indirect and remote that to embrace them, in view of our complex society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between [18] what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government.'" Id., at 556-557 (quoting Jones & Laughlin Steel, supra, at 37). n3

REV_00258887

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 JUSTICE SOUTER's dissent takes us to task for allegedly abandoning Jones & Laughlin Steel in favor of an inadequate "federalism of some earlier time." Post, at 15-17, 29. As the foregoing language from Jones & Laughlin Steel makes clear however, this Court has always recognized a limit on the commerce power inherent in "our dual system of government." 301 U.S. at 37. It is the dissent's remarkable theory that the commerce power is without judicially enforceable boundaries that disregards the Court's caution in Jones & Laughlin Steel against allowing that power to "effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local." Ibid.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[4]
As we observed in Lopez, modern Commerce Clause jurisprudence has "identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate [19] under its commerce power." [*609] 514 U.S. at 558 (citing Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276-277, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981); Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 150, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971)). "First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce." 514 U.S. at 558 (citing Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 256, 85 S. Ct. 348, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258 (1964); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 114, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941)). "Second, Congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities." 514 U.S. at 558 (citing Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342 (1914); Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U.S. 20, 32 S. Ct. 2, 56 L. Ed. 72 (1911); Perez, supra, at 150). "Finally, Congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, . . . i.e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce." 514 U.S. at 558-559 [20] (citing Jones & Laughlin Steel, supra, at 37).

Petitioners do not contend that these cases fall within either of the first two of these categories of Commerce Clause regulation. They seek to sustain § 13981 as a regulation of activity that substantially affects interstate commerce. Given § 13981's focus on gender-motivated violence wherever it occurs (rather than violence directed at the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, interstate markets, or things or persons in interstate commerce), we agree that this is the proper inquiry.

[5A]
[6A]
Since Lopez most recently canvassed and clarified our case law governing this third category of Commerce Clause regulation, it provides the proper framework for conducting the required analysis of § 13981. In Lopez, we held that the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(A), which made it a federal crime to knowingly possess a firearm in a school zone, exceeded Congress' authority under the Commerce Clause. See 514 U.S. at 551. Several significant considerations contributed to our decision. [*610]

First, we observed that § 922(q) was "a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing [21] to do with 'commerce' or any sort of economic enterprise, however [1750]

REV_00258888

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 514 U.S. 549,AT 551

*514 U.S. 549, *; 115 S. Ct. 1624, **;*
1995 U.S. LEXIS 3039, ; 131 L. Ed. 2d 626

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER v. ALFONSO LOPEZ, JR.

No. 93-1260

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

514 U.S. 549; 115 S. Ct. 1624; 1995 U.S. LEXIS 3039; 131 L. Ed. 2d 626; 63 U.S.L.W. 4343; 95 Cal. Daily Op. Service 3074; 8 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. S 752

November 8, 1994, Argued April 26, 1995, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY: [*1] ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 2 F.3d 1342, affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Appellant sought review of reversal by the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit of respondent's conviction under the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 (GFSZA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(q)(1)(A) (1988).

OVERVIEW: Respondent was convicted of violating the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 (GFSZA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(q)(1)(A) (1988) after carrying a concealed handgun and bullets to school. Respondent's conviction was reversed on appeal. In upholding the reversal, the court held the GFSZA was invalid as it was beyond the power of congress under the commerce clause, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3. The GFSZA had nothing to do with commerce or any economic activity, and therefore could not be sustained as a regulation of activity arising out of or connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affected interstate commerce.

OUTCOME: Reversal of respondent's conviction upheld because GFSZA was invalid; it was not a regulation of activity arising out of or connected with a commercial transaction which substantially affected interstate commerce, and was thus beyond the power of congress under the commerce clause.

CORE TERMS: commerce, interstate commerce, commerce clause, gun, commerce power, regulation, federal government, interstate, firearm, intrastate, regulated, manufacturing, agriculture, wheat, violence, zone, manufacture, substantially affect, skills, power to regulate, rational basis, enumerated, learning, enact, indirect, classroom, violent crime, productivity, regulating, federalism

CORE CONCEPTS - ✦ Hide Concepts

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

REV_00258921

sense competes with wheat in commerce." 317 U.S. at 128.

[1C]
[3A]
Section 922(q) is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with [1631] "commerce" or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms. n3 Section 922(q) is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated. It cannot, therefore, be sustained under our cases upholding regulations of activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce.

[3B]

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 Under our federal system, the "'States possess primary authority for defining and enforcing the criminal law.'" Brecht v. Abrahamson, 507 U.S. 619, 635, 123 L. Ed. 2d 353, 113 S. Ct. 1710 (1993) (quoting Engle v. Isaac, 456 U.S. 107, 128, 71 L. Ed. 2d 783, 102 S. Ct. 1558 (1982)); see also Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 109, 89 L. Ed. 1495, 65 S. Ct. 1031 (1945) (plurality opinion) ("Our national government is one of delegated powers alone. Under our federal system the administration of criminal justice rests with the States except as Congress, acting within the scope of those delegated powers, has created offenses against the United States"). When Congress criminalizes conduct already denounced as criminal by the States, it effects a "'change in the sensitive relation between federal and state criminal jurisdiction.'" United States v. Enmons, 410 U.S. 396, 411-412, 35 L. Ed. 2d 379, 93 S. Ct. 1007 (1973) (quoting United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971)). The Government acknowledges that § 922(q) "displace[s] state policy choices in . . . that its prohibitions apply even in States that have chosen not to outlaw the conduct in question." Brief for United States 29, n. 18; see also Statement of President George Bush on Signing the Crime Control Act of 1990, 26 Weekly Comp. of Pres. Doc. 1944, 1945 (Nov. 29, 1990) ("Most egregiously, section [922(q)] inappropriately overrides legitimate State firearms laws with a new and unnecessary Federal law. The policies reflected in these provisions could legitimately be adopted by the States, but they should not be imposed upon the States by the Congress").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*23]

[1D]
Second, § 922(q) contains no jurisdictional element which would ensure, through case-by-case inquiry, that the firearm possession in question affects interstate commerce. For example, in United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971), the Court interpreted former 18 U.S.C. § 1202(a), which made it [*562] a crime for a felon to "receive, posses[s], or transport in commerce or affecting commerce . . . any firearm." 404 U.S. at 337. The Court interpreted the possession component of § 1202(a) to require an additional nexus to interstate commerce both because the statute was ambiguous and because "unless Congress conveys its purpose clearly, it will not be deemed to have significantly changed the federal-state balance." Id., at 349. The Bass Court set aside the conviction because although the Government had demonstrated that Bass had possessed a firearm, it had failed "to show the requisite nexus with interstate commerce." Id., at 347. The Court thus interpreted the statute to reserve the constitutional question whether Congress could [24] regulate, without more, the "mere possession" of firearms. See id., at 339, n. 4; see also United States v. Five Gambling Devices, 346 U.S. 441, 448, 98 L. Ed. 179, 74 S. Ct. 190 (1953) (plurality opinion) ("The principle is old and deeply imbedded in our jurisprudence that this Court will construe a statute in a manner that requires decision of serious constitutional questions only if the statutory language leaves no reasonable alternative"). Unlike the statute in Bass, § 922(q) has no express jurisdictional element which might limit its reach to a discrete set of firearm possessions that additionally have an explicit connection with or effect on interstate commerce.

REV_00258930

Although as part of our independent evaluation of constitutionality under the Commerce Clause we of course consider legislative findings, and indeed even congressional committee findings, regarding effect on interstate commerce, see, e. g., Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S. at 17, the Government concedes that "neither the statute nor its legislative history contain[s] express congressional findings regarding the effects upon interstate commerce of [25] gun possession in a school zone." Brief for United States 5-6. We agree with the Government that Congress normally is not required to make formal findings as to the substantial burdens that an activity has on interstate commerce. See McClung, 379 U.S. at 304; [*563] see also Perez, 402 U.S. at 156 ("Congress need [not] make particularized findings in order to legislate"). But to the [1632] extent that congressional findings would enable us to evaluate the legislative judgment that the activity in question substantially affected interstate commerce, even though no such substantial effect was visible to the naked eye, they are lacking here. n4

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 We note that on September 13, 1994, President Clinton signed into law the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. 103-322, 108 Stat. 1796. Section 320904 of that Act, id., at 2125, amends § 922(q) to include congressional findings regarding the effects of firearm possession in and around schools upon interstate and foreign commerce. The Government does not rely upon these subsequent findings as a substitute for the absence of findings in the first instance. Tr. of Oral Arg. 25 ("We're not relying on them in the strict sense of the word, but we think that at a very minimum they indicate that reasons can be identified for why Congress wanted to regulate this particular activity").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*26]

[4]
The Government argues that Congress has accumulated institutional expertise regarding the regulation of firearms through previous enactments. Cf. Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 503, 65 L. Ed. 2d 902, 100 S. Ct. 2758 (1980) (Powell, J., concurring). We agree, however, with the Fifth Circuit that importation of previous findings to justify § 922(q) is especially inappropriate here because the "prior federal enactments or Congressional findings [do not] speak to the subject matter of section 922(q) or its relationship to interstate commerce. Indeed, section 922(q) plows thoroughly new ground and represents a sharp break with the long-standing pattern of federal firearms legislation." 2 F.3d at 1366.

The Government's essential contention, in fine, is that we may determine here that § 922(q) is valid because possession of a firearm in a local school zone does indeed substantially affect interstate commerce. Brief for United States 17. The Government argues that possession of a firearm in a school zone may result in violent crime and that violent crime can be expected to affect the functioning of the national economy in two ways. First, the costs [27] of violent [*564] crime are substantial, and, through the mechanism of insurance, those costs are spread throughout the population. See United States v. Evans, 928 F.2d 858, 862 (CA9 1991). Second, violent crime reduces the willingness of individuals to travel to areas within the country that are perceived to be unsafe. Cf. Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 253. The Government also argues that the presence of guns in schools poses a substantial threat to the educational process by threatening the learning environment. A handicapped educational process, in turn, will result in a less productive citizenry. That, in turn, would have an adverse effect on the Nation's economic well-being. As a result, the Government argues that Congress could rationally have concluded that § 922(q) substantially affects interstate commerce.

REV_00258931

We pause to consider the implications of the Government's arguments. The Government admits, under its "costs of crime" reasoning, that Congress could regulate not only all violent crime, but all activities that might lead to violent crime, regardless of how tenuously they relate to interstate commerce. See [28] Tr. of Oral Arg. 8-9. Similarly, under the Government's "national productivity" reasoning, Congress could regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens: family law (including marriage, divorce, and child custody), for example. Under the theories that the Government presents in support of § 922(q), it is difficult to perceive any limitation on federal power, even in areas such as criminal law enforcement or education where States historically have been sovereign. Thus, if we were to accept the Government's arguments, we are hard pressed to posit any activity by an individual that Congress is without power to regulate.

Although JUSTICE BREYER argues that acceptance of the Government's rationales would not authorize a general federal police power, he is unable to identify any activity that the States may regulate but Congress may not. JUSTICE BREYER posits that there might be some limitations on Congress' [*565] commerce power, such as family law or certain aspects of education. Post, at 624. These suggested limitations, when viewed in light of the dissent's expansive analysis, are devoid of substance.

JUSTICE BREYER focuses, for the [29] most part, on the threat that firearm possession in [1633] and near schools poses to the educational process and the potential economic consequences flowing from that threat. Post, at 619-624. Specifically, the dissent reasons that (1) gun-related violence is a serious problem; (2) that problem, in turn, has an adverse effect on classroom learning; and (3) that adverse effect on classroom learning, in turn, represents a substantial threat to trade and commerce. Post, at 623. This analysis would be equally applicable, if not more so, to subjects such as family law and direct regulation of education.

For instance, if Congress can, pursuant to its Commerce Clause power, regulate activities that adversely affect the learning environment, then, a fortiori, it also can regulate the educational process directly. Congress could determine that a school's curriculum has a "significant" effect on the extent of classroom learning. As a result, Congress could mandate a federal curriculum for local elementary and secondary schools because what is taught in local schools has a significant "effect on classroom learning," cf. ibid., and that, in turn, has a substantial effect on interstate [30] commerce.

[5]
JUSTICE BREYER rejects our reading of precedent and argues that "Congress . . . could rationally conclude that schools fall on the commercial side of the line." Post, at 629. Again, JUSTICE BREYER's rationale lacks any real limits because, depending on the level of generality, any activity can be looked upon as commercial. Under the dissent's rationale, Congress could just as easily look at child rearing as "falling on the commercial side of the line" because it provides a "valuable service -- namely, to equip [children] with the skills they need to survive in life and, more specifically, in the workplace." Ibid. We do not doubt that Congress [*566] has authority under the Commerce Clause to regulate numerous commercial activities that substantially affect interstate commerce and also affect the educational process. That authority, though broad, does not include the authority to regulate each and every aspect of local schools.

[6]

REV_00258932

Admittedly, a determination whether an intrastate activity is commercial or noncommercial may in some cases result in legal uncertainty. But, so long as Congress' authority is limited to those powers enumerated in the Constitution, and so long as those [31] enumerated powers are interpreted as having judicially enforceable outer limits, congressional legislation under the Commerce Clause always will engender "legal uncertainty." Post, at 630. As Chief Justice Marshall stated in > McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. 316, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. Ed. 579 (1819): "The [federal] government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle, that it can exercise only the powers granted to it . . . is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted, is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist." Id., at 405.

See also Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., at 195 ("The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated"). The Constitution mandates this uncertainty by withholding from Congress a plenary police power that would authorize enactment of every type of legislation. See Art. I, § 8. Congress has operated within this framework of legal uncertainty ever since this Court determined that it was the Judiciary's duty "to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 177, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803) [32] (Marshall, C. J.). Any possible benefit from eliminating this "legal uncertainty" would be at the expense of the Constitution's system of enumerated powers.

In Jones & Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S. at 37, we held that the question of congressional power under the Commerce Clause "is necessarily one of degree." To the same effect [*567] is the concurring opinion of Justice Cardozo in Schechter Poultry:

> "There is a view of causation that would obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local in the activities of commerce. Motion at the outer rim is communicated perceptibly, though minutely, to recording instruments at the center. A society such as ours 'is an elastic medium which transmits all tremors throughout its territory; the only question is of their size.'" 295 U.S. at 554 [1634] (quoting United States v. A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp., 76 F.2d 617, 624 (CA2 1935) (L. Hand, J., concurring)).

[1E]
These are not precise formulations, and in the nature of things they cannot be. But we think they point the way to a correct decision of this case. The possession of a gun in a local school [33] zone is in no sense an economic activity that might, through repetition elsewhere, substantially affect any sort of interstate commerce. Respondent was a local student at a local school; there is no indication that he had recently moved in interstate commerce, and there is no requirement that his possession of the firearm have any concrete tie to interstate commerce.

To uphold the Government's contentions here, we would have to pile inference upon inference in a manner that would bid fair to convert congressional authority under the Commerce Clause to a general police power of the sort retained by the States. Admittedly, some of our prior cases have taken long steps down that road, giving great deference to congressional action. See supra, at 556-558. The broad language in these opinions has suggested the possibility of additional expansion, but we decline here to proceed any further. To do so would require us to conclude that the Constitution's enumeration of powers does not presuppose something not enumerated, cf. Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, at 195, and that there never will be a distinction between what is [*568] truly national and what is truly local, [34] cf. Jones & Laughlin Steel, supra, at 30. This we are unwilling to do.

REV_00258933

For the foregoing reasons the judgment of the Court of Appeals is Affirmed.

CONCURBY: KENNEDY; THOMAS

CONCUR: JUSTICE KENNEDY, with whom JUSTICE O'CONNOR joins, concurring.

The history of the judicial struggle to interpret the Commerce Clause during the transition from the economic system the Founders knew to the single, national market still emergent in our own era counsels great restraint before the Court determines that the Clause is insufficient to support an exercise of the national power. That history gives me some pause about today's decision, but I join the Court's opinion with these observations on what I conceive to be its necessary though limited holding.

Chief Justice Marshall announced that the national authority reaches "that commerce which concerns more States than one" and that the commerce power "is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 194, 196, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824). His statements can be understood now as an early and authoritative recognition that the [35] Commerce Clause grants Congress extensive power and ample discretion to determine its appropriate exercise. The progression of our Commerce Clause cases from Gibbons to the present was not marked, however, by a coherent or consistent course of interpretation; for neither the course of technological advance nor the foundational principles for the jurisprudence itself were self-evident to the courts that sought to resolve contemporary disputes by enduring principles.

Furthermore, for almost a century after the adoption of the Constitution, the Court's Commerce Clause decisions did not concern the authority of Congress to legislate. Rather, [*569] the Court faced the related but quite distinct question of the authority of the States to regulate matters that would be within the commerce power had Congress chosen to act. The simple fact was that in the early years of the Republic, Congress seldom perceived the necessity to exercise its power in circumstances where its authority would be called into question. The Court's initial task, therefore, was to elaborate the theories that would permit the States to act where Congress had not done so. Not the least part of the problem was the unresolved [36] question whether the congressional power was exclusive, a question reserved by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden, supra, at 209-210.

At the midpoint of the 19th century, the Court embraced the principle that the States and the National Government both have authority to regulate certain matters absent the [1635] congressional determination to displace local law or the necessity for the Court to invalidate local law because of the dormant national power. Cooley v. Board of Wardens of Port of Philadelphia ex rel. Soc. for Relief of Distressed Pilots, 53 U.S. 299, 12 HOW 299, 318-321, 13 L. Ed. 996 (1852). But the utility of that solution was not at once apparent, see generally F. Frankfurter, The Commerce Clause under Marshall, Taney and Waite (1937) (hereinafter Frankfurter), and difficulties of application persisted, see Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U.S. 100, 122-125, 34 L. Ed. 128, 10 S. Ct. 681 (1890).

One approach the Court used to inquire into the lawfulness of state authority was to draw content-based or subject-matter distinctions, thus defining by semantic or formalistic categories those activities that were commerce and those that were not. For instance, in deciding that a State could prohibit the in-state [37] manufacture of liquor intended for out-of-state shipment, it distinguished between manufacture and commerce. "No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation -- the fashioning of raw materials [*570] into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different." Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1, 20, 32 L. Ed. 346, 9 S. Ct. 6 (1888). Though that approach likely would not have survived even if confined to the question of a State's authority to enact legislation, it was not at all propitious when applied to the quite different question of what subjects were within the reach of the national power when Congress chose to exercise it.

REV_00258934

This became evident when the Court began to confront federal economic regulation enacted in response to the rapid industrial development in the late 19th century. Thus, it relied upon the manufacture-commerce dichotomy in United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325, 15 S. Ct. 249 (1895), where a manufacturers' combination controlling some 98% of the Nation's domestic sugar refining capacity was [38] held to be outside the reach of the Sherman Act. Conspiracies to control manufacture, agriculture, mining, production, wages, or prices, the Court explained, had too "indirect" an effect on interstate commerce. Id., at 16. And in Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161, 52 L. Ed. 436, 28 S. Ct. 277 (1908), the Court rejected the view that the commerce power might extend to activities that, although local in the sense of having originated within a single State, nevertheless had a practical effect on interstate commercial activity. The Court concluded that there was not a "legal or logical connection . . . between an employe's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce," id., at 178, and struck down a federal statute forbidding the discharge of an employee because of his membership in a labor organization. See also The Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U.S. 463, 497, 52 L. Ed. 297, 28 S. Ct. 141 (1908) (invalidating statute creating negligence action against common carriers for personal injuries of employees sustained in the course of employment, because the statute "regulates the persons [39] because they engage in interstate commerce and does not alone regulate the business of interstate commerce").

[*571] Even before the Court committed itself to sustaining federal legislation on broad principles of economic practicality, it found it necessary to depart from these decisions. The Court disavowed E. C. Knight's reliance on the manufacturing-commerce distinction in Standard Oil Co. of N. J. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1, 68-69, 55 L. Ed. 619, 31 S. Ct. 502 (1911), declaring that approach "unsound." The Court likewise rejected the rationale of Adair when it decided, in Texas & New Orleans R. Co. v. Railway Clerks, 281 U.S. 548, 570-571, 50 S. Ct. 427, 74 L. Ed. 1034 (1930), that Congress had the power to regulate matters pertaining to the organization of railroad workers.

In another line of cases, the Court addressed Congress' efforts to impede local activities it considered undesirable by prohibiting the interstate movement of some essential element. In the Lottery Case, 188 U.S. 321, 47 L. Ed. 492, 23 S. Ct. 321 (1903), the Court rejected the argument that Congress lacked power to prohibit the interstate movement of lottery tickets because it had power only [40] to regulate, not to prohibit. See also [1636] Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U.S. 45, 55 L. Ed. 364, 31 S. Ct. 364 (1911); Hoke v. United States, 227 U.S. 308, 57 L. Ed. 523, 33 S. Ct. 281 (1913). In Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 38 S. Ct. 529 (1918), however, the Court insisted that the power to regulate commerce "is directly the contrary of the assumed right to forbid commerce from moving," id., at 269-270, and struck down a prohibition on the interstate transportation of goods manufactured in violation of child labor laws.

Even while it was experiencing difficulties in finding satisfactory principles in these cases, the Court was pursuing a more sustainable and practical approach in other lines of decisions, particularly those involving the regulation of railroad rates. In the Minnesota Rate Cases, 230 U.S. 352, 57 L. Ed. 1511, 33 S. Ct. 729 (1913), the Court upheld a state rate order, but observed that Congress might be empowered to regulate in this area if "by reason of the interblending of the interstate and intrastate operations of interstate carriers" the regulation of interstate rates could not be maintained [41] without restrictions on "intrastate [*572] rates which substantially affect the former." Id., at 432-433. And in the Shreveport

REV_00258935

Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342, 34 S. Ct. 833, 58 L. Ed. 1341 (1914), the Court upheld an Interstate Commerce Commission order fixing railroad rates with the explanation that congressional authority, "extending to these interstate carriers as instruments of interstate commerce, necessarily embraces the right to control their operations in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate traffic that the control is essential or appropriate to the security of that traffic, to the efficiency of the interstate service, and to the maintenance of conditions under which interstate commerce may be conducted upon fair terms and without molestation or hindrance." Id., at 351.

Even the most confined interpretation of "commerce" would embrace transportation between the States, so the rate cases posed much less difficulty for the Court than cases involving manufacture or production. Nevertheless, the Court's recognition of the importance of a practical conception of the commerce power was not altogether confined to the rate [42] cases. In Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 49 L. Ed. 518, 25 S. Ct. 276 (1905), the Court upheld the application of federal antitrust law to a combination of meat dealers that occurred in one State but that restrained trade in cattle "sent for sale from a place in one State, with the expectation that they will end their transit . . . in another." Id., at 398. The Court explained that "commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business." Ibid. Chief Justice Taft followed the same approach in upholding federal regulation of stockyards in Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 66 L. Ed. 735, 42 S. Ct. 397 (1922). Speaking for the Court, he rejected a "nice and technical inquiry," id., at 519, when the local transactions at issue could not "be separated from the movement to which they contribute," id., at 516.

Reluctance of the Court to adopt that approach in all of its cases caused inconsistencies in doctrine to persist, however. In addressing New Deal legislation the Court [43] resuscitated [*573] the abandoned abstract distinction between direct and indirect effects on interstate commerce. See Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 309, 80 L. Ed. 1160, 56 S. Ct. 855 (1936) (Act regulating price of coal and wages and hours for miners held to have only "secondary and indirect" effect on interstate commerce); Railroad Retirement Bd. v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330, 368, 79 L. Ed. 1468, 55 S. Ct. 758 (1935) (compulsory retirement and pension plan for railroad carrier employees too "remote from any regulation of commerce as such"); A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 548, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935) (wage and hour law provision of National Industrial Recovery Act had "no direct relation to interstate commerce").

The case that seems to mark the Court's definitive commitment to the practical conception of the commerce power is NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937), where the Court sustained labor laws that applied to [1637] manufacturing facilities, making no real attempt to distinguish Carter, supra, and Schechter, supra. 301 U.S. at 40-41. [44] The deference given to Congress has since been confirmed. United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941), overruled Hammer v. Dagenhart, supra. And in Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942), the Court disapproved E. C. Knight and the entire line of direct-indirect and manufacture-production cases, explaining that "broader interpretations of the Commerce Clause [were] destined to supersede the earlier ones," 317 U.S. at 122, and "whatever terminology is used, the criterion is necessarily one of degree and must be so defined. This does not satisfy those who seek mathematical or rigid formulas. But such formulas are not provided by the great concepts of the Constitution," id., at 123, n. 24. Later examples of the exercise of federal power where commercial transactions were the subject of regulation include Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964), Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964), and Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971). [45] These and like authorities are within the fair ambit [*574] of the Court's practical conception of commercial regulation and are not called in question by our decision today.

REV_00258936

The history of our Commerce Clause decisions contains at least two lessons of relevance to this case. The first, as stated at the outset, is the imprecision of content-based boundaries used without more to define the limits of the Commerce Clause. The second, related to the first but of even greater consequence, is that the Court as an institution and the legal system as a whole have an immense stake in the stability of our Commerce Clause jurisprudence as it has evolved to this point. Stare decisis operates with great force in counseling us not to call in question the essential principles now in place respecting the congressional power to regulate transactions of a commercial nature. That fundamental restraint on our power forecloses us from reverting to an understanding of commerce that would serve only an 18th-century economy, dependent then upon production and trading practices that had changed but little over the preceding centuries; it also mandates against returning to the time when congressional authority [46] to regulate undoubted commercial activities was limited by a judicial determination that those matters had an insufficient connection to an interstate system. Congress can regulate in the commercial sphere on the assumption that we have a single market and a unified purpose to build a stable national economy.

In referring to the whole subject of the federal and state balance, we said this just three Terms ago:

> "This framework has been sufficiently flexible over the past two centuries to allow for enormous changes in the nature of government. The Federal Government undertakes activities today that would have been unimaginable to the Framers in two senses: first, because the Framers would not have conceived that any government would conduct such activities; and second, because the Framers would not have believed that the Federal Government, rather than the States, would assume such [*575] responsibilities. Yet the powers conferred upon the Federal Government by the Constitution were phrased in language broad enough to allow for the expansion of the Federal Government's role." New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 157, 120 L. Ed. 2d 120, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992) (emphasis deleted).

It does [47] not follow, however, that in every instance the Court lacks the authority and responsibility to review congressional attempts to alter the federal balance. This case requires us to consider our place in the design of the Government and to appreciate the significance of federalism in the whole structure of the Constitution.

Of the various structural elements in the Constitution, separation of powers, checks and balances, judicial review, and federalism, only concerning the last does there seem to be much uncertainty respecting the existence, and the content, of standards that allow the Judiciary to play a significant role [1638] in maintaining the design contemplated by the Framers. Although the resolution of specific cases has proved difficult, we have derived from the Constitution workable standards to assist in preserving separation of powers and checks and balances. See, e. g., Prize Cases, 67 U.S. 635, 2 Black 635, 17 L. Ed. 459 (1863); Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 96 L. Ed. 1153, 72 S. Ct. 863 (1952); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1039, 94 S. Ct. 3090 (1974); Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 46 L. Ed. 2d 659, 96 S. Ct. 612 (1976); [48] INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 77 L. Ed. 2d 317, 103 S. Ct. 2764 (1983); Bowsher v. Synar, 478 U.S. 714, 92 L. Ed. 2d 583, 106 S. Ct. 3181 (1986); Plaut v. Spendthrift Farm, Inc., ante, p. 211. These standards are by now well accepted. Judicial review is also established beyond question, Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 1 Cranch 137, 2 L. Ed. 60 (1803), and though we may differ when applying its principles, see, e. g., Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 120 L. Ed. 2d 674, 112 S. Ct. 2791 (1992), its legitimacy is undoubted. Our role in preserving the federal balance seems more tenuous.

There is irony in this, because of the four structural elements in the Constitution just mentioned, federalism was the unique contribution of the Framers to political science and political theory. See Friendly, Federalism: A Foreword, 86 [*576] Yale L. J. 1019 (1977); G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776-1787, pp. 524-532, 564 (1969). Though on the surface the idea may seem counter-intuitive, it was the insight of the Framers that freedom was enhanced by the creation of two governments, not one. "In the compound republic of America, the power [49] surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each subdivided among distinct and separate departments. Hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself." The Federalist No. 51, p. 323 (C. Rossiter ed. 1961) (J. Madison). See also Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 458-459, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991) ("Just as the separation and independence of the coordinate branches of the Federal Government serve to prevent the accumulation of excessive power in any one branch, a healthy balance of power between the States and the Federal Government will reduce the risk of tyranny and abuse from either front. . . . In the tension between federal and state power lies the promise of liberty"); New York v. United States, supra, at 181 ("The Constitution divides authority between federal and state governments for the protection of individuals. State sovereignty is not just an end in itself: 'Rather, federalism secures to citizens the liberties that derive [50] from the diffusion of sovereign power'") (quoting Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 759, 115 L. Ed. 2d 640, 111 S. Ct. 2546 (1991) (Blackmun, J., dissenting)).

REV_00258937

The theory that two governments accord more liberty than one requires for its realization two distinct and discernable lines of political accountability: one between the citizens and the Federal Government; the second between the citizens and the States. If, as Madison expected, the Federal and State Governments are to control each other, see The Federalist No. 51, and hold each other in check by competing for the affections of the people, see The Federalist No. 46, those citizens must have some means of knowing which of [*577] the two governments to hold accountable for the failure to perform a given function. "Federalism serves to assign political responsibility, not to obscure it." FTC v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 504 U.S. 621, 636, 119 L. Ed. 2d 410, 112 S. Ct. 2169 (1992). Were the Federal Government to take over the regulation of entire areas of traditional state concern, areas having nothing to do with the regulation of commercial activities, the boundaries between the spheres of federal and state authority would blur and political [51] responsibility would become illusory. Cf. New York v. United States, supra, at 155-169; FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. 742, 787, 72 L. Ed. 2d 532, 102 S. Ct. 2126 (1982) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). The resultant inability to hold either branch of the government answerable [1639] to the citizens is more dangerous even than devolving too much authority to the remote central power.

To be sure, one conclusion that could be drawn from The Federalist Papers is that the balance between national and state power is entrusted in its entirety to the political process. Madison's observation that "the people ought not surely to be precluded from giving most of their confidence where they may discover it to be most due," The Federalist No. 46, p. 295 (C. Rossiter ed. 1961), can be interpreted to say that the essence of responsibility for a shift in power from the State to the Federal Government rests upon a political judgment, though he added assurance that "the State governments could have little to apprehend, because it is only within a certain sphere that the federal power can, in the nature of things, be advantageously administered, [52] " ibid. Whatever the judicial role, it is axiomatic that Congress does have substantial discretion and control over the federal balance.

For these reasons, it would be mistaken and mischievous for the political branches to forget that the sworn obligation to preserve and protect the Constitution in maintaining the federal balance is their own in the first and primary instance. In the Webster-Hayne Debates, see The Great Speeches and [*578] Orations of Daniel Webster 227-272 (E. Whipple ed. 1879), and the debates over the Civil Rights Acts, see Hearings on S. 1732 before the Senate Committee on Commerce, 88th Cong., 1st Sess., pts. 1-3 (1963), some Congresses have accepted responsibility to confront the great questions of the proper federal balance in terms of lasting consequences for the constitutional design. The political branches of the Government must fulfill this grave constitutional obligation if democratic liberty and the federalism that secures it are to endure.

REV_00258938

At the same time, the absence of structural mechanisms to require those officials to undertake this principled task, and the momentary political convenience often attendant upon their failure to do so, argue against a complete [53] renunciation of the judicial role. Although it is the obligation of all officers of the Government to respect the constitutional design, see Public Citizen v. Department of Justice, 491 U.S. 440, 466, 105 L. Ed. 2d 377, 109 S. Ct. 2558 (1989); Rostker v. Goldberg, 453 U.S. 57, 64, 69 L. Ed. 2d 478, 101 S. Ct. 2646 (1981), the federal balance is too essential a part of our constitutional structure and plays too vital a role in securing freedom for us to admit inability to intervene when one or the other level of Government has tipped the scales too far.

In the past this Court has participated in maintaining the federal balance through judicial exposition of doctrines such as abstention, see, e. g., Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37, 27 L. Ed. 2d 669, 91 S. Ct. 746 (1971); Railroad Comm'n of Tex. v. Pullman Co., 312 U.S. 496, 85 L. Ed. 971, 61 S. Ct. 643 (1941); Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U.S. 315, 87 L. Ed. 1424, 63 S. Ct. 1098 (1943), the rules for determining the primacy of state law, see, e. g., Erie R. Co. v. Tompkins, 304 U.S. 64, 82 L. Ed. 1188, 58 S. Ct. 817 (1938), the doctrine of adequate and independent state grounds, see, e. g., Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U.S. 590, 20 Wall. 590, 22 L. Ed. 429 (1875); [54] Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032, 77 L. Ed. 2d 1201, 103 S. Ct. 3469 (1983), the whole jurisprudence of pre-emption, see, e. g., Rice v. Santa Fe Elevator Corp., 331 U.S. 218, 91 L. Ed. 1447, 67 S. Ct. 1146 (1947); Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 120 L. Ed. 2d 407, 112 S. Ct. 2608 (1992), and many of the rules governing our habeas jurisprudence, see, e. g., Coleman v. Thompson, 501 U.S. 722, 115 L. Ed. 2d 640, 111 S. Ct. 2546 (1991); McCleskey [*579] v. Zant, 499 U.S. 467, 113 L. Ed. 2d 517, 111 S. Ct. 1454 (1991); Teague v. Lane, 489 U.S. 288, 103 L. Ed. 2d 334, 109 S. Ct. 1060 (1989); Rose v. Lundy, 455 U.S. 509, 71 L. Ed. 2d 379, 102 S. Ct. 1198 (1982); Wainwright v. Sykes, 433 U.S. 72, 53 L. Ed. 2d 594, 97 S. Ct. 2497 (1977).

Our ability to preserve this principle under the Commerce Clause has presented a much greater challenge. See supra, at 568-574. "This clause has throughout the Court's history been the chief source of its adjudications regarding federalism," and "no other body of opinions affords a fairer or more revealing test of judicial qualities." Frankfurter 66-67. But as the branch whose distinctive duty it is to declare "what the law is," Marbury v. [1640] Madison, 1 Cranch, at 177, [55] we are often called upon to resolve questions of constitutional law not susceptible to the mechanical application of bright and clear lines. The substantial element of political judgment in Commerce Clause matters leaves our institutional capacity to intervene more in doubt than when we decide cases, for instance, under the Bill of Rights even though clear and bright lines are often absent in the latter class of disputes. See County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, Greater Pittsburgh Chapter, 492 U.S. 573, 630, 106 L. Ed. 2d 472, 109 S. Ct. 3086 (1989) (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment) ("We cannot avoid the obligation to draw lines, often close and difficult lines" in adjudicating constitutional rights). But our cases do not teach that we have no role at all in determining the meaning of the Commerce Clause.

Our position in enforcing the dormant Commerce Clause is instructive. The Court's doctrinal approach in that area has likewise "taken some turns." Oklahoma Tax Comm'n v. Jefferson Lines, Inc., ante, at 180. Yet in contrast to the prevailing skepticism that surrounds our ability to give meaning to the [56] explicit text of the Commerce Clause, there is widespread acceptance of our authority to enforce the dormant Commerce Clause, which we have but inferred from the constitutional structure as a limitation on the power of the States. One element of our dormant Commerce Clause jurisprudence has been the principle that the States may not [*580] impose regulations that place an undue burden on interstate commerce, even where those regulations do not discriminate between in-state and out-of-state businesses. See Brown-Forman Distillers Corp. v. New York State Liquor Authority, 476

REV_00258939

The commerce power, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3, is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

Where the interstate and intrastate aspects of commerce are so mingled together that full regulation of interstate commerce requires incidental regulation of intrastate commerce, the commerce clause, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3, authorizes such regulation.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

The power of congress over interstate commerce is not confined to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of congress to regulate interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

Even if an activity is local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as direct or indirect.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

The scope of the interstate commerce power, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3, must be considered in the light of the dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon interstate commerce so indirect and remote that to embrace them, in view of complex society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government. Congress may regulate intrastate activity that has a "substantial effect" on interstate commerce and activity that exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce. The court decides whether a rational basis exists for concluding that a regulated activity sufficiently affects interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

There are three broad categories of activity that congress may regulate under its commerce power, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 3. First, congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce. Second, congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only from intrastate activities. Finally, congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities having a substantial relation to interstate commerce, i.e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

The proper test of whether an activity substantially affects interstate commerce requires an analysis of whether the regulated activity "substantially affects" interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause
Criminal Law & Procedure : Criminal Offenses : Weapons Offenses : Possession Offenses

REV_00258922

U.S. 573, 579, 90 L. Ed. 2d 552, 106 S. Ct. 2080 (1986) (citing Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 U.S. 137, 142, 25 L. Ed. 2d 174, 90 S. Ct. 844 (1970)). Distinguishing between regulations that do place an undue burden on interstate commerce and regulations that do not depends upon delicate judgments. True, if we invalidate a state law, Congress can in effect overturn our judgment, whereas in a case announcing that Congress has transgressed its authority, the decision is more consequential, for it stands unless Congress can revise its law to demonstrate its commercial character. This difference no doubt informs the circumspection [57] with which we invalidate an Act of Congress, but it does not mitigate our duty to recognize meaningful limits on the commerce power of Congress.

The statute before us upsets the federal balance to a degree that renders it an unconstitutional assertion of the commerce power, and our intervention is required. As THE CHIEF JUSTICE explains, unlike the earlier cases to come before the Court here neither the actors nor their conduct have a commercial character, and neither the purposes nor the design of the statute have an evident commercial nexus. See ante, at 559-561. The statute makes the simple possession of a gun within 1,000 feet of the grounds of the school a criminal offense. In a sense any conduct in this interdependent world of ours has an ultimate commercial origin or consequence, but we have not yet said the commerce power may reach so far. If Congress attempts that extension, then at the least we must inquire whether the exercise of national power seeks to intrude upon an area of traditional state concern.

An interference of these dimensions occurs here, for it is well established that education is a traditional concern of the States. Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 741-742, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1069, 94 S. Ct. 3112 (1974); [*581] [58] Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104, 21 L. Ed. 2d 228, 89 S. Ct. 266 (1968). The proximity to schools, including of course schools owned and operated by the States or their subdivisions, is the very premise for making the conduct criminal. In these circumstances, we have a particular duty to ensure that the federal-state balance is not destroyed. Cf. Rice, supra, at 230 ("We start with the assumption that the historic police powers of the States" are not displaced by a federal statute "unless that was the clear and manifest purpose of Congress"); Florida Lime & Avocado Growers, Inc. v. Paul, 373 U.S. 132, 146, 10 L. Ed. 2d 248, 83 S. Ct. 1210 (1963).

[1641] While it is doubtful that any State, or indeed any reasonable person, would argue that it is wise policy to allow students to carry guns on school premises, considerable disagreement exists about how best to accomplish that goal. In this circumstance, the theory and utility of our federalism are revealed, for the States may perform their role as laboratories for experimentation to devise various solutions where the best solution is far from clear. See San Antonio Independent School Dist. v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 49-50, 36 L. Ed. 2d 16, 93 S. Ct. 1278 (1973); [59] New State Ice Co. v. Liebmann, 285 U.S. 262, 311, 76 L. Ed. 747, 52 S. Ct. 371 (1932) (Brandeis, J., dissenting).

If a State or municipality determines that harsh criminal sanctions are necessary and wise to deter students from carrying guns on school premises, the reserved powers of the States are sufficient to enact those measures. Indeed, over 40 States already have criminal laws outlawing the possession of firearms on or near school grounds. See, e. g., Alaska Stat. Ann. §§ 11.61.195(a)(2)(A), 11.61.220(a)(4)(A) (Supp. 1994); Cal. Penal Code Ann. § 626.9 (West Supp. 1994); Mass. Gen. Laws § 269:10(j) (1992); N. J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:39-5(e) (West Supp. 1994); Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-308.1 (1988); Wis. Stat. § 948.605 (1991-1992).

Other, more practicable means to rid the schools of guns may be thought by the citizens of some States to be preferable for the safety and welfare of the schools those States are [*582] charged with maintaining. See Brief for National Conference of State Legislatures et al. as Amici Curiae 26-30 (injection of federal officials into local problems causes friction and diminishes political accountability of state and local governments). These might include [60] inducements to inform on violators where the information leads to arrests or confiscation of the guns, see Lima, Schools May Launch Weapons Hot Line, Los Angeles Times, Ventura Cty. East ed., Jan. 13, 1995, p. B1, col. 5; Reward for Tips on Guns in Tucson

REV_00258940

Schools, The Arizona Republic, Jan. 7, 1995, p. B2; programs to encourage the voluntary surrender of guns with some provision for amnesty, see Zaidan, Akron Rallies to Save Youths, The Plain Dealer, Mar. 2, 1995, p. 1B; Swift, Legislators Consider Plan to Get Guns Off Streets, Hartford Courant, Apr. 29, 1992, p. A4; penalties imposed on parents or guardians for failure to supervise the child, see, e. g., Okla. Stat., Tit. 21, § 858 (Supp. 1995) (fining parents who allow students to possess firearm at school); Tenn. Code Ann. § 39-17-1312 (Supp. 1992) (misdemeanor for parents to allow student to possess firearm at school); Straight Shooter: Gov. Casey's Reasonable Plan to Control Assault Weapons, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Mar. 14, 1994, p. B2 (proposed bill); Bailey, Anti-Crime Measures Top Legislators' Agenda, Los Angeles Times, Orange Cty. ed., Mar. 7, 1994, p. B1, col. 2 (same); Krupa, New Gun-Control Plans Could Tighten Local Law, The Boston Globe, [61] June 20, 1993, p. 29; laws providing for suspension or expulsion of gun-toting students, see, e. g., Ala. Code § 16-1-24.1 (Supp. 1994); Ind. Code § 20-8.1-5-4(b)(1)(D) (1993); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 158.150(1)(a) (Michie 1992); Wash. Rev. Code § 9.41.280 (1994), or programs for expulsion with assignment to special facilities, see Martin, Legislators Poised to Take Harsher Stand on Guns in Schools, The Seattle Times, Feb. 1, 1995, p. B1 (automatic year-long expulsion for students with guns and intense semester-long reentry program).

[*583] The statute now before us forecloses the States from experimenting and exercising their own judgment in an area to which States lay claim by right of history and expertise, and it does so by regulating an activity beyond the realm of commerce in the ordinary and usual sense of that term. The tendency of this statute to displace state regulation in areas of traditional state concern is evident from its territorial operation. There are over 100,000 elementary and secondary schools in the United States. See U.S. Dept. of Education, National Center for Education Statistics, Digest of Education Statistics 73, 104 (NCES 94-115, 1994) (Tables 63, 94). Each [62] of these now has an invisible federal zone extending 1,000 feet beyond the (often irregular) boundaries of the school property. In some communities no doubt it would be difficult to navigate without infringing on those zones. Yet throughout these areas, school officials would find their own programs for the prohibition [1642] of guns in danger of displacement by the federal authority unless the State chooses to enact a parallel rule.

This is not a case where the etiquette of federalism has been violated by a formal command from the National Government directing the State to enact a certain policy, cf. New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 120 L. Ed. 2d 120, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992), or to organize its governmental functions in a certain way, cf. FERC v. Mississippi, 456 U.S. at 781 (O'CONNOR, J., concurring in judgment in part and dissenting in part). While the intrusion on state sovereignty may not be as severe in this instance as in some of our recent Tenth Amendment cases, the intrusion is nonetheless significant. Absent a stronger connection or identification with commercial concerns that are central to the Commerce Clause, that interference contradicts the federal balance [63] the Framers designed and that this Court is obliged to enforce.

For these reasons, I join in the opinion and judgment of the Court.

[*584] JUSTICE THOMAS, concurring.

The Court today properly concludes that the Commerce Clause does not grant Congress the authority to prohibit gun possession within 1,000 feet of a school, as it attempted to do in the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, Pub. L. 101-647, 104 Stat. 4844. Although I join the majority, I write separately to observe that our case law has drifted far from the original understanding of the Commerce Clause. In a future case, we ought to temper our Commerce Clause jurisprudence in a manner that both makes sense of our more recent case law and is more faithful to the original understanding of that Clause.

We have said that Congress may regulate not only "Commerce . . . among the several States," U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3, but also anything that has a "substantial effect" on such commerce. This test, if taken to its logical extreme, would give Congress a "police power" over all aspects of American life. Unfortunately, we have never come to grips with this implication of our substantial effects formula. Although we have supposedly [64] applied the substantial effects test for the past 60 years, we always have rejected readings of the Commerce Clause and the scope of federal power that would permit Congress to exercise a police power; our cases are quite clear that there are real limits to federal power. See New York v. United States, 505 U.S. 144, 155, 120 L. Ed. 2d 120, 112 S. Ct. 2408 (1992) ("No one disputes the proposition that 'the Constitution created a Federal Government of limited powers'") (quoting Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 457, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991); Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 196, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 37, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937). Cf. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. 419, 2 Dall. 419, 435, 1 L. Ed. 440 (1793) (Iredell, J.) ("Each State in the Union is sovereign as to all the powers reserved. It must necessarily be so, because the United States have no claim to any authority but such as the States have surrendered to them") (emphasis deleted). Indeed, on this crucial point, the majority and JUSTICE BREYER agree in principle: The Federal [*585] Government has nothing approaching a police power. Compare ante, [65] at 556-558, with post, at 624.

REV_00258941

While the principal dissent concedes that there are limits to federal power, the sweeping nature of our current test enables the dissent to argue that Congress can regulate gun possession. But it seems to me that the power to regulate "commerce" can by no means encompass authority over mere gun possession, any more than it empowers the Federal Government to regulate marriage, littering, or cruelty to animals, throughout the 50 States. Our Constitution quite properly leaves such matters to the individual States, notwithstanding these activities' effects on interstate commerce. Any interpretation of the Commerce Clause that even suggests that Congress could regulate such matters is in need of reexamination.

In an appropriate case, I believe that we must further reconsider our "substantial effects" test with an eye toward constructing a standard that reflects the text and history of the Commerce Clause without totally rejecting [1643] our more recent Commerce Clause jurisprudence.

Today, however, I merely support the Court's conclusion with a discussion of the text, structure, and history of the Commerce Clause and an analysis of our early case law. My goal is [66] simply to show how far we have departed from the original understanding and to demonstrate that the result we reach today is by no means "radical," see post, at 602 (STEVENS, J., dissenting). I also want to point out the necessity of refashioning a coherent test that does not tend to "obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government." Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., supra, at 37.

I

At the time the original Constitution was ratified, "commerce" consisted of selling, buying, and bartering, as well as transporting for these purposes. See 1 S. Johnson, A Dictionary [*586] of the English Language 361 (4th ed. 1773) (defining commerce as "Intercour[s]e; exchange of one thing for another; interchange of any thing; trade; traffick"); N. Bailey, An Universal Etymological English Dictionary (26th ed. 1789) ("trade or traffic"); T. Sheridan, A Complete Dictionary of the English Language (6th ed. 1796) ("Exchange of one thing for another; trade, traffick"). This understanding finds support in the etymology of the word, which literally means "with merchandise." See 3 Oxford English Dictionary 552 (2d ed. 1989) (com -- "with"; merci -- "merchandise [67] "). In fact, when Federalists and Anti-Federalists discussed the Commerce Clause during the ratification period, they often used trade (in its selling/bartering sense) and commerce interchangeably. See The Federalist No. 4, p. 22 (J. Jay) (asserting that countries will cultivate our friendship when our "trade" is prudently regulated by Federal Government); n1 id., No. 7, at 39-40 (A. Hamilton) (discussing "competitions of commerce" between States resulting from state "regulations of trade"); id., No. 40, at 262 (J. Madison) (asserting that it was an "acknowledged object of the Convention . . . that the regulation of trade should be submitted to the general government"); Lee, Letters of a Federal Farmer No. 5, in Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States 319 (P. Ford ed. 1888); Smith, An Address to the People of the State of New-York, in id., at 107.

REV_00258942

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n1 All references to The Federalist are to the Jacob E. Cooke 1961 edition.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

As one would expect, the term "commerce" was used in contradistinction to productive [68] activities such as manufacturing and agriculture. Alexander Hamilton, for example, repeatedly treated commerce, agriculture, and manufacturing as three separate endeavors. See, e. g., The Federalist No. 36, at 224 (referring to "agriculture, commerce, manufactures"); id., No. 21, at 133 (distinguishing commerce, arts, and industry); id., No. 12, at 74 (asserting that commerce and agriculture have shared interests). The same distinctions [*587] were made in the state ratification conventions. See, e. g., 2 Debates in the Several State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution 57 (J. Elliot ed. 1836) (hereinafter Debates) (T. Dawes at Massachusetts convention); id., at 336 (M. Smith at New York convention).

Moreover, interjecting a modern sense of commerce into the Constitution generates significant textual and structural problems. For example, one cannot replace "commerce" with a different type of enterprise, such as manufacturing. When a manufacturer produces a car, assembly cannot take place "with a foreign nation" or "with the Indian Tribes." Parts may come from different States or other nations and hence may have been in the flow of commerce at one time, [69] but manufacturing takes place at a discrete site. Agriculture and manufacturing involve the production of goods; commerce encompasses traffic in such articles.

The Port Preference Clause also suggests that the term "commerce" denoted sale and/or transport rather than business generally. According to that Clause, "no Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another." U.S. Const., Art. I, § 9, cl. 6. Although it is possible to [1644] conceive of regulations of manufacturing or farming that prefer one port over another, the more natural reading is that the Clause prohibits Congress from using its commerce power to channel commerce through certain favored ports.

The Constitution not only uses the word "commerce" in a narrower sense than our case law might suggest, it also does not support the proposition that Congress has authority over all activities that "substantially affect" interstate commerce. The Commerce Clause n2 does not state that Congress may [*588] "regulate matters that substantially affect commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." In contrast, the Constitution itself temporarily [70] prohibited amendments that would "affect" Congress' lack of authority to prohibit or restrict the slave trade or to enact unproportioned direct taxation. Art. V. Clearly, the Framers could have drafted a Constitution that contained a "substantially affects interstate commerce" Clause had that been their objective.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 Even to speak of "the Commerce Clause" perhaps obscures the actual scope of that Clause. As an original matter, Congress did not have authority to regulate all commerce; Congress could only "regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3. Although the precise line between interstate/foreign commerce and purely intrastate commerce was hard to draw, the Court attempted to adhere to such a line for the first 150 years of our Nation. See infra, at 593-599.

REV_00258943

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In addition to its powers under the Commerce Clause, Congress has the authority to enact such laws as are "necessary and proper" to carry into execution its power [71] to regulate commerce among the several States. U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 18. But on this Court's understanding of congressional power under these two Clauses, many of Congress' other enumerated powers under Art. I, § 8, are wholly superfluous. After all, if Congress may regulate all matters that substantially affect commerce, there is no need for the Constitution to specify that Congress may enact bankruptcy laws, cl. 4, or coin money and fix the standard of weights and measures, cl. 5, or punish counterfeiters of United States coin and securities, cl. 6. Likewise, Congress would not need the separate authority to establish post offices and post roads, cl. 7, or to grant patents and copyrights, cl. 8, or to "punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas," cl. 10. It might not even need the power to raise and support an Army and Navy, cls. 12 and 13, for fewer people would engage in commercial shipping if they thought that a foreign power could expropriate their property with ease. Indeed, if Congress could regulate matters that substantially affect interstate commerce, there would have been no need to specify [*589] that Congress can regulate international trade and commerce [72] with the Indians. As the Framers surely understood, these other branches of trade substantially affect interstate commerce.

Put simply, much if not all of Art. I, § 8 (including portions of the Commerce Clause itself), would be surplusage if Congress had been given authority over matters that substantially affect interstate commerce. An interpretation of cl. 3 that makes the rest of § 8 superfluous simply cannot be correct. Yet this Court's Commerce Clause jurisprudence has endorsed just such an interpretation: The power we have accorded Congress has swallowed Art. I, § 8. n3

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 There are other powers granted to Congress outside of Art. I, § 8, that may become wholly superfluous as well due to our distortion of the Commerce Clause. For instance, Congress has plenary power over the District of Columbia and the territories. See U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 17, and Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2. The grant of comprehensive legislative power over certain areas of the Nation, when read in conjunction with the rest of the Constitution, further confirms that Congress was not ceded plenary authority over the whole Nation.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*73] Indeed, if a "substantial effects" test can be appended to the Commerce Clause, why not to every other power of the Federal Government? There is no reason for singling out the Commerce Clause for special treatment. Accordingly, Congress could regulate all matters that "substantially affect" the Army and Navy, bankruptcies, tax collection, expenditures, and so on. In that case, the Clauses of § 8 all mutually overlap, something we can assume the Founding Fathers never intended.

[1645] Our construction of the scope of congressional authority has the additional problem of coming close to turning the Tenth Amendment on its head. Our case law could be read to reserve to the United States all powers not expressly prohibited by the Constitution. Taken together, these fundamental textual problems should, at the very least, convince us that the "substantial effects" test should be reexamined.

[*590] II

The exchanges during the ratification campaign reveal the relatively limited reach of the Commerce Clause and of federal power generally. The Founding Fathers confirmed that most areas of life (even many matters that would have substantial effects on commerce) would remain outside the reach of the Federal [74] Government. Such affairs would continue to be under the exclusive control of the States.

REV_00258944

Early Americans understood that commerce, manufacturing, and agriculture, while distinct activities, were intimately related and dependent on each other -- that each "substantially affected" the others. After all, items produced by farmers and manufacturers were the primary articles of commerce at the time. If commerce was more robust as a result of federal superintendence, farmers and manufacturers could benefit. Thus, Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut attempted to convince farmers of the benefits of regulating commerce. "Your property and riches depend on a ready demand and generous price for the produce you can annually spare," he wrote, and these conditions exist "where trade flourishes and when the merchant can freely export the produce of the country" to nations that will pay the highest price. A Landholder No. 1, Connecticut Courant, Nov. 5, 1787, in 3 Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution 399 (M. Jensen ed. 1978) (hereinafter Documentary History). See also The Federalist No. 35, at 219 (A. Hamilton) ("Discerning citizens are well aware that the mechanic and manufacturing [75] arts furnish the materials of mercantile enterprise and industry. Many of them indeed are immediately connected with the operations of commerce. They know that the merchant is their natural patron and friend"); id., at 221 ("Will not the merchant . . . be disposed to cultivate . . . the interests of the mechanic and manufacturing arts to which his commerce is so nearly allied?"); A Jerseyman: To the Citizens of New Jersey, Trenton Mercury, Nov. 6, 1787, in 3 Documentary History 147 (noting that agriculture will serve as [*591] a "source of commerce"); Marcus, The New Jersey Journal, Nov. 14, 1787, id., at 152 (both the mechanic and the farmer benefit from the prosperity of commerce). William Davie, a delegate to the North Carolina Convention, illustrated the close link best: "Commerce, sir, is the nurse of [agriculture and manufacturing]. The merchant furnishes the planter with such articles as he cannot manufacture himself, and finds him a market for his produce. Agriculture cannot flourish if commerce languishes; they are mutually dependent on each other." 4 Debates 20.

Yet, despite being well aware that agriculture, manufacturing, and other matters substantially affected commerce, [76] the founding generation did not cede authority over all these activities to Congress. Hamilton, for instance, acknowledged that the Federal Government could not regulate agriculture and like concerns:

> "The administration of private justice between the citizens of the same State, the supervision of agriculture and of other concerns of a similar nature, all those things in short which are proper to be provided for by local legislation, can never be desirable cares of a general jurisdiction." The Federalist No. 17, at 106.

In the unlikely event that the Federal Government would attempt to exercise authority over such matters, its effort "would be as troublesome as it would be nugatory." Ibid. n4

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 Cf. 3 Debates 40 (E. Pendleton at the Virginia convention) (The proposed Federal Government "does not intermeddle with the local, particular affairs of the states. Can Congress legislate for the state of Virginia? Can [it] make a law altering the form of transferring property, or the rule of descents, in Virginia?"); id., at 553 (J. Marshall at the Virginia convention) (denying that Congress could make "laws affecting the mode of transferring property, or contracts, or claims, between citizens of the same state"); The Federalist No. 33, at 206 (A. Hamilton) (denying that Congress could change laws of descent or could pre-empt a land tax); A Native of Virginia: Observations upon the Proposed Plan of Federal Government, Apr. 2, 1788, in 9 Documentary History 692 (States have sole authority over "rules of property").

REV_00258945

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*592] [*77] [1646] The comments of Hamilton and others about federal power reflected the well-known truth that the new Government would have only the limited and enumerated powers found in the Constitution. See, e. g., 2 Debates 267-268 (A. Hamilton at New York convention) (noting that there would be just cause for rejecting the Constitution if it would enable the Federal Government to "alter, or abrogate . . . [a State's] civil and criminal institutions [or] penetrate the recesses of domestic life, and control, in all respects, the private conduct of individuals"); The Federalist No. 45, at 313 (J. Madison); 3 Debates 259 (J. Madison) (Virginia convention); R. Sherman & O. Ellsworth, Letter to Governor Huntington, Sept. 26, 1787, in 3 Documentary History 352; J. Wilson, Speech in the State House Yard, Oct. 6, 1787, in 2 id., at 167-168. Agriculture and manufacture, since they were not surrendered to the Federal Government, were state concerns. See The Federalist No. 34, at 212-213 (A. Hamilton) (observing that the " internal encouragement of agriculture and manufactures" was an object of state expenditure). Even before the passage of the Tenth Amendment, it was apparent that Congress would [78] possess only those powers "herein granted" by the rest of the Constitution. Art. I, § 1.

Where the Constitution was meant to grant federal authority over an activity substantially affecting interstate commerce, the Constitution contains an enumerated power over that particular activity. Indeed, the Framers knew that many of the other enumerated powers in § 8 dealt with matters that substantially affected interstate commerce. Madison, for instance, spoke of the bankruptcy power as being "intimately connected with the regulation of commerce." The Federalist No. 42, at 287. Likewise, Hamilton urged that "if we mean to be a commercial people or even to be secure on our Atlantic side, we must endeavour as soon as possible to have a navy." Id., No. 24, at 157.

In short, the Founding Fathers were well aware of what the principal dissent calls "'economic . . . realities.'" See [*593] post, at 625 (BREYER, J.) (quoting North American Co. v. SEC, 327 U.S. 686, 705, 90 L. Ed. 945, 66 S. Ct. 785 (1946)). Even though the boundary between commerce and other matters may ignore "economic reality" and thus seem arbitrary or artificial to some, we must nevertheless [79] respect a constitutional line that does not grant Congress power over all that substantially affects interstate commerce.

III

If the principal dissent's understanding of our early case law were correct, there might be some reason to doubt this view of the original understanding of the Constitution. According to that dissent, Chief Justice Marshall's opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824), established that Congress may control all local activities that "significantly affect interstate commerce," post, at 615. And, "with the exception of one wrong turn subsequently corrected," this has been the "traditional" method of interpreting the Commerce Clause. Post, at 631 (citing Gibbons and United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941)).

In my view, the dissent is wrong about the holding and reasoning of Gibbons. Because this error leads the dissent to characterize the first 150 years of this Court's case law as a "wrong turn," I feel compelled to put the last 50 years in proper perspective.

A

In Gibbons, the Court examined whether a federal law that licensed ships to engage in the "coasting [80] trade" pre-empted a New York law granting a 30-year monopoly to Robert Livingston and Robert Fulton to navigate the State's waterways by steamship. In concluding that it did, the Court noted that Congress could regulate "navigation" because "all America . . . has uniformly understood, the [1647] word 'commerce,' to comprehend navigation. It was so understood, and must have been so understood, when the constitution was framed." 9 Wheat., at 190. The Court also observed [*594] that federal power over commerce "among the several States" meant that Congress could regulate commerce conducted partly within a State. Because a portion of interstate commerce and foreign commerce would almost always take place within one or more States, federal power over interstate and foreign commerce necessarily would extend into the States. Id., at 194-196.

REV_00258946

At the same time, the Court took great pains to make clear that Congress could not regulate commerce "which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States." Id., at 194. [81] Moreover, while suggesting that the Constitution might not permit States to regulate interstate or foreign commerce, the Court observed that "inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State" were but a small part "of that immense mass of legislation . . . not surrendered to a general government." Id., at 203. From an early moment, the Court rejected the notion that Congress can regulate everything that affects interstate commerce. That the internal commerce of the States and the numerous state inspection, quarantine, and health laws had substantial effects on interstate commerce cannot be doubted. Nevertheless, they were not "surrendered to the general government."

Of course, the principal dissent is not the first to misconstrue Gibbons. For instance, the Court has stated that Gibbons "described the federal commerce power with a breadth never yet exceeded." Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 120, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942). See also Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 151, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971) (claiming that with Darby and [82] Wickard, "the broader view of the Commerce Clause announced by Chief Justice Marshall had been restored"). I believe that this misreading stems from two statements in Gibbons.

First, the Court made the uncontroversial claim that federal power does not encompass "commerce" that "does [*595] not extend to or affect other States." 9 Wheat., at 194 (emphasis added). From this statement, the principal dissent infers that whenever an activity affects interstate commerce, it necessarily follows that Congress can regulate such activities. Of course, Chief Justice Marshall said no such thing and the inference the dissent makes cannot be drawn.

There is a much better interpretation of the "affect[s]" language: Because the Court had earlier noted that the commerce power did not extend to wholly intrastate commerce, the Court was acknowledging that although the line between intrastate and interstate/foreign commerce would be difficult to draw, federal authority could not be construed to cover purely intrastate commerce. Commerce that did not affect another State could never be said to be commerce "among the several States."

But even if one were to adopt the dissent's [83] reading, the "affect[s]" language, at most, permits Congress to regulate only intrastate commerce that substantially affects interstate and foreign commerce. There is no reason to believe that Chief Justice Marshall was asserting that Congress could regulate all activities that affect interstate commerce. See ibid.

The second source of confusion stems from the Court's praise for the Constitution's division of power between the States and the Federal Government:

> "The genius and character of the whole government seem to be, that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal > concerns which affect the States generally; but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere, for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the government." Id., at 195.

REV_00258947

[*596] In this passage, the Court merely was making the well understood point that the Constitution commits matters of "national" concern to Congress and leaves "local" matters [1648] to the States. The Court was not saying that whatever Congress believes [84] is a national matter becomes an object of federal control. The matters of national concern are enumerated in the Constitution: war, taxes, patents, and copyrights, uniform rules of naturalization and bankruptcy, types of commerce, and so on. See generally Art. I, § 8. Gibbons' emphatic statements that Congress could not regulate many matters that affect commerce confirm that the Court did not read the Commerce Clause as granting Congress control over matters that "affect the States generally." n5 Gibbons simply cannot be construed as the principal dissent would have it.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 None of the other Commerce Clause opinions during Chief Justice Marshall's tenure, which concerned the "dormant" Commerce Clause, even suggested that Congress had authority over all matters substantially affecting commerce. See Brown v. Maryland, 25 U.S. 419, 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. Ed. 678 (1827); Willson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. 245 (1829).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

B

I am aware of no cases prior to [85] the New Deal that characterized the power flowing from the Commerce Clause as sweepingly as does our substantial effects test. My review of the case law indicates that the substantial effects test is but an innovation of the 20th century.

Even before Gibbons, Chief Justice Marshall, writing for the Court in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. 264, 6 Wheat. 264, 5 L. Ed. 257 (1821), noted that Congress had "no general right to punish murder committed within any of the States," id., at 426, and that it was "clear that congress cannot punish felonies generally," id., at 428. The Court's only qualification was that Congress could enact such laws for places where it enjoyed plenary powers -- for instance, over the District of Columbia. Id., at 426. Thus, whatever effect ordinary murders, or robbery, or gun possession might have on interstate commerce (or on any [*597] other subject of federal concern) was irrelevant to the question of congressional power. n6

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 It is worth noting that Congress, in the first federal criminal Act, did not establish nationwide prohibitions against murder and the like. See Act of Apr. 30, 1790, ch. 9, 1 Stat. 112. To be sure, Congress outlawed murder, manslaughter, maiming, and larceny, but only when those acts were either committed on United States territory not part of a State or on the high seas. Ibid. See U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 10 (authorizing Congress to outlaw piracy and felonies on high seas); Art. IV, § 3, cl. 2 (plenary authority over United States territory and property). When Congress did enact nationwide criminal laws, it acted pursuant to direct grants of authority found in the Constitution. Compare Act of Apr. 30, 1790, supra, §§ 1 and 14 (prohibitions against treason and the counterfeiting of U.S. securities), with U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 6 (counterfeiting); Art. III, § 3, cl. 2 (treason). Notwithstanding any substantial effects that murder, kidnaping, or gun possession might have had on interstate commerce, Congress understood that it could not establish nationwide prohibitions.

REV_00258948

Likewise, there were no laws in the early Congresses that regulated manufacturing and agriculture. Nor was there any statute that purported to regulate activities with "substantial effects" on interstate commerce.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*86] United States v. Dewitt, 76 U.S. 41, 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. Ed. 593 (1870), marked the first time the Court struck down a federal law as exceeding the power conveyed by the Commerce Clause. In a two-page opinion, the Court invalidated a nationwide law prohibiting all sales of naphtha and illuminating oils. In so doing, the Court remarked that the Commerce Clause "has always been understood as limited by its terms; and as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States." Id., at 44. The law in question was "plainly a regulation of police," which could have constitutional application only where Congress had exclusive authority, such as the territories. Id., at 44-45. See also License Tax Cases, 72 U.S. 462, 5 Wall. 462, 470-471, 18 L. Ed. 497 (1867) (Congress cannot interfere with the internal commerce and business of a State); Trade-Mark Cases, 100 U.S. 82, 25 L. Ed. 550 (1879) (Congress [*598] cannot regulate internal commerce and thus may not establish national trademark registration).

In United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 39 L. Ed. 325, 15 S. Ct. 249 (1895), [87] this Court held that mere attempts to monopolize the manufacture of sugar could not be regulated pursuant to the Commerce Clause. [1649] Raising echoes of the discussions of the Framers regarding the intimate relationship between commerce and manufacturing, the Court declared that "commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it." Id., at 12. The Court also approvingly quoted from

> Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1, 20, 32 L. Ed. 346, 9 S. Ct. 6 (1888):
> "'No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce . . . . If it be held that the term [commerce] includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested . . . with the power to regulate, not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining -- in short, every branch of human industry.'" E. C. Knight, supra, at 14.

[*88] If federal power extended to these types of production "comparatively little of business operations and affairs would be left for state control." Id., at 16. See also Newberry v. United States, 256 U.S. 232, 257, 65 L. Ed. 913, 41 S. Ct. 469 (1921) ("It is settled . . . that the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce does not reach whatever is essential thereto. Without agriculture, manufacturing, mining, etc., commerce could not exist, but this fact does not suffice to subject them to the control of Congress "). Whether or not manufacturing, agriculture, or other matters substantially affected interstate commerce was irrelevant.

[*599] As recently as 1936, the Court continued to insist that the Commerce Clause did not reach the wholly internal business of the States. See Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 308, 80 L. Ed. 1160, 56 S. Ct. 855 (1936) (Congress may not regulate mine labor because "the relation of employer and employee is a local relation"); see also A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 543-550, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935) (holding that Congress may not regulate intrastate sales [89] of sick chickens or the labor of employees involved in intrastate poultry sales). The Federal Government simply could not reach such subjects regardless of their effects on interstate

REV_00258949

The Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990 (GFSZA), 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(q) is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with "commerce" or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly one might define those terms. The GFSZA is not an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated. It cannot, therefore, be sustained as a regulation of activity that arises out of or is connected with a commercial transaction, which viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

The Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, 18 U.S.C.S. § 922(q) contains no jurisdictional element which would ensure, through case-by-case inquiry, that the firearm possession in question affects interstate commerce.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Commerce Clause

Governments : Legislation : Construction & Interpretation

As part of the court's independent evaluation of constitutionality under the commerce clause, U.S. Const. amend. I, § 8, cl. 3, the court considers legislative findings, and indeed even congressional committee findings, regarding effect on interstate commerce.

• Show Lawyers' Edition Display

SYLLABUS:

After respondent, then a 12th-grade student, carried a concealed handgun into his high school, he was charged with violating the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, which forbids "any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that [he] knows . . . is a school zone," 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(A). The District Court denied his motion to dismiss the indictment, concluding that § 922(q) is a constitutional exercise of Congress' power to regulate activities in and affecting commerce. In reversing, the Court of Appeals held that, in light of what it characterized as insufficient congressional findings and legislative history, § 922(q) is invalid as beyond Congress' power under the Commerce Clause.

Held: The Act exceeds Congress' Commerce Clause authority. First, although this Court has upheld a wide variety [2] of congressional Acts regulating intrastate economic activity that substantially affected interstate commerce, the possession of a gun in a local school zone is in no sense an economic activity that might, through repetition elsewhere, have such a substantial effect on interstate commerce. Section 922(q) is a criminal statute that by its terms has nothing to do with "commerce" or any sort of economic enterprise, however broadly those terms are defined. Nor is it an essential part of a larger regulation of economic activity, in which the regulatory scheme could be undercut unless the intrastate activity were regulated. It cannot, therefore, be sustained under the Court's cases upholding regulations of activities that arise out of or are connected with a commercial transaction, which, viewed in the aggregate, substantially affects interstate commerce. Second, § 922(q) contains no jurisdictional element that would ensure, through case-by-case inquiry, that the firearms possession in question has the requisite nexus with interstate commerce. Respondent was a local student at a local school; there is no indication that he had recently moved in interstate commerce, and there is no requirement [3] that his possession of the firearm have any concrete tie to interstate commerce. To uphold the Government's contention that § 922(q) is justified because firearms possession in a local school zone does indeed substantially affect interstate commerce would require this Court to pile inference upon inference in a manner that would bid fair to convert congressional Commerce Clause authority to a general police power of the sort held only by the States. Pp. 552-568.

COUNSEL: Solicitor General Days argued the cause for the United States. With him on the commerce.

REV_00258923

These cases all establish a simple point: From the time of the ratification of the Constitution to the mid-1930's, it was widely understood that the Constitution granted Congress only limited powers, notwithstanding the Commerce Clause. n7 Moreover, there was no question that activities wholly separated from business, such as gun possession, were beyond the reach of the commerce power. If anything, the "wrong turn" was the Court's dramatic departure in the 1930's from a century and a half of precedent.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n7 To be sure, congressional power pursuant to the Commerce Clause was alternatively described less narrowly or more narrowly during this 150-year period. Compare United States v. Coombs, 12 Pet. 72, 78 (1838) (commerce power "extends to such acts, done on land, which interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate [interstate and international] commerce" such as stealing goods from a beached ship), with United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 13, 39 L. Ed. 325, 15 S. Ct. 249 (1895) ("Contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several States, the transportation and its instrumentalities . . . may be regulated, but this is because they form part of interstate trade or commerce"). During this period, however, this Court never held that Congress could regulate everything that substantially affects commerce.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*90] IV

Apart from its recent vintage and its corresponding lack of any grounding in the original understanding of the Constitution, the substantial effects test suffers from the further [*600] flaw that it appears to grant Congress a police power over the Nation. When asked at oral argument if there were any limits to the Commerce Clause, the Government was at a loss for words. Tr. of Oral Arg. 5. Likewise, the principal dissent insists that there are limits, but it cannot muster even one example. Post, at 624. Indeed, the dissent implicitly concedes that its reading has no limits when it criticizes the Court for "threatening legal uncertainty in [1650] an area of law that . . . seemed reasonably well settled." Post, at 630. The one advantage of the dissent's standard is certainty: It is certain that under its analysis everything may be regulated under the guise of the Commerce Clause.

The substantial effects test suffers from this flaw, in part, because of its "aggregation principle." Under so-called "class of activities" statutes, Congress can regulate whole categories of activities that are not themselves either "interstate" or "commerce." In applying the effects test, we ask whether [91] the class of activities as a whole substantially affects interstate commerce, not whether any specific activity within the class has such effects when considered in isolation. See Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. at 192-193 (if class of activities is "'within the reach of federal power,'" courts may not excise individual applications as trivial) (quoting Darby, 312 U.S. at 120-121).

The aggregation principle is clever, but has no stopping point. Suppose all would agree that gun possession within 1,000 feet of a school does not substantially affect commerce, but that possession of weapons generally (knives, brass knuckles, nunchakus, etc.) does. Under our substantial effects doctrine, even though Congress cannot single out gun possession, it can prohibit weapon possession generally. But one always can draw the circle broadly enough to cover an activity that, when taken in isolation, would not have substantial effects on commerce. Under our jurisprudence, if Congress passed an omnibus "substantially affects interstate commerce" statute, purporting to regulate every aspect of human existence, the Act apparently [92] would be constitutional. [*601] Even though particular sections may govern only trivial activities, the statute in the aggregate regulates matters that substantially affect commerce.

REV_00258950

V

This extended discussion of the original understanding and our first century and a half of case law does not necessarily require a wholesale abandonment of our more recent opinions. n8 It simply reveals that our substantial effects test is far removed from both the Constitution and from our early case law and that the Court's opinion should not be viewed as "radical" or another "wrong turn" that must be corrected in the future. n9 The analysis also suggests that we ought to temper our Commerce Clause jurisprudence.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 Although I might be willing to return to the original understanding, I recognize that many believe that it is too late in the day to undertake a fundamental reexamination of the past 60 years. Consideration of stare decisis and reliance interests may convince us that we cannot wipe the slate clean.

n9 Nor can the majority's opinion fairly be compared to Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 49 L. Ed. 937, 25 S. Ct. 539 (1905). See post, at 604-609 (SOUTER, J., dissenting). Unlike Lochner and our more recent "substantive due process" cases, to-day's decision enforces only the Constitution and not "judicial policy judgments." See post, at 607. Notwithstanding JUSTICE SOUTER's discussion, "'commercial' character" is not only a natural but an inevitable "ground of Commerce Clause distinction." See post, at 608 (emphasis added). Our invalidation of the Gun-Free School Zones Act therefore falls comfortably within our proper role in reviewing federal legislation to determine if it exceeds congressional authority as defined by the Constitution itself. As John Marshall put it: "If [Congress] were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judges as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard . . . . They would declare it void." 3 Debates 553 (before the Virginia ratifying convention); see also The Federalist No. 44, at 305 (J. Madison) (asserting that if Congress exercises powers "not warranted by [the Constitution's] true meaning" the judiciary will defend the Constitution); id., No. 78, at 526 (A. Hamilton) (asserting that the "courts of justice are to be considered as the bulwarks of a limited constitution against legislative encroachments"). Where, as here, there is a case or controversy, there can be no "misstep," post, at 614, in enforcing the Constitution.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*602] [93] Unless the dissenting Justices are willing to repudiate our long-held understanding of the limited nature of federal power, I would think that they, too, must be willing to reconsider the substantial effects test in a future case. If we wish to be true to a Constitution that does not cede a police power to the Federal Government, our Commerce Clause's boundaries simply cannot be "defined" as being "'commensurate with the national needs'" or self-consciously intended [1651] to let the Federal Government "'defend itself against economic forces that Congress decrees inimical or destructive of the national economy.'" See post, at 625 (BREYER, J., dissenting) (quoting North American Co. v. SEC, 327 U.S. at 705). Such a formulation of federal power is no test at all: It is a blank check.

At an appropriate juncture, I think we must modify our Commerce Clause jurisprudence. Today, it is easy enough to say that the Clause certainly does not empower Congress to ban gun possession within 1,000 feet of a school.

DISSENTBY: STEVENS; SOUTER; BREYER

DISSENT: JUSTICE STEVENS, dissenting.

The welfare of our future "Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, [94] " U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3, is vitally dependent on the character of the education of our children. I therefore agree entirely with JUSTICE BREYER's explanation of why Congress has ample power to prohibit the possession of firearms in or near schools -- just as it may protect the school environment from harms posed by controlled substances such as asbestos or alcohol. I also agree with JUSTICE SOUTER's exposition of the radical character of the Court's holding and its kinship with the discredited, pre-Depression version of substantive due process. Cf. Dolan v. City of Tigard, 512 U.S. 374, 405-411, 129 L. Ed. 2d 304, 114 S. Ct. 2309 (1994) (STEVENS, J., dissenting). I believe, however, that the Court's extraordinary decision merits this additional comment.

REV_00258951

Guns are both articles of commerce and articles that can be used to restrain commerce. Their possession is the consequence, [*603] either directly or indirectly, of commercial activity. In my judgment, Congress' power to regulate commerce in firearms includes the power to prohibit possession of guns at any location because of their potentially harmful use; it necessarily follows that Congress may also prohibit their possession in particular markets. The [95] market for the possession of handguns by school-age children is, distressingly, substantial. * Whether or not the national interest in eliminating that market would have justified federal legislation in 1789, it surely does today.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

* Indeed, there is evidence that firearm manufacturers -- aided by a federal grant -- are specifically targeting schoolchildren as consumers by distributing, at schools, hunting-related videos styled "educational materials for grades four through 12," Herbert, Reading, Writing, Reloading, N. Y. Times, Dec. 14, 1994, p. A23, col. 1.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

JUSTICE SOUTER, dissenting.

In reviewing congressional legislation under the Commerce Clause, we defer to what is often a merely implicit congressional judgment that its regulation addresses a subject substantially affecting interstate commerce "if there is any rational basis for such a finding." Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981); Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S. 1, 17, 108 L. Ed. 2d 1, 110 S. Ct. 914 (1990); [96] see Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 190, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968), quoting Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 303-304, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964). If that congressional determination is within the realm of reason, "the only remaining question for judicial inquiry is whether 'the means chosen by Congress [are] reasonably adapted to the end permitted by the Constitution.'" Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., supra, at 276, quoting Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 262, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964); see also Preseault v. ICC, supra, at 17. n1

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 In this case, no question has been raised about means and ends; the only issue is about the effect of school zone guns on commerce.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*604] The practice of deferring to rationally based legislative judgments "is a paradigm of judicial restraint." FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 314, 124 L. Ed. 2d 211, 113 S. Ct. 2096 (1993). In judicial review under the Commerce Clause, it reflects our respect for the institutional competence of the Congress on a subject expressly assigned to it by the Constitution and our appreciation of the legitimacy that comes [1652] from Congress's political accountability in dealing with matters open to a wide range of possible choices. [97] See id., at 313-316; Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., supra, at 276; United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144, 147, 151-154, 82 L. Ed. 1234, 58 S. Ct. 778 (1938); cf. Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 488, 99 L. Ed. 563, 75 S. Ct. 461 (1955).

REV_00258952

It was not ever thus, however, as even a brief overview of Commerce Clause history during the past century reminds us. The modern respect for the competence and primacy of Congress in matters affecting commerce developed only after one of this Court's most chastening experiences, when it perforce repudiated an earlier and untenably expansive conception of judicial review in derogation of congressional commerce power. A look at history's sequence will serve to show how today's [98] decision tugs the Court off course, leading it to suggest opportunities for further developments that would be at odds with the rule of restraint to which the Court still wisely states adherence.

I

Notwithstanding the Court's recognition of a broad commerce power in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 196-197, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824) (Marshall, C. J.), Congress saw few occasions to exercise that power prior to Reconstruction, see generally 2 C. Warren, The Supreme Court in United States History 729-739 (rev. ed. 1935), and it was really the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act of 1887 that opened a new age of congressional reliance on the Commerce Clause for authority to exercise general police powers at the national level, see id., at [*605] 729-730. Although the Court upheld a fair amount of the ensuing legislation as being within the commerce power, see, e. g., Stafford v. Wallace, 258 U.S. 495, 66 L. Ed. 735, 42 S. Ct. 397 (1922) (upholding an Act regulating trade practices in the meat packing industry); Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342, 34 S. Ct. 833, 58 L. Ed. 1341 (1914) (upholding Interstate Commerce Commission order to equalize interstate and intrastate rail rates); see generally [99] Warren, supra, at 729-739, the period from the turn of the century to 1937 is better noted for a series of cases applying highly formalistic notions of "commerce" to invalidate federal social and economic legislation, see, e. g., Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 303-304, 80 L. Ed. 1160, 56 S. Ct. 855 (1936) (striking Act prohibiting unfair labor practices in coal industry as regulation of "mining" and "production," not "commerce"); A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 545-548, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935) (striking congressional regulation of activities affecting interstate commerce only "indirectly"); Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 38 S. Ct. 529 (1918) (striking Act prohibiting shipment in interstate commerce of goods manufactured at factories using child labor because the Act regulated "manufacturing," not "commerce"); Adair v. United States, 208 U.S. 161, 52 L. Ed. 436, 28 S. Ct. 277 (1908) (striking protection of labor union membership as outside "commerce").

These restrictive views of commerce subject to congressional power complemented the Court's activism in limiting the enforceable scope [100] of state economic regulation. It is most familiar history that during this same period the Court routinely invalidated state social and economic legislation under an expansive conception of Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process. See, e. g., Louis K. Liggett Co. v. Baldridge, 278 U.S. 105, 73 L. Ed. 204, 49 S. Ct. 57 (1928) (striking state law requiring pharmacy owners to be licensed as pharmacists); Coppage v. Kansas, 236 U.S. 1, 59 L. Ed. 441, 35 S. Ct. 240 (1915) (striking state law prohibiting employers from requiring their employees to agree not to join labor organizations); Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, 49 L. Ed. 937, 25 S. Ct. 539 (1905) (striking state law establishing maximum working hours for bakers). See generally L. Tribe, American Constitutional [*606] Law 568-574 (2d ed. 1988). The fulcrums of judicial review in these cases were the notions of liberty and property characteristic of laissez-faire economics, whereas the Commerce Clause cases turned on what was ostensibly a structural limit of federal power, but under each conception of judicial review the Court's character for the [1653] first third of the century showed itself in exacting judicial scrutiny [101] of a legislature's choice of economic ends and of the legislative means selected to reach them.

REV_00258953

It was not merely coincidental, then, that sea changes in the Court's conceptions of its authority under the Due Process and Commerce Clauses occurred virtually together, in 1937, with West Coast Hotel Co. v. Parrish, 300 U.S. 379, 81 L. Ed. 703, 57 S. Ct. 578, and NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615. See Stern, The Commerce Clause and the National Economy, 1933-1946, 59 Harv. L. Rev. 645, 674-682 (1946). In West Coast Hotel, the Court's rejection of a due process challenge to a state law fixing minimum wages for women and children marked the abandonment of its expansive protection of contractual freedom. Two weeks later, Jones & Laughlin affirmed congressional commerce power to authorize NLRB injunctions against unfair labor practices. The Court's finding that the regulated activity had a direct enough effect on commerce has since been seen as beginning the abandonment, for practical purposes, of the formalistic distinction between direct and indirect effects.

In the years following these decisions, [102] deference to legislative policy judgments on commercial regulation became the powerful theme under both the Due Process and Commerce Clauses, see United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. at 147-148, 152; United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 119-121, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941); United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U.S. 110, 118-119, 86 L. Ed. 726, 62 S. Ct. 523 (1942), and in due course that deference became articulate in the standard of rationality review. In due process litigation, the Court's statement of a rational [*607] basis test came quickly. See United States v. Carolene Products Co., supra, at 152; see also Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., supra, at 489-490. The parallel formulation of the Commerce Clause test came later, only because complete elimination of the direct/indirect effects dichotomy and acceptance of the cumulative effects doctrine, Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 125, 127-129, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942); United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., supra, at 124-126, so far [103] settled the pressing issues of congressional power over commerce as to leave the Court for years without any need to phrase a test explicitly deferring to rational legislative judgments. The moment came, however, with the challenge to congressional Commerce Clause authority to prohibit racial discrimination in places of public accommodation, when the Court simply made explicit what the earlier cases had implied: "where we find that the legislators, in light of the facts and testimony before them, have a rational basis for finding a chosen regulatory scheme necessary to the protection of commerce, our investigation is at an end." Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. at 303-304, discussing United States v. Darby, supra; see Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. at 258-259. Thus, under commerce, as under due process, adoption of rational basis review expressed the recognition that the Court had no sustainable basis for subjecting economic regulation as such to judicial policy judgments, and for the past half century the Court has no more turned back [104] in the direction of formalistic Commerce Clause review (as in deciding whether regulation of commerce was sufficiently direct) than it has inclined toward reasserting the substantive authority of Lochner due process (as in the inflated protection of contractual autonomy). See, e. g., Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. at 190, 198; Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 151-157, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971); Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. at 276, 277.

[*608] II

There is today, however, a backward glance at both the old pitfalls, as the Court treats deference under the rationality rule as subject to gradation according to the commercial or noncommercial nature of the immediate subject of the challenged regulation. [1654] See ante, at 558-561. The distinction between what is patently commercial and what is not looks much like the old distinction between what directly affects commerce and what touches it only indirectly. And the act of calibrating the level of deference by drawing a line between what is patently commercial and what is less purely so will probably resemble the [105] process of deciding how much interference with contractual freedom was fatal. Thus, it seems fair to ask whether the step taken by the Court today does anything but portend a return to the untenable jurisprudence from which the Court extricated itself almost 60 years ago. The answer is not reassuring. To be sure, the occasion for today's decision reflects the century's end, not its beginning. But if it seems anomalous that the Congress of the United States has taken to regulating school yards, the Act in question is still probably no more remarkable than state regulation of bake shops 90 years ago. In any event, there is no reason to hope that the Court's qualification of rational basis review will be any more successful than the efforts at substantive economic review made by our predecessors as the century began. Taking the Court's opinion on its own terms, JUSTICE BREYER has explained both the hopeless porosity of "commercial" character as a ground of Commerce Clause distinction in America's highly connected economy, and the inconsistency of this categorization with our rational basis precedents from the last 50 years.

REV_00258954

Further glosses on rationality review, moreover, may be in the [106] offing. Although this case turns on commercial character, the Court gestures toward two other considerations that it might sometime entertain in applying rational basis [*609] scrutiny (apart from a statutory obligation to supply independent proof of a jurisdictional element): does the congressional statute deal with subjects of traditional state regulation, and does the statute contain explicit factual findings supporting the otherwise implicit determination that the regulated activity substantially affects interstate commerce? Once again, any appeal these considerations may have depends on ignoring the painful lesson learned in 1937, for neither of the Court's suggestions would square with rational basis scrutiny.

A

The Court observes that the Gun-Free School Zones Act operates in two areas traditionally subject to legislation by the States, education and enforcement of criminal law. The suggestion is either that a connection between commerce and these subjects is remote, or that the commerce power is simply weaker when it touches subjects on which the States have historically been the primary legislators. Neither suggestion is tenable. As for remoteness, it may or may not be wise for [107] the National Government to deal with education, but JUSTICE BREYER has surely demonstrated that the commercial prospects of an illiterate State or Nation are not rosy, and no argument should be needed to show that hijacking interstate shipments of cigarettes can affect commerce substantially, even though the States have traditionally prosecuted robbery. And as for the notion that the commerce power diminishes the closer it gets to customary state concerns, that idea has been flatly rejected, and not long ago. The commerce power, we have often observed, is plenary. Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., supra, at 276; United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. at 114; see Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 549-550, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985); Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., at 196-197. Justice Harlan put it this way in speaking for the Court in Maryland v. Wirtz:

> [*610] "There is no general doctrine implied in the Federal Constitution that the two governments, national and state, are each to exercise its powers so as [108] not to interfere with the free and full exercise of the powers of the other. . . . It is clear that the Federal Government, when acting within a delegated power, may override countervailing state interests . . . . As long ago as [1925], the Court put to rest the contention that state concerns might constitutionally 'outweigh' the importance of an otherwise valid federal statute regulating commerce." [1655] 392 U.S. at 195-196 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

See also United States v. Darby, supra, at 114; Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 460, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991); United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. at 147.

Nor is there any contrary authority in the reasoning of our cases imposing clear statement rules in some instances of legislation that would significantly alter the state-national balance. In the absence of a clear statement of congressional design, for example, we have refused to interpret ambiguous federal statutes to limit fundamental state legislative prerogatives, Gregory v. Ashcroft, supra, at 460-464, [109] our understanding being that such prerogatives, through which "a State defines itself as a sovereign," are "powers with which Congress does not readily interfere," 501 U.S. at 460, 461. Likewise, when faced with two plausible interpretations of a federal criminal statute, we generally will take the alternative that does not force us to impute an intention to Congress to use its full commerce power to regulate conduct traditionally and ably regulated by the States. See United States v. Enmons, 410 U.S. 396, 411-412, 35 L. Ed. 2d 379, 93 S. Ct. 1007 (1973); United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 349-350, 30 L. Ed. 2d 488, 92 S. Ct. 515 (1971); Rewis v. United States, 401 U.S. 808, 812, 28 L. Ed. 2d 493, 91 S. Ct. 1056 (1971).

REV_00258955

These clear statement rules, however, are merely rules of statutory interpretation, to be relied upon only when the [*611] terms of a statute allow, United States v. Culbert, 435 U.S. 371, 379-380, 55 L. Ed. 2d 349, 98 S. Ct. 1112 (1978); see Gregory v. Ashcroft, supra, at 470; United States v. Bass, supra, at 346-347, and in cases implicating Congress's historical [110] reluctance to trench on state legislative prerogatives or to enter into spheres already occupied by the States, Gregory v. Ashcroft, supra, at 461; United States v. Bass, supra, at 349; see Rewis v. United States, supra, at 811-812. They are rules for determining intent when legislation leaves intent subject to question. But our hesitance to presume that Congress has acted to alter the state-federal status quo (when presented with a plausible alternative) has no relevance whatever to the enquiry whether it has the commerce power to do so or to the standard of judicial review when Congress has definitely meant to exercise that power. Indeed, to allow our hesitance to affect the standard of review would inevitably degenerate into the sort of substantive policy review that the Court found indefensible 60 years ago. The Court does not assert (and could not plausibly maintain) that the commerce power is wholly devoid of congressional authority to speak on any subject of traditional state concern; but if congressional action is not forbidden absolutely when it touches such a [111] subject, it will stand or fall depending on the Court's view of the strength of the legislation's commercial justification. And here once again history raises its objections that the Court's previous essays in overriding congressional policy choices under the Commerce Clause were ultimately seen to suffer two fatal weaknesses: when dealing with Acts of Congress (as distinct from state legislation subject to review under the theory of dormant commerce power) nothing in the Clause compelled the judicial activism, and nothing about the judiciary as an institution made it a superior source of policy on the subject Congress dealt with. There is no reason to expect the lesson would be different another time.

[*612] B

There remain questions about legislative findings. The Court of Appeals expressed the view, 2 F.3d 1342, 1363-1368 (CA5 1993), that the result in this case might well have been different if Congress had made explicit findings that guns in schools have a substantial effect on interstate commerce, and the Court today does not repudiate that position, see ante, at 562-563. Might a court aided by such findings have subjected this legislation to less exacting scrutiny [112] (or, put another [1656] way, should a court have deferred to such findings if Congress had made them)? n2 The answer to either question must be no, although as a general matter findings are important and to be hoped for in the difficult cases.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n2 Unlike the Court, (perhaps), I would see no reason not to consider Congress's findings, insofar as they might be helpful in reviewing the challenge to this statute, even though adopted in later legislation. See the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, Pub. L. 103-322, § 320904, 108 Stat. 2125 ("The occurrence of violent crime in school zones has resulted in a decline in the quality of education in our country; . . . this decline . . . has an adverse impact on interstate commerce and the foreign commerce of the United States; . .

REV_00258956

. Congress has power, under the interstate commerce clause and other provisions of the Constitution, to enact measures to ensure the integrity and safety of the Nation's schools by enactment of this subsection"). The findings, however, go no further than expressing what is obviously implicit in the substantive legislation, at such a conclusory level of generality as to add virtually nothing to the record. The Solicitor General certainly exercised sound judgment in placing no significant reliance on these particular afterthoughts. Tr. of Oral Arg. 24-25.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*113] It is only natural to look for help with a hard job, and reviewing a claim that Congress has exceeded the commerce power is much harder in some cases than in others. A challenge to congressional regulation of interstate garbage hauling would be easy to resolve; review of congressional regulation of gun possession in school yards is more difficult, both because the link to interstate commerce is less obvious and because of our initial ignorance of the relevant facts. In a [*613] case comparable to this one, we may have to dig hard to make a responsible judgment about what Congress could reasonably find, because the case may be close, and because judges tend not to be familiar with the facts that may or may not make it close. But while the ease of review may vary from case to case, it does not follow that the standard of review should vary, much less that explicit findings of fact would even directly address the standard.

The question for the courts, as all agree, is not whether as a predicate to legislation Congress in fact found that a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce. The legislation implies such a finding, and there is no reason to entertain claims that Congress [114] acted ultra vires intentionally. Nor is the question whether Congress was correct in so finding. The only question is whether the legislative judgment is within the realm of reason. See Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. at 276-277; Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. at 303-304; Railroad Retirement Bd. v. Alton R. Co., 295 U.S. 330, 391-392, 79 L. Ed. 1468, 55 S. Ct. 758 (1935) (Hughes, C. J., dissenting); cf. FCC v. Beach Communications, Inc., 508 U.S. at 315 (in the equal protection context, "those attacking the rationality of the legislative classification have the burden to negate every conceivable basis which might support it[;] . . . it is entirely irrelevant for constitutional purposes whether the conceived reason for the challenged distinction actually motivated the legislature") (citations and internal quotation marks omitted); Ferguson v. Skrupa, 372 U.S. 726, 731-733, 10 L. Ed. 2d 93, 83 S. Ct. 1028 (1963); Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. at 487. Congressional findings do not, however, directly address [115] the question of reasonableness; they tell us what Congress actually has found, not what it could rationally find. If, indeed, the Court were to make the existence of explicit congressional findings dispositive in some close or difficult cases something other than rationality review would be afoot. The resulting congressional obligation to justify its policy choices on the merits would imply [*614] either a judicial authority to review the justification (and, hence, the wisdom) of those choices, or authority to require Congress to act with some high degree of deliberateness, of which express findings would be evidence. But review for congressional wisdom would just be the old judicial pretension discredited and abandoned in 1937, and review for deliberateness would be as patently unconstitutional as an Act of Congress mandating long opinions from this Court. Such a legislative process requirement would function merely as an excuse for covert review of the merits of legislation under standards never expressed [1657] and more or less arbitrarily applied. Under such a regime, in any case, the rationality standard of review would be a thing of the past.

On the other hand, to say that courts applying [116] the rationality standard may not defer to findings is not, of course, to say that findings are pointless. They may, in fact, have great value in telling courts what to look for, in establishing at least one frame of reference for review, and in citing to factual authority. The research underlying JUSTICE BREYER's dissent was necessarily a major undertaking; help is welcome, and it not incidentally shrinks the risk that judicial research will miss material scattered across the public domain or buried under pounds of legislative record. Congressional findings on a more particular plane than this record illustrates would accordingly have earned judicial thanks. But thanks do not carry the day as long as rational possibility is the touchstone, and I would not allow for the possibility, as the Court's opinion may, ante, at 563, that the addition of congressional findings could in principle have affected the fate of the statute here.

REV_00258957

III

Because JUSTICE BREYER's opinion demonstrates beyond any doubt that the Act in question passes the rationality review that the Court continues to espouse, today's decision may be seen as only a misstep, its reasoning and its suggestions [*615] not quite in [117] gear with the prevailing standard, but hardly an epochal case. I would not argue otherwise, but I would raise a caveat. Not every epochal case has come in epochal trappings. Jones & Laughlin did not reject the direct-indirect standard in so many words; it just said the relation of the regulated subject matter to commerce was direct enough. 301 U.S. at 41-43. But we know what happened.

I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE BREYER, with whom JUSTICE STEVENS, JUSTICE SOUTER, and JUSTICE GINSBURG join, dissenting.

The issue in this case is whether the Commerce Clause authorizes Congress to enact a statute that makes it a crime to possess a gun in, or near, a school. 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(A) (1988 ed., Supp. V). In my view, the statute falls well within the scope of the commerce power as this Court has understood that power over the last half century.

I

In reaching this conclusion, I apply three basic principles of Commerce Clause interpretation. First, the power to "regulate Commerce . . . among the several States," U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3, encompasses the power to regulate local activities insofar as they significantly [118] affect interstate commerce. See, e. g., Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 194-195, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824) (Marshall, C. J.); Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 125, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942). As the majority points out, ante, at 559, the Court, in describing how much of an effect the Clause requires, sometimes has used the word "substantial" and sometimes has not. Compare, e. g., Wickard, supra, at 125 ("substantial economic effect"), with Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981) ("affects interstate commerce"); see also Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 196, n. 27, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968) (cumulative effect must not be "trivial"); NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 37, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937) [*616] (speaking of "close and substantial relation" between activity and commerce, not of "substantial effect") (emphasis added); Gibbons, supra, at 194 (words of Commerce Clause do not "comprehend . . . commerce, which is completely internal . . . and which does not . . . affect other States"). And, as the majority [119] also recognizes in quoting Justice Cardozo, the question of degree (how much effect) requires an estimate of the "size" of the effect that no verbal formulation can capture with precision. See ante, at 567. I use the word "significant" because the word "substantial" implies a somewhat narrower power than recent precedent suggests. See, e. g., Perez v. United States, 402 [1658] U.S. 146, 154, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971); Daniel v. Paul, 395 U.S. 298, 308, 23 L. Ed. 2d 318, 89 S. Ct. 1697 (1969). But to speak of "substantial effect" rather than "significant effect" would make no difference in this case.

Second, in determining whether a local activity will likely have a significant effect upon interstate commerce, a court must consider, not the effect of an individual act (a single instance of gun possession), but rather the cumulative effect of all similar instances (i. e., the effect of all guns possessed in or near schools). See, e. g., Wickard, supra, at 127-128. As this Court put the matter almost 50 years ago:

REV_00258958

> "It is enough that the individual activity when multiplied into a general practice . . . contains a threat to the interstate economy that [120] requires preventative regulation." Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. 219, 236, 92 L. Ed. 1328, 68 S. Ct. 996 (1948) (citations omitted).

Third, the Constitution requires us to judge the connection between a regulated activity and interstate commerce, not directly, but at one remove. Courts must give Congress a degree of leeway in determining the existence of a significant factual connection between the regulated activity and interstate commerce -- both because the Constitution delegates the commerce power directly to Congress and because the [*617] determination requires an empirical judgment of a kind that a legislature is more likely than a court to make with accuracy. The traditional words "rational basis" capture this leeway. See Hodel, supra, at 276-277. Thus, the specific question before us, as the Court recognizes, is not whether the "regulated activity sufficiently affected interstate commerce," but, rather, whether Congress could have had "a rational basis" for so concluding. Ante, at 557 (emphasis added).

I recognize that we must judge this matter independently. "Simply because Congress may conclude [121] that a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce does not necessarily make it so." Hodel, supra, at 311 (REHNQUIST, J., concurring in judgment). And, I also recognize that Congress did not write specific "interstate commerce" findings into the law under which Lopez was convicted. Nonetheless, as I have already noted, the matter that we review independently (i. e., whether there is a "rational basis") already has considerable leeway built into it. And, the absence of findings, at most, deprives a statute of the benefit of some extra leeway. This extra deference, in principle, might change the result in a close case, though, in practice, it has not made a critical legal difference. See, e. g., Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 299, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964) (noting that "no formal findings were made, which of course are not necessary"); Perez, supra, at 156-157; cf. Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC, 512 U.S. 622, 666, 129 L. Ed. 2d 497, 114 S. Ct. 2445 (1994) (opinion of KENNEDY, J.) ("Congress is not obligated, when enacting its statutes, to make a record of the type that an administrative agency or court does to accommodate [122] judicial review"); Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 503, 65 L. Ed. 2d 902, 100 S. Ct. 2758 (1980) (Powell, J., concurring) ("After Congress has legislated repeatedly in an area of national concern, its Members gain experience that may reduce the need for fresh hearings or prolonged debate . . ."). It would seem particularly unfortunate to make the validity of [*618] the statute at hand turn on the presence or absence of findings. Because Congress did make findings (though not until after Lopez was prosecuted), doing so would appear to elevate form over substance. See Pub. L. 103-322, §§ 320904 (2) (F), (G), 108 Stat. 2125, 18 U.S.C. §§ 922(q)(1)(F), (G).

In addition, despite the Court of Appeals' suggestion to the contrary, see 2 F.3d 1342, 1365 (CA5 1993), there is no special need here for a clear indication of Congress' rationale. The statute does not interfere with the exercise of state or local authority. Cf., e. g., Dellmuth v. Muth, 491 U.S. 223, 227-228, 105 L. Ed. 2d 181, 109 S. Ct. 2397 (1989) (requiring clear statement for abrogation of Eleventh Amendment immunity). Moreover, any clear [123] statement rule would [1659] apply only to determine Congress' intended result, not to clarify the source of its authority or measure the level of consideration that went into its decision, and here there is no doubt as to which activities Congress intended to regulate. See ibid.; id., at 233 (SCALIA, J., concurring) (to subject States to suits for money damages, Congress need only make that intent clear, and need not refer explicitly to the Eleventh Amendment); EEOC v. Wyoming, 460 U.S. 226, 243, n. 18, 75 L. Ed. 2d 18, 103 S. Ct. 1054 (1983) (Congress need not recite the constitutional provision that authorizes its action).

REV_00258959

briefs were Assistant Attorney General Harris, Deputy Solicitor General Wallace, Malcolm L. Stewart, and John F. De Pue.

John R. Carter argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief were Lucien B. Campbell, Henry J. Bemporad, Carter G. Phillips, and Adam D. Hirsh. *

* Briefs of amici curiae urging reversal were filed for 16 Members of the United States Senate et al. by Debra A. Valentine, Brady C. Williamson, and Jeffrey J. Kassel; for the State of Ohio et al. by Lee Fisher, Attorney General of Ohio, John P. Ware, Assistant Attorney General, Richard A. Cordray, State Solicitor, Simon B. Karas, G. Oliver Koppell, Attorney General of New York, and Vanessa Ruiz; for the Center to Prevent Handgun Violence et al. by Erwin N. Griswold, Dennis A. Henigan, and Gail A. Robinson; for Children NOW et al. by William F. Abrams; for the Clarendon Foundation by Ronald D. Maines; for the Coalition to Stop Gun Violence et al. by Brian J. Benner; and for the National School Safety Center et al. by James A. Rapp.

Briefs of amici curiae urging affirmance were filed for the National Conference of State Legislatures et al. by Richard Ruda and Barry Friedman; and for the Pacific Legal Foundation by Ronald A. Zumbrun and Anthony T. Caso.

Briefs of amici curiae were filed for Academics for the Second Amendment et al. by Patrick J. Basial, Don B. Kates, Robert Carter, Henry Mark Holzer, Nicholas J. Johnson, Joseph E. Olson, Daniel Polsby, Charles E. Rice, Wallace Rudolph, Justin Smith, Robert B. Smith, George Strickler, Richard Warner, and Robert Weisberg; and for the Texas Justice Foundation by Clayton Trotter.

JUDGES: REHNQUIST, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court, in which O'CONNOR, SCALIA, KENNEDY, and THOMAS, JJ., joined. KENNEDY, J., filed a concurring opinion, in which O'CONNOR, J., joined, post, p. 568. THOMAS, J., filed a concurring opinion, post, p. 584. STEVENS, J., post, p. 602, and SOUTER, J., post, p. 603, filed dissenting opinions. BREYER, J., filed a dissenting opinion, in which STEVENS, SOUTER, and GINSBURG, JJ., joined, post, p. 615.

OPINIONBY: REHNQUIST

OPINION: [*551] [1626] CHIEF JUSTICE REHNQUIST delivered the opinion of the Court.

[1A]
In the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990, Congress made it a federal offense "for any individual knowingly to possess a firearm at a place that the individual knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, is a school zone." 18 U.S.C. § 922 [4] (q)(1)(A) (1988 ed., Supp. V). The Act neither regulates a commercial activity nor contains a requirement that the possession be connected in any way to interstate commerce. We hold that the Act exceeds the authority of Congress "to regulate Commerce . . . among the several States . . . ." U.S. Const., Art. I, § 8, cl. 3.

On March 10, 1992, respondent, who was then a 12th-grade student, arrived at Edison High School in San Antonio, Texas, carrying a concealed .38 caliber handgun and five bullets. Acting upon an anonymous tip, school authorities confronted respondent, who admitted that he was carrying the weapon. He was arrested and charged under Texas law with firearm possession on school premises. See Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 46.03(a)(1) (Supp. 1994). The next day, the state charges were dismissed after federal agents charged respondent by complaint with violating the Gun-Free School Zones Act of 1990. 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(A) (1988 ed., Supp. V). n1

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00258924

II

Applying these principles to the case at hand, we must ask whether Congress could have had a rational basis for finding a significant (or substantial) connection between gun-related school violence and interstate commerce. Or, to put the question in the language of the explicit finding that Congress made when it amended this law in 1994: Could Congress rationally have found that "violent crime in school zones," through its effect on the "quality of education," significantly (or substantially) affects "interstate" or "foreign [124] commerce"? 18 U.S.C. §§ 922(q)(1)(F), (G). As long as one views the commerce connection, not as a "technical legal conception," but as "a practical one," Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 398, 49 L. Ed. 518, 25 S. Ct. 276 [*619] (1905) (Holmes, J.), the answer to this question must be yes. Numerous reports and studies -- generated both inside and outside government -- make clear that Congress could reasonably have found the empirical connection that its law, implicitly or explicitly, asserts. (See Appendix, infra, at 631, for a sample of the documentation, as well as for complete citations to the sources referenced below.)

For one thing, reports, hearings, and other readily available literature make clear that the problem of guns in and around schools is widespread and extremely serious. These materials report, for example, that four percent of American high school students (and six percent of inner-city high school students) carry a gun to school at least occasionally, Centers for Disease Control 2342; Sheley, McGee, & Wright 679; that 12 percent of urban high school students have had guns fired at them, ibid.; that [125] 20 percent of those students have been threatened with guns, ibid.; and that, in any 6-month period, several hundred thousand schoolchildren are victims of violent crimes in or near their schools, U.S. Dept. of Justice 1 (1989); House Select Committee Hearing 15 (1989). And, they report that this widespread violence in schools throughout the Nation significantly interferes with the quality of education in those schools. See, e. g., House Judiciary Committee Hearing 44 (1990) (linking school violence to dropout rate); U.S. Dept. of Health 118-119 (1978) (school-violence victims suffer academically); compare U.S. Dept. of Justice 1 (1991) (gun violence worst in inner-city schools), with National Center 47 (dropout rates highest in inner cities). Based on reports such as these, Congress obviously could have thought that guns and learning are mutually exclusive. Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee Hearing 39 (1993); U.S. Dept. of Health 118, 123-124 (1978). Congress could therefore have found a substantial educational problem -- teachers unable to teach, students unable to learn -- and concluded that guns near schools contribute substantially to the size and scope of that [126] problem.

[*620] Having found that guns in schools significantly undermine the quality of education in our Nation's classrooms, Congress could also have found, given the effect of education upon interstate and foreign commerce, that gun-related violence in and around schools is a commercial, as well as a human, problem. Education, although far more than a matter of economics, has long been inextricably intertwined with the Nation's economy. When this Nation began, most workers received their education in the workplace, typically (like Benjamin Franklin) as apprentices. See generally Seybolt; Rorabaugh; U.S. Dept. of Labor (1950). As late as the 1920's, many workers still received general education directly from their employers -- from large corporations, such as General Electric, Ford, and Goodyear, which created schools [1660] within their firms to help both the worker and the firm. See Bolino 15-25. (Throughout most of the 19th century fewer than one percent of all Americans received secondary education through attending a high school. See id., at 11.) As public school enrollment grew in the early 20th century, see Becker 218 (1993), the need for industry to teach basic educational skills diminished. [127] But, the direct economic link between basic education and industrial productivity remained. Scholars estimate that nearly a quarter of America's economic growth in the early years of this century is traceable directly to increased schooling, see Denison 243; that investment in "human capital" (through spending on education) exceeded investment in "physical capital" by a ratio of almost two to one, see Schultz 26 (1961); and that the economic returns to this investment in education exceeded the returns to conventional capital investment, see, e. g., Davis & Morrall 48-49.

REV_00258960

In recent years the link between secondary education and business has strengthened, becoming both more direct and more important. Scholars on the subject report that technological changes and innovations in management techniques have altered the nature of the workplace so that more jobs now demand greater educational skills. See, e. g., MIT 32 [*621] (only about one-third of handtool company's 1,000 workers were qualified to work with a new process that requires high-school-level reading and mathematical skills); Cyert & Mowery 68 (gap between wages of high school dropouts and better trained workers increasing); U.S. [128] Dept. of Labor 41 (1981) (job openings for dropouts declining over time). There is evidence that "service, manufacturing or construction jobs are being displaced by technology that requires a better-educated worker or, more likely, are being exported overseas," Gordon, Ponticell, & Morgan 26; that "workers with truly few skills by the year 2000 will find that only one job out of ten will remain," ibid.; and that > "over the long haul the best way to encourage the growth of high-wage jobs is to upgrade the skills of the work force. . . . Better-trained workers become more productive workers, enabling a company to become more competitive and expand." Henkoff 60.

Increasing global competition also has made primary and secondary education economically more important. The portion of the American economy attributable to international trade nearly tripled between 1950 and 1980, and more than 70 percent of American-made goods now compete with imports. Marshall 205; Marshall & Tucker 33. Yet, lagging worker productivity has contributed to negative trade balances and to real hourly compensation that has fallen below wages in 10 other industrialized nations. See National Center 57; Handbook [129] of Labor Statistics 561, 576 (1989); Neef & Kask 28, 31. At least some significant part of this serious productivity problem is attributable to students who emerge from classrooms without the reading or mathematical skills necessary to compete with their European or Asian counterparts, see, e. g., MIT 28, and, presumably, to high school dropout rates of 20 to 25 percent (up to 50 percent in inner cities), see, e. g., National Center 47; Chubb & Hanushek 215. Indeed, Congress has said, when writing other statutes, that [*622] "functionally or technologically illiterate" Americans in the work force "erode" our economic "standing in the international marketplace," Pub. L. 100-418, § 6002(a)(3), 102 Stat. 1469, and that "our Nation is . . . paying the price of scientific and technological illiteracy, with our productivity declining, our industrial base ailing, and our global competitiveness dwindling," H. R. Rep. No. 98-6, pt. 1, p. 19 (1983).

Finally, there is evidence that, today more than ever, many firms base their location decisions upon the presence, or absence, of a work force with a basic education. See MacCormack, Newman, & Rosenfield 73; Coffee 296. Scholars on the subject report, [130] for example, that today, "high speed communication and transportation make it possible to produce most products and services anywhere in the world," National Center 38; that "modern machinery and production methods can therefore be combined with low wage workers to drive costs down," ibid.; that managers can perform "'back office functions anywhere in the world now,'" and say that if they "'can't get enough skilled [1661] workers here'" they will "'move the skilled jobs out of the country,'" id., at 41; with the consequence that "rich countries need better education and retraining, to reduce the supply of unskilled workers and to equip them with the skills they require for tomorrow's jobs," Survey of Global Economy 37. In light of this increased importance of education to individual firms, it is no surprise that half of the Nation's manufacturers have become involved with setting standards and shaping curricula for local schools, Maturi 65-68, that 88 percent think this kind of involvement is important, id., at 68, that more than 20 States have recently passed educational reforms to attract new business, Overman 61-62, and that business magazines have begun to rank cities according [131] to the quality of their schools, see Boyle 24.

REV_00258961

The economic links I have just sketched seem fairly obvious. Why then is it not equally obvious, in light of those links, that a widespread, serious, and substantial physical [*623] threat to teaching and learning also substantially threatens the commerce to which that teaching and learning is inextricably tied? That is to say, guns in the hands of six percent of inner-city high school students and gun-related violence throughout a city's schools must threaten the trade and commerce that those schools support. The only question, then, is whether the latter threat is (to use the majority's terminology) "substantial." The evidence of (1) the extent of the gun-related violence problem, see supra, at 619, (2) the extent of the resulting negative effect on classroom learning, see ibid., and (3) the extent of the consequent negative commercial effects, see supra, at 620-622, when taken together, indicate a threat to trade and commerce that is "substantial." At the very least, Congress could rationally have concluded that the links are "substantial."

Specifically, Congress could have found that gun-related violence [132] near the classroom poses a serious economic threat (1) to consequently inadequately educated workers who must endure low paying jobs, see, e. g., National Center 29, and (2) to communities and businesses that might (in today's "information society") otherwise gain, from a well-educated work force, an important commercial advantage, see, e. g., Becker 10 (1992), of a kind that location near a railhead or harbor provided in the past. Congress might also have found these threats to be no different in kind from other threats that this Court has found within the commerce power, such as the threat that loan sharking poses to the "funds" of "numerous localities," Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. at 157, and that unfair labor practices pose to instrumentalities of commerce, see Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 197, 221-222, 83 L. Ed. 126, 59 S. Ct. 206 (1938). As I have pointed out, supra, at 618, Congress has written that "the occurrence of violent crime in school zones" has brought about a "decline in the quality of education" that "has an adverse impact on interstate commerce and the foreign commerce of the United States." 18 U.S.C. §§ 922 [133] (q)(1)(F), (G). The violence-related facts, the educational [*624] facts, and the economic facts, taken together, make this conclusion rational. And, because under our case law, see supra, at 615-617; infra, at 627-628, the sufficiency of the constitutionally necessary Commerce Clause link between a crime of violence and interstate commerce turns simply upon size or degree, those same facts make the statute constitutional.

To hold this statute constitutional is not to "obliterate" the "distinction between what is national and what is local," ante, at 567 (citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted); nor is it to hold that the Commerce Clause permits the Federal Government to "regulate any activity that it found was related to the economic productivity of individual citizens," to regulate "marriage, divorce, and child custody," or to regulate any and all aspects of education. Ante, at 564. First, this statute is aimed at curbing a particularly acute threat to the educational process -- the possession (and use) of life-threatening firearms in, or near, the classroom. The empirical evidence that I have discussed above unmistakably documents the special way [134] in which guns and education are incompatible. See supra, at 619. This Court has previously recognized the singularly disruptive potential [1662] on interstate commerce that acts of violence may have. See Perez, supra, at 156-157. Second, the immediacy of the connection between education and the national economic well-being is documented by scholars and accepted by society at large in a way and to a degree that may not hold true for other social institutions. It must surely be the rare case, then, that a statute strikes at conduct that (when considered in the abstract) seems so removed from commerce, but which (practically speaking) has so significant an impact upon commerce.

In sum, a holding that the particular statute before us falls within the commerce power would not expand the scope of that Clause. Rather, it simply would apply pre-existing law to changing economic circumstances. See Heart of Atlanta [*625] Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 251, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964). It would recognize that, in today's economic world, gun-related violence near the classroom makes a significant difference to our economic, as [135] well as our social, well-being. In accordance with well-accepted precedent, such a holding would permit Congress "to act in terms of economic . . . realities," would interpret the commerce power as "an affirmative power commensurate with the national needs," and would acknowledge that the "commerce clause does not operate so as to render the nation powerless to defend itself against economic forces that Congress decrees inimical or destructive of the national economy." North American Co. v. SEC, 327 U.S. 686, 705, 90 L. Ed. 945, 66 S. Ct. 785 (1946) (citing Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. at 398 (Holmes, J.)).

REV_00258962

III

The majority's holding -- that § 922 falls outside the scope of the Commerce Clause -- creates three serious legal problems. First, the majority's holding runs contrary to modern Supreme Court cases that have upheld congressional actions despite connections to interstate or foreign commerce that are less significant than the effect of school violence. In Perez v. United States, supra, the Court held that the Commerce Clause authorized a federal statute that makes it a crime to engage in loan [136] sharking ("extortionate credit transactions") at a local level. The Court said that Congress may judge that such transactions, "though purely *intra*state, . . . affect *inter*state commerce." 402 U.S. at 154 (emphasis added). Presumably, Congress reasoned that threatening or using force, say with a gun on a street corner, to collect a debt occurs sufficiently often so that the activity (by helping organized crime) affects commerce among the States. But, why then cannot Congress also reason that the threat or use of force -- the frequent consequence of possessing a gun -- in or near a school occurs sufficiently often so that such activity (by inhibiting basic education) affects [*626] commerce among the States? The negative impact upon the national economy of an inability to teach basic skills seems no smaller (nor less significant) than that of organized crime.

In Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964), this Court upheld, as within the commerce power, a statute prohibiting racial discrimination at local restaurants, in part because that discrimination discouraged travel by African Americans and in part because that discrimination [137] affected purchases of food and restaurant supplies from other States. See id., at 300; Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, at 274 (Black, J., concurring in McClung and in Heart of Atlanta). In Daniel v. Paul, 395 U.S. 298, 23 L. Ed. 2d 318, 89 S. Ct. 1697 (1969), this Court found an effect on commerce caused by an amusement park located several miles down a country road in the middle of Alabama -- because some customers (the Court assumed), some food, 15 paddleboats, and a juke box had come from out of state. See id., at 304-305, 308. In both of these cases, the Court understood that the specific instance of discrimination (at a local place of accommodation) was part of a general practice that, considered as a whole, caused not only the most serious human and social harm, but had nationally significant economic dimensions as well. See McClung, supra, at 301; [1663] Daniel, supra, at 307, n. 10. It is difficult to distinguish the case before us, for the same critical elements are present. Businesses are less likely to locate in communities where violence plagues the classroom. [138] Families will hesitate to move to neighborhoods where students carry guns instead of books. (Congress expressly found in 1994 that "parents may decline to send their children to school" in certain areas "due to concern about violent crime and gun violence." 18 U.S.C. § 922(q)(1)(E).) And (to look at the matter in the most narrowly commercial manner), interstate publishers therefore will sell fewer books and other firms will sell fewer school supplies where the threat of violence disrupts learning. Most importantly, like the local racial discrimination at issue in McClung and Daniel, the local instances here, taken [*627] together and considered as a whole, create a problem that causes serious human and social harm, but also has nationally significant economic dimensions.

In Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942), this Court sustained the application of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 to wheat that Filburn grew and consumed on his own local farm because, considered in its totality, (1) homegrown wheat may be "induced by rising prices" to "flow into the market and check price increases, [139] " and (2) even if it never actually enters the market, homegrown wheat nonetheless "supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market" and, in that sense, "competes with wheat in commerce." Id., at 128. To find both of these effects on commerce significant in amount, the Court had to give Congress the benefit of the doubt. Why would the Court, to find a significant (or "substantial") effect here, have to give Congress any greater leeway? See also United States v. Women's Sportswear Mfrs. Assn., 336 U.S. 460, 464, 93 L. Ed. 805, 69 S. Ct. 714 (1949) ("If it is interstate commerce that feels the pinch, it does not matter how local the operation which applies the squeeze"); Mandeville Island Farms, Inc. v. American Crystal Sugar Co., 334 U.S. at 236 ("It is enough that the individual activity when multiplied into a general practice . . . contains a threat to the interstate economy that requires preventive regulation").

REV_00258963

The second legal problem the Court creates comes from its apparent belief that it can reconcile its holding with earlier cases by making [140] a critical distinction between "commercial" and noncommercial "transaction[s]." Ante, at 561. That is to say, the Court believes the Constitution would distinguish between two local activities, each of which has an identical effect upon interstate commerce, if one, but not the other, is "commercial" in nature. As a general matter, this approach fails to heed this Court's earlier warning not to turn "questions of the power of Congress" upon "formula[s]" that would give > [*628] "controlling force to nomenclature such as 'production' and 'indirect' and foreclose consideration of the actual effects of the activity in question upon interstate commerce." Wickard, supra, at 120.

See also United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 116-117, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941) (overturning the Court's distinction between "production" and "commerce" in the child labor case, Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U.S. 251, 271-272, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 38 S. Ct. 529 (1918)); Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. at 398 (Holmes, J.) ("Commerce among the States is not a technical legal conception, but a practical one, drawn from the course of business"). Moreover, [141] the majority's test is not consistent with what the Court saw as the point of the cases that the majority now characterizes. Although the majority today attempts to categorize Perez, McClung, and Wickard as involving intrastate "economic activity," ante, at 559, the Courts that decided each of those cases did not focus upon the economic nature of the activity regulated. Rather, they focused upon whether that activity affected interstate or foreign commerce. In fact, the Wickard Court expressly held that Filburn's consumption of homegrown wheat, "though it may not be regarded [1664] as commerce," could nevertheless be regulated -- "whatever its nature" -- so long as "it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce." Wickard, supra, at 125 (emphasis added).

More importantly, if a distinction between commercial and noncommercial activities is to be made, this is not the case in which to make it. The majority clearly cannot intend such a distinction to focus narrowly on an act of gun possession standing by itself, for such a reading could not be reconciled with either the civil rights cases (McClung and Daniel) or Perez -- in [142] each of those cases the specific transaction (the race-based exclusion, the use of force) was not itself "commercial." And, if the majority instead means to distinguish generally among broad categories of activities, differentiating what is educational from what is commercial, then, as a [*629] practical matter, the line becomes almost impossible to draw. Schools that teach reading, writing, mathematics, and related basic skills serve both social and commercial purposes, and one cannot easily separate the one from the other. American industry itself has been, and is again, involved in teaching. See supra, at 620, 622. When, and to what extent, does its involvement make education commercial? Does the number of vocational classes that train students directly for jobs make a difference? Does it matter if the school is public or private, nonprofit or profit seeking? Does it matter if a city or State adopts a voucher plan that pays private firms to run a school? Even if one were to ignore these practical questions, why should there be a theoretical distinction between education, when it significantly benefits commerce, and environmental pollution, when it causes economic harm? See Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981).

REV_00258964

[*143] Regardless, if there is a principled distinction that could work both here and in future cases, Congress (even in the absence of vocational classes, industry involvement, and private management) could rationally conclude that schools fall on the commercial side of the line. In 1990, the year Congress enacted the statute before us, primary and secondary schools spent $ 230 billion -- that is, nearly a quarter of a trillion dollars -- which accounts for a significant portion of our $ 5.5 trillion gross domestic product for that year. See Statistical Abstract 147, 442 (1993). The business of schooling requires expenditure of these funds on student transportation, food and custodial services, books, and teachers' salaries. See U.S. Dept. of Education 4, 7 (1993). These expenditures enable schools to provide a valuable service -- namely, to equip students with the skills they need to survive in life and, more specifically, in the workplace. Certainly, Congress has often analyzed school expenditure as if it were a commercial investment, closely analyzing whether schools are efficient, whether they justify the significant resources [*630] they spend, and whether they can be restructured to achieve [144] greater returns. See, e. g., S. Rep. No. 100-222, p. 2 (1987) (federal school assistance is "a prudent investment"); Senate Appropriations Committee Hearing (1994) (private sector management of public schools); cf. Chubb & Moe 185-229 (school choice); Hanushek 85-122 (performance based incentives for educators); Gibbs (decision in Hartford, Conn., to contract out public school system). Why could Congress, for Commerce Clause purposes, not consider schools as roughly analogous to commercial investments from which the Nation derives the benefit of an educated work force?

The third legal problem created by the Court's holding is that it threatens legal uncertainty in an area of law that, until this case, seemed reasonably well settled. Congress has enacted many statutes (more than 100 sections of the United States Code), including criminal statutes (at least 25 sections), that use the words "affecting commerce" to define their scope, see, e. g., 18 U.S.C. § 844(i) (destruction of buildings used in activity affecting interstate commerce), and other statutes that contain no jurisdictional language at all, see, e. g., 18 U.S.C. § 922 [145] (o)(1) (possession of machineguns). Do these, or similar, statutes regulate noncommercial activities? If so, would that alter the meaning of "affecting commerce" in a jurisdictional element? Cf. United States v. Staszcuk, 517 F.2d 53, 57-58 (CA7 1975) (en [1665] banc) (Stevens, J.) (evaluation of Congress' intent "requires more than a consideration of the consequences of the particular transaction"). More importantly, in the absence of a jurisdictional element, are the courts nevertheless to take Wickard, 317 U.S. at 127-128, (and later similar cases) as inapplicable, and to judge the effect of a single noncommercial activity on interstate commerce without considering similar instances of the forbidden conduct? However these questions are eventually resolved, the legal uncertainty now created will restrict Congress' ability to enact criminal laws aimed at criminal behavior that, considered problem by problem rather [*631] than instance by instance, seriously threatens the economic, as well as social, well-being of Americans.

IV

In sum, to find this legislation within the scope of the Commerce Clause would permit "Congress . . . [146] to act in terms of economic . . . realities." North American Co. v. SEC, 327 U.S. at 705 (citing Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. at 398 (Holmes, J.)). It would interpret the Clause as this Court has traditionally interpreted it, with the exception of one wrong turn subsequently corrected. See Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., at 195 (holding that the commerce power extends "to all the external concerns of the nation, and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally "); United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. at 116-117 ("The conclusion is inescapable that Hammer v. Dagenhart [the child labor case] was a departure from the principles which have prevailed in the interpretation of the Commerce Clause both before and since the decision . . . . It should be and now is overruled"). Upholding this legislation would do no more than simply recognize that Congress had a "rational basis" for finding a significant connection between guns in or near schools and (through their effect on education) the interstate and foreign commerce [147] they threaten. For these reasons, I would reverse the judgment of the Court of Appeals. Respectfully, I dissent.

REV_00258965

APPENDIX TO OPINION OF BREYER, J.

Congressional Materials

(in reverse chronological order)

Private Sector Management of Public Schools, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education and Related Agencies of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. (1994) (Senate Appropriations Committee Hearing (1994)).

[*632] Children and Gun Violence, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (Senate Judiciary Committee Hearing (1993)).

Keeping Every Child Safe: Curbing the Epidemic of Violence, Joint Hearing before the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources and the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993).

Recess from Violence: Making our Schools Safe, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 103d Cong., 1st Sess. (1993) (Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee Hearing (1993)).

[*148] Preparing for the Economy of the 21st Century, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Children, Family, Drugs and Alcoholism of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (1992).

Children Carrying Weapons: Why the Recent Increase, Hearing before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (1992).

Youth Violence Prevention, Hearing before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, 102d Cong., 2d Sess. (1992).

School Dropout Prevention and Basic Skills Improvement Act of 1990, Pub. L. 101-600, § 2 (a)(2), 104 Stat. 3042.

Excellence in Mathematics, Science and Engineering Education Act of 1990, 104 [1666] Stat. 2883, 20 U.S.C. § 5301(a)(5) (1988 ed., Supp. V).

Oversight Hearing on Education Reform and American Business and the Implementation of the Hawkins-Stafford Amendments of 1988, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Training of the [*633] House Committee on Education and Labor, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. (1990).

U.S. Power in a Changing World, Report Prepared for the Subcommittee on International

REV_00258966

Economic Policy and Trade of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, [149] 101st Cong., 2d Sess., 43-66 (1990).

Gun Free School Zones Act of 1990, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Crime of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. (1990) (House Judiciary Committee Hearing (1990)).

Restoring American Productivity: The Role of Education and Human Resources, Hearing before the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1989).

Children and Guns, Hearing before the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1989) (House Select Committee Hearing (1989)).

Education and Training for a Competitive America Act of 1988, Pub. L. 100-418, Title VI, 102 Stat. 1469.

S. Rep. No. 100-222 (1987).

Education and Training for American Competitiveness, Hearings before the House Committee on Education and Labor, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987).

Competitiveness and the Quality of the American Work Force, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Education and Health of the Joint Economic Committee, 100th Cong., 1st Sess., pts. 1 and 2 (1987).

Oversight Hearing on Illiteracy, Joint Hearing before the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education of the House Committee [150] on Education and Labor and the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (1986).

[*634] Oversight on Illiteracy in the United States, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education of the House Committee on Education and Labor, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (1986).

Crime and Violence in the Schools, Hearing before the Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. (1984).

H. R. Rep. No. 98-6, pts. 1 and 2 (1983).

S. Rep. No. 98-151 (1983).

Education for Economic Security Act, Hearings before the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983).

Pub. L. 93-380, § 825, 88 Stat. 602 (1974).

I. Clarke, Art and Industry: Instruction in Drawing Applied to the Industrial and Fine Arts, S. Exec. Doc. No. 209, 46th Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 2 (1891).

Other Federal Government Materials

(in reverse chronological order)

U.S. Dept. of Education, Office of Educational Research and Improvement, First Findings: The Educational Quality of the Workforce Employer [151] Survey (Feb. 1995).

REV_00258967

Economic Report of the President 108 (Feb. 1994).

U.S. Dept. of Commerce, Statistical Abstract of the United States (1993) (Statistical Abstract (1993)).

U.S. Dept. of Education, Office of Educational Research and Improvement, Public School Education Financing for School Year 1989-90 (June 1993) (U.S. Dept. of Education (1993)).

Economic Report of the President 101 (Feb. 1992).

U.S. Dept. of Labor, Secretary's Commission on Achieving Necessary Skills, Skills and Tasks For Jobs: A SCANS Report for America 2000 (1992).

[*635] U.S. Dept. of Labor, Employment and Training Administration, Beyond the School Doors: The Literacy Needs of Job [1667] Seekers Served by the U.S. Department of Labor (Sept. 1992).

U.S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Justice Statistics, School Crime: A National Crime Victimization Survey Report (Sept. 1991) (U.S. Dept. of Justice (1991)).

U.S. Dept. of Commerce, Bureau of Census, 1990 Census of Population: Education in the United States 474 (Jan. 1994).

U.S. Dept. of Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Weapons in Schools, OJJDP Bulletin 1 (Oct. 1989) (U.S. Dept. of Justice (1989)).

U.S. Dept. of Labor, [152] Bureau of Labor Statistics, Handbook of Labor Statistics 281, 561, 576 (Aug. 1989) (Handbook of Labor Statistics (1989)).

Bishop, Incentives for Learning: Why American High School Students Compare So Poorly to their Counterparts Overseas, in 1 U.S. Dept. of Labor, Commission on Workforce Quality & Labor Market Efficiency, Investing in People 1 (Sept. 1989).

Rumberger & Levin, Schooling for the Modern Workplace, in 1 U.S. Dept. of Labor, Commission on Workforce Quality & Labor Market Efficiency, Investing in People 85 (Sept. 1989).

U.S. Dept. of Education and U.S. Department of Labor, The Bottom Line: Basic Skills in the Workplace 12 (1988).

U.S. Dept. of Labor, Employment and Training Administration, Estimating Educational Attainment of Future Employment Demand for States (Oct. 1981) (U.S. Dept. of Labor (1981)).

U.S. Dept. of Health, Education, and Welfare, National Institute of Education, Violent Schools -- Safe Schools: The Safe School Study Report to Congress (1978) (U.S. Dept. of Health (1978)).

[*636] U.S. Dept. of Labor, Bureau of Apprenticeship, Apprenticeship Past and Present (1950) (U.S. Dept. of Labor (1950)).

Other Readily Available Materials

(in alphabetical [153] order)

Akin & Garfinkel, School Expenditures and the Economic Returns to Schooling, 12 J. Human Resources 462 (1977).

American Council on Education, Business-Higher Education Forum, America's Competitive Challenge: A Report to the President of the United States (Apr. 1983).

Applebome, Employers Wary of School System, N. Y. Times, Feb. 20, 1995, p. A1, col. 1.

Are Real Estate Firms Ready to Ride on the Infobahn?: Information Highway of Technology, 36 National Real Estate Investor, Oct. 1994, p. 6.

Aring, What the 'V' Word is Costing America's Economy: Vocational Education, 74 Phi Delta Kappan 396 (1993).

G. Atkinson, The Economics of Education (1983).

Becker, The Adam Smith Address: Education, Labor Force Quality, and the Economy, Business Economics, Jan. 1992, p. 7 (Becker (1992)).

G. Becker, Human Capital (3d ed. 1993) (Becker (1993)).

I. Berg, Education and Jobs: The Great Training Robbery (1970).

Berryman, The Economy, Literacy Requirements, and At-Risk Adults, in Literacy and the Marketplace: Improving the Literacy of Low-Income Single Mothers 22 (June 1989).

Bishop, Is the Test Score Decline Responsible for the Productivity Growth Decline?, 79 Am. Econ. Rev. 178 (Mar. 1989).

[*154] Bishop, High School Performance and Employee Recruitment, 13 J. Labor Research 41 (1992).

Blackburn, What Can Explain the Increase in Earnings Inequality Among Males?, 29 Industrial Relations 441 (1990).

[*637] Boissiere, Knight, & Sabot, Earnings, Schooling, Ability and Cognitive Skills, 75 Am. Econ. Rev. 1016 (1985).

A. Bolino, A Century of Human Capital by Education and Training (1989) (Bolino).

Boyle, Expansion Management's Education Quotient, Economic Development Rev., Winter 1992, pp. 23-25 (Boyle).

Brandel, Wake Up Get Smart, New England Business, May 1991, p. 46.

[1668] Callahan & Rivara, Urban High School Youth and Handguns: A School-Based Survey, 267 JAMA 3038 (1992).

Card & Krueger, Does School Quality Matter? Returns to Education and the Characteristics of Public Schools in the United States, 100 J. Pol. Econ. 1 (1992).

A. Carnevale, America and the New Economy: How New Competitive Standards are Radically Changing American Workplaces (1991).

A. Carnevale and J. Porro, Quality Education: School Reform for the New American Economy 31-32 (1994).

Center to Prevent Handgun Violence, Caught in the Cross-fire: A Report [155] on Gun n1 The term "school zone" is defined as "in, or on the grounds of, a public, parochial or private school" or "within a distance of 1,000 feet from the grounds of a public, parochial or private school." § 921(a)(25).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*5] A federal grand jury indicted respondent on one count of knowing possession of a firearm at a school zone, in violation of § 922(q). Respondent moved to dismiss his federal indictment on the ground that § 922(q) "is unconstitutional as it is beyond the power of Congress to legislate control over our public schools." The District Court denied the motion, concluding that § 922(q) "is a constitutional exercise of Congress' well-defined power to regulate activities in and affecting [*552] commerce, and the 'business' of elementary, middle and high schools . . . affects interstate commerce." App. to Pet. for Cert. 55a. Respondent waived his right to a jury trial. The District Court conducted a bench trial, found him guilty of violating § 922(q), and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment and two years' supervised release.

On appeal, respondent challenged his conviction based on his claim that § 922(q) exceeded Congress' power to legislate under the Commerce Clause. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed and reversed respondent's conviction. It held that, in light of what it characterized as insufficient congressional findings and legislative history, "section 922(q), in the full [6] reach of its terms, is invalid as beyond the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause." 2 F.3d 1342, 1367-1368 (1993). Because of the importance of the issue, we granted certiorari, 511 U.S. 1029 (1994), and we now affirm.

We start with first principles. The Constitution creates a Federal Government of enumerated powers. See Art. I, § 8. As James Madison wrote, "the powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the federal government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite." The Federalist No. 45, pp. 292-293 (C. Rossiter ed. 1961). This constitutionally mandated division of authority "was adopted by the Framers to ensure protection of our fundamental liberties." Gregory v. Ashcroft, 501 U.S. 452, 458, 115 L. Ed. 2d 410, 111 S. Ct. 2395 (1991) (internal quotation marks omitted). "Just as the separation and independence of the coordinate branches of the Federal Government serve to prevent the accumulation of excessive power in any one branch, a healthy balance of power between the States and the Federal Government will reduce the risk of tyranny and abuse from either front." [7] Ibid.

The Constitution delegates to Congress the power "to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes." Art. I, § 8, [*553] cl. 3. The Court, through Chief Justice Marshall, first defined the nature of Congress' [1627] commerce power in

> Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1, 9 Wheat. 1, 189-190, 6 L. Ed. 23 (1824):
> "Commerce, undoubtedly, is traffic, but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse."

The commerce power "is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations, other than are prescribed in the constitution." Id., at 196. The Gibbons Court, however, acknowledged that limitations on the commerce power are inherent in the very language of the Commerce Clause.

REV_00258925

Violence in our Nation's Schools (Sept. 1990).

Centers For Disease Control, Leads from the Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, 266 JAMA 2342 (1991) (Centers for Disease Control).

Chubb & Hanushek, Reforming Educational Reform, in Setting National Priorities 213 (H. Aaron ed. 1990) (Chubb & Hanushek).

J. Chubb & T. Moe, Politics, Markets, and America's Schools (1990) (Chubb & Moe).

Coffee, Survey: Worker Skills, Training More Important in Site Selection, Site Selection, Apr. 1993, p. 296 (Coffee).

E. Cohn, The Economics of Education (rev. ed. 1979).

[*638] Council on Competitiveness, Competitiveness Index 5 (July 1994).

Council on Competitiveness, Elevating the Skills of the American Workforce (May 1993).

Council on Competitiveness, Governing America: A Competitiveness Policy Agenda for The New Administration 33-39 (1989).

R. Cyert & D. Mowery, Technology and Employment: Innovation and Growth in the U.S. Economy (1987) (Cyert & Mowery).

J. Cynoweth, Enhancing Literacy for Jobs and Productivity: Council of State Policy and Planning Agencies Report (1994).

J. Davis & J. Morrall, Evaluating Educational Investment (1974) (Davis & Morrall).

Denison, [156] Education and Growth, in Economics and Education 237 (D. Rogers & H. Ruchlin eds. 1971) (Denison).

M. Dertouzos, R. Lester, & R. Solow, MIT Commission on Industrial Productivity, Made In America: Regaining the Productive Edge (1989).

A. DeYoung, Economics and American Education: A Historical and Critical Overview of the Impact of Economic Theories on Schooling in the United States (1989).

Downs, America's Educational Failures Will Hurt Real Estate, National Real Estate Investor, Aug. 1988, p. 34.

Doyle, The Role of Private Sector Management in Public Education, 76 Phi Delta Kappan 128 (1994).

Education and Economic Development (C. Anderson & M. Bowman eds. 1965).

Education Commission of the States, Task Force on Education for Economic Growth, Action for Excellence (June 1983).

Educational Testing Service, Developing the Skills and Knowledge of the Workforce (1993).

[*639] Finding What Really Works in Education, Chief Executive, May 1994, p. 48.

Ganderton & Griffin, Impact of Child Quality on Earnings: The Productivity-of-Schooling Hypothesis, 11 Contemporary Policy Issues 39 (July 1993).

Garver, "Success Story!": The Evolution of Economic Development in Broward County, [157] Florida, 11 Economic Development Review 85 (Summer 1993).

Gibbs, Schools for Profit, Time, Oct. 17, 1994, p. 48 (Gibbs).

Gintis, Education, Technology, and the Characteristics of Worker Productivity, 61 Am. Econ. Rev. 266 (1971).

Glazer, A Human Capital Policy for the Cities, Public Interest, Summer 1993, p. 27.

Glazer, Violence in Schools: Can Anything be Done to Curb the Growing Violence?, The CQ Researcher, Sept. 11, 1992, pp. 785-808.

[1669] E. Gordon, J. Ponticell, & R. Morgan, Closing the Literacy Gap in American Business 23 (1991) (Gordon, Ponticell, & Morgan).

E. Hanushek, Making Schools Work: Improving Performance and Controlling Costs (1994) (Hanushek).

Henkoff, Where Will the Jobs Come From?, Fortune, Oct. 19, 1992, p. 58 (Henkoff).

Herbert, Reading, Writing, Reloading, N. Y. Times, Dec. 14, 1994, p. A23, col. 1.

Industry's New Schoolhouse, N. Y. Times, Jan. 9, 1994, section 4A, p. 22, col. 3, Education Life Supp.

Introducing the EQ (Education Quotient), Expansion Management, Sept./Oct. 1991, pp. 18-24.

Investment in Education: The Equity-Efficiency Quandary (T. Schultz ed. 1972).

[*640] Itzkoff, America's Unspoken Economic Dilemma: Falling [158] Intelligence Levels, 18 J. Social, Pol. & Econ. Studies 311 (1993).

Johnson, The Private Sector Should Help U.S. Schools, Financier, Sept. 1991, p. 34.

Johnson & Stafford, Social Returns to Quantity and Quality of Schooling, 8 J. Human Resources 139 (1973).

W. Johnston & A. Packer, Workforce 2000: Work and Workers for the Twenty-first Century (1987).

Jorgenson, The Contribution of Education to U.S. Economic Growth, 1948-73, in Education and Economic Productivity 95 (E. Dean ed. 1984).

Kirkland, Are Service Jobs Good Jobs?, Fortune, June 10, 1985, p. 38.

J. Kozol, Illiterate America 13 (1985).

J. Kozol, Where Stands the Republic? Illiteracy: A Warning and a Challenge to the Nation's Press 9 (1986).

M. Levin & A. Shank, Educational Investment in an Urban Society: Costs, Benefits, and Public Policy (1970).

Link & Ratledge, Social Returns to Quantity and Quality of Education: A Further Statement, 10 J. Human Resources 78 (1975).

Lyne, The Skills Gap: U.S. Work-Force Woes Complicate Business-Location Equation, Site Selection, Aug. 1992, p. 642.

MacCormack, Newman, & Rosenfield, The New Dynamics of Global Manufacturing Site Location, 35 Sloan Management Review, No. [159] 4, p. 69 (1994) (MacCormack, Newman, & Rosenfield).

F. Machlup, Education and Economic Growth (1970).

Markey, The Labor Market Problems of Today's High School Dropouts, Monthly Labor Review, June 1988, p. 36.

[*641] Marshall, The Implications of Internationalization for Labor Market Institutions and Industrial Relations Systems, in Rethinking Employment Policy 205 (D. Bawden & F. Skidmore eds. 1989) (Marshall).

R. Marshall & M. Tucker, Thinking for a Living: Work, Skills, and the Future of the American Economy 33 (1992) (Marshall & Tucker).

Maturi, The Workforce Lure: Education/Training Carries More Weight in Siting Decisions, Industry Week, May 16, 1994, pp. 65-68 (Maturi).

M. Maurice, F. Sellier, & J. Silvestre, The Social Foundations of Industrial Power: A Comparison of France and Germany (1986).

Mikulecky, Job Literacy: The Relationship Between School Preparation and Workplace Actuality, 17 Reading Research Quarterly 400 (1982).

Mikulecky & Ehlinger, The Influence of Metacognitive Aspects of Literacy on Job Performance of Electronics Technicians, 18 J. Reading Behavior 41 (1986).

MIT Commission on Industrial Productivity, Education and Training in the United States: [160] Developing the Human Resources We Need for Technological Advance and Competitiveness, in 2 Working Papers of the MIT Commission on Industrial Productivity (1989) (MIT).

Mitchell, The Impact of International Trade on U.S. Employment, in American Labor in a Changing World Economy 5 (W. Morehouse ed. 1978).

[1670] Morgan & Sirageldin, A Note on the Quality Dimension in Education, 76 J. Pol. Econ. 1069 (1968).

National Academy of Education, Economic Dimensions of Education (1979).

National Center on Education and the Economy, America's Choice: High Skills or Low Wages! (1990) (National Center).

[*642] National Commission on Excellence in Education, A Nation at Risk 8-9 (Apr. 1983).

National Commission on Jobs and Small Business, Making America Work Again: Jobs, Small Business, and the International Challenge (1987).

National Governor's Association, Making America Work 35-36, 77-96 (1987).

National Institute of Justice, Research in Brief, J. Toby, Violence in Schools 3 (Dec. 1983).

National School Safety Center, Weapons in Schools (May 1989).

Neef & Kask, Manufacturing Productivity and Labor Costs in 14 Economies, Monthly Labor Review, Dec. 1991, p. 24 (Neef & Kask).

Neff, Recharging [161] U.S. Competitiveness: Perhaps We Should Use Germany's Education System as a Benchmark, Industry Week, Jan. 20, 1992, p. 21.

O'Connor, Education's Significance as Quality-of-Life Location Factor Parallels Nationwide Reformist Movement, Site Selection Handbook, Aug. 1988, p. 846.

M. O'Donoghue, Economic Dimensions in Education (1971).

Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, Education and the Economy in a Changing Society (1989).

Overman, Skilled States Lure New Business, HRMagazine, Jan. 1994, pp. 61-62 (Overman).

Packer, Taking Action on the SCANS Report, Educational Leadership, Mar. 1992, p. 27.

R. Perlman, The Economics of Education: Conceptual Problems and Policy Issues (1973).

R. Price, Fighting Violence with 'All the Mushy Stuff,' USA Today, May 9, 1994, p. 9A.

D. Prothrow-Stith & M. Weissman, Deadly Consequences (1991).

[*643] G. Psacharopoulos, Returns to Education: An International Comparison (1973).

M. Rasell & E. Appelbaum, Investment in Learning: An Assessment of the Economic Return (1992).

Ray & Mickelson, Corporate Leaders, Resistant Youth, and School Reform in Sunbelt City: The Political Economy of Education, 37 Social Problems 178 (1990).

R. Reich, [162] The Work of Nations (1991).

D. Riddle, Service-Led Growth: The Role of the Service Sector in World Development (1986).

W. Rorabaugh, The Craft Apprentice: From Franklin to the Machine Age in America (1986) (Rorabaugh).

Rumberger & Daymont, The Economic Value of Academic and Vocational Training Acquired in High School, in Youth and the Labor Market 157 (M. Borus ed. 1984).

Ruttenberg, The Limited Promise of Public Health Methodologies to Prevent Youth Violence, 103 Yale L. J. 1885 (1994).

Ryscavage & Henle, Earnings Inequality Accelerates in the 1980's, Monthly Labor Review, Dec. 1990, p. 3.

T. Schultz, Education and Productivity (report prepared for the National Commission on Productivity, 1971).

Schultz, Investment in Human Capital, American Economic Review, Mar. 1961, p. 3, reprinted in 1 Economics of Education 13 (M. Blaug ed. 1968) (Schultz (1961)).

S. Seninger, Labor Force Policies for Regional Economic Development: The Role of Employment and Training Programs (1989).

R. Seybolt, Apprenticeship & Apprenticeship Education in Colonial New England & New York (1917) (Seybolt).

Sheley, McGee, & Wright, Gun-Related Violence in and Around [163] Inner-City Schools, 146 Am. J. Diseases in Children 677 (1992) (Sheley, McGee, & Wright).

[*644] [1671] Stone & Boundy, School Violence: The Need for a Meaningful Response, 28 Clearinghouse Review 453 (1994).

Strane, Locating in Rural America Could be a Competitive Advantage, 12 Telemarketing, Oct. 1993, p. 92.

R. Sturm, How Do Education and Training Affect a Country's Economic Performance? A Literature Survey (1993).

A Survey of The Global Economy, The Economist, Oct. 1, 1994, p. 37 (Survey of Global Economy).

Swaim & Podgursky, Do More-Educated Workers Fare Better Following Job Displacement?, Monthly Labor Review, Aug. 1989, p. 43.

Tremblay, The Impact of School and College Expenditures on the Wages of Southern and Non-Southern Workers, 7 J. Labor Research 201 (1986).

J. Vaizey, The Economics of Education (1973).

J. Vaizey, The Political Economy of Human Capital (1973).

Vallens, Global Economy May Dictate More Spending for Training, Modern Plastics, Nov. 1993, p. 19.

Wachtel, The Effect on Earnings of School and College Investment Expenditures, 58 Review of Economics & Statistics 326, 330 (1976).

Weiner & Siler, Trained to Order, Forbes, June 26, 1989, pp. 73-78.

L. Wheat, [164] Urban Growth in the Nonmetropolitan South 65 (1976).

Wirth, Education and Work: The Choices We Face, Phi Delta Kappan, Jan. 1993, p. 361.

A. Wirth, Education and Work for the Year 2000 (1992).

L. Wise, Labor Market Policies and Employment Patterns in the United States 50 (1989).

Service: LEXSEE®
Citation: 514 U.S. 549,AT 551
View: Full
Date/Time: Sunday, April 22, 2001 - 3:18 PM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

> "It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce, which is completely internal, [8] which is carried on between man and man in a State, or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and is certainly unnecessary.
>
> "Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. . . . The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated; and that something, if we regard the language, or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of a State." Id., at 194-195.

For nearly a century thereafter, the Court's Commerce Clause decisions dealt but rarely with the extent of Congress' power, and almost entirely with the Commerce Clause as a limit on state legislation that discriminated against interstate commerce. See, e. g., Veazie v. Moor, 55 U.S. 568, 14 How. 568, 573-575, 14 L. Ed. 545 (1853) (upholding a state-created steamboat monopoly [*554] because it involved regulation of wholly internal commerce); Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U.S. 1, 17, 20-22, 32 L. Ed. 346, 9 S. Ct. 6 (1888) (upholding a state prohibition on the manufacture of intoxicating liquor because the commerce power "does not comprehend the purely internal domestic [9] commerce of a State which is carried on between man and man within a State or between different parts of the same State"); see also L. Tribe, American Constitutional Law 306 (2d ed. 1988). Under this line of precedent, the Court held that certain categories of activity such as "production," "manufacturing," and "mining" were within the province of state governments, and thus were beyond the power of Congress under the Commerce Clause. See Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 121, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942) (describing development of Commerce Clause jurisprudence).

In 1887, Congress enacted the Interstate Commerce Act, 24 Stat. 379, and in 1890, Congress enacted the Sherman Antitrust Act, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. These laws ushered in a new era of federal regulation under the commerce power. When cases involving these laws first reached this Court, we imported from our negative Commerce Clause cases the approach that Congress could not regulate activities such as "production," "manufacturing," and "mining." See, e. g., United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 1, 12, 39 L. Ed. 325, 15 S. Ct. 249 (1895) ("Commerce [10] succeeds to manufacture, and is not part of it"); Carter v. Carter Coal Co., 298 U.S. 238, 304, 80 L. Ed. 1160, 56 S. Ct. 855 (1936) ("Mining brings the subject matter of commerce into existence. Commerce disposes of it"). Simultaneously, however, the Court held that, where the interstate and intrastate aspects of commerce were so mingled together that full regulation of interstate commerce required incidental regulation of intrastate commerce, the Commerce Clause authorized such regulation. See, e. g., Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342, 58 L. Ed. 1341, 34 S. Ct. 833 (1914).

In A. L. A. Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States, 295 U.S. 495, 550, 79 L. Ed. 1570, 55 S. Ct. 837 (1935), the Court struck down regulations that [*555] fixed the hours and wages of individuals employed by an intrastate business because the activity being regulated related to interstate commerce only indirectly. In doing so, the Court characterized the distinction between [1628] direct and indirect effects of intrastate transactions upon interstate commerce as "a fundamental one, essential to the maintenance of our constitutional system." Id., at 548. [11] Activities that affected interstate commerce directly were within Congress' power; activities that affected interstate commerce indirectly were beyond Congress' reach. Id., at 546. The justification for this formal distinction was rooted in the fear that otherwise "there would be virtually no limit to the federal power and for all practical purposes we should have a completely centralized government." Id., at 548.

Two years later, in the watershed case of NLRB v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 301 U.S. 1, 81 L. Ed. 893, 57 S. Ct. 615 (1937), the Court upheld the National Labor Relations Act against a Commerce Clause challenge, and in the process, departed from the distinction between "direct" and "indirect" effects on interstate commerce. Id., at 36-38 ("The question [of the scope of Congress' power] is necessarily one of degree"). The Court held that intrastate activities that "have such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that their control is essential or appropriate to protect that commerce from burdens and obstructions" are within Congress' power to regulate. Id., at 37.

REV_00258926

[*12] In United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 85 L. Ed. 609, 61 S. Ct. 451 (1941), the Court upheld the Fair Labor Standards Act, stating:

> "The power of Congress over interstate commerce is not confined to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce." Id., at 118.

[*556] See also United States v. Wrightwood Dairy Co., 315 U.S. 110, 119, 86 L. Ed. 726, 62 S. Ct. 523 (1942) (the commerce power "extends to those intrastate activities which in a substantial way interfere with or obstruct the exercise of the granted power").

In Wickard v. Filburn, the Court upheld the application of amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 to the production and consumption of homegrown wheat. 317 U.S. at 128-129. The Wickard Court explicitly rejected earlier distinctions between direct and indirect effects on interstate commerce, [13] stating:

> "Even if appellee's activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what might at some earlier time have been defined as 'direct' or 'indirect.'" Id., at 125.

The Wickard Court emphasized that although Filburn's own contribution to the demand for wheat may have been trivial by itself, that was not "enough to remove him from the scope of federal regulation where, as here, his contribution, taken together with that of many others similarly situated, is far from trivial." Id., at 127-128.

Jones & Laughlin Steel, Darby, and Wickard ushered in an era of Commerce Clause jurisprudence that greatly expanded the previously defined authority of Congress under that Clause. In part, this was a recognition of the great changes that had occurred in the way business was carried on in this country. Enterprises that had once been local or at most regional in nature had become national in scope. But the doctrinal change [14] also reflected a view that earlier Commerce Clause cases artificially had constrained the authority of Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

But even these modern-era precedents which have expanded congressional power under the Commerce Clause [*557] confirm that this power is subject to outer limits. In Jones & Laughlin Steel, the Court warned that the scope of the interstate commerce power "must be considered in the light of our dual system of government and may not be extended so as to embrace effects upon interstate commerce so indirect and remote that [1629] to embrace them, in view of our complex society, would effectually obliterate the distinction between what is national and what is local and create a completely centralized government." 301 U.S. at 37; see also Darby, supra, at 119-120 (Congress may regulate intrastate activity that has a "substantial effect" on interstate commerce); Wickard, supra, at 125 (Congress may regulate activity that "exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce"). Since that time, the Court has heeded that warning and undertaken to decide whether a rational basis existed for concluding that a [15] regulated activity sufficiently affected interstate commerce. See, e. g., Hodel v. Virginia Surface Mining & Reclamation Assn., Inc., 452 U.S. 264, 276-280, 69 L. Ed. 2d 1, 101 S. Ct. 2352 (1981); Perez v. United States, 402 U.S. 146, 155-156, 28 L. Ed. 2d 686, 91 S. Ct. 1357 (1971); Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294, 299-301, 13 L. Ed. 2d 290, 85 S. Ct. 377 (1964); Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc. v. United States, 379 U.S. 241, 252-253, 13 L. Ed. 2d 258, 85 S. Ct. 348 (1964). n2

REV_00258927

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 See also Hodel, 452 U.S. at 311 ("Simply because Congress may conclude that a particular activity substantially affects interstate commerce does not necessarily make it so") (REHNQUIST, J., concurring in judgment); Heart of Atlanta Motel, 379 U.S. at 273 ("Whether particular operations affect interstate commerce sufficiently to come under the constitutional power of Congress to regulate them is ultimately a judicial rather than a legislative question, and can be settled finally only by this Court") (Black, J., concurring).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*16] Similarly, in Maryland v. Wirtz, 392 U.S. 183, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1020, 88 S. Ct. 2017 (1968), the Court reaffirmed that "the power to regulate commerce, though broad indeed, has limits" that "the Court has ample power" to enforce. Id., at 196, overruled on other grounds, National League of Cities v. Usery, 426 U.S. 833, 49 L. Ed. 2d 245, 96 S. Ct. 2465 (1976), overruled by Garcia v. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit [*558] Authority, 469 U.S. 528, 83 L. Ed. 2d 1016, 105 S. Ct. 1005 (1985). In response to the dissent's warnings that the Court was powerless to enforce the limitations on Congress' commerce powers because "all activities affecting commerce, even in the minutest degree, [Wickard], may be regulated and controlled by Congress," 392 U.S. at 204 (Douglas, J., dissenting), the Wirtz Court replied that the dissent had misread precedent as "neither here nor in Wickard has the Court declared that Congress may use a relatively trivial impact on commerce as an excuse for broad general regulation of state or private activities," id., at 197, n. 27. Rather, "the Court has said only that where [17] a general regulatory statute bears a substantial relation to commerce, the de minimis character of individual instances arising under that statute is of no consequence." Ibid. (first emphasis added).

[2A]
Consistent with this structure, we have identified three broad categories of activity that Congress may regulate under its commerce power. Perez, supra, at 150; see also Hodel, supra, at 276-277. First, Congress may regulate the use of the channels of interstate commerce. See, e. g., Darby, 312 U.S. at 114; Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, at 256 ("'The authority of Congress to keep the channels of interstate commerce free from immoral and injurious uses has been frequently sustained, and is no longer open to question'" (quoting Caminetti v. United States, 242 U.S. 470, 491, 61 L. Ed. 442, 37 S. Ct. 192 (1917))). Second, Congress is empowered to regulate and protect the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, or persons or things in interstate commerce, even though the threat may come only [18] from intrastate activities. See, e. g., Shreveport Rate Cases, 234 U.S. 342, 34 S. Ct. 833, 58 L. Ed. 1341 (1914); Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U.S. 20, 56 L. Ed. 72, 32 S. Ct. 2 (1911) (upholding amendments to Safety Appliance Act as applied to vehicles used in intrastate commerce); Perez, supra, at 150 ("For example, the destruction of an aircraft (18 U.S.C. § 32), or . . . thefts from interstate shipments (18 U.S.C. § 659)"). Finally, Congress' commerce authority includes the power to regulate those activities [*559] having a substantial [1630] relation to interstate commerce, Jones & Laughlin Steel, 301 U.S. at 37, i. e., those activities that substantially affect interstate commerce,

REV_00258928

Wirtz, supra, at 196, n. 27.

Within this final category, admittedly, our case law has not been clear whether an activity must "affect" or "substantially affect" interstate commerce in order to be within Congress' power to regulate it under the Commerce Clause. Compare Preseault v. ICC, 494 U.S. 1, 17, 108 L. Ed. 2d 1, 110 S. Ct. 914 (1990), with Wirtz, supra, at 196, [19] n. 27 (the Court has never declared that "Congress may use a relatively trivial impact on commerce as an excuse for broad general regulation of state or private activities"). We conclude, consistent with the great weight of our case law, that the proper test requires an analysis of whether the regulated activity "substantially affects" interstate commerce.

[1B]
We now turn to consider the power of Congress, in the light of this framework, to enact § 922 (q). The first two categories of authority may be quickly disposed of: § 922(q) is not a regulation of the use of the channels of interstate commerce, nor is it an attempt to prohibit the interstate transportation of a commodity through the channels of commerce; nor can § 922(q) be justified as a regulation by which Congress has sought to protect an instrumentality of interstate commerce or a thing in interstate commerce. Thus, if § 922(q) is to be sustained, it must be under the third category as a regulation of an activity that substantially affects interstate commerce.

[2B]
First, we have upheld a wide variety of congressional Acts regulating intrastate economic activity where we have concluded that the activity substantially affected interstate [20] commerce. Examples include the regulation of intrastate coal mining; Hodel, supra, intrastate extortionate credit transactions, Perez, supra, restaurants utilizing substantial interstate supplies, McClung, supra, inns and hotels catering to interstate guests, Heart of Atlanta Motel, supra, and production [*560] and consumption of homegrown wheat, Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111, 87 L. Ed. 122, 63 S. Ct. 82 (1942). These examples are by no means exhaustive, but the pattern is clear. Where economic activity substantially affects interstate commerce, legislation regulating that activity will be sustained.

Even Wickard, which is perhaps the most far reaching example of Commerce Clause authority over intrastate activity, involved economic activity in a way that the possession of a gun in a school zone does not. Roscoe Filburn operated a small farm in Ohio, on which, in the year involved, he raised 23 acres of wheat. It was his practice to sow winter wheat in the fall, and after harvesting it in July to sell a portion of the crop, to feed part of it to poultry and livestock on the farm, to use some in making flour for home consumption, and to keep the [21] remainder for seeding future crops. The Secretary of Agriculture assessed a penalty against him under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 because he harvested about 12 acres more wheat than his allotment under the Act permitted. The Act was designed to regulate the volume of wheat moving in interstate and foreign commerce in order to avoid surpluses and shortages, and concomitant fluctuation in wheat prices, which had previously obtained. The Court said, in an opinion sustaining the application of the Act to Filburn's activity:

> "One of the primary purposes of the Act in question was to increase the market price of wheat and to that end to limit the volume thereof that could affect the market. It can hardly be denied that a factor of such volume and variability as home-consumed wheat would have a substantial influence on price and market conditions. This may arise because being in marketable condition such wheat overhangs the market and, if induced by rising prices, tends to flow into the market and check price increases. But if we assume that it is never marketed, it supplies a need of the man who grew it which would otherwise be reflected by purchases in the open market. [*561] [22] Home-grown wheat in this

REV_00258929

Research - Race Cases

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box 51
Folder 1

REV_00258976

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Federal Cases, Combined Courts
Terms: shaw and adarand and date(is 2001) (Edit Search)

*2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3256, **

BARBARA GRUTTER, Plaintiff, vs. LEE BOLLINGER, JEFFREY LEHMAN, DENNIS SHIELDS, REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, and THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LAW SCHOOL, Defendants.

Civil Action No. 97-CV-75928-DT

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, SOUTHERN DIVISION

2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3256

March 27, 2001, Decided

DISPOSITION: [*1] Plaintiffs' request for declaratory relief granted. Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief granted. Parties' various motions for summary judgment denied, except that motion of individual defendants for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity granted.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: The matter came on for trial on plaintiff's complaint alleging defendants' law school admissions policy discriminated against her on the basis of race in violation of equal protection under U.S. Const. amend. XIV, and that defendants violated 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d. The individual defendants moved for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and defendant board of regents moved for summary judgment on the basis of U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity.

OVERVIEW: Plaintiff, a Caucasian, applied for admission to defendant law school, a state educational institution receiving federal funds. Plaintiff sued alleging her application was rejected because defendants, the law school, its dean and director of admissions, the university president and the university regents, used race as a predominant factor in determining law school admissions, giving minority applicants a significantly greater chance of admission than students with similar credentials from disfavored racial groups. Following a bench trial the court found that: defendants placed a heavy emphasis on race in deciding whether to accept or reject an applicant; under the Bakke analysis a state educational institution's desire to assemble a racially diverse student body was not a compelling state interest; achievement of racial diversity in defendant law school's admissions was not a compelling state interest because it was not a remedy for past discrimination; and, even if it was, it had not been narrowly tailored to serve that interest. With respect to intervenors' case the court held that remedying past or present societal discrimination was not a compelling state interest.

OUTCOME: The court granted plaintiff declaratory and injunctive relief, holding that defendant law school's race conscious admissions policy violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The court enjoined further use of race as an admissions factor, denied defendant regents Eleventh Amendment immunity, but granted individual defendants summary judgement on the basis of qualified immunity.

CORE TERMS: law school, score, underrepresented, diversity, undergraduate, odds, dean, critical mass, gap, ethnic, median, intervenors, grid, diverse, educational, grades, affirmative file [sic] are also important. I also like to see people who have been challenged in one way or the other and have faced up to that challenge in a positive way."

REV_00258977

The law school's admissions policy is also succinctly described in the University of Michigan Law School Bulletin. The bulletin for the 1996-1997 academic year, which was admitted as Trial Exhibit 6, states at page 81: n7

> All applications are read in their entirety, and all of the information elicited by the application is factored into the admission decision. All admissions are made with the goal of forming a class with an exciting and productive mix of students who will enhance the educational experience for each other and for the School. Law School Admission Test (LSAT) scores and undergraduate course work [*19] and performance are relied on heavily, as are comparative studies of the past performance of similar students at the Law School. Serious regard is also given to an applicant's promise of making a notable contribution to the class by way of a particular strength, attainment, or characteristic -- e.g., an unusual intellectual achievement, employment experience, nonacademic performance, or personal background. The guiding purpose for selection among applicants is to make the School a better a livelier place in which to learn and to improve its service to the profession and the public.
>
> In addition to its own interest in forming a class which is strengthened by the talents and diversity of its members, Michigan recognizes the public interest in increasing the number of lawyers from groups which the faculty identifies as significantly underrepresented in the legal profession. In particular, we strongly encourage prospective students who are African American, Mexican American, Native American, or Puerto Rican and raised on the U.S. mainland to apply. Such applicants are invited to contact the Admissions Office for further information about the School's affirmative efforts to increase enrollment [*20] from among these groups. Similarly, the Law School welcomes applications from all persons without regard to their sex, religious affiliation, national origin or ancestry, age, marital status, sexual orientation, or handicap. Every Law School matriculant must be a graduate of an accredited college or university.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n7 The identical statement appears at page 81 of the law school bulletin for 1995-1997. See Trial Exhibit 7.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In the 1997-1999 law school bulletin (Exhibit 8, p. 85), the first paragraph of this passage is repeated, but the second paragraph was rewritten as follows:

> Based on its years of teaching experience, the Michigan faculty has determined that the quality of classroom analysis and discussion is enhanced by the multiplicity of perspectives and experiences that students bring with them. Each year, the Law School enrolls a talented and diverse class of students, and the admissions office considers the ways in which a potential student will contribute to the diversity of the Law School as [*21] one of the factors in its admissions decisions. The Law School welcomes applications from all persons without regard to their sex, religious affiliation, national origin or ancestry, age, marital status, sexual orientation, or handicap. Every Law School matriculant must be a graduate of an accredited college or university.

REV_00258986

2.

At trial, a number of witnesses testified as to the admissions procedures prior to the adoption of the 1992 policy; the reasons why, and the process by which, the 1992 policy was adopted; and the manner in which the 1992 policy has been administered. This testimony assisted the court in understanding the genesis of the 1992 policy and how it works in practice.

Allan Stillwagon was the law school's Director of Admissions from 1979 to 1990. He testified that during his tenure admissions decisions were made in accordance with the policy described at pp. 85-86 of the 1988-89 Law School Announcement (Exhibit 55), which states:

> One half of the entering class is selected primarily on the basis of a prediction of their academic success in law study. The prediction is calculated on the basis of Law School Admission Test scores, undergraduate records, and studies [*22] of the past performance of previous students at the Law School. . . .
>
> The other half of the class will be chosen from a group of several hundred applicants whose grades and test scores qualify them for further consideration. The grades and scores necessary to gain admission to this pool vary from year to year, but the academic credentials of all who are included are invariably strong.
>
> Selections among applicants in the pool are made for the purpose of making the School a livelier place to learn and for improving its service to the profession and the public. Specifically, the School seeks those students who are more likely to contribute affirmatively to the learning of others by reason of their unusual intellectual attainments, significant employment experience or outstanding non-academic achievements, demonstration of emotional maturity and self-discipline, unusual social background, or exceptional capacity to benefit from a particular phase of the School's program. . . .
>
> In administering its admissions policy, the Law School recognizes the racial imbalance now existing in the legal profession and the public interest in increasing the number of lawyers from the ethnic and cultural [*23] minorities significantly underrepresented in the profession. Minorities are strongly encouraged to apply and to call upon Assistant Dean Stillwagon for information and assistance. Black, Chicano, Native American, and many Puerto Rican applicants are automatically considered for a special admissions program designed to encourage and increase the enrollment of minorities.

Mr. Stillwagon testified that under this system, which was in effect throughout his tenure, applicants were selected from one of three groups. The first group consisted of applicants who were chosen based on "the numbers," that is, their LSAT scores and UGPA. The second consisted of a "pool" of candidates who had lower numbers but other interesting qualities. The third, known as "special admissions," was for minority candidates who did not fall within the other two groups. According to Mr. Stillwagon, approximately one-half of the minority applicants who were admitted came from the first two groups, and the other half came from the third. The "special admissions" program was adopted in order to increase minority enrollment at the law school. n8 Mr. Stillwagon indicated that the law school had a "goal" or "target" [*24] whereby 10-12% of the students of each entering class should be Black, Chicano, Native American, and mainland Puerto Rican. The law school faculty increased this percentage in the 1970s from 10% to 10-12% because they believed it necessary to increase the representation of minorities in the legal profession. Mr. Stillwagon testified that he had no discretion to disregard this policy, and that the policy was considered flexible only to the extent that the number of minority admittees could deviate by three or four students on either side of the target range. Mr. Stillwagon also testified that the 10-12% target could be achieved only through the special admissions program due to the "considerable differences" in academic credentials between the minority and non-minority applicants.

REV_00258987

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 Trial Exhibit 53 is a document entitled "The History of Special Admissions at the University of Michigan Law School, 1966-1981." This document traces the history of the law school's efforts to enroll a certain percentage of students from particular, identified minority groups during this time period. Beginning in 1966, the law school faculty became concerned about the low numbers of black students. For the first time, "those who are Negroes or from disadvantaged backgrounds" who were on the waiting list for admission were given preference. Id. at 5. In 1970, the dean of admissions indicated he would seek to admit black and Mexican-American students "who fall below the admission standards regularly applied" in sufficient numbers to constitute 10% of the entering class. Id. at 16. Exhibit 53 shows that from the late 1960s to the early 1980s the law school faculty frequently debated the issue of special admissions -- the reasons for the policy, how it should be administered, the minority groups to which it was directed, and the "target" percentage the law school should aim to achieve. Over the years, the law school faculty apparently reached a consensus that black and Hispanic students should constitute between 10% and 12.5% of the entering class. See id. at 16, 19, 22, 27, 31, 34, 45, 48-50, 57. In 1975 the law school faculty formally adopted a special admissions policy that identified "Blacks, Chicanos, American Indians, and Puerto Rican Americans" as the groups which "have been substantially underrepresented in the student body and the legal profession" and directed that members from these groups constitute 10-12% of the entering class. See id. at 48-49. The dean of the law school, Terrance Sandalow, reaffirmed the 10-12% goal in a memorandum to the faulty in 1978. See id. at 53-55.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*25]

Mr. Stillwagon testified that Exhibits 112 and 113 show admissions statistics for 1988-1989 and 1989-1990, respectively. These reports to the law school Committee of Visitors show significant differences in the numerical qualifications between "regular" admissions (i.e., students admitted based on LSAT and UGPA and those admitted from the "pool") and "special" admissions. In 1988, the regular admissions had a median LSAT score of 43 and a median UGPA of 3.58, whereas the special admissions had a median LSAT score of 34 and a median UGPA of 3.05. This gap in the numbers was essentially the same in 1989 and 1990. n9 On cross-examination, Mr. Stillwagon testified that explicit consideration of race was necessary since otherwise very few minority students would have been admitted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 In 1989, regular admissions had a median LSAT score of 43 and a median UGPA of 3.60, while special admissions had a median LSAT score of 35 and a median UGPA of 3.06. In 1990, regular admissions had a median LSAT score of 45 and a median UGPA of 3.60, while special admissions had a median LSAT score of 38 and a median UGPA of 3.16.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*26]

Dennis Shields succeeded Allan Stillwagon as the director of the law school's admissions office in 1991 and he held this position until 1998. Mr. Shields testified that his memo entitled "The Gospel According to Dennis" was intended to give newcomers to his staff some guidance in reading application files. Mr. Shields did not mention race in this memo because this is not a "primary consideration" in making admissions decisions. Mr. Shields indicated that he did not tell his staff to strive to admit a particular percentage of minority students, but that an applicant's race was considered along with all other factors. Mr. Shields said that he never spoke with the law school dean about the number or percentage of minority students who should be admitted, although the dean did tell him that approximately one-third of the class should consist of Michigan residents because the law school is a state institution. Mr. Shields also testified that the minority and non-minority admittees were all well qualified for admission.

REV_00258988

On cross-examination, Mr. Shields was asked about the manner in which he would use the so-called "daily reports," an example of which was admitted as Exhibit 10. These [*27] reports provide an overview, as of the day the report is generated, of the number of applications and their current status. That is, one can see at a glance the number of applications received to date, the number offered admission, the number rejected, the number on the waiting list, and so on. While the first page of the report provides an overview for the total applicant pool, each of the next seven pages breaks down the information by the following racial categories: Native American, Black/African American, Caucasian/White, Mexican American, Other Hispanic, Asian American, and Puerto Rican American. Page 9 is devoted to "Other/Non-Citizen" and page 10 is "unknown." The last four pages break down the applicants by gender and by their status as either Michigan or Non-Michigan residents. Mr. Shields testified that as an admissions season progressed, he would consult the daily reports more and more frequently in order to keep track of the racial and ethnic composition of the class. This was done in order to ensure that a "critical mass" of minority students were enrolled so as to realize the educational benefits of a diverse student body. Mr. Shields could not say what percentage was [*28] needed in order to achieve this goal. He doubted if five percent would be enough but thought that 10% might suffice. While Mr. Shields testified that he did not seek to admit a particular number or percentage of underrepresented minority students, he acknowledged that during his tenure at least 11% of each entering class consisted of African American, Hispanic and Native American students.

Mr. Shields' attention was drawn to Exhibit 15, which is the law school's admissions grids for the class entering in 1995. Like the law school's daily reports, the admissions grids are broken down by racial groups. In each cell of each grid, one can see the number of applicants who applied, the number who were accepted, and the number who enrolled for any given combination of LSAT score and undergraduate GPA. When asked why most white applicants are rejected and most black applicants are accepted in the mid-ranges of LSAT scores and UGPA, Mr. Shields acknowledged that race does account for some of the difference. n10

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 Mr. Shields also acknowledged that, at his deposition, he testified that race "generally" explains the difference in admissions rates between minority and non-minority groups. The comparison during Mr. Shields' cross-examination was the difference in admission rates between white and black applicants with LSAT scores between 154 and 169 and with UGPA's between 3.25 and 4.00. In these cells nearly all of the African American applicants (48 of 52) were accepted, whereas a much smaller percentage of the Caucasian applicants (379 of 1437) were accepted. In the same cluster of cells, 30 of 40 Mexican American applicants were accepted; 7 of 14 Native American applicants were accepted; and 3 of 5 Puerto Rican applicants were accepted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*29]

Erica Munzel replaced Dennis Shields as the director of the law school's admissions office in 1998. She testified that she feels bound by the law school's 1992 admissions policy, including the provision that calls for the enrollment of a "critical mass of minority students." See Exhibit 4, p. 12. Ms. Munzel testified that a "critical mass" means "meaningful numbers" or "meaningful representation," which she understands to mean a number that is sufficient so that the minority students can contribute to classroom dialog and not feel isolated. When pressed to express this concept in numerical terms, Ms. Munzel stated that there is no number or percentage, or range of numbers or percentages, which constitute critical mass. However, she stated that there must be more than a "token" number of minority students, since small numbers of students cannot contribute in the manner foreseen by the law school's diversity policy.

REV_00258989

Ms. Munzel also indicated that she must consider the race of the applicants because a critical mass of minority students could not be enrolled if admissions decisions were based primarily on LSAT scores and UGPA's. This is apparent from Exhibit 14, which Ms. Munzel [*30] acknowledged shows the median LSAT scores and UGPA's for the students enrolled in 1994 and 1995. These figures show the same gap in the numbers between minority and non-minority admittees as is shown in similar exhibits for previous years. n11 Ms. Munzel testified that only ten minority students per entering class would be admitted if admissions decisions were driven by the numbers.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n11 See, e.g., Exhibit 112 (1988-1989), Exhibit 113 (1989-1990), Exhibit 114 (1990-1991), Exhibit 115 (1992), Exhibit 116 (1993). Exhibit 14 shows that in the 1994 entering class, white students had a median LSAT score of 168 and a median UGPA of 3.57, while the corresponding figures were 157 and 2.97 for African American students, and 162 and 3.26 for Mexican American students. In the 1995 entering class, white students had a median LSAT score of 167 and a median UGPA of 3.59, while the corresponding figures were 155 and 3.18 for African American students, and 159 and 3.35 for Mexican American students.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In deciding whether to [*31] admit an applicant, Ms. Munzel stated that she reviews the entire file. In addition to grades and test scores, she also considers the strength of the undergraduate curriculum, the college attended, the personal statements, letters of recommendation, and the applicant's background and experiences. The student's race is considered because it is relevant to achieving diversity in the entering class. Ms. Munzel stated that she was never told by the dean or by the faculty to admit a particular number or percentage of minority students, but she does consult the daily reports (such as Exhibits 11 and 12) to make sure that admissions goals, including those regarding the admission of a critical mass of minority students, are being achieved.

The court also heard testimony from Lee Bollinger and Jeffrey Lehman as to the reasons why race is considered in the admissions process. Mr. Bollinger was the dean of the law school from 1987 to 1994, and he has been the president of the University of Michigan since 1997. Mr. Lehman succeeded Mr. Bollinger as the dean of the law school in 1994, and he continues to hold this position. President Bollinger testified that in the fall of 1991 he convened a faculty [*32] committee to review the law school's admissions policy. n12 President Bollinger sought to ensure that the policy complied with the Supreme Court's ruling in Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750, 98 S. Ct. 2733 (1978). He believes that it is appropriate for an applicant's race to be considered because the law school seeks a student body with diverse backgrounds and perspectives.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 It was this committee's report and recommendation that became the law school's official admissions policy when it was adopted, unanimously, by the law faculty in April 1992. See Exhibit 4 (cover sheet).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Dean Lehman testified that racial diversity in the student body is an important part of one's education at the law school because exposure to students of various races and perspectives helps students to understand and be sympathetic to differing points of view. He described racial diversity as "part of the general commitment to diversity." Dean Lehman agreed with the testimony offered by other witnesses to the effect [*33] that the law school seeks to admit a critical mass of underrepresented minority students, particularly those from groups which have been discriminated against historically. He was unable to quantify "critical mass" in terms of numbers or percentages, or ranges of numbers or percentages, but indicated that critical mass means "meaningful numbers," that is, numbers such that the minority students do not feel isolated or like spokespersons for their race, and feel comfortable discussing issues freely based on their personal experiences. He doubted whether critical mass would be present if only five percent of a class consisted of minority students, and he acknowledged that minority students have constituted at least 11% of every entering class since 1992.

REV_00258990

When asked about the extent to which race is considered in admissions, Dean Lehman testified that this varies from one application file to another. In some files the applicant's race may play no role, while in others it may be a "determinative" factor. n13 Dean Lehman indicated that race is taken into consideration to the extent necessary to achieve a critical mass, although he could not quantify this in terms of numbers or percentages. [*34] While Dean Lehman reviews the daily admissions reports with the admissions director, he said he has not given any direction as to a number or percentage of minority students who should be admitted. Dean Lehman also stated that a critical mass of minority candidates cannot be admitted unless race is explicitly considered, due to the gap in LSAT scores and UGPA's between minority and non-minority students. He fears that minority enrollment would drop to "token levels" if race could not be considered, and in this context he pointed to the experience of the University of California at Berkeley, where minority enrollment dropped sharply after passage of Proposition 209.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Dean Lehman conceded that the different admission rates for different racial groups is "partly indicative" of the extent to which race is considered. Referring to Ex. 15 (the law school's 1995 grids), Dean Lehman acknowledged that all African American applicants with an LSAT score of 159-160 and a UGPA of 3.00 and above were admitted, whereas only one of 54 Asian applicants and four of 190 Caucasian applicants with these qualifications were admitted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*35]

The court also heard extensive testimony from Professor Richard Lempert, the law school professor who chaired the faculty admissions committee that drafted the 1992 admissions policy. n14 Professor Lempert testified that the admissions committee was charged with examining the law school's admissions policy and ensuring that it complied with the Supreme Court's ruling in Bakke. The 1992 written policy, which was conceived in a "very deliberative process," was debated and then adopted unanimously by the full faculty. It remains in effect today.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 The other members of the committee were Don Herzog, Jeffrey Lehman, Don Regan, Ted Shaw and Dennis Shields. See Exhibit 4, p. 14.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Professor Lempert emphasized that the law school seeks to admit an interesting and dynamic class, which has a certain "synergy" that is greater than the sum of its parts. That is, the law school seeks students with a diversity of interests and backgrounds in order to enhance classroom discussion and the educational experience of students [*36] and faculty, both in and outside the classroom. In Professor Lempert's view, racial diversity is an important part of "perspective" or "experiential" diversity. A critical mass is needed so that minority students do not feel that they must be spokespersons for their race.

REV_00258991

When asked about the policy's "commitment to racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups which have been historically discriminated against," see Exhibit 4, p. 12, Professor Lempert stated that this was not intended as a remedy for past discrimination, but as a means of including students who may bring to the law school a perspective different from that of members of groups which have not been the victims of such discrimination. n15 Professor Lempert indicated that race is one element in the admissions decision-making process, but that some minority applicants would be admitted even if their race were not considered. He believes that race is considered only to the extent necessary to achieve critical mass.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n15 Professor Lempert indicated that other groups, such as Asians and Jews, have also been discriminated against, but they were not mentioned in the law school's admissions policy because members of these groups are already being admitted to the law school in significant numbers.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*37]

Exhibit 34 is a draft of the admissions policy, which contains several provisions omitted from the final version. One such provision, on page 13 of the draft, states:

> Our goal is to have substantial and meaningful racial and ethnic diversity, but we do not wish to exhaust the positions that are open to non-grid diversity admittees in promoting racial and ethnic diversity. Nor are we insensitive to the competition among all students for admissions to this law school. Thus while we set no floors or ceilings on the numbers or proportion of students who are to be admitted as minority diversity candidates, in making judgments about admitting such candidates the Admissions Officer and Admissions Committee should be sensitive to such factors as the proportion of minority students who would be attending Michigan without a diversity admissions program and the strength of the credentials that various minority candidates bring. Also it is important to note that in the past we seem to have achieved the kinds of benefits that we associate with racial and ethnic diversity from classes in which the proportion of African American, Hispanic and Native American members has been between about 11% [*38] and 17% of total enrollees.

Professor Lempert testified that the "11% to 17%" figure, which is the range he believes constitutes critical mass, was omitted from the final version of the admissions policy because percentages were too rigid and could be misconstrued as a quota. Another provision omitted for the same reason stated on page 12 of the draft that "non-grid admittees admitted for diversity purposes shall not exceed 20% of the expected matriculants in a class." One faculty member, Don Regan, argued for retaining the "numbers on the 'target range' . . . for a variety of reasons, including candor." See Exhibit 32, p. 1.

The final witness who testified about the law school's policy, and the reasons for the inclusion of race as a factor in admissions decisions, was Kent Syverud. He was a professor at the law school when the 1992 admissions policy was adopted, and he is now the dean of Vanderbilt Law School. He has also submitted expert reports on the educational benefits of diversity. See Exhibits 153, 154, 155. Like the other witnesses who testified on this subject, Dean Syverud believes that racial diversity is part of the diversity of perspectives needed to [*39] enhance the "classroom dynamic." Also like the other witnesses, he indicated that critical mass cannot be quantified, but that a professor knows when it is present because minority students feel free to express their views, rather than to state "expected views" or "politically correct views." Dean Syverud also indicated that when a critical mass of minority students are present, racial stereotypes are dismantled because non-minority students see that there is no "minority viewpoint"; they see, in other words, that there is a diversity of viewpoints among minority students.

3.

While defendants concede that race is a factor in the admissions process, they have consistently argued that race is simply one of many factors and not a "trump card." Plaintiffs, on the other hand, have argued that race is a "super factor" in the admissions process. In an attempt to quantify the extent to which race actually has been considered during the years in question, the parties presented expert testimony, and expert reports, from two statisticians. Plaintiffs presented Dr. Kinley Larntz, a professor emeritus in the Department of Applied Statistics at the University of Minnesota. n16 Defendants presented [*40] Dr. Stephen Raudenbush, a professor of education at the University of Michigan. n17 Both were qualified as experts in statistics and both testified at great length.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 Dr. Larntz' expert reports were admitted as Exhibits 137-142. Exhibit 143 consists of the tables and charts of Dr. Larntz' "powerpoint presentation."

n17 Dr. Raudenbush's expert reports were admitted as Exhibits 145-150.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Dr. Larntz analyzed admissions data provided by the law school. This data consists of the "admissions grids" for each of the years in question (1995-2000). As noted previously, these grids show the number of applicants and the number of admittees for all combinations of undergraduate GPA and LSAT score. n18 The UGPA is presented along the vertical axis in quarter-point increments (as well as "below 2.00" and "No GPA"); the LSAT score is presented along the vertical axis in two- or three-point increments (as well as "170-Above," "120-145" and "No LSAT"). The ten UGPA rows and twelve LSAT columns in these grids produce 120 [*41] "cells" with admissions data. For each of the years in question, the law school compiled one admissions grid for all applicants, as well as separate grids for various racial groups. n19

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n18 The law school grids also indicate the "yield," that is, the number of admittees who enrolled.

n19 For example, separate grids are compiled for Native Americans, African Americans, Caucasian Americans, Mexican Americans, Hispanic Americans, Asian/Pacific Island Americans, Puerto Rican Applicants, and for other groups as well.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Dr. Larntz used this extensive numerical data, compiled by the law school, to make "cell-by-cell" comparisons between applicants of different races to determine by logistic regression analysis whether a statistically significant relationship exists between race and admission rates. Because the grids show the number of applicants and the number of admittees in each cell, and because different grids have been prepared for various racial groups, it is possible to make cross-racial comparisons of applicants [*42] with closely similar "academic credentials" or "numbers." To make this comparison, Dr. Larntz calculated the odds of admission for Caucasian applicants and compared them with the odds of admission for applicants of other races in order to calculate the "relative odds of acceptance" for each racial group. Caucasians were the "comparison group" -- that is, each group's odds of acceptance were calculated relative to those of Caucasians. Relative odds, or an "odds ratio," greater than 1.0 would indicate that a member of the racial group in question has a greater chance of admission than does a Caucasian applicant. Relative odds less than 1.0 would indicate the opposite. "For perspective, attaining a relative odds of 2 or 3 for cure of a disease is often the goal of a medical study. That is, a drug that doubled or tripled the odds of cure would be of great value. Double and triple digit relative odds are simply enormous!" Exhibit 137, p. 8.

REV_00258993

Dr. Larntz calculated the relative odds of acceptance for various racial groups for each of the years in question. The results of these calculations, and the grids themselves, are presented in his expert reports. See Exhibits 137 and 138 (1995-98), [*43] 139 (1999), 141 (2000). For each of the years in question, the relative odds of acceptance for Native American, African American, Mexican American and Puerto Rican applicants were many times greater than for Caucasian applicants. n20 Dr. Larntz characterized these relative odds as "extremely large." He concluded that in 1995-2000, > membership in certain ethnic groups is an extremely strong factor in the decision for acceptance. Native American, African American, Mexican American, and Puerto Rican applicants in the same LSAT x GPA grid cell as a Caucasian American applicant have odds of acceptance that is many, many (tens to hundreds) times that of a similarly situated Caucasian American applicant.

Exhibit 137, p. 9; Exhibit 139, p. 7; Exhibit 141, p. 7. This conclusion remained the same even when Dr. Larntz controlled for other factors, such as Michigan residency status, gender, and whether the applicant received an application fee waiver. See Exhibit 137, p. 11; Exhibit 139, p. 8; Exhibit 141, p. 10. At trial Dr. Larntz characterized his relative odds figures as "enormous" and as showing that a "tremendous advantage" was given to applicants from these minority groups [*44] in each of the years in question.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n20 In 1995, the relative odds of acceptance were 61.37 for Native Americans, 257.93 for African Americans, 81.90 for Mexican Americans, and 37.86 for Puerto Ricans. In 1996, the relative odds were 29.81 for Native Americans, 313.59 for African Americans, 81.46 for Mexican Americans, and 45.40 for Puerto Ricans. In 1997, the relative odds were 37.37 for Native Americans, 53.49 for African Americans, 17.55 for Mexican Americans, and 32.78 for Puerto Ricans. In 1998, the relative odds were 23.98 for Native Americans, 132.16 for African Americans, 23.53 for Mexican Americans, and 17.84 for Puerto Ricans. See Exhibit 137, pp. 23-26. In 1999, the relative odds were 32.05 for Native Americans, 206.45 for African Americans, 43.77 for Mexican Americans, and 41.71 for Puerto Ricans. See Exhibit 139, p. 21. And in 2000, the relative odds were 24.61 for Native Americans, 443.26 for African Americans, 16.99 for Mexican Americans, and 28.63 for Puerto Ricans.

Dr. Larntz cautioned that the relative odds do not express the "number of times greater" a minority applicant's chances of admission are as compared to those of a Caucasian applicant. For the 1995 relative odds, for example, if a Caucasian applicant has a 6-7% chance of being admitted, an African American with a similar index score would have a 93% chance of being admitted. If a Caucasian applicant has a 10% chance of being admitted, a Mexican American applicant with a similar index score would have a 90% chance of being admitted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*45]

In addition to calculating relative odds of acceptance, Dr. Larntz also prepared graphs which plotted the probability of acceptance against the selection index. The selection index, or simply "index," is a combination of an applicant's undergraduate GPA and LSAT score. As noted above, the law school's admissions policy states that "bluntly, the higher one's index score, the greater should be one's chances of being admitted. The lower the score, the greater the risk the candidate poses." Exhibit 4, p. 4. Each of Dr. Larntz' graphs plots the relationship between the selection index and the probability of acceptance for Caucasian applicants and for applicants from one minority group for comparison. As one would expect, these graphs show that for all races the higher one's index score, the greater one's chances of being admitted. However, each graph shows a significant gap between the lines plotted for the Caucasian and certain minority applicants. n21 Dr. Larntz concluded that "all the graphs comparing Native American, African American, Mexican American, and Puerto Rican applicants to Caucasian American applicants show wide separation indicating a much higher probability of acceptance [*46] for the particular ethnic group at a given selection index value." Exhibit 137, p. 14; Exhibit 139, pp. 9-10; Exhibit 141. pp. 9-10. Based on all of his analysis, Dr. Larntz concluded that membership in these racial groups "is an extremely strong factor in the decision for acceptance." Exhibit 137, p. 14, and that applicants from these minority groups "are given an extremely large allowance for admission" as compared to Caucasian applicants. Exhibit 139, p. 13; Exhibit 141, p. 13. Dr. Larntz found this to be the case for each of the years in question (1995-2000).

REV_00258994

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n21 See Exhibit 137, Figures 9, 10, 11, 14, 17, 18, 19, 22, 25, 26, 27, 30, 33, 34, 35, 38; Exhibit 139, Figures 3, 4, 5, 8; Exhibit 141, Figures 3, 4, 5, 8.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

At trial Dr. Larntz made certain cell-by-cell comparisons to highlight the difference in acceptance rates for Caucasian and minority applicants. For example, in 1995 African American and Caucasian applicants with LSAT scores of 161-163 were accepted in clearly disparate proportions at every [*47] UGPA level. Two of the three African American applicants with a UGPA of 2.5-2.74 were accepted, whereas none of the seven Caucasian applicants were accepted. All of the four African American applicants with a UGPA of 2.75-2.99 were accepted, whereas none of the 14 Caucasian applicants were accepted. Seven of the eight African American applicants with a UGPA of 3.00-3.24 were accepted, whereas two of the 42 Caucasian applicants were accepted. All of the four African American applicants with a UGPA of 3.25-3.49 were accepted, whereas five of the 126 Caucasian applicants were accepted. Five of the six African American applicants with a UGPA of 3.50-3.74 were accepted, whereas 14 of the 161 Caucasian applicants were accepted. All of the three African American applicants with a UGPA of 3.75 and above were accepted, whereas eight of the 93 Caucasian applicants were accepted. See Exhibit 143, slide 27.

Dr. Larntz highlighted similarly disparate rates of admission between African American and Caucasian applicants by holding the UGPA constant and showing the admissions figures for applicants with various LSAT scores. Dr. Larntz' Exhibit 143, slide 28, compares applicants in 1995 from these [*48] two racial groups with UGPA's of 3.25-3.49. In this UGPA range, of six African American applicants with an LSAT score of 148-150, two were admitted; of 16 Caucasian applicants, none was admitted. Of seven African American applicants with an LSAT score of 151-153, three were admitted; of 24 Caucasian applicants, none was admitted. Of five African American applicants with an LSAT score of 154-155, four were admitted; of 51 Caucasian applicants, one was admitted. Of ten African American applicants with an LSAT score of 156-158, all were admitted; of 51 Caucasian applicants, one was admitted. Of three African American applicants with an LSAT score of 159-160, all were admitted; of 61 Caucasian applicants, one was admitted. Of four African American applicants with an LSAT score of 161-163, all were admitted; of 126 Caucasian applicants, five were admitted.

Dr. Larntz showed similar discrepancies in the admissions rates between Caucasians and members of other minority groups in each of the years in question. See, e.g., Exhibit 143, action, non-minority, racially, classification, student body, faculty, cell, admit, University of Michigan Law School, enrollment, classroom, viewpoint, candidate, dropped

REV_00258995

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection
See U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Discrimination in Education
See 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review
Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
All racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
The legal analysis of a claim of discrimination on the basis of race under both the Fourteenth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, and 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, is the same under both claims.

Governments : Courts : Judicial Precedents
The Marks framework cannot be applied to a case where the various Justices' reasons for concurring in the judgment are not merely different by degree, but are so fundamentally different as to not be comparable in terms of "narrowness."

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review
Strict scrutiny applies to all racial classifications, regardless of the level of government using the classification.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
Racial classifications are unconstitutional unless they are intended to remedy carefully documented effects of past discrimination.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
Racial classifications which are not strictly limited in duration are highly suspect.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection
A straight quota system is not narrowly tailored under any interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review
A "close fit" is required between the means and the ends that the U.S. Constitution demands in order for a racial classification to pass muster under strict scrutiny analysis.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review
The term "narrowly tailored" maybe used to require consideration of whether lawful alternative and less restrictive means could have been used. The classification at issue must 'fit' with greater precision than any alternative means.

slides 47-51. He concluded that the law school gives an "incredibly large allowance" to Native American, African American, Mexican American and Puerto Rican [*49] applicants, as compared to Caucasian applicants with similar undergraduate GPA's, LSAT scores, and residency status.

Dr. Raudenbush testified as defendants' statistician. He suggested that Dr. Larntz' analysis of the admissions data is flawed because it did not consider the effect of "unquantifiable" factors such as applicants' letters of recommendation and essays, or the reputation of the applicants' undergraduate institutions. In addition, Dr. Raudenbush criticized Dr. Larntz' odds ratio analysis because it disregarded cells in which all applicants were accepted, or all were rejected, and this resulted in the loss of information. n22 He also suggested that because the odds ratios vary from one cell to another, an overall or "composite" odds ratio is not informative. In addition, Dr. Raudenbush was suspicious of the odds ratios because they vary widely from one year to another, whereas the actual percentage of applicants admitted (at least for African Americans and Caucasians) has remained relatively stable. See Exhibit 194.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n22 Dr. Larntz testified that he disregarded these cells because they do not contain "comparative information." That is, if all applicants in a particular cell are accepted, or if all are rejected, then there is no basis for calculating the odds ratio.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*50]

Aside from criticizing Dr. Larntz' analysis, the primary focus of Dr. Raudenbush's own analysis and testimony was on the predicted effect of eliminating race as a factor in the law school's admissions process. In Dr. Raudenbush's view, a "race-blind" admissions system would have a "very dramatic," negative effect on minority admissions but only a slight effect on non-minority admissions, due to the vastly greater number of non-minority applicants. In the year 2000, 35% of underrepresented minority applicants and 40% of non-minority applicants were admitted. See Exhibit 187. Dr. Raudenbush predicted that if race were not considered, then only 10% of underrepresented minority applicants and 44% of non-minority applicants would be admitted. If correct, this would mean that in the year 2000 only 46 underrepresented minority applicants would have been admitted (instead of 170 who actually were admitted), of whom only 16 would enroll (instead of 58 who actually enrolled). Under this scenario, underrepresented minority students would have constituted 4% of the entering class in 2000, instead of 14.5% as actually occurred. See Exhibit 189.

B. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of [*51] Law

From this testimony and documentary evidence, the court makes the following findings and conclusions.

1.

The law school clearly considers an applicant's race in making admissions decisions. While the reasons for doing so have changed somewhat over time, the law school has given some degree of preference to members of particular racial groups for more than 30 years. n23 In the early years of affirmative action, the law school extended this preference only to African American applicants. In the years since then, the preference has been broadened to include Native Americans, Mexican Americans and mainland Puerto Ricans. It does not appear that any preference is given to members of any other racial groups.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 Professor Lempert has written that the law school has considered applicants' race since 1966. See Exhibit 166, p. 2.

REV_00258996

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The current stated reason for granting a preference to members of these groups is that certain educational benefits flow from a racially diverse student body, and members of underrepresented [*52] minorities would not be admitted in significant numbers unless race is explicitly considered. n24 This is due to the fact that members of these groups, on average, have lower LSAT scores and lower undergraduate GPA's as compared to other applicants (i.e., Caucasians and Asians), so that comparatively few would be admitted in a system where admissions decisions were based on "the numbers."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n24 This is the reason stated in the policy itself, and it is the reason given by defendants' witnesses and counsel. However, the court notes that as recently as 1996-1997 the law school's bulletin indicated that one reason for the affirmative action policy has been to further "the public interest in increasing the number of lawyers from groups which the faculty identifies as significantly underrepresented in the legal profession." Exhibit 6, p. 81.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

A major bone of contention in this case has been the extent to which race is considered in the admissions process. The evidence shows that race is not, as defendants have argued, [*53] merely one factor which is considered among many others in the admissions process. Rather, the evidence indisputably demonstrates that the law school places a very heavy emphasis on an applicant's race in deciding whether to accept or reject.

This emphasis on race is apparent from the admissions policy itself, which explicitly states the law school's "commitment to racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups which have been historically discriminated against, like African-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans, . . ." Exhibit 4, Admissions Policy, p. 12. The admissions policy is equally explicit about the extent of this commitment: race is considered at least to the extent necessary to enroll a "critical mass" of students from these groups. While "critical mass" has proved to be a concept that has eluded precise quantification, over the years it has meant in practice that the law school attempts to enroll an entering class 10% to 17% of which consists of underrepresented minority students. The 10% figure, as a target, has historical roots going back to the late 1960s. Beginning in the 1970s, law school documents begin referring to [*54] 10-12% as the desired percentage. Professor Lempert testified that critical mass lies in the range of 11-17%. Indeed, this percentage range appeared in a draft of the 1992 admissions policy, and it was omitted from the final version despite Professor Regan's suggestion that it remain for the sake of "candor."

The actual admissions and graduation statistics confirm the law school's commitment to enroll African American, Native American and Hispanic students in the 10-17% range. For example, Exhibit 97 shows the number of students graduating (total as well as by various racial groups) for each year from 1950 to 1999. From 1973 to 1985, underrepresented minority students constituted approximately 9-10% of the graduating class, n25 and from 1986 to 1999 students from these groups constituted approximately 12-13% of the graduating class. n26 These percentages conclusively demonstrate that the law school considers race in the admissions process because applicants from the underrepresented minority groups have, on average, considerably lower undergraduate GPA's and LSAT scores as compared to Caucasian applicants and yet, nonetheless, the percentage of applicants from these minority groups [*55] who are admitted is roughly equal to the percentage they constitute of the total applicant pool.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n25 The percentages range from a low of 5.8% in 1974 to a high of 12.5% in 1977, but the mean percentage of underrepresented minority students from 1973 to 1985 was 9.7%.

n26 The percentages range from a low of 5.4% in 1998 to a high of 19.2% in 1994, but the mean percentage of underrepresented minority students from 1986 to 1999 was 12.6%.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In 1995, for example, Native Americans constituted 1.1% of the total applicant pool and 1.2% of the admitted students; African Americans constituted 9.3% of the total applicant pool and 9.2% of the admitted students; Mexican Americans constituted 2.3% of the total applicant pool and 3.5% of the admitted students; Puerto Ricans constituted 0.5% of the total applicant pool and 0.4% of the admitted students; and Caucasians constituted 56.3% of the total applicant pool and 59.7% of the admitted students. See Exhibit 146, Table 1. That is, the representation of each group in [*56] the applicant pool roughly approximates its representation among the total admitted. Yet the median undergraduate GPA and LSAT score are generally lower -- even considerably lower -- for underrepresented minority applicants than for Caucasian applicants. See Exhibit 137, pp. 18-19 (Tables 2 and 3). The same pattern can be seen in 1996 and 1997. See Exhibit 146 (Tables 2 and 3) and Exhibit 137, pp. 18-19 (Tables 2 and 3). If race were not considered in the admissions process, one would expect to see underrepresented minority applicants admitted in much lower proportions than has been the case.

Plaintiffs' and defendants' statisticians analyzed the admissions data and both provided testimony and expert reports which assisted the court in understanding the extent to which race is considered in the law school's admissions process. Dr. Larntz' cell-by-cell analysis provided mathematically irrefutable proof that race is indeed an enormously important factor. In each year at issue in this case, Native American, African American, Mexican American and Puerto Rican applicants have been admitted in significantly greater proportions than Caucasian applicants with the same or similar undergraduate [*57] GPA's and LSAT scores. As Dr. Larntz noted, this fact is apparent on the face of the law school's admissions grids. One does not need to undergo sophisticated statistical analysis in order to see it; the statistical analysis simply confirms empirically what the grids suggest intuitively. The court specifically adopts Dr. Larntz' analysis and his conclusion that "membership in certain ethnic groups is an extremely strong factor in the decision for acceptance."

The court rejects Dr. Raudenbush's criticism of Dr. Larntz' cell-by-cell analysis. While it is true that Dr. Larntz' analysis did not include cells in which all applicants were either accepted or rejected, the court was persuaded by Dr. Larntz' explanation that these cells do not contain any comparative data. The issue in this case is whether similarly situated applicants are treated differently because of their race, and this question can be answered by examining cells in which some applicants are accepted and others rejected so that the differences in the admissions rates can be calculated. Moreover, Dr. Larntz testified that the cells he included in his analysis are the ones containing more than 95% of all admittees. Thus, [*58] the court believes that Dr. Larntz omitted very little data from his analysis and none that is relevant.

The court also rejects Dr. Raudenbush's other criticisms of Dr. Larntz' methodology. For example, Dr. Raudenbush argued that the admissions process is complex and cannot be reduced to a comparison of acceptance odds based on "the numbers" and membership in various racial groups. The court agrees, and specifically finds, that the law school examines each application file individually and considers not only grades and test scores but also letters of recommendation, the applicant's personal statements, extracurricular activities, work experience, residency status, relationship to university alumni, rigor of undergraduate curriculum, trend in undergraduate grades, and reputation of undergraduate institution. Nonetheless, the court does not believe that the complexity of the admissions process undermines the validity of Dr. Larntz' analysis. When cell by cell, and year by year, underrepresented minority applicants are admitted in significantly greater proportions than their non-minority competitors with similar UGPA and LSAT scores, it is clear that the law school accords the race of [*59] the applicants a great deal of weight.

REV_00258998

Even the testimony and reports of the law school's statistician, Dr. Raudenbush, support this conclusion. As noted above, Dr. Raudenbush testified that the number of underrepresented minority admittees would drop "sharply and dramatically" if race were not considered in the admissions process. By his calculations, the percentage of underrepresented minority applicants who are admitted would have dropped from 26% to 4% in 1995, and from 31% to 8% in 1996, under a race-blind admissions system. See Exhibit 146, Table 8. In 1997 the percentage admitted would have dropped from 33% to 8%; in 1998 the percentage admitted would have dropped from 34% to 9%; in 1999 the percentage admitted would have dropped from 37% to 8%; and in 2000 the percentage admitted would have dropped from 35% to 10%. See Exhibit 149, Table 1; and Exhibit 149, Tables 1-3. These figures, which the court has no reason to doubt, may explain even more plainly than Dr. Larntz' odds ratios and graphs the extent to which race is considered in the law school's admissions process.

Finally, the testimony of the witnesses who are familiar with the inner workings of the law school's [*60] admissions office confirmed that race is considered and that it makes a difference in admissions decisions. The current and former dean, as well as the current and former admissions directors, all testified that race is considered to the extent necessary to enroll a critical mass of underrepresented minority students. While none of these witnesses acknowledged that they have a particular number or percentage in mind as the admissions season progresses, the written and unwritten policy at the law school charges the admissions office with assembling entering classes which consist of between 10% and 17% African American, Native American, and Hispanic students. Over the years this target has been achieved, and even exceeded, n27 despite the underrepresented minority students' generally lower LSAT scores and undergraduate GPA's. The court also finds it significant that the dean and the admissions director monitor the law school's "daily admissions reports," which classify applicants by race. These reports inform the reader how many students from various racial groups have applied, how many have been accepted, how many have been placed on the waiting list, and how many have paid a deposit. [*61] There would be no need for this information to be categorized by race unless it were being used to ensure that the target percentage is achieved.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n27 From the graduation years 1986 to 1999, underrepresented minorities constituted at least 9.8% (1999) and as much as 19.2% (1994) of the class, except in 1998 when the percentage dipped to 5.4%. See Exhibit 97.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In conclusion, the court finds that the law school explicitly considers the race of applicants in order to enroll a critical mass of underrepresented minority students -- that is, the law school wants 10% to 17% of each entering class to consist of African American, Native American, and Hispanic students.

2.

The court must now turn to the central issue in this case: whether the Constitution permits the consideration of race in order to achieve racial diversity. In current constitutional parlance, the question is Whether the achievement of racial diversity is a compelling state interest and, if so, whether the law school's admissions policy is narrowly [*62] tailored to serve that interest. n28 See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 115 S. Ct. 2097 (1995) ("all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n28 While plaintiffs claim that the law school's policy violates both the Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d, the legal analysis under the two claims is the same. See Bakke, 438 U.S. at 287; Johnson v. Board of Regents, 106 F. Supp. 2d 1362, 1366 (S.D. Ga. 2000).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In answering this question, the starting point is the Supreme Court's landmark decision in Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750, 98 S. Ct. 2733 (1978), the only case in which the high court has ever addressed the "diversity [*63] rationale" as a justification for considering race in reviewing an application for admission to a university.

In Bakke, the plaintiff was a white male who applied in 1973 and 1974 to the University of California at Davis Medical School ("U.C. Davis"), a state institution. In both years, U.C. Davis rejected Bakke's application. After the second rejection Bakke sued the Regents of the University of California, claiming that U.C. Davis' special admissions program, which reserved 16 places in the class of 100 for members of certain minority groups, violated the California state constitution, Title VI, and the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. The trial court held that U.C. Davis could not consider race in making admissions decisions. The California Supreme Court affirmed and enjoined any consideration of race in the admissions process.

On appeal, a sharply divided Supreme Court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Justice Stevens wrote an opinion in which Chief Justice Burger and Justices Stewart and Rehnquist joined. The Stevens group concluded that Title VI prohibited U.C. Davis, as a state educational institution receiving federal funding, from considering an applicant's [*64] race in making admissions decisions. Bakke, 438 U.S. at 412. Justices Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun authored a joint opinion in which they concluded that both Title VI and the Constitution permit a state educational institution to "take race into account when it acts not to demean or insult any racial group, but to remedy disadvantages cast on minorities by past racial prejudice, at least when appropriate findings have been made by judicial, legislative, or administrative bodies with competence to act in this area." Id. at 325.

In a separate, tie-breaking opinion, Justice Powell expressed the view that a state educational institution has a compelling interest in admitting a diverse student body, and that "ethnic diversity . . . is only one element in a range of factors a university properly may consider in attaining the goal of a heterogeneous student body." Id. at 311, 314. Because the Brennan group joined in the short portion of Justice Powell's opinion (Part V-C) which reversed the California Supreme Court's holding that an applicant's race may never be considered, a total of five Justices agreed that "the State has a substantial interest that [*65] legitimately may be served by a properly devised admissions program involving the competitive consideration of race and ethnic origin." Bakke, 438 U.S. at 320. However, Justice Powell also found that U.C. Davis' special admissions program, which implemented a strict quota system along race lines, was not narrowly tailored to serve the interest of admitting a diverse class of students. Thus, Justice Powell joined the Stevens group, albeit on different grounds, to make a five-Justice majority holding that U.C. Davis' special admissions program was unlawful. n29

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n29 Justice Powell found U.C. Davis' special admissions program invalid under the Fourteenth Amendment, see Bakke, 438 U.S. at 320; while the Stevens group avoided the constitutional issue and found that the program violated Title VI, see id. at 421.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

This court is faced with the task of piecing together the above opinions to determine Bakke's holding. n30 Specifically, the court must determine whether Bakke held [*66] that a state institution's desire to assemble a racially diverse student body is a compelling government interest. The parties sharply disagree on this issue. In short, plaintiffs argue that although Justice Powell's opinion announced the Court's judgment, his opinion contained statements and conclusions in which no other Justice or group of Justices joined and are therefore not part of the Court's holding. Plaintiffs argue that Justice Powell's discussion of the "diversity rationale" in Part IV-D of his opinion is one such matter. Defendants argue that the Brennan group concurred with Justice Powell's conclusions regarding diversity by joining in Part V-C of his opinion, and that under Marks n31 Justice Powell's conclusions regarding diversity are part of the Court's holding. For the reasons stated below, the court is persuaded that Bakke did not hold that a state educational institution's desire to assemble a racially diverse student body is a compelling government interest.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n30 The difficulty of this task was perhaps best summarized by the Fifth Circuit in United States v. City of Miami, 614 F.2d 1322, 1337 (5th Cir. 1980), which stated: "We frankly admit that we are not entirely sure what to make of the various Bakke opinions. In over one hundred and fifty pages of United States Reports, the Justices have told us mainly that they have agreed to disagree." [*67] n31 See Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 51 L. Ed. 2d 260, 97 S. Ct. 990 (1977).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Of the six separate opinions issued by the Supreme Court in Bakke, Justice Powell's was the only one that considered whether a state educational institution may have a compelling interest in admitting a racially diverse class of students. While rejecting the other justifications offered for the special admissions program, n32 Justice Powell found in Part IV-D of his opinion that "the attainment of a diverse student body . . . clearly is a constitutionally permissible goal for an institution of higher education." 438 U.S. at 311-12. He cited Justice Frankfurter's statement in Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1311, 77 S. Ct. 1203 (1957), that universities must have the freedom to decide which students to admit, as this is relevant to providing an "atmosphere which is most conducive to speculation, experiment and creation." Justice Powell also indicated his belief that "the 'nation's future depends upon leaders trained through wide exposure' to the ideas and mores of students as diverse as this Nation of [*68] many peoples." 438 U.S. at 313. He quoted approvingly from an article by the president of Princeton University, who wrote:

> [A] great deal of learning occurs informally. It occurs through interactions among students of both sexes; of different races, religions, and backgrounds; who come from cities and rural areas, from various states and countries; who have a wide variety of interests, talents, and perspectives; and who are able, directly or indirectly, to learn from their differences and to stimulate one another to reexamine even their most deeply held assumptions about themselves and their world.

Id. at 313, quoting Bowen, "Admissions and the Relevance of Race," Princeton Alumni Weekly 7, 9 (September 26, 1977). Justice Powell emphasized that "ethnic diversity, however, is only one element in a range of factors a university properly may consider in attaining the goal of a heterogeneous student body. Although a university must have wide discretion in making the sensitive judgments as to who should be admitted, constitutional limitations protecting individual rights may not be disregarded." Id. at 314.

REV_00259001

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n32 U.C. Davis argued that its special admissions program served four purposes: "(i) reducing the historic deficit of traditionally disfavored minorities in medical schools and in the medical profession; (ii) countering the effects of societal discrimination; (iii) increasing the number of physicians who will practice in communities currently underserved; and (iv) obtaining the educational benefits that flow from an ethnically diverse student body." Bakke, 438 U.S. at 306.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*69]

Having recognized the compelling nature of a university's interest in diversity, including ethnic diversity, Justice Powell went on in Parts V-A and V-B of his opinion to find that U.C. Davis' quota system was not narrowly tailored to serve this interest. He stated:

> It may be assumed that the reservation of a specified number of seats in each class for individuals from the preferred ethnic groups would contribute to the attainment of considerable ethnic diversity in the student body. But petitioner's argument that this is the only effective means of serving the interest of diversity is seriously flawed. In a most fundamental sense the argument misconceives the nature of the state interest that would justify consideration of race or ethnic background. It is not an interest in simple ethnic diversity, in which a specified percentage of the student body is in effect guaranteed to be members of selected ethnic groups, with the remaining percentage an undifferentiated aggregation, of students. The diversity that furthers a compelling state interest encompasses a far broader array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important [*70] element. Petitioner's special admissions program, focused solely on ethnic diversity, would hinder rather than further attainment of genuine diversity.

438 U.S. at 315. While rejecting a quota system, Justice Powell endorsed an admissions program such as the one adopted by Harvard College, which states that > race or ethnic background may be deemed a "plus" in a particular applicant's file, yet it does not insulate the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats. The file of a particular black applicant may be examined for his potential contribution to diversity without the factor of race being decisive when compared, for example, with that of an applicant identified as an Italian-American if the latter is thought to exhibit qualities more likely to promote beneficial educational pluralism. Such qualities could include exceptional personal talents, unique work or service experience, leadership potential, maturity, demonstrated compassion, a history of overcoming disadvantage, ability to communicate with the poor, or other qualifications deemed important. In short, an admissions program operated in this way is flexible enough [*71] to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight.

438 U.S. at 317-18.

In Part V-C of his opinion, Justice Powell concluded that

> In enjoining petitioner from ever considering the race of any applicant, however, the courts below failed to recognize that the State has a substantial interest that legitimately may be served by a properly devised admissions program involving the competitive consideration of race and ethnic origin. For this reason, so much of the California court's judgment as enjoins petitioner from any consideration of the race of any applicant must be reversed.

438 U.S. at 320.

The clearest indication that the Brennan group did not concur with Justice Powell's conclusions regarding the diversity rationale is that, although they joined in other portions of Justice Powell's opinion, they did not join in Part IV-D, the only portion of any of the Bakke opinions that specifically addressed the diversity issue. n33 Moreover, the Brennan group apparently [*72] did not believe that the diversity rationale was before the Court, as those Justices stated that the "issue presented" in the case was "whether government may use race-conscious programs to redress the continuing effects of past discrimination." Id. at 324. The Brennan group also stated that in their view the "central meaning of today's opinions [is that] Government may take race into account when it acts not to demean or insult any racial group, but to remedy disadvantages cast on minorities by past racial prejudice, at least when appropriate findings have been made by judicial, legislative, or administrative bodies with competence to act in this area." Id. at 325. The Brennan group did not so much as mention the diversity rationale in their opinion, and they specifically declined to join in the portion of Justice Powell's opinion that addressed this issue. At the same time, Justice Powell specifically and vigorously disagreed with the Brennan group's conclusion that the special admissions program at U.C. Davis could be justified on the grounds that it sought to remedy general, societal discrimination. See 438 U.S. at 294-97 & nn. 34, 36. [*73] In short, while the Brennan group and Justice Powell agreed that race may be considered in admissions (hence the joinder of the Brennan group in Part V-C of Justice Powell's opinion), they disagreed entirely as to the reasons why (hence their failure to join in Part IV-D). Thus, there is no force at all to defendants' contention that the Brennan group's joinder in Part V-C of Justice Powell's opinion may be taken as an endorsement of Justice Powell's discussion of the diversity rationale.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n33 The Brennan group stated that it "joined Parts I and V-C of our Brother POWELL's opinion and three of us agree with his conclusion in Part II that this case does not require us to resolve the question whether there is a private right of action under Title VI." 438 U.S. at 328.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The defendants next argue that under Marks, Justice Powell's opinion is controlling because it is the narrowest grounds which support the judgment. The court must reject this argument because a Marks analysis does not assist in [*74] interpreting Bakke.

In Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193, 51 L. Ed. 2d 260, 97 S. Ct. 990 (1977), the Court held that "when a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, 'the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds.'" In Marks this rule was applied to determine the holding of Memoirs v. Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413, 16 L. Ed. 2d 1, 86 S. Ct. 975 (1966), a pornography case in which the Supreme Court reversed a state court judgment finding a book obscene. In Memoirs, three Justices reversed on the grounds that the book had not been shown to be "utterly without redeeming social value"; two others reversed on the grounds that the First Amendment prohibits any action by government to suppress obscenity; and one Justice reversed on the grounds that the book was not "hard core pornography." In Marks the Court stated that the "governing standards" of Memoirs were those announced by the three-Justice plurality because the other Justices who concurred in the judgment did so "on broader grounds." 430 U.S. at 193.

The Court [*75] in Marks did not clearly explain what it meant by "narrow" and "broad" grounds. But in that particular case, the plurality's opinion was the "narrowest" in the sense that it was the most conservative reason for reversing the finding of obscenity and it was a reason that was subsumed within the grounds articulated by the other justices who concurred in the judgment.

The Marks framework cannot be applied to a case like Bakke, where the various Justices' reasons for concurring in the judgment are not merely different by degree, as they were in Memoirs, but are so fundamentally different as to not be comparable in terms of "narrowness." In Memoirs, the six Justices concurring in the judgment expressed three viewpoints which could be placed on a continuum from narrow to broad. The narrowest would permit a finding of obscenity if the book in question is "utterly without redeeming social value." A somewhat broader view would permit a finding of obscenity if the book is "hard cord pornography." An even broader view would not permit any book to be found obscene. On this continuum, the first view is clearly the narrowest and, therefore, articulates the binding legal [*76] standard constituting the Court's holding.

In Bakke, however, it is nonsensical to ask which opinion -- Justice Powell's or the Brennan group's -- offers the "narrowest grounds" in support of the judgment reversing the finding that race may never be considered in university admissions. The diversity rationale articulated by Justice Powell is neither narrower nor broader than the remedial rationale articulated by the Brennan group. They are completely different rationales, neither one of which is subsumed within the other. There is simply no overlap between the two rationales; in fact, as noted above, the two opinions are very much at odds with one another. Thus, the Marks framework is inapplicable because the varying positions cannot be compared for "narrowness."

For these reasons, the court concludes that Justice Powell's discussion of the diversity rationale is not among the governing standards to be gleaned from Bakke. No other member of the Court joined in his view that the attainment of a diverse student class is a compelling state interest which can justify the consideration of race in university admissions. Nor can Justice Powell's discussion of this issue be understood [*77] as part of the Court's holding on the grounds that, under Marks, it is the narrowest grounds for the judgment in which he and the Brennan group joined. Therefore, this court concludes that Bakke does not stand for the proposition that a university's desire to assemble a racially diverse student body is a compelling state interest. n34

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n34 The court acknowledges that the status of Justice Powell's opinion has been the subject of much debate and disagreement. Some courts have concluded that the diversity rationale is part of Bakke's holding. See, e.g., Smith v. University of Wash. Law Sch., 233 F.3d 1188, 1200-1201 (9th Cir. 2000); Gratz v. Bollinger, 122 F. Supp. 2d 811, 819-21 (E.D. Mich. 2000). Others have reached the opposite conclusion. See, e.g., Hopwood v. State of Texas, 78 F.3d 932, 944-45 (5th Cir. 1996); Johnson v. Board of Regents of the Univ. Sys. of Georgia, 106 F. Supp. 2d 1362, 1368-69 (S.D. Ga. 2000). Other courts have avoided deciding the issue. See, e.g., Eisenberg v. Montgomery County Pub. Sch., 197 F.3d 123, 130 (4th Cir. 1999) ("whether diversity is a compelling governmental interest remains unresolved, and in this case, we also choose to leave it unresolved"); Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790, 796 (1st Cir. 1998) ("we need not definitively resolve this conundrum today").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*78]

Further, in post-Bakke decisions the Supreme Court has indicated quite clearly that it looks upon racial classifications with even more suspicion than was the case at the time Bakke was decided. In Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. Federal Communications Comm'n, 497 U.S. 547, 111 L. Ed. 2d 445, 110 S. Ct. 2997 (1990), the Court upheld FCC regulations which gave a preference to various racial minority groups in the awarding of broadcast licenses. Applying intermediate scrutiny, the Court upheld the regulations because "the interest in enhancing broadcast diversity is, at the very least, an important governmental objective . . . ." Id. at 567. Five years later, however, in Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 115 S. Ct. 2097 (1995), the Court stated "that all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. To the extent that Metro Broadcasting is inconsistent with that holding, it is overruled." Adarand clarified that strict scrutiny applies to all racial classifications, regardless of the level of government using the classification. Here it should be noted that [*79] the Brennan group in Bakke used the less demanding standard of intermediate scrutiny in their review of U.C. Davis' admissions program. See Bakke, 438 U.S. at 359 ("racial classifications designed to further remedial purposes "'must serve important governmental objectives and must be substantially related to achievement of those objectives'"). Moreover, the Court in City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 493, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854, 109 S. Ct. 706 (1989), made the following significant statement: "Classifications based on race carry a danger of stigmatic harm. Unless they are strictly reserved for remedial settings, they may in fact promote notions of racial inferiority and lead to a politics of racial hostility." n35 When read together, Adarand and Croson clearly indicate that racial classifications are unconstitutional unless they are intended to remedy carefully documented effects of past discrimination. n36 The Supreme Court has rejected various "benign" justifications for racial classifications. See, e.g., Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 90 L. Ed. 2d 260, 106 S. Ct. 1842 (1986) (finding race-conscious layoff policy unconstitutional, and rejecting "minority role model" [*80] and "societal discrimination" justifications).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n35 This statement appears in Part III-A of Justice O'Connor's opinion, in which Justices Rehnquist, White and Kennedy joined. Justice Scalia, in a concurring opinion, wrote that "at least where state or local action is at issue, only a social emergency rising to the level of imminent danger to life and limb . . . can justify an exception to the principle embodied in the Fourteenth Amendment that 'our Constitution is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens.'" 488 U.S. at 521 (citations omitted). Thus, four members of the Court expressed the view that racial classifications are permissible only to remedy past discrimination, and a fifth expressed the view that they are permissible only in cases of social emergency.

n36 For example, race-based hiring or promotion programs have been upheld where necessary to correct a racial imbalance caused by documented race discrimination by a particular agency or employer. See, e.g., United States v. Paradise, 480 U.S. 149, 94 L. Ed. 2d 203, 107 S. Ct. 1053 (1987); Franks v. Bowman Transp. Co., 424 U.S. 747, 47 L. Ed. 2d 444, 96 S. Ct. 1251 (1976). Race-based student assignments have been upheld where necessary to correct a racial imbalance, or a misallocation of school resources, caused by de jure racial segregation. See, e.g., Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 1, 28 L. Ed. 2d 554, 91 S. Ct. 1267 (1971).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*81]

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

Government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. The contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful; but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.

Constitutional Law : State Autonomy

Congress has abrogated Eleventh Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XI, immunity by conditioning the receipt of federal funds upon the duty to comply with various anti-discrimination laws.

Constitutional Law : State Autonomy

See 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d-7(a).

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Discrimination Claims

Under 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, liability for damages attaches upon a showing of intentional discrimination. The right at issue need not have been "clearly established"; it suffices for a state to have violated a plaintiff's rights by intentional action. A violation of § 2000d requires proof of discriminatory intent, and, when intentional discrimination is proven, damages are among the remedies which may be awarded.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Discrimination Claims

In the context of the duty to comply with anti-discrimination laws conditioned upon the receipt of federal funds, "intentional discrimination," as used in 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d means that a plaintiff must prove that the governmental actor, in adopting or employing the challenged practices or undertaking the challenged action, intended to treat similarly situated persons differently on the basis of race.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

The effects of general, societal discrimination cannot constitutionally be remedied by race-conscious decision-making.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Societal discrimination alone is insufficient to justify a racial classification. Rather, there must be some showing of prior discrimination by the governmental unit involved before allowing limited use of racial classifications in order to remedy such discrimination.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

A governmental agency's interest in remedying "societal" discrimination, that is, discrimination not traceable to its own actions, cannot be deemed sufficiently compelling to pass constitutional muster under strict scrutiny.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

The Fourteenth Amendment, U.S. Const. amend. XIV, does not permit government to make racial classifications in order to remedy societal discrimination.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

REV_00258979

The court concludes that the Supreme Court in Bakke did not recognize the achievement of racial diversity in university admissions as a compelling state interest. The court further concludes that under the Supreme Court's post-Bakke decisions, the achievement of such diversity is not a compelling state interest because it is not a remedy for past discrimination.

3.

This is not to say that diversity does not have important educational benefits. The evidence defendants submitted on this issue, both at trial and in their summary judgment briefs, demonstrated that the educational atmosphere at the law school is improved by the presence of students who represent the greatest possible variety of backgrounds and viewpoints. Several law professors testified that classroom discussion is livelier, more spirited, and simply more enlightening and interesting when students from varying walks of life, and representing varying world views, participate. As Professor Syverud has written, "in the best classrooms, every voice is heard, and the quality of the education received is largely a function of the diversity of viewpoints and experiences among the students in the class." Report of Kent [*82] Syverud, p. 3. n37

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n37 Professor Syverud's report is among those contained in volume 3 of the appendix filed by defendants in support of their renewed motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

However, a distinction should be drawn between viewpoint diversity and racial diversity. While the educational benefits of the former are clear, those of the latter are less so. The defendants' witnesses emphasized repeatedly that it is a diversity of viewpoints, experiences, interests, perspectives, and backgrounds which creates an atmosphere most conducive to learning. As Dean Lehman testified, it is primarily a "diversity of views" that the law school seeks.

The connection between race and viewpoint is tenuous, at best. The defendants walk a fine line in simultaneously arguing that one's viewpoints are not determined by one's race but that certain viewpoints might not be voiced if students of particular races are not admitted in significant numbers. Some of defendants' witnesses testified that classroom [*83] discussion is improved when the class is racially diverse, and some gave examples of viewpoints expressed in class by underrepresented minority students. However, these witnesses generally conceded that these viewpoints might equally have been expressed by non-minority students. n38 n38 Professor Terrance Sandalow, former dean of the law school and long-time law professor, has written in this connection:

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

> Students learn from one another in different ways. In the course of discussion, whether in the classroom or in dormitory 'bull sessions,' participants are likely to be exposed to unfamiliar ideas. My own experience and that of colleagues with whom I have discussed the question, experience that concededly is limited to the classroom setting, is that racial diversity is not responsible for generating ideas unfamiliar to some members of the class. Students do, of course, quite frequently express and develop ideas that others in the class have not previously encountered, but even though the subjects I teach deal extensively with racial issues, I cannot recall an instance in which, for example, ideas were expressed by > a black student that have not also been expressed by white students. Black students do, at times, call attention to the racial implications of issues that are not facially concerned with race, but white and Asian-American students are in my experience no less likely to do so.

REV_00259006

Terrance Sandalow, "Identity and Equality, Minority Preferences Reconsidered," 97 Mich. L. Rev. 1874, 1906-1907 (1999).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*84]

Another asserted benefit of racial diversity is, essentially, that it promotes socialization. That is, cross-racial understanding is advanced, and racial stereotypes break down, in a multi-racial setting. This, it is argued, enhances all students' legal education because it enables them to better understand persons of different races and better equips them to serve as lawyers in an increasingly diverse society and an increasingly competitive world economy. See, e.g., Report of Derek Bok, pp. 3, 11, 13, 17; Report of Robert Webster, pp. 2-5; Amicus Curiae Brief of General Motors Corp., pp. 8-25. Defendants have also submitted a lengthy report by Patricia Gurin, a professor of psychology and women's studies at the University of Michigan, whose research suggests that "students learn better in a [racially and ethnically] diverse educational environment, and they are better prepared to become active participants in our pluralistic, democratic society once they leave such a setting." Report of Patricia Gurin, p. 3.

The court does not doubt that racial diversity in the law school population may provide these educational and societal benefits. Nor are these benefits disputed by the [*85] plaintiffs in this case. Clearly the benefits are important and laudable. Nonetheless, the fact remains that the attainment of a racially diverse class is not a compelling state interest because it was not recognized as such by Bakke and it is not a remedy for past discrimination.

4.

Even if racial diversity were a compelling state interest, defendants' use of race as an admissions factor would be constitutional only if "narrowly tailored" to serve that interest. See Adarand, 515 U.S. at 227. For the following reasons, the court finds that defendants' use of race has not been so narrowly tailored at any time under consideration in this case.

First, defendants have indicated that they use race in admissions to the extent necessary to achieve a "critical mass" of underrepresented minority students. None of the witnesses was able to clearly define critical mass in terms of numbers or percentages. While Professor Lempert indicated that critical mass lies somewhere between 11% and 17% of the entire class, Professor Syverud stated that even one to three minority students in a particular classroom might suffice. The current director of admissions, Erica Munzel, testified [*86] that she does not know what number or percentage of the entering class would constitute critical mass, and that she relies on faculty members to keep her informed as to whether she is achieving it. "Critical mass" has proved to be an amorphous concept. Apparently defendants know it when they see it, but it cannot be quantified. Narrow tailoring is difficult, if not impossible, to achieve when the contours of the interest being served are so ill-defined.

Second, there is no time limit on defendants' use of race in the admissions process. The Supreme Court has been highly critical of racial classifications which are not strictly limited in duration. See, e.g., Croson, 488 U.S. at 510 ("Proper findings . . . defining both the scope of the injury and the extent of the remedy . . . serve to assure all citizens that the deviation from the norm of equal treatment of all racial and ethnic groups is a temporary matter, a measure taken in the service of the goal of equality itself"); Wygant, 476 U.S. at 275 ("The role model theory allows the Board to engage in discriminatory hiring and layoff practices long past the point required by any legitimate remedial [*87] purpose"). The defendants have indicated that they will continue to use race as a factor in admissions for as long as necessary to admit a critical mass of underrepresented minority students, and no one can predict how long that might be. Such indefiniteness weighs heavily against a finding of narrow tailoring.

REV_00259007

Third, by using race to ensure the enrollment of a certain minimum percentage of underrepresented minority students, the law school has made the current admissions policy practically indistinguishable from a quota system. As noted above, the law school has an unwritten policy of constituting each entering class so that at least 10-12% are students from underrepresented minority groups. This percentage has fluctuated somewhat from one year to another, but 10-12% is the approximate percentage that has been established as the minimum level needed to achieve a "critical mass" of students from these groups. While the law school has not set aside a fixed number of seats for underrepresented minority students, as did the medical school in Bakke, there is no principled difference between a fixed number of seats and an essentially fixed minimum percentage figure. Under either system, [*88] students of all races are not competing against one another for each seat, with race being simply one factor among many which may "tip the balance" in particular cases. The reservation of some seats for applicants of particular races, and the attendant lack of competition for those seats, was the principle reason Justice Powell found U.C. Davis' quota system unconstitutional. See Bakke, 438 U.S. at 315-19. While defendants contend that the law school's admissions policy differs from U.C. Davis' in that all applicants compete against one another, the fact of the matter is that approximately 10% of each entering class is effectively reserved for members of particular races, and those seats are insulated from competition. The practical effect of the law school's policy is indistinguishable from a straight quota system, and such a system is not narrowly tailored under any interpretation of the Equal Protection Clause. See, e.g., Bakke, 438 U.S. at 307 ("Preferring members of any one group for no reason other than race or ethnic origin is discrimination for its own sake"). It appears that the law school is engaging in simple racial balancing by focusing [*89] so carefully on admitting and enrolling a particular percentage of students from particular racial groups.

Fourth, there is no logical basis for the law school to have chosen the particular racial groups which receive special attention under the current admissions policy. The 1992 admissions policy, at page 12, identifies "African Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans" as "groups which have been historically discriminated against n39 [and] who without this commitment might not be represented in our student body in meaningful numbers." During some of the years at issue in this lawsuit, the law school bulletin indicated that special attention has been given to "students who are African American, Mexican American, Native American, or Puerto Rican and raised on the U.S. mainland." n40 The law school has failed to offer a principled explanation as to why it has singled out these particular groups for special attention. Certainly, other groups have also been subjected to discrimination, such as Arabs and southern and eastern Europeans to name but a few, yet the court heard nothing to suggest that the law school has concerned itself as to whether members of these groups are represented [*90] "in meaningful numbers." No satisfactory explanation was offered for distinguishing between Puerto Ricans who were raised on the U.S. mainland from Puerto Ricans who were raised in Puerto Rico or elsewhere. No satisfactory explanation was offered for singling out Mexican Americans but, by implication, excluding from special consideration Hispanics who originate from countries other than Mexico. A special "commitment" is made to African Americans, but apparently none is made to blacks from other parts of the world. This haphazard selection of certain races is a far cry from the "close fit" between the means and the ends that the Constitution demands in order for a racial classification to pass muster under strict scrutiny analysis. n41 If the law school may single out these racial groups for a special commitment today, there is nothing to prevent it from enlarging, reducing, or shifting its list of preferred groups tomorrow without any reasoned basis or logical stopping point.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n39 In this connection it is worth noting that the law school, like U.C. Davis, "does not purport to have made, and is in no position to make such findings. Its broad mission is education, not the formulation of any legislative policy or the adjudication of particular claims of illegality." Bakke, 438 U.S. at 309. [*91]

n40 See the University of Michigan Law School Bulletin, 1996-1997 (Exhibit 6), p. 81; the University of Michigan Law School Bulletin, 1995-1997 (Exhibit 7), p. 81. No such statement appears in the University of Michigan Law School Bulletin, 1997-1999 (Exhibit 8), p. 85.

n41 A close fit is lacking for another reason -- namely, that there is no basis for believing that a particular member of any underrepresented minority group is "particularly likely to have experiences and perspectives of special importance to our mission." Exhibit 4, 1992 Admissions Policy, p. 12. One cannot assume, for example, that a particular African American applicant has been the victim of race discrimination or that a particular Mexican American applicant has grown up in an economically depressed neighborhood.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

A fifth and final factor the court must note in this connection is the law school's apparent failure to investigate alternative means for increasing minority enrollment. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 507 (finding that narrow tailoring was absent because, among other reasons, the city failed to [*92] consider "the use of race-neutral means to increase minority business participation in city contracting"); Wygant, 476 U.S. at 280 n.6 ("The term 'narrowly tailored' . . . maybe used to require consideration of whether lawful alternative and less restrictive means could have been used. . . . The classification at issue must 'fit' with greater precision than any alternative means"). The court did hear some testimony from witnesses who indicated that underrepresented minority students cannot be enrolled in significant numbers unless their race is explicitly considered in the admissions process. However, the court heard very little testimony from the authors of the 1992 admissions policy, or from those who have been involved in administering it, as to whether the deans or the faculty at the law school itself have ever given serious consideration to race-neutral alternatives. Such efforts might have included increasing recruiting efforts, decreasing the emphasis for all applicants on undergraduate GPA and LSAT scores, using a lottery system for all qualified applicants, or a system whereby a certain number or percentage of the top graduates from various colleges and universities [*93] are admitted. Even if these alternatives would not be as effective in enrolling significant numbers of underrepresented minority students, the law school's failure to consider them, and perhaps experiment with them, prior to implementing an explicitly race-conscious system militates against a finding of narrow tailoring.

For all of these reasons, the court believes that the attainment of a racially diverse student body is not a compelling state interest. Even if it were, the law school's admissions policy is not narrowly tailored to serve that interest. Accordingly, the court concludes that the law school's 1992 admissions policy violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

5.

Nonetheless, having listened to extensive testimony and having reviewed all of the relevant documents, the court also concludes that the individual defendants are qualifiedly immune from damages. Under Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396, 102 S. Ct. 2727 (1982), "government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory [*94] or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known." In Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640, 97 L. Ed. 2d 523, 107 S. Ct.

3034 (1987), the Supreme Court indicated that "the contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right. This is not to say that an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful; but it is to say that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent."

While the court is convinced that the law school's admissions policy is unconstitutional, the court is equally convinced that the individual defendants (Lee Bollinger, Jeffrey Lehman, and Dennis Shields) did not participate in the adoption or administration of a policy they either knew or had reason to believe was unconstitutional. The state of the law in this area is murky, to say the least. No Supreme Court decision since Bakke has addressed the constitutionality of affirmative action in university admissions, and Bakke itself, to borrow a phrase, "is a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma." n42 Lower courts have struggled [*95] for years, with little success, to divine the legal principles to be gleaned from Bakke, and to understand how, if at all, the teachings of other affirmative action cases may apply to the higher education context. Under these circumstances, university officials understandably had difficulty formulating admissions policies that conformed with Bakke.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n42 Winston Churchill, in a radio broadcast in October 1939. J. Bartlett, Familiar Quotations 620 (1968).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Moreover, it is clear from the defendants' testimony that they were concerned about the constitutionality of the law school's admissions policy and that they attempted to comply with Bakke, as they interpreted the decision, while still striving to fulfill their admissions goals. President Bollinger testified that he formed the faculty Admissions Committee in the fall of 1991 because he wanted to ensure that the law school was in compliance with the law. He deliberately selected committee members who were knowledgeable about Bakke and constitutional [*96] law. Dean Lehman, who served on that committee, testified that the committee members wanted the law school's admissions policy to be lawful, especially in light of Bakke. Dennis Shields, the director of admissions from 1991 to 1998, also served on that committee. Nothing in his testimony, or in any other evidence admitted in this case, suggests that he knew or should have known that it was unconstitutional for the law school to consider race as part of its admissions policy.

In short, the "contours" of the legal standards governing affirmative action in university admissions have not been so clearly defined as to permit reasonable law school officials to know whether it was constitutional to use race in the admissions process in order to assemble a racially diverse student body. The court finds that the individual defendants in this case acted reasonably and in good faith in adopting and administering the policy in question. Accordingly, the court shall grant the motion of these defendants for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.

6.

Plaintiffs also seek, as part of their Title VI claim, money damages from the board of regents. The board argues that this damages [*97] claim is barred by the Eleventh Amendment, which generally prevents individuals from obtaining damages from a state or a state institution in federal court. See, e.g., Alabama v. Pugh, 438 U.S. 781, 782, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1114, 98 S. Ct. 3057 (1978); Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 662-63, 39 L. Ed. 2d 662, 94 S. Ct. 1347 (1974).

However, the board acknowledges that in this context Congress has abrogated Eleventh Amendment immunity by conditioning the receipt of federal funds upon the duty to comply with various anti-discrimination laws. Title 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-7(a) states:

REV_00259010

> (1) A State shall not be immune under the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution of the United States from suit in Federal court for a violation of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, the Age Discrimination Act of 1975, title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, or the provisions of any other Federal statute prohibiting discrimination by recipients of Federal financial assistance.
>
> (2) In a suit against a State for a violation of a statute referred to in paragraph (1), remedies (including remedies both at law and in equity) are available for such a violation to the [*98] same extent as such remedies are available for such a violation in the suit against any public or private entity other than a State.

Nonetheless, the board argues that it may be held liable in damages only if it is found to have violated "clearly established legal principles." Defendants' Memorandum of Law in Support of Renewed Motion for Summary Judgment, p. 45. Plaintiffs argue that it is inappropriate to graft a qualified immunity standard onto Title VI, and that the board is liable so long as intentional discrimination has been proven. See Plaintiffs' Memorandum in Opposition to Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment, p. 33.

The court has reviewed the cases cited by both sides and is convinced that, under Title VI, liability for damages attaches upon a showing of intentional discrimination. The right at issue need not have been "clearly established"; it suffices for a state to have violated a plaintiff's rights by intentional action. In Guardians Ass'n v. Civil Serv. Comm'n of the City of New York, 463 U.S. 582, 608 n.1, 77 L. Ed. 2d 866, 103 S. Ct. 3221 (1983), a majority of the Court agreed "that a violation of [Title VI] requires proof of discriminatory intent." When intentional [*99] discrimination is proven, damages are among the remedies which may be awarded. See Franklin v. Gwinnett County Pub. Sch., 503 U.S. 60, 75-76, 117 L. Ed. 2d 208, 112 S. Ct. 1028 (1992). In Franklin, the Court held that damages could be awarded under Title IX to a student who allegedly had been sexually harassed by a teacher, even though the law in this area was not clearly established. See id. at 75 (citing a Title VII sexual harassment case as sufficient authority for the proposition that sexual harassment of a student by a teacher is an "intentional action[]" proscribed by Title IX). The court agrees with the Fifth Circuit's view on this issue:

> "Intentional discrimination," as used in this context means that a plaintiff must prove "that the governmental actor, in adopting or employing the challenged practices or undertaking the challenged action, intended to treat similarly situated persons differently on the basis of race." While we agree with the district court's conclusion that the various defendants acted in good faith, there is no question that they intended to treat the plaintiffs differently on account of their race.

Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 957 [*100] (citations omitted). Accord, Gratz, 122 F. Supp. 2d at 834-36; Smith v. University of Wash. Law Sch., 2 F. Supp. 2d 1324, 1331 (W.D. Wash. 1998). See also Pederson v. Louisiana State Univ., 201 F.3d 388, 410-12 (5th Cir. 2000) (defendants liable for damages under Title IX for "intentional discrimination" where university sports program treated women differently because of their sex, although defendants were ignorant of their legal obligations. Court noted the defendants "need not have intended to violate Title IX, but need only have intended to treat women differently").

In the present case, there is no doubt that the law school's official admissions policy intentionally treats applicants differently because of their race. While the constitutionality of this policy may be debatable, the board of regents is nonetheless subject to liability in damages under Title VI insofar as it intentionally endorsed, or acquiesced in, an admissions policy that treats applicants differently because of their race. The unlawfulness of the policy need not have been clearly established for liability to attach. n43 Accordingly, the court must deny the board's [*101] motion for summary judgment.

REV_00259011

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n43 Of course, whether plaintiffs actually should be awarded any damages is a question to be resolved in the next phase of the trial. Now that defendants' liability has been established, defendants may still defeat plaintiffs' claim for compensatory damages by showing that plaintiffs would not have been admitted under a race-blind admissions policy. See Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 955-57 (discussing burden of proof under Mt. Healthy).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

III. Remedying Societal Discrimination as a Rationale for Using Race as a Factor in University Admissions: The Intervenors' Case

A. Evidence

The intervenors presented many witnesses who testified about the history and current status of racial discrimination in this country; the causes of the "achievement gap" between underrepresented minority and non-minority students; the alleged cultural bias in standardized tests such as the SAT and the LSAT; and the recent experiences of some African American and Mexican American students [*102] at high schools, colleges and universities. Some of these witnesses are preeminent experts in their respective fields of history, sociology, psychology and education. Others testified about their personal experiences of the deplorable conditions at a Detroit high school, and of isolation and discrimination at predominantly white universities. The court listened intently to nearly 30 hours of testimony from the intervenors' witnesses. The court shall summarize briefly the highlights of each witness's testimony.

Four students testified. Erica Dowdell is an African American student in her junior year at the University of Michigan. She was elected to the university's student assembly on the Defendant Affirmative Action Party ticket. Ms. Dowdell grew up in Detroit and attended public schools, where all or nearly all of the students were African American. She testified to the generally shoddy conditions at her elementary, middle and high schools. Her high school, Lewis Cass Technical High School, is one of the best in Detroit, yet the building is poorly maintained and books and other resources are often lacking. Ms. Dowdell testified that in her senior year she attended a band festival [*103] at Livonia Churchill High School in the suburbs, where most of the students are white, and she was hurt and shocked at the differences in such things as the sports facilities and the quality of the students' musical instruments. As an undergraduate student at the University of Michigan, Ms. Dowdell testified that she feels isolated because African Americans are in the minority. She also testified that she experiences racism on a daily basis, and she gave examples of insensitive remarks by other students and instructors. While Ms. Dowdell is doing well academically, she feels that racism negatively affects her performance because it is discouraging and distracting.

Concepcion Escobar is a Mexican American and Native American student at the University of Michigan Law School. She testified primarily about her experiences at a predominantly black public high school in Chicago and then at Amherst College, where most of the students are white and from privileged backgrounds. In her high school there were very few college counselors, and Ms. Escobar was not given any information about scholarships for which she may have been eligible. At Amherst, she abandoned her plans to pursue a pre-med [*104] curriculum because her high school had not adequately prepared her for college-level math and science classes. Ms. Escobar indicated that she did not often speak in class at Amherst because the student population was predominantly white and she did not want to play the role of representing her race. She also testified about some of the difficulties she and her classmates had in understanding one another, as they came from such completely different backgrounds.

Crystal James is an African American student in her second year of law school at the University of California at Los Angeles. Ms. James entered UCLA in 1999, three years after the passage of Proposition 209, which banned state-sponsored affirmative action and racial preferences in California. She testified that she was shocked to discover that she was one of only two African American law students in her entering class of 300. Ms. James feels isolated and believes that students and teachers expect her to represent the "black viewpoint" when racial issues are discussed. She also has experienced a loss of self-confidence and optimism, and a decline in her academic performance, which she attributes to her racial isolation and to [*105] subtle forms of racism on campus. The latter phenomenon has taken the form of students making anti-affirmative action comments, teachers failing to direct classroom discussion of racial issues in a positive manner, and teachers neglecting to call on her in class because, she believes, they assume she would not be able to respond. In sum, Ms. James testified that the loss of affirmative action in California has resulted in far fewer underrepresented minority students being admitted to prestigious state universities such as UCLA and Berkeley, and that those who are admitted feel isolated and defeated.

The last student to testify was Tania Kappner, an African American graduate of the master's of education program at the University of California at Berkeley. Like Ms. James, Ms. Kappner testified about her feelings of isolation, since the number of black students in her program dropped significantly following the passage of Proposition 209. Ms. Kappner teaches English at a high school near Berkeley, and she testified that the abolishment of affirmative action has had a demoralizing effect on her minority students.

The court also heard testimony from several university professors who, [*106] as noted above, are highly respected scholars in their various fields of endeavor. Gary Orfield is a professor of education and social policy at Harvard University. He testified extensively about racial segregation and affirmative action. His expert report, which is a collection of articles he has published on these issues, was admitted as Exhibit 167.

Professor Orfield testified that racial segregation in American public schools is particularly pronounced in the northeast and midwest sections of the country, and that Michigan is among the four most highly segregated states. n44 Of all the states, Michigan has the highest percentage (64%) of black students who attend schools whose student populations are 90-100% minority. See Exhibit 196. Detroit has the most highly segregated schools of any major metropolitan area in the country. Over 90% of the children enrolled in Detroit public schools are African American. Professor Orfield testified that racial segregation in the schools is related to segregation in housing, and he characterized housing in Detroit as "hyper-segregated." Further, Professor Orfield indicated that segregation in schools is associated with high levels of poverty [*107] which, in turn, are associated with poor resources and decreased educational opportunities. And as a rule, the poorest schools are the ones with the highest minority population. See Exhibit 197. Two-thirds of African American and 70% of Hispanic schoolchildren attend segregated schools. Professor Orfield testified that, as a result, most minority students do not receive a public education that prepares them for college. He noted, for example, that the University of Chicago has routinely rejected applicants who are Chicago valedictorians, even those from magnet schools, because city schools do not compare with schools in the suburbs. Professor Orfield has written that "college admissions officers have long known that class rank is hardly comparable from one high school to the next. The top students in many high-poverty schools are woefully unprepared for college." Exhibit 167 D, G. Orfield and E. Miller, Chilling Admissions 10 (1998).

REV_00259013

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n44 In this connection Professor Orfield meant racial separation, not de jure segregation.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*108]

Professor Orfield was also asked several questions about the effects of Hopwood v. State of Texas, 78 F.3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996), which banned the consideration of applicants' race in university admissions in the Fifth Circuit; and of Proposition 209, which in 1996 eliminated all racial preferences, including in university admissions, in California. Professor Orfield noted that following Hopwood and Proposition 209, enrollment of underrepresented minority students dropped sharply in Texas and California. For example, at the University of Texas School of Law at Austin, whose admissions system was challenged in Hopwood, the percentage of the entering class that is African American dropped from 5.8% (29 students) in 1996 to 0.9% (4 students) in 1997. n45 Native American enrollment at that law school dropped from 1.2% (six students) in 1996 to 0.2% (one student) in 1997. n46 Hispanic enrollment dropped from 9.2% (46 students) in 1996 to 6.7% (31 students) in 1997. n47 See Exhibit 131.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n45 The percentage of African American students increased to 1.8% (nine students) in 1998 but fell slightly to 1.7% (nine students) in 1999. [*109]

n46 The percentage of Native American students increased to 1.0% (five students) in 1998 but fell to 0.4% (two students) in 1999.

n47 The percentage of Hispanic students increased to 7.6% (37 students) in 1998 and to 8.1% (42 students) in 1999.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Professor Orfield also cited statistics showing that similar declines in law school enrollments occurred in California following the passage of Proposition 209. In 1996, for example, 89 Hispanics, 43 African Americans and 10 Native Americans were enrolled as first year students at the top three public California law schools. n48 In 1997, these numbers fell to 59, 16, and 4, respectively. At Berkeley, only one African American enrolled in the freshman law class in 1997, whereas 20 had been enrolled in the freshman class the year before. See Exhibit 132.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n48 By this Professor Orfield was referring to the University of California at Berkeley, the University of California at Davis, and the University of California at Los Angeles.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*110]

Part of the reason for the drop in the number of underrepresented minorities in law schools, following the elimination of affirmative action, can be seen in Exhibits 199 and 200. These exhibits are graphs showing the distribution of LSAT scores by race in 1997-1998. Exhibit 199 shows that the test scores of each racial group formed a similar bell-shaped curve, but that the curve for whites is located to the right of those of all underrepresented minority groups. This confirms the data from other exhibits, which reveal that the median LSAT score of white test-takers is significantly higher than the median underrepresented minority score. See Exhibit 137, p. 19; Exhibit 139, p. 20; Exhibit 141, p. 17. Exhibit 200 shows the distribution of LSAT scores by race, but indicates the absolute numbers of tests taken. The curve of the white test-takers absolutely dwarfs the curves of the minority test-takers; this graph dramatically illustrates the fact that the vast majority of test-takers are white and that the vast majority of high LSAT scores are obtained by white test-takers. In Professor Orfield's words, "hardly any" minority test-takers receive scores in the 169-180 range from which [*111] the best law schools expect their applicants to come.

Professor Orfield concluded that affirmative action is needed in order to achieve racial diversity at law schools because the academic averages between underrepresented minority and non-minority groups is such that a "very segregated outcome" would result if race were not considered in the admissions process. He believes there is no double standard in doing so, since most minority children are so disadvantaged in their public school education.

Professor Orfield also testified that the elimination of affirmative action in university admissions leads to a phenomenon known as "cascading," whereby minority students no longer gain admittance to the most prestigious institutions and are instead relegated to less selective ones. In his view, this is undesirable because the more prestigious universities are "leadership training institutions." n49

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n49 Professor Orfield has written:

> The reversal of affirmative admissions in higher education can drastically reduce black, Latino, and American Indian enrollment on highly selective campuses. The increased use of tests and grades as entrance standards will tend to exacerbate the existing inequities in U.S. society. If affirmative action is outlawed nationally, as it has been in Texas, the impact on access to leading public and private universities would be enormous. Many of our most able students would find themselves on campuses overwhelmingly dominated by white and Asian students. The severe isolation characteristic of our more affluent suburbs would become the rule in the institutions that train the leaders of our society and our professions. This threatens critical educational functions of universities and their ability to fully serve their communities.

Exhibit 167D, G. Orfield and E. Miller, Chilling Admissions 14 (1998).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*112]

The court also heard extensive testimony from another distinguished sociologist, Dr. Walter Allen, a professor of sociology at the University of California at Los Angeles. His expert reports were admitted as Exhibits 156-158.

Professor Allen testified that affirmative action in the law school admissions process is needed in order to counterbalance the negative effects of racism on the academic performance of underrepresented minority students in college. Professor Allen believes that underrepresented minorities suffer systematic deprivations in both housing and educational opportunities, which account for much of the "GPA gap" that exists between minority and non-minority college students. Professor Allen indicated that underrepresented minority students at predominantly white undergraduate institutions often experience a racially hostile environment, which depresses their confidence and desire to succeed academically. He stated that African American students perform better at historically black colleges and universities (HBCU's) than at predominantly white institutions because they feel validated and encouraged to succeed in the friendlier and more supportive atmosphere at HBCU's. [*113] In contrast, at predominantly white institutions, African Americans and other underrepresented minority students often feel isolated, disliked and marginalized.

REV_00259015

A constitutional challenge to a voluntarily adopted racial classification may not be defeated by the argument that elimination of the classification will or may have undesirable consequences, be they political, social, economic or otherwise.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Level of Review
Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
All racial distinctions are inherently suspect and presumptively invalid. This presumption may be overcome only upon a showing that the distinction in question serves a compelling state interest, and that the use of race is narrowly tailored to the achievement of that interest. It does not suffice for the interest in question merely to be important, beneficial, or laudable; the interest must be compelling.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race
The remedying of societal discrimination, either past or present, has is not recognized as a compelling state interest.

COUNSEL: For BARBARA GRUTTER, plaintiff: Kerry L. Morgan, Pentiuk & Couvreur, Taylor, MI.

For BARBARA GRUTTER, plaintiff: Kirk O. Kolbo, Maslon, Edelman, Minneapolis, MN.

For BARBARA GRUTTER, plaintiff: David F. Herr, Mason, Edelman, Minneapolis, MN.

For LEE BOLLINGER, JEFFREY LEHMAN, DENNIS SHIELDS, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, Regents of, defendants: John A. Payton, Jane Sherburne, Wilmer, Cutler, Washington, DC.

For LEE BOLLINGER, JEFFREY LEHMAN, DENNIS SHIELDS, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, Regents of, defendants: Leonard M. Niehoff.

For AMERICAN COUNCIL ON EDUCATION, movant: Martin Michaelson, PENDING APP., Steven J. Routh, NOT ADMITTED, Alexander E. Dreier, NOT ADMITTED, Hogan & Hartson, Washington, DC.

For UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, movant: Jeremiah Glassman, Kathryn M. Woodruff, Kenneth D. Johnson, U.S. Dept of Justice, Washington, DC.

For OHIO, STATE OF, movant: Edward B. Foley, PENDING APP, Ohio [*2] Department of Attorney General, Columbus, OH.

For ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN LAW SCHOOLS, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UNIVERSITIES AND LAND GRANT COLLEGES, COMMITTEE ON INSTITUTIONAL COOPERATION, WAYNE STATE UNIVERSITY, movants: Richard A. Wilhelm, Dickinson, Wright, Bloomfield Hills, MI.

JUDGES: BERNARD A. FRIEDMAN, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

OPINIONBY: BERNARD A. FRIEDMAN

OPINION: FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

On December 22, 2000, the court heard oral argument in this case on the parties' cross motions for summary judgment. The court took the motions under advisement and identified the issues for trial. Over a period of 15 days in January and February 2001, the court conducted a bench trial. In this opinion, the court shall rule on the motions and make findings of fact and conclusions of law.

REV_00258980

Professor Allen studied the racial climate at four of the undergraduate institutions which supply a portion of the students who apply to the University of Michigan Law School. The "feeder schools" selected for this research were the University of Michigan, Michigan State University, the University of California at Berkeley, and Harvard University. Professor Allen also studied the racial climate at the law school itself. His research was conducted at these campuses principally by studying the responses of minority and non-minority students in focus groups and surveys.

Professor Allen concluded that the students at the four feeder campuses "described the overall racial climate of their campuses as a place where they feel their presence is questioned and belittled." Exhibit 157, p. 11. The underrepresented minority focus group participants described various items which contributed to this climate, including insensitive or racist remarks by faculty and students, a feeling of isolation due to the low number of fellow students [*114] of the same race, avoidance of racial issues in classroom discussions, the lack of minority role models such as faculty members, exclusion from white study groups, and unequal treatment by campus police. Some of the focus group participants also indicated that the negative racial climate caused them to feel alienated and discouraged and that this harmed their academic performance.

Professor Allen also surveyed 200 students at the feeder institutions. Thirty-five percent felt discriminated against at their campus because of their race, and 47% felt they had been unfairly graded. See Exhibit 157, p. 51. However, 75% felt they had made the right choice in attending their undergraduate institution, and 84% "would definitely recommend their university to other students who want to attend college." Id. pp. 51, 55.

The court also heard testimony from Professor John Hope Franklin, a renowned historian with special expertise in the history of race relations in the United States. n50 His expert report was admitted as Exhibit 163. Professor Franklin described his personal experiences as the victim of racial discrimination as an undergraduate student in Nashville, as a graduate student [*115] doing research in North Carolina, and as a young history professor seeking housing in Brooklyn. Professor Franklin testified that even now, as a distinguished educator and historian, he experiences racism. For example, in recent years he has been approached more than once by a white person in a hotel lobby or private club who asked him to fetch her coat or car. Professor Franklin believes that great strides have been made in improving race relations, but that much more remains to be done. Professor Franklin believes that active effort is needed to eliminate the race problem, and that the abolishment of affirmative action at universities is a step toward resegregation. However, he also expressed the belief that academic standards should not be lowered for minority students, and that all people should be judged on their individual merits.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n50 Additional testimony about this history of racial discrimination in the United States was provided by Dr. Eric Foner, a professor of American history at Columbia University.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*116]

Three witnesses testified on the subject of bias in standardized testing. This was important testimony, given the significance of such tests in undergraduate and graduate admissions. The first such witness was Jay Rosner, the executive director of the San Francisco office of the Princeton Review Foundation (PRF). The PRF is affiliated with the Princeton Review, an organization that provides LSAT preparation courses to approximately 10,000 students each year. The PRF focuses on providing such courses to underrepresented minority students.

Mr. Rosner's expert reports were admitted as Exhibits 168 and 169. He testified that the LSAT is developed and administered by the Law School Admission Council (LSAC), which claims that the LSAT score helps predict students' first year grades in law school. However, according to Mr. Rosner, the actual correlation is only 16-20%, which is to say that 80-84% of first year law school grades are not predicted by the LSAT. Mr. Rosner stated that test preparation courses like those offered by the Princeton Review, or by its competitor Kaplan, Inc., generally improve one's LSAT score by approximately seven points.

REV_00259016

Mr. Rosner testified that the PRF engages [*117] in "targeted outreach" to offer its test preparation services to African American and other minority students. In his experience, white students are aware of the benefits of taking such a course, but minority students do not share this awareness. For example, at Howard University, a predominantly African American institution, Mr. Rosner once had difficulty filling the 15 seats in an LSAT preparation course, despite the fact that the customary $ 1,000 fee was reduced to $ 200. He also testified that despite PRF's outreach efforts, the vast majority of the students who take an LSAT preparation course are white, and that this fact accounts for some of the test-score gap between minority and non-minority test-takers.

Martin Shapiro, a professor of psychology at Emory University, testified on the issue of bias in standardized testing. He also submitted an expert report, which was admitted as Exhibit 170. Professor Shapiro testified that standardized admission tests, by the manner in which new test questions are "pretested," tend to perpetuate bias against groups which have performed poorly on the tests in the past. He also noted the large difference between the average LSAT score for whites [*118] and blacks, and the weak correlation, of about 27%, between performance on the LSAT and first year law school grades.

On the issue of bias in standardized testing, the court also heard testimony from David White, director of Testing for the Public, a group which offers test preparation courses for women and minority students. His expert report was accepted as Exhibit 173. White provided information similar to that provided by Dr. Larntz regarding the gaps in LSAT scores and UGPA's between whites and underrepresented minorities. Exhibit 219 shows that while 46% of white law school applicants in 1996-1997 scored at or above 155 on the LSAT, only 8% of black applicants did so. While 46% of white applicants had a UGPA of 3.25 or above, only 17% of black applicants had a UGPA in this range. And while 27% of white applicants had both qualifications, only 3% of black applicants had both. Whites on average score higher on the LSAT than any other racial group at all socioeconomic levels. See Exhibits 220, 221. Even among applicants who attend the same undergraduate institution and have the same undergraduate GPA, the LSAT gap as compared to white applicants is 4.0 points for Native Americans, [*119] 6.8 points for Hispanics, and 9.2 points for African Americans. See Exhibit 223.

The court also heard testimony from Dr. Eugene Garcia, the Dean of the School of Education at the University of California at Berkeley. His expert report was admitted as Exhibit 164. Dr. Garcia testified about the effects of Proposition 209 on student admissions at the eight campuses of the University of California system. n51 From 1995 to 2000, underrepresented minority admissions dropped by 1% overall. See Exhibit 213. Underrepresented minority admissions at the most selective campuses, Los Angeles and Berkeley, have dropped by 45% and 42%, respectively, whereas the admission rates at Santa Cruz and Riverside, which are less selective, have increased by 27% and 87%, respectively. n52 Dr. Garcia attributed these changes to the fact that underrepresented minority applicants generally have lower GPA's and test scores. Their lower average GPA is due in large part to the generally poorer quality of the schools attended by underresented minority students. And their lower average test scores are to some extent due to the fact that standardized tests, like the SAT and LSAT, are "heavily loaded with [*120] academic English." This disadvantages many Hispanics because English is their second language. African Americans are also disadvantaged because many -- 60% by his estimate -- speak "Black English." Dr. Garcia indicated that test preparation courses do improve test scores, but that these courses are expensive, which adds to the disadvantage against poorer groups. Dr. Garcia characterized the loss of underrepresented minority students at Los Angeles and Berkeley, and the corresponding gain of underrepresented minority students at Santa Cruz and Riverside, as a "redistribution" within the University of California system. This is the phenomenon which Professor Orfield called "cascading."

REV_00259017

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n51 The University of California has campuses at Los Angeles, Berkeley, San Diego, Irvine, Davis, Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz, and Riverside.

n52 Exhibit 214 shows applications, admissions, admissions rates, and enrollment figures for the years 1995 to 2000 at all of the University of California campuses by the race of the applicants. It appears that the most significant declines in admission rates occurred among African Americans, Native Americans, Chicanos and Latinos at Berkeley, Los Angeles and San Diego. The court notes that admission rates of whites and Asian Americans also dropped at most of the campuses over the same time period, albeit less dramatically. At San Diego, for example, the admission rate for Asian Americans fell from 62.8% in 1995 to 46.1% in 2000. At Santa Barbara, the admission rate for whites fell from 85.3% in 1995 to 48.9% in 2000.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*121]

Dr. Garcia testified that the University of California has been unable to admit underrepresented minority students in significant numbers by any means other than by explicitly considering race in admissions. He favors race-conscious admissions policies because they enable universities to consider historical discrimination against particular racial groups. Dr. Garcia testified that a decrease in racial diversity at universities decreases the quality of the educational experience for all students. He also expressed the belief that institutions of higher education prepare students to take leadership roles later in life, and that part of this preparation should include exposure to people of other races, particularly in light of the fact that American society is itself becoming increasingly diverse.

On cross-examination, Dr. Garcia acknowledged that at the school of education of which he is the dean, 28% of this year's class consists of underrepresented minority students. Dr. Garcia indicated that the school of education was able to achieve this level of diversity by decreasing reliance on the Graduate Record Examination (GRE), and by expending greater effort in recruiting new students. [*122]

The court also heard testimony from Faith Smith, the president of Native American Educational Services (NAES) College; and Frank Wu, an associate professor of law at Howard University. Ms. Smith testified about the educational difficulties which face Native Americans, and the importance of increasing the number of Native American lawyers. Her expert report was admitted as Exhibit 171. Professor Wu testified about the historical and present societal discrimination against Asian Americans, particularly in the areas of employment and housing. His expert report was admitted as Exhibit 175.

Finally, the intervenors called Professor Richard Lempert. As noted above, Professor Lempert has served for many years on the faculty of the law school as well as in the sociology department at the University of Michigan. While the defendants called him to testify about the genesis of the law school's admissions policy, the intervenors called him to testify about a survey study he and others performed which examined the career success of underrepresented minority graduates of the law school. Professor Lempert's study, and a condensed version thereof, were admitted as Exhibits 165 and 166.

While Professor [*123] Lempert's report is quite lengthy, he summarized the main conclusions as follows:

> The results reveal that almost all of Michigan Law School's minority graduates pass a bar exam and go on to have careers that appear successful by > conventional measures. In particular, the survey indicates that minority graduates (defined so as to include graduates with African American, Latino, and Native American backgrounds) are no less successful than white graduates, whether success is measured by the log of current income, self-reported satisfaction, or an index of service contributions. Also, although an admissions index that combines LSAT scores and undergraduate grade-point average is a significant predictor of law school grades, it does not predict career success on any of our three outcome measures. n53

Exhibit 166, p. 1. Professor Lempert also wrote:

> What we find is a strong, statistically significant relationship between LSAT and UGPA, on the one hand, and grades at the end of three years of law school on the other. But we find no significant relationship between the LSAT or UGPA and what matters more -- the achievement of students after graduation. Drawing on work [*124] done in connection with the affirmative action lawsuit against the University of Michigan Law School, we can also say that had the LSAT and the UGPA been the only criteria for admissions at Michigan, few of Michigan's minority graduates would have been admitted to the school, even though their career success since law school is similar to the career success of Michigan's white graduates and consistent with the aspirations Michigan has for all students it admits.

Id. at 33-34. In his testimony, Professor Lempert also indicated that the law school's race-conscious admissions policy has helped to integrate the legal profession. He testified that if affirmative action in admissions did not exist, the number of underrepresented minorities admitted to any law school in the country would be reduced by 75%. Not only would underrepresented minority applicants "cascade down" to less selective law schools, but they probably would, if admitted, simply displace other minority applicants. Professor Lempert believes that the LSAT is a valid predictor of academic success in law school (though not of later success in the profession), and he does not believe there are any "hard data" showing [*125] any racial bias against minorities in terms of the LSAT's predictive capacity. See also Exhibit 166, p. 34 ("LSAT scores and an index based on LSAT scores and UGPAs are significantly correlated with both first-year and final law school grade-point averages").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n53 Professor Lempert found that the law school's "admissions index" (combination of LSAT score and UGPA) was an equally poor predictor of career success for both minority and white alumni. See Exhibit 166, pp. 94-99 (Tables 29A, 29B, 29C, 30A, 30B, 30C).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

B. Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

From this extensive body of evidence, the court makes the following findings and conclusions.

1.

First, there is no question about the long and tragic history of race discrimination in this country. At different times in history, Native Americans have been deprived of land and forced onto reservations; African Americans have been held in slavery; and Asian Americans have been detained in internment camps. Many ethnic and racial groups -- including, [*126] but not limited to, the underrepresented minority groups identified by the law school's admissions policy -- have been victims of discrimination in housing, employment, education, public accommodations, and elsewhere.

REV_00259019

While American public policy has sought to eradicate race discrimination, its lingering effects are apparent. As Professor Wu has written, "For many people of color, racism has decreased the amount and value of economic, social, and cultural capital inherited from our ancestors. Not only did we receive less material wealth, we also received less 'insider knowledge' and fewer social contacts so instrumental to one's educational and professional advancement in America." Exhibit 175, p. 131. The lingering effects can be seen, for example, in lower education rates and higher poverty rates among some minority groups as compared to whites. n54 n54 While not introduced at trial, defendants did submit a report from Dr. Thomas Sugrue, a professor of history and sociology at the University of Pennsylvania, in support of their motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity. Professor Sugrue cites census data showing the significant disparities along racial lines in educational attainment, unemployment rates, income levels, poverty rates, and household net worth. See Sugrue Report, pp. 50, 53-57.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*127]

2.

The evidence presented at trial also made clear that underrepresented minority groups have, on average, lower undergraduate grade-point averages than whites. Among applicants accepted by the University of Michigan law school from 1995 through 2000, the median UGPA of every underrepresented minority group has been lower than the median UGPA of Caucasians by approximately one-tenth to three-tenths of a point. n55 A greater gap exists in LSAT scores. From 1995 to 2000, the median LSAT score of the underrepresented minority groups has been lower than the median LSAT score of Caucasians by approximately seven to nine points. n56

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n55 The median undergraduate GPA for accepted applicants, by race, is shown in Exhibit 137, p. 21; Exhibit 139, p. 19; and Exhibit 141, p. 16. The smallest difference between the Caucasian UGPA and an underrepresented minority group UGPA was .05 (Caucasian vs. Puerto Rican in 1996, and Caucasian vs. Native American in 1998). The largest difference was .41 (Caucasian vs. African American in 2000). Averaging the figures over the six years, one sees that the gap between the Caucasian UGPA was .21 for Native Americans, .32 for African Americans, .14 for Mexican Americans, and .22 for Puerto Ricans. [*128] n56 The median LSAT scores for accepted applicants, by race, is shown in Exhibit 137, p.22; Exhibit 139, p. 20; and Exhibit 141, p. 17. The smallest difference between the Caucasian LSAT score and an underrepresented minority group LSAT score was three points (Caucasian vs. Native American in 2000). The largest different was 12 points (Caucasian vs. African American in 2000). Averaging the figures over the six years, one sees that the point gap between the Caucasian LSAT score was 6.8 for Native Americans, 9.6 for African Americans, 7 for Mexican Americans, and 7.6 for Puerto Ricans.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The reasons for the "GPA gap" and the "LSAT gap" are complex. While one must be cautious in making generalizations, the evidence at trial clearly indicates that much of the GPA gap is due to the fact that disproportionate numbers of Native Americans, African Americans, and Hispanics live and go to school in impoverished areas of the country. It should not surprise anyone that students who attend schools where books are lacking, where classrooms are overcrowded, and where Advanced Placement or other higher level courses [*129] are not offered are at a competitive disadvantage as compared with students whose schools do not suffer from such shortcomings. An educational deficit in the K-12 years will, for most students, have a negative ripple effect on academic performance in college. Ms. Escobar, for example, had to drop out of the pre-med program in college because her high school, a large public school in Chicago, failed to provide her with the necessary mathematics and science background. Of course, students of any race will have difficulty "catching up" in college if they have had a poor K-12 education.

REV_00259020

The intervenors have also argued that the GPA gap is due in part to the racially hostile environment at college and university campuses. The court does not doubt that many underrepresented minority students find the racial climate hostile at the law school's "feeder" institutions. Nor does the court doubt that such a climate can have a negative effect on these students' academic performance. Nonetheless, the court is unable to give any weight to Professor Allen's study of this issue, due to the small number of students who participated in the focus groups and surveys and due to the manner in which the [*130] students were selected.

Regarding the small numbers, the court notes that a total of 65 students participated in Professor Allen's focus groups. Of these, 18 were white and Asian students; only 47 were members of the underrepresented minority groups at issue in this case. n57 Of these 47 students, 20 participated in four focus groups at the University of Michigan; 15 participated in three focus groups at Berkeley; eleven participated in two focus groups at Harvard; and one participated in one focus group at Michigan State University. See Exhibit 157, Figure 2. n58 Similarly small numbers of underrepresented minority students participated in the surveys. Of the 200 total respondents, 140 were African Americans, Hispanics or Native Americans, 47 of whom were participants in the focus groups. See Exhibit 157(2), Tables 3, 6, 9 and 12. At trial, Professor Allen acknowledged that it is difficult to make generalizations based on results from such small sample sizes. The court seriously doubts whether any reliable generalizations can be made about the racial climate at the feeder institutions, whose total student population well exceeds 125,000, based on the information gathered [*131] from 47 focus group participants and 140 survey respondents.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n57 All 47 of these students were African American or Hispanic. No Native Americans participated in the focus groups. See Exhibit 157, Figure 2.

n58 At trial Professor Allen indicated that focus groups 1, 2, 5, 8, 9 and 11 were conducted at The University of Michigan; focus groups 4, 6 and 10 were conducted at Berkeley; focus groups 3 and 7 were conducted at Harvard; and focus group 12 was conducted at Michigan State University.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The reliability of Professor Allen's conclusions is further undermined by the manner in which students were solicited for inclusion in the research project. While Professor Allen supervised the focus groups and the composition of the survey, he relied on student volunteers to recruit the study's participants. Several of these solicitations, in the form of electronic mail and facsimile transmissions, were co-authored by United for Equality and Affirmative Action, which is one of the intervenors in this case. These solicitations [*132] called upon students "to contribute to a legal case that will impact the educational opportunities of minority students for generations to come. It is our 'Brown v. Board of Education' and we must do everything we can to ensure a victory." Exhibit 176. Other solicitations began with the heading, "URGENT - PLEASE PARTICIPATE IN A STUDY FOR THE U OF M AFFIRMATIVE ACTION CASES." Exhibit 177. These solicitations also indicated that "the student intervenors in the watershed University of Michigan affirmative action cases are seeking students . . . ." Id. Professor Allen acknowledged that the wording of these solicitations "possibly" could have biased the selection process. The court believes not only that such bias may have occurred, but that it surely did occur, because the solicitations clearly communicated a desire to attract research participants who shared a particular viewpoint.

The court has three other difficulties with Professor Allen's research results. The first is that they fail to quantify the degree to which the academic performance of underrepresented minority students is reduced by the racially hostile environment at the feeder institutions. Nor did the evidence show [*133] that the academic performance of all underrepresented minority students is reduced to the same extent, or whether the effect varies from one individual to another. Thus, even if it were constitutionally permissible for the law school to consider the race of underrepresented minority applicants in order to compensate for the reduction in their grades and test scores attributable to a racially hostile environment in college, the court has no means of knowing the permissible extent of such compensation, either for particular individuals or for all underrepresented minority law school applicants.

Second, even if the effect of a racially hostile environment on academic performance could be quantified, no testimony was offered as to the percentage or numbers of underrepresented minority students at the University of Michigan Law School who come from the four "feeder" institutions. n59 Nor was any testimony or other evidence offered to show whether the racial climate at other undergraduate institutions from which underrepresented minority law students have graduated is hostile to the same degree as at the four feeder schools. Thus, it is impossible to know whether Professor Allen's findings [*134] apply to most or only some of the underrepresented minority law school applicants.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n59 The magnitude of this flaw is suggested by Exhibit 18, which identifies all of the undergraduate schools which graduated students who entered the law school's 1995 class. Of the 337 students in that class, only 85 (25%) came from the four "feeder" institutions studied by Professor Allen. The remaining 252 students (75%) came from 106 other colleges and universities which were not included in the study.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Third, Professor Allen's research failed to inquire into the effects of racial hostility on the academic performance of minority groups other than African Americans, Latinos, Asian Americans and Native Americans. It seems quite likely that Arab students, or those from eastern or southern Europe, or adherents of a religious minority, may also to one degree or another be subjected to a hostile undergraduate environment. Given the narrow focus of Professor Allen's research project, the court and the law school admissions office [*135] can only guess as to precisely which applicants are entitled to a "boost."

3.

The gap in LSAT scores between underrepresented minorities and Caucasians is even more difficult to explain than the gap in undergraduate GPA's. The intervenors contend that this gap is due to various factors, including cultural bias in the LSAT and a psychological phenomenon experienced by underrepresented minority test-takers known as "stereotype threat." The court is unable to find that anything in the content or design of the LSAT biases the test for or against any racial group. If such a bias exists, it was not proved at trial. Jay Rosner gave some testimony about "white preference" and "black preference" questions on the SAT (not the LSAT). Three of these questions appeared in newspaper articles in 1997 and 1999, while Mr. Rosner found others in unspecified "'88-'89 ETS data." See Exhibits 202-210. The court is unable to give any weight to this testimony, as Mr. Rosner is not an expert in test design. Nor did he claim to have studied, or to have the expertise to study, the issue of bias in standardized tests. Professor Shapiro testified generally as to how pre-testing procedures can be used to [*136] perpetuate a test-score gap, but he did not testify that such procedures are used in connection with the LSAT. Professor Shapiro and David White testified about the existence of the LSAT gap, but they did not demonstrate to the court's satisfaction that the gap is due to the selection of the test questions or the design of the test.

The intervenors have also suggested that underrepresented minority students do less well than Caucasians on the LSAT, and on other standardized tests, because of a psychological phenomenon known as "stereotype threat." No witnesses testified directly on this subject. However, defendants did file a report by Dr. Claude Steele, a psychology professor at Stanford University who has done some research in this area. See Appendix in support of defendants' motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity, volume 3. Professor Steele writes that stereotype threat > refers to the experience of being in a situation where one recognizes that a negative stereotype about one's group is applicable to oneself. When this happens, one knows that one could be judged or treated in terms of that stereotype, or that one could inadvertently do something [*137] that would confirm it. In situations where one cares very much about one's performance or related outcomes -- as in the case of serious students taking the SAT -- this threat of being negatively stereotyped can be upsetting and distracting. Our research confirms that when this threat occurs in the midst of taking a high stakes standardized test, it directly interferes with performance.

Steele Report, p. 7. Professor Steele indicates that he once conducted an experiment where black and white Stanford University sophomores were given a difficult verbal test, using questions from the advanced Graduate Record Examination in literature. When the students were told that their ability was being tested, the black students performed "dramatically worse" than did the white students. But when the students were told that the test was a "problem-solving task," not a measure of ability, black and white performance was the same. Id. at 8. Professor Steele indicates that he has performed other research which "shows stereotype threat to be a very general effect, one that is undoubtedly capable of undermining the standardized test performance of any group negatively stereotyped in the area [*138] of achievement tested by the test." Id. at 9.

Due to the sparseness of the evidence on this issue, the court is unable to determine whether stereotype threat explains any part of the gap between Caucasian and underrepresented minority LSAT scores. Professor Steele's report describes his research only in the most general terms. He reports the results of only one experiment he performed using the GRE, and he does not indicate when the experiment was done, how many students participated, whether the results were tested for statistical significance, or whether the results were published and subjected to peer review. Nor has Professor Steele provided any evidence, by way of survey data for example, to show that the members of any particular racial group perceive themselves as being the object of a stereotype that expects underachievement. Professor Steele does not quantify the effect of stereotype threat; nor, at least according to this report, has he performed any research on the LSAT. If there is evidence showing that stereotype threat accounts for some of the LSAT gap, it was not produced in this case.

The intervenors' witnesses offered two explanations for the LSAT gap which the [*139] court does find plausible. The first is that the LSAT, and other standardized tests, are written in what Dr. Garcia characterized as "academic English." Evidence at trial indicated that this causes a problem for underrepresented minority students, many of whom do not speak English, or do not speak standard English, as their first language. The second is that underrepresented minority students are less likely to take an LSAT preparation course, which could increase one's score. Mr. Rosner testified that underrepresented minority students enroll in such courses only in "token numbers." This may well be due to the cost of taking a test preparation course, although Mr. Rosner testified that in his experience underrepresented minority students are simply less aware than are Caucasian students about the benefits such a course can provide.

REV_00259023

4.

The intervenors have argued strenuously that the law school's race-conscious admissions policy does not apply lower academic standards to underrepresented minority applicants than are applied to non-minority applicants. In this view, there is no "double standard" in the admissions process because the UGPA gap and the LSAT gap are attributable to past [*140] and present discrimination against underrepresented minorities in the form of segregation in housing and schools, a racially hostile environment at undergraduate institutions, cultural bias in standardized tests, and stereotype threat. That is to say, underrepresented minority applicants are actually performing at a higher academic level than is suggested by their undergraduate grade-point averages and LSAT scores because of the more difficult conditions under which they were obtained. Therefore, the intervenors argue, the law school's race-conscious admissions policy simply "levels the playing field," or compensates for the differing levels of adversity, by giving some degree of preference to underrepresented minority applicants.

The court has made its findings on the factual issues relevant to this inquiry and, as noted above, the court concludes that the comparatively lower grades and test scores of underrepresented minorities is attributable, at least in part, to general, societal racial discrimination against these groups. While the court may agree with some of the factual underpinnings of the intervenors' argument, the legal conclusion they draw therefrom is flawed both as a [*141] matter of logic and as a matter of constitutional law.

The logical flaw in the argument is that it assumes all members of the underrepresented minority groups have suffered adversity entitling them to some degree of upward adjustment in their UGPA and LSAT scores. Conversely, the intervenors' argument assumes that no members of non-minority groups have suffered any such adversity which would entitle them to a similar adjustment in their grades and scores. Of course, neither assumption is correct. Every law school applicant is an individual whose personal history is unique. Some applicants, regardless of their race, may have been the victims of racial discrimination or have attended a substandard school or have grown up in poverty, while others will have been more fortunate. There is no basis in logic or in the evidence for assuming that all members of some racial groups are victims of adverse circumstances or, conversely, that all members of other racial groups are beneficiaries of privilege.

The legal flaw in the intervenors' conclusion is even more daunting, and it is this: the Supreme Court has held that the effects of general, societal discrimination cannot constitutionally be [*142] remedied by race-conscious decision-making. For example, in Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 274, 90 L. Ed. 2d 260, 106 S. Ct. 1842 (1986), the Supreme Court stated that it "never has held that societal discrimination alone is sufficient to justify a racial classification. Rather, the Court has insisted upon some showing of prior discrimination by the governmental unit involved before allowing limited use of racial classifications in order to remedy such discrimination." n60 See also id. at 276 ("Societal discrimination, without more, is too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy.") n61 In the present case there has been no evidence, or even an allegation, that the law school or the University of Michigan has engaged in racial discrimination. All of the evidence submitted by the intervenors relates to discrimination on the part of society at large or by entities other than the law school or the University of Michigan. As a matter of federal constitutional law, the law school is not permitted to "level the playing field" in the manner urged by the intervenors. That is, the law school may not consider the race of applicants in order to compensate for [*143] the effects of discrimination by others or by society generally.

REV_00259024

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n60 This statement is from Part I of Justice Powell's opinion, which was joined by Justices Burger and Rehnquist. Justice O'Connor filed a concurring opinion in which she specifically joined Part I of Justice Powell's opinion, see 476 U.S. at 294, and "agreed with the plurality that a governmental agency's interest in remedying 'societal' discrimination, that is, discrimination not traceable to its own actions, cannot be deemed sufficiently compelling to pass constitutional muster under strict scrutiny." 476 U.S. at 288. Justice White also concurred in the judgment and wrote that "none of the interests asserted by the Board, singly or together, justify this racially discriminatory layoff policy and save it from the strictures of the Equal Protection Clause." 476 U.S. at 295. Thus, five members of the court indicated that the Fourteenth Amendment does not permit government to make racial classifications in order to remedy societal discrimination.

n61 This statement is from Part III-A of Justice Powell's opinion, in which Justices Burger, Rehnquist and O'Connor joined. Justice White, in a concurring opinion, tacitly agreed with the statement by indicating that "none of the interests asserted by the Board, singly or together, justify this racially discriminatory layoff policy and save it from the structures of the Equal Protection Clause." 476 U.S. at 295.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*144]

5.

The intervenors' other argument in support of the law school's race-conscious admissions policy is that it is necessary in order to prevent "resegregation." The intervenors fear that if the law school is prohibited from considering race in admissions, then the number of underrepresented minority students will fall dramatically, perhaps to mere "token" levels. They point to the law schools at Austin and Berkeley, where underrepresented minority enrollment fell sharply following the elimination of affirmative action, as examples of what may occur here.

The court agrees that it would be unfortunate if the number of students from any racial group would decline at the University of Michigan Law School. It is the court's sincere hope that such consequences can be avoided, and some evidence adduced at trial suggested that they can be. Dr. Garcia testified that Berkeley's school of education has succeeded in constituting a class that is 28% minority by increasing its recruiting efforts and decreasing its reliance on standardized test scores. At the most selective law schools in the University of California system, the underrepresented minority population increased from 9.3% of the entering [*145] class in 1999 to 10.5% in 2000. See Exhibit 132. Throughout the University of California system, underrepresented minority admissions decreased just one percent from 1995 to 2000, although one must recognize the significant shift of the underrepresented minority student population from the more to the less selective campuses during this time period. See Exhibit 213.

Regardless of one's analysis of the admissions data in California and Texas, the constitutionality of the current admissions system at the University of Michigan Law School does not turn on the predicted consequences of instituting a race-blind admissions system. The current system is either constitutional or it is not. The court is unaware of any precedent for the proposition that a constitutional challenge to a voluntarily adopted racial classification may be defeated by the argument that elimination of the classification will or

I. Introduction

Plaintiff Barbara Grutter commenced this action in December 1997. Ms. Grutter alleges that in 1996 she applied for admission to the University of Michigan Law School (hereinafter "the law school"). At first plaintiff was placed on a waiting list, but in June 1997 her application was rejected. Plaintiff, who is Caucasian, alleges that her application was [*3] rejected because the law school uses race as a "predominant" factor, giving minority n1 applicants "a significantly greater chance of admission than students with similar credentials from disfavored racial groups." Complaint PP 20, 23. In their answer to the complaint, defendants "state that they do have a current intention to continue using race as a factor in admissions, as part of a broad array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important element." Answer PP 9, 23.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 Unless indicated otherwise, the court uses the terms "minorities," "minority groups," and "underrepresented minorities" interchangeably in this opinion to refer to African American, Native American, Mexican American and mainland Puerto Rican students, as these are identified in University of Michigan Law School documents as the groups which receive special attention in the admissions process.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Plaintiff asserts two claims. First, she claims that defendants discriminated against her on [*4] the basis of her race, thereby violating her rights to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. n2 This claim is brought under 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981 and 1983. Second, plaintiff claims that defendants violated Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d, which prohibits recipients of federal funds from discriminating on the basis of race. n3 For relief, plaintiff seeks a declaratory judgment to the effect that her rights were violated; an injunction prohibiting racial discrimination in admissions; compensatory and punitive damages; an order requiring defendants to admit her to the law school; and attorney fees and costs. The defendants are Lee Bollinger, the dean of the law school from 1987 to 1994 and president of the University of Michigan from 1997 to the present; Jeffrey Lehman, the dean of the law school from 1994 to the present; Dennis Shields, the director of admissions at the law school from 1991 to 1998; the regents of the University of Michigan; and the University of Michigan Law School.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n2 Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution states:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. [*5]

n3 42 U.S.C. § 2000d states: "No person in the United States shall, on the ground of race, color, or national origin, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

REV_00258981

may have undesirable consequences, be they political, social, economic or otherwise. n62 If undesirable consequences are likely or even certain to occur, the answer is not to retain the unconstitutional racial classification but to search for lawful solutions, ones that treat all people [*146] equally and do not use race as a factor.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n62 This is not a case where a challenge to a desegregation order is opposed on the grounds that the order must be kept in place lest the school district revert to a racially segregated state. See, e.g., Belk v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 233 F.3d 232 (4th Cir. 2000) (opinion vacated). Nor, with all due respect to the intervenors' counsel, can the present admissions policy be defended on the grounds that its elimination would result in the creation of an all-white campus. In this connection the intervenors have raised the specter of Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 94 L. Ed. 1114, 70 S. Ct. 848 (1950), in which the Supreme Court struck down the de jure exclusion of blacks from the University of Texas Law School and the creation of a separate law school for black students. There is simply no comparison between the de jure segregation at issue in Sweatt and a race-blind admissions policy which may admit fewer underrepresented minority students than are admitted by a race-conscious policy.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*147]

One such solution may be to relax, or even eliminate, reliance on the LSAT. The evidence presented at trial indicated that the LSAT predicts law school grades rather poorly (with a correlation of only 10-20%) and that it does not predict success in the legal profession at all. If, as its admissions policy states, the law school seeks students who "have substantial promise for success in law school" and "a strong likelihood of succeeding in the practice of law," one must wonder why the law school concerns itself at all with an applicant's LSAT score. Defense counsel, and counsel for the intervenors, asserted at trial that the American Bar Association (ABA) and the Association of American Law Schools (AALS) will not accredit law schools which do not require applicants to submit an LSAT score. This is not entirely accurate. Standard 503 of the ABA's Standards for the Approval of Law Schools states:

> A law school shall require all applicants to take an acceptable test for the purpose of assessing the applicants' capability of satisfactorily completing its education program. A law school that is not using the Law School Admission Test sponsored by the Law School Admission Council [*148] shall establish that it is using an acceptable test.

Section 6-2 of the AALS bylaws, which covers law school admissions, states:

> a. A member school shall admit only those applicants who appear to have the capacity to meet its academic standards.
>
> b. In order that appropriate intellectual rigor may be maintained, a member school shall admit to its first professional degree program only those applicants who have the level of intellectual maturity and accomplishment normally demonstrated by the award of an undergraduate degree.
>
> c. A member school shall deal fairly with applicants for admission.

Exhibit 31. Thus, neither accrediting organization requires law schools to require applicants to take the LSAT. While the ABA does require law schools to "require all applicants to take an acceptable test," such as the LSAT, it does not require that law schools give the test results any particular weight. n63

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n63 The court did not hear any testimony as to whether the University of Michigan Law School has considered reducing its reliance on the LSAT or whether it has considered challenging the ABA's requirement that applicants take "an acceptable test."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*149]

Another solution may be for the law school to relax its reliance on undergraduate GPA. The law school's admissions policy acknowledges that, even in combination, the LSAT score and undergraduate GPA are "far from perfect" predictors of success in law school. In fact, the policy asserts that the correlation between the index score and first-year law school grades is merely 27%. See Exhibit 4, Admissions Policy, p. 3. The policy also notes the obvious fact that high undergraduate grades may overstate an applicant's academic achievements or promise, and that low grades may understate them. To determine the significance of an applicant's undergraduate GPA, the law school's admissions officers say they consider such factors as the difficulty of the course work and the reputation of the undergraduate institution. The law school may be able to counterbalance some of the negative effect of the UGPA gap by also determining whether individual applicants have had to overcome any particularly challenging or difficult obstacles. So long as the law school acknowledges that such obstacles may confront an applicant of any race, consideration might be given to such things as growing up in [*150] difficult family circumstances, attending underfunded public schools, or learning English as a second language.

Another solution may be for the law school to reduce or eliminate the preference now given to the sons and daughters of University of Michigan alumni. The current admissions director testified that applicants with a family connection to alumni are given "careful consideration," although this factor adds nothing in terms of diversity. Common sense would suggest that a preference of this nature perpetuates past imbalances and has no connection to any measure of "merit."

In this regard, the court would make the obvious observation that, ultimately, the law school student population naturally will become racially diverse under a race-blind admissions system when the gaps in LSAT scores, undergraduate GPA's, and other measures of academic performance are eliminated by investing greater educational resources in currently under-performing primary and secondary school systems. Dr. Garcia testified to some of the efforts being made in this regard in California. This is a social and political matter, which calls for social and political solutions. The solution is not for the law [*151] school, or any other state institution, to prefer some applicants over others because of race.

Whatever solution the law school elects to pursue, it must be race neutral. The focus must be upon the merit of individual applicants, not upon assumed characteristics of racial groups. An admissions policy that treats any applicants differently from others on account of their race is unfair and unconstitutional. As a matter of constitutional law, such a system cannot be justified on the grounds that certain races are at a greater competitive disadvantage than others because of discrimination or other societal conditions which may have created an "uneven playing field." Nor can a race-conscious system be upheld based on the predicted consequences of moving to a race-blind system. In sum, the court must reject the arguments raised by the intervenors in defense of the law school's current admissions policy.

IV. Conclusion

The Supreme Court has often stated that "distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry [are] odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality." Wygant, 476 U.S. at 273, quoting Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 100, 87 L. Ed. 1774, 63 S. Ct. 1375 (1943). [*152] In our history, such distinctions generally have been used for improper purposes. Even when used for "benign" purposes, they always have the potential for causing great divisiveness. For these reasons, all racial distinctions are inherently suspect and presumptively invalid. This presumption may be overcome only upon a showing that the distinction in question serves a compelling state interest, and that the use of race is narrowly tailored to the achievement of that interest. It does not suffice for the interest in question merely to be important, beneficial, or laudable; the interest must be compelling.

For the reasons stated in this opinion, the court concludes that the University of Michigan Law School's use of race as a factor in its admissions decisions is unconstitutional and a violation of Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The law school's justification for using race -- to assemble a racially diverse student population -- is not a compelling state interest. Even if it were, the law school has not narrowly tailored its use of race to achieve that interest. Nor may the law school's use of race be justified on the alternative grounds urged by the intervenors -- to "level [*153] the playing field" between applicants of minority and non-minority races -- because the remedying of societal discrimination, either past or present, has not been recognized as a compelling state interest. n64 Accordingly, n64 The court notes again that no party in this case has alleged, or offered any evidence to suggest, that the law school or the University of Michigan has committed any acts of discrimination against any minority group which might warrant a race-based remedy.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

IT IS ORDERED that plaintiffs' request for declaratory relief is granted. The court finds and declares that the University of Michigan Law School's use of race in its admissions decisions violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief is granted. The University of Michigan Law School is hereby enjoined from using applicants' race as a factor in its admissions decisions.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the parties' [*154] various motions for summary judgment are denied, except that the motion of the individual defendants for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity is granted.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the clerk schedule the damages phase of the trial.

Dated: March 27, 2001

Detroit, Michigan

/s/

BERNARD A. FRIEDMAN

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Federal Cases, Combined Courts
Terms: shaw and adarand and date(is 2001) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, April 20, 2001 - 7:08 PM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In an opinion and order dated January 7, 1999, the court granted plaintiff's motion for class certification and for bifurcation of the trial into liability and damages phases. The class was defined as consisting of "all persons who (A) applied for and were not granted admission to the University of Michigan Law School for the academic years since (and including) 1995 until the time that judgment is entered herein; and (B) were members of those racial or ethnic groups, including Caucasian, that Defendants treated less favorably in considering their applications for admission to the Law School."

In March 1998, 41 individuals and three pro-affirmative action student groups n4 sought to intervene in the case as defendants. The individual intervenors include 21 undergraduate students of various [*6] races who currently attend the University of Michigan, Wayne State University, the University of California at Berkeley, or Diablo Valley Community College in Pleasant Hill, California, all of whom plan to apply to the law school for admission; five black students who currently attend Cass Technical High School or Northwestern High School in Detroit and who plan to apply to the law school for admission; twelve students of various races who currently attend the law school; a paralegal and a Latino graduate student at the University of Texas at Austin who intend to apply to the law school for admission; and a black graduate student at the University of Michigan who is a member of the Defend Affirmative Action Party. Motion to Intevene PP 1-41. The court initially denied the motion to intervene, but in August 1999 the court of appeals reversed and directed that the intervention be permitted.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n4 These groups are United For Equality and Affirmative Action (UEAA), the Coalition to Defend Affirmative Action By Any Means Necessary (BAMN), and Law Students for Affirmative Action (LSAA).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*7]

On December 22, 2000, the court heard oral argument on the parties' cross motions for summary judgment. The court took those motions under advisement. The court indicated that the trial would focus on the following three issues: (1) the extent to which race is a factor in the law school's admissions decisions; (2) whether the law school's consideration of race in making admissions decisions constitutes a double standard in which minority and non-minority students are treated differently; and (3) whether the law school may take race into account to "level the playing field" between minority and non-minority applicants.

II. Diversity as a Rationale for Using Race as a Factor in University Admissions

A. Evidence

1.

The starting point in this case is the written admissions policy of the University of Michigan Law School, which was admitted at trial as Exhibit 4. This policy, which was adopted by the law school faculty in April 1992, was the subject of many hours of testimony during trial as well as extensive discovery. Due to the central role the policy has played in this case, the court shall summarize the policy and highlight certain provisions.

The policy expresses [*8] the law school's desire "to admit a group of students who individually and collectively are among the most capable students applying to American law schools in a given year. . . . Collectively, we seek a mix of students with varying backgrounds and experiences who will respect and learn from each other." Exhibit 4, Admissions Policy, p. 1. The policy notes that "no applicant should be admitted unless we expect that applicant to do well enough to graduate with no serious academic problems." Id. at 2. In identifying applicants who can be expected to succeed academically, the law school's "most general measure . . . is a composite of an applicant's [Law School Admission Test] score and undergraduate gradepoint average (UGPA) (which we shall call the 'index')." Id. at 3.

REV_00258982

Under this admissions policy, the law school pays close attention to LSAT scores and UGPA's in reviewing applications. The significance of these numbers is visually apparent from the "grid" of law school applicants, an example of which is attached to the law school's admissions policy. n5 LSAT scores are shown along the horizontal axis in three- or four-point increments; UGPA's are shown along the vertical axis [*9] in quarter-point increments. Every combination of LSAT and UGPA is shown in a "cell" on this grid. In each cell, the law school reports the number of applicants with that particular combination of numerical qualifications, as well as the number of offers of admission made to the applicants in that cell. n6 Constructed in this manner, the highest combinations of LSAT scores and UPGA's are found in the upper right-hand corner of the grid. Even a cursory review of the numbers contained in this grid reveals that one's chances of being admitted increase dramatically as one moves into the upper right corner. Of the 966 offers of admission made in 1991, 843 (87%) were made to applicants who fell within the nine cells closest to this corner. In short, the numbers reflect the law school's stated policy: "Bluntly, the higher one's index score, the greater should be one's chances of being admitted. The lower the score, the greater the risk the candidate poses. . . . So we expect the vast majority of those students we admit to have high index scores." Id. at 4. See also id. at 6-7 ("The further applicants are from the upper right corner the less likely they are to be offered admission. [*10] Thus we may think of the upper right portion of the grid as indicating the combinations of LSAT and UGPA that characterize the overwhelming bulk of students admitted.") n5 For easy reference a copy of this grid, which shows admissions information for 1991, is attached to this opinion as Exhibit A.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 For example, in 1991 there were 499 applicants with an LSAT score between 38 and 41 and a UGPA between 3.50 and 3.74; and of these, 36 were offered admission. In later years, the LSAT was scored on a scale between 120 and 180 points. The grids for the years at issue in this case (1995 to the present) still show UGPA in quarter-point increments on the vertical axis, as was done in earlier years. But the LSAT scores, which are still shown along the horizontal axis, are presented in the following increments: no LSAT, 120-145, 146-147, 148-150, 151-153, 154-155, 156-158, 159-160, 161-163, 164-166, 167-169, and 170-above.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The policy also notes, however, that admissions decisions should not be made strictly based [*11] on the index scores. A high index score may not necessarily identify an applicant who is likely to succeed in law school, and a low index score may not necessarily identify one who is likely to fail. See id. at 4-5. The policy states:

> When the differences in index scores are small, we believe it is important to weigh as best we can not just the index but also such file characteristics as the enthusiasm of recommenders, the quality of the undergraduate institution, the quality of the applicant's essay, and the areas and difficulty of undergraduate course selection. These "soft" variables not only bear on the applicant's likely graded performance but also have the additional benefit that they may tell us something about the applicant's likely contributions to the intellectual and social life of the institution. Thus an applicant who has performed well in advanced courses in a demanding subject may have more to offer both faculty and students than an applicant with a similarly high average achieved without ever pursuing in > depth any area of learning. Other information in an applicant's file may add nothing about the applicant's likely LGPA [law school grade-point average] beyond [*12] what may be discerned from the index, but it may suggest that that applicant has a perspective or experiences that will contribute to the diverse student body that we hope to assemble. The applicant may for example be a member of a minority group whose experiences are likely to be different from those of most students, may be likely to make a unique contribution to the bar, or may have had a successful career as a concert pianist or may speak five languages.

REV_00258983

Id. at 5-6.

Thus, while the policy indicates that most offers for admission should be made to applicants with high "index" scores, the policy also states that "considerable discretion is exercised in the admissions process . . ., for many qualities not captured in grades and test scores figure in the evaluation of an application." Id. at 7. The reasons behind the exercise of this discretion are an important part of the admissions policy, and they also lie at the heart of the dispute between the parties in this case. The policy articulates two reasons why an offer of admission may be made to applicants with grades and test scores "that place them relatively far from the upper right corner of the grid." Id. at [*13] 8. The first reason is that "there are students for whom we have good reason to be skeptical of an index score based prediction." Id. As an example, the policy describes an applicant who received a poor SAT score but nonetheless went on to perform well academically in college. This applicant received an unimpressive LSAT score, which pulled down his index, but he was admitted on the strength of his undergraduate record "with the expectation that this record would be a better predictor of [his] performance at Michigan than his LSAT score." Id. at 9.

The second reason for admitting applicants with comparatively lower index scores is that they "may help achieve that diversity which has the potential to enrich everyone's education and thus make a law school class stronger than the sum of its parts. In particular we seek to admit students with distinctive perspectives and experiences as well as students who are particularly likely to assume the kinds of leadership roles in the bar and make the kinds of contributions to society discussed in the introduction to this report." Id. at 9-10. The policy identifies these as "diversity admissions," id. at 10, and provides three [*14] examples of applicants who were admitted in 1991 under this rubric. One was born in Bangladesh, graduated from Harvard, received "outstanding references" from his professors, and had a "truly exceptional record of extracurricular activity." Id. Another was a single mother from Argentina who worked successfully in business for several years, graduated from college summa cum laude, received "glowing references," and was fluent in four languages. Id. at 10-11. The third had excellent grades and a good LSAT score; "diversity considerations" further strengthened her application because her parents were Greek immigrants, she was "immersed in a significantly ethnic home life," she had studied and traveled in Europe and was fluent in three languages. Id. at 11.

In addition to the type of diversity that may come, for example, from an applicant's interesting or unusual employment experiences, extracurricular activities, travel experiences, athletic accomplishments, volunteer work, or foreign language fluency, the admissions policy also describes the importance of an applicant's race as a qualification which may make him a more attractive candidate for admission:

> There is, however, [*15] a commitment to one particular type of diversity that the school has long had and which should continue. This is a commitment to racial and ethnic diversity with special reference to the inclusion of students from groups which have been historically discriminated against, like African-Americans, Hispanics and Native Americans, who without this commitment might > not be represented in our student body in meaningful numbers. These students are particularly likely to have experiences and perspectives of special importance to our mission.

>
> Over the past two decades, the law school has made special efforts to increase the numbers of such students in the school. We believe that the racial and ethnic diversity that has resulted has made the University of Michigan Law School a better law school than it could possibly have been otherwise. By enrolling a "critical mass" of minority students, we have ensured their ability to make unique contributions to the character of the Law School; the policies embodied in this document should ensure that those contributions continue in the future.

Id. at 12.

The law school's admissions policy is further described in an October 13, 1992, memorandum [*16] from defendant Dennis Shields, who was the Director of Admissions at the law school from 1991 to 1998. This memorandum (Trial Exhibit 5), entitled "The Gospel According to Dennis," was addressed to "File Readers 1992-93," and was intended to provide guidance to his staff who assisted him in reviewing application files. Mr. Shields explained his philosophy as follows:

> As one of my colleagues so elegantly stated recently "our mission is to pick winners". . . . To make those selections requires more than a mere review of the numbers (LSAT and GPA), credentials. This is because many of the numbers will be so close to the same as to make the candidates indistinguishable from one another on that basis. Rather we must begin with the numbers and go forward from there to scrutinize the essays and letters of recommendation (as well as considering extracurricular and work experience) to look for candidates that show intellectual talent, leadership ability, and academic acumen which augers for a lively intellectual community and important contributions to the profession.
>
> * * *
>
> Of the 5,000 or more applications we will receive this year, we will offer admission to about 1,000 of the candidates. [*17] Of that thousand offers, fully 500 of the decisions are pretty easy, another 300 or are [sic] a bit tougher, and the last 200 very difficult because the numbers will be so close that in these cases we will clearly be making the most subjective of judgements.

Mr. Shields went on to explain that in reviewing an application file he looked first at an applicant's grades and LSAT score. "My view is we will ultimately be swayed in any case by the strength of the numbers so it makes sense to know what they are before one proceeds to judge the rest of the file." "The numbers" referred to the LSAT score, the cumulative GPA, the undergraduate institution, the trend in grades, and the rank at the undergraduate institution. In addition, Mr. Shields indicated that in reviewing transcripts he looked to see if applicants chose a rigorous major, whether they pursued a liberal education, and whether they took difficult courses. After reviewing "the numbers," Mr. Shields proceeded to the essays and the letters of recommendation. The essays reveal an applicant's writing and intellectual abilities and interests, and "what the candidate might offer the academic enterprise which is legal education [*18] at Michigan." The letters of recommendation are useful because they provide information about the applicant's academic abilities, particularly "growth and improvement or other trends" and "the general rigor of the curriculum pursued by the student." Finally, Mr. Shields noted that "there is a preference for those who have demonstrated academic and/or intellectual strength. Hard work and discipline evidenced in

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Circuit Court Cases - By Circuit : US Court of Appeals Cases - 10th Circuit
Terms: (adarand) (Edit Search)

*228 F.3d 1147, *; 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 23725, **;*
79 Empl. Prac. Dec. (CCH) P40,237; 2000 Colo. J. C.A.R. 5574

ADARAND CONSTRUCTORS, INC., a Colorado corporation, Plaintiff-Appellee, v. RODNEY E. SLATER, Secretary of the Department of Transportation; KENNETH R. WYKLE, Administrator of the Federal Highway Administration; VINCENT F. SCHIMMOLLER, Administrator of Region VIII of the Federal Highway Administration; LARRY C. SMITH, Engineer of the Central Federal Lands Highway Division, Defendants-Appellants, PACIFIC LEGAL FOUNDATION; ASSOCIATED GENERAL CONTRACTORS OF AMERICA, INC.; EMPLOYMENT LAW CENTER; MINORITY BUSINESS ENTERPRISE LEGAL DEFENSE AND EDUCATION FUND, INC., Amici Curiae.

No. 97-1304

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE TENTH CIRCUIT

228 F.3d 1147; 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 23725; 79 Empl. Prac. Dec. (CCH) P40,237; 2000 Colo. J. C.A.R. 5574

September 25, 2000, Filed

PRIOR HISTORY: [1] Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Colorado. (D.C. No. 90-K-1413). D.C. Judge John L. Kane Jr.

DISPOSITION: REVERSED and Remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Defendants appealed from a judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Colorado, granting summary judgment to plaintiff and finding the Subcontractor Compensation Clause program unconstitutional.

OVERVIEW: The district court found the Subcontractor Compensation Clause program, which employed race-conscious presumptions designed to favor minority and disadvantaged business enterprises, to be unconstitutional. Specifically, the district court found the program insufficiently narrowly tailored to further a compelling interest because the program was both over- and under-inclusive, including minority individuals who were not in fact disadvantaged and excluding non-minority individuals who were disadvantaged. In so finding, the district court granted summary judgment to plaintiff. Defendants appealed. The court found the government had met its initial burden of presenting a "strong basis in evidence" sufficient to support its articulated, constitutionally valid, compelling interest. Next, the court held that plaintiff utterly failed to meet the "ultimate burden" of introducing credible, particularized evidence to rebut the government's showing of the existence of a compelling interest in remedying the nationwide effects of past and present discrimination in the federal construction procurement subcontracting market.

OUTCOME: Judgment reversed; government had met its initial burden of presenting a "strong basis in evidence" sufficient to support its articulated, constitutionally valid, compelling interest. Also, the relevant programs now met the requirements of narrow tailoring.

16 F.3d at 1543. This conclusion was left undisturbed by the Supreme Court, see Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 210-12, and remains law of the case, and we discern no clear error in that prior decision or manifest injustice sufficient to warrant overriding the law of the case doctrine, see Agostini v. Felton, 521 U.S. 203, 236, 138 L. Ed. 2d 391, 117 S. Ct. 1997 [*1160] (1997); McIlravy, 204 F.3d at 1034-35. Furthermore, our decision in Adarand II, as well as the Supreme Court's remand in Adarand III, was limited to the question of the constitutionality of the use of a race-conscious presumption in the SCC program. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237-38. This case does not involve, nor has Adarand ever demonstrated standing to bring, a generalized challenge to the policy of maximizing contracting opportunities for small disadvantaged businesses set forth in 15 U.S.C. §§ 637 and 644(g), or to the various goals for fostering the participation of small minority-owned businesses [18] promulgated pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 644(g), also discussed below. Nor are we presented with any indication that Adarand has standing to challenge paragraphs (4)-(6) of 15 U.S.C. § 637(d). Finally, we agree with the government that throughout the course of this litigation, Adarand's challenge has been to the use of the SCC in direct federal highway procurement contracts entered into by the CFLHD with funds appropriated under STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21. In the discussion that follows, we therefore address the constitutionality of the relevant statutory provisions as applied in the SCC program, as well as their facial constitutionality. To the extent the district court's judgment can be construed as having reached statutes, programs, and issues beyond the scope of Adarand's standing and the Supreme Court's remand in Adarand III, we reverse that judgment.

C. Overview of the Statutory Framework and the SCC

We are now in a position to offer a brief overview of the statutory framework and the SCC underlying this litigation.

> The [SBA] . . . declares it to be "the policy of the United States that small business concerns, [19] [and] small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, . . . shall have the maximum practicable opportunity to participate in the performance of contracts let by any Federal agency." § 8(d)(1), 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(1). The [SBA] defines "socially disadvantaged individuals" as "those who have been subjected to racial or ethnic prejudice or cultural bias because of their identity as a member of a group without regard to their individual qualities," § 8(a)(5), 15 U.S.C. § 637(a)(5), and it defines "economically disadvantaged individuals" as "those socially disadvantaged individuals whose ability to compete in the free enterprise system has been impaired due to diminished capital and credit opportunities as compared to others in the same business area who are not socially disadvantaged." § 8(a)(6)(A), 15 U.S.C. § 637(a)(6)(A).
>
> In furtherance of the policy stated in § 8(d)(1), the Act establishes "the Government-wide goal for participation by small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals" at "not less than 5 [20] percent of the total value of all prime contract and subcontract awards for each fiscal year." 15 U.S.C. § 644(g)(1). It also requires the head of each federal agency to set agency-specific goals for participation by businesses controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals. Id.

Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 206. These goals must "realistically reflect the potential" of small disadvantaged businesses to perform subcontracts. See 15 U.S.C. § 644(g)(2), (h)(1). Under both § 8(a) and § 8(d), subcontractors can be certified as DBEs, qualifying them for the SCC program at issue in this litigation.

REV_00259039

STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21, the transportation appropriations statutes at issue in this case, incorporate the presumption of disadvantage from SBA § 8(d). See STURAA § 106(c)(2)(B), ISTEA § 1003(b)(2)(B); TEA-21 § 1101(b)(2)(B) (providing that the term "socially and economically disadvantaged individuals" has the meaning of such term under SBA § 8(d) "and relevant subcontracting [*1161] regulations promulgated pursuant thereto."). STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21 all set forth aspirational goals of 10% DBE [21] participation in federal subcontracting. See STURAA § 106(c)(1); ISTEA § 1003(b)(1); TEA-21 § 1101(b)(1). n5

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 The relevant statutes have remained unchanged in all respects material to this litigation from 1992 to the present, except as noted in the Appendix to this opinion.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The SCC is a means of implementing the various statutory goals and directives at issue in this litigation. This clause provides a financial bonus of up to 10% of an approved subcontract (no more than 1.5% or 2% of the original contract, depending on how many DBEs are employed) to a prime contractor for employing a DBE. (See Appellants' App. at 55-56.) Subcontractors must be certified as DBEs by "the SBA, a state highway agency, or some other certifying authority acceptable to the contracting officer" pursuant to the "[§] 8(a) or [§] 8(d) program, or certification by a State under the DOT regulations." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 209-10. In November of 1997, the SCC at issue in Adarand IV was revised, [22] leaving the basic framework in place. At present, the government maintains, and Adarand does not dispute, that SCCs are no longer in use. (See Appellants' Supp. Br. Attach. 1.)

A discussion of the complex, cumbersome, and changing regulations promulgated pursuant to the foregoing statutes, as well as a more thorough summary both of the statutory framework itself and of the SCC, is incorporated as an Appendix to this opinion. Otherwise, changes in the relevant portions of the regulations and SCC are discussed in our application of the strict scrutiny standard that follows.

III

In reviewing the district court's grant of summary judgment to Adarand, we employ our customary standard of review:

> We review a grant of a motion for summary judgment de novo, applying the same legal standard used by the district court. See Byers v. City of Albuquerque, 150 F.3d 1271, 1274 (10th Cir. 1998). Summary judgment is appropriate "if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter [23] of law." Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). We view the evidence, and all reasonable inferences drawn therefrom, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party. See Byers, 150 F.3d at 1274.

McGarry v. Board of County Comm'rs, 175 F.3d 1193, 1198 (10th Cir. 1999). At the very outset, before immersing ourselves in the intricacies of the issues before us, we emphasize our substantial agreement with much of the district court's judgment as it pertains to the versions of the statutes and regulations in place in 1996. Insofar as the court's judgment does not exceed the proper scope of its review and with the significant caveat that we disagree both with the court's conclusion regarding the fatality in fact of strict scrutiny and with its ultimate result in light of the current version of the relevant regulations, we take the district court's view of the matter. And we share wholeheartedly its sentiment that the time has come for this litigation to come to an end. See Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1558.

REV_00259040

A. Evolution of Strict Scrutiny Standards

The Supreme Court's declarations in the affirmative action area are characterized by plurality [24] and split opinions and by the overruling of precedent. This fractured prism complicates the task of lower courts in both identifying and applying an appropriate form of equal protection review. We therefore begin our analysis with a brief review of what we understand to be the current state of the law in this area.

Twenty years ago, the Supreme Court addressed a direct precursor of the statutes [*1162] at issue today in Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 448. Although Fullilove failed to produce a majority opinion, six Justices voted to affirm the program at issue--the "minority business enterprise" ("MBE") provision of the Public Works Employment Act of 1977, Pub. L. 95-28, 91 Stat. 116, § 103(f)(2). See Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 453. The MBE provision required that, subject to waiver by the Secretary of Commerce, "no grant shall be made under this Act for any local public works project unless the applicant gives satisfactory assurance to the Secretary [of Commerce] that at least 10 per centum of the amount of each grant shall be expended for minority business enterprises." Id. at 454 (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 6705(f)(2) (1976 [25] ed., Supp. II)). For purposes of the MBE set-aside, MBEs were defined as businesses owned and controlled by individuals who could be classified as "Negroes, Spanish-speaking, Oriental, Indians, Eskimos, and Aleuts." Id. (quoting 42 U.S.C. § 6705(f)(2)). The MBE program was a mandatory set-aside; under the relevant regulations, a request for waiver could be granted, among other circumstances, if a minority business enterprise quoted an "unreasonable" price. Id. at 470-71 (internal quotation and citation omitted).

Chief Justice Burger, joined by Justices White and Powell, applied what appears to be a more deferential standard than what the Court often terms "strict scrutiny":

> A program that employs racial or ethnic criteria, even in a remedial context, calls for close examination; yet we are bound to approach our task with appropriate deference to the Congress, a co-equal branch charged by the Constitution with the power to "provide for the . . . general Welfare of the United States' and 'to enforce, by appropriate legislation," the equal protection guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Id. at 472 (quoting [26] U.S. Const., art. I, § 8, cl. 1); see also City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co., 488 U.S. 469, 487, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854, 109 S. Ct. 706 (1989) (Op. of O'Connor, J.) ("The principal opinion in Fullilove, written by Chief Justice Burger, did not employ 'strict scrutiny' or any other traditional standard of equal protection review.").

Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 235, cast doubt on Fullilove. "To the extent (if any) that Fullilove held federal racial classifications to be subject to a less rigorous standard, it is no longer controlling. But we need not decide today whether the program upheld in Fullilove would survive strict scrutiny as our more recent cases have defined it." Id. We interpret that statement in Adarand III as precluding reliance on Fullilove for either the standard of review or the result in this case. Otherwise, the programs at issue here would almost certainly pass muster under the Fullilove standard because, in furtherance of substantially similar goals, the programs before us impose a significantly more flexible and less intrusive remedy--a voluntary subsidy as opposed to a fixed set-aside subject to waiver. [27] n6

REV_00259041

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n6 We note that the Adarand III Court's qualified repudiation of Fullilove would appear to leave in place other aspects of that case, most notably its factual determinations regarding congressional findings and the legislative history of the SBA discussed in the Chief Justice's opinion and further elaborated upon in the concurring opinion of Justice Powell. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 488 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) ("In reviewing the legislative history behind the Act, the principal opinion focused on the evidence before Congress that a nationwide history of past discrimination had reduced minority participation in federal construction grants." (citing Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 458-67 (Op. of Burger, C.J.)); id. at 489 (citing the concurring opinion of Powell, J., in Fullilove). Thus, where Fullilove's factual findings bear on the factual underpinnings of this case, we so note in the discussion that follows. The separate question of whether those findings are adequately supported by evidence, pursuant to Adarand III's application of Croson to federal race-conscious programs, is one we consider at length in Subsection B below.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [28]

[*1163] In 1989 the Court produced a majority for a portion of an affirmative action opinion. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 469. In Croson, the Court struck down under strict scrutiny a municipal plan requiring "prime contractors to whom the city awarded construction contracts to subcontract at least 30% of the dollar amount of the contract to one or more [MBEs]." Id. at 477. In so doing, Justice O'Connor, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice White, rejected the competing arguments that a state's power to remedy racial discrimination is equal to that of Congress under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment and that the Fourteenth Amendment effectively preempts state action in matters of race. See id. at 489-93 (Op. of O'Connor, J.). n7 A plurality of the Court then proceeded to reject the proposition that the level of scrutiny varies in cases of "benign" and invidious racial classifications, noting that black Americans constituted a controlling political majority in the city of Richmond, a fact militating against the application of a more deferential standard of review. Id. at 495-96 (Op. of O'Connor, J.).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n7 Despite overruling Metro Broadcasting and casting doubt on Fullilove, the majority opinion in Adarand III firmly rejected the suggestion "that any Member of this Court has repudiated in this case his or her previously expressed views on the subject" of Congress's powers under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 231.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [29]

What did produce a clear majority in Croson was the proposition that "the factual predicate offered in support of the Richmond Plan suffers from the two defects identified as fatal in Wygant [v. Jackson Board of Education, 476 U.S. 267, 90 L. Ed. 2d 260, 106 S. Ct. 1842 (1986)]," Croson, 488 U.S. at 498, namely, failure to make findings specific to the market to be addressed by the remedy and to provide limits to the scope of that remedy due to only generalized findings of discrimination. n8 The Court stated that "while there is no doubt that the sorry history of both private and public discrimination in this country has contributed to a lack of opportunities for black entrepreneurs, this observation, standing alone, cannot justify a rigid racial quota in the awarding of public contracts in Richmond, Virginia." Id. at 499. In particular, the majority noted it was "sheer speculation" to simply guess how many firms there would be absent past discrimination and "the 30% quota cannot in any realistic sense be tied to any injury suffered by anyone." Id.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 Croson cannot be read, as Adarand would have it, as standing for the proposition that findings of "the present effects of past discrimination in the construction industry," 488 U.S. at 498 (citation omitted), are automatically insufficient to justify remedial action. This characterization of Croson overlooks a very significant difference between the Richmond Plan at issue in Croson and the congressional enactments at issue in the instant case. The City of Richmond had no authority to remedy the present effects of past discrimination in the entire construction industry nationally, and the City was not permitted to simply infer that congressional findings as to the entire industry applied equally to the particular market within its jurisdiction. See id. at 504-05. The remediation of nation-wide problems, however, is particularly within the purview of Congress, and findings of industry-wide discrimination are precisely what is relevant to a federal decision to undertake remedial action. See id. at 490, 504.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [30]

After noting the City of Richmond's failure to link its remedial program to specifically identified past discrimination, the Croson majority made two additional observations explaining why the City's program was not narrowly tailored. See id. at 507. First, the Court noted "there does not appear to have been any consideration of the use of race-neutral means to increase minority business participation in city contracting." Id. (citing United States v. Paradise, 480 U.S. 149, 171, 94 L. Ed. 2d 203, 107 S. Ct. 1053 (1987)). The Court suggested that race-neutral programs of municipal financing for small firms might increase minority participation without the use of a direct racial preference. See id.

[*1164] Second, the Court declared "the 30% quota cannot be said to be narrowly tailored to any goal, except perhaps outright racial balancing. It rests upon the 'completely unrealistic' assumption that minorities will choose a particular trade in lockstep proportion to their representation in the local population." Id. (quoting Sheet Metal Workers' v. EEOC, 478 U.S. 421, 494, 92 L. Ed. 2d 344, 106 S. Ct. 3019 (1986) (O'Connor, J., [31] concurring in part and dissenting in part)).

Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 235 (citing Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 496 (Powell, J., concurring)), followed and held that "federal racial classifications, like those of a State, must serve a compelling governmental interest, and must be narrowly tailored to further that interest." Now, informed by the Supreme Court's directives pertaining to remand, and its multifaceted jurisprudence on affirmative action programs, we turn to the task of assessing the application of racial presumptions in the SCC program under a strict scrutiny standard.

B. Compelling Interest

We "decide the question [of] whether the interests served by the use of [SCCs] are properly described as 'compelling.'" Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237. In so doing, our inquiry necessarily consists of four parts: First, we must determine whether the government's articulated goal in enacting the race-based measures at issue in this case is appropriately considered a "compelling interest" under the governing case law; if so, we must then set forth the standards under which to evaluate the government's evidence of compelling interest; [32] third, we must decide whether the evidence presented by the government is sufficiently strong to meet its initial burden of demonstrating the compelling interest it has articulated; and finally, we must examine wether the challenging party has met its ultimate burden of rebutting the government's evidence such that the granting of summary judgment to either party is proper. We begin, as we must, with an inquiry into the meaning of "compelling interest."

1. "Compelling Interest" in Race-Conscious Measures Defined

We know from Adarand III that, as a general proposition, there may be a compelling interest that supports the enactment of race-conscious measures. Justice O'Connor explicitly states: "The unhappy persistence of both the practice and the lingering effects of racial discrimination against minority groups in this country is an unfortunate reality, and government is not disqualified from acting in response to it." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237; see also Shaw v. Hunt, 517 U.S. 899, 909, 135 L. Ed. 2d 207, 116 S. Ct. 1894 (1996) (stating that "remedying the effects of past or present racial discrimination may in the proper case justify a government's [33] use of racial distinctions" (citing Croson, 488 U.S. at 498-506)). Interpreting Croson, we have recognized that "the Fourteenth Amendment permits race-conscious programs that seek both to eradicate discrimination by the governmental entity itself and to prevent the public entity from acting as a '"passive participant" in a system of racial exclusion practiced by elements of the local construction industry' by allowing tax dollars 'to finance the evil of private prejudice.'" Concrete Works of Colo., Inc. v. City & County of Denver, 36 F.3d 1513, 1519 (10th Cir. 1994) (quoting Croson, 488 U.S. at 492).

The government identifies the compelling interest at stake in the use of racial presumptions in the SCC program as "remedying the effects of racial discrimination and opening up federal contracting opportunities to members of previously excluded minority groups." (Appellants' Br. at 21.) The district court in Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1572, held this interest is properly described as compelling, reasoning that "it appears that Justice O'Connor's assertion in Croson, that Congress has the ability under Section [34] 5 [of the Fourteenth Amendment] to recognize and address racial discrimination, has been left [*1165] undisturbed." Although we decline to address the precise relationship between § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment and the power of Congress, acting through the Executive branch, to address racial discrimination by the states, we readily conclude that the federal government has a compelling interest in not perpetuating the effects of racial discrimination in its own distribution of federal funds and in remediating the effects of past discrimination in the government contracting markets created by its disbursements. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 492 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) ("It is beyond dispute that any public entity, state or federal, has a compelling interest in assuring that public dollars, drawn from the tax contributions of all citizens, do not serve to finance the evil of private prejudice." (citing Norwood v. Harrison, 413 U.S. 455, 465, 37 L. Ed. 2d 723, 93 S. Ct. 2804 (1973))); Norwood, 413 U.S. at 463 ("That the Constitution may compel toleration of private discrimination in some circumstances does not mean that it requires state support for [35] such discrimination.").

In its brief, Adarand cites general language from Adarand III in an attempt to limit the permissible scope of Congress's power to redress the effects of racial discrimination, ignoring the substantial differences between the scope of problems to be addressed by Congress and those to be addressed by a city council such as that in Croson. The fact that Congress's enactments must serve a compelling interest does not necessitate the conclusion that the scope of that interest must be as geographically limited as that of a local government. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 489 (Op. of O'Connor, J.). n9 Although there is not a clear majority on the Court for the proposition that § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment grants Congress broad remedial powers in the area of discrimination, in Section II of Justice O'Connor's opinion in Croson, Justice O'Connor and Chief Justice Rehnquist endorsed that proposition. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 490 ("That Congress may identify and redress the effects of society-wide discrimination does not mean that, a fortiori, the States and their political subdivisions are free to decide that such remedies [36] are appropriate."). The geographic scope of Congress's reach in this regard is "society-wide" and therefore nationwide. See id. n10 n9 Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania, Inc. v. City of Philadelphia, 6 F.3d 990 (3d Cir. 1993), cited by appellee, is distinguishable both in that it involved a city-based rather than a nationwide program, and in that the program at issue was based on far scantier evidence than that available in the instant case.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 The parties and their respective amici curiae differ sharply as to the relevant geographical scope to be considered in assessing the government's basis in evidence for concluding that race-conscious remedial action is necessary. Adarand and its amici argue based on Croson for the necessity of findings regarding both discrimination and the availability of qualified DBEs in a particular local market as a necessary prerequisite to any government action. We disagree, concluding that the absence of such findings is more properly addressed in this case under the rubric of narrow tailoring. Quite apart from the question of Congress's power under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment left unresolved by the Adarand III majority, see Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 230-31, the compelling interests to be addressed by Congress, whether under the Commerce Clause, Spending Clause, or Fourteenth Amendment, are necessarily different in geographic scope than those properly addressed by a city. See, e.g., Croson, 488 U.S. at 505 (focusing on lack of "identified discrimination in the Richmond construction industry"); Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1520 (identifying "the six-county Denver Metropolitan Statistical Area" as one acceptable geographical region for inquiry into an affirmative action measure by the City and County of Denver). That said, Adarand's concern with the availability of DBEs in a particular market is certainly an important one, see Croson, 488 U.S. at 502, and, as discussed below, the lack of evidence provided by the government regarding local availability and the government's concomitant failure to tailor contracting regulations accordingly constitute one of the chief barriers to finding the previous statutory and regulatory scheme narrowly tailored.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [37]

[*1166] 2. Evidence Required to Show Compelling Interest

While the government's articulated interest is compelling as a theoretical matter, we must yet determine whether the actual evidence proffered by the government supports the existence of past and present discrimination in the publicly-funded highway construction subcontracting market. Generally, > absent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for . . . race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining what classifications are . . . in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics. Indeed, the purpose of strict scrutiny is to 'smoke out' illegitimate uses of race by assuring that the legislative body is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant the use of a highly suspect tool.

Id. at 493 (Op. of O'Connor, J.); see also Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630, 643-44, 125 L. Ed. 2d 511, 113 S. Ct. 2816 (1993) ("A racial classification, regardless of purported motivation, is presumptively invalid and can be upheld only upon an extraordinary justification." (quoting Personnel Administrator of Mass. v. Feeney, 442 U.S. 256, 272, 60 L. Ed. 2d 870, 99 S. Ct. 2282 (1979)) [38] (further citations omitted)).

Our "benchmark for judging the adequacy of the government's factual predicate for affirmative action legislation is whether there exists a 'strong basis in evidence for [the government's] conclusion that remedial action was necessary.'" Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1521 (quoting Croson, 488 U.S. at 500 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 277 (plurality))) (emphasis in Concrete Works). Both statistical and anecdotal evidence are appropriate in the strict scrutiny calculus, although anecdotal evidence by itself is not. See > Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1520-21.

> Although Croson places the burden of production on the [government] to demonstrate a "strong basis in evidence" that its race- and gender-conscious contract program aims to remedy specifically identified past or present discrimination, the Fourteenth Amendment does not require a court to make an ultimate judicial finding of discrimination before [the government] may take affirmative steps to eradicate discrimination.

Id. at 1522 (citing Wygant, 476 U.S. at 292 (O'Connor, J., [39] concurring)). After the government's initial showing, the burden shifts to Adarand to rebut that showing: "Notwithstanding the burden of initial production that rests" with the government, "the ultimate burden [of proof] remains with [the challenging party] to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of an affirmative-action program." Id. (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 277-78 (plurality)). "The nonminority [challengers] . . . continue to bear the ultimate burden of persuading the court that [the government entity's] evidence did not support an inference of prior discrimination and thus a remedial purpose." Id. 36 F.3d at 1522-23 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 293 (O'Connor, J., concurring)).

In addressing the question of what evidence of discrimination supports a compelling interest in providing a remedy, we consider both direct and circumstantial evidence, including post-enactment evidence introduced by defendants as well as the evidence in the legislative history itself. See Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1521, 1529 n.23 (considering post-enactment evidence). n11 Furthermore, we may consider public and private discrimination not only [40] in the specific area of government procurement contracts but also in the construction [*1167] industry generally; thus, any findings Congress has made as to the entire construction industry are relevant. See id. at 1523, 1529; see also Croson, 488 U.S. at 492 (Op. of O'Connor, J.).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n11 Post-enactment evidence is particularly relevant when, as here, it was gathered specifically to respond to the Supreme Court's Adarand III decision, which applied a new compelling interest standard to the federal government's affirmative action programs. See Appendix--The Compelling Interest for Affirmative Action in Federal Procurement, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,050 (1996) (noting purpose of responding to Adarand III).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

It is with the foregoing principles in mind that we turn to an examination of the evidentiary basis on which Congress relied to support its finding of discrimination and continuing effects of past discrimination against minorities in the publicly-funded and private construction [41] industry.

3. Evidence in the Present Case

There can be no doubt that Congress repeatedly has considered the issue of discrimination in government construction procurement contracts, finding that racial discrimination and its continuing effects have distorted the market for public contracts--especially construction contracts--necessitating a race-conscious remedy. See, e.g., Appendix--The Compelling Interest for Affirmative Action in Federal Procurement, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,050, 26,051-52 & nn.12-21 (1996) ("The Compelling Interest") (citing approximately thirty congressional hearings since 1980 concerning minority-owned businesses). But the question is not merely whether the government has considered evidence, but rather the nature and extent of the evidence it has considered.

Of course, statements made with regard to discrimination in the subcontracting industry by congressional reports and by members of Congress are insufficient in themselves to support a finding of compelling interest. We must probe more deeply into the legislative history of the enactments at issue. We cannot merely recite statements made by members of Congress alleging a finding [42] of discriminatory effects and the need to address those effects, such as the following:

> Where there are no DBE programs, women and minority-owned small businesses are shut out of the highway construction. The Federal DBE program serves to redress the inequality and redress the unfortunate fact that all across the country women and minorities would not otherwise have access to construction contracts.

144 Cong. Rec. S1421 (March 5, 1998) (statement of Sen. Moseley-Braun). Such findings are not enough to satisfy strict scrutiny standards. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 500 ("When a legislative body chooses to employ a suspect classification, it cannot rest upon a generalized assertion as to the classification's relevance to its goals." (citing McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 190-92, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222, 85 S. Ct. 283 (1964))). The question that Croson requires us to ask is whether there is a strong basis in evidence to support the legislature's conclusion.

In Concrete Works, we noted that > Neither Croson nor its progeny clearly state whether private discrimination that is in no way funded with public tax dollars can, by itself, [43] provide the requisite strong basis in evidence necessary to justify a municipality's affirmative action program. A plurality in Croson simply suggested that remedial measures could be justified upon a municipality's showing that "it had essentially become a 'passive participant' in a system of racial exclusion practiced by elements of the local construction industry." Croson, 488 U.S. at 492. Although we do not read Croson as requiring the municipality to identify an exact linkage between its award of public contracts and private discrimination, such evidence would at least enhance the municipality's factual predicate for a race- and gender-conscious program.

Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1529. Unlike Concrete Works, the evidence presented by the government in the present case demonstrates the existence of two kinds of discriminatory barriers to minority subcontracting enterprises, both of which show a strong link between racial disparities in the federal government's disbursements of public funds for construction contracts and the channeling of those funds [*1168] due to private discrimination. The first discriminatory barriers are to the [44] formation of qualified minority subcontracting enterprises due to private discrimination, precluding from the outset competition for public construction contracts by minority enterprises. The second discriminatory barriers are to fair competition between minority and non-minority subcontracting enterprises, again due to private discrimination, precluding existing minority firms from effectively competing for public construction contracts. The government also presents further evidence in the form of local disparity studies of minority subcontracting and studies of local subcontracting markets after the removal of affirmative action programs. Discussion of each of those bodies of evidence follows. n12

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 In the discussion that follows, we take judicial notice of the content of hearings and testimony before the congressional committees and subcommittees cited by the government. Furthermore, we note in passing that there is an even more substantial body of legislative history supporting the compelling interest in the present case than that cited by the government. See, e.g., Barriers to Full Minority Participation in Federally Funded Highway Contracts: Hearing Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Gov't Operations, 100th Cong. (April 1, 1998); Problems Facing Minority and Women-Owned Small Businesses in Procuring U.S. Government Contracts: Hearing Before the Commerce, Consumer, & Monetary Affairs Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Gov't Operations, 103d Cong. (July 12, 1993).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [45]

a. Barriers to Minority Business Formation in Construction Subcontracting

As to the first kind of barrier, the government's evidence consists of numerous congressional investigations and hearings as well as outside studies of statistical and anecdotal evidence--cited and discussed in The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,054-58--and demonstrates that discrimination by prime contractors, unions, and lenders has woefully impeded the formation of qualified minority business enterprises in the subcontracting market nationwide.

The evidence demonstrates that prime contractors in the construction industry often refuse to employ minority subcontractors due to "old boy" networks--based on a familial history of participation in the subcontracting market--from which minority firms have traditionally been excluded. See H.R. Rep. 103-870 15 n.36 (1994) ("The construction industry is . . . family dominated. Many firms are in their second or third generation operating structures. Minorities and women, unless they are part of construction families, have been and will continue to be excluded whenever possible."); The Meaning and Significance for Minority Business of the [46] Supreme Court Decision in the City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson: Hearing Before the Legislative & Nat'l Sec. Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Gov't Operations, 100th Cong. 111 (1990) ("The Significance of Croson") (statement of Manuel Rodriguez, President, R&D Development, Inc., specializing in mechanical construction, and past president and founder of the National Hispanic Association of Construction Enterprises) ("Few [minorities] today have families from whom they can inherit a construction business."); see also Minority Business Development Program Reform Act of 1987: Hearings on S. 1993 & H.R. 1807 Before the Senate Comm. on Small Bus., 100th Cong. 127 (1988) (statement of Parren Mitchell, Chairman, Minority Business Enterprise Legal Defense and Education Fund) (noting the "harsh reality" of the "old-boy network" that prevents minority-owned firms from breaking into the private sector); H.R. Rep. No. 103-870 15 & n.36 (1994) (discussing evidence of the discriminatory exclusion of minority firms from business networks); The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,057 & nn.82-83 (citing studies explaining minorities' exclusion from the construction trades [47] as a result of the lack of familial connections).

Furthermore, subcontractors' unions place before minority firms a plethora of barriers to membership, thereby effectively blocking them from participation in a [*1169] subcontracting market in which union membership is an important condition for success. See Minority Business Participation in Department of Transportation Project: Hearing Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Gov't Operations, 99th Cong. 203 (1985) (testimony of James Haughton, President, Fight Back) (minority contractors continue to "suffer[] very heavily because they have been victims to that discrimination as practiced by the unions"); The Significance of Croson at 117-19 (statement of Manuel Rodriguez) (describing the way in which union discrimination prevents access to skills and experience needed to form a business); The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,055-56 & nn.53 & 62 (citing studies of statistical and anecdotal evidence finding racism by construction trade unions in several cities and states and concluding that racism is a major cause of the lack of minority business formation in the construction industry).

The government's evidence [48] is particularly striking in the area of the race- based denial of access to capital, without which the formation of minority subcontracting enterprises is stymied. See, e.g., Availability of Credit to Minority-Owned Small Businesses: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Fin. Insts. Supervision, Regulation & Deposit Ins. of the House Comm. on Banking, Fin. & Urb. Affs., 103d Cong. 19-20 (1994) (statement of Toni Hawkins, Executive Director, National Black Business Counsel) (noting the existence and examples of discrimination in business lending); id. at 27 (statement of Wayne Smith, Chairperson, Black Urban Alliance: African American Chamber of Commerce of Newark, NJ) (stating that while perhaps more subtle than discrimination in mortgage lending, discrimination in business

CORE TERMS: regulation, disadvantaged, disadvantage, compelling interest, certification, socially, subcontracting, contractor, disparity, strict scrutiny, race-conscious, recipient, prime, economically, narrowly tailored, contracting, subcontractor, bonding, racial discrimination, construction industry, classification, race-neutral, small business, subcontract, bid, tailoring, minority-owned, discriminatory, aspirational, minority business

CORE CONCEPTS - ✦ Hide Concepts

Governments : Legislation : Effect & Operation : Prospective & Retrospective Operation
Even absent specific legislative authorization, application of new statutes passed after the events in suit is unquestionably proper in many situations. When the intervening statute affects the propriety of prospective relief, application of the new provision is not retroactive.

Governments : Legislation : Effect & Operation : Prospective & Retrospective Operation
Generally an appellate court must apply the law in effect at the time it renders its decision where a change in law occurs while a case is on direct appeal, although there may well be an exception to this rule to prevent manifest injustice.

Governments : Legislation : Effect & Operation : Prospective & Retrospective Operation
Where a rule of law was changed after the decision in the trial court but before the decision in the appellate court, the decision in the appellate court must be according to the new law.

Civil Procedure : Jurisdiction : Subject Matter Jurisdiction
A defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice.

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Small Businesses
See 15 U.S.C.S. § 637(d)(1).

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Small Businesses
See 15 U.S.C.S. § 637(a)(5).

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Small Businesses
See 15 U.S.C.S. § 637(a)(6)(A).

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Small Businesses
See 15 U.S.C.S. § 644(g)(1).

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Small Businesses
The Small Business Act of 1958 requires the head of each federal agency to set agency-specific goals for participation by businesses controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals.

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Summary Judgment Standard
A court reviews a grant of a motion for summary judgment de novo, applying the same legal standard used by the district court. Summary judgment is appropriate if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 (c). Courts view the evidence, and all reasonable inferences drawn therefrom, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party.

lending exists); id. at 209 (statement of M. Harrison Boyd, President/CEO, HBA Management Services Group, Inc.) (White bank employees "have been, and are continually, programmed to perceive minority business loans as bad business, and/or at a minimum, risky and less desirable."); H.R. Rep. No. 103-870 7 (1994) ("There is a widespread reluctance on the part of the commercial banking, venture capital, . . [49] . and capital markets to take the same risk with a [minority] entrepreneur that they would readily do with a white one." (quoting testimony of Sherman Copelin, President of the National Business League)); Disadvantaged Business Set-Asides in Transportation Construction Projects: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Procurement, Innovation, and Minority Enter. Dev. of the House Comm. on Small Bus., 100th Cong. 26 (1988) (statement of Joann Payne, President, PSM Consultants) ("Because of the ethnic and sex discrimination practiced by lending institutions, it was very difficult for minorities and women to secure bank loans. . . ."); The Disadvantaged Business Enterprise Program of the Federal-Aid Highway Act: Hearing Before [*1170] the Subcomm. on Transp. of the Senate Comm. on Env't & Pub. Works, 99th Cong. 363 (1985) (statement of James K. Laducer, Director, North Dakota Minority Business Enterprise Programs, United Tribes Educational Technical Center) (North Dakota banks "refuse to lend monies to minority businesses from nearby Indian communities."); Fiscal Economic & Social Crises Confronting American Cities: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Banking, Housing, & Urb. Affs., 102d [50] Cong. 431 (1992) (statement of Anthony Robinson, President, Minority Business Enterprise Legal Defense and Education Fund) ("The legitimate capital needs of the minority business community are ignored or held to such a higher underwriting standard and systematically denied venture capital."); Federal Minority Business Programs: Hearing Before the House Comm. on Small Bus., 102d Cong. 89 (1991) (statement of Joshua I. Smith, Chairman, U.S. Commission on Minority Business Development) (attaching Interim Report 1990 of the United States Commission of Minority Business Development, which states minority business owners' "access to credit has been historically limited"); Minority Construction Contracting: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on SBA, the Gen. Econ. & Minority Enter. Dev. of the House Comm. on Small Bus., 101 Cong. 26 (1989) (statement of Cleveland M. Chapman, President, Midwest Contractors For Progress) (citing statistics demonstrating discrimination in lending in Chicago). For example, "the average loan to a black-owned construction firm is $ 49,000 less than the average loan to an equally matched nonminority construction firm." The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,058 & n.91 [51] (citing Grown & Bates, Commercial Bank Lending Practices & the Development of Black-Owned Construction Companies., 14 J. Urb. Aff. at 34 (1992)). "All other factors being equal, a black business owner is approximately 15 percent less likely to receive a business loan than a white owner." Id. at 26,058 & n.90 (citing Faith Ando, Capital Issues and the Minority-Owned Business, 16 Rev. Black Pol. Econ. at 97 (1988)). Another study > surveyed 407 business owners in the Denver area. It found that African Americans were 3 times more likely to be rejected for business loans than whites. The denial rate for Hispanic owners was 1.5 times as high as white owners. Disparities in the denial rate remained significant even after controlling for other factors that may affect the lending rate, such as the size and net worth of the business. The study concluded that "despite the fact that loan applicants of three different racial/ethnic backgrounds in this sample (Black, Hispanic and Anglo) were not appreciably different as businesspeople, they were ultimately treated differently by the lenders on the crucial issue of loan approval or denial."

Id. at 26,058 [52] (footnotes omitted) (citing The Colorado Center for Community Development, University of Colorado at Denver, Survey of Small Business Lending in Denver v (1996)). Such findings strongly support an initial showing of discrimination in lending; and we take judicial notice of the obvious causal connection between access to capital and ability to implement public works construction projects. n13

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Lending discrimination alone of course does not justify action in the construction market. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 510 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) (noting a municipality's alternative remedy of taking direct action against discrimination in the provision of credit). However, the persistence of such discrimination, which is already unlawful under federal law, supports the assertion that the formation, as well as utilization, of minority-owned construction enterprises has been impeded.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

b. Barriers to Competition by Existing Minority Enterprises

With regard to barriers faced by existing minority enterprises, [53] the government presents evidence tending to show that discrimination by prime contractors, private sector customers, business networks, suppliers, and bonding companies fosters a decidedly uneven playing field for minority subcontracting enterprises seeking to compete in the area of federal construction subcontracts.

The government presents powerful evidence that > all too often, contracting remains a closed network, with prime contractors maintaining long-standing relationships with subcontractors with whom they prefer to work. Because minority owned firms are new entrants to most markets, the existence and proliferation of these relationships locks them out of subcontracting opportunities. As a result, minority-owned firms are seldom or never invited to bid for subcontracts on projects that do not contain affirmative action requirements.

The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,058 & nn.98-99 (footnotes omitted) (citing studies of statistical and anecdotal evidence of minority business participation in state and local construction industries). The government has also presented sobering evidence that > when minority firms are permitted to bid [54] on subcontracts, prime contractors often resist working with them. This [*1171] sort of exclusion is often achieved by white firms refusing to accept low minority bids or by sharing low minority bids with another subcontractor in order to allow that business to beat the bid (a practice known as "bid shopping").

Id. at 26,058-59 (citing studies of statistical and anecdotal evidence detailing bid shopping in several localities).

It is clear to us that Congress has devoted considerable energy to investigating and considering this systematic exclusion of existing minority enterprises from opportunities to bid on construction projects resulting from the insularity and sometimes outright racism of the non-minority firms in the construction industry. See, e.g., How State and Local Governments Will Meet the Croson Standard (Minority Set-Asides): Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Civ. & Const. Rights of the House Comm. on the Judiciary, 100th Cong. 53-54 (1989) (statement of Marc Bendick, Bendick & Egan Economic Consultants, Inc.) ("We must not for a moment underestimate the role of continuing pervasive blunt discrimination by the private market. . . . The same prime [55] contractor who will use a minority subcontractor on a city contract and will be terribly satisfied with the firm's performance, will simply not use that minority subcontractor on a private contract where the prime contractor is not forced to use a minority firm."); The Significance of Croson at 121-22 (statement of Manuel Rodriguez); id. at 104-06 (statement of E.R. Mitchell, Jr., President of E.R. Mitchell Construction Company and President of the Atlanta Chapter of the National Association of Minority Contractors) (identifying racially discriminatory actions by federal and state government agencies in the bidding process on construction contracts).

REV_00259050

The government's evidence strongly supports the thesis that informal, racially exclusionary business networks dominate the subcontracting construction industry, shutting out competition from minority firms. See, e.g., The Significance of Croson at 107 (statement of E.R. Mitchell, Jr.) ("Qualified black firms are outside the business network of established white firms. By virtue of being outsiders to their communications loop, it is impossible to successfully bid because we remain forever strangers to white owners and developers. [56] "); The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,059-60 & nn.107, 109-110 (citing studies and articles on statistical and anecdotal evidence demonstrating discriminatory treatment in the bidding process).

Minority subcontracting enterprises in the construction industry find themselves unable to compete with non-minority firms on an equal playing field due to racial discrimination by bonding companies, without whom those minority enterprises cannot obtain subcontracting opportunities. The government presents evidence both that bonding is an essential requirement of participation in federal subcontracting procurement, see The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,060 (citing 40 U.S.C. §§ 270a-270e), and a "vicious circle" whereby minority subcontractors cannot obtain bonding due to lack of experience, and "since they cannot get bonding, they cannot get experience," The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,060 (footnote omitted). Minority Business Participation in Department of Transportation Project: Hearing Before a Subcomm. of the House Comm. on Gov't Operations, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. 159 (1985) (statement [57] of Sherman Brown, President, MCAP, Inc.) ("Virtually everyone connected with the minority contracting industry . . . apparently agrees that surety bonding is one of the biggest obstacles in the development of minority firms."). The government additionally presents evidence of an insular "old-boy" network in bonding that excludes minority firms. See, e.g., H.R. Rep. No. 103-870 at 15 & n.36. There is also strong evidence of overt racial discrimination in the bonding market. See, e.g., Discrimination in Surety Bonding: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Minority Enter., Fin. & Urb. Dev. of the House Comm. on Small Bus., 103d Cong. 2 (1993) (statement of John B. Cruz, III, President, John B. Cruz Construction Co.) (describing racial [*1172] discrimination his company suffered in its efforts to obtain bonding); City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson: Impact and Response: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Urb. & Minority-Owned Bus. Dev. of the Senate Comm. on Small Bus., 101st Cong. 40-41, 43 (1990) (statement of Andrew Brimmer, President, Brimmer and Company, Inc., Economic and Financial Consultants) (presenting the results of a study showing discrimination in bonding faced by African-American, [58] Hispanic, and Pacific-Islander-owned firms in the Atlanta area); id. at 165-66 (statement of Edward W. Bowen, Project Administrator, Prentiss Properties, Ltd.) (noting that unclear bonding standards permit denials of bonding that are arbitrary and capricious and racially-biased); Disadvantaged Business Set-Asides in Transportation Construction Projects, supra, at 107 (statement of Marjorie L. Herter, National President, Women Construction Owners & Executives, USA; President, Vee See Construction Co.) ("Discrimination against women and minorities in the bonding market is quite prevalent."); The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26060 & n.118 (citing studies of statistical and anecdotal evidence of widespread racial discrimination in bonding). For example, the government cites a Louisiana study according to which "minority firms were nearly twice as likely to be rejected for bonding, three times more likely to be rejected for bonding for over $ 1 million, and on average were charged higher rates for the same bonding policies than white firms with the same experience level," The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,060 & n.119 (citing [59] D.J. Miller & Associates, 2 State of Louisiana Disparity Study at 35-57 (1991)), while an Atlanta study found similarly glaring disparities in the ability of minority versus non-minority construction firms to obtain bonding generally and "unlimited bonding" in particular, Andrew F. Brimmer & Ray Marshall, Public Policy and Promotion of Minority Economic Development: City of Atlanta and Fulton County, Georgia at 19-20 (1990) (cited in City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson: Impact and Response: Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Urb. & Minority-owned Bus. Dev. of the Sen. Comm. on Small Bus., 101st Cong. 193-94 (1990)).

Finally, the government presents evidence of discrimination by suppliers, the result of which is that nonminority subcontractors receive special prices and discounts from suppliers not available to minority subcontractors, driving up "anticipated costs, and therefore the bid, for minority-owned businesses." Id. at 26,061; see also id. at n.123 (citing studies detailing discrimination by suppliers); The Significance of Croson at 106 (statement of E.R. Mitchell, Jr.) ("Common suppliers working on projects routinely give white subs better prices [60] for materials than they do black subs.").

Contrary to Adarand's contentions, on the basis of the foregoing survey of evidence regarding minority business formation and competition in the subcontracting industry, the government's evidence as to the kinds of obstacles minority subcontracting businesses face constitutes a strong basis for the conclusion that those obstacles are not "the same problems faced by any new business, regardless of the race of the owners." (Appellee's Br. at 28.)

c. Local Disparity Studies

Following the Supreme Court's decision in Croson, numerous state and local governments have undertaken statistical studies to assess the disparity, if any, between availability and utilization of minority-owned businesses in government contracting. See The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,061-62 (presenting the Urban Institute's analysis of thirty-nine disparity studies); see also 144 Cong. Rec. S5413-14 (May 22, 1998) (statement of Senator Chafee) (discussing a disparity study conducted for CDOT that found "a disproportionately small number of . . . minority-owned contractors participating in Colorado's transportation construction industry [61] . . . . Hispanic firms received less than one-half of one percent (.26%). . . . The vast majority of contracts--more than 99 percent-- [*1173] went to firms owned by white men."). The government's review of those studies reveals that although such disparity was least glaring in the category of construction subcontracting, even in that area "minority firms still receive only 87 cents for every dollar they would be expected to receive" based on their availability. The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. at 26,062. In that regard, the Croson majority stated that "where there is a significant statistical disparity between the number of qualified minority contractors willing and able to perform a particular service and the number of such contractors actually engaged by the [government] or the [government's] prime contractors, an inference of discriminatory exclusion could arise." 488 U.S. at 509 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) (citations omitted). We are certainly mindful that "where special qualifications are necessary, the relevant statistical pool for purposes of demonstrating discriminatory exclusion must be the number of minorities qualified to undertake the particular [62] task." Id. at 501-02. But here, we are unaware of such "special qualifications" aside from the general qualifications necessary to operate a construction subcontracting business. At a minimum, the disparity indicates that there has been under-utilization of the existing pool of minority subcontractors; and there is no evidence either in the record on appeal or in the legislative history before us that those minority subcontractors who have been utilized have performed inadequately or otherwise demonstrated a lack of necessary qualifications.

The disparity between minority DBE availability and market utilization in the subcontracting industry raises an inference that the various discriminatory factors the government cites have created that disparity. In Concrete Works, we stated that "we agree with the other circuits which have interpreted Croson impliedly to permit a municipality to rely . . . on general data reflecting the number of MBEs and WBEs in the marketplace to defeat the challenger's summary judgment motion," and we do not see Adarand III as requiring any different standard in the case of an analogous suit against the federal government. [63] 36 F.3d at 1528. n14 Although [*1174] the government's aggregate figure of a 13% disparity between minority enterprise availability and utilization is not overwhelming evidence, it is significant. It is made more significant yet by the evidence showing that discriminatory factors discourage both enterprise formation of minority businesses and utilization of existing minority enterprises in public contracting. Of course, it would be "sheer speculation" to even attempt to attach a particular figure to the hypothetical number of minority enterprises that would exist without discriminatory barriers to minority DBE formation. Croson, 488 U.S. at 499. However, the existence of evidence indicating that the number of minority DBEs would be significantly (but unquantifiably) higher but for such barriers is nevertheless relevant to the assessment of whether a disparity is sufficiently significant to give rise to an inference of discriminatory exclusion. n15 n14 We reject the decidedly vague urgings of Adarand's amici curiae to reject disparity studies generally as biased and/or insufficiently reliable. Certainly, the conclusions of virtually all social scientific studies may be cast into question by criticism of their choice of assumptions and methodologies. The very need to make assumptions and to select data sets and relevant variables precludes perfection in empirical social science. However, general criticism of disparity studies, as opposed to particular evidence undermining the reliability of the particular disparity studies relied upon by the government, is of little persuasive value and neither compels us to discount the disparity evidence presented in the government's appendix nor does it create "a legitimate factual dispute about the accuracy of [the government's] data." Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1528 (refusing to grant summary judgment because of a legitimate factual dispute about the accuracy of disparity study data). Moreover, a generalized assertion that disparity studies lack reliability is in conflict with Croson, which suggests that disparity studies are entirely relevant to an assessment of whether sufficiently strong evidence exists to support a compelling interest in a race-conscious remedy. See 488 U.S. at 501; Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1528 ("Once credible information about the size or capacity of the firms is introduced in the record, it becomes a factor that the court should consider.").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Adarand and its amici curiae misinterpret the case law they cite for the proposition that disparity studies are invalid. For example, with regard to Coral Construction Co. v. King City, 941 F.2d 910, 921 (9th Cir. 1991), we agree with the Ninth Circuit that the challengers of a DBE program should have the opportunity to rebut statistical evidence. In the present case, Adarand has had such an opportunity both in the district court below, see Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1573-77, and before this Court on appeal, but has failed to present a rebuttal other than an unfocused attack on disparity studies generally. Relying on Coral Construction Co., Adarand's amici further argue the disparity studies were not introduced into evidence and not rebutted; however, the amici do not, and presumably cannot, cite the portion of the record where Adarand objected on that ground to the introduction of the studies via The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,050, and their objection has been waived. See Lopez v. Behles (In re Am. Ready Mix, Inc.), 14 F.3d 1497, 1502 (10th Cir. 1994) (holding that where the appellant did not show, and the court of appeals could not find, where the issue was raised in the trial court below, the issue was not properly before the court of appeals and would not be considered); Walker v. Mather (In re Walker), 959 F.2d 894, 896 (10th Cir. 1992) (holding that as a general rule, the court of appeals will not consider an issue that was not raised below). As for Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. Coalition for Economic Equity, 950 F.2d 1401, 1416 (9th Cir. 1991), the court in that case held the statistical evidence presented was sufficient on the facts to establish compelling interest. Contractors Association of Eastern Pennsylvania, 6 F.3d at 1005, stated that "disparity indices are highly probative evidence of discrimination." On further appeal in that case, the Third Circuit stated that whether disparity studies provided the requisite strong basis in evidence for upholding the race-conscious program at issue was a "close call" but did not decide the question. Contractors Ass'n of E. Penn, Inc. v. City of Philadelphia, 91 F.3d 586, 605 (3d Cir. 1996). Finally, Engineering Contractors Association of South Florida, Inc. v. Metropolitan Dade County, 122 F.3d 895, 903-05, 924 (11th Cir. 1997), can be distinguished on the grounds that the court of appeals affirmed the district court's factual findings which rejected evidence from disparity studies under the deferential "clear error" standard of review. Here the district court committed no clear error in its finding of compelling interest based on the statistical evidence before it. To the extent the foregoing cases may be otherwise interpreted, we reject their holdings. [64] n15 Based on a comprehensive review of 1987 census data showing disproportionately low minority business ownership and receipts for minority-owned business, the U.S. Commission on Minority Business Development concluded that "minorities are not underrepresented in business because of choice or chance. Discrimination and benign neglect is the reason why our economy has been denied access to this vital resource." United States Commission on Minority Business Development, Final Report 60 (1992).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

d. Results of Removing Affirmative Action Programs

We take notice of an additional source of evidence of the link between compelling interest and remedy. There is ample evidence that when race-conscious public contracting programs are struck down or discontinued, minority business participation in the relevant market drops sharply or even disappears. See, e.g., 144 Cong. Rec. S1421 (March 5, 1998) (statement of Sen. Moseley-Braun) (citing statistics); The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,062 & nn.130-134 (citing studies). Although that evidence standing alone is not dispositive, [65] it strongly supports the government's claim that there are significant barriers to minority competition in the public subcontracting market, raising the specter of racial discrimination. "Where there is a significant statistical disparity between the number of qualified minority contractors willing and able to perform a particular service and the number of such contractors actually engaged by the locality or the locality's prime contractors, an inference of discriminatory exclusion could arise." Croson, 488 U.S. at 509 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) (citations omitted).

In sum, on the basis of the foregoing body of evidence, we conclude that the government has met its initial burden of presenting a "strong basis in evidence" [*1175] sufficient to support its articulated, constitutionally valid, compelling interest. Croson, 488 U.S. at 500 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 277).

4. Adarand's Rebuttal

Adarand and the amici curiae supporting it have utterly failed to meet their "ultimate burden" of introducing credible, particularized evidence to rebut the government's initial showing of the existence of a compelling interest in remedying the nationwide [66] effects of past and present discrimination in the federal construction procurement subcontracting market. n16 Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1522 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 277). Its assertions as to the general impermissibility of a race-conscious remedy regardless of the compelling interest identified by Congress are not in accordance with equal protection jurisprudence. It is simply an untenable interpretation of Equal Protection Doctrine to insist that the Constitution requires Congress to acquiesce in the workings of an ostensibly free market that would direct the profits to be gleaned from disbursements of public funds to non-minorities alone. See Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1519 ("The Fourteenth Amendment permits race-conscious programs that seek . . . to prevent the public entity from acting as a '"passive participant" in a system of racial exclusion . . .' by allowing tax dollars 'to finance the evil of private prejudice.'" (quoting Croson, 488 U.S. at 492)); see also Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237 ("The unhappy persistence of both the practice and the lingering effects of racial discrimination [67] against minority groups in this country is an unfortunate reality, and government is not disqualified from acting in response to it.").

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

REV_00259054

n16 We disagree with Adarand's contention that the government's "Appendix I" to its motion for summary judgment (Appellants' App. at 44-53) is insufficient evidence of Congress's findings. The Appendix references and discusses the long and comprehensive legislative history and findings on discrimination in the nationwide construction contracting market. Adarand's challenge to that history is too conclusory to meet its burden under Concrete Works.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

We reject Adarand's characterization of various congressional reports and findings as conclusory and its highly general criticism of the methodology of numerous "disparity studies" cited by the government and its amici curiae as supplemental evidence of discrimination. n17 The evidence cited by the government and its amici curiae and examined in this opinion only reinforces the conclusion that "racial discrimination and its effects [68] continue to impair the ability of minority-owned businesses to compete in the nation's contracting markets." The Compelling Interest, 62 Fed. Reg. at 26,062. In Concrete Works, 36 F.3d at 1530-31, the plaintiff "specifically identified" and "put forth evidence" showing "flaws" in the data justifying the City of Denver's affirmative action program, thus precluding summary judgment on the issue of compelling interest. Here, by contrast, the government's evidence permits a finding that as a matter of law Congress has the requisite strong basis in evidence to take action to remedy racial discrimination and its lingering effects in the construction industry. This evidence demonstrates that both the race-based barriers to entry and the ongoing [*1176] race-based impediments to success faced by minority subcontracting enterprises--both discussed above--are caused either by continuing discrimination or the lingering effects of past discrimination on the relevant market. Furthermore, Congress is not limited to simply proscribing federal discrimination against minority contractors, as it has obviously already done. The Constitution does not obligate Congress to stand [69] by idly and continue to pour money into an industry so shaped by the effects of discrimination that the profits to be derived from congressional appropriations accrue exclusively to the beneficiaries, however personally innocent, of the effects of racial prejudice. n18

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n17 Adarand III called into question Fullilove's standard of review and possibly its result. However, as far as we can ascertain, nothing in Adarand III undermines the conclusion of the lead Fullilove opinion that "Congress had abundant evidence from which it could conclude that minority businesses have been denied effective participation in public contracting opportunities by procurement practices that perpetuated the effects of prior discrimination." Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 477-78 (Op. of Burger, C.J.); see also Croson, 488 U.S. at 504 ("[In the Fullilove case,] Congress was exercising its powers under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment in making a finding that past discrimination would cause federal funds to be distributed in a manner which reinforced prior patterns of discrimination . . . . Congress has made national findings that there has been societal discrimination in a host of fields."). [70]

n18 We likewise reject Adarand's contention that Congress must make specific findings regarding discrimination against every single sub-category of individuals within the broad racial and ethnic categories designated by statute and addressed by the relevant legislative findings. If Congress has valid evidence, for example that Asian-American individuals are subject to discrimination because of their status as Asian-Americans, it makes no sense to require sub-findings that subcategories of that class experience particularized discrimination because of their status as, for example, Americans from Bhutan. "Race" is often a classification of dubious validity--scientifically, legally, and morally. We need not impart excess legitimacy to racial classifications by taking notice of the harsh fact that racial discrimination commonly occurs along the lines of the broad categories identified: "Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Pacific Americans, and other minorities." 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(3)(C).

The evidence at issue is not, as Adarand would have it, merely evidence of generalized societal discrimination. See Wygant, 476 U.S. at 276 (Op. of Powell, J.) ("Societal discrimination, without more, is too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy."). Rather, it is evidence of specific barriers to market entry and fair competition facing actual and potential minority participants in the market for public construction contracts. In short, the construction contracting market is overwhelmingly composed of non-minorities due to the effects of racial discrimination.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [71]

We do not intend to suggest that the evidence cited by the government is unrebuttable. We merely point out that under our precedent it is for Adarand to rebut that evidence, and it has not done so to the extent required to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the government has met its evidentiary burden. We reiterate that "the ultimate burden [of proof] remains with [the challenging party] to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of an affirmative-action program." Id. 36 F.3d at 1522 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 277-78 (plurality)). "The nonminority [challengers] . . . continue to bear the ultimate burden of persuading the court that [the government entity's] evidence did not support an inference of prior discrimination and thus a remedial purpose." Id. (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 293 (O'Connor, J., concurring)). Because Adarand has failed utterly to meet its burden, the government's initial showing stands.

In sum, guided by Concrete Works, we conclude that the evidence cited by the government and its amici, particularly that contained in The Compelling Interest, 61 Fed. Reg. 26,050, more than satisfies [72] the government's burden of production regarding the compelling interest for a race-conscious remedy. Congress has a compelling interest in eradicating the economic roots of racial discrimination in highway transportation programs funded by federal monies. We therefore affirm the district court's finding of a compelling interest.

C. Narrow Tailoring

We turn now to the question of narrow tailoring. Here, again, we must first define "narrow tailoring" for purposes of strict scrutiny and then determine whether the SCC program in the present case falls within that definition.

1. "Narrow Tailoring" in Race-conscious Programs Defined

We are guided in our inquiry by the handful of Supreme Court cases that have applied the narrow-tailoring analysis to government affirmative action programs. [*1177] In applying strict scrutiny to a court-ordered program remedying the failure to promote black police officers, a plurality of the Court stated that > in determining whether race-conscious remedies are appropriate, we look to several factors, including the necessity for the relief and the efficacy of alternative remedies; the flexibility and duration of the relief, including the availability [73] of waiver provisions; the relationship of the numerical goals to the relevant labor market; and the impact of the relief on the rights of third parties.

Paradise, 480 U.S. at 171 (1986) (plurality op. of Brennan, J.) (citations omitted). Regarding flexibility, "the availability of waiver" is of particular importance. Id. As for numerical proportionality, Croson admonishes us to beware of the "completely unrealistic assumption that minorities will choose a particular trade in lockstep proportion to their representation in the local population." 488 U.S. at 507 (quoting Sheet Metal Workers, 478 U.S. at 494 (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)). In that context, a "rigid numerical quota" particularly disserves the cause of narrow tailoring. Id. at 508. n19 Finally, as for burdens imposed on third parties, a plurality of the Court in Wygant stated:

REV_00259056

> As part of this Nation's dedication to eradicating racial discrimination, innocent persons may be called upon to bear some of the burden of the remedy. "When effectuating a limited and properly tailored remedy to cure the effects [74] of prior discrimination, such a 'sharing of the burden' by innocent parties is not impermissible."

476 U.S. at 280-81 (Op. of Powell, J.) (quoting Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 484 (plurality)) (further quotations and footnote omitted). We are guided by that benchmark.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n19 While Paradise only assumed without deciding that strict scrutiny is the appropriate standard, see 480 U.S. at 166-67 (plurality), it nevertheless applied strict scrutiny to affirm a race-conscious relief measure, see id. at 185-86. Although the Paradise factors require some modification in order to be used for evaluating the nationwide legislative enactment and its implementing regulations and programs at issue here (as opposed to a judicial order aimed at a particular police department), they provide some general guidance on questions the Court considers relevant to the narrow tailoring inquiry. See also Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237 (citing the opinions of Justices Brennan, Stevens, and O'Connor in Paradise "to dispel the notion that strict scrutiny is 'strict in theory, but fatal in fact'" (quoting Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 519 (Marshall, J., concurring))).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [75]

Justice O'Connor's majority opinion in Croson adds a further factor to our analysis: under- or over-inclusiveness of the DBE classification. In Croson, the Supreme Court struck down an affirmative action program as insufficiently narrowly tailored in part because "there is no inquiry into whether or not the particular MBE seeking a racial preference has suffered from the effects of past discrimination . . . . The interest in avoiding the bureaucratic effort necessary to tailor remedial relief to those who truly have suffered from the effects of prior discrimination cannot justify a rigid line drawn on the basis of a suspect classification." Croson, 488 U.S. at 508 (citation omitted). Thus, we must be especially careful to inquire into whether there has been an effort to identify worthy participants in DBE programs or whether the programs in question paint with too broad--or too narrow--a brush.

More specific guidance is found in Adarand III. In remanding for strict scrutiny, the Court identified two questions apparently of particular importance in the instant case: (1) "consideration of the use of race-neutral means;" and (2) "whether the program [is] [76] appropriately limited [so as] not to last longer than the discriminatory effects it is designed to eliminate." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237-38 (internal quotations and citations omitted). We thus direct our attention to an analysis of the program in light of [*1178] Adarand III's specific questions on remand, and the foregoing narrow-tailoring factors, in the following order: (1) the availability of race-neutral alternative remedies; (2) limits on the duration of the SCC and DBE certification programs; (3) flexibility; (4) numerical proportionality; (5) the burden on third parties; and (6) over- or under-inclusiveness.

2. Race-neutral Alternative Remedies

REV_00259057

The first factor to be considered is that of the availability of alternative remedies to the race-conscious measures at issue. The district court in Adarand IV found, and Adarand does not challenge its finding, that Congress over a period of decades attempted to correct by race-neutral means the problem of too few minority subcontractors for government construction contracts, and only after it continued to find discriminatory effects did it first implement a race-conscious remedy. See Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1582-83; [77] see also Croson, 488 U.S. at 507 (noting the finding in Fullilove that "Congress . . . carefully examined and rejected race-neutral alternatives before enacting the MBE set-aside"). n20 That finding is law of the case and is not clearly erroneous. See Agostini, 521 U.S. at 236; McIlravy, 204 F.3d at 1034-35. The long history of discrimination in, and affecting, the public construction procurement market--despite the efforts dating back at least to the enactment in 1958 of the SBA to employ race-neutral measures--places a formidable burden on both existing and would-be minority participants and thus justifies race-conscious action to address a decidedly racial disparity.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n20 Although the standard of review and result of Fullilove have been called into question by Adarand III, the district court noted, in our view correctly, that a square majority of the Court in Croson cited with approval the principal opinion in Fullilove for this factual finding. We fail to see how this factual aspect of Fullilove has been impaired; Adarand offers no authority to refute the finding that three decades of race-neutral measures failed to have any appreciable effect on the exclusion of minorities from the receipt of government highway largesse. Adarand offers no evidence to rebut the district court's conclusion that Congress entertained and indeed attempted years of race-neutral measures without success before resorting to the programs at issue in this lawsuit.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [78]

A separate question, however, is whether the FLHP considered other more narrowly tailored measures before deciding to implement 15 U.S.C. § 644(g) by means of the SCC, with its race-based presumptions of disadvantage. The government's argument focuses on Congress's consideration of race-neutral measures prior to enacting its policy of maximizing opportunity for minority-owned and controlled businesses and setting aspirational goals for the participation of such businesses in federal contracting. Although Congress considered the futility of race-neutral measures prior to incorporating the aspirational goals into the SBA and the relevant appropriations measures, the government fails to address whether the FLHP considered either measures short of a race-conscious subsidy to prime contractors or a more refined means of assessing subcontractors' eligibility for race-conscious programs prior to promulgating the regulations implementing the SCC. The record persuades us that under the high degree of solicitude for individual rather than race-based consideration mandated by the Court's strict scrutiny standard, the government has not shown that the FLHP adequately [79] considered such alternative measures in the 1996 SCC program.

Again, the situation has since changed dramatically. n21 A comparison of that previous SCC program with the new federal regulations under TEA-21 is particularly instructive. The current, revised regulations instruct recipients that "you must meet the maximum feasible portion of your overall goal by using race-neutral means of facilitating DBE participation," 49 C.F.R. § 26.51(a) (2000); see also 49 C.F.R. [*1179] § 26.51(f) (2000) (if a recipient can meet its overall goal through race-neutral means, it must implement its program without the use of race-conscious contracting measures), and enumerate a list of race-neutral measures, see 49 C.F.R. § 26.51(b) (2000). The current regulations also outline several race-neutral means available to program recipients including helping overcome bonding and financing obstacles, providing technical assistance, establishing programs to assist start-up firms, and other methods. See 49 C.F.R. § 26.51(b). We therefore are dealing here with revisions that emphasize the continuing need to employ non-race-conscious methods even as

REV_00259058

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection

A program that employs racial or ethnic criteria, even in a remedial context, calls for close examination; yet courts are bound to approach the task with appropriate deference to the Congress, a co-equal branch charged by the United States Constitution with the power to provide for the general welfare of the United States and to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the equal protection guarantees of the U.S. Const. amend. XIV.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

When deciding the question of whether the interests served by the use of subcontractor compensation clauses are properly described as "compelling," a courts inquiry necessarily consists of four parts: First, it must determine whether the government's articulated goal in enacting the race-based measures at issue is appropriately considered a "compelling interest" under the governing case law; if so, it must then set forth the standards under which to evaluate the government's evidence of compelling interest; third, it must decide whether the evidence presented by the government is sufficiently strong to meet its initial burden of demonstrating the compelling interest it has articulated; and finally, it must examine whether the challenging party has met its ultimate burden of rebutting the government's evidence such that the granting of summary judgment to either party is proper.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

U.S. Const. amend. XIV permits race-conscious programs that seek both to eradicate discrimination by the governmental entity itself and to prevent the public entity from acting as a "passive participant" in a system of racial exclusion practiced by elements of the local construction industry by allowing tax dollars to finance the evil of private prejudice.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

The fact that Congress's enactments must serve a compelling interest does not necessitate the conclusion that the scope of that interest must be as geographically limited as that of a local government.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Generally, absent searching judicial inquiry into the justification for race-based measures, there is simply no way of determining what classifications are in fact motivated by illegitimate notions of racial inferiority or simple racial politics. Indeed, the purpose of strict scrutiny is to smoke out illegitimate uses of race by assuring that the legislative body is pursuing a goal important enough to warrant the use of a highly suspect tool.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

A racial classification, regardless of purported motivation, is presumptively invalid and can be upheld only upon an extraordinary justification.

Labor & Employment Law : Affirmative Action

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection

A court's benchmark for judging the adequacy of the government's factual predicate for affirmative action legislation is whether there exists a strong basis in evidence for the government's conclusion that remedial action was necessary. Both statistical and anecdotal evidence are appropriate in the strict scrutiny calculus, although anecdotal evidence by itself is not.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

REV_00259032

the need for race-conscious remedies is recognized. [80] The record before us does not indicate whether or not FLHP considered race-neutral measures prior to resorting to the SCC. This absence weighs strongly against any finding of narrow tailoring. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237-38; Croson, 488 U.S. at 507. The district court was therefore correct, given the information before it at the time, that the SCC program was not narrowly tailored, and should the government reinstitute the revised program without considering race-neutral measures similar to those outlined in 49 C.F.R. § 25.51(a) and (b) (2000), that program too would be insufficiently narrowly tailored.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n21 The regulatory changes discussed below resulted from several years of study and consideration of Croson and Adarand III. See 64 Fed. Reg. 5096, 5101-03 (1999) (discussing how regulatory changes address the requirements of narrow tailoring).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

3. Appropriate Limit on Duration

A second important factor in any narrow-tailoring analysis is a limit [81] on the duration of the race-conscious measures at issue. The district court declined to address this aspect of the Supreme Court's inquiry on remand because of the court's finding that the 1996 SCC program was not narrowly tailored for other reasons. See Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1584. Although we agree for different reasons that the 1996 program the district court considered was insufficiently narrowly tailored to pass constitutional muster, the factor of limited duration is mentioned in Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238, and we accept the Court's invitation to consider this factor now.

The duration of a particular company's DBE status is limited by statute and regulation to approximately ten-and-one-half years under the § 8(a) certification program. See 15 U.S.C. §§ 634(b)(6), 636(j)(10)(C)(i), 637(a), (d); 13 C.F.R. § 124.110 (1996); 13 C.F.R. § 124.2 (2000). Moreover, each participant in the § 8(a) program is required to annually submit financial and other information, on the basis of which the SBA reevaluates and may "graduate" a small disadvantaged business from the program as no longer qualified (e.g., because the [82] criteria of economic disadvantage are no longer met). See 15 U.S.C. §§ 636(j)(10)(G), 637(a)(6)(B), (C). The § 8(a) program's inherent time limit and graduation provisions ensure that it, like the program upheld in Paradise, is carefully designed to "endure[] only until . . . the discriminatory impact" has been eliminated; once a DBE loses its economic disadvantage, it loses its certification. Paradise, 480 U.S. at 178. As far as we can ascertain from the regulations previously in effect, the § 8(d) program did not have an analogous individual time limit. Therefore, insofar as the 1996 SCC program relied on § 8(a) criteria, those criteria increased the narrow tailoring of the program. However, insofar as the program relied on § 8(d) criteria, through state certifications, n22 we discern no evidence that the specific criteria of DBE eligibility provide a temporal limit to the program. Thus, insofar as the district court suggested that an SCC program based on § 8(a) criteria would be insufficiently narrowly tailored, we disagree; the court's skepticism about the fatality in fact of strict scrutiny in the narrow-tailoring context is [83] contrary to the Supreme Court's own pronouncements in both Adarand III, [*1180] 515 U.S. at 237, and Croson, 488 U.S. at 509.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n22 Notably, Gonzalez was certified through such a state program in the present case, belying the government's argument that there was no evidence of unconstitutional state certifications under the version of § 8(d) in place at the time this litigation commenced.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

In this respect, too, we note that the government has modified its unconstitutional practices. The current § 8(d) program regulations specifically incorporate the certification requirements from the Small Business Administration regulations implementing the § 8(a) program. See 48 C.F.R. § 19.001 (2000) (incorporating certification requirements of 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. B); 13 C.F.R. § 124.1002(a) (2000) (incorporating § 8(a) criteria from 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. A). The regulations incorporated into the § 8(d) program provide for a certification of a business as socially and economically [84] disadvantaged for three years after either the initial certification or other administrative determination. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.1014 (2000). If a business wishes to remain certified for longer than three years, it must "submit a new application and receive a new certification." Id. § 124.1014(c). n23 Therefore, with regard to appropriate limitations on duration, the current DBE certification programs are narrowly tailored.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n23 Although the § 8(a) program provides for annual rather than tri-annual review of DBE certification, for purposes of the "duration" prong of the narrow-tailoring inquiry, that difference is not so glaring as to require striking down the § 8(d) program; rather, it is the periodic reevaluation of disadvantaged status that renders this aspect of the program narrowly tailored because in that way, the program will not last longer than the situation it seeks to correct.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Finally, we note that Congress extensively debated whether to renew the DBE program prior to passing TEA-21 in 1998. [85] See, e.g., 144 Cong. Rec. S1481-06, S1481-96 (March 6, 1998); id. S1395-01, S1395-434 (March 5, 1998); id. H1885-04, H2000-11 (Apr. 1, 1998). These debates, in addition to the limited duration of the DBE program in accordance with the limited duration of TEA-21 and other highway appropriations statutes like it, indicate that the race-conscious programs at issue are "appropriately limited" to last no longer than "the discriminatory effects [they are] designed to eliminate." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238 (quotation omitted).

4. Additional Narrow-Tailoring Factors

Although they were not emphasized by the Adarand III Court, we deem the other factors discussed in Paradise, 480 U.S. at 171, and Croson, 488 U.S. at 507-08, to be of value in the narrow tailoring analysis, and we turn to them now.

a. Flexibility

The 1996 SCC program, providing a subsidy for the use of DBEs, is certainly more flexible than the set-asides considered in either Fullilove or Croson because the program is not mandatory. It does not require the use of DBEs in subcontracting against the will of the prime contractor. See Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1583 [86] (finding that the prime contractor's choice to avail itself of the SCC is "more flexible than the 'rigid racial quota' struck down in Croson, 488 U.S. at 499, and the 10 percent set aside upheld in Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 513-14"). n24 Moreover, the 1996 SCC program [*1181] incorporates an additional element of flexibility--"the availability of waiver," Paradise, 480 U.S. at 171--because any prime contractor is free not to take advantage of the clause and will never be required to make a "gratuitous" choice of subcontractors, id. at 178. With regard to flexibility, the 1996 program passes muster under a narrow-tailoring analysis.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n24 None of the parties in this case contend that SBA § 8(d)(4), 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(4), pertains to the SCC. However, even if § 8(d)(4) were relevant here, that would not change our conclusion that the SCC is not mandatory in nature. Section 8(d)(4)(E) informs government agencies letting contracts that they are "authorized to provide such incentives as such Federal agency may deem appropriate in order to encourage such subcontracting opportunities as may be commensurate with the efficient and economical performance of the contract." 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(4)(E) (emphasis added). This language demonstrates that § 8 (d)(4) merely authorizes, but does not require, the use of incentives (of whatever type) to further the aspirational goals of increased participation in government contracts by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals. The fact that the FLHP has discontinued use of the SCC further demonstrates that § 8(d)(4) in no way requires an incentive clause in federal highway transportation contracts.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [87]

Nothing has changed in this regard from 1996 until the present that would militate the contrary conclusion. On the contrary, the present version of the regulations have increased the flexibility of the government's DBE programs: An express waiver provision has been added to the current regulations. See 49 C.F.R. § 26.15 (2000) (allowing recipients of federal highway construction funds to seek waivers and exemptions, despite the already non-mandatory nature of DBE programs).

b. Numerical Proportionality

The essential question arising out of the numerical proportionality factor of Paradise is whether the aspirational goals of 5% in the SBA and 10% participation contained in STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21 are proportionate only if they correspond to an actual finding as to the number of existing minority-owned businesses. Despite involving a rigid quota rather than flexible and periodically adjusted aspirational goals, Croson may be read to suggest as much. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 507 (characterizing as "completely unrealistic" the "assumption that minorities will choose a particular trade in lockstep proportion to their representation in the local population" [88] (citing Sheet Metal Workers', 478 U.S. 421 at 494, 92 L. Ed. 2d 344, 106 S. Ct. 3019 (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part))). However, because Congress has evidence that the effects of past discrimination have excluded minorities from the construction industry and that the number of available minority subcontractors reflects that discrimination, the existing percentage of minority-owned businesses is not necessarily an absolute cap on the percentage that a remedial program might legitimately seek to achieve. Absolute proportionality to overall demographics is an unreasonable goal. However, Croson does not prohibit setting an aspirational goal above the current percentage of minority-owned businesses that is substantially below the percentage of minority persons in the population as a whole. This aspirational goal is reasonably construed as narrowly tailored to remedy past discrimination that has resulted in homogenous ownership within the industry. It is reasonable to conclude that allocating more than 95% of all federal contracts to enterprises owned by non-minority persons, or more than 90% of federal transportation contracts to enterprises [89] owned by non-minority males, is in and of itself a form of passive participation in discrimination that Congress is entitled to seek to avoid. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 492 (Op. of O'Connor, J.).

Apart from the reasonableness of the goals, the record before us supports the government's contention that the 5% and 10% goals incorporated in the statutes at issue here, unlike the set-asides in both Fullilove and Croson, are merely aspirational and not mandatory. Cf. Croson, 488 U.S. at 508 (finding no need "for a rigid numerical quota"). Therefore, while the goal may well be relevant to the numerical proportionality aspect of the Paradise strict scrutiny inquiry, we disagree with the district court that the goal itself is facially unconstitutional. Moreover, there is simply no showing that Adarand lost or will lose contracts due to the STURAA/ISTEA/TEA-21 10% goals for DBE participation, but rather only due to the over- or under-inclusive race-based presumptions involved in certification for 1996 SCC eligibility. Therefore, we conclude both that Adarand is without standing to mount any independent challenge to the 5% and 10% figures [90] and that such a challenge is outside the scope of the Supreme Court's Adarand III remand. See [*1182] Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1566 n.11 (noting that "Defendants maintain, and Adarand does not dispute, that the challenge in this action is based only on the use of the SCC to meet the various goals" established by the SBA, STURAA, and ISTEA).

We also conclude the government failed to carry its evidentiary burden in the district court insofar as the use of the 1996 SCC was based on an ill-defined 12-15% goal apparently adopted by the Federal Highway Administration ("FHA"). (See Appellants' App. at 187.) Unlike the congressionally-mandated goals that are supported by legislative history and supplemental evidence, we can find no explanation in the record before us of the basis in evidence on which the FHA relied in adopting this 12-15% goal (if in fact there is one). That congressional findings support the 5% and 10% aspirational goals in the SBA and transportation appropriation statutes, respectively, as well as the delegation of responsibility for setting individual goals to various agencies, does not vitiate the constitutional duty of those agencies to assure that [91] the goals are supported by evidence that meets the requirements of Croson and Concrete Works. The complete absence of an explanation for the 12-15% goal in the record would have required granting summary judgment in favor of Adarand on the question of whether use of the 1996 SCC is narrowly tailored to meet the compelling interest determined by Congress.

Once again, however, comparison of the 1996 SCC to the current TEA-21 regulations is instructive and leads us to the conclusion that the recent regulatory changes preclude ruling in favor of Adarand at the present time for reasons beyond the abandonment of use of the SCC in federal highway construction contracting. The process by which recipients of federal transportation funding set aspirational goals is now much more rigorous. The current regulation instructs each recipient that its "overall goal must be based on demonstrable evidence of the availability of ready, willing and able DBEs relative to all businesses ready, willing and able to participate on [the recipient's] DOT-assisted contracts" and must make "reference to the relative availability of DBEs in [the recipient's] market." ↑ 49 C.F.R. § 26.45 (b) (2000). In [92] addition, goal setting must involve "examining all evidence available in [the recipient's] jurisdiction." Id. § 26.45(c). Such evidence may include census data and valid disparity studies. See id. § 26.45(c)(1)-(3). After examining this evidence, the recipient must adjust its DBE participation goal by examining the capacity of DBEs to perform needed work, disparity studies, and other evidence. See id. § 26.45(d). When submitting a goal, the recipient must include a description of the methodology and evidence used. See id. § 26.45 (f)(3). Significantly, the rigidity of even those realistic goals is negligible. Once the goals have been set, there is no requirement that the recipient actually meet them, merely that it make a good faith effort to do so: So long as good faith efforts were made, failure to meet a goal will not subject a recipient to penalties or to being held in noncompliance. See id. § 26.47(a). These new requirements that federal agencies rigorously examine, in a verifiable manner, the reasonableness of DBE programs given particular local conditions further ensure that government agencies will heed Croson's mandate to avoid rigid application [93] of DBE percentages in government contracting. See 488 U.S. at 507.

In sum, in conformity with the aspirational nature of the percentage goals of the relevant statutes, the current regulations emphasize that the 10% figure is nothing more than "an aspirational goal at the national level," 49 C.F.R. § 26.41(b) (2000), which "does not authorize or require recipients to set overall or contract goals at the 10 percent level, or any other particular level," id. § 26.41(c). Thus, in practice there are significant requirements currently in place that must be met by any recipient of federal highway construction funds before setting even an aspirational goal for [*1183] DBE participation. There is little danger of arbitrariness in the setting of such goals, as was the case in Croson, 488 U.S. at 507.

c. Burden on Third Parties

REV_00259062

As for the third Paradise factor, the burden on third parties is obviously significant enough to grant standing to Adarand. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 211-12. While there appears to be no serious burden on prime contractors, who are obviously compensated for any additional burden occasioned by the employment of [94] DBE subcontractors, at the margin, some non-DBE subcontractors such as Adarand will be deprived of business opportunities. See Wygant, 476 U.S. at 280-81 (Op. of Powell, J.) ("When effectuating a limited and properly tailored remedy to cure the effects of prior discrimination, . . . a 'sharing of the burden' by innocent parties is not impermissible." (quoting Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 484 (plurality)) (further quotations and footnote omitted)). Insofar as the 1996 and current SCC programs are "limited in scope and duration, [they] only postpone[]" the hiring of non-DBEs, "imposing a diffuse burden . . . foreclosing only one of several opportunities." Paradise, 480 U.S. at 183 (quoting Wygant, 476 U.S. at 283).

These further limitations have been incorporated: (1) Compensation under the SCC above 1.5-2% of the total contract is prohibited (see Appellants' App. at 56); (2) under the revised SCC, there is also a monetary limit to compensation under the program of $ 50,000-$ 100,000 (see Appellants' Supp. Br. Attach. 2 at 3). Thus, the subsidy is capped in such a way as to circumscribe the financial incentive [95] to hire DBEs; after a fairly low threshold, the incentive for the prime contractor to hire further DBEs disappears.

Moreover, the current regulations are designed to increase the participation of non-minority DBEs. As to those not falling into one of the categories to which a presumption of social disadvantage applies, the current regulations retain procedures for non-minorities to participate in the DBE program. Consistent with the changes in SBA regulations, proof of social disadvantage by those not so presumed may be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, rather than by the former "clear and convincing" standard. Compare 49 C.F.R. §§ 26.61(d), 26.67(d) (2000) and 13 C.F.R. § 124.105(c)(1) (2000) with 13 C.F.R. § 124.105(c)(1) (1996). The current regulations also require recipients to ensure that DBEs are not "so overconcentrated in a certain type of work as to unduly burden the opportunity of non-DBE firms to participate." 49 C.F.R. § 26.33(a) (2000).

While at the margin, some DBEs may be hired under the program in lieu of non-DBEs, the possibility that innocent parties will share the burden of a remedial program is itself insufficient to warrant the conclusion [96] that the program is not narrowly tailored. To invalidate the 1996 and revised SCC and other government DBE programs on that basis would be to render strict scrutiny effectively fatal, in contravention of Justice O'Connor's clear statements to the contrary. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237.

d. Over- or Under-Inclusiveness

The last factor we must consider in applying strict scrutiny in this case is that of the over- or under-inclusiveness of the programs at issue. One factor in the Croson Court's rejection of the Richmond Plan was the lack of "inquiry into whether or not the particular MBE seeking a racial preference has suffered from the effects of past discrimination." Croson, 488 U.S. at 508.

Even if a race-conscious means of achieving the goal of increasing minority participation is necessary, in promulgating the SCC in use at the time of the district court's decision in Adarand IV, defendants-appellants have not demonstrated that they considered the effectiveness of at least one other, less sweeping approach to [*1184] implementing a race-conscious SCC program: disaggregating the presumptions of social and economic disadvantage, as is the [97] case under the SBA § 8(a) program, to require a separate determination of social disadvantage and economic disadvantage. See 48 C.F.R. § 52.219-8 (1996). Requiring a separate showing as to each type of disadvantage would help address the Court's concern in Croson that a government entity undertake the necessary administrative effort "to tailor remedial relief to those who truly have suffered from the effects of prior discrimination." 488 U.S. at 508. The record does not disclose any evidence that defendants undertook, and found to be unsuccessful, a program incorporating, as under § 8(a), a more individualized inquiry as to economic disadvantage prior to implementing the particular SCC program at issue in this litigation.

If the § 8(d) program in place prior to 1999 is interpreted, as we conclude it must be, to accord a presumption of economic as well as social disadvantage to minority individuals under § 8(d), while not doing so under § 8(a), that fact suggests that another more carefully tailored approach is available, i.e., the § 8(a) approach of individualized inquiry into economic disadvantage. The final section of Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238-39, [98] suggests the distinction is relevant. If individualized inquiry into economic disadvantage is sufficient to serve the purpose, why then dispense with such inquiry under § 8(d)? Indeed, if one can qualify under § 8(d), what is the significance of permitting qualification under § 8(a), aside from the practical matter of already including those DBEs enjoying § 8(a) benefits?

At the time Adarand IV originally was appealed in 1997, the government argued that the more lenient approach of § 8(d) is acceptable because of the differing purposes of § 8(a) and § 8(d).

> The [§] 8(a) program is targeted towards a smaller number of firms and provides direct assistance and protection from open competition over a period of years to help such firms become viable as prime contractors. By contrast, the [§] 8(d) program is focused on opening up federal subcontracting opportunities to a much larger number of small disadvantaged firms, and thus imposes less restrictive qualifications.

(Appellants' Br. at 34 (citing 13 C.F.R. § 124.06(b) (1997)).) That distinction, however, fails to identify why an individualized inquiry into economic disadvantage, which is admittedly [99] practicable for § 8(a) purposes, was unnecessary for the particular purposes of § 8 (d) prior to 1999. To put it simply, presuming economic disadvantage based on membership in certain racial groups does make § 8(d) "less restrictive," but it is not thereby narrowly tailored. The government fails to explain why it could not have used a non-race-based means of making § 8(d) "less restrictive." Therefore, we must conclude, under Croson, that the § 8 (d) method of certification reviewed by the district court in Adarand IV is not narrowly tailored insofar as it obviates an individualized inquiry into economic disadvantage. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 508 (rejecting an affirmative action program in part because "there is no inquiry into whether or not the particular MBE seeking a racial preference has suffered from the effects of past discrimination . . .[, and] the interest in avoiding the bureaucratic effort necessary to tailor remedial relief to those who truly have suffered from the effects of prior discrimination cannot justify a rigid line drawn on the basis of a suspect classification" (citation omitted)).

Requiring state certification standards to incorporate [100] an individualized inquiry into economic disadvantage would certainly increase the burden on enterprises seeking DBE certification, as the government argues, and therefore would presumably reduce the pool of eligible enterprises. That increased burden, however, is slight when compared with the constitutional imperative [*1185] to avoid over- or under-inclusive racial classifications--the "Sultan of Brunei" scenario that troubled the district court, Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1581 n.17--, and the § 8(d) certification process thus fails to satisfy the narrow tailoring prong of the strict scrutiny inquiry. Cf. Croson, 488 U.S. at 508. When faced with the readily available alternative approach under § 8(a) of requiring would-be DBEs to provide a narrative statement of the economic disadvantage they have faced, combined with the various other more narrowly tailored alternatives discussed above, we fail to see how the SCC approach to certification in use at the time of Adarand IV satisfies the rigorous narrow tailoring requirement of the strict scrutiny calculus. In short, by inquiring into economic disadvantage on an individual basis, the program could avoid [101] improperly increasing the contracting opportunities of those minority entrepreneurs whose access to credit, suppliers, and industry networks is already sufficient to obviate the effects of discrimination, past and present.

REV_00259064

Yet again, the government has eliminated its offending 1996 practices. In particular, it has eliminated the discrepancy between the individualized determination of economic disadvantage characterizing the § 8(a) program and the non-individualized presumption of economic disadvantage characterizing the § 8(d) program. See 48 C.F.R. § 19.001 (2000) (providing that the § 8(d) program regulations expressly incorporate the definitions of "small disadvantaged business concern" contained in 13 C.F.R. pt 124, subpt. B); 13 C.F.R. § 124.1002(a) (2000) (incorporating § 8(a) criteria from 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. A); see also 48 C.F.R. § 19.703 (2000) (eliminating the race-based presumption of economic disadvantage of the former regulation); id. § 52.219-8. The current regulations also impose a new requirement on applicants with regard to an individualized showing: They must submit a narrative statement describing the circumstances of that purported economic [102] disadvantage. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.104(b)(1) (2000); see also 49 C.F.R. § 26.67(b)(1) (2000) (providing a net worth limit for DBEs under ISTEA and TEA-21); id. § 26.65(b) (stating that businesses exceeding a certain amount of gross receipts are ineligible for the DBE program). With the individualized determination of § 8(a) extended to economic disadvantage under § 8(d), the main obstacle to a finding of narrow tailoring has disappeared.

Thus, one of Adarand III's "unresolved questions" has been answered, namely, whether the § 8(d) DBE certification program requires an individualized showing of economic disadvantage or whether the presumption applies to both social and economic disadvantage. Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238. The 1996 § 8(d) certification program did not require an individualized showing of economic disadvantage, whereas the current § 8(d) certification program does require such an individualized showing.

There remains a further question of over- and under-inclusiveness that we must consider. The district court, Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1580, found that the 1996 SCC program was not narrowly tailored in part due [103] to a failure to inquire into discrimination against each particular minority racial or ethnic group. The district court's opinion cites Adarand's arguments that "there is no evidence that Aleuts, Samoans or Bhutans [sic] have been discriminated against in the Colorado construction industry." Id. Insofar as the district court held that the scope of the inquiry into the statutes generally was the Colorado construction industry alone, this is at odds with our holdings regarding compelling interest and Congress's power to enact nationwide legislation. Furthermore, as discussed below, because of the unreliability of racial and ethnic categories and the fact that discrimination commonly occurs based on much broader racial classifications, extrapolating findings of discrimination against Native Americans, Asian-Pacific Americans, and Asian-Americans to include Aleuts, Samoans, and [*1186] Bhutanese, respectively, is more a question of nomenclature than of narrow tailoring. The Constitution does not erect a barrier to the government's effort to combat discrimination based on broad racial classifications that might prevent it from enumerating particular ethnic origins falling within such classifications. [104] While the concept of classifying human beings by race is distasteful, the fact remains that discrimination occurs based on such classifications, and engaging the classifications in order to eradicate such discrimination is a necessary evil which constitutes a compelling government interest.

We agree in principle that the 1996 SCC program would be more narrowly tailored had the CFLHD conducted an inquiry into the scope of discrimination within the region it administers as the current regulations mandate. n25 However, the district court's ensuing conclusion appears to stem from a premise that a classification, to be narrowly tailored, must not only include minority individuals who have themselves suffered discrimination, but must also automatically include all non-minority individuals who have suffered disadvantage as well. Cf. Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 486 ("There has been no showing in this case that Congress has inadvertently effected an invidious discrimination by excluding from coverage an identifiable minority group that has been the victim of a degree of disadvantage and discrimination equal to or greater than that suffered by the groups encompassed by the MBE program. [105] "). Requiring that degree of precise fit would again render strict scrutiny "fatal in fact." Id. at 507 (Powell, J., concurring). We hold that such fatality is inconsistent with Adarand III, which re-affirmed Paradise, in its declaration that strict scrutiny was not fatal in fact. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 237. There can be a permissible middle ground in appropriate circumstances between the entirely individualized inquiry of a Title VII lawsuit, for example, and an unconstitutionally sweeping, race-based generalization. Indeed, the police officers receiving the benefit of the promotion policy in Paradise were not required to prove that they themselves individually were victims of past discrimination. n26

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n25 Nonetheless, the geographic scope of the remedial powers of a local government, as in Croson, and that of Congress's remedial powers under § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment differ. See Croson, 488 U.S. at 488 (Op. of O'Connor, J.). In Croson, the City ignored the fact > that Congress, unlike any State or political subdivision, has a specific constitutional mandate to enforce the dictates of the Fourteenth Amendment. The power to "enforce" may at times also include the power to define situations which Congress determines threaten principles of equality and to adopt prophylactic rules to deal with those situations.

Id. at 490 (Op. of O'Connor, J.) (citations omitted). [106]

n26 Although the viability of Fullilove is uncertain, the Fullilove majority rejected a very similar overinclusiveness challenge to the 1977 10% MBE set-aside:

> It is also contended that the MBE program is overinclusive--that it bestows a benefit on businesses identified by racial or ethnic criteria which cannot be justified on the basis of competitive criteria or as a remedy for the present effects of identified prior discrimination. It is conceivable that a particular application of the program may have this effect; however, the peculiarities of specific applications are not before us in this case.

Fullilove, 448 U.S. at 486.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Although we disagree with the district court's effectively fatal standard of scrutiny, we again note that comparison with the current SBA § 8(d) and TEA-21 regulations illustrates how the more careful tailoring now in place avoids some of the problems identified by the district court--again, the court's conclusion that the "Sultan of Brunei," should he have the temerity to apply, could qualify for DBE status. Adarand IV, 965 F. Supp. at 1581 n.17. [107] See 13 C.F.R. § 124.104(c)(2) (2000); 48 C.F.R. § 19.001 (2000); 49 C.F.R. §§ 26.65, 26.67 (b) (2000) (providing for an individual net worth limit for DBE certification). The current regulations more [*1187] precisely identify the proper minority recipients of DBE certification by periodically re-screening for economic disadvantage all candidates for such certification. See 48 C.F.R. § 19.1014 (2000).

Mindful of the Supreme Court's mandate to exercise particular care in examining governmental racial classifications, we conclude that the 1996 SCC was insufficiently narrowly tailored as applied in this case and is thus unconstitutional under Adarand III's strict standard of scrutiny. Nonetheless, after examining the current SCC and DBE certification programs, we conclude that the 1996 defects have been remedied, and the relevant programs now meet the requirements of narrow tailoring.

REV_00259066

D. "Unresolved Question"

As a final matter, inasmuch as Adarand III suggests that an additional "unresolved question []" concerning one of "the details of the complex regulatory regimes," 515 U.S. at 238, bears on the constitutionality of the SCC program, we address that [108] question now: namely, whether there are differing definitions of economic disadvantage under § 8(a) and § 8(d). The 1996 regulations establish that § 8(a) certification requires, for determination of economic disadvantage, comparison with "others in the same or similar line of business who are not socially disadvantaged." 13 C.F.R. § 124.106(a) (1996). Subsection 8(d) certification, however, apparently requires comparison with "others in the same or similar line of business" generally, presumably with all others, socially disadvantaged or not. 13 C.F.R. § 124.106(b) (1996). Because under 1996 programs based on § 8(d) economic disadvantage is to be presumed for minorities, the § 8(d) comparative analysis would appear to arise only in the event of either a challenge to the presumption in the case of a particular minority DBE, or application for DBE status by a socially-disadvantaged non-minority subcontractor (the classic example being the white subcontractor from rural Appalachia). We are unable to discern the constitutional relevance of these two slightly different methods of comparison. n27 Moreover, the distinction between the two has disappeared in the current version of [109] the regulations. The current regulation retains the more precise definition previously applicable to the § 8(a) program, requiring a comparison of the applicant to those who are not socially disadvantaged. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.104(a) (2000); see also 48 C.F.R. § 19.001 (2000) (incorporating the definitions of "small disadvantaged business concern" contained in 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. B); 13 C.F.R. § 124.1002(a) (2000) (incorporating 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. A, in determining social and economic disadvantage).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n27 We reject the contention that two slightly different definitions of economic disadvantage for purposes of two different certification methods create uncertainty as to who is a DBE, thus necessarily precluding any finding of narrow tailoring.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

IV

As a final matter, the government argues that we should remand this case in light of a pending, potentially related lawsuit originally filed under the name Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Romer, No. CIV. A. 97-K-1351 (D. Colo.) (filed June 26, 1997). [110] n28 Romer involves a challenge by plaintiff in the instant case to use of race-conscious policies in highway construction projects by CDOT. Adarand has conceded that its challenge in the instant case is to "the federal program, implemented by federal officials," and not to the letting of federally-funded construction contracts by state agencies. (Appellee's Br. at 24 n.23.) [*1188] We do not have before us a sufficient record to enable us to evaluate the separate question of CDOT's implementation of race-conscious policies. The propriety of potential consolidation of the instant action and Romer following our remand is a question to be considered by the district court in the first instance, should that question arise.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n28 Decisions arising out of the Romer litigation include: Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Romer, 174 F.R.D. 100 (D. Colo. 1997) (denying the federal government's motion to intervene); Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Romer, 194 F.3d 1320, 1999 U.S. App. LEXIS 23725, 1999 WL 770176 (10th Cir. 1999) (unpublished) (permitting intervention by the federal government); and Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Owens, 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5478, No. CIV. A. 97- K-1351, 2000 WL 490690 (D. Colo. Apr. 24, 2000) (unpublished) (dismissing the governor of Colorado as a defendant).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [111]

V

The judgment of the district court is REVERSED. This matter is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

APPENDIX

As noted, several statutes are implicated in this case, notably the Small Business Act of 1958 ("SBA"), Pub. L. No. 85-536, 72 Stat. 384, as amended, 15 U.S.C. §§ 631 et seq., § 106(c) of the Surface Transportation and Uniform Relocation Assistance Act of 1987 ("STURAA"), Pub. L. No. 100-17, 101 Stat. 132, and § 1003(b) of the Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act of 1991 ("ISTEA"), Pub. L. No. 102-240, 105 Stat. 1914, the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century of 1998 ("TEA 21"), Pub. L. No. 105-178, 112 Stat. 107, 113, as well as their accompanying administrative regulations. In the discussion that follows, we outline the statutory and regulatory scheme as it was at the time of the first and second district court decisions. n29 Then we discuss the relevant changes in that scheme after 1997.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n29 The relevant language in the statutes and regulations did not change in any material way between Adarand I and Adarand IV, and therefore references to regulations are to 1991 regulations unless otherwise indicated.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [112]

A. SBA

Subsection 8(d)(1) of the SBA states "it is the policy of the United States that small business concerns, and small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, . . . shall have the maximum practicable opportunity to participate in the performance of contracts let by any Federal agency." 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(1). n30 "Socially disadvantaged individuals" are defined as "those who have been subjected to racial or ethnic prejudice or cultural bias because of their identity as a member of a group without regard to their individual qualities." 15 U.S.C. § 637(a)(5). The SBA further defines "economically disadvantaged individuals" as "those socially disadvantaged individuals whose ability to compete in the free enterprise system has been impaired due to diminished capital and credit opportunities as compared to others in the same business area who are not socially disadvantaged." 15 U.S.C. § 637(a)(6)(A). n31

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n30 The SCC defines Disadvantaged Business Enterprises ("DBEs") as those concerns owned and operated by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals. [113] n31 It appears that the 1996 regulations implementing the § 8(d) certification program provide that the showing of disadvantage requires a general comparison "to others in the same or similar line of business." 13 C.F.R. § 124.106(b)(1) (1996). Justice O'Connor suggests that this distinction may have constitutional significance. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238.

REV_00259068

In addressing the question of what evidence of discrimination supports a compelling interest in providing a remedy, courts consider both direct and circumstantial evidence, including post-enactment evidence introduced by defendants as well as the evidence in the legislative history itself. Furthermore, courts may consider public and private discrimination not only in the specific area of government procurement contracts but also in the construction industry generally; thus, any findings Congress has made as to the entire construction industry are relevant.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

When a legislative body chooses to employ a suspect classification, it cannot rest upon a generalized assertion as to the classification's relevance to its goals.

Evidence : Writings & Real Evidence

The challengers of a disadvantaged business enterprises program should have the opportunity to rebut statistical evidence.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

U.S. Const. amend. XIV permits race-conscious programs that seek to prevent the public entity from acting as a passive participant in a system of racial exclusion by allowing tax dollars to finance the evil of private prejudice.

Evidence : Procedural Considerations : Burdens of Proof, Presumptions & Inferences

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

The ultimate burden of proof remains with the challenging party to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of an affirmative-action program. The nonminority challengers continue to bear the ultimate burden of persuading the court that the government entity's evidence did not support an inference of prior discrimination and thus a remedial purpose.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

In determining whether race-conscious remedies are appropriate, courts look to several factors, including the necessity for the relief and the efficacy of alternative remedies; the flexibility and duration of the relief, including the availability of waiver provisions; the relationship of the numerical goals to the relevant labor market; and the impact of the relief on the rights of third parties.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

As part of the United States' dedication to eradicating racial discrimination, innocent persons may be called upon to bear some of the burden of the remedy. When effectuating a limited and properly tailored remedy to cure the effects of prior discrimination, such a sharing of the burden by innocent parties is not impermissible.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Scope of Protection

If a recipient can meet its overall goal through race-neutral means, it must implement its program without the use of race-conscious contracting measures.

Public Contracts Law : Business Aids & Assistance : Minority, Women-Owned & Disadvantaged Businesses

See 49 C.F.R. § 26.45(b) (2000).

COUNSEL: Leslie A. Simon, Attorney, United States Department of Justice, (Nancy E. McFadden, General Counsel, Paul M. Geier, Assistant General Counsel for Litigation, Edward V.A. Kussy, Acting Chief Counsel, Federal Highway Administration, Sara McAndrew, Trial

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(2) requires that all federal contracts, with certain exceptions not relevant here, contain a clause stating it is the government's policy for small disadvantaged businesses to have "the maximum practicable opportunity to participate" as contractors or subcontractors. See 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(3). The required clause includes the following language: "The contractor shall presume that socially and economically disadvantaged individuals include Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Pacific Americans, and other minorities, or any other individual found to be disadvantaged by the Administration pursuant to section 8(a) of the Small Business [114] Act [15 U.S.C. 637 (a)]." 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(3)(C). n32

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n32 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(4) provides for certain additional requirements for contracts to be awarded "pursuant to the negotiated method of procurement" and exceeding certain dollar amounts. These requirements include an approved plan providing maximum opportunity for small business concerns, see id. § 637(d)(4)(D), and provision for agencies to offer incentives to encourage subcontracting opportunities for small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, see id. § 637(d)(4)(E). The parties have not addressed paragraph (4) of § 8(d) at all, and, because there is no indication from the parties that Adarand has or will bid for contracts governed by that paragraph's requirement, we do not address it in great detail.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

15 U.S.C. § 644(g)(1) provides for a government-wide goal of 5% minimum minority business participation [115] calculated on the basis of "the total value of all prime [*1189] contract and subcontract awards for each fiscal year." n33 The Federal Highway Administration appears to have adopted, pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 644(g)(2), goals of 12-15% participation for the period of time pertinent to this litigation. (Appellants' App. at 187.) These goals are aspirational rather than mandatory and must "realistically reflect the potential" of small disadvantaged businesses to perform subcontracts. See 15 U.S.C. § 644 (g)(2), (h)(1). Section 644(h) further mandates annual reports to the Administration and Congress on the results of government agency efforts to increase contracting participation by small businesses, including those owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n33 Section 644(g)(1) provides in relevant part that > the President shall annually establish Government-wide goals for procurement contracts awarded to small business concerns and small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals . . . . The Government-wide goal for participation by small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals shall be established at not less than 5 percent of the total value of all prime contract and subcontract awards for each fiscal year. . . . Notwithstanding the Government-wide goal, each agency shall have an annual goal that presents, for that agency, the maximum practicable opportunity . . . for small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals to participate in the performance of contracts let by such agency.

REV_00259069

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [116]

1. Subsection 8(a)

The § 8(a) program provides numerous benefits to disadvantaged businesses aside from eligibility for the SCC program. n34 Eligibility requires "small" size and 51% ownership by individuals socially and economically disadvantaged. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.103. Subsection 8 (a) regulations incorporate a presumption that enumerated minorities are socially disadvantaged, see 13 C.F.R. § 124.105(b)(1), and others can prove social disadvantage by clear and convincing evidence, see id. § 124.105(c). The presumption of disadvantage is in theory rebuttable by a third party. See 49 C.F.R. § 23.69. All businesses must separately prove economic disadvantage. See id. § 124.106(a). Eligibility for the § 8(a) program confers an automatic presumption of disadvantage under § 8(d). See 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(3)(C).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n34 Although Adarand lacks standing to challenge the constitutionality of the § 8(a) program per se, we consider its provisions insofar as they are relevant to the use of racially-conscious presumptions in determining certification of DBEs for the SCC program challenged here.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [117]

2. Subsection 8(d)

The relevant portions of § 8(d) in themselves require only the inclusion of a provision in federal contracts stating the government's policy of maximizing contracting opportunities for small businesses, including those owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals. See 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(1)-(3). n35 Subsection (d) is relevant to this litigation, however, insofar as the definition set forth therein serves as a basis for certifying small businesses as disadvantaged for purposes [*1190] of compensating prime contractors under the SCC. See 49 C.F.R. § 23.53. n36 Like § 8(a), § 8(d) includes language instructing contractors to afford a presumption of social disadvantage based on race. See id. The Court stated that certain regulations based on § 8(d) "appear[] to require an individualized, although 'less restrictive,' showing of economic disadvantage." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 207 (quoting 13 C.F.R. § 124.106(b)). However, other regulations provide for presumptions of both social and economic disadvantage. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 207-08 (citing 48 C.F.R. §§ 19.011, [118] 19.703(a)(2)). The Court was thus "left with some uncertainty as to whether participation in the [§] 8(d) subcontracting program requires an individualized showing of economic disadvantage." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 208. n37 Both presumptions of disadvantage are theoretically rebuttable by a third party. (See Appellants' App. at 131.)

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n35 There is no indication from any of the parties in their briefs or elsewhere that the particular requirements of paragraphs (4)-(6) of § 8(d) are at issue in the instant lawsuit or that Adarand has and will continue to bid for contracts or subcontracts covered by those paragraphs. See 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(4)-(6).

n36 The relevant state DBE program at the time of the contract at issue, under which Adarand's competitor was certified as a DBE, provided that "persons who are members of [specified racial/ethnic minorities] are 'rebuttably presumed' to be socially and economically disadvantaged." (Appellants' App. at 131.) Pursuant to Adarand VI, because Colorado's revised program may be inconsistent with federal requirements, we direct our inquiry to the possibility of reinstatement of the prior state DBE certification requirements, as informed by federal law and regulation. [119]

REV_00259070

n37 As noted, those portions of § 8(d) at issue here perhaps may be more properly characterized as a requirement that a clause be included in contracts than as a discrete program. However, the Supreme Court has characterized the requirements as a discrete program, and we note that they are certainly relevant to the SCC program at issue because they inform the criteria for certification of DBE participants by state agencies.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

B. STURAA and ISTEA provisions

STURAA and ISTEA are relevant insofar as they incorporate the presumption of disadvantage from SBA § 8(d). See STURAA § 106(c)(2)(B), ISTEA § 1003(b)(2)(B) (providing that the term "socially and economically disadvantaged individual" has the meaning of such term under SBA § 8(d) "and relevant subcontracting regulations promulgated pursuant thereto."). Both measures set forth aspirational goals of 10% DBE participation in federal subcontracting. See ISTEA § 1003(b)(1).

C. Subcontracting Compensation Clause

The particular means of implementation of the various statutory goals and directives at issue in this litigation [120] is the SCC. This clause provides a financial bonus of up to 10% of an approved subcontract (no more than 1.5% or 2% of the original contract, depending on how many DBEs are employed) to a prime contractor in return for employing a DBE. (See Appellants' App. at 55-56.) n38 Subcontractors [*1191] must be certified as DBEs by "the SBA, a state highway agency, or some other certifying authority acceptable to the contracting officer" pursuant to the "[§] 8(a) or [§] 8(d) program, or certification by a State under the DOT regulations." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 209-10.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n38 The Supreme Court in Adarand III stated that "federal law requires that a subcontracting clause similar to the one used here must appear in most federal agency contracts, and it also requires the clause to state that 'the contractor shall presume that socially and economically disadvantaged individuals include Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, Native Americans, Asian Pacific Americans, and other minorities, or any other individual found to be disadvantaged by the [Small Business] Administration pursuant to section 8(a) of the Small Business Act.'" 515 U.S. at 205 (quoting 15 U.S.C. §§ 637(d)(2), (3)). However, examination of the statute reveals that 15 U.S.C. § 637, while providing for inclusion in most federal agency contracts of a clause stating that "it is the policy of the United States that . . . small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, . . . shall have the maximum practicable opportunity to participate in the performance of contracts let by any Federal agency," 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(3)(A), the relevant provisions of § 8(d) do not require the particular contract provision at issue here: "monetary compensation . . . for awarding subcontracts to small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals," Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 209 (citation omitted). Cf. 15 U.S.C. § 637(d)(4)(E). Rather, that clause, the SCC, was established administratively by the Federal Lands Highway Program ("FLHP") of the Department of Transportation ("DOT") pursuant to the FLHP's obligations under 15 U.S.C. § 644(g). (See Appellants' App. at 33.) In Adarand II, 16 F.3d at 1545-56, ("Adarand II"), we concluded that the FLHP was acting within its delegated power under § 644(g) in promulgating the SCC. The Supreme Court, in altering the equal protection standard of scrutiny applicable to federal action in Adarand III, did not disturb this statutory conclusion. Therefore it remains law of the case that the SCC constitutes an exercise of the FLHP's delegated authority under § 644(g), and we discern no clear error in that prior decision or manifest injustice sufficient to warrant overriding the law of the case doctrine. See Agostini, 521 U.S. at 236; McIlravy, 204 F.3d at 1034-35.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [121]

D. Post-1996 Changes

1. SBA

There have been no significant changes to § 637(a) or (d) relevant to the Adarand litigation after 1996. Virtually the only changes to these statutory sections were additions of language including other groups in the SBA's affirmative action program: 1995 (women); 1998 ("HUBZone small business concerns"); and 2000 (veterans). Likewise, the key language in § 644(g)(1)--"The Government-wide goal for participation by small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals shall be established at not less than 5 percent of the total value of all prime contract and subcontract awards for each fiscal year"--has not changed. However, § 644(g)(1) has been amended at various times during the litigation to include government-wide contracting goals for other groups, such as women, service-disabled veterans, and HUBZone small business concerns.

Of the regulations implementing § 8(a) of the SBA, 13 C.F.R. §§ 124.1 et seq., n39 two regulations--those defining social and economic disadvantage--are relevant to this litigation and differ significantly from their 1996 counterparts. The most extensive changes [122] were made in 1998 and are present in the current regulations.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n39 The § 8(d) program regulations are located at 48 C.F.R. pt. 19, but they specifically incorporate the definitions of "small disadvantaged business concern" contained in 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. B. See 48 C.F.R. § 19.001 (2000); 13 C.F.R. § 124.1002(a) (2000) (incorporating 13 C.F.R. pt. 124, subpt. A).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The regulation defining social disadvantage are presently located at 13 C.F.R. § 124.103, and its language, preceding the list of presumptively socially disadvantaged groups, has changed. The current regulation states: "There is a rebuttable presumption that the following individuals are socially disadvantaged . . . ." 13 C.F.R. § 124.103(b)(1) (2000); see also id. § 124.103(b)(3) ("The presumption of social disadvantage may be overcome with credible evidence to the contrary."). This change reemphasizes that the presumption of social disadvantage based on group membership is not absolute.

In addition, the burden on members of unlisted [123] groups to show they are socially disadvantaged has been reduced. Currently, social disadvantage may be established by a "preponderance of the evidence," rather than by the former "clear and convincing" evidentiary standard. Compare 13 C.F.R. § 124.103(c)(1) (2000) with 13 C.F.R. § 124.105(c)(1) (1997). The Small Business Administration explains that this change was meant to more narrowly tailor the § 8(a) program in light of Adarand III. See 8(a) Business Development/Small Disadvantaged Business Status Determinations, 63 Fed. Reg. 35,726, 35,728 [*1192] (1998) ("In response to the Supreme Court's decision in Adarand [III] . . .,the Department of Justice recommended the 'preponderance of the evidence' standard for government-wide disadvantaged business programs. [The Small Business Administration] . . . continues to believe that the use of this standard strengthens the defense of the [§] 8(a) Business Development program.").

The relevant regulations regarding economic disadvantage are presently located at 13 C.F.R.

§ 124.104. The Adarand III majority expressed concern about the "apparent discrepancy between the definitions of which socially [124] disadvantaged individuals qualify as economically disadvantaged for the [§] 8(a) and [§] 8(d) programs." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 238-39. The new regulations rectify that discrepancy, retaining the more precise definition previously applicable to the § 8(a) program, which requires comparing the applicant to those who are not socially disadvantaged. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.104(a) (2000). The current regulations also impose a new requirement on applicants: They must submit a narrative statement describing their economic disadvantage. See id. § 124.104(b)(1) (2000).

As to duration of DBE certification, the current § 8(d) certification program regulations provide for certification of a business as socially disadvantaged for three years after either the initial certification or other administrative determination. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.1014 (2000). If a DBE wishes to retain its certification for longer than three years, it must "submit a new application and receive a new certification." Id. § 124.1014(c).

2. STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21

The language in STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21 concerning the DBE program is similar. Notably, the requirement that [125] "not less than 10 percent of the amounts" authorized under those Acts "shall be expended with small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals" remains unchanged in all three statutes. TEA-21 § 1101(b)(1), 112 Stat. at 113; ISTEA § 1003(b)(1), 105 Stat. 1919; STURAA § 106(c)(1), 101 Stat. 132.

The only significant change in the transportation appropriations statutes is the addition in both § 1003(b) of ISTEA, 105 Stat. 1920-22, and § 1101(b)(6) of TEA-21, 112 Stat. 114-15, of a requirement that the Comptroller General conduct a study and report to Congress regarding several aspects of the DBE program.

In ISTEA § 1003(b)(5), 105 Stat. 1920-22, the Comptroller General is given twelve months to study and prepare a report discussing: graduation from the program; the extent of out-of-state contracting with disadvantaged businesses by prime contractors; whether adjustments could be made "with respect to Federal and State participation in training programs and with respect to meeting capital needs and bonding requirements" to increase the success of disadvantaged business enterprises; possible "revisions and additions to criteria [126] used to determine the performance and financial capabilities of" DBEs; the costs and benefits of meeting the goal of 10% participation by DBEs; the effect of the program on the construction industry; the certification process; and the implementation of the program by states.

In TEA-21 § 1101(b)(6), 112 Stat. 114-15, the Comptroller General is given three years to study and prepare a report discussing: the number, participation in prime contracts and subcontracts, gross receipts, and net worth of DBEs; the overall costs of the DBE program, "including administrative costs, certification costs, additional construction costs, and litigation costs"; discrimination against DBEs in various markets including transportation contracting, financial, insurance, credit and bonding; the costs of any court order striking down the DBE program; and the impact of the program on competition and the creation of jobs.

[*1193] The regulations implementing affirmative action programs of STURAA, ISTEA, and TEA-21 have undergone the most change of any of the relevant regulations at issue over the course of the instant litigation. According to the federal Department of Transportation, the changes were made "primarily [127] in response to the 'narrow tailoring' requirements of Adarand [III]," and the final rule "complies with the requirements that the courts have established for a narrowly tailored affirmative action program." Participation by Disadvantaged Business Enterprises in Department of Transportation Programs, 64 Fed. Reg. 5096 (1999); see also id. at 5101-03 (discussing the requirements of narrow tailoring and the ways in which the new regulations attempt to meet those requirements). The current regulations, which apply to any federal highway funds authorized under ISTEA or TEA-21, see 49 C.F.R. § 26.3(a) (2000), are located at 49 C.F.R. pt. 26.

REV_00259073

The current regulations specify that the presumption of economic disadvantage automatically is rebutted for any individual whose net worth is above $ 750,000, without a requirement of further proceedings. See id. § 26.67(b)(1) (2000). This conforms with SBA regulations concerning re-certification of economic disadvantage. See 13 C.F.R. § 124.104 (2000). The current regulations also retain the requirement that businesses not exceed a certain amount of gross receipts in order to be eligible [128] for the DBE program. See 49 C.F.R. § 26.65(b) (2000).

Regarding the allocation of subcontracts to DBEs, the current regulations explicitly prohibit the use of quotas. See id. § 26.43(a). Similarly, the current regulations prohibit use of set-asides except in "limited and extreme circumstances . . . when no other method could be reasonably expected to redress egregious instances of discrimination." Id. § 26.43(b). Although acknowledging that ISTEA and TEA-21 set a goal of 10% DBE participation in government contracts, the current regulations term this "an aspirational goal at the national level," id. § 26.41(b), which "does not authorize or require recipients to set overall or contract goals at the 10 percent level, or any other particular level," id. § 26.41(c). n40

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n40 The term "recipient" is defined by the regulations as "any entity, public or private, to which DOT financial assistance is extended, whether directly or through another recipient, through the programs of the . . . FHWA." 46 C.F.R. § 26.5 (2000). The FLHP is such a program and therefore is a "recipient" for purposes of the relevant regulations. See 23 C.F.R. § 645.105(f) (2000).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [129]

Extensive regulatory requirements must be met before goals may be set for DBE participation in a particular market. See id. § 26.45. Goals must be based on "demonstrable evidence of the availability of ready, willing and able DBEs relative to all businesses ready, willing and able to participate" and must make "reference to the relative availability of DBEs in [the recipient's local] market." Id. § 26.45(b). In addition, goal setting must involve "examining all evidence available in [the recipient's] jurisdiction." Id. § 26.45(c). Such evidence may include census data and valid disparity studies. See id. § 26.45(c)(1)-(3). After examining this evidence, the recipient must adjust its DBE participation goals by examining the capacity of DBEs to perform needed work, disparity studies, and other evidence. See id. § 26.45(d). When submitting these goals, the recipient must include a description of the methodology and evidence used in setting them. See id. § 26.45(f)(3). Finally, there is no requirement that the recipient actually meet its goals, merely that it make a good faith effort to do so; failure to meet goals will not subject a recipient to penalties [130] or to being held in noncompliance as long as good faith efforts were made. See id. § 26.47(a).

Wherever possible, the current regulations require recipients to use race-neutral means to "meet the maximum feasible portion" [*1194] of their overall DBE participation goals. Id. § 26.51(a); see also id. § 26.51(f) (if a recipient can meet its overall goals through race-neutral means, it must implement its program without the use of contract goals). The current regulations also outline several race-neutral means available to program recipients including helping overcome bonding and financing obstacles, providing technical assistance, establishing programs to assist start-up firms, and other methods. See id. § 26.51(b).

For those not falling into one of the categories to which a presumption of social disadvantage applies, the current regulations retain procedures for non-minorities to participate in the DBE program. Consistent with the changes in SBA regulations, proof of social and economic disadvantage by those not so presumed may be shown by a preponderance of the evidence. See id. §§ 26.61(d), 26.67(d). Additionally, the current regulations require recipients to make [131] sure DBEs are not "so overconcentrated in a certain type of work as to unduly burden the opportunity of non-DBE firms to participate." Id. § 26.33(a).

REV_00259074

Finally, as to any part of the foregoing DBE statutory and regulatory framework, the current regulations allow recipients to seek waivers and exemptions, despite the already non-mandatory nature of the DBE programs. See id. § 26.15. In this way, the statutory and regulatory scheme provides yet another means of ensuring that the program is not applied more broadly than warranted.

3. SCC

The government maintains, and Adarand does not dispute, that the SCC, which spawned this litigation in 1989, is no longer in use. (See Appellants' Supp. Br. Attach. 1 (memorandum from Arthur E. Hamilton, Federal Lands Program Manager to Federal Lands Highway Division Engineers stating that "the SCC will not be placed in any future invitations for bids" and "shall be removed by amendment from any invitations for bids where the bid opening has not taken place").)

In November 1997, before the discontinuation of its use, the SCC was revised by the addition of a new section n41 which creates further conditions of eligibility for the program. [132] (See id. Attach. 2 (new section of the SCC).) To begin with, subject to modification based on DBE availability, at least 10% of the prime contract must go to DBEs for SCC eligibility. If a DBE subcontractor is hired, that DBE may only contract out to non-DBEs "for onsite work . . . incidental to, and necessary for the accomplishment of," the subcontract, in an amount not to exceed 50 percent of the value of the DBE's subcontract. (Id. at 2.) In addition to the 1.5-2% cap on the total amount of the prime contract that may be awarded pursuant to the SCC, the new section adds a further cap of $ 50,000 if subcontracting to one DBE and $ 100,000 if subcontracting to more than one DBE.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n41 It is unclear from the record whether the 1997 revision to the SCC entailed the addition of a new section or the replacement of the previous one. The revision instructs those using the SCC to "add the following [revision]," (Appellants' Supp. Br. Attach. 2 at 1), rather than replace the existing SCC, and we thus assume the 1997 revision is an addition to the SCC. However, in either case, our analysis in this opinion remains the same.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [133]

The revised SCC retains the provision furnishing prime contractors with "compensation . . . to locate train, utilize, assist, and develop DBEs to become fully qualified contractors in the transportation facilities construction field," but adds the explanation that this compensation is provided "to offset costs and anticipated risks associated with awarding subcontracts to small business concerns owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals (DBE)." (Id. at 1.)

Finally, the new section provides an alternative route to certification, "ad hoc certification" based on "self certification" accompanied by the requisite documents to demonstrate qualification for the program, [*1195] as well as "documentation showing the disposition of any previous application for certification the subcontractor has made to any Federal, State or local Government agency." (Id.) If a would-be self-certified DBE has already been rejected by a government agency, ad hoc certification will not be granted "unless the reasons for [the previous] denial have been resolved." (Id.)

REV_00259075

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Circuit Court Cases - By Circuit : US Court of Appeals Cases - 10th Circuit
Terms: (adarand) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Monday, March 26, 2001 - 7:16 PM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Attorney, Peter S. Smith, Trial Attorney, of the United States Department of Transportation, Washington, D.C.; Isabelle Katz Pinzler, Acting Assistant Attorney General, William R. Yeomans, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Bill Lann Lee, Acting Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Thomas E. Perez, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, Mark L. Gross, Attorney, Louis E. Peraertz, Attorney, of the United States Department of Justice, Washington, D.C., with her on the briefs), for Defendants-Appellants.

William Perry Pendley (Todd S. Welch and J. Scott Detamore, with him on the briefs), Mountain States Legal Foundation, Denver, Colorado, for Plaintiff-Appellee.

Robin L. Rivett, Sharon L. Browne, and Stephen R. McCutcheon, Jr., for Pacific Legal Foundation, [2] Sacramento, California, filed an amicus curiae brief.

Julian A. Gross and William C. McNeill III, Legal Aid Society of San Francisco, for the Employment Law Center, San Francisco, California, and Franklin M. Lee and Tracie Anita Watkins for the Minority Business Enterprise Legal Defense and Education Fund, Inc., Washington, D.C., filed an amicus curiae brief.

Michael E. Kennedy, General Counsel for Associated General Contractors of America, Inc., and John G. Roberts, Jr., David G. Leitch, and H. Christopher Bartolomucci of Hogan & Hartson, L.L.P., Washington, D.C., filed an amicus curiae brief for Associated General Contractors of America, Inc.

JUDGES: Before LUCERO, Circuit Judge, McKAY, Senior Circuit Judge, and MURPHY, Circuit Judge.

OPINIONBY: LUCERO

OPINION: [*1155] OPINION ON REMAND

LUCERO, Circuit Judge.

Following the Supreme Court's vacation of our dismissal on mootness grounds, we address the merits of this appeal, namely, the federal government's challenge to the district court's grant of summary judgment to plaintiff-appellee Adarand Constructors, Inc. In so doing, we must resolve the constitutionality of the use in federal subcontracting procurement of the Subcontractor [3] Compensation Clause ("SCC"), which employs race-conscious presumptions designed to favor minority enterprises and other "disadvantaged business enterprises" ("DBEs"). Our evaluation of the SCC program utilizes the "strict scrutiny" standard of constitutional review enunciated by the Supreme Court in an earlier decision in this case, Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158, 115 S. Ct. 2097 (1995) ("Adarand III").

In his concurring opinion in Adarand III, Justice Scalia succinctly articulated this Nation's guiding aspiration: "In the eyes of government, we are just one race here. It is American." Id. at 239 (Scalia, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). Until that future day when national aspiration and national reality converge, the Court has made clear that under certain circumstances the federal government may use race-conscious means to remedy the effects of historical and present-day racial discrimination. Inherently, we resolve whether the two branches of the government--the Legislative and the Executive--that have chosen to hasten that future day have met the constitutional standards enunciated [4] by the third branch. Since the district court last considered this case, and after lengthy congressional hearings in response to the Adarand III decision, the federal government has significantly changed the way in which it implements the challenged race-conscious programs in highway construction contracting. It is ultimately our considered judgment that the SCC program and the DBE certification programs as currently structured, though not as they were structured in 1997 when the district court last rendered judgment, pass constitutional muster: They are narrowly tailored to serve a compelling governmental interest. Thus, exercising jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1291, we reverse the judgment of the district court below.

REV_00259034

I

The Supreme Court has characterized the facts of this case as "fairly straightforward," [*1156] Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 206, summarizing the relevant facts as follows:

> In 1989, the Central Federal Lands Highway Division (CFLHD), which is part of the United States Department of Transportation (DOT), awarded the prime contract for a highway construction project in Colorado to Mountain Gravel & Construction [5] Company. Mountain Gravel then solicited bids from subcontractors for the guardrail portion of the contract. Adarand, a Colorado-based highway construction company specializing in guardrail work, submitted the low bid. Gonzales Construction Company also submitted a bid.

Id. at 205. At the time, Gonzales was certified as a small business owned and controlled by socially and economically disadvantaged individuals, while Adarand was not. See id. This litigation centers around the SCC, a clause which was included in CFLHD's prime contract with Mountain Gravel. The SCC provided "that Mountain Gravel would receive additional compensation if it hired subcontractors certified as small businesses controlled by 'socially and economically disadvantaged individuals.'" Id. (citation omitted).

Adarand submitted an affidavit stating that but for the additional compensation Mountain Gravel obtained by hiring Gonzales, a certified business, it would have hired Adarand for the guardrail work. See id. Adarand sued, arguing that the use of a race-conscious presumption in determining who is a socially and economically disadvantaged individual for purposes of the SCC [6] violated its Fifth Amendment equal protection rights. See id. at 205-06.

In Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Skinner, 790 F. Supp. 240 (D. Colo. 1992) ("Adarand I"), the district court addressed Adarand's challenge to "the DBE program as administered by the CFLHD within Colorado." Id. at 241 (footnote omitted). Without focusing specifically on the SCC and its operation, the court in Adarand I upheld as constitutional, under intermediate scrutiny, statutory provisions defining DBEs and setting goals for DBE participation in government contracting. See id. at 241, 244-45 (relying on Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448, 480, 65 L. Ed. 2d 902, 100 S. Ct. 2758 (1980); Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC, 497 U.S. 547, 598-601, 111 L. Ed. 2d 445, 110 S. Ct. 2997 (1990)).

In Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 16 F.3d 1537, 1539 (10th Cir. 1994) ("Adarand II"), this Court affirmed the district court's judgment on different grounds. We concluded that Adarand had standing to challenge the SCC program as it pertains to minority business enterprises but not women-owned [7] business enterprises and addressed our inquiry to the SCC as a program implemented pursuant to § 502 of the Small Business Act of 1958 ("SBA"), Pub. L. No. 85-536, 72 Stat. 384 (codified as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 631 et seq.). See Adarand II, 16 F.3d at 1543 (citing 15 U.S.C. § 644(g)). Like the district court, we relied on Metro Broadcasting, 497 U.S. at 565, applying intermediate scrutiny to the SCC and holding "the SCC program . . . constitutional because it is narrowly tailored to achieve its significant governmental purpose of providing subcontracting opportunities for small [DBEs], as required under section 502 of the [SBA]." Adarand II, 16 F.3d at 1547.

The Supreme Court reversed. It overruled Metro Broadcasting and cast doubt on Fullilove insofar as that case might be read to apply less than strict scrutiny to federal programs involving racial classifications. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 227, 235. n1 n1 The principal focus of Adarand III was not an analysis of the particular statutes and regulations before the Court under its newly-announced standard, but the far more abstract question of whether "benign" race-conscious programs are subject to the "strict scrutiny" doctrine, a question which the majority answered in the affirmative. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 225-27. In its enunciation of the strict scrutiny standard and its overruling of Metro Broadcasting, the Court accorded very little attention to the application of the strict scrutiny test to the particular programs at issue in this case.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [8]

[*1157] On remand, the district court held the SCC program unconstitutional, finding it insufficiently narrowly tailored to further a compelling interest because the program was both over- and under-inclusive, including minority individuals who were not in fact disadvantaged and excluding non-minority individuals who were disadvantaged. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 965 F. Supp. 1556 (D. Colo. 1997) ("Adarand IV"). With regard to the Court's pronouncement in Adarand III that strict scrutiny is not "fatal in fact," the district court found it "difficult to envisage a race-based classification" that would ever be narrowly tailored, thereby effectively pronouncing strict scrutiny fatal in fact. Id. at 1580. The district court granted summary judgment to Adarand.

Following Adarand IV, we considered the government's contention that subsequent events had rendered the case moot. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Slater, 169 F.3d 1292 (10th Cir. 1999) ("Adarand V"). Specifically, because Adarand applied for and was granted DBE certification by the Colorado Department of Transportation ("CDOT"), we concluded that Adarand [9] could no longer demonstrate an injury stemming from the SCC sufficient to confer standing. See id. at 1296-97. Hence, the case was moot. See id.

The Supreme Court disagreed. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Slater, 528 U.S. 216, 120 S. Ct. 722, 145 L. Ed. 2d 650 (2000) ("Adarand VI"). Relying on its decision in Friends of the Earth, Inc. v. Laidlaw Environmental Services (TOC), Inc., 528 U.S. 167, 120 S. Ct. 693, 145 L. Ed. 2d 610 (2000), handed down on the same day as its Adarand VI remand, the Court stated it had "recently noted" that a possibility of a defendant "engaging in (or resuming) harmful conduct" might be too speculative to confer standing but not too speculative to overcome mootness. Adarand VI, 120 S. Ct. at 726 (quoting Friends of the Earth, 120 S. Ct. 693 at 699). The Court held it was "far from clear" that DOT would not initiate proceedings to revoke Adarand's status and because "it is impossible to conclude that respondents have borne their burden of establishing that it is 'absolutely clear that the allegedly wrongful behavior could not reasonably be expected to recur, [10] ' petitioner's cause of action remains alive." Id. 120 S. Ct. at 726-27 (quoting Friends of the Earth, Inc., 120 S. Ct. 693 at 708). With the reversal of our judgment in Adarand V, this appeal was remanded to us for consideration on the merits. See id. 120 S. Ct. at 726-27.

In the discussion that follows, we first dispose of three threshold concerns: (1) a determination of the appropriate versions of the statutes and regulations at issue in this case; (2) the scope of our review of the SCC program; and (3) a brief overview of the relevant statutory framework and of the SCC program. Then, in Part III we subject the SCC program to strict scrutiny, examining the compelling interest underlying the program as well as its narrow tailoring, and addressing specific issues that the Supreme Court in Adarand III directed that we consider. Finally, in Part IV, we briefly discuss the government's request that we consolidate with the instant action a pending, potentially related case, originally filed under the name Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Romer, No. CIV. A. 97-K-1351 (D. Colo. June 26, 1997).

II

REV_00259036

We begin by addressing the scope of our inquiry in this appeal. It is essential [11] that we decide which versions of the statutes and regulations at issue are properly before us, as well as which portions of those statutes and regulations are relevant to this appeal.

[*1158] Several statutes are implicated in this case, notably §§ 8(a), 8(d) and 502 of the SBA (codified as amended at 15 U.S.C. §§ 637(a), (d), and 644(g)), § 106(c) of the Surface Transportation and Uniform Relocation Assistance Act of 1987 ("STURAA"), Pub. L. No. 100-17, 101 Stat. 132, 145 (1987), § 1003(b) of the Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act of 1991 ("ISTEA"), Pub. L. No. 102-240, 105 Stat. 1914, 1919-21 (1991), § 1101(b) of the Transportation Equity Act for the 21st Century of 1998 ("TEA-21"), Pub. L. No. 105-178, 112 Stat. 107, 113-15 (1998), as well as their accompanying administrative regulations.

A. The Versions To Be Considered

With regard to the foregoing statutes, regulations, and SCC, the parties disagree as to whether we may properly consider intervening changes in the law between 1992 when Adarand I was handed down and the present. n2 Our resolution of that dispute is ultimately compelled by the logic of the well-settled precedent of both [12] the Supreme Court and this Circuit. Adarand seeks only prospective declaratory and injunctive relief. See Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 210. n3 Application of the intervening statutory and regulatory changes to this type of claim does not implicate any presumption against the retroactive application of statutes. See Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 273, 128 L. Ed. 2d 229, 114 S. Ct. 1483 (1994) ("Even absent specific legislative authorization, application of new statutes passed after the events in suit is unquestionably proper in many situations. When the intervening statute . . . affects the propriety of prospective relief, application of the new provision is not retroactive."); Jurado-Gutierrez v. Greene, 190 F.3d 1135, 1149 (10th Cir. 1999) (applying Landgraf), cert. denied sub nom. Palaganas-Suarez v. Greene, 529 U.S. 1041, 146 L. Ed. 2d 352, 120 S. Ct. 1539 (2000); see also Jones v. Hess, 681 F.2d 688, 695 n.9 (10th Cir. 1982) ("Generally an appellate court must apply the law in effect at the time it renders its decision where a change in law occurs while a case is on direct appeal, although there may [13] well be an exception to this rule to prevent manifest injustice." (citations omitted)); McMahan v. Hunter, 179 F.2d 661, 663 (10th Cir. 1950) ("Where a rule of law was changed after the decision in the trial court but before the decision in the Appellate Court, the decision in the Appellate Court must be according to the new law."); 13A Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice & Procedure, Jurisdiction 2d § 3533.6 (1984) ("Ordinarily, courts . . . apply[] the law in force at the time of decision, unless a good reason appears for ignoring the change."); cf. Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Corp. v. Bonjorno, 494 U.S. 827, 836-37, 108 L. Ed. 2d 842, 110 S. Ct. 1570 (1990). To ignore intervening changes in the statutory and regulatory framework underlying this litigation would be to shirk our responsibility to strictly scrutinize the real-world legal regime against which Adarand seeks prospective relief. The changes in the law are squarely before us today, and we discern no reason to leave their scrutiny to future litigation, in effect prolonging the instant litigation and fostering "both a wasteful expenditure of resources by courts and litigating [14] parties and the gradual undermining of public confidence in the judiciary--in short, Dickens's Jarndyce v. Jarndyce syndrome." McIlravy v. Kerr-McGee Coal Corp., 204 F.3d 1031, 1035 (10th Cir. 2000).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n2 We have therefore requested and received supplementary briefing from the parties on intervening changes in the statutory and regulatory scheme at issue in the instant action.

n3 Although Adarand also seeks "such other and further relief as to the Court seems just and equitable," this highly general language does not constitute a prayer for retrospective relief under the circumstances of this case. (Appellants' App. at 10.) Moreover, on appeal Adarand seeks to uphold the district court's grant of summary judgment and declaratory and injunctive relief and has not filed a cross-appeal seeking damages or another form of retrospective relief.

REV_00259037

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

[*1159] However, considering that we are reviewing a decision of the district court below that relied on older versions of the statutes, regulations, and SCC, [15] and because we are mindful that future statutory and regulatory changes may cause the government to "engage in (or resume) [the] harmful conduct" in question earlier in this litigation so as to militate against a finding of mootness, Adarand VI, 120 S. Ct. at 726 (quoting Friends of the Earth, 120 S. Ct. at 699), we consider the statutory and regulatory framework in its prior stages as well. n4 See also Northeastern Fla. Chapter of Associated Gen. Contractors of Am. v. City of Jacksonville, 508 U.S. 656, 662, 124 L. Ed. 2d 586, 113 S. Ct. 2297 (1993) ("[A] defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice." (quoting City of Mesquite v. Aladdin's Castle, Inc., 455 U.S. 283, 289, 71 L. Ed. 2d 152, 102 S. Ct. 1070 (1982))). It is not fanciful to suggest that the government may retreat to prior practice, but if the government did so, this opinion expressly holds that such an action would be unconstitutional for the reasons discussed below.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 Thus, we refuse the government's invitation to ignore the SCC program by virtue of its citation to a March 29, 2000 memorandum from the Manager of the Federal Lands Program indicating that the SCC is no longer in use in federal highway construction procurement contracts. We likewise reject the government's argument, relying on Lawrence v. Chater, 516 U.S. 163, 165-66, 133 L. Ed. 2d 545, 116 S. Ct. 604 (1996), that we must remand this case to the district court for consideration of intervening statutory and regulatory changes. The government's reliance on Lawrence is misplaced: That case involved the Supreme Court's exercise of its power to "grant certiorari, vacate the judgment below, and remand the case" to a "lower federal court" in light of intervening regulatory changes, and not the power of a lower federal court to decide a case on remand from the Supreme Court. Id. (emphasis added). In the present case, the parties have briefed intervening changes in the law, there are no disputed factual issues, and we see no reason to delay this already protracted litigation by remanding to the district court, especially considering the district court's statement that it would be "difficult to envisage a race-based classification" that would ever be narrowly tailored, thereby effectively pronouncing strict scrutiny fatal in fact, Adarand IV 965 F. Supp. at 1580, a view which we reject in the discussion that follows.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [16]

B. The Scope of the SCC Program Under Scrutiny

We next clarify the scope of the SCC program under review. In that regard, we are bound by the Supreme Court's ruling on Adarand's standing in Adarand III as law of the case. Based on its conclusion that "CFLHD is likely to let contracts involving guardrail work that contain an [SCC] at least once per year in Colorado, that Adarand is very likely to bid on each such contract, and that Adarand often must compete for such contracts against small disadvantaged businesses," the Court held Adarand has standing to challenge "the race-based rebuttable presumption used in some certifications under the Subcontracting Compensation Clause." Adarand III, 515 U.S. at 212-13 (citation omitted).

We recognize, however, that there are programs that the Supreme Court did not hold Adarand has standing to challenge. First is the § 8(a) program, discussed below. See 15 U.S.C. § 637(a). Subsection 8(a) does not involve the use of SCCs, nor has Adarand made any showing that it has been injured by non-inclusion in the § 8(a) program. Second, we specifically held in Adarand II that Adarand has [17] not shown standing to challenge "the provisions of the SCC program pertaining to women-owned business enterprises (WBE)."

REV_00259038

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : District Court Cases - By Circuit : US District Court Cases - 6th Circuit
Terms: bakke and hopwood (Edit Search)

*122 F. Supp. 2d 811, *; 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18099, **

JENNIFER GRATZ and PATRICK HAMACHER, for themselves and all others similarly situated, Plaintiffs, v. LEE BOLLINGER, JAMES J. DUDERSTADT, THE BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, Defendants, and EBONY PATTERSON, RUBEN MARTINEZ, LAURENT CRENSHAW, KARLA R. WILLIAMS, LARRY BROWN, TIFFANY HALL, KRISTEN M.J. HARRIS, MICHAEL SMITH, KHYLA CRAINE, NYAH CARMICHAEL, SHANNA DUBOSE, EBONY DAVIS, NICOLE BREWER, KARLA HARLIN, BRIAN HARRIS, KATRINA GIPSON, CANDICE B.N. REYNOLDS, by and through their parents or guardians, DENISE PATTERSON, MOISE MARTINEZ, LARRY CRENSHAW, HARRY J. WILLIAMS, PATRICIA SWAN-BROWN, KAREN A. MCDONALD, LINDA A. HARRIS, DEANNA A. SMITH, ALICE BRENNAN, IVY RENE CHARMICHAEL, SARAH L. DUBOSE, INGER DAVIS, BARBARA DAWSON, ROY D. HARLIN, WYATT G. HARRIS, GEORGE C. GIPSON, SHAWN R. REYNOLDS, AND CITIZENS FOR AFFIRMATIVE ACTION'S PRESERVATION, Defendant-Intervenors.

CASE NO.: 97-CV-75231-DT

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN, SOUTHERN DIVISION

122 F. Supp. 2d 811; 2000 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18099

December 13, 2000, Decided

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: Plaintiffs brought class action for violation of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, and U.S. Const. amend. XI, by considering race as a factor in admissions decisions. Defendants cross-moved for summary judgment with respect to the liability phase only. Defendants sued in their individual capacities under 42 U.S.C.S. § 1983, moved for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity.

OVERVIEW: Plaintiffs, Caucasian applicants denied admission, brought suit alleging that defendant university's admissions policies favoring minorities violated equal protection rights. The court agreed with defendants that a racially and ethnically diverse student body produced significant educational benefits such that diversity, in the context of higher education, constituted a compelling governmental interest under strict scrutiny. Defendants' current admissions program was a permissible use of race because it did not utilize rigid quotas or seek to admit a predetermined number of minority students. The court was satisfied that the admissions program, under which certain minority applicants received a plus on account of their race but were not insulated from all competition with other applicants, was constitutional. However the prior system used represented an impermissible use of race because the system operated as the functional equivalent of a quota. Because it was not unreasonable for an official in the position of defendants sued in their individual capacity to conclude that the admissions policies were constitutional, they had qualified immunity.

OUTCOME: Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment was granted with respect to the admissions programs in existence from 1995 through 1998, and the admissions programs for such years were declared unconstitutional, but denied as to the programs for 1999 and 2000. Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief was denied. The individual defendants' motion was granted on grounds of qualified immunity.

REV_00259077

'reducing the historic deficit of traditionally disfavored minorities in medical schools and in the medical profession,' (ii) countering the effects of societal discrimination, (iii) increasing [16] the number of physicians who will practice in communities currently underserved; and (iv) obtaining the educational benefits that flow from an ethnically diverse student body." Id. 438 U.S. at 306, 98 S. Ct. at 2756-57.

The Supreme Court of California sustained the applicant's challenge, holding that the university's admission program violated the California Constitution, Title VI, and the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. On appeal, the United States Supreme Court, through a majority formed by Justices Powell, Stevens, Burger, Stewart and Rehnquist, affirmed the California Supreme Court's finding that the university's special admissions system was invalid, as was its order directing the university to admit the respondent to the Medical School. The Supreme Court also, through a different majority formed by Justices Powell, Brennan, White, Marshall, and Blackmun, reversed the California Supreme Court's order enjoining the university from ever considering race in making admissions decisions. An examination of the separate opinions in Bakke, however, clearly illustrates that there were no clear grounds upon which a [*818] majority of the Court agreed in reaching [17] their respective decisions.

Justice Powell's Opinion

Justice Powell, writing solely for himself, supplied the pivotal vote in both affirming the California Supreme Court's finding that the university's admission program was unlawful, and reversing the California Supreme Court's order "enjoining [the university] from according any consideration to race in its admission process." Id. 438 U.S. at 272, 98 S. Ct. at 2738.

Applying strict scrutiny, Justice Powell found that to the extent that the university's purpose was to "assure within its student body some specified percentage of a particular group merely because of its race or ethnic origin, such a preferential purpose must be rejected, not as insubstantial, but as facially invalid." Id. 438 U.S. at 307, 98 S. Ct. at 2757. Justice Powell also rejected the university's proferred interests in countering the effects of societal discrimination and improving the delivery of healthcare to disadvantaged communities. Id. 438 U.S. at 307-10, 98 S. Ct. at 2757-59.

However, Justice Powell found that the university's fourth goal, "the attainment of a diverse student body," was "clearly" a "constitutionally permissible [18] goal for an institution of higher education." Id. 438 U.S. at 311-12, 98 S. Ct. at 2759. Relying upon the "four essential freedoms" that constitute "academic freedom," i.e. "'to determine for itself on academic grounds who may teach, what may be taught, how it shall be taught, and who may be admitted to study,'" Justice Powell concluded that "the freedom of a university to make its own judgments as to education includes the selection of its student body." Id. at 312, 98 S. Ct. at 2759 (quoting Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263, 77 S. Ct. 1203, 1218, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1311 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring)). According to Justice Powell, "the atmosphere of 'speculation, experiment and creation'--so essential to the quality of higher education--is widely believed to be promoted by a diverse student body." Id. at 312, 98 S. Ct. at 2760. Furthermore, "the 'nation's future depends upon leaders trained through wide exposure' to the ideas and mores of students as diverse as this Nation of many peoples." Id. at 313, 98 S. Ct. at 2760.

According to Justice Powell, a university's "interest in diversity is compelling [19] in the context of a university's admissions program," in which "ethnic diversity . . . is only one element in a range of factors a university properly may consider in attaining the goal of a heterogenous student body." Id. at 314, 98 S. Ct. at 2760-61.

Justice Brennan's Opinion

Applying intermediate scrutiny, Justice Brennan, joined by Justices White, Marshall, and Blackmun, found that the university's articulated purpose of remedying the effects of past societal discrimination was "sufficiently important to justify the use of race-conscious admissions programs where there is a sound basis for concluding that minority underrepresentation is substantial and chronic, and that the handicap of past discrimination is impeding access of minorities." n6 Id. at 362, 98 S. Ct. at 2784.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n6 As noted supra, the Supreme Court has since clarified that all racial classifications are subject to strict scrutiny review. See Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 115 S. Ct. 2097, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158 (1995).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [20]

Justice Stevens's Opinion

Based upon the fact that Bakke was not a class action, but rather a "controversy between two specific litigants," Justice Stevens, joined by Chief Justice Burger, Justice Stewart, and Justice Rehnquist, viewed "the question of whether race can ever be used as a factor in an admissions decision" as an issue not before the Court. Id. at 408 & 411, 98 S. Ct. at 2808 & 2809. Justice Stevens also declined to address the issue on constitutional grounds, relying solely upon Title VI's prohibition instead, which Justice Stevens viewed as "crystal clear: Race cannot be the basis of excluding [*819] anyone from participation in a federally funded program." Id. at 418, 98 S. Ct. at 2813.

2. Diversity as a Matter of Law

In support of their motion for summary judgment, the University Defendants contend that under Justice Powell's reasoning in Bakke, the University has, as a matter of law, a compelling governmental interest in the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body. n7 According to the University Defendants, Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke stands as the narrowest grounds offered in support of [21] the judgment in that case and is therefore also binding precedent on this Court.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n7 Defendant-Intervenors join in the University Defendants' assertion that racial diversity is a compelling governmental interest in the context of higher education. (Def.-Intervenors' 8/11/00 Resp. to Defs.' Mot. at 3-5).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

"When a fragmented Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, 'the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds.'" Marks v. United States, 430 U.S. 188, 193, 97 S. Ct. 990, 993, 51 L. Ed. 2d 260 (1977) (quoting Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 169 n.15, 96 S. Ct. 2909, 2923 n.15, 49 L. Ed. 2d 859 (1976)). As explained by the Sixth Circuit, "where a Justice or Justices concurring in the judgment in such a case articulates a legal standard which, when applied, will necessarily produce results with which a majority of the Court from that [22] case would agree, that standard is the law of the land." Triplett Grille, Inc. v. City of Akron, 40 F.3d 129, 134 (6th Cir. 1994).

It is clear that a majority of the Justices in Bakke expressly agreed that the California Supreme Court erred in enjoining the university from ever considering race in its admissions programs. Therefore, to the extent that the University Defendants assert Bakke's holding to be that "'a properly devised admissions program involving the competitive consideration of race and ethnic origin'" is constitutional, this Court agrees. See Bakke, 438 U.S. at 320, 98 S. Ct. at 2763; see also Minnick v. California Dep't of Corr., 452 U.S. 105, 115 & n.17, 101 S. Ct. 2211, 2217 & n.17, 68 L. Ed. 2d 706 (1981) (recognizing that the opinions of Justices Brennan, White, Marshall, Blackmun, and Powell "unequivocally stated that race may be used as a factor in the admissions process in some circumstances"); Oliver v. Kalamazoo Bd. of Educ., 706 F.2d 757, 763 (6th Cir. 1983) (citing Bakke for proposition that "affirmative action admission programs of educational institutions may take race into [23] account"). What is less clear, however, is whether five Justices implicitly agreed that diversity can be a compelling interest in the context of higher education, i.e., whether universities have a compelling interest in the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body.

It is clear that no five Justices in Bakke expressly held that diversity was a compelling interest under the Equal Protection Clause. The most that can be garnered from Bakke's splintered decision is that five Justices reached the same conclusion, i.e. that universities may take race into account in admissions when done so properly, for separate, unrelated reasons.

The University Defendants, relying upon Smith v. University of Washington, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 31160, Nos. 99-35209, 99-35347, 99-35348, 2000 WL 1770045 (9th Cir. Dec. 4, 2000), contend that Justice Powell's opinion is the "narrowest opinion" of the Court and therefore, diversity is a compelling governmental interest as a matter of law. n8

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n8 In their briefs, the University Defendants rely on the district court's opinion in Smith, No. C97-3352 (W.D. Wash. Feb. 12, 1999). On December 4, 2000, however, the Ninth Circuit affirmed the district court's decision.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [24] [*820]

While this Court does not necessarily agree with the Ninth Circuit's conclusion that Justice Powell's "analysis is the narrowest footing upon which a race-conscious decision making process could stand," Smith, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 31160, at *31, 2000 WL 1770045 at *10, this Court reaches the same ultimate conclusion as the Ninth Circuit, i.e., that under Bakke, diversity constitutes a compelling governmental interest in the context of higher education justifying the use of race as one factor in the admissions process, albeit through somewhat different reasoning. n9

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n9 Recognizing that neither the Supreme Court nor the Sixth Circuit have definitively held that diversity can never be a compelling interest under strict scrutiny, this Court is satisfied that the University's argument remains viable.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Plaintiffs, relying on the Fifth Circuit's decision in Hopwood v. State of Texas, 78 F.3d 932 (5th Cir. 1996), cert. denied, 518 U.S. 1033, 116 S. Ct. 2581, 135 L. Ed. 2d 1095 (1996), and more [25] recently, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia's decision in Johnson v. Board of Regents of University System of Georgia, 106 F. Supp. 2d 1362, 1375 (S.D. Ga. 2000), contend that, as a matter of law, "diversity" and "academic freedom" are not compelling governmental interests that can ever justify the use of race in the admission process. This Court disagrees.

In Hopwood, two of the three judges on the Fifth Circuit panel held "that any consideration of race or ethnicity. . . for the purpose of achieving a diverse student body is not a compelling interest under the Fourteenth Amendment." Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 944. The Fifth Circuit reasoned that by explicitly agreeing with a portion of Justice Powell's opinion, but remaining silent in regard to Justice Powell's diversity rationale, the Justices who joined Justice Brennan's opinion in Bakke "implicitly rejected" Justice Powell's position regarding diversity. Id. This Court, however, believes that the panel in Hopwood reads too much into the other Justices' silence regarding Justice Powell's diversity rationale. It is just as likely that the other Justices [26] felt no need to address the issue of diversity based upon their finding that under intermediate scrutiny, the program at issue was justified as a means to remedy past discrimination.

For example, Justice Brennan's silence regarding diversity could just as easily be interpreted as "implicit approval" that, in an appropriate case, diversity may constitute a compelling governmental interest. In fact, in Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. F.C.C., 497 U.S. 547, 568, 110 S. Ct. 2997, 3010, 111 L. Ed. 2d 445 (1990), rev'd on other grounds, Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 115 S. Ct. 2097, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158 (1995), Justice Brennan specifically described the Supreme Court's decision in Bakke as recognizing that "a 'diverse student body' contributing to a 'robust exchange of ideas' is a 'constitutionally permissible goal' on which a race-conscious university admissions program may be predicated." In this Court's opinion, Justice Brennan's statement in Metro Broadcasting further supports a conclusion that his silence regarding the diversity interest in Bakke was not an implicit rejection of such an interest, but rather, an implicit approval [27] of such an interest. As the Ninth Circuit recognized in Smith:

> True it is that Justice Brennan did not specifically say that "race" could be used to achieve student body diversity in the absence of any societal discrimination, but, then, there was no need for him to do so in light of his view about past societal discrimination. Yet, we can hardly doubt that he would have embraced that somewhat narrower principle if need be, for he thought that it was simply an allotrope of the principle he was propounding.

Smith, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 31160, at *32, 2000 WL 1770045 at *10.

Although this Court agrees that since Bakke, no Supreme Court decision has explicitly accepted the diversity rationale under strict scrutiny, this Court does not [*821] agree that under recent Supreme Court precedent, the diversity interest can never constitute a compelling state interest, especially in the context of higher education. In fact, none of the cases relied upon by the Fifth Circuit involved the issue of whether the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body can ever constitute a compelling governmental interest in the context of higher education, most likely because [28] the Supreme Court has not been faced with this precise issue since Bakke. See Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 944-45; Johnson, 106 F. Supp. 2d at 1367-70.

In Hopwood, the Fifth Circuit relied upon the Supreme Court's decision in City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson, 488 U.S. 469, 109 S. Ct. 706, 102 L. Ed. 2d 854 (1989), in reaching its conclusion that diversity can never justify the use of racial classifications. Croson, however, involved a minority set-aside program in the context of government construction contracts. This Court agrees with Judge Wiener's concurring opinion in Hopwood that the public graduate or professional school context is distinguishable from the employment, minority business set-aside, and re-districting contexts in that, unlike the other cited contexts, the higher education context implicates "the uneasy marriage of the First and Fourteenth Amendments." n10 Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 965 n.21 (Wiener, J., concurring).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n10 As the First Circuit recognized in > Wessmann v. Gittens, 160 F.3d 790, 795-96 (1st Cir. 1998):

> In the education context, Hopwood is the only appellate court to have rejected diversity as a compelling interest, and it did so only in the face of vigorous dissent from a substantial minority of the active judges in the Fifth Circuit. See Hopwood v. State of Texas, 84 F.3d 720, 721 (5th Cir. 1996) (Politz, C.J., with whom King, Wiener, Benavides, Stewart, Parker, and Dennis, JJ., joined, dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc). The question that divided the Fifth Circuit centered on the precedential value of Justice Powell's controlling opinion in Bakke. The panel in Hopwood pronounced that opinion dead. The dissenting judges countered that the reports of Bakke's demise were premature.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [29]

As Justice Powell recognized in Bakke, "academic freedom, though not a specifically enumerated constitutional right, long has been viewed as a special concern of the First Amendment." Bakke, 438 U.S. at 312, 98 S. Ct. at 2759. This "freedom" has always been viewed as including "the freedom of the university to make its own judgments as to education," including "the selection of its student body." Id. (citing Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 263, 77 S. Ct. 1203, 1218, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1311 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring); Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589, 603, 87 S. Ct. 675, 683, 17 L. Ed. 2d 629 (1967)).

Moreover, that section of Justice O'Connor's opinion in Croson that is most often cited for the proposition that race-based classifications must be "strictly reserved for remedial settings" did not enjoy a majority of the Court. Croson, 488 U.S. at 493, 109 S. Ct. at 722. In his concurring opinion, Justice Stevens specifically disagreed with the premise that seemed to underlie Justice O'Connor's opinion, i.e., "that a governmental decision that rests on a racial classification is [30] never permissible except as a remedy for a past wrong." Id. at 511, 109 S. Ct. at 731. In Justice Stevens's opinion, Justice O'Connor's approach "overlooked the potential value of race-based determinations that may serve other valid purposes." Id. at 511 n.1, 109 S. Ct. at 731 n.1.

In short, this Court is not convinced that recent Supreme Court precedent has established, as a matter of law, that the consideration of race in an attempt to attain the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body in the context of higher education can never constitute a compelling interest under strict scrutiny. To that end, this Court agrees with Judge Wiener's concurring opinion in Hopwood that applicable Supreme Court precedent has never held [*822] "squarely and unequivocally either that remedying the effects of past discrimination is the only compelling state interest that can ever justify racial classification, or conversely that achieving diversity in the student body of a public graduate or professional school can never be a compelling governmental interest." Hopwood, 78 F.3d at 964 (Wiener, J., concurring); [31] see also Smith, 2000 U.S. App. LEXIS 31160, at *34, 2000 WL 1770045 at *11 ("For now, therefore, it ineluctably follows that the Fourteenth Amendment permits University admissions programs which consider race for other than remedial purposes, and educational diversity is a compelling governmental interest that meets the demands of strict scrutiny of race-conscious measures."); Eisenberg v. Montgomery County Pub. Schs., 197 F.3d 123, 130 (4th Cir. 1999) (noting that issue of whether diversity constitutes a compelling interest remains unresolved); Boston's Children First v. City of Boston, 62 F. Supp. 2d 247, 258 (D. Mass. 1999) (rejecting plaintiff's contention on motion for preliminary injunction that diversity can never be compelling governmental interest); Hunter v. Regents of Univ. of Cal., 971 F. Supp. 1316, 1324-27 (C.D. Cal. 1997) (rejecting plaintiff's contention that remedying past discrimination is only compelling state interest). Accordingly, this Court is satisfied that, if presented with sufficient evidence regarding the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body, there is nothing barring the Court from determining that such [32] benefits are compelling under strict scrutiny analysis.

The University Defendants have presented this Court with solid evidence regarding the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body. According to Patricia Y. Gurin, Professor of Psychology at the University of Michigan and Interim Dean of the LSA, "students learn better in a diverse educational environment, and they are better prepared to become active participants in our pluralistic, democratic society once they leave such a setting." (Gurin Rep. at 3; see also U.S. Br. at 20-24; Association of American Law Schools ("ALS") n11 Br. at 6-10). Diversity in higher education also serves to break "patterns of racial segregation and separation historically rooted in our national life." (Id.).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n11 The Association of American Laws Schools, National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges, Committee on Institutional Cooperation (an academic consortium including Indiana University, Michigan State University, Northwestern University, The Ohio State University, Pennsylvania State University, Purdue University, the University of Chicago, the University of Illinois, the University of Iowa, the University of Michigan, the University of Minnesota, and the University of Wisconsin-Madison), and Wayne State University have joined in one amicus brief in support of the University, together representing over 360 institutional members of the professional higher education community.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [33]

Gurin reports that "multi-institutional national data, the results of an extensive survey of students at the University of Michigan, and data drawn from a specific classroom program at the University of Michigan" show that "students who experienced the most racial and ethnic diversity in classroom settings and in informal interactions with peers showed the greatest engagement in active thinking processes, growth in intellectual engagement and motivation, and growth in intellectual and academic skills." (Id. at 5). Such students were also "better able to understand and consider multiple perspectives, deal with the conflicts that different perspectives sometimes create, and appreciate the common values and integrative forces that harness differences in pursuit of common ground." (Id. at 5-6; see also ALS Br. at 11-13; American Council on Education ("ACE") n12 Br. at 9-11).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n12 The American Council on Education is joined by twenty-four other associations, councils, and other groups representing the higher education community throughout the United States.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [34] [*823]

Members of heterogeneous working groups also offer more creative solutions to problems than do homogeneous groups, and show a greater potential for critical thinking because heterogeneity "eliminates a problem termed 'group think,' an organizational situation in which group members mindlessly conform." (Id. at 17) (internal citation omitted). Students who had experienced the most diversity in classroom settings and in informal interactions with peers showed the greatest engagement in active thinking processes, growth in intellectual engagement and motivation, and growth in intellectual and academic skills. (Id. at 35-36 & Tables C1, C2, M1, M2, I1). Gurin also concludes that on average, students who attend more diverse institutions exhibit a greater "intellectual engagement and motivation index" and a greater "citizenship engagement index." (Id., Figs. 3 & 4).

A number of amici have filed briefs concurring with the University that diversity results in a richer educational experience for students. n13 In support of its position, the United States cites a study by Alexander Astin, Director of the Higher Education Research Institute at the University of California, in which [35] Astin associates diversity with increased satisfaction in most areas of the college experience and an increased commitment to promoting racial understanding and participation in cultural activities, leadership, and citizenship. (U.S. Br. at 20-21; see also ALS Br. at 6; ACE Br. at 15).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n13 Along with the ALS and ACE, the following have filed amicus briefs in support of the University's position: the United States, the State of Ohio, the Michigan Attorney General, General Motors Corporation, Steelcase, Inc., joined by nineteen other global corporations, and the National Association of Social Workers, joined by the Council on Social Work Education, the Association of Baccalaureate Social Work Program Directors, Inc., and the Group for the Advancement of Doctoral Education in Social Work.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The over 360 institutions represented by the Association of American Law Schools assert that they have learned through their extensive experience in the educational realm that the quality of education for all students is greatly [36] enhanced when student bodies include persons of diverse backgrounds, interests, and experiences, including racial and ethnic makeups. (ALS Br. at v). According to these institutions, a decision adverse to the University Defendants would significantly undermine their ability to provide the highest quality of academic experience and to prepare their students to effectively contribute to society after graduation. (Id. at vi).

Plaintiffs have presented no argument or evidence rebutting the University Defendants' assertion that a racially and ethnically diverse student body gives rise to educational benefits for both minority and non-minority students. In fact, during oral argument, counsel for Plaintiffs indicated his willingness to assume, for purposes of these motions, that diversity in institutions of higher education is "good, important, and valuable." Counsel for Plaintiffs, however, contends that "good, important, and valuable" is not enough, and that the diversity rationale is too amorphous and ill-defined, and "too limitless, timeless, and scopeless," to rise to the level of a compelling interest. According to counsel for Plaintiffs, the University's diversity rationale has [37] "no logical stopping point" but rather is a "permanent regime" in direct conflict with the strict scrutiny standard.

This Court, however, is not convinced that what may be too amorphous and ill-defined in other contexts, i.e. the construction industry context, is also necessarily too amorphous or ill-defined in the context of higher education. In this Court's opinion, the fact that the University cannot articulate a set number or percentage of minority students that would constitute the requisite level of diversity does not, by itself, eliminate diversity as a potentially compelling interest.

Furthermore, unlike the remedial setting, diversity in higher education, by its [*824] very nature, is a permanent and ongoing interest. As previously noted, diversity is not a "remedy." Therefore, unlike the remedial setting, where the need for remedial action terminates once the effects of past discrimination have been eradicated, the need for diversity lives on perpetually. This does not mean, however, that Universities are unrestrained in their use of race in the admissions process, as any use of race must be narrowly tailored. Hopefully, there may come a day when universities are able to achieve [38] the desired diversity without resort to racial preferences. Such an occurrence, however, would have no affect on the compelling nature of the diversity interest. Rather, such an occurrence would affect only the issue of whether a university's race-conscious admissions program remained narrowly tailored. In this Court's opinion, the permanency of such an interest does not remove it from the realm of "compelling interests," but rather, only emphasizes the importance of ensuring that any race-conscious admissions policy that is justified as a means to achieve diversity is narrowly tailored to such interest.

The only argument rebutting the University Defendants' assertions regarding the educational benefits of a diverse student body comes from the National Association of Scholars ("NAS"), which has filed a brief as amicus curiae in support of Plaintiffs. Contrary to the amici in support of the University Defendants, the NAS contends that "intellectual diversity bears no obvious or necessary relationship to racial diversity." (NAS Br. at 3). NAS specifically takes issue with the studies relied upon by the ALS, contending that such studies really report that "outcomes are generally [39] not affected" by racial diversity on campus. (Id. at 6-7).

NAS also asserts that none of the variables Gurin uses in her studies as proxies for racial diversity on college campuses actually requires the presence of other-race students on campus. (Id. at 8). For example, NAS asserts that Gurin relies on a student's attendance at an ethnic studies course coupled with either participation in a racial/cultural awareness workshop or a discussion regarding racial issues. (Id.). As NAS points out, neither of these necessarily requires the presence of other-race students.

NAS also attacks Gurin's study as providing no indication of the number of minority students that are needed to achieve the effects reported. (Id. at 9). According to NAS, "it is possible that the positive outcomes that Gurin catalogues do not require any more racial diversity than that which would occur without racial preferences." (Id.). This argument, however, does not go to the core issue of whether the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body constitute a compelling governmental interest, but rather, whether the means employed to achieve that interest are narrowly tailored.

This [40] Court is persuaded, based upon the record before it, that a racially and ethnically diverse student body produces significant educational benefits such that diversity, in the context of higher education, constitutes a compelling governmental interest under strict scrutiny.

3. Narrowly Tailored Analysis

Having determined that the educational benefits flowing from a racially and ethnically diverse student body are a sufficiently compelling interest to survive strict scrutiny, the Court must now determine whether the LSA's admissions policies for the years at issue (1995-present) were narrowly tailored to achieving that interest.

Although Justice Powell found diversity to be a compelling interest in the context of a university's admissions program, Justice Powell ultimately found that the particular admissions program at issue in Bakke was not a narrowly tailored means of achieving such interest and accordingly, the program was nonetheless unconstitutional. According to Justice Powell, the [*825] fatal flaw in the University of California's program was that:

> It tells applicants who are not Negro, Asian, or Chicano that they are totally excluded from a specific percentage [41] of the seats in an entering class. No matter how strong their qualifications, quantitative and extracurricular, including their own potential for contribution to educational diversity, they are never afforded the chance to compete with applicants from the preferred groups for the special admissions seats. At the same time, the preferred applicants have the opportunity to compete for every seat in the class.

Bakke, 438 U.S. at 318, 98 S. Ct. at 2763. However, "in enjoining [the university] from ever considering the race of any applicant," the California Supreme Court had "failed to recognize that the State has a substantial interest that legitimately may be served by a properly devised admissions program involving the competitive consideration of race and ethnic origin." Id. For that reason, Justice Powell concluded that so much of the California court's judgment that enjoined the university from any consideration of an applicant's race had to be reversed. n14

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n14 In contrast, Justice Brennan found that there was "no sensible, and certainly no constitutional, distinction between, for example, adding a set number of points to the admissions rating of disadvantaged minority applicants as an expression of the preference with the expectation that this will result in the admission of an approximately determined number of qualified minority applicants and setting a fixed number of places for such applicants." Bakke, 438 U.S. at 378, 98 S. Ct. at 2793.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [42]

In contrast to the University of California's special admissions system, Justice Powell cited Harvard's admissions program as an example of how race could properly be taken into account in an effort to achieve diversity. Id. 438 U.S. at 316, 98 S. Ct. at 2762. As Justice Powell described Harvard's admissions program:

> In such an admissions program, race or ethnic background may be deemed a "plus" in a particular applicant's file, yet it does not insulate the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats. The file of a particular black applicant may be examined for his potential contribution to diversity without the factor of race being decisive when compared, for example, with that of an applicant identified as an Italian-American if the latter is thought to exhibit qualities more likely to promote beneficial educational pluralism. Such qualities could include exceptional personal talents, unique work or service experience, leadership potential, maturity, demonstrated compassion, a history of overcoming disadvantage, ability to communicate with the poor, or other qualifications deemed important. In short, an admissions program operated in this way [43] is flexible enough to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight. Indeed, the weight attributed to a particular quality may vary from year to year depending upon the "mix" both of the student body and the applicants for the incoming class.

Id. 438 U.S. at 317-18, 98 S. Ct. at 2762.

According to Justice Powell, such a program was appropriate because it "treated each applicant as an individual in the admissions process." Id. 438 U.S. at 318, 98 S. Ct. at 2762. "The applicant who loses out on the last available seat to another candidate receiving a 'plus' on the basis of ethnic background will not have been foreclosed from all consideration for that seat simply because he was not the right color or had the wrong surname. It would mean only that his combined qualifications, which may have included similar nonobjective factors, did not outweigh those of the other applicant." Id. An applicant whose qualifications had been weighed "fairly and competitively" had no basis to complain of [*826] unequal treatment under the [44] Fourteenth Amendment. Id.

Although the Harvard plan spoken of approvingly by Justice Powell did not set target-quotas for the number of minorities to be admitted in a given year, the plan clearly used race as a factor in admissions. Id. 438 U.S. at 316, 98 S. Ct. at 2761-62. Therefore, to the extent that Plaintiffs contend that race can never be used as a factor during admissions decisions, their argument must be rejected.

It is also clear that under the Harvard plan, "race may tip the balance in [an applicant's] favor just as geographic origin or a life spent on a farm may tip the balance in other candidates' cases." Id. 438 U.S. at 316, 98 S. Ct. at 2761. Therefore, in some cases, an applicant may constitutionally be granted admission over another applicant solely on account of his race.

Furthermore, a university may "pay[] some attention to distribution among many types and categories of students," as more than a "token number of blacks" is necessary to fully achieve the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse student body. Id. 438 U.S. at 316-17, 98 S. Ct. at 2762. As Harvard explained in regard to its admission program:

> In Harvard College admissions [45] the Committee has not set target-quotas for the number of blacks, or of musicians, football players, physicists or Californians to be admitted in a given year. At the same time the Committee is aware that if Harvard College is to provide a truly heterogeneous environment that reflects the rich diversity of the United States, it cannot be provided without some attention to numbers. It would not make sense, for example, to have 10 or 20 students out of 1,100 whose homes are west of the Mississippi. Comparably, 10 or 20 black students could not begin to bring to their classmates and to each other the variety of points of view, backgrounds and experiences of blacks in the United States.

Id. 438 U.S. at 323, 98 S. Ct. at 2765.

As is clear from Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke, a university's interest in achieving the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body does not justify an admissions program designed to admit a predetermined number or proportion of minority students. Instead, a university must carefully design its system to fall between these two competing ends of the spectrum, i.e., between a system that completely fails to achieve a meaningful degree [46] of diversity, under which the benefits associated with a diverse student body will never be realized, and a rigid quota system, which is clearly unconstitutional under Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke.

In striving to achieve such a system, "race or ethnic background may be deemed a 'plus' in a particular applicant's file," as long as this plus "does not insulate the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats." Id. 438 U.S. at 317, 98 S. Ct. at 2762. As Justice Powell explained with reference to the Harvard plan, an admissions program that takes race into consideration must be "flexible enough to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight." Id. 438 U.S. at 317, 98 S. Ct. at 2761. It is exactly because race need not necessarily be accorded the same weight as other objective factors that, in some instances, "race may tip the balance in an applicant's favor." Id. 438 U.S. at 316, 98 S. Ct. at 2761.

The instant action involves the LSA's admissions programs from 1995 through the present. In [47] 1995 and 1996, admission decisions were based primarily on a set of guideline tables referred to as grids, with GPA 2 ranges represented on the vertical axis, and ACT/SAT scores represented on the horizontal axis. n15 In 1995, four grids [*827] were used: (1) in-state non-minority applicants, (2) out-of-state non-minority applicants, (3) in-state minority applicants, and (4) out-of-state minority applicants. In 1996 only two grids were

CORE TERMS: diversity, student body, diverse, educational, summary judgment, seat, under-represented, higher education, compelling interest, qualified immunity, immunity, grid, non-minority, Eleventh Amendment, compelling governmental interest, strict scrutiny, ethnically, racially, pool, counselor, score, narrowly tailored, Fourteenth Amendment, ethnic, joined, classification, abrogated, achieving, matter of law, candidate

CORE CONCEPTS - ♦ Hide Concepts

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Summary Judgment Standard

Summary judgment is proper only if there is no genuine issue as to any material fact, thereby entitling the moving party to judgment as a matter of law. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56 (c). There is no genuine issue of material fact for trial unless, by viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the nonmoving party, a reasonable jury could return a verdict for that party.

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Burdens of Production & Proof

On a motion for summary judgment, the moving party bears the initial responsibility of informing the court of the basis for its motion and identifying those portions of the record that establish the absence of a material issue of fact.

Civil Procedure : Summary Judgment : Burdens of Production & Proof

Once the moving party on a summary judgment motion has met its burden, the nonmoving party must go beyond the pleadings and come forward with specific facts to show that there is a genuine issue for trial. Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(e). The nonmoving party must do more than show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. The nonmoving party must present significant probative evidence in support of its opposition to the motion for summary judgment. If, after adequate time for discovery, the party bearing the burden of proof fails to make a showing sufficient to establish an essential element of his claim, summary judgment is appropriate.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Scope of Protection

See U.S. Const. amend. XIV § 1.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

The "central mandate" of U.S. Const. amend. XIV is racial neutrality in governmental decisionmaking. The basic principle is straightforward: racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination. Accordingly, the United States Supreme Court has explicitly clarified that all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests.

Governments : Courts : Judicial Precedents

When a fragmented United States Supreme Court decides a case and no single rationale explaining the result enjoys the assent of five Justices, the holding of the court may be viewed as that position taken by those members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds. As explained by the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, where a Justice or Justices concurring in the judgment in such a case articulates a legal standard which, when applied, will necessarily produce results with which a majority of the Court from that case would agree, that standard is the law of the land.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

REV_00259078

used- (1) in-state and legacy applicants and (2) out-of-state applicants - with non-minority applicant action codes listed in the top row of the grid's cells, and minority action codes listed in the bottom row. In 1997, the same grids as in 1996 were used. However, in 1997, the LSA also added .5 to under-represented minority applicants' GPA 2 scores.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - n15 An applicant's GPA 2 was calculated by adjusting the applicant's high school GPA based upon several factors, including the quality of the applicant's high school, the strength of the applicant's high school curriculum, any unusual circumstances, the applicant's geographical residence, and the applicant's alumni relations, if any.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [48]

From 1998 through the present, the LSA has used a 150 point system, under which admission decisions were generally determined by the applicant's rank on the 150 point scale. Under-represented minority applicants automatically receive 20 points based upon their membership in one of the identified under-represented minority categories. In 1999 and 2000, the LSA also added a system whereby certain applicants, including under-represented minority applicants, could be "flagged," thereby keeping such applicants in the review pool for further consideration.

Beyond the fact that rigid quotas are impermissible, Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke fails to set forth any bright line regarding what constitutes a permissible consideration of race in admissions decisions. Furthermore, in situations such as this, it is often a thin line that divides the permissible from the impermissible. Applying the principles set forth by Justice Powell in Bakke, this Court is satisfied that when examined in its entirety, the LSA's current admissions program (1999-present) represents a permissible use of race. At the same time, however, the Court is satisfied that although the LSA views its current system [49] as "changing only the mechanics, not the substance" of its prior systems, its prior systems, when examined in their entirety, cross that thin line from the permissible to the impermissible. n16

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n16 It is understandable that the LSA does not contend that there is any "substantive" difference between its current and prior admissions programs. To acknowledge a substantive difference in such programs would give some support to Plaintiffs' claims that the admissions programs in effect from 1995 through 1998 were not "narrowly tailored." Furthermore, the University Defendants' contention that "only the current system can form the basis for [injunctive relief]," and their arguments in support of this contention, (Defs.' 8/11/ 00 Br. at 92), suggest that there are some significant differences between the LSA's current admissions programs and those used from 1995 through 1998.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

A. The LSA's Current System (1999-Present)

Foremost in the Court's decision that the LSA's current admissions program is constitutional [50] is the fact that the LSA's current program does not utilize rigid quotas or seek to admit a predetermined number of minority students. Therefore, the LSA's current program does not contain the fatal flaw identified by Justice Powell in Bakke. Instead, race is taken into account in two ways under the LSA's current program. First, admissions counselors may assign each under-represented minority applicant twenty points in calculating their selection index score on account of their race. Second, under the LSA's current program, counselors may "flag" applicants that possess certain qualities or characteristics the LSA deems important to the composition of its freshman class, one of which is "under-represented race," thereby keeping an applicant who may not necessarily pass the LSA's initial admit threshold in the review pool for further consideration. n17 Such uses of race, however, [*828] operate as nothing more than the "plus" spoken of with approval by Justice Powell in Bakke.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n17 Other qualities or characteristics include high school class rank, unique life experiences, challenges, circumstances, interests or talents, socioeconomic disadvantage, and geography.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [51]

In response, Plaintiffs contend that the LSA's practice of adding twenty points to under-represented minority applicants' selection index scores really operates as the functional equivalent of a quota. Justice Powell, however, rejected essentially the same argument in Bakke explaining:

> It has been suggested that an admissions program which considers race only as one factor is simply a subtle and more sophisticated--but no less effective--means of according racial preference than the Davis program. A facial intent to discriminate, however, is evident in petitioner's preference program and not denied in this case. No such facial infirmity exists in an admissions program where race or ethnic background is simply one element--to be weighed fairly against other elements--in the selection process. "A boundary line," as Mr. Justice Frankfurter remarked in another connection, "is none the worse for being narrow." McLeod v. Dilworth, 322 U.S. 327, 329, 64 S. Ct. 1023, 1025, 88 L. Ed. 1304 (1944). And a court would not assume that a university, professing to employ a facially nondiscriminatory admissions policy, would operate it as a cover for the functional equivalent [52] of a quota system. In short, good faith would be presumed in the absence of a showing to the contrary in the manner permitted by our cases. See e. g., Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 97 S. Ct. 555, 50 L. Ed. 2d 450 (1977); Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 96 S. Ct. 2040, 48 L. Ed. 2d 597 (1976); Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, 85 S. Ct. 824, 13 L. Ed. 2d 759 (1965).

Id. 438 U.S. at 318-19, 98 S. Ct. at 2762-63.

Minority applicants are not insulated from review by virtue of these twenty points any more than other applicants are insulated from review by virtue of the six points awarded for geographic factors, four points awarded for alumni relationship, three points awarded for an outstanding essay, five points awarded for leadership and service skills, twenty points awarded for socioeconomic status, or twenty points awarded for athletes. In fact, the Court notes that in certain circumstances, these points may be combined for a total of up to forty. The fact that these points may "tip the balance" in favor of a particular applicant, however, does not necessarily lead to a conclusion that such [53] applicants have been insulated from competition in the sense that Justice Powell spoke of in Bakke.

The Court agrees that in certain situations, a pre-existing commitment to a fixed preference may translate into an exact proportion of the favored group being selected. This is most clearly illustrated by programs in which a preference is only available for one factor, for example race. However, under the LSA's admissions program, there are many factors that may entitle an applicant to a preference, thereby making the results of any one factor less predictable.

Plaintiffs also contend that the LSA's program, under which twenty points may be added to the selection index score of under-represented minority applicants, operates as the same type of "dual" or "two-track" system prohibited by Justice Powell in Bakke. (Pls.' 8/11/ 00 Br. at 15). The "two-track" system Justice Powell spoke of in Bakke, however, was not a two-track system that employed lower thresholds for minority applicants vis a vis majority applicants. Such a conclusion is evident from the fact that not once in his narrowly tailored analysis did Justice Powell ever discuss the fact that under [54] the University of California's admissions program, majority students were subject to a 2.5 minimum GPA requirement, whereas there was no minimum GPA requirement for minority students. See id. 438 U.S. 274-75, 98 S. Ct. at 2739-40. [*829]

Instead, the "two-track" system of which Justice Powell spoke was the university's system under which one group of students, i.e. minority students, competed for one set of seats, and another group of students, i.e. majority students, competed for another set of seats, thereby in effect creating two separate admissions systems. Justice Powell's statement that the university's interest in genuine diversity would not be served by "expanding [the university's] two-track system into a multitrack program with a prescribed number of seats set aside for each identifiable category of applicants" further confirms that the two-track system Justice Powell spoke of related to the university's practice of setting seats aside for minority applicants, not the university's practice of employing different GPA requirements for minority vis a vis majority applicants. Id. at 314, 98 S. Ct. 2761.

Furthermore, unlike the University of California, the LSA does not [55] utilize a separate admissions review committee for under-represented minority applications. Instead, admission counselors are assigned to specific geographic areas. Each counselor reviews all applications from his or her territory, under-represented minority and non-minority alike. There is no separate review or assignment of under-represented minority applicants as there was in Bakke. (Spencer Dep. at 273; Gauss Dep. at 31, Vanhecke Dep. at 99).

Moreover, whenever a point-based system such as the LSA's is used in making admissions decisions, any factor that may result in points being added to an applicant's total score will necessarily have the effect of lowering that applicant's admission threshold. For example, any time an applicant receives three points for an outstanding essay, it can just as easily be said that the threshold for admission for that applicant has now been reduced by three points. The same is true for each of the other factors used during the admissions process, e.g., geographic location, alumni relationship, socioeconomic status, etc. Such a result is the natural byproduct of using such a point system.

What Plaintiffs really appear to contest is the fact [56] that race is accorded twenty points, while other factors that may more consistently favor non-minority students are not typically accorded the same weight. However, as Justice Powell recognized in Bakke, universities may accord an applicant's race some weight in the admissions process and, in doing so, universities are not required to accord the same weight to race as they do other factors. Bakke, 438 U.S. at 317-18, 98 S. Ct. at 2762. As long as the admissions program does not work to isolate the applicants from review, it withstands constitutional muster, despite the fact that it may provide individuals with a "plus" on account of their race.

Plaintiffs also attack the LSA's "flagging" system. According to Plaintiffs, the files of under-represented minorities remain "protected" insofar as the LSA's flagging procedure ensures that the files of such students remain in the "review pool" because of their race.

Under the LSA's current admissions system, a counselor may "flag" an applicant if (1) in the counselor's estimation, the applicant is academically prepared for the University, (2) has a selection index score of at least 80 for residents, or 75 for non-residents, [57] and (3) possesses a quality or characteristic the LSA deems important to the composition of its incoming class, including under-represented minority status. Counselors, however, are not required to flag every under-represented minority applicant. Furthermore, applicants other than under-represented minority applicants may also be flagged. For example, other factors a counselor may consider in flagging applications include whether the applicant was in the top of his class, resided in a preferred county of Michigan, exhibited any "unique life experiences, challenges, circumstances, interests or talents," exhibited a disadvantaged background, had an important connection [*830] to the University community, or was a recruited athlete. (Defs.' Exs., Ex. Z at 3-4). Given that any number of applicants, including applicants other than under-represented minority applicants, may be "flagged" under the LSA's current system, the Court rejects Plaintiffs' contention that under-represented minorities remain "protected" by virtue of such system.

Plaintiffs also contend that the University Defendants have failed to sustain their burden of showing that it considered race-neutral alternatives to its current [58] program. For example, according to Plaintiffs, one obvious race-neutral mechanism would be to randomly select all or a portion of the class from the entire pool of 'qualified' applicants, regardless of race. Plaintiffs, however, fail to explain how randomly selecting all or a portion of the class from the entire pool of applicants would produce a sufficiently diverse student body. As discussed supra, to achieve the educational benefits associated with a racially and ethnically diverse student body, more than a token number of under-represented minority students is required. Given the small size of the applicant pool, it is highly unlikely that a random selection process would result in a sufficiently diverse student body.

Furthermore, the University Defendants have presented evidence that a race-neutral admission program would substantially reduce the number of under-represented minority students in the LSA's incoming student body. (See Raudenbush 2/24/00 Supp. Rep. at 4-5; Raudenbush 3/3/99 Supp. Rep. at 9-11). If race were not taken into account, the probability of acceptance for minority applicants would be cut dramatically, while non-minority students would see only a [59] very small positive effect on their probability of admission, due largely in part to the size of their respective applicant pools. (See Raudenbush 3/3/00 Supp. Rep. at 11).

The University Defendants have also presented evidence that a system that relied entirely on test scores would also lead to the rejection of a number of qualified minority applicants. (Bowen Rep. at 10). This is due to the fact that nationally, minorities are very under-represented at the higher level of standardized test scores, and over-represented at the lower level. (Id. at 10).

The University Defendants have also presented the expert opinion of William G. Bowen that the race-neutral admissions program currently used by the University of Texas, under which all students who finish in the top ten percent of their high school class are guaranteed admission, and any system based purely on an applicant's income level, would not be as effective in enrolling "an academically well prepared and diverse student body." (Bowen Rep. at 12). According to Bowen, the Texas approach would have the effect of "admitting some students from weaker high schools while turning down better-prepared applicants who happen not [60] to finish in the top tenth of their class in academically stronger schools." (Id.). Bowen further hypothesizes that "so long as high schools differ so substantially in the academic abilities of their students and the level of difficulty of their courses, treating all applicants alike if they finished above a given high school class rank provides a spurious form of equality that is likely to damage the academic profile of the overall class of students admitted to selective institutions." (Id.).

According to Bowen, income-based strategies are just as ineffective as there "are simply too few blacks and Latinos from poor families who have strong enough academic records to qualify for admission to highly selective institutions." (Id. at 13). Bowen also reports that if universities were totally eliminated from considering race during the admissions process, "over half of the black students in selective colleges today would have been rejected." (Id.).

Furthermore, the University has attempted to enlarge its pool of under-represented [*831] minority applicants through vigorous minority recruitment programs, which have all proved to be unavailing. For example, the University's efforts [61] have included personal contact with minority students at symposia, attendance at recruiting fairs, direct mailings, campus visits, and offices in Detroit. (Vanhecke Dep. at 11-12; Spencer Dep. at 29, 196-97). Nevertheless, according to the University, its pool of qualified minority applicants for the LSA has remained small, most of whom are also highly recruited by other selective institutions and universities. (Defs.' 7/17/ 00 Br. at 27).

The Court also rejects Plaintiffs' contention that the LSA's current system amounts to nothing more than racial balancing. Unlike the cases relied upon by Plaintiffs, the LSA does not seek to achieve a certain proportion of minority students, let alone a proportion that represents the community. To that end, the Court agrees with the Fourth Circuit in Tuttle v. Arlington County Sch. Bd., 195 F.3d 698, 707 (4th Cir. 1999), that an educational institution's goal of achieving the educational benefits associated with a diverse student body "does not require racial balancing." However, the University's interest does require a sufficiently diverse student body and therefore, requires that some attention be given to the composition [62] of the student body. Although fixed racial quotas and racial balancing are not necessary to achieving that goal, the consideration of an applicant's race during the admissions process necessarily is.

In summary, the Court is satisfied that the LSA's current admissions program, under which certain minority applicants receive a "plus" on account of their race but are not insulated from all competition with other applicants, meets the requirements set forth by Justice Powell in Bakke and is therefore constitutional. Accordingly, the University Defendants' motion for summary judgment shall be granted with respect to the LSA's current admissions program, and Plaintiffs' motion for injunctive relief shall be denied.

B. The LSA's Prior Programs (1995-1998)

Although the Court finds the LSA's current admissions program to be permissible under the principles set forth by Justice Powell in Bakke, the Court is similarly satisfied that the LSA's prior admissions programs, when examined in their entirety, represent an impermissible use of race. One of the most significant factors that transforms the permissible into the impermissible in this case is the LSA's prior practice of "protecting" [63] or "reserving" seats for under-represented minority applicants. As explained by the LSA itself:

> Because the class is selected on a rolling basis, rather than at one point in time, a certain number of seats is designated during the admissions cycle for in-state students and for certain other groups of students, including, for example, athletes, foreign applicants, underrepresented minority candidates, and ROTC candidates (sometimes referred to as "protected" space). This space is "protected" to enable OUA to achieve the enrollment targets of the University and of the individual units while using a rolling admissions system. If this space is not filled by qualified candidates from the designated groups toward the end of the season, it used to admit students from the postponed pool or the extended waiting list, applicants to other units, etc.

(Defs.' Answer Interrog. No. 1) (emphasis added); (See also Pls.' 4/9/99 Exs., Vol. I, Exs. P, Q, & R) (showing number of protected seats for particular academic years). The LSA has also explained this practice in the following manner:

> LSA admissions occur on a "rolling" basis: rather than waiting for one date in late [64] winter to notify all applicants of the disposition of their applications, LSA admits applicants throughout the admissions season. Under such a process,

REV_00259100

> [*832] offers of admissions must be carefully monitored and managed to ensure that sufficient spaces are reserved, or protected, for attractive applicants who apply later in the cycle. The number of protected spaces is determined by the expected pool size of various groups of applications. As applicants from a particular group are admitted over the course of the admissions season, the protected spaces reserved for that group are used. If the pool of qualified applicants never reaches the number of protected spaces, those slots are filled with qualified applicants off the wait list.

(Pls.' 4/9/ 99 Br. at 7 n.4) (quoting Defendants' Motion for Reassignment or Designating Actions as Companion Cases in Grutter v. Bollinger, 16 F. Supp. 2d 797, 97-CV-5928-DT).

Other memoranda refer to these "protected" seats as being "reserved" for particular groups of applicants. (See Pls.' 4/9/99 Exs., Vol. I, Ex. M). In fact, one memorandum specifically states that the number of "protected groups" for Fall 1997 would be decreased, thereby "opening [65] up slots for non-protected applicants." (Id., Ex. O). This evidence clearly indicates that these slots were not merely protected from the admissions process itself, but from competition by non-protected applicants. It is clear that the LSA's system operated as the functional equivalent of a quota and therefore, ran afoul of Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke.

In this Court's opinion, there is no significant difference between the LSA's prior practice of "protecting" or "reserving" seats and the University of California's quota system. The fact that non-minority applicants may have had a chance at any "leftover" spots at the end of the admissions cycle does not change this conclusion. Under both systems, preferred minority applicants were insulated from competition from non-preferred applicants for a given number of seats. The fact that this number may have changed from year to year, or even during any one particular admissions cycle, does not change this fact. It can hardly be said that those non-preferred applicants who, by pure chance, may have had an opportunity to compete for one of the leftover seats, were allowed to compete on equal footing for every seat in the class. [66]

Furthermore, it is undisputed that from 1995 through 1997, the LSA used facially different grids and action codes based solely upon an applicant's race. Under these differing grids, a certain group of non-preferred applicants were automatically excluded from competing for a seat in the class without any type of individualized counselor review solely on account of their race, n18 whereas, preferred minority applicants were never automatically rejected, regardless of their grades and test scores. Rather, all minority applicants received some type of individualized counselor review. (McKinney Dep. at 41, Spencer Dep. at 105). This practice of "automatic exclusion" continued into the 1998 academic year despite the LSA's switch to the selection index system. (McKinney Dep. at 97-98, 150-52).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n18 The Court notes that the LSA's practice of automatically rejecting applicants also ended with the 1999 academic year.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

The Court agrees with the University Defendants' assertion that all who are ultimately admitted to the [67] LSA are "qualified" academically, and neither Plaintiffs nor this Court seek to imply that those minorities who are admitted under the lower admissions standards are not academically qualified for admission. It cannot be seriously disputed, however, that the effect of the LSA's differing standards was to systematically exclude a certain group of non-minority applicants from participating in the admissions process based solely on account of their race.

For example, in 1995 and 1996, the LSA [*833] used two grids for instate applicants, n19 one for "non-minority" applicants and another for "minority" applicants. The non-minority grid indicated that an applicant with a GPA 2 of 3.2-3.3 and ACT of 18-20/SAT of 400-500 would be automatically rejected, whereas a minority applicant with the same grade/score would have most likely been admitted. n20

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n19 The Court notes that another set of grids was used for out-of-state applicants, for a total of four grids.

n20 The minority grid also contained the option of delaying such a minority applicant "for senior year SAT's or ACT's."

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [68]

In so doing, the LSA's policies foreclosed each of the automatically rejected applicants from further consideration for a seat simply because they were not of a favored race or ethnicity. These applicants were never accorded any further individualized review as envisioned by Justice Powell in Bakke. In this Court's opinion, the LSA's different treatment of preferred minority applicants vis a vis non-preferred applicants at this stage of the admissions process further adds to the infirmity of the LSA's prior programs.

Moreover, the only distinguishing factor between the grids used by the LSA during these years was the applicant's race. Therefore, to the extent admissions counselors used such grids in making admissions decisions, it is clear from the face of the grids themselves that in some cases, the only defining factor was race.

Although the LSA's use of facially different grids/action codes based upon an applicants' race, in and of itself, may not have been constitutionally impermissible, when combined with the other components previously discussed by the Court, i.e. the LSA's use of protected seats and the LSA's system of automatic rejection, the Court is convinced [69] that the LSA's prior programs, when examined in their entirety, fall within the impermissible under the principles enunciated by Justice Powell in Bakke. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment shall be granted with respect to the LSA's admissions programs employed from 1995 through 1998.

Qualified Immunity

Defendants Bollinger and Duderstadt, who have been sued in their individual capacities under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, have moved for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity. Under the qualified immunity doctrine, "government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known." Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818, 102 S. Ct. 2727, 2738, 73 L. Ed. 2d 396 (1982). "The question of whether qualified immunity attaches to an official's actions is a purely legal question for the trial judge to determine prior to trial." Garvie v. Jackson, 845 F.2d 647, 649 (6th Cir. 1988).

In order to determine whether an [70] official is entitled to qualified immunity, a court must first consider, "whether, based on the applicable law, a constitutional violation occurred." Dickerson v. McClellan, 101 F.3d 1151, 1157 (6th Cir. 1996) (citing Centanni v. Eight Unknown Officers, 15 F.3d 587, 589 (6th Cir. 1994)). As discussed supra, the Court is satisfied that although diversity is a sufficiently compelling interest to survive strict scrutiny, the LSA's prior admissions programs (1995-1998) were nonetheless impermissible under the principles enunciated by Justice Powell in Bakke. Therefore, the Court is satisfied that a constitutional violation has occurred.

Next, the Court must determine whether the constitutional violation involved "'clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'" Id. 101 F.3d at 1158 (quoting Christophel v. Kukulinsky, 61 F.3d 479, 485 (6th Cir. 1995)). "In determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established, a district [*834] court must find binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals, or itself." Sheets v. Moore, 97 F.3d 164, 166 (6th Cir. 1996) (citing [71] Ohio Civil Serv. Employees Ass'n v. Seiter, 858 F.2d 1171, 1177 (6th Cir. 1988)). Neither party disputes the fact that under the Fourteenth Amendment, every individual is entitled to equal protection of the laws. To date, however, there has been only one Supreme Court decision addressing the extent to which a university may take race into consideration during the admissions decision, i.e., the Supreme Court's decision in Bakke. As is illustrated by the foregoing discussion, the binding effect of Justice Powell's opinion in Bakke has been the subject of much debate in recent years.

Furthermore, to defeat a claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiffs must show that Defendants "knew or reasonably should have known" that their actions were unconstitutional. Harlow, 457 U.S. at 816, 102 S. Ct. 2727; see also Dickerson, 101 F.3d at 1151 (quoting Russo v. City of Cincinnati, 953 F.2d 1036, 1042 (6th Cir. 1992)). "'The unlawfulness must be apparent.'" Id. (quoting Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640, 107 S. Ct. 3034, 3039, 97 L. Ed. 2d 523 (1987)).

In finding the University of California's [72] admission program unconstitutional, Justice Powell relied exclusively upon the fact that the university employed a rigid quota. In light of the principles enunciated by Justice Powell in Bakke, the Court does not believe that it would necessarily have been unreasonable for an official in Defendants' position to conclude that the LSA's admissions policies were constitutional. It is clear that the University did not employ the same type of rigid quota renounced by Justice Powell in Bakke. Moreover, the mere fact that this Court has disagreed with Defendants as to whether the LSA's programs were constitutional does not automatically defeat qualified immunity. As the Supreme Court has explained, "the qualified immunity standard gives ample room for mistaken judgment by protecting all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law. This accommodation for reasonable error exists because officials should not err always on the side of caution because they fear being sued." Hunter v. Bryant, 502 U.S. 224, 229, 112 S. Ct. 534, 537, 116 L. Ed. 2d 589 (1991).

Applying the defense of qualified immunity in this case is, in this Court's opinion, consistent [73] with the qualified immunity standard. Courts themselves have been struggling for well over two decades to fully understand what constitutes a properly devised admissions program under Bakke. This Court cannot say that a reasonable official in Defendants' position should have known that the LSA's prior admissions programs were unconstitutional. Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment based upon the doctrine of qualified immunity shall be granted.

Eleventh Amendment Immunity

The Board of Regents ("the Board") also seeks summary judgment with respect to Plaintiffs' Title VI claims on grounds of Eleventh Amendment Immunity. In general, Eleventh Amendment immunity bars plaintiffs from bringing claims for damages against a state or its officials acting in their official capacities unless the state has waived its immunity, or Congress has exercised its power to override that immunity. See Will v. Michigan Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 109 S. Ct. 2304, 105 L. Ed. 2d 45 (1989). With respect to Title VI, Congress has enacted a specific provision abrogating the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity. See 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-7 [74] (a)(1). n21 n21 42 U.S.C. § 2000d-7(a)(1) specifically provides:

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

> A State shall not be immune under the Eleventh Amendment of the Constitution of the United States from suit in Federal court for a violation of section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 [29 U.S.C.A. § 794], title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 [20 U.S.C.A. § 1681 et seq.], the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 [42 U.S.C.A. § 6101 et seq.], title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [42 U.S.C.A. § 2000d et seq.], or the provisions of any other Federal statute prohibiting discrimination by recipients of Federal financial assistance.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - [*835]

In fact, the Board specifically recognizes that Congress has abrogated its Eleventh Amendment immunity with respect to claims under Title VI, and that by accepting federal funds, it has consented to being sued for damages in federal court. (Defs.' 5/3/ 99 Br. at 68). [75] In support of its motion for summary judgment, however, the Board contends that the scope of that agreement does not encompass Plaintiffs' claims because the Board was not on "notice" that its conduct in this case would subject it to liability. (Id. at 68-69). According to the Board, its actions must violate "Clearly established legal principles" for its Eleventh Amendment immunity to be abrogated. (Id.) (emphasis in original).

None of the cases relied upon by the Board, however, support its claim that its Eleventh Amendment immunity cannot be abrogated unless it had notice that its conduct was unconstitutional. In Gebser v. Lago Vista Independent School District, 524 U.S. 274, 118 S. Ct. 1989, 141 L. Ed. 2d 277 (1998), the Supreme Court faced the issue of whether a plaintiff could maintain a cause of action for sexual harassment against a school under Title IX of the Educational Amendments of 1972, 20 U.S.C. § 1681, based upon a theory of respondeat superior or constructive notice. Because the express remedial scheme of Title IX was based upon notice to an appropriate person and an opportunity to rectify the [76] discriminatory behavior, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff could not maintain a cause of action under Title IX based upon a theory of respondeat superior or constructive notice. Id. 524 U.S. at 290-93, 118 S. Ct. at 1999-2000.

Similarly, in Guardians Association v. Civil Service Commission of City of N.Y., 463 U.S. 582, 103 S. Ct. 3221, 77 L. Ed. 2d 866 (1983), the Supreme Court faced the issue of whether a plaintiff could maintain a cause of action under Title VI without showing intentional discrimination on behalf of the defendant. In Guardians, the Supreme Court ultimately held that intent was not an essential element of a Title VI violation, but "a plaintiff should recover only injunctive, noncompensatory relief for a defendant's unintentional violations of Title VI." Id. 463 U.S. at 607, 103 S. Ct. at 3235. Each of these cases addressed the requisite showing a plaintiff must make to sustain a claim under the respective federal statute, not whether a state's Eleventh Amendment immunity could be abrogated where the state has not been put on "notice" that the specific conduct alleged to be a violation of federal law was illegal. [77]

The Supreme Court has referred to § 2000d as an "unequivocal waiver" of the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity. See Lane v. Pena, 518 U.S. 187, 198, 116 S. Ct. 2092, 2099, 135 L. Ed. 2d 486 (1996). Furthermore, a number of courts have recognized that with respect to Title VI, Congress has validly abrogated the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity. See, e.g., Fuller v. Rayburn, 161 F.3d 516, 518 (8th Cir. 1998) ("We nevertheless agree with Mr. Fuller that by enacting section 2000d-7, 'Congress abrogated the States' Eleventh Amendment immunity under . . . Title VI.'"); DeKalb County Sch. Dist. v. Schrenko, 109 F.3d 680, 688 (11th Cir. 1997) ("On the other hand, the parties agree that Congress has abolished the states' immunity for causes of action grounded in Title VI."); United States v. Yonkers Bd. of Educ., 893 F.2d 498, 503 (2d Cir. 1990) ("With respect to Title VI, which prohibits, inter alia, racial discrimination in federally assisted programs, Congress has expressly abrogated the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity . . . .").

REV_00259104

Moreover, to the extent that the Board seeks to extend the doctrine of qualified [78] immunity to cover its actions, the Board's arguments must be rejected, as "qualified [*836] immunity is not a defense available to governmental entities, but only to government employees sued in their individual capacity." Johnson v. Outboard Marine Corp., 172 F.3d 531, 535 (8th Cir. 1999); see also Rodriguez v. City of New York, 72 F.3d 1051, 1065 (2d Cir. 1995) ("The defense of qualified immunity protects only individual defendants sued in their individual capacity, not governmental entities."); Hill v. Dekalb Reg'l Youth Det. Ctr., 40 F.3d 1176, 1185 (11th Cir. 1994) ("Governmental entities are not entitled to qualified immunity regarding section 1983 claims.").

By enacting § 2000d, Congress validly abrogated the states' Eleventh Amendment immunity with respect to Title VI claim. Therefore, although the Board remains free to assert that Plaintiffs have failed to set forth a proper case under Title VI, the Eleventh Amendment does not bar Plaintiffs' claims for damages. Accordingly, the Board's motion for summary judgment with respect to Plaintiffs' Title VI claim shall be denied.

Conclusion

For the reasons stated above, Plaintiffs' [79] motion for summary judgment is granted with respect to the LSA's admissions programs in existence from 1995 through 1998, and the admissions programs for such years are declared unconstitutional. However, the University Defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted with respect to the LSA's admissions programs for 1999 and 2000. Furthermore, Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief is denied. Defendants Duderstadt and Bollinger's motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity is granted. The Board of Regent's motion for summary judgment on grounds of Eleventh Amendment immunity, however, is denied.

An Order consistent with this Opinion shall issue.

PATRICK J. DUGGAN

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Date: December 13, 2000

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : District Court Cases - By Circuit : US District Court Cases - 6th Circuit
Terms: bakke and hopwood (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Wednesday, March 28, 2001 - 9:19 AM EST

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

Governments : Local Governments : Education

Since Bakke, no United State Supreme Court decision has explicitly accepted the diversity rationale under strict scrutiny, however, that is not to say that under recent Supreme Court precedent, the diversity interest can never constitute a compelling state interest, especially in the context of higher education.

Constitutional Law : Fundamental Freedoms

Governments : Local Governments : Education

Academic freedom, though not a specifically enumerated constitutional right, long has been viewed as a special concern of the U.S. Const. amend. I. This "freedom" has always been viewed as including the freedom of the university to make its own judgments as to education, including the selection of its student body.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Applicable United States Supreme Court precedent has never held squarely and unequivocally either that remedying the effects of past discrimination is the only compelling state interest that can ever justify racial classification, or conversely that achieving diversity in the student body of a public graduate or professional school can never be a compelling governmental interest.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

If presented with sufficient evidence regarding the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body, there is nothing barring the court from determining that such benefits are compelling under strict scrutiny analysis.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Governments : Local Governments : Education

Unlike the remedial setting, diversity in higher education, by its very nature, is a permanent and ongoing interest. Diversity is not a remedy.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Governments : Local Governments : Education

A university's interest in achieving the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body does not justify an admissions program designed to admit a predetermined number or proportion of minority students. Instead, a university must carefully design its system to fall between these two competing ends of the spectrum, i.e., between a system that completely fails to achieve a meaningful degree of diversity, under which the benefits associated with a diverse student body will never be realized, and a rigid quota system, which is clearly unconstitutional.

Governments : Local Governments : Education

In striving to achieve a diverse student body, race or ethnic background may be deemed a plus in a particular applicant's file, as long as this plus does not insulate the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats.

Constitutional Law : Substantive Due Process : Equal Protection : Race

Governments : State & Territorial Governments : Education

Universities are not required to accord the same weight to race as they do other factors. As long as the admissions program does not work to isolate the applicants from review, it withstands constitutional muster, despite the fact that it may provide individuals with a "plus" on account of their race.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

Under the qualified immunity doctrine, government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. The question of whether qualified immunity attaches to an official's actions is a purely legal question for the trial judge to determine prior to trial.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

In order to determine whether an official is entitled to qualified immunity, a court must first consider, whether, based on the applicable law, a constitutional violation occurred.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

In a determination of qualified immunity, the court must determine whether the constitutional violation involved clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. In determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established, a district court must find binding precedent by the United States Supreme Court, its court of appeals, or itself.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

To defeat a claim of qualified immunity, a plaintiff must show that defendant knew or reasonably should have known that their actions were unconstitutional. The unlawfulness must be apparent.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

The qualified immunity standard gives ample room for mistaken judgment by protecting all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.

Constitutional Law : State Autonomy

U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity bars plaintiffs from bringing claims for damages against a state or its officials acting in their official capacities unless the state has waived its immunity, or Congress has exercised its power to override that immunity. With respect to Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, Congress has enacted a specific provision abrogating the states' U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity. 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d-7 (a)(1).

Constitutional Law : State Autonomy

The United States Supreme Court has referred to Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d as an "unequivocal waiver" of the states' U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity. Furthermore, a number of courts have recognized that with respect to Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, Congress has validly abrogated the states' U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity.

Constitutional Law : Civil Rights Enforcement : Official Immunities

Qualified immunity is not a defense available to governmental entities, but only to government employees sued in their individual capacity.

Constitutional Law : State Autonomy

By enacting Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.S. § 2000d, Congress validly abrogated the states' U.S. Const. amend. XI immunity with respect to Title VI claims.

COUNSEL: [1] For JENNIFER GRATZ, PATRICK HUMACHER, plaintiffs: Kerry L. Morgan, Pentiuk & Couvreur, Taylor, MI. David F. Herr, Mason, Edelman, Minneapolis, MN.

For EBONY PATTERSON, RUBEN MARTINEZ, LAURENT CRENSHAW, KARLA R. WILLIAMS, LARRY BROWN, TIFFANY HALL, KRISTEN M.J. HARRIS, MICHAEL SMITH, KHYLA CRAINE, NYAH CARMICHAEL, SHANNA DUBOSE, EBONY DAVIS, NICOLE BREWER, KARLA HARLIN, BRIAN HARRIS, KATRINA GIPSON, CANDICE B.N. REYNOLDS, CITIZENS FOR AFFIRMATIVE ACTIONS'S PRESERVATION, appellants: Godfrey J. Dillard, Detroit, MI.

For LEE BOLLINGER, JAMES T. DUDERSTADT, defendants: Philip J. Kessler. John A. Payton, John H. Pickering, NOT ADMITTED, Wilmer, Cutler, Washington, DC. Leonard M. Niehoff. Jane Sherburne, Wilmer, Cutler, Washington, DC.

For UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN, UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN COLLEGE OF LITERATURE, ARTS AND SCIENCE, defendants: Philip J. Kessler, Leonard M. Niehoff.

For COLLEGE ENTRANCE EXAMINATION BOARD, movant: Richard A. Wilhelm, Dickinson, Wright, Bloomfield Hills, MI.

For JENNIFER M. GRANHOLM, movant: Susan I. Leffler, Michigan Department of Attorney General, Habeas Corpus Division, Lansing, MI.

For NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SCHOLARS, movant: Oscar [2] M. Garibaldi, NOT ADMITTED, Keith A. Noreika, NOT ADMITTED, Covington, Burling, Washington, DC. Brice M. Clagett, NOT ADMITTED, Covington & Burling, Washington, DC.

For GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION, movant: Kenneth Geller, PENDING APP., Mayer, Brown, Washington, DC.

For STEELCASE, INCORPORATED, movant: Jeffrey S. Silver, Randall E. Mehrberg, NOT ADMITTED, Jenner & Block, Chicago, IL. Deanne E. Maynard, NOT ADMITTED, Shilpa S. Satoskar, NOT ADMITTED, Jenner & Block, Washington, DC. Jon D. Botsford, NOT ADMITTED, Dwight K. Hamilton, NOT ADMITTED, Steelcase Inc., Grand Rapids, MI.

For 3M, ABBOTT LABORATORIES, BANK ONE CORPORATION, E.I. DUPONT DE NEMOURS COMPANY, DOW CHEMICAL COMPANY, EASTMAN KODAK COMPANY, ELI LILLY AND COMPANY, GENERAL MILLS, INCORPORATED, INTEL CORPORATION, JOHNSON AND JOHNSON, KELLOGG COMPANY, KPMG INTERNATIONAL, LUCENT TECHNOLOGIES, INCORPORATED, MICROSOFT CORPORATION, PPG INDUSTRIES, INCORPORATED, PROCTER AND GAMBLE COMPANY, SARA LEE CORPORATION, TEXACO, INCORPORATED, TRW, INCORPORATED, movants: Jeffrey S. Silver, Jenner & Block, Chicago, IL.

JUDGES: PATRICK J. DUGGAN, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

OPINIONBY: PATRICK J. DUGGAN

OPINION: [*813]

HON. PATRICK J. DUGGAN

[3] OPINION

On October 14, 1997, Plaintiffs filed a class action against the University of [*814] Michigan and various university officials asserting that the University's College of Literature, Science, and the Arts ("LSA") had violated Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, as well as the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, by considering race as a factor in admissions decisions. Plaintiffs seek injunctive, declaratory, and monetary relief.

On December 23, 1998, this Court issued an Order bifurcating the action into a "liability" and "damages" phase. This matter is currently before the Court on cross-motions for summary judgment with respect to the "liability" phase only, which has been previously defined as "whether Defendants' use of race as a factor in admissions decisions violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution," n1 and has been specifically limited to Plaintiffs' request for injunctive and declaratory relief. n2 Oral argument was heard on November 16, 2000.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n1 Because Title VI "proscribe[s] only those racial classifications that would violate the Equal Protection Clause," it is not necessary for the Court to engage in a separate analysis regarding Plaintiffs' claims under Title VI. Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 287, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 2746, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 (1978). [4] n2 In the same Order, this Court certified a class consisting of:

> Those individuals who applied for and were not granted admission to the College of Literature, Science & the Arts of the University of Michigan for all academic years from 1995 forward and who are members of those racial or ethnic groups, including Caucasian, that defendants treated less favorably on the basis of race in considering their application for admission.

(12/23/98 Op. at 15).

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

For the reasons set forth herein:

> Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment shall be granted with respect to the LSA's admissions programs in existence from 1995 through 1998, and the admissions programs for such years shall be declared unconstitutional;
>
> The University Defendants' motion for summary judgment shall be granted with respect to the LSA's admissions programs for 1999 and 2000;
>
> Plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief shall be denied;
>
> Defendants Duderstadt and Bollinger's motion for summary judgment on grounds of qualified immunity shall be granted; and
>
> The Board of Regent's motion for summary [5] judgment on grounds of Eleventh Amendment immunity shall be denied. n3

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n3 This Opinion and its corresponding order shall address only the University Defendants' arguments regarding diversity. The Intervenor-Defendants' arguments regarding remedial measures shall be addressed in a supplemental opinion and order.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Background

The University of Michigan ("University") is a public institution of higher education located in Ann Arbor, Michigan. According to Defendants, admission to the University is selective, meaning that many more students apply each year than can be admitted. The University received some 13,500 applications for admission to the LSA in 1997, from which it elected to enroll 3,958 freshmen. Among its stated admissions objectives, the University strives to compose a class of students from diverse races, ethnicities, cultures, and socioeconomic backgrounds. The University views diversity as an integral component of its mission. According to the University, diversity "increase[s] the [6] intellectual vitality of [its] education, scholarship, service, and communal life." (Jt. Summ. Facts at 1). n4 To facilitate the University's goal of diversity, it is undisputed that the LSA employs race as a factor in its admissions decisions.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n4 The parties have provided the Court with a Joint Summary of Undisputed Facts Regarding Admissions Process, which was filed on December 13, 2000.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Plaintiffs Jennifer Gratz and Patrick Hamacher are Caucasion residents of the State of Michigan, both of whom applied for admission into the 1995 and 1997 classes of the LSA, respectively. On January 19, 1995, Plaintiff Gratz was notified that a final decision regarding her admission had been delayed until early to mid [*815] April 1995, as she was considered by the LSA as "well qualified, but less competitive than the students who had been admitted on first review." (Id.). On April 24, 1995, Plaintiff Gratz was notified that the LSA was unable to offer her admission. Thereafter, Plaintiff Gratz enrolled in the University of [7] Michigan at Dearborn, from which she graduated in the spring of 1999.

Similarly, Plaintiff Hamacher was notified on November 19, 1996, that a decision regarding his admission was "postponed" until mid-April of 1997. According to the LSA's letter, a decision regarding Plaintiff Hamacher had been postponed because, "although [his] academic credentials [were] in the qualified range, they [were] not at the level needed for first review admission." (Id. at 2). On April 8, 1997, Plaintiff Hamacher's admissions application was rejected. Thereafter, Plaintiff Hamacher enrolled at Michigan State University.

The Defendant-Intervenors are seventeen African American and Latino students who have applied for, or intend to apply for, admission to the University, joined by the Citizens for Affirmative Action's Preservation, a nonprofit organization whose stated mission is to preserve opportunities in higher education for African American and Latino students in Michigan. According to Defendant-Intervenors, the resolution of this case directly threatens African American and Latino students' access to higher education.

Plaintiffs have filed a motion for summary judgment asserting that the [8] LSA's use of race as a factor in admissions decisions violates Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. § 2000d, and the Equal Protection Clause of the United States Constitution. The University Defendants have filed a cross-motion for summary judgment asserting that the LSA's use of race as a factor in admissions decisions is, as a matter of law, constitutional. Defendant-Intervenors have filed responses to both motions, supporting the University Defendants' assertion that the LSA's admissions policies are constitutional.

Standard of Review

Summary judgment is proper only if there is no genuine issue as to any material fact, thereby entitling the moving party to judgment as a matter of law. Hunter v. Caliber Sys., Inc., 220 F.3d 702, 709 (6th Cir. 2000); see also FED. R. CIV. P. 56(c). There is no genuine issue of material fact for trial unless, by viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to the nonmoving party, a reasonable jury could "return a verdict for that party." Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 106 S. Ct. 2505, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202 (1986). On a motion for summary judgment, [9] the moving party bears the initial responsibility of informing the Court of the basis for its motion and identifying those portions of the record that establish the absence of a material issue of fact. Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 323, 106 S. Ct. 2548, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1986).

Once the moving party has met its burden, the nonmoving party must go beyond the pleadings and come forward with specific facts to show that there is a genuine issue for trial. FED. R. CIV. P. 56(e); Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322-24, 106 S. Ct. at 2552-53. The nonmoving party must do more than show that there is some metaphysical doubt as to the material facts. Pierce v. Commonwealth Life Ins. Co., 40 F.3d 796, 800 (6th Cir. 1994). The nonmoving party must present significant probative evidence in support of its opposition to the motion for summary judgment. Moore v. Philip Morris Co., Inc., 8 F.3d 335, 339-40 (6th Cir. 1993). If, after adequate time for discovery, the party bearing the burden of proof fails to make a showing sufficient to establish an essential element of his claim, summary judgment is appropriate. Celotex, 477 U.S. at 322-24, 106 S. Ct. at 2552-53. [10]

Discussion

As previously mentioned, this phase of the litigation has been explicitly limited to [*816] the issue of "liability," defined as "whether Defendants' use of race as a factor in admissions decisions violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution," as well as Plaintiffs' request for injunctive and declaratory relief. (12/23/98 Op. at 15; 5/1/00 Op. & Order at 4). Specifically, Plaintiffs seek a declaratory judgment that the LSA's admission policies and practices for the academic years 1995 through the present violate Plaintiffs' rights under the Constitution and 42 U.S.C. §§ 1981, 1983, and 2000d. Without such a declaration, Plaintiffs' claims for monetary relief fail. Plaintiffs further seek an order permanently enjoining the LSA from engaging in illegal, racially discriminatory admissions practices in the future.

The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S. CONST., amend. XIV, § 1. The "central mandate" of the Fourteenth Amendment "is racial neutrality in governmental decisionmaking. [11] " Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 904, 115 S. Ct. 2475, 2482, 132 L. Ed. 2d 762 (1995) (citing Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1, 11, 87 S. Ct. 1817, 1823, 18 L. Ed. 2d 1010 (1967); McLaughlin v. Florida, 379 U.S. 184, 191-92, 85 S. Ct. 283, 287-88, 13 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1964)). "The basic principle is straightforward: 'Racial and ethnic distinctions of any sort are inherently suspect and thus call for the most exacting judicial examination.'" Id. (quoting Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 291, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 2748, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 (1978) (Powell, J.)). Accordingly, the Supreme Court has explicitly clarified that "all racial classifications, imposed by whatever federal, state, or local governmental actor, must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. In other words, such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored measures that further compelling governmental interests." Adarand Constructors, Inc. v. Pena, 515 U.S. 200, 227, 115 S. Ct. 2097, 2113, 132 L. Ed. 2d 158 (1995).

Two interests have been asserted in support of the LSA's race conscious [12] admissions policies. The University Defendants assert that the LSA has a compelling interest in the educational benefits that result from having a diverse student body, whereas the Defendant-Intervenors assert that the LSA has a compelling interest in remedying the University's past and current discrimination against minorities. n5 Therefore, the two issues this Court must decide in resolving the parties' motions for summary judgment are: (1) whether Defendants have asserted a compelling governmental interest in support of the LSA's use of race and (2) whether the measures by which the LSA has used race as a factor in admissions decisions were narrowly tailored to serve such interest.

REV_00259084

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

n5 Only the Defendant-Intervenors have asserted that the LSA's admissions policies serve a remedial purpose. The University Defendants have never justified the LSA's race-conscious admissions policies on remedial grounds.

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -End Footnotes- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Both the Plaintiffs and the University Defendants have agreed to the material facts relating to the mechanics [13] of the LSA's admission policies, and that the Court has, in the record currently before it, all the evidence they wish to present. Therefore, both Plaintiffs and the University Defendants agree there is no need for a trial with respect to the issue of whether diversity constitutes a compelling interest under strict scrutiny, and whether the LSA's admissions programs were narrowly tailored to achieving that interest, and that, based upon the record before the Court, such issues may be resolved by summary judgment pursuant to Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The Diversity Rationale

Both parties assert that with respect to the University Defendants' "diversity" rationale, the Supreme Court's decision in Regents of the University of California v. [*817] Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 98 S. Ct. 2733, 57 L. Ed. 2d 750 (1978), governs this dispute. In support of their motion for summary judgment, the University Defendants, supported by Defendant-Intervenors and a number of amici, contend that under Justice Powell's decision in Bakke, the University has a compelling governmental interest in the educational benefits that flow from a racially and ethnically diverse [14] student body. The University Defendants also contend that under Bakke, the LSA's admissions policies were properly tailored to achieve the University's stated interest in diversity.

Plaintiffs, however, contend that Justice Powell's decision in Bakke has never garnered a majority of support from the Justices and that subsequent Supreme Court cases have confirmed that "diversity" and "academic freedom" are not compelling governmental interests that can ever justify the use of race in the admissions process. In the alternative, Plaintiffs contend that even if this Court were to find "diversity" to be a sufficiently compelling interest, they are nonetheless entitled to summary judgment because the manner in which the LSA used race in admissions decisions for the years at issue in this case, 1995 through the present, is inconsistent with that specifically endorsed by Justice Powell in Bakke.

1. The "Bakke" Decision

In Bakke, a rejected applicant challenged the University of California at Davis Medical School's admissions program, which consisted of two systems: a regular admissions system for non-minority applicants, and a special admissions system strictly [15] for minorities. Bakke, 438 U.S. at 273-75, 98 S. Ct. at 2739-40. In contrast to the regular admissions system, the special minority admissions system operated with a separate committee, a majority of whom were members of minority groups. Special applicants were rated by the special committee in a manner similar to the regular admissions system, except that the special applicants did not have to meet the 2.5 minimum GPA applied to non-minority applicants.

Under the university's special admissions system, the special applicants were never compared against the non-minority applicants. The special admissions committee would continue to recommend special applicants for admission until a specific number of minority applicants were admitted, which was predetermined by faculty vote. For example, in 1973 and 1974, sixteen out of the one hundred available seats were reserved for special applicants.

According to the university, its special admissions system served the purposes of: "(i)

REV_00259085

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugn, Brett

Research - Spending Clause Cases

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 2163/2074
9693

Box 51
Folder 2

REV_00259106

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Supreme Court Cases & Materials : US Supreme Court Lawyers' Edition Cases
Terms: ("south dakota" and dole) (Edit Search)

*483 U.S. 203, *; 107 S. Ct. 2793, **;*
1987 U.S. LEXIS 2871, ; 97 L. Ed. 2d 171

♦ Go to Supreme Court Briefs

SOUTH DAKOTA v. DOLE, SECRETARY OF TRANSPORTATION

No. 86-260

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

483 U.S. 203; 107 S. Ct. 2793; 1987 U.S. LEXIS 2871; 97 L. Ed. 2d 171; 55 U.S.L.W. 4971

April 28, 1987, Argued June 23, 1987, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY: [*1]

CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

DISPOSITION: 791 F.2d 628, affirmed.

CASE SUMMARY

PROCEDURAL POSTURE: On certiorari from the United States Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, petitioner challenged ruling that 23 U.S.C.S. § 158, which reduced federal highway funding to states with minimum drinking age below twenty-one, did not violate U.S. Const. amend. XXI, or Congress' spending power, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

OVERVIEW: Petitioner permitted persons nineteen years of age or older to purchase beer pursuant to S.D. Codified Laws § 35-6-27. However, 23 U.S.C.S. § 158 permitted the reduction of federal highway funds otherwise allocable to a state if the state had a minimum drinking age below twenty-one. Petitioner sought a declaratory judgment that § 158 violated Congress' spending power, U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1, and that it violated U.S. Const. amend. XXI. The trial court rejected petitioner's claims, and the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit affirmed. On certiorari, the Court affirmed, holding that: (1) the statute's indirect imposition of a minimum drinking age was a valid exercise of Congress' spending power, reasonably calculated to advance the general welfare and national concern of safe interstate travel; (2) the Twenty-first amendment was not violated as the statute did not induced petitioner to engage in unconstitutional activities.

OUTCOME: Affirmed; the statute's indirect imposition of a minimum drinking age was a valid exercise of Congress' spending power, reasonably calculated to advance the general welfare and national concern of safe interstate travel. The Twenty-first amendment was not violated as the statute did not induce petitioner to engage in unconstitutional activities.

CORE TERMS: spending, Twenty-first Amendment, highway, federal funds, regulation, drinking, general welfare, expenditure, liquor, minimum drinking age, expended, drinking age, interstate, conditional, federal interest, unrelated, commerce power, indirect, safe, condition imposed, regulatory power, sale of liquor, germaneness, conditioned, coercion, withhold, reserved, alcohol, drink, drive a State's social, political, or economic life on the theory that use of the interstate transportation system [24] is somehow enhanced. If, for example, the United States were to condition highway moneys upon moving the state capital, I suppose it might argue that interstate transportation is facilitated by locating local governments in places easily accessible to interstate highways -- or, conversely, that highways might become overburdened if they had to carry traffic to and from the state capital. In my mind, such a relationship is hardly more attenuated than the one which the Court finds supports § 158. Cf. Tr. of Oral Arg. 39 (counsel for the United States conceding that to condition a grant upon adoption of a unicameral legislature would violate the "germaneness" requirement).

REV_00259107

There is a clear place at which the Court can draw the line between permissible and impermissible conditions on federal grants. It is the line identified in the Brief for the [2801] National Conference of State Legislatures et al. as Amici Curiae:

[*216] "Congress has the power to spend for the general welfare, it has the power to legislate only for delegated purposes. . . .

"The appropriate inquiry, then, is whether the spending requirement or prohibition is a condition on a grant or whether [25] it is regulation. The difference turns on whether the requirement specifies in some way how the money should be spent, so that Congress' intent in making the grant will be effectuated. Congress has no power under the Spending Clause to impose requirements on a grant that go beyond specifying how the money should be spent. A requirement that is not such a specification is not a condition, but a regulation, which is valid only if it falls within one of Congress' delegated regulatory powers." Id., at 19-20.

This approach harks back to United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936), the last case in which this Court struck down an Act of Congress as beyond the authority granted by the Spending Clause. There the Court wrote that "there is an obvious difference between a statute stating the conditions upon which moneys shall be expended and one effective only upon assumption of a contractual obligation to submit to a regulation which otherwise could not be enforced." Id., at 73. The Butler Court saw the Agricultural Adjustment Act for what it was -- an exercise of regulatory, not spending, power. The error in Butler was not the [26] Court's conclusion that the Act was essentially regulatory, but rather its crabbed view of the extent of Congress' regulatory power under the Commerce Clause. The Agricultural Adjustment Act was regulatory but it was regulation that today would likely be considered within Congress' commerce power. See, e. g., Katzenbach v. McClung, 379 U.S. 294 (1964); Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942).

While Butler's authority is questionable insofar as it assumes that Congress has no regulatory power over farm production, [*217] its discussion of the spending power and its description of both the power's breadth and its limitations remain sound. The Court's decision in Butler also properly recognizes the gravity of the task of appropriately limiting the spending power. If the spending power is to be limited only by Congress' notion of the general welfare, the reality, given the vast financial resources of the Federal Government, is that the Spending Clause gives "power to the Congress to tear down the barriers, to invade the states' jurisdiction, and to become a parliament of the whole people, subject to no restrictions [27] save such as are self-imposed." United States v. Butler, supra, at 78. This, of course, as Butler held, was not the Framers' plan and it is not the meaning of the Spending Clause.

Our later cases are consistent with the notion that, under the spending power, the Congress may only condition grants in ways that can fairly be said to be related to the expenditure of federal funds. For example, in Oklahoma v. CSC, 330 U.S. 127 (1947), the Court upheld application of the Hatch Act to a member of the Oklahoma State Highway Commission who was employed in connection with an activity financed in part by loans and grants from a federal agency. This condition is appropriately viewed as a condition relating to how federal moneys were to be expended. Other conditions that have been upheld by the Court may be viewed as independently justified under some regulatory power of the Congress. Thus, in Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448 (1980), the Court upheld a condition on federal grants that 10% of the money be "set aside" for contracts with minority business enterprises. But the Court found that the condition could [28] be justified as a valid regulation [2802] under the commerce power and § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id., at 476, 478. See also Lau v. Nichols, 414 U.S. 563 (1974) (upholding nondiscrimination provisions applied to local schools receiving federal funds).

[*218] This case, however, falls into neither class. As discussed above, a condition that a State will raise its drinking age to 21 cannot fairly be said to be reasonably related to the expenditure of funds for highway construction. The only possible connection, highway safety, has nothing to do with how the funds Congress has appropriated are expended. Rather than a condition determining how federal highway money shall be expended, it is a regulation determining who shall be able to drink liquor. As such it is not justified by the spending power.

Of the other possible sources of congressional authority for regulating the sale of liquor only the commerce power comes to mind. But in my view, the regulation of the age of the purchasers of liquor, just as the regulation of the price at which liquor may be sold, falls squarely within the scope of those powers reserved to the [29] States by the Twenty-first Amendment. Capital Cities Cable, Inc. v. Crisp, 467 U.S. 691, 716 (1984). As I emphasized in 324 Liquor Corp. v. Duffy, 479 U.S. 335, 356 (1987) (dissenting opinion):

"The history of the Amendment strongly supports Justice Black's view that the Twenty-first Amendment was intended to return absolute control of the liquor trade to the States, and that the Federal Government could not use its Commerce Clause powers to interfere in any manner with the States' exercise of the power conferred by the Amendment."

Accordingly, Congress simply lacks power under the Commerce Clause to displace state regulation of this kind. Ibid.

The immense size and power of the Government of the United States ought not obscure its fundamental character. It remains a Government of enumerated powers. McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 405 (1819). Because 23 U. S. C. § 158 (1982 ed., Supp. III) cannot be justified as an exercise of any power delegated to the Congress, it is not authorized by the Constitution. The Court errs in holding it to be the law of the land, and I respectfully dissent.

Source: All Sources : Federal Legal - U.S. : Supreme Court Cases & Materials : US Supreme Court Lawyers' Edition Cases
Terms: ("south dakota" and dole) (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Sunday, April 22, 2001 - 3:41 PM EDT

About LEXIS-NEXIS | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2001 LEXIS-NEXIS Group. All rights reserved.

CORE CONCEPTS - ◆ Hide Concepts

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
See U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
Incident to its power under U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1, Congress may attach conditions on the receipt of federal funds, and has repeatedly employed the power to further broad policy objectives by conditioning receipt of federal moneys upon compliance by the recipient with federal statutory and administrative directives.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
The power of Congress to authorize expenditure of public moneys for public purposes is not limited by the direct grants of legislative power found in the Constitution. Thus, objectives not thought to be within U.S. Const. art I's enumerated legislative fields, may nevertheless be attained through the use of the spending power and the conditional grant of federal funds.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
The spending power granted to Congress under U.S. Const. art. I, § 8, cl. 1 is of course not unlimited, but is instead subject to several general restrictions. The first of these limitations is derived from the language of the Constitution itself: the exercise of the spending power must be in pursuit of the general welfare.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
In considering whether a particular expenditure is intended to serve general public purposes, courts should defer substantially to the judgment of Congress.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
If Congress desires to condition the States' receipt of federal funds, it must do so unambiguously enabling the States to exercise their choice knowingly, cognizant of the consequences of their participation.

Constitutional Law : Congressional Powers & Duties : Spending & Taxation
