Throughout most of the 19th century, the accounting officers consisted of a series of comptrollers and auditors. Starting in 1817 with two comptrollers and four auditors, the number increased until, for the second half of the century, there were three co-equal comptrollers (First Comptroller, Second Comptroller, Commissioner of Customs) and six auditors (First Auditor, Second Auditor, etc.), all officials of the Treasury Department. The jurisdiction of the comptrollers and auditors was divided generally along departmental lines, with the auditors examining accounts and submitting their settlements to the appropriate comptroller.

The practice of rendering written decisions goes back at least to 1817. However, very little of this material exists in published form. (Until sometime after the Civil War, the decisions were handwritten.)

[38]Decisions, especially the earlier ones, frequently refer to the "accounting officers of the government." While this language has fallen into disuse in recent decades, its purpose was to distinguish those matters within the jurisdiction of the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office from those matters within the jurisdiction of the "law officers of the government," i.e., the Attorney General and the Department of Justice.

There are no published decisions of the First Comptroller prior to the term of William Lawrence (1880–1885). Lawrence published his decisions in a series of 6 annual volumes. After Lawrence's decisions, a gap of 9 years followed until First Comptroller Robert Bowler published a single unnumbered volume of his 1893-94 decisions.[39]

The decisions of the Second Comptroller and the Commissioner of Customs were never published. However, volumes of digests of decisions of the Second Comptroller were published starting in 1852. The first volume, unnumbered, saw three cumulative editions, the latest issued in 1869 and including digests for the period 1817–1869. Three additional volumes (designated volumes 2, 3, and 4) were published in 1884, 1893, and 1899 (the latter being published several years after the office had ceased to exist), covering respectively the periods 1869-84, 1884-93, and 1893-94.[40]

Thus, material available in permanent form from this period consists of Lawrence's 6 volumes, Bowler's single volume, and 4 volumes of Second Comptroller digests.

b. 1894–1921: Comptroller of the Treasury

In 1894, Congress enacted the so-called Dockery Act, actually a part of the general appropriation act for 1895 (28 Stat. 162, 205), which consolidated the functions of the First and Second Comptrollers and the Commissioner of Customs into the newly created Comptroller of the Treasury. (The title was a reversion to one which had been used before 1817.) The 6 auditors remained, with different titles, but their settlements no longer had to be automatically submitted to the Comptroller.

The Dockery Act included a provision requiring the Comptroller of the Treasury to render decisions upon the request of an agency head or a disbursing officer. (Certifying officers did not exist back then.) Although this was to a large extent a codification of existing practice, it gave increased significance to the availability of the [39]Citations to these are rarely encountered, and we have observed no consistent citation format, except that the First Comptroller's name is always included to prevent confusion with the later Comptroller of the Treasury series. Example: 5 Lawrence, First Comp. Dec. 408 (1884).

[40]Digests are numbered consecutively within each volume. Citations should specify the digest number rather than the page number since several digests appear on each page. Example: 4 Dig. Second Comp. Dec. ¶ 35 (1893). Without the text of the decisions themselves, the digests are of primarily historical interest.

decisions. Accordingly, the first Comptroller of the Treasury (Robert Bowler, who had been First Comptroller when the Dockery Act passed) initiated the practice of publishing an annual volume of decisions "of such general character as will furnish precedents for the settlements of future accounts." 1 Comp. Dec. iv (1896) (Preface).

The Decisions of the Comptroller of the Treasury series consists of 27 volumes covering the period 1894–1921.[41] Comptroller of the Treasury decisions not included in the annual volumes exist in bound "manuscript volumes," which are now in the custody of the National Archives and are thus unavailable as a practical matter.

c. 1921 to the Present Time

When the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 created the General Accounting Office, the offices of the Comptroller of the Treasury and the 6 Auditors were abolished and their functions transferred to the Comptroller General. Among these functions was the issuance of legal decisions to agency officials concerning the availability and use of appropriated funds. Thus, the decisions GAO issues today reflect the continuing evolution of a body of administrative law on federal fiscal matters dating back to the Nation's infancy. We turn now to a brief description of this function under the stewardship of the Comptroller General.

2. Decisions of the Comptroller General

a. General Information

Certain federal officials are entitled by statute to receive GAO decisions. The Comptroller General renders decisions in advance of payment when requested by disbursing officers, certifying officers, or the head of any department or establishment of the federal government, who may be uncertain whether he or she has authority to make, or authorize the making of, particular payments. 31 U.S.C. § 3529. These, logically, are known as "advance decisions."

Decisions are also provided to disbursing and certifying officers who request review of a settlement of their accounts, and to individual claimants who request review or reconsideration by the [41]These are cited by volume and page number, respectively, and the year of the decision, using the abbreviation "Comp. Dec." Example: 19 Comp. Dec. 582 (1913). There is also a hefty (2,497 pages) volume, published in 1920, of digests of decisions appearing in volumes 1–26.

Comptroller General of settlements made by an agency disallowing their claims in whole or in part. In addition, the Comptroller General may, in his discretion, render decisions or legal opinions to other individuals or organizations, both within and outside the government.

A decision is binding on the executive branch[42] and on the Comptroller General himself,[43] but is not binding on a private party who, if dissatisfied, retains whatever recourse to the courts he would otherwise have had. There is no legal requirement for the private party to come to GAO, under the doctrine of exhaustion of administrative remedies, before seeking judicial resolution.

There is no specific procedure for requesting a decision from the Comptroller General. A simple letter is usually sufficient. The request should, however, include all pertinent information or supporting material, and should present any arguments the requestor wishes to have considered.

A request for an advance decision submitted by a certifying officer will usually arise from "a voucher presented . . . for certification." 31 U.S.C. § 3529(a)(2). At one time, GAO insisted that the original voucher accompany the request, and occasionally declined to render the decision if this was not done. See, e.g., 21 Comp. Gen. 1128 (1942). The requirement was eliminated in B-223608, December 19, 1988:

"Consistent with our current practice, submission of the original voucher need not accompany the request for an advance decision. Accordingly, in the future, the original voucher should be retained in the appropriate finance office. A photocopy accompanying the request for decision will be sufficient. Language to the contrary in prior decisions may be disregarded."

[42]See United States ex rel. Skinner & Eddy Corp. v. McCarl, 275 U.S. 1, 4 n.2 (1927); St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Ry. Co. v. United States, 268 U.S. 169, 174 (1925); United States v. Standard Oil Co. of California, 545 F.2d 624, 637-38 (9th Cir. 1976); Burkley v. United States, 185 F.2d 267, 272 (7th Cir. 1950); United States ex rel. Steacy-Schmidt Mfg. Co. v. Globe Indemnity Co., 66 F.2d 302, 303 (3d Cir. 1933); United States ex rel. Brookfield Construction Co. v. Stewart, 234 F. Supp. 94, 99–100 (D.D.C. 1964); Pettit v. United States, 488 F.2d 1026, 1031 (Ct. Cl. 1973); 54 Comp. Gen. 921 (1975); 45 Comp. Gen. 335, 337 (1965). An exception is decisions on bid protests under the Competition in Contracting Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 3551–56, which by law have been designated as advisory only. See Ameron, Inc. v. Corps of Engineers, 809 F.2d 979 (3d Cir. 1986).

Even if no voucher is submitted, GAO will most likely render the decision notwithstanding the absence of a voucher if the question is of general interest and appears likely to recur. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 652 (1976); 53 Comp. Gen. 429 (1973); 53 Comp. Gen. 71 (1973); 52 Comp. Gen. 83 (1972).

An involved party or agency may request reconsideration of a decision. The standard applied is whether the request demonstrates error of fact or law (e.g., B-184062, July 6, 1976) or presents new information not considered in the earlier decision. While the Comptroller General gives precedential weight to prior decisions,[44] a decision may be modified or overruled by a subsequent decision. In overruling its decisions, GAO tries to follow the approach summarized by the Comptroller of the Treasury in a 1902 decision:

"I regret exceedingly the necessity of overruling decisions of this office heretofore made for the guidance of heads of departments and the protection of paying officers, and fully appreciate that certainty in decisions is greatly to be desired in order that uniformity of practice may obtain in the expenditure of the public money, but when a decision is made not only wrong in principle but harmful in its workings, my pride of decision is not so strong that when my attention is directed to such decision I will not promptly overrule it. It is a very easy thing to be consistent, that is, to insist that the horse is 16 feet high, but not so easy to get right and keep right." 8 Comp. Dec. 695, 697 (1902).

The more significant decisions or those with wide applicability are published annually in hardbound volumes entitled Decisions of the Comptroller General. Because GAO is limited by statute to one published volume each year,[45] most decisions are unpublished. They are, however, readily available to other government agencies and to the public. There is no legal distinction between a published decision and an unpublished decision. 28 Comp. Gen. 69 (1948). Major points in a decision are summarized in one or more digests, which now appear as headnotes preceding both published and unpublished decisions.[46]

[44]It is a general principle of administrative law that an agency rendering administrative decisions should follow its own decisions or give a reasoned explanation for departure. See, e.g., Doubleday Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 655 F.2d 417, 422-23 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

[45]44 U.S.C. § 1311. This statute originated in 1882 (22 Stat. 391), shortly after First Comptroller Lawrence started publishing his decisions.

[46]While the digest is thus an integral part of a legal decision, it should be noted that language in a headnote or digest is only a paraphrase or summary, and cannot be relied upon in preference to the text of the decision itself. 56 Comp. Gen. 275 (1977).

Informal opinions expressed by GAO officers or employees are meant to be helpful but are in no way controlling on any subsequent formal or official determinations by the Comptroller General. 56 Comp. Gen. 768, 773-74 (1977); 31 Comp. Gen. 613 (1952); 29 Comp. Gen. 335 (1950); 12 Comp. Gen. 207 (1932); 4 Comp. Gen. 1024 (1925).

b. Note on Citations

Published decisions of the Comptroller General—those printed in the annual Decisions of the Comptroller General volumes—are cited by volume, page number on which the decision begins, and the year. Example: 31 Comp. Gen. 350 (1952). Unpublished decisions are cited by file number and date, for example, B-193282, December 21, 1978. The present file numbering system ("B-numbers") has been in use since January 1939. From 1924 through 1938, file numbers had an "A" prefix.[47] Decisions selected for publication but for which page numbers have not yet been assigned are cited as follows: 69 Comp. Gen. ___(B-123456, April 1, 1990).

Since GAO developed its decision format in 1974, decisions, both published and unpublished, include a " Matter of" caption. Especially where the caption is the name of an individual or business entity, it is sometimes included as part of the citation. Example: Lynne Gweeney, 65 Comp. Gen. 760 (1986). We have chosen not to do so in this publication.

c. Matters Not Considered

There are a number of areas in which, as a matter of law or policy, the Comptroller General will generally decline to render a decision.

In the first category are questions concerning which the determination of another agency is by law "final and conclusive." Examples are determinations on the merits of a claim against another agency under the Federal Tort Claims Act (28 U.S.C. § 2672) or the Military Personnel and Civilian Employees' Claims Act of 1964 (31 U.S.C. § 3721). Another example is a decision by the Secretary of Veterans Affairs on a claim for veterans' benefits (38 U.S.C. § 211(a)). See 56 [47]Cases prior to 1924 were classified according to type into one of four categories: advance decision (A.D. 1234), review decision (Review No. 2345), division memorandum (D.M. 3456), or appeal (Appeal No. 4567). In addition, some of the earliest decisions have no file designation. These must be cited by reference to the "manuscript volume" in which the decision appears. (These are volumes maintained by GAO primarily for internal purposes, containing the written product of the Office of General Counsel for a given month in chronological sequence.) Example: unpublished decision of September 1, 1921, 1 MS Comp. Gen. 712.

Comp. Gen. 587, 591 (1977); B-226599.2, November 3, 1988 (non-decision letter).

In addition, GAO has traditionally declined to render decisions in a number of areas which are specifically within the jurisdiction of some other agency and concerning which GAO would not be in the position to make authoritative determinations, even though the other agency's determination is not statutorily "final and conclusive." Thus, GAO will not "decide" whether a given action violates a provision of the Criminal Code (18 U.S.C.) since this is within the jurisdiction of the Justice Department and the courts.[48] If the use of public funds is an element of the alleged violation, the extent of GAO's involvement will be to determine if appropriated funds were in fact used and to refer the matter to the Justice Department if deemed appropriate or if requested to do so.[49]

Other examples of areas where GAO has declined to render decisions are antitrust law;[50] political activities of federal employees under the Hatch Act;[51] and determinations as to what is or is not taxable under the Internal Revenue Code.[52]

Apart from preparing litigation reports if requested by the Justice Department, GAO will generally not render an opinion on an issue which is the subject of current litigation, especially if the Comptroller General finds the matter unduly speculative, except on stipulation of the parties or unless the court expresses an interest in receiving GAO's opinion.[53] Particular circumstances may dictate an

For examples of cases where GAO's opinion was requested by a court, see 56 Comp. Gen. 768 (1977) and B-186494, July 22, 1976. Also, under 28 U.S.C. § 2507, the United States Claims Court may issue a "call" upon GAO (or any other agency) for comments on a particular issue or for other information.

exception. E.g., 67 Comp. Gen. 553 (1988), where GAO was essentially elaborating on a prior decision on an appropriations issue which had not been addressed by the court and where the agency had informed the court that it had requested GAO's opinion. GAO's policy with respect to issues which are the subject of agency administrative proceedings is generally similar to its litigation policy. 4 C.F.R. § 22.8. See also B-231838, January 4, 1989 (declining to render an opinion on the propriety of an attorney's fee award being considered by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission).

Another long-standing GAO policy concerns the constitutionality of acts of Congress. As an agent of the Congress, GAO has always considered it inappropriate to question the constitutionality of duly enacted statutes. In other words, GAO presumes the constitutionality of all federal laws unless or until the courts say otherwise.[54] GAO will, however, express its opinion, upon the request of a Member or committee of Congress, on the constitutionality of a bill prior to enactment. E.g., B-228805, September 28, 1987.

d. Research Aids

For anyone without ready access to the research facilities in GAO's main building in Washington, D.C., researching GAO decisions has never been particularly easy, especially in view of the large proportion of unpublished material. In recent years, some of the computerized legal research systems (e.g., Juris, Lexis, Westlaw) have started including some GAO materials. In addition, GAO's procurement decisions are published commercially, and some of the commercial "newsletter" services, especially in the areas of contracts and grants, include summaries of relevant GAO issuances. This publication, we hope, will also make the job easier.

In addition to this publication, GAO's Office of General Counsel publishes several other items dealing with areas in which the Office has developed special expertise. These publications include:

- Civilian Personnel Law Manual
  Title I – Compensation
  Title II – Leave

Except for matters perceived as involving conflicts between the prerogatives of the executive and legislative branches, the Attorney General has expressed a similar policy. 39 Op. - Military Personnel Law Manual
- Bid Protests at GAO: A Descriptive Guide (4th ed. 1991) (no case citations but a useful summary together with full text of GAO's bid protest regulations).

GAO also furnishes a telephone research service for government agencies and members of the public at no charge. While this service does not provide callers with legal analysis, it can provide the following types of information:

- whether an issue has been considered by GAO. (This is limited to GAO's legal decisions and opinions. It does not include audit reports.)
- citations to decisions of the Comptroller General involving a particular issue.
- whether a decision of the Comptroller General has been modified, overruled, or cited in subsequent decisions.

The telephone research service may be reached on (202) 275–5028. Copies of decisions for which a file number and date are known may be obtained, free of charge, by calling (202) 275–6241.

In addition to the annual Decisions of the Comptroller General volumes, GAO's Office of General Counsel publishes other reference material, which includes:

- Monthly "advance sheet" pamphlets of decisions (full text) to be included in the next hardbound volume.
- Monthly pamphlets entitled Digests of Decisions of the Comptroller General of the United States. Prior to October 1989, these pamphlets, under a slightly different name, included digests only of unpublished decisions. Now they include digests of published decisions as well.
- Index Digest volumes covering the published decisions. These hardbound volumes are now published at 5–year intervals. The most recent, the tenth in the series, covers the period October 1, 1981 through September 30, 1986.

In addition to these current materials, there is also a hardbound index volume, published in 1931, covering the 27 Comptroller of the Treasury volumes and the first 8 volumes of GAO decisions, and

3. Other Relevant Authorities

a. GAO Materials

GAO expresses its positions in many forms. Most of the GAO materials cited in this publication are decisions of the Comptroller General, published and unpublished. While these constitute the most significant body of GAO positions on legal issues, the editors have also included, as appropriate, citations to the following items:

(1) Legal opinions to Congress—As noted above, GAO prepares many legal opinions at the request of congressional committees or individual Members of Congress. Congressional opinions are prepared in letter rather than decision format, but if signed by the Comptroller General or his delegate, they have the same weight and effect. The citation form is identical to that for decisions, and some are now published in the annual Decisions of the Comptroller General volumes. As a practical matter, except where specifically identified in the text, the reader will not be able to distinguish between a decision and a congressional opinion based on the form of the citation.

(2) Office memoranda—Legal questions are frequently presented by other divisions or offices within GAO. The response is in the form of an internal memorandum, formerly signed by the Comptroller General, but now, for the most part, signed by the General Counsel or someone on the General Counsel's staff. The citation is the same as for an unpublished decision, except that the suffix "O.M." (Office Memorandum) has traditionally been added. More recent material tends to omit the suffix, in which case our practice in this publication is to identify the citation as a memorandum to avoid confusion with decisions. Office memoranda are generally not cited in decisions. Technically, an office memorandum is not a decision of the Comptroller General as provided in 31 U.S.C. § 3529, does not have the same legal or precedential effect, and should never be cited as a decision. See, e.g., A-10786, May 23, 1927. Notwithstanding these limitations, we have included selected citations to

GAO office memoranda, particularly where they provide guidance in the absence of formal decisions on a given point or contain useful research or discussion.

(3) Audit reports—A GAO audit report is cited by its title, date of issuance, and a numerical designation. Up to the mid-1970's, the same file numbering system was used as in decisions ("B-numbers"). Now, the designation for an audit report consists of the initials of the issuing division, the fiscal year, and the report number, although a "B-number" is also assigned. Reports are numbered sequentially within each fiscal year. Thus, the first report issued by the General Government Division for FY 1990 would be designated "GAO/GGD-90-1." Certain types of reports are further designated by a letter suffix attached to the report number (e.g., BR for briefing report, FS for fact sheet). The names of audit divisions are subject to change over time as reorganizations occur, so the initials in a particular citation may not correspond to an existing audit division at any given time.

Several audit reports are cited throughout this publication either as authority for some legal proposition or to provide sources of additional information to supplement the discussion in the text. To prevent confusion stemming from different citation formats used over the years, our practice in this publication is to always identify an audit report as a "GAO report" in the text, in addition to the citation.

As required by 31 U.S.C. § 719(h), GAO issues monthly and annual lists of reports. In addition, GAO occasionally prepares bibliographies of reports and decisions in a given subject area (food, land use, etc.). GAO reports may be obtained by calling (202) 275–6241.

In addition to the reports themselves, GAO publishes a number of pamphlets and other documents relating to its audit function. References to any of these will be fully described in the text where they occur.

(4) Non-decision letters — These are letters, signed by some subordinate official, usually to an individual or organization who has requested information or who has requested a legal opinion but is not entitled by law to a formal decision. Their purpose is basically to convey information rather than resolve a legal issue. Several of these are cited in this publication, either because they offer a particularly clear statement of some policy or position, or to supplement the material found in the decisions. Each is identified parenthetically. The citation form is otherwise identical to an unpublished decision. As with the office memoranda, these are not decisions of the Comptroller General and do not have the same legal or precedential effect.

(5) Circular letters—A circular letter is a letter addressed simply to the "Heads of Federal Departments and Agencies" or to "Federal Certifying and Disbursing Officers." It is distributed automatically to all federal agencies on GAO's distribution list. Circular letters, although not common, are used for a variety of purposes and may emanate from a particular division within GAO or directly from the Comptroller General. Circular letters which announce significant changes in pertinent legal requirements or GAO audit policy or procedures are occasionally cited in this publication. They are identified as such and often, but not always, bear file designations similar to unpublished decisions.

(6) General Accounting Office Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies—This large looseleaf volume is the official medium through which the Comptroller General issues accounting principles and standards and related material for the development of accounting systems and internal auditing programs, uniform procedures, and regulations governing GAO's relationship with other federal agencies and private parties. It consists of eight titles (U.S. General Accounting Office; Accounting; Audit; Claims; Transportation; Pay, Leave, and Allowances; Fiscal Procedures; Records Management). The titles are revised and updated individually from time to time. In areas of mutual coverage, the Policy and Procedures Manual (particularly titles 4 and 7) is an important complement to Principles of Federal Appropriations Law.

(7) A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27 (3d ed., March 1981)—This is a booklet containing standard definitions of fiscal and budgetary terms developed by GAO in cooperation with the Treasury Department, Office of Management and Budget, and Congressional Budget Office, as required by 31 U.S.C. § 1112(c). Definitions used throughout Principles of Federal Appropriations Law are based on the Glossary unless otherwise noted.

b. Non-GAO Materials

As we have emphasized, the primary focus of this publication is the issuances of the General Accounting Office, particularly legal decisions and opinions. Manifestly, however, various non-GAO authorities require inclusion.

References to legislative materials should be readily recognizable. Citations to the United States Code are to the edition or its supplements current as of the time of publication, unless specified otherwise. We specify the year only when referring to an obsolete edition of the Code. Section numbers and even title numbers may change over the years as a result of amendments or recodifications. For convenience and (we hope) clarity, we have generally used current citations even though the referenced decision may have used an older obsolete citation. Where the difference is significant, it will be noted in the text.

We have also included relevant decisions and opinions of other administrative agencies, primarily the Department of Justice, although our research in these areas has not been exhaustive. The Attorney General renders legal opinions pursuant to various provisions of law. E.g., 28 U.S.C. §§ 511–513. There are two series of published opinions.

Opinions signed by the Attorney General are called "formal opinions," and are published in volumes entitled Official Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States Advising the President and Heads of Departments in Relation to Their Official Duties (cited "Op. Att'y Gen."). The series started in 1852 and now numbers 42 volumes. They are published at irregular intervals.

The second series consists of selected opinions by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, which prepares and issues legal opinions under delegation from the Attorney General. Commencing in 1977, volumes 1–6 of the Opinions of the Office of Legal Counsel have thus far been published. Logically enough, they are cited "Op. Off. Legal Counsel." Given the lengthy intervals in recent decades between volumes of the "formal" Attorney General opinions, these are now included in the OLC volumes as well. We have used a parallel citation format to identify this latter group. Example: 43 Op. Att'y Gen. ___, 4A Op. Off. Legal Counsel 16

(1980). In addition, we have, in consultation with that office, cited a number of OLC opinions issued subsequent to the most recent published volume, some of which may eventually be selected for publication.

A Treasury Department publication cited a number of times is the Treasury Financial Manual, Volume I (formerly known as the Treasury Fiscal Requirements Manual). This, also issued in looseleaf form, is the Treasury Department's detailed procedural guidance on fiscal matters (central accounting and reporting, receipts, disbursements, etc.). The TFM is indispensable for finance personnel.

c. Note on Title 31 Recodification

Many of the key statutes of general applicability that govern the use of appropriated funds are found in Title 31 of the United States Code (U.S.C.). Title 31 was recodified on September 13, 1982 (Pub. L. No. 97-258, 96 Stat. 877). A recodification is intended as a—

> "compilation, restatement, and revision of the general and permanent laws of the United States which conforms to the understood policy, intent, and purpose of the Congress in the original enactments, with such amendments and corrections as will remove ambiguities, contradictions, and other imperfections both of substance and of form . . . ." 2 U.S.C. § 285b(1).

Enactment of a recodification transforms the title into "positive law." A recodified title is legal evidence of the law, and resort to the Statutes at Large for evidentiary purposes is no longer necessary.

The recodification of Title 31 is essentially a restatement in updated form. It is not supposed to make any substantive change in the law. This point is made in the statute itself (Pub. L. No. 97-258, § 4(a), 96 Stat. 1067, 31 U.S.C. note preceding § 101) and in the accompanying report of the House Judiciary Committee (H.R. Rep. No. 97-651, 97th Cong., 2d Sess. 3 (1982)). In addition, the courts will not read a substantive change into a recodification in the absence of evidence that Congress intended a substantive change. E.g., Fourco Glass Co. v. Transmirra Products Corp., 353 U.S. 222, 227 (1957); United States v. Thompson, 319 F.2d 665, 669 (2d Cir. 1963).

Part of the recodification is the repeal of the various source statutes. Thus, the "popular names" of the various pre-1982 laws found in Title 31 no longer exist. To illustrate, section 1 of Pub. L.

No. 88-558, 78 Stat. 767, provided that the act may be cited as the "Military Personnel and Civilian Employees' Claims Act of 1964." Prior to the recodification, Pub. L. No. 88-558 was found in Title 31 at §§ 240–243. The recodification redesignated it as 31 U.S.C. § 3721 (96 Stat. 973), and repealed Pub. L. No. 88-558 (Pub. L. No. 97-258, § 5(b), 96 Stat. 1068, 1080). Therefore, since Pub. L. No. 88-558, including section 1, has been repealed, there is, in a strict technical sense, no longer a "Military Personnel and Civilian Employees' Claims Act of 1964"; there is only a "31 U.S.C. § 3721." Having said this, however, we have continued to use many of the old popular names because they have become so familiar throughout the government that to stop using them would cause more confusion than it is worth. Also, they continue to be listed in the Popular Names index in the United States Code.

The Legal Framework

A. Appropriations and Related Terminology

1. Introduction

The reader will find it useful to have a basic understanding of certain appropriations law terminology that will be routinely encountered throughout this publication. Some of our discussion will draw upon definitions which have been enacted into law for application in various budgetary contexts. Other definitions are drawn from custom and usage in the budget and appropriations process, in conjunction with administrative and judicial decisions.

In addition, 31 U.S.C. § 1112(c), previously noted in Chapter 1, requires the Comptroller General, in cooperation with the Treasury Department, Office of Management and Budget, and Congressional Budget Office, to maintain and publish standard terms and classifications for "fiscal, budget, and program information," giving particular consideration to the needs of the congressional budget, appropriations, and revenue committees. Federal agencies are required by 31 U.S.C. § 1112(d) to use this standard terminology when providing information to Congress.

The terminology developed pursuant to this authority is published in a GAO booklet entitled A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27 (3d ed., March 1981) [hereinafter Glossary]. Unless otherwise noted, the terminology used throughout this publication is based on the Glossary. The following sections present some of the more important terminology in the budget and appropriations process. Many other terms will be defined in the chapters which deal specifically with them.

2. Concept and Types of Budget Authority

Congress finances federal programs and activities by providing "budget authority." Budget authority is a general term referring to various forms of authority provided by law to enter into obligations which will result in immediate or future outlays of government funds. The statutory definition, effective beginning with fiscal year 1992, is:

"The term 'budget authority' means the authority provided by Federal law to incur financial obligations, as follows:

"(i) provisions of law that make funds available for obligation and expenditure (other than borrowing authority), including the authority to obligate and expend the proceeds of offsetting receipts and collections;

"(ii) borrowing authority, which means authority granted to a Federal entity to borrow and obligate and expend the borrowed funds, including through the issuance of promissory notes or other monetary credits;

"(iii) contract authority, which means the making of funds available for obligation but not for expenditure; and

"(iv) offsetting receipts and collections as negative budget authority, and the reduction thereof as positive budget authority

"The term includes the cost for direct loan and loan guarantee programs, as those terms are defined by [the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508, § 13201(a)]." [1]

a. Appropriations

Appropriations are the most common form of budget authority. As we have seen in Chapter 1 in our discussion of the congressional "power of the purse," the Constitution prohibits the withdrawal of money from the Treasury unless authorized in the form of an appropriation enacted by Congress.[2] Thus, funds paid out of the United States Treasury must be accounted for by charging them to an appropriation provided by or derived from an act of Congress.

The term "appropriation" may be defined as:

"An authorization by an act of Congress that permits Federal agencies to incur obligations and to make payments out of the Treasury for specified purposes."[3]

[1]Section 3(2) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, 2 U.S.C. § 622(2), as amended by the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508 (November 5, 1990), §§ 13201(b) and 13211(a), 104 Stat. 1388–614 and 620. Prior to the Congressional Budget Act, the term "obligational authority" was frequently used instead of budget authority.

[2]The Constitution does not specify precisely what assets comprise the "Treasury" of the United States. An important statute in this regard is 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), discussed in detail in Chapter 6, which requires that, unless otherwise provided, a government agency must deposit any funds received from sources other than its appropriations in the general fund of the Treasury, where they are then available to be appropriated as Congress may see fit.

[3]Glossary at 42; Andrus v. Sierra Club, 442 U.S. 347, 359 n.18 (1979). See also 31 U.S.C. §§ 701(2) and 1101(2). The term "authorization" as used in this definition must be distinguished from an "authorization of appropriations" as described in Section C.1.

While other forms of budget authority may authorize the incurring of obligations, the authority to incur obligations by itself is not sufficient to authorize payments from the Treasury. See, e.g., National Association of Regional Councils v. Costle, 564 F.2d 583, 586 (D.C. Cir. 1977); New York Airways, Inc. v. United States, 369 F.2d 743 (Ct. Cl. 1966). Thus, at some point if obligations are paid, they are usually paid by and from an appropriation. Section B.1 of this chapter discusses in more detail precisely what types of statutes constitute appropriations.

Appropriations do not represent cash actually set aside in the Treasury. They represent legal authority granted by Congress to incur obligations and to make disbursements for the purposes, during the time periods, and up to the amount limitations, specified in the appropriation acts.

Appropriations are identified on financial documents by means of "account symbols" which are assigned by the Treasury Department based on the number and types of appropriations an agency receives and other types of funds it may control. An appropriation account symbol is a group of numbers, or a combination of numbers and letters, which identifies the agency responsible for the account, the period of availability of the appropriation, and the specific fund classification. Detailed information on reading and identifying account symbols is contained in the Treasury Financial Manual (I TFM Chapter 2-1500). Specific accounts for each agency are listed in a publication entitled Federal Account Symbols and Titles, issued quarterly as a supplement to the TFM.

b. Contract Authority

Contract authority is a form of budget authority which permits contracts or other obligations to be entered into in advance of an appropriation or in excess of amounts otherwise available in a revolving fund. Glossary at 42. It is to be distinguished from the inherent authority to enter into contracts possessed by every government agency but which is dependent upon the availability of funds.

Contract authority itself is not an appropriation; it provides the authority to enter into binding contracts but not the funds to make payments under them. Therefore, contract authority must be funded (or, in other words, the funds needed to liquidate obligations under the contracts must be provided) by a subsequent appropriation (called a "liquidating appropriation") or by the use of receipts or offsetting collections authorized for that purpose. See B-228732, February 18, 1988; National Association of Regional Councils v. Costle, 564 F.2d 583, 586 (D.C. Cir. 1977); OMB Circular No. A-11, § 14.1(a) (1990); OMB Circular No. A-34, § 21.1 (1985).

Contract authority may be provided in appropriation acts (e.g., B-174839, March 20, 1984) or, more commonly, in other types of legislation (e.g., B-228732, February 18, 1988). Either way, the authority must be specific. 31 U.S.C. § 1301(d). As we noted in Chapter 1, one of the objectives of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 was to provide increased control by the appropriations process over various forms of so-called "backdoor spending" such as contract authority. To this end, legislation providing new contract authority will be subject to a point of order in either the Senate or the House of Representatives unless it also provides that the new authority will be effective for any fiscal year only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation acts. 2 U.S.C. § 651(a).

Contract authority has a "period of availability" analogous to that for an appropriation. Unless otherwise specified, if it appears in an appropriation act in connection with a particular appropriation, its period of availability will be the same as that for the appropriation. If it appears in an appropriation act without reference to a particular appropriation, its period of availability, again unless otherwise specified, will be the fiscal year covered by the appropriation act. 32 Comp. Gen. 29, 31 (1952); B-76061, May 14, 1948; National Association of Regional Councils v. Costle, 564 F.2d 583, 587-88 (D.C. Cir. 1977). This period of availability refers to the time period during which the contracts must be entered into, as distinguished from the duration of the contracts themselves, which is governed by the terms of the legislation granting the authority.

As noted above, appropriations generally constitute budget authority. However, an appropriation to liquidate contract authority is an important exception. Since contract authority itself constitutes new budget authority, an appropriation to liquidate that authority is not counted as new budget authority. This treatment is necessary to avoid counting the amounts twice. B-171630, August 14, 1975.

Since the contracts entered into pursuant to contract authority constitute obligations binding on the United States, Congress has little practical choice but to make the necessary liquidating appropriations. B-228732, February 18, 1988; B-226887, September 17, 1987. As the Supreme Court has put it:

> "The expectation is that appropriations will be automatically forthcoming to meet these contractual commitments. This mechanism considerably reduces whatever discretion Congress might have exercised in the course of making annual appropriations."

Train v. City of New York, 420 U.S. 35, 39 n.2 (1975). A failure or refusal by Congress to make the necessary appropriation would not defeat the obligation, and the party entitled to payment would most likely be able to recover in a lawsuit. E.g., B-211190, April 5, 1983.

c. Borrowing Authority

"Borrowing authority" is statutory authority (in a substantive or appropriation act) that permits a federal agency to incur obligations and to liquidate those obligations out of borrowed moneys.[4] Borrowing authority may consist of (a) authority to borrow from the Treasury (authority to borrow funds from the Treasury that are realized from the sale of public debt securities), (b) authority to borrow directly from the public (authority to sell agency debt securities), (c) authority to borrow from (sell agency debt securities to) the Federal Financing Bank, or (d) some combination of the above.

Borrowing from the Treasury is the most common form and is also known as "public debt financing." As a general proposition, GAO has traditionally expressed a preference for financing through direct appropriations on the grounds that the appropriations process provides enhanced congressional control. E.g., B-141869, July 26, 1961. The Congressional Budget Act met this concern to an extent by requiring generally that new borrowing authority, as with new contract authority, be limited to the extent or amounts provided in appropriation acts. 2 U.S.C. § 651(a). More recently, GAO has recommended that borrowing authority be provided only to those accounts which can generate enough revenue in the form of collections from nonfederal sources to repay their debt. Budget Issues: Agency Authority to Borrow Should be Granted More Selectively, GAO/AFMD-89-4 (September 1989).[5]

[5]If an agency cannot repay with external collections, it must either extend its debt with new borrowings, seek appropriations to repay the debt, or seek to have the debt forgiven by statute. Repayment from external collections is the only alternative that reimburses the Treasury in any meaningful sense. See AFMD-89-4 at 17, 20.

d. Monetary Credits

A type of borrowing authority specified in the expanded definition of budget authority contained in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, is monetary credits. The monetary credit is a relatively uncommon concept in government transactions. At the present time, it exists mostly in a handful of statutes authorizing the government to use monetary credits to acquire property such as land or mineral rights. Examples are the Rattlesnake National Recreation Area and Wilderness Act of 1980, discussed in 62 Comp. Gen. 102 (1982), and the Cranberry Wilderness Act, discussed in B-211306, April 9, 1984.[6]

Under the monetary credit procedure, the government does not issue a check in payment for the acquired property. Instead, it gives the seller "credits" in dollar amounts reflecting the purchase price. The holder may then use these credits to offset or reduce amounts it owes the government in other transactions which may, depending on the terms of the governing legislation, be related or unrelated to the original transaction. The statute may use the term "monetary credit" (as in the Cranberry legislation) or some other designation such as "bidding rights" (as in the Rattlesnake Act). Where this procedure is authorized, the acquiring agency does not need to have appropriations or other funds available to cover the purchase price because no cash disbursement is made. An analogous device authorized for use by the Commodity Credit Corporation is "commodity certificates."[7]

The inclusion of monetary credits as budget authority has the effect of making them subject to the appropriation controls of the Congressional Budget Act, such as the requirements of 2 U.S.C. § 651.

e. Offsetting Receipts

The federal government receives money from numerous sources and in numerous contexts. For budgetary purposes, collections are classified in two major categories, governmental receipts and offsetting collections.[8]

[6]These and other examples are noted in GAO's report, Budget Treatment of Monetary Credits, GAO/AFMD-85-21 (April 8, 1985).

[7]See Farm Payments: Cost and Other Information on USDA's Commodity Certificates, GAO/RCED-87-117BR (March 26, 1987).

[8]See Glossary at 46–49; OMB Circular No. A-11, § 14.1(d) (1990).

Governmental receipts or budget receipts are collections resulting from the government's exercise of its sovereign or regulatory powers. Examples are tax receipts, customs duties, and court fines. Collections in this category are deposited in receipt accounts and are compared against total outlays for purposes of calculating the budget surplus or deficit.

Offsetting collections are collections resulting from business-type or market-oriented activities, such as the sale of goods or services to the public, and intragovernmental transactions. Their budgetary treatment differs from governmental receipts in that they are offset against (deducted from or "netted against") budget authority in determining total outlays. Offsetting collections are also divided into two major categories.

First is offsetting collections credited to appropriation or fund accounts. These are collections which, under specific statutory authority, may be deposited in an appropriation or fund account under the control of the receiving agency, and which are then available for obligation by the agency subject to the purpose and time limitations of the receiving account.

Second is offsetting receipts. Offsetting receipts are offsetting collections which are deposited in a receipt account.[9] For budgetary purposes, these amounts are deducted from budget authority by function or subfunction and by agency.[10]

The Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 first addressed the budgetary treatment of offsetting receipts by adding the authority "to collect offsetting receipts" to the definition of budget authority. The expanded definition in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990 is more explicit. The authority to obligate and expend the proceeds of offsetting receipts and collections is treated as negative budget authority. In addition, the reduction of offsetting receipts or collections (e.g., legislation authorizing [9]This usually means a general fund receipt account (miscellaneous receipts), but also includes amounts deposited in special or trust fund accounts. An example of offsetting receipts deposited in a special receipt account is discussed in B-199216, July 21, 1980.

an agency to forgo certain collections) is treated as positive budget authority.[11]

f. Loan and Loan Guarantee Authority

A loan guarantee is an agreement, authorized by statute, by which the United States pledges to pay part or all of the loan principal and interest to a lender or holder of a security in the event of default by a third-party borrower.[12] The government does not know whether or to what extent it may be required to honor the guarantee until there has been a default. Loan guarantees are contingent liabilities which may not be recorded as obligations until the contingency occurs. See 64 Comp. Gen. 282, 289 (1985) and Chapter 11.

Prior to legislation enacted in November 1990, loan guarantees were expressly excluded from the definition of budget authority. Budget authority was created only when an appropriation to liquidate loan guarantee authority was made.

Statutory reform of the budgetary treatment of federal credit programs came about in two stages. First, the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 added a definition of "credit authority" to the Congressional Budget Act, specifically, "authority to incur direct loan obligations or to incur primary loan guarantee commitments." 2 U.S.C. § 622(10).[13] Any bill, resolution, or conference report providing new credit authority will be subject to a point of order unless the new authority is limited to the extent or amounts provided in appropriation acts. 2 U.S.C. § 652(a).[14]

The second stage was the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990,[15] effective starting with fiscal year 1992. Under this legislation, the [11]This was the intent of the 1985 legislation, as reflected in the conference report (supra note 10), although it had not been expressed in the legislation itself.

[12]Glossary at 64; OMB Circular No. A-11, § 33.2(b) (1990).

[14]This is the same control device we have previously noted for contract authority and borrowing authority. Although loan guarantee authority was not viewed as budget authority in 1985, the apparent rationale was that the control, if it is to be employed, must apply at the authorization stage because the opportunity for control no longer exists by the time liquidating budget authority becomes necessary. An example of a statute including this language is discussed in B-230951, March 10, 1989.

[15]Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508 (November 5, 1990), § 13201(a), 104 Stat. 1388-609.

"cost" of loan and loan guarantee programs is budget authority. "Cost" means the estimated long-term cost to the government of a loan or loan guarantee (defaults, delinquencies, interest subsidies, etc.), calculated on a net present value basis, excluding administrative costs. Except for entitlement programs (the statute notes the guaranteed student loan program and the veterans' home loan guaranty program as examples) and certain Commodity Credit Corporation programs, new loan guarantee commitments may be made only to the extent budget authority to cover their costs is provided in advance or other treatment is specified in appropriation acts. Appropriations of budget authority are to be made to "credit program accounts," and the programs administered from revolving non-budgetary "financing accounts."

The Credit Reform Act reflects the thrust of proposals by GAO, the Office of Management and Budget, the Congressional Budget Office, and the Senate Budget Committee. See GAO report, Budget Issues: Budgetary Treatment of Federal Credit Programs, GAO/AFMD-89-42 (April 1989), which includes a discussion of the "net present value" approach to calculating costs.

3. Some Related Concepts

a. Spending Authority

The Congressional Budget Act of 1974 introduced the concept of "spending authority." The term is a collective designation for authority provided in laws other than appropriation acts to obligate the United States to make payments. It includes, to the extent budget authority is not provided in advance in appropriation acts, permanent appropriations (such as authority to spend offsetting collections), the non-appropriation forms of budget authority described above (e.g., contract authority, borrowing authority, authority to forgo collection of offsetting receipts), entitlement authority, and any other authority to make payments. 2 U.S.C. § 651(c)(2). The different forms of spending authority are subject to varying controls in the budget and appropriations process. For example, as noted previously, proposed legislation providing new contract authority or new borrowing authority will be subject to a point of order unless it limits the new authority to such extent or amounts as provided in appropriation acts.

Further information on spending authority may be found in two 1987 GAO companion reports, one a summary presentation[16] and the other a detailed inventory.[17]

b. Entitlement Authority

Entitlement authority is statutory authority, whether temporary or permanent,

> "to make payments (including loans and grants), the budget authority for which is not provided for in advance by appropriation acts, to any person or government if, under the provisions of the law containing such authority, the United States is obligated to make such payments to persons or governments who meet the requirements established by such law."[18]

Entitlement authority is treated as spending authority during congressional consideration of the budget. In order to make entitlements subject to the reconciliation process, the Congressional Budget Act provides that proposed legislation providing new entitlement authority to become effective prior to the start of the next fiscal year will be subject to a point of order. 2 U.S.C. § 651(b)(1). Entitlement legislation which would require new budget authority in excess of the allocation made pursuant to the most recent budget resolution must be referred to the appropriations committees. Id. § 651(b)(2).

4. Types of Appropriations

Appropriations are classified in different ways for different purposes. Some are discussed elsewhere in this publication.[19] The following classifications, although phrased in terms of appropriations, apply equally to the broader concept of budget authority.

a. Classification Based on Duration [20]

(1) One-year appropriation: an appropriation which is available for obligation only during a specific fiscal year. This is the most common type of appropriation. It is also known as a "fiscal year" or "annual" appropriation.

[16]Budget Issues: The Use of Spending Authority and Permanent Appropriations is Widespread, GAO/AFMD-87-44 (July 1987).

[20]Glossary at 43; OMB Circular No. A-11, § 14.1(a) (1990).

(2) Multiple-year appropriation: an appropriation which is available for obligation for a definite period of time in excess of one fiscal year.

(3) No-year appropriation: an appropriation which is available for obligation for an indefinite period. A no-year appropriation is usually identified by appropriation language such as "to remain available until expended."

b. Classification Based on Presence or Absence of Monetary Limit [21]

(1) Definite appropriation: an appropriation of a specific amount of money.

(2) Indefinite appropriation: an appropriation of an unspecified amount of money. An indefinite appropriation may appropriate all or part of the receipts from certain sources, the specific amount of which is determinable only at some future date, or it may appropriate "such sums as may be necessary" for a given purpose.

c. Classification Based on Permanency [22]

(1) Current appropriation: an appropriation made by the Congress in, or immediately prior to, the fiscal year or years during which it is available for obligation.

(2) Permanent appropriation: a "standing" appropriation which, once made, is always available for specified purposes and does not require repeated action by Congress to authorize its use.[23] Legislation authorizing an agency to retain and use offsetting receipts tends to be permanent; if so, it is a form of permanent appropriation.

d. Classification Based on Availability for New Obligations

(1) Unexpired appropriation: an appropriation which is available for incurring and recording new obligations.

(2) Expired appropriation: an appropriation which is no longer available to incur new obligations, although it may still be available

[22] Glossary at 44.

[23] This is similar to a no-year appropriation except that a no-year appropriation will be closed if it remains inactive for two consecutive fiscal years. 31 U.S.C. § 1555. In actual usage, the term "permanent appropriation" tends to be used more in reference to appropriations contained in permanent legislation, while "no-year appropriation" is used more to describe appropriations found in appropriation acts.

for the recording and/or payment (liquidation) of obligations properly incurred before the period of availability expired.

An appropriation may combine characteristics from more than one of the above groupings. For example, a "permanent indefinite" appropriation is open-ended as to both period of availability and amount. Examples are 31 U.S.C. § 1304 (payment of certain judgments against the United States) and 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) (refunding amounts erroneously collected and deposited in Treasury).

e. Reappropriation

The term "reappropriation" means congressional action to continue the obligational availability, whether for the same or different purposes, of all or part of the unobligated portion of budget authority which has expired or would otherwise expire. Reappropriations are counted as new budget authority in the first year for which the availability is extended.[24]

B. Some Basic Concepts

1. What Constitutes an Appropriation

The starting point is 31 U.S.C. § 1301(d), which provides:

"A law may be construed to make an appropriation out of the Treasury or to authorize making a contract for the payment of money in excess of an appropriation only if the law specifically states that an appropriation is made or that such a contract may be made."

Thus, the rule is that the making of an appropriation must be expressly stated. An appropriation cannot be inferred or made by implication. E.g., 50 Comp. Gen. 863 (1971).

Regular annual and supplemental appropriation acts present no problems in this respect as they will be apparent on their face. They, as required by 1 U.S.C. § 105, bear the title "An Act making appropriations . . . ." However, there are situations in which statutes other than regular appropriation acts may be construed as making appropriations.

Under the above rule, while the authority must be expressly stated, it is not necessary that the statute actually use the word "appropriation." If the statute contains a specific direction to pay (as opposed to a mere authorization), and a designation of the funds to be used, such as a direction to make a specified payment or class of payments "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," then this amounts to an appropriation. 63 Comp. Gen. 331 (1984); 13 Comp. Gen. 77 (1933). See also 34 Comp. Gen. 590 (1955).

For example, a private relief act which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a specified sum of money to a named individual constitutes an appropriation. 23 Comp. Dec. 167, 170 (1916). Another example is B-160998, April 13, 1978, concerning section 11 of the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse local fire departments or districts for costs incurred in fighting fires on federal property. Since the statute directed the Secretary to make payments "from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" (i.e., it contained both the specific direction to pay and a designation of the funds to be used), the Comptroller General concluded that section 11 constituted a permanent indefinite appropriation.

Both elements of the test must be present. Thus, a direction to pay without a designation of the source of funds is not an appropriation. For example, a private relief act which contains merely an authorization and direction to pay but no designation of the funds to be used does not make an appropriation. 21 Comp. Dec. 867 (1915); B-26414, January 7, 1944.[25] Similarly, public legislation enacted in 1978 authorized the U.S. Treasury to make an annual prepayment to Guam and the Virgin Islands of the amount estimated to be collected over the course of the year for certain taxes, duties, and fees. While it was apparent that the prepayment at least for the first year would have to come from the general fund of [25]A few early cases will be found which appear inconsistent with the proposition stated in the text. E.g., 6 Comp. Dec. 514, 516 (1899) and 4 Comp. Dec. 325, 327 (1897). These cases predate the enactment in 1902 (32 Stat. 552, 560) of what is now 31 U.S.C. § 1301(d) and should be disregarded.

the Treasury, the legislation was silent as to the source of the funds for the prepayments, both for the first year and for subsequent years. It was concluded that, while the statute may have established a permanent authorization, it was not sufficient under 31 U.S.C. § 1301(d) to constitute an actual appropriation. B-114808, August 7, 1979. (Congress subsequently made the necessary appropriation in Pub. L. No. 96-126, 93 Stat. 954, 966 (1979).)

The designation of a source of funds without a specific direction to pay is also not an appropriation. 67 Comp. Gen. 332 (1988).

Thus far, we have been talking about the authority to make disbursements from the general fund of the Treasury. There is a separate line of decisions establishing the proposition that statutes which authorize the collection of fees and their deposit into a particular fund, and which make the fund available for expenditure for a specified purpose, constitute continuing or permanent appropriations; that is, the money is available for obligation or expenditure without further action by the Congress. The reasoning is that, under 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), all money received for the use of the United States must be deposited in the general fund of the Treasury absent statutory authority for some other disposition. Once the money is in the Treasury, it can be withdrawn only if Congress appropriates it.[26] Therefore, the authority for an agency to obligate or expend collections without further congressional action amounts to a continuing appropriation of the collections. E.g., United Biscuit Co. v. Wirtz, 359 F.2d 206, 212 (D.C. Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 971. This principle has been applied to revolving funds and various special deposit funds.

Cases involving the "special fund" principle fall into two categories. In the first group, the question is whether a particular statute authorizing the deposit and expenditure of a class of receipts makes those funds available for the specified purpose or purposes without further congressional action. These cases, in other words, raise the basic question of whether the statute may be regarded as an appropriation. Cases answering this question in the affirmative include 59 Comp. Gen. 215 (1980) (mobile home inspection fees collected by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development); B-228777, August 26, 1988 (licensing revenues received by the Commission on the Bicentennial); B-204078.2, May 6, 1988

(Panama Canal Revolving Fund); B-197118, January 14, 1980 (National Defense Stockpile Transaction Fund); B-90476, June 14, 1950. See also 1 Comp. Gen. 704 (1922) (revolving fund created in appropriation act remains available beyond end of fiscal year where not specified otherwise).

The second group of cases involves the applicability of statutory restrictions or other provisions which by their terms apply to "appropriated funds" or exemptions which apply to "nonappropriated funds." For example, fees collected from federal credit unions and deposited in a revolving fund for administrative and supervisory expenses have been regarded as appropriated funds for various purposes. 63 Comp. Gen. 31 (1983), aff'd upon reconsideration, B-210657, May 25, 1984 (payment of relocation expenses); 35 Comp. Gen. 615 (1956) (restrictions on reimbursement for certain telephone calls made from private residences). Other situations applying the "special fund as appropriation" principle are summarized below:

- Various funds held to constitute appropriated funds for purposes of GAO's bid protest jurisdiction:[27] 65 Comp. Gen. 25 (1985) (funds received by National Park Service for visitor reservation services); 64 Comp. Gen. 756 (1985) (Tennessee Valley Authority power program funds); 57 Comp. Gen. 311 (1978) (commissary surcharges).
- Applicability of other procurement laws: United Biscuit Co. v. Wirtz, 359 F.2d 206 (D.C. Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 971 (Armed Services Procurement Act applicable to military commissary purchases); B-217281-O.M., March 27, 1985 (federal procurement regulations applicable to Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation revolving funds).
- User fee toll charges collected by the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation are "appropriated funds." However, many of the restrictions on the use of appropriated funds will nevertheless be inapplicable by virtue of the Corporation's organic legislation and its status as a corporation. B-193573, January 8, 1979, modified and affirmed by B-193573, December 19, 1979; B-217578, October 16, 1986. The December 1979 decision noted that the capitalization of a government corporation, whether a lump-sum appropriation in the form of capital stock or the authority to borrow through the issuance of long-term bonds to the United States Treasury, consists of "appropriated funds."

[27]GAO regulations exempt nonappropriated fund procurements. 4 C.F.R. § 21.3(m)(8).

REV_00256694

- User fees collected under Tobacco Inspection Act are appropriated funds and as such are subject to restrictions on payment of employee health benefits. 63 Comp. Gen. 285 (1984).
- The Prison Industries Fund is an "appropriated fund" subject to the General Services Administration's surplus property regulations. 60 Comp. Gen. 323 (1981).

Other cases in this category are 50 Comp. Gen. 323 (1970); 35 Comp. Gen. 436 (1956); B-191761, September 22, 1978; B-67175, July 16, 1947.

In each of the special fund cases cited above, the authority to make payments from the fund involved was clear from the governing legislation. However, it was not necessary to address whether the legislation also satisfied 31 U.S.C. § 1301(d), because that statute has long been construed as referring to the general fund of the Treasury and not to money authorized to be deposited in the Treasury as a "special fund." 13 Comp. Dec. 700 (1907); 13 Comp. Dec. 219 (1906). See also 59 Comp. Gen. 215, 217 (1980).

Finally, the cases cited above generally involve statutes which specify the fund to which the collections are to be deposited. This is not essential, however. A statute which clearly makes receipts available for obligation or expenditure without further congressional action will be construed as authorizing the establishment of such a fund as a necessary implementation procedure. 59 Comp. Gen. 215 (1980) (42 U.S.C. § 5419); 13 Comp. Dec. 700 (1907); B-226520, April 3, 1987 (non-decision letter) (26 U.S.C. § 7475).

2. Specific vs. General Appropriations

a. General Rule

An appropriation for a specific object is available for that object to the exclusion of a more general appropriation which might otherwise be considered available for the same object, and the exhaustion of the specific appropriation does not authorize charging any excess payment to the more general appropriation, unless there is something in the general appropriation to make it available in addition to the specific appropriation. In other words, if an agency has a specific appropriation for a particular item, and also has a general appropriation broad enough to cover the same item, it does not have an option as to which to use. It must use the specific appropriation. Were this not the case, agencies could evade or exceed congressionally-established spending limits.

The cases illustrating this rule are legion.[28] Generally, the fact patterns and the specific statutes involved are of secondary importance. The point is that the agency does not have an option. If a specific appropriation exists for a particular item, then that appropriation must be used and it is improper to charge the more general appropriation (or any other appropriation) or to use it as a "back-up." A few cases are summarized as examples:

- A State Department appropriation for "publication of consular and commercial reports" could not be used to purchase books in view of a specific appropriation for "books and maps." 1 Comp. Dec. 126 (1894). The Comptroller of the Treasury referred to the rule as having been well-established "from time immemorial." Id. at 127.
- The existence of a specific appropriation for the expenses of repairing the United States courthouse and jail in Nome, Alaska, precludes the charging of such expenses to more general appropriations such as "miscellaneous expenses, U.S. courts" or "support of prisoners, U.S. courts." 4 Comp. Gen. 476 (1924).
- A specific appropriation for the construction of an additional wing on the Navy Department Building could not be supplemented by a more general appropriation to build a larger wing desired because of increased needs. 20 Comp. Gen. 272 (1940).
- Appropriations of the District of Columbia Health Department could not be used to buy penicillin to be used for Civil Defense purposes because the District had received a specific appropriation for "all expenses necessary for the Office of Civil Defense." 31 Comp. Gen. 491 (1952).

Further, the fact that an appropriation for a specific purpose is included as an earmark in a general appropriation does not deprive it of its character as an appropriation for the particular purpose designated, and where such specific appropriation is available for the expenses necessarily incident to its principal purpose, such incidental expenses may not be charged to the more general appropriation. 20 Comp. Gen. 739 (1941). In the cited decision, a general appropriation for the Geological Survey contained the provision

"including not to exceed $45,000 for the purchase and exchange . . . of . . . passenger-carrying vehicles." It was held that the costs of transportation incident to the delivery of the purchased vehicles were chargeable to the specific $45,000 appropriation and not to the more general portion of the appropriation.

The rule has also been applied to expenditures by a government corporation from corporate funds for an object for which the corporation had received a specific appropriation, where the reason for using corporate funds was to avoid a restriction applicable to the specific appropriation. B-142011, June 19, 1969.

Of course, the rule that the specific governs over the general is not peculiar to appropriation law. It is a general principle of statutory construction and applies equally to provisions other than appropriation statutes. E.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 617 (1983); B-152722, August 16, 1965. However, another principle of statutory construction is that two statutes should be construed harmoniously so as to give maximum effect to both wherever possible. In dealing with non-appropriation statutes, the relationship between the two principles has been stated as follows:

"Where there is a seeming conflict between a general provision and a specific provision and the general provision is broad enough to include the subject to which the specific provision relates, the specific provision should be regarded as an exception to the general provision so that both may be given effect, the general applying only where the specific provision is inapplicable." B-163375, September 2, 1971.

As stated before, however, in the appropriations context, this does not mean that a general appropriation is available when the specific appropriation has been exhausted. Using the more general appropriation would be an unauthorized transfer (discussed later in this chapter) and would improperly augment the specific appropriation.

b. Two Appropriations Available for Same Purpose

There are situations in which either of two appropriations can be construed as available for a particular object, but neither can reasonably be called the more specific of the two. The rule in this situation is this: Where either of two appropriations may reasonably be construed as available for expenditures not specifically mentioned under either appropriation, the determination of the agency as to which of the two appropriations to use will not be questioned.

However, once the election has been made, the continued use of the appropriation selected to the exclusion of any other for the same purpose is required, in the absence of changes in the appropriation acts. 68 Comp. Gen. 337 (1989); 23 Comp. Gen. 827 (1944); 10 Comp. Gen. 440 (1931); 5 Comp. Gen. 479 (1926); 15 Comp. Dec. 101 (1908); 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 391 (1981).

In 59 Comp. Gen. 518 (1980), the Environmental Protection Agency received separate lump-sum appropriations for "Research and Development" and "Abatement and Control." A contract entered into in 1975 could arguably have been charged to either appropriation, but EPA had elected to charge it to Research and Development. Applying the above rule, the Comptroller General concluded that a 1979 modification to the contract had to be charged to Research and Development funds, and that the Abatement and Control appropriation could not be used.

Thus, in this type of situation (two appropriations, both arguably available, neither of which specifies the object in question), the agency may make an initial election as to which appropriation to use. However, once it has made that election and has in fact used the selected appropriation, it cannot thereafter, because of insufficient funds in the selected appropriation or for other reasons, change its election and use the other appropriation.

3. Transfer and Reprogramming

For a variety of reasons, agencies have a legitimate need for a certain amount of flexibility to deviate from their budget estimates. Two ways to shift money from one place to another are transfer and reprogramming. While the two concepts are related in this broad sense, they are nevertheless different.

a. Transfer

Transfer is the shifting of funds between appropriations. Glossary at 80. For example, if an agency receives one appropriation for Operations and Maintenance and another for Capital Expenditures, a shifting of funds from either to the other is a transfer.

The basic rule with respect to transfer is simple: Transfer is prohibited without statutory authority. The rule applies equally to (1) transfers from one agency to another,[29] (2) transfers from one account to another within the same agency,[30] and (3) transfers to an interagency or intraagency working fund.[31] In each instance, statutory authority is required. An agency's erroneous characterization of a proposed transfer as a "reprogramming" is irrelevant. See B-202362, March 24, 1981.

The rule applies even though the transfer is intended as a temporary expedient (for example, to alleviate a temporary exhaustion of funds) and the agency contemplates reimbursement. Thus, without statutory authority, an agency cannot "borrow" from another account or another agency. 36 Comp. Gen. 386 (1956); 13 Comp. Gen. 344 (1934). An exception to this proposition is 31 U.S.C. § 1534, under which an agency may temporarily charge one appropriation for an expenditure benefiting another appropriation of the same agency, as long as amounts are available in both appropriations and the accounts are adjusted to reimburse the appropriation initially charged during or as of the close of the same fiscal year. This statute was intended to facilitate "common service" activities. For example, an agency procuring equipment to be used jointly by several bureaus or offices within the agency funded under separate appropriations may initially charge the entire cost to a single appropriation and later apportion the cost among the appropriations of the benefiting components. See generally S. Rep. No. 1284, 89th Cong., 2d Sess. (1966), reprinted at 1966 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 2340.

The prohibition against transfer is codified in 31 U.S.C. § 1532, the first sentence of which provides:

"An amount available under law may be withdrawn from one appropriation account and credited to another or to a working fund only when authorized by law."

[29]7 Comp. Gen. 524 (1928); 4 Comp. Gen. 848 (1925); 17 Comp. Dec. 174 (1910). A case in which adequate statutory authority was found to exist is B-217093, January 9, 1985 (transfer from Japan-United States Friendship Commission to Department of Education to partially fund study of Japanese education).

[30]65 Comp. Gen. 881 (1986); 33 Comp. Gen. 216 (1953); 33 Comp. Gen. 214 (1953); 17 Comp. Dec. 7 (1910); B-206668, March 15, 1982; B-178205, April 13, 1976; B-164912-O.M., December 21, 1977.

[31]26 Comp. Gen. 545, 548 (1947); 19 Comp. Gen. 774 (1940); 6 Comp. Gen. 748 (1927); 4 Comp. Gen. 703 (1925).

In addition to the express prohibition of 31 U.S.C. § 1532, an unauthorized transfer would violate 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) (which prohibits the use of appropriations for other than their intended purpose), would constitute an unauthorized augmentation of the receiving appropriation, and could, if the transfer led to overobligating the receiving appropriation, result in an Antideficiency Act violation as well. E.g., B-222009-O.M., March 3, 1986.

Some agencies have limited transfer authority either in permanent legislation or in appropriation act provisions. Such authority will commonly set a percentage limit on the amount that may be transferred from a given appropriation and/or the amount by which the receiving appropriation may be augmented. A transfer pursuant to such authority is, of course, entirely proper. B-167637, October 11, 1973. An example is 7 U.S.C. § 2257, which authorizes transfers between Department of Agriculture appropriations. The amount to be transferred may not exceed 7% of the "donor" appropriation, and the receiving appropriation may not be augmented by more than 7% except in extraordinary emergencies. Cases construing this provision include 33 Comp. Gen. 214 (1953); B-218812, January 23, 1987; B-123498, April 11, 1955; and B-218812-O.M., July 30, 1985.

If an agency has transfer authority of this type, its exercise is not precluded by the fact that the amount of the receiving appropriation had been reduced from the agency's budget request. B-151157, June 27, 1963. Also, the transfer statute is an independent grant of authority and, unless expressly provided otherwise, the percentage limitations do not apply to transfers under any separate transfer authority the agency may have. B-239031, June 22, 1990.

Another type of transfer authority is illustrated by 31 U.S.C. § 1531, which authorizes the transfer of unexpended balances incident to executive branch reorganizations, but only for purposes for which the appropriation was originally available. Cases discussing this authority include 31 Comp. Gen. 342 (1952) and B-92288 et al., August 13, 1971.

Statutory transfer authority does not require any particular "magic words." Of course the word "transfer" will help, but it is not necessary as long as the words that are used make it clear that transfer is being authorized. B-213345, September 26, 1986; B-217093, January 9, 1985; B-182398, March 29, 1976 (letter to Senator Laxalt), modified on other grounds by 64 Comp. Gen. 370 (1985).

Some transfer statutes have included requirements for approval by one or more congressional committees. In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Immigration and Naturalization Service v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), such "legislative veto" provisions are no longer valid. Whether the transfer authority to which the veto provision is attached remains valid depends on whether it can be regarded as severable from the approval requirement. This in turn depends on an evaluation, in light of legislative history and other surrounding circumstances, of whether Congress would have enacted the substantive authority without the veto provision. See, e.g., 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 520 (1982), in which the Justice Department concluded that a Treasury Department transfer provision was severable and therefore survived a legislative veto provision.

The precise parameters of transfer authority will, of course, depend on the terms of the statute which grants it. The analytical starting point is the second sentence of 31 U.S.C. § 1532:

> "Except as specifically provided by law, an amount authorized to be withdrawn and credited [to another appropriation account or to a working fund] is available for the same purpose and subject to the same limitations provided by the law appropriating the amount."

A number of GAO decisions, several predating the enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1532, have made essentially the same points—that, except to the extent the statute authorizing a transfer provides otherwise, transferred funds are available for purposes permissible under the donor appropriation and are subject to the same limitations and restrictions applicable to the donor appropriation.[32]

Restrictions applicable to the receiving account but not to the donor account may or may not apply. Where transfers are intended to accomplish a purpose of the source appropriation (Economy Act transactions, for example), transferred funds have been held not subject to such restrictions. E.g., 21 Comp. Gen. 254 (1941); 18 Comp. Gen. 489 (1938); B-35677, July 27, 1943; B-131580-O.M., June 4, 1957. However, for transfers intended to permit a limited augmentation of the receiving account (7 U.S.C. § 2257, for example),

As noted above, in the context of working funds, the prohibition against transfer applies not only to interagency funds, but to the consolidation of all or parts of different appropriations of the same agency into a single fund as well. In a few instances, the "pooling" of portions of agency unit appropriations has been found authorized where necessary to implement a particular statute. In B-195775, September 10, 1979, the Comptroller General approved the transfer of portions of unit appropriations to an agency-wide pool to be used to fund the Merit Pay System established by the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978. The transfers, while not explicitly authorized in the statute, were seen as necessary to implement the law and carry out the legislative purpose. Following this decision, the Comptroller General held in 60 Comp. Gen. 686 (1981) that the Treasury Department could "pool" portions of appropriations made to several separate bureaus to fund an Executive Development Program also authorized by the Civil Service Reform Act. However, pooling which would alter the purposes for which funds were appropriated is an impermissible transfer unless authorized by statute. E.g., B-209790-O.M., March 12, 1985.

The reappropriation of an unexpended balance for a different purpose is a form of transfer. Such funds cease to be available for the purposes of the original appropriation. 18 Comp. Gen. 564 (1938); A-79180, July 30, 1936. Cf. 31 U.S.C. § 1301(b) (reappropriation for different purpose to be accounted for as a new appropriation). If the reappropriation is of an amount "not to exceed" a specified sum, and the full amount is not needed for the new purpose, the balance not needed reverts to the source appropriation. 18 Comp. Gen. at 565.

The prohibition against transfer would not apply to transfers of administrative allocations within a lump-sum appropriation since the allocations are not legally binding.[33] Thus, where the (then) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare received a lump-sum appropriation covering several grant programs, it could set aside a portion of each program's allocation for a single fund to be used for [33]The agency must be careful that a transfer of administrative allocations does not, under its own fund control regulations, produce a violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1517(a), discussed further in Chapter 6.

"cross-cutting" grants intended to serve more than one target population, as long as the grants were for projects within the scope or purpose of the lump-sum appropriation. B-157356, August 17, 1978.

b. Reprogramming

A few years ago, the Deputy Secretary of Defense made the following statement:

"The defense budget does not exist in a vacuum. There are forces at work to play havoc with even the best of budget estimates. The economy may vary in terms of inflation; political realities may bring external forces to bear; fact-of-life or programmatic changes may occur. The very nature of the lengthy and overlapping cycles of the budget process poses continual threats to the integrity of budget estimates. Reprogramming procedures permit us to respond to these unforeseen changes and still meet our defense requirements."[34]

The thrust of this statement, while made from the perspective of the Defense Department, applies at least to some extent to all agencies.

Reprogramming is the utilization of funds in an appropriation account for purposes other than those contemplated at the time of appropriation.[35] In other words, it is the shifting of funds from one object to another within an appropriation. The term "reprogramming" appears to have come into use in the mid-1950s although the practice, under different names, pre-dates that time.[36]

The authority to reprogram is implicit in an agency's responsibility to manage its funds; no statutory authority is necessary. See, e.g., 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 701 (1980), discussing the Attorney General's authority to reprogram to avoid deficiencies; B-196854.3, March 19, 1984 (Congress is "implicitly conferring the authority to reprogram" by enacting lump-sum appropriations). Indeed, reprogramming is usually a non-statutory arrangement. This means that there is no general statutory provision either authorizing or prohibiting it, and it has evolved largely in the form of informal (i.e., non-statutory) agreements between various agencies and their congressional oversight committees. These informal arrangements do not have the force and effect of law. Blackhawk Heating & Plumbing Co. v. United States, 622 F.2d 539, 548 (Ct. Cl. 1980). See also 56 Comp. Gen. 201 (1976), holding that the Navy's failure to complete a form required by Defense Department reprogramming regulations was not sufficient to support a claim for proposal preparation costs by an unsuccessful bidder upon cancellation of the proposal.

Thus, as a matter of law, an agency is free to reprogram unobligated funds as long as the expenditures are within the general purpose of the appropriation and are not in violation of any other specific limitation or otherwise prohibited. E.g., B-123469, May 9, 1955. This is true even though the agency may already have administratively allotted the funds to a particular object. 20 Comp. Gen. 631 (1941). In some situations, the agency's discretion may rise to the level of a duty. E.g., Blackhawk Heating & Plumbing at 552 n.9 (satisfaction of obligations under a settlement agreement).

There are at present no reprogramming guidelines applicable to all agencies. As one might expect, reprogramming policies, procedures, and practices vary considerably among agencies.[37] In view of the nature of its activities and appropriation structure, the Defense Department has the most detailed and sophisticated procedures.[38]

In some cases, Congress has attempted to regulate reprogramming by statute, and of course any applicable statutory provisions control. B-164912-O.M., December 21, 1977. For example, a provision frequently found in Defense Department appropriation acts prohibits the use of funds to prepare or present a reprogramming request to the Appropriations Committees "where the item for which reprogramming is requested has been denied by the Congress."[39] The Comptroller General has construed this provision as prohibiting a reprogramming request which would have the effect of restoring funds which had been specifically deleted in the legislative process; that is, the provision is not limited to the denial of an entire project. See GAO report entitled Legality of the Navy's Expenditures for Project Sanguine During Fiscal Year 1974, LCD-75-315 (January 20, 1975).

Under Defense's arrangement as reflected in its written instructions, reprogramming procedures apply to funding shifts between program elements, but not to shifts within a program element. Thus, the denial of a request to reprogram funds from one program element to another does not preclude a military department from shifting available funds within the element. 65 Comp. Gen. 360 (1986). In other words, all funding shifts are not necessarily "reprogrammings." The level at which reprogramming procedures and restrictions will apply depends on applicable legislation, if any, and the arrangements an agency has worked out with its respective committees.

In the absence of a statutory provision such as the Defense provision noted above, a reprogramming which has the effect of restoring funds deleted in the legislative process has been held not legally objectionable. B-195269, October 15, 1979.

Reprogramming frequently involves some form of notification to the appropriations and/or legislative committees. In a few cases, the notification process is prescribed by statute. However, in most cases, the committee review process is non-statutory, and derives from instructions in committee reports, hearings, or other correspondence. Sometimes, in addition to notification, reprogramming arrangements also provide for committee approval. As in the case of transfer, under the Supreme Court's Chadha decision, statutory committee approval or veto provisions are no longer permissible. However, an agency may continue to observe committee approval procedures as part of its informal arrangements, although they would not be legally binding. B-196854.3, March 19, 1984.

In sum, reprogramming procedures provide an element of congressional control over spending flexibility short of resort to the full legislative process. They are for the most part non-binding, and compliance is largely a matter of "keeping faith" with the pertinent committees.

4. General Provisions: When Construed as Permanent Legislation

Appropriation acts, in addition to making appropriations, frequently contain a variety of provisions either restricting the availability of the appropriations or making them available for some particular use. Such provisions come in two forms: (a) "provisos" attached directly to the appropriating language, and (b) general provisions. A general provision may apply solely to the act in which it is contained ("No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used . . ."), or it may have general applicability ("No part of any appropriation contained in this or any other Act shall be used . . .").[40] Provisions of this type are no less effective merely because they are contained in appropriation acts. It is settled that Congress can enact general or permanent legislation in appropriation acts. E.g., United States v. Dickerson, 310 U.S. 554 (1940); Cella v. United States, 208 F.2d 783, 790 (7th Cir. 1953), cert. denied, 347 U.S. 1016; NLRB v. Thompson Products, Inc., 141 F.2d 794, 797 (9th Cir. 1944); 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 274, 276 (1956). General provisions may be phrased in the form of restrictions or positive authority.

As noted in Chapter 1, rules of both the Senate and the House of Representatives prohibit "legislating" in appropriation acts. However, this merely subjects the provision to a point of order and does not affect the validity of the legislation if the point of order is not raised, or is raised and not sustained. Thus, once a given provision has been enacted into law, the question of whether it is "general legislation" or merely a restriction on the use of an appropriation, i.e., whether it might have been subject to a point of order, is academic.

This section deals with the question of when provisos or general provisions appearing in appropriation acts can be construed as permanent legislation.

[40]In recent decades, general provisions of government-wide applicability—the "this or any other act" provisions—have, for the most part, been consolidated in the annual Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government appropriation acts. E.g., Pub. L. No. 101-136, Title VI, 103 Stat. 783, 816 (1989) (fiscal year 1990).

Since an appropriation act is made for a particular fiscal year, the starting presumption is that everything contained in the act is effective only for the fiscal year covered. Thus, the rule is: A provision contained in an annual appropriation act is not to be construed to be permanent legislation unless the language used therein or the nature of the provision makes it clear that Congress intended it to be permanent. The presumption can be overcome if the provision uses language indicating futurity, such as "hereafter," or if the provision is of a general character bearing no relation to the object of the appropriation. 65 Comp. Gen. 588 (1986); 62 Comp. Gen. 54 (1982); 36 Comp. Gen. 434 (1956); 32 Comp. Gen. 11 (1952); 24 Comp. Gen. 436 (1944); 10 Comp. Gen. 120 (1930); 5 Comp. Gen. 810 (1926); 7 Comp. Dec. 838 (1901).

In analyzing a particular provision, the starting point in ascertaining Congress' intent is, as it must be, the language of the statute. The question to ask is whether the provision uses "words of futurity." The most common "word of futurity" is "hereafter" and provisions using this term will usually be construed as permanent. For specific examples, see Cella v. United States, 208 F.2d at 790; 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-242142, March 22, 1991); 26 Comp. Gen. 354, 357 (1946); 2 Comp. Gen. 535 (1923); 11 Comp. Dec. 800 (1905); B-108245, March 19, 1952; B-100983, February 8, 1951; B-76782, June 10, 1948. The precise location of the word "hereafter" may be important. It may not be sufficient, for example, if it appears only in an exception clause and not in the operative portion of the provision. B-228838, September 16, 1987.

Words of futurity other than "hereafter" have also been deemed sufficient. Thus, there is no significant difference in meaning between "hereafter" and "after the date of approval of this act." 65 Comp. Gen. 588, 589 (1986); 36 Comp. Gen. 434, 436 (1956); B-209583, January 18, 1983. Using a specific date rather than a general reference to the date of enactment produces the same result. B-57539, May 3, 1946. "Henceforth" will also do the job. B-209583, January 18, 1983. So will specific references to future fiscal years. B-208354, August 10, 1982.

In 24 Comp. Gen. 436 (1944), the words "at any time" were viewed as words of futurity in a provision which authorized reduced transportation rates to military personnel who were "given furloughs at any time." In that decision, however, the conclusion of permanence was further supported by the fact that Congress appropriated funds to carry out the provision in the following year as well, and did not repeat the provision but merely referred to it.

The words "or any other act" in a provision addressing funds appropriated in or made available by "this or any other act" are not words of futurity. They merely refer to any other appropriation act for the same fiscal year. 65 Comp. Gen. 588 (1986); B-230110, April 11, 1988; B-228838, September 16, 1987; B-145492, September 21, 1976.[41] See also A-88073, August 19, 1937 ("this or any other appropriation"). Similarly, the words "notwithstanding any other provision of law" are not words of futurity. B-208705, September 14, 1982.

The words "this or any other act" may be used in conjunction with other language that makes the result, one way or the other, indisputable. The provision is clearly not permanent if the phrase "during the current fiscal year" is added. Norcross v. United States, 142 Ct. Cl. 763 (1958). Addition of the phrase "with respect to any fiscal year" makes the provision permanent. B-230110, April 11, 1988.

If words of futurity indicate permanence, it follows that a proviso or general provision that does not contain words of futurity will generally not be construed as permanent. 65 Comp. Gen. 588 (1986); 32 Comp. Gen. 11 (1952); 20 Comp. Gen. 322 (1940); 10 Comp. Gen. 120 (1930); 5 Comp. Gen. 810 (1926); 3 Comp. Gen. 319 (1923); B-209583, January 18, 1983; B-208705, September 14, 1982; B-66513, May 26, 1947; A-18614, May 25, 1927. The courts have applied the same analysis. See United States v. Vulte, 233 U.S. 509, 514 (1914); Minis v. United States, 40 U.S. (15 Pet.) 423 (1841); United States v. International Business Machines Corp., 892 F.2d 1006, 1009 (Fed. Cir. 1989); NLRB v. Thompson Products, Inc., 141 F.2d 794, 798 (9th Cir. 1944); City of Hialeah v. United States Housing Authority, 340 F. Supp. 885 (S.D. Fla. 1971).

As the preceding paragraphs indicate, the language of the statute is the crucial determinant. However, other factors may also be taken into consideration. Thus, the repeated inclusion of a provision in annual appropriation acts indicates that it is not considered or [41]One early case found the words "or any other act" sufficient words of futurity. 26 Comp. Dec. 1066 (1920). A later decision, B-37032, October 5, 1943, regarded their effect as inconclusive. Both of these cases must be regarded as implicitly modified by the consistent position expressed in the more recent decisions.

intended by Congress to be permanent. 32 Comp. Gen. 11 (1952); 10 Comp. Gen. 120 (1930); A-89279, October 26, 1937; 41 Op. Att'y Gen. 274, 279-80 (1956). However, where adequate words of futurity exist, the repetition of a provision in the following year's appropriation act has been viewed simply as an "excess of caution." 36 Comp. Gen. 434, 436 (1956). This factor is of limited usefulness, since the failure to repeat in subsequent appropriation acts a provision which does not contain words of futurity can also be viewed as an indication that Congress did not consider it to be permanent and simply did not want it to continue. See 18 Comp. Gen. 37 (1938); A-88073, August 19, 1937. Thus, if the provision does not contain words of futurity, repetition or non-repetition lead to the same result—that the provision is not permanent. If the provision does contain words of futurity, non-repetition indicates permanence but repetition, although it suggests non-permanence, is inconclusive.

The inclusion of a provision in the United States Code is relevant as an indication of permanence but is not controlling. 36 Comp. Gen. 434 (1956); 24 Comp. Gen. 436 (1944). Failure to include a provision in the Code would appear to be of no significance. A reference by the codifiers to the failure to reenact a provision suggests non-permanence. 41 Op. Att'y Gen. at 280-81.

Legislative history is also relevant, but has been used for the most part to support a conclusion based on the presence or absence of words of futurity. See 65 Comp. Gen. 588 (1986); B-209583, January 18, 1983; B-208705, September 14, 1982; B-108245, March 19, 1952; B-57539, May 3, 1946; Cella v. United States, 208 F.2d at 790 n.1; NLRB v. Thompson Products, 141 F.2d at 798. In B-192973, October 11, 1978, a general provision requiring the submission of a report "annually to the Congress" was held not permanent in view of conflicting expressions of congressional intent. Legislative history by itself has not been used to find futurity where it is missing in the statutory language.

The degree of relationship between a given provision and the object of the appropriation act in which it appears or the appropriating language to which it is appended is a factor to be considered. If the provision bears no direct relationship to the appropriation act in which it appears, this is an indication of permanence. For example, a provision prohibiting the retroactive application of an energy tax credit provision in the Internal Revenue Code was found sufficiently unrelated to the rest of the act in which it appeared, a supplemental appropriations act, to support a conclusion of permanence. B-214058, February 1, 1984. See also 62 Comp. Gen. 54, 56 (1982); 26 Comp. Gen. 354, 357 (1946); 32 Comp. Gen. 11 (1952); B-37032, October 5, 1943; A-88073, August 19, 1937. The closer the relationship, the less likely it is that the provision will be viewed as permanent. A determination under rules of the Senate that a proviso is germane to the subject matter of the appropriation bill will negate an argument that the proviso is sufficiently unrelated as to suggest permanence. B-208705, September 14, 1982.

The phrasing of a provision as positive authorization rather than a restriction on the use of an appropriation is an indication of permanence, but usually has been considered in conjunction with a finding of adequate words of futurity. 36 Comp. Gen. 434 (1956); 24 Comp. Gen. 436 (1944). An early decision, 17 Comp. Dec. 146 (1910), held a proviso to be permanent based solely on the fact that it was not phrased as a restriction on the use of the appropriation to which it was attached, but this decision seems inconsistent with the weight of authority and certainly with the Supreme Court's decision in Minis v. United States, cited above.

Finally, a provision may be construed as permanent if construing it as temporary would render the provision meaningless or produce an absurd result. 65 Comp. Gen. 352 (1986); 62 Comp. Gen. 54 (1982); B-200923, October 1, 1982. These decisions dealt with a general provision designed to prohibit cost-of-living pay increases for federal judges except as specifically authorized by Congress. The provision appeared in a continuing resolution which expired on September 30, 1982. The next applicable pay increase would have been effective October 1, 1982. Thus, if the provision were not construed as permanent, it would have been meaningless "since it would have been enacted to prevent increases during a period when no increases were authorized to be made." 62 Comp. Gen. at 56-57. Similarly, a provision was held permanent in 9 Comp. Gen. 248 (1929) although it contained no words of futurity, because it was to become effective on the last day of the fiscal year and an alternative construction would have rendered it effective for only one day, clearly not the legislative intent. See also 65 Comp. Gen. 588, 590 (1986); B-214058, February 1, 1984.

In sum, the six additional factors mentioned above are all relevant as indicia of whether a given provision should be construed as permanent. However, the presence or absence of words of futurity remains the crucial factor, and the additional factors have been used for the most part to support a conclusion based primarily on this presence or absence. Four of the factors—occurrence or nonoccurrence in subsequent appropriation acts, inclusion in United States Code, legislative history, and phrasing as positive authorization—have never been used as the sole basis for finding permanence in a provision without words of futurity. The two remaining factors—relationship to rest of statute and meaningless or absurd result—can be used to find permanence in the absence of words of futurity, but the conclusion is almost invariably supported by at least one of the other factors such as legislative history.

C. Relationship of Appropriations to Other Types of Legislation

1. Distinction Between Authorization and Appropriation

Appropriation acts must be distinguished from two other types of legislation: "enabling" or "organic" legislation and "appropriation authorization" legislation. Enabling or organic legislation is legislation which creates an agency, establishes a program, or prescribes a function, such as the Department of Education Organization Act or the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. While the organic legislation may provide the necessary authority to conduct the program or activity, it, with relatively rare exceptions, does not provide any money.

Appropriation authorization legislation, as the name implies, is legislation which authorizes the appropriation of funds to implement the organic legislation. It may be included as part of the organic legislation or it may be separate. As a general proposition, it too does not give the agency any actual money to spend. With certain exceptions (discussed in Section B.1 of this chapter), only the appropriation act itself permits the withdrawal of funds from the Treasury. The principle has been stated as follows:

"The mere authorization of an appropriation does not authorize expenditures on the faith thereof or the making of contracts obligating the money authorized to be appropriated."

16 Comp. Gen. 1007, 1008 (1937). Restated, an authorization of appropriations does not constitute an appropriation of public funds, but contemplates subsequent legislation by the Congress actually appropriating the funds. 35 Comp. Gen. 306 (1955); 27 Comp. Dec. 923 (1921).[42]

Like the organic legislation, authorization legislation is considered and reported by the committees with legislative jurisdiction over the particular subject matter, whereas the appropriation bills are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the appropriations committees.

There is no general requirement, either constitutional or statutory, that an appropriation act be preceded by a specific authorization act. The existence of a statute (organic legislation) imposing substantive functions upon an agency which require funding for their performance is itself sufficient authorization for the necessary appropriations. B-173832, July 16, 1976; B-173832, August 1, 1975; B-111810, March 8, 1974. However, statutory requirements for authorizations do exist in a number of specific situations. An example is section 660 of the Department of Energy Organization Act, 42 U.S.C. § 7270 ("Appropriations to carry out the provisions of this chapter shall be subject to annual authorizations"). Another example is 10 U.S.C. § 114(a), which provides that no funds may be appropriated for military construction, military procurement, and certain related research and development "unless funds therefor have been specifically authorized by law."

In addition, rules of the House of Representatives prohibit appropriations for expenditures not previously authorized by law. See Rule XXI(2), Rules of the House of Representatives. The effect of this Rule is to subject the offending appropriation to a point of order. A more limited provision exists in Rule XVI, Standing Rules of the Senate.

The majority of appropriations today are preceded by some form of authorization although, as noted, it is not statutorily required in all cases.

Authorizations take many different forms, depending in part on whether they are contained in the organic legislation or are separate. Authorizations contained in organic legislation may be "definite" (setting dollar limits either in the aggregate or for specific fiscal years) or "indefinite" (authorizing "such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act"). An indefinite authorization serves little purpose other than to comply with House Rule XXI. Appropriation authorizations enacted as separate legislation resemble appropriation acts in structure, for example, the annual Department of Defense Authorization Acts.

An authorization act is basically a directive to the Congress itself which Congress is free to follow or alter (up or down) in the subsequent appropriation act. A statutory requirement for prior authorization is also essentially a congressional mandate to itself. Thus, for example, if Congress appropriates money to the Defense Department in violation of 10 U.S.C. § 114, there are no practical consequences. The appropriation is just as valid, and just as available for obligation, as if section 114 had been satisfied or did not exist.

In sum, the typical sequence is: (1) organic legislation, (2) authorization of appropriations, if not contained in the organic legislation, and (3) the appropriation act. While this may be the "normal" sequence, there are deviations and variations, and it is not always possible to neatly label a given piece of legislation. Consider, for example, the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Secretary of the Interior . . . for the benefit of the Coushatta Tribe of Louisiana . . . out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,300,000."[43]

This is the first section of a law enacted to settle land claims by the Coushatta Tribe against the United States and to prescribe the use and distribution of the settlement funds. Applying the test described above in Section B.1, it is certainly an appropriation—it contains a specific direction to pay and designates the funds to be used—but, in a technical sense, it is not an appropriation act. Also, it contains its own authorization. Thus, we have an authorization and an appropriation combined in a statute that is neither an authorization act (in the sense described above) nor an appropriation act. General classifications may be useful and perhaps essential, but they should not be expected to cover all situations.

2. Specific Problem Areas and the Resolution of Conflicts

a. Introduction

Appropriation acts, as we have seen, do not exist in a vacuum. They are enacted against the backdrop of program legislation and, in many cases, specific authorization acts. This section deals with two broad but closely related issues. First, what precisely can Congress do in an appropriation act? Is it limited to essentially "rubber stamping" what has previously been authorized? Second, what does an agency do when faced with what it perceives to be an inconsistency between an appropriation act and some other statute?

The remaining portions of this section raise these issues in a number of specific contexts. In this introduction, we present four important principles. The resolution of problems in the relationship of appropriation acts to other statutes will almost invariably lie in the application of one or more of these principles.

First, as a general proposition, appropriations made to carry out authorizing laws "are made on the basis that the authorization acts in effect constitute an adjudication or legislative determination of the subject matter." B-151157, June 27, 1963. Thus, except as specified otherwise in the appropriation act, appropriations to carry out enabling or authorizing laws must be expended in strict accord with the original authorization both as to the amount of funds to be expended and the nature of the work authorized. 36 Comp. Gen. 240, 242 (1956); B-220682, February 21, 1986; B-204874, July 28, 1982; B-125404, August 31, 1956; B-151157, June 27, 1963. While it is true that one Congress cannot bind a future Congress, nor can it bind subsequent action by the same Congress, an authorization act is more than an academic exercise and its requirements must be followed unless changed by subsequent legislation.

Second, Congress is free to amend or repeal prior legislation as long as it does so directly and explicitly and does not violate the Constitution. It is also possible for one statute to implicitly amend or repeal a prior statute, but it is firmly established that "repeal by implication" is disfavored, and statutes will be construed to avoid this result whenever reasonably possible. E.g., Tennessee Valley Authority v. Hill, 437 U.S. 153, 189-90 (1978); Morton v. Mancari, 417 U.S. 535, 549 (1974); Posadas v. National City Bank, 296 U.S. 497, 503 (1936); 68 Comp. Gen. 19, 22-23 (1988); 64 Comp. Gen. 143, 145 (1984); 58 Comp. Gen. 687, 691-92 (1979); 53 Comp. Gen. 853, 856 (1974); 34 Comp. Gen. 170, 172-73 (1954); 21 Comp. Gen. 319, 322-23 (1941); B-236057, May 9, 1990. A repeal by implication will be found only where "the intention of the legislature to repeal [is] clear and manifest." Posadas, 296 U.S. at 503.

A corollary to the "cardinal rule" against repeal by implication, or perhaps another way of saying the same thing, is the rule of construction that statutes should be construed harmoniously so as to give maximum effect to both wherever possible. E.g., Posadas, 296 U.S. at 503; 53 Comp. Gen. at 856; B-208593.6, December 22, 1988.

Third, if two statutes are in irreconcilable conflict, the more recent statute, as the latest expression of Congress, governs. As one court concluded in a statement illustrating the eloquence of simplicity:

> "The statutes are thus in conflict, the earlier permitting and the later prohibiting. The later statute supersedes the earlier."

Eisenberg v. Corning, 179 F.2d 275, 277 (D.C. Cir. 1949). In a sense, the "last in time" rule is yet another way of expressing the repeal by implication principle. We state it separately to highlight its narrowness: it applies only when the two statutes cannot be reconciled in any reasonable manner, and then only to the extent of the conflict. E.g., Posadas, 296 U.S. at 503; B-203900, February 2, 1989; B-226389, November 14, 1988; B-214172, July 10, 1984, aff'd upon reconsideration, 64 Comp. Gen. 282 (1985).

The fourth principle we state in two parts:

(a) Despite the occasional comment to the contrary in judicial decisions (a few of which we will note later), Congress can and does "legislate" in appropriation acts. E.g., Preterm, Inc. v. Dukakis, 591 F.2d 121 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 441 U.S. 952; Friends of the Earth v. Armstrong, 485 F.2d 1 (10th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1171; Eisenberg v. Corning, 179 F.2d 275 (D.C. Cir. 1949); Tayloe v. Kjaer, 171 F.2d 343 (D.C. Cir. 1948). See also the Dickerson, Cella, and Thompson Products cases cited above in Section B.4, and the discussion of the congressional power of the purse in Chapter 1, Section B. It may well be that the device is "unusual and frowned upon." Preterm, 591 F.2d at 131. It also may well be that the appropriation act will be narrowly construed when it is in apparent conflict with authorizing legislation. Donovan v. Carolina Stalite Co., 734 F.2d 1547, 1558 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Maybe—although we express no independent judgment—it is even "universally recognized as exceedingly bad legislative practice." Tayloe, 171 F.2d at 344. Nevertheless, appropriation acts are, like any other statute, passed by both Houses of Congress and either signed by the President or enacted over a presidential veto. As such, and subject of course to constitutional strictures, they are "just as effective a way to legislate as are ordinary bills relating to a particular subject." Friends of the Earth, 485 F.2d at 9.

(b) Legislative history is not legislation. As useful and important as legislative history may be in resolving ambiguities and determining congressional intent, it is the language of the appropriation act, and not the language of its legislative history, that is enacted into law. As the Supreme Court stated in a case previously cited which we will discuss in more detail later:

> "Expressions of committees dealing with requests for appropriations cannot be equated with statutes enacted by Congress . . . ."

Tennessee Valley Authority v. Hill, 437 U.S. at 191.

These, then, are the "guiding principles" which will be applied in various combinations and configurations to analyze and resolve the problem areas identified in the remainder of this section. For the most part, our subsequent discussion will merely note the applicable principle(s). A useful supplemental reference on many of the topics we discuss is Louis Fisher, The Authorization-Appropriation Process in Congress: Formal Rules and Informal Practices, 29 Cath. U.L. Rev. 51 (1979).

b. Variations in Amount

(1) Appropriation exceeds authorization

Generally speaking, Congress is free to appropriate more money for a given object than the amount previously authorized. As the Comptroller General stated in a brief letter to a Member of Congress:

"While legislation providing for an appropriation of funds in excess of the amount contained in a related authorization act apparently would be subject to a point of order under rule 21 of the Rules of the House of Representatives, there would be no basis on which we could question otherwise proper expenditures of funds actually appropriated." B-123469, April 14, 1955.

The governing principle was stated as follows in 36 Comp. Gen. 240, 242 (1956):

"It is fundamental . . . that one Congress cannot bind a future Congress and that the Congress has full power to make an appropriation in excess of a cost limitation contained in the original authorization act. This authority is exercised as an incident to the power of the Congress to appropriate and regulate expenditures of the public money."

If we are dealing with a line-item appropriation or a specific earmark in a lump-sum appropriation, the quoted statement would appear beyond dispute. However, complications arise where the authorization for a given item is specific and a subsequent lump-sum appropriation includes a higher amount for that item specified only in legislative history and not in the appropriation act itself. In this situation, the rule that one Congress cannot bind a future Congress or later action by the same Congress must be modified somewhat by the rule against repeal by implication. The line of demarcation, however, is not precisely defined.

In 36 Comp. Gen. 240, Congress had authorized the construction of two bridges across the Potomac River "at a cost not to exceed" $7 million. A subsequent appropriation act made a lump-sum appropriation which included funds for the bridge construction (specified in legislative history but not in the appropriation act itself) in excess of the amount authorized. The decision concluded that the appropriation, as the latest expression of Congress on the matter, was available for expenditure.[44] Similarly, it was held in B-148736, September 15, 1977, that the National Park Service could expend its lump-sum appropriation for planning and construction of parks even though the expenditures for specific parks would exceed amounts authorized to be appropriated for those parks.

Both of these cases were distinguished in 64 Comp. Gen. 282 (1985), which affirmed a prior unpublished decision, B-214172, July 10, 1984. Authorizing legislation for the Small Business Administration provided specific funding levels for certain SBA programs. SBA's 1984 appropriation act contained a lump-sum appropriation for the programs which, according to the conference report, included amounts in excess of the funding levels specified in the authorization. Relying in part on Tennessee Valley Authority v. Hill, GAO concluded that the two statutes were not in conflict, that the appropriation did not implicitly repeal or amend the authorizations, and that the spending levels in the authorization were controlling. The two prior cases were distinguished as being limited in scope and dealing with different factual situations. 64 Comp. Gen. at 285. For example, it was clear in the prior cases that Congress was knowingly providing funds in excess of the authorization ceilings. In contrast, the SBA appropriation made explicit reference to the authorizing statute, thus suggesting that Congress did not intend that the appropriation be inconsistent with the authorized spending levels. Id. at 286-87.

(2) Appropriation less than authorization

Congress is free to appropriate less than an amount authorized either in an authorization act or in program legislation, again, as in the case of exceeding an authorization, at least where it does so directly. E.g., 53 Comp. Gen. 695 (1974). This includes the failure to fund a program at all, i.e., not to appropriate any funds. United States v. Dickerson, 310 U.S. 554 (1940).

A more recent case in point is City of Los Angeles v. Adams, 556 F.2d 40 (D.C. Cir. 1977). The Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970 authorized airport development grants "in aggregate amounts not less than" specified dollar amounts for specified fiscal [44]The decision also held that obligations in excess of the amount included in the appropriation would violate the Antideficiency Act. Since the appropriation in question was a lump-sum appropriation which did not mention the bridge construction item, this portion of the decision is no longer valid. See Chapter 6, Section F.

years, and provided an apportionment formula. Subsequent appropriation acts included specific limitations on the aggregate amounts to be available for the grants, less than the amounts authorized. The court concluded that both laws could be given effect by limiting the amounts available to those specified in the appropriation acts, but requiring that they be distributed in accordance with the formula of the authorizing legislation. In holding the appropriation limits controlling, the court said:

"According to its own rules, Congress is not supposed to use appropriations measures as vehicles for the amendment of general laws, including revision of expenditure authorization. . . . Where Congress chooses to do so, however, we are bound to follow Congress's last word on the matter even in an appropriations law." Id. at 48-49.

Where the amount authorized to be appropriated is mandatory rather than discretionary, Congress can still appropriate less, or can suspend or repeal the authorizing legislation, as long as the intent to suspend or repeal the authorization is clear. The power is considerably diminished, however, with respect to entitlements that have already vested. The distinction is made clear in the following passage from the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Larionoff, 431 U.S. 864, 879 (1977):

"No one disputes that Congress may prospectively reduce the pay of members of the Armed Forces, even if that reduction deprived members of benefits they had expected to be able to earn. . . . It is quite a different matter, however, for Congress to deprive a service member of pay due for services already performed, but still owing. In that case, the congressional action would appear in a different constitutional light."

Several earlier cases provide concrete illustrations of what Congress can and cannot do in an appropriation act to reduce or eliminate a non-vested mandatory authorization. In United States v. Fisher, 109 U.S. 143 (1883), permanent legislation set the salaries of certain territorial judges. Congress subsequently appropriated a lesser amount, "in full compensation" for that particular year. The Court held that Congress had the power to reduce the salaries, and had effectively done so. "It is impossible that both acts should stand. No ingenuity can reconcile them. The later act must therefore prevail . . . ." Id. at 146. See also United States v. Mitchell, 109 U.S. 146 (1883). In the Dickerson case cited above, the Court found a mandatory authorization effectively suspended by a provision in an appropriation act prohibiting the use of funds for the payment in question "notwithstanding the applicable portions of" the authorizing legislation.

In the cases in the preceding paragraph, the "reduction by appropriation" was effective because the intent of the congressional action was unmistakable. The mere failure to appropriate sufficient funds is not enough. In United States v. Langston, 118 U.S. 389 (1886), for example, the Court refused to find a repeal by implication in "subsequent enactments which merely appropriated a less amount . . . and which contained no words that expressly or by clear implication modified or repealed the previous law." Id. at 394. A similar holding is United States v. Vulte, 233 U.S. 509 (1914). A failure to appropriate in this type of situation will prevent administrative agencies from making payment, but, as in Langston and Vulte, is unlikely to prevent recovery by way of a lawsuit. See also New York Airways, Inc. v. United States, 369 F.2d 743 (Ct. Cl. 1966); Gibney v. United States, 114 Ct. Cl. 38 (1949).

Thus, appropriating less than the amount of a non-vested mandatory authorization, including not appropriating any funds for it, will be effective under the "last in time" rule as long as the intent to suspend or repeal the authorization is clear. However, by virtue of the rule against repeal by implication, a mere failure to appropriate sufficient funds will not be construed as amending or repealing prior authorizing legislation.

(3) Earmarks in authorization act

In Chapter 6, Section B, we set forth the various types of language Congress uses in appropriation acts when it wants to "earmark" a portion of a lump-sum appropriation as either a maximum or a minimum to be spent on some particular object. These same types of earmarking language can be used in authorization acts.

A number of cases have considered the question of whether there is a conflict when an authorization establishes a minimum earmark ("not less than," "shall be available only"), and the related appropriation is a lump-sum appropriation which does not expressly mention the earmark. Is the agency in this situation required to observe the earmark? Applying the principle that an appropriation must be expended in accordance with the related authorization unless the appropriation act provides otherwise, GAO has concluded that the agency must observe the earmark. 64 Comp. Gen. 388

(1985); B-220682, February 21, 1986 ("an earmark in an authorization act must be followed where a lump sum is appropriated pursuant to the authorization"); B-207343, August 18, 1982; B-193282, December 21, 1978. See also B-131935, March 17, 1986. This result applies even though following the earmark will drastically reduce the amount of funds available for non-earmarked programs funded under the same appropriation. 64 Comp. Gen. at 391. (These cases can also be viewed as another application of the rule against repeal by implication.)

If Congress expressly appropriates an amount at variance with a previously-enacted authorization earmark, the appropriation will control under the "last in time" rule. For example, in 53 Comp. Gen. 695 (1974), an authorization act had expressly earmarked $18 million for UNICEF for specific fiscal years. A subsequent appropriation act provided a lump sum, out of which only $15 million was earmarked for UNICEF. The Comptroller General concluded that the $15 million specified in the appropriation act was controlling and represented the maximum available for UNICEF for that fiscal year.

c. Variations in Purpose

As noted previously, it is only the appropriation, and not the authorization by itself, that permits the incurring of obligations and the making of expenditures. It follows that an authorization does not, as a general proposition, expand the scope of availability of appropriations beyond what is permissible under the terms of the appropriation act. The authorized purpose must be implemented either by a specific appropriation or by inclusion in a broader lump-sum appropriation. Thus, an appropriation made for specific purposes is not available for related but more extended purposes contained in the authorization act but not included in the appropriation. 19 Comp. Gen. 961 (1940). See also 37 Comp. Gen. 732 (1958); 35 Comp. Gen. 306 (1955); 26 Comp. Gen. 452 (1947).

In addition to simply failing to appropriate funds for an authorized purpose, Congress can expressly restrict the use of an appropriation for a purpose or purposes included in the authorization. E.g., B-24341, April 1, 1942 ("[W]hatever may have been the intention of the original enabling act it must give way to the express provisions of the later act which appropriated funds but limited their use").

Similarly, by express provision in an appropriation act, Congress can expand authorized purposes. In 67 Comp. Gen. 401 (1988), for construction. (Rerouting was apparently not possible.) B-125309, December 6, 1955.[4]

In any case, an appropriation serves as a limitation, or more accurately, a series of limitations relating to time and amount in addition to purpose. In some situations, an appropriation is simultaneously a grant of authority. For example, 5 U.S.C. § 3109 authorizes agencies to procure the services of experts and consultants, but only "[w]hen authorized by an appropriation or other statute." In contrast with the statute authorizing services for credit unions noted earlier, 5 U.S.C. § 3109 by itself does not authorize an agency to spend general operating appropriations to hire consultants. Unless an agency has received this authority somewhere in its permanent legislation, the hiring of consultants under section 3109 is an authorized purpose only if it is specified in the agency's appropriation act.

c. Effect of Budget Estimates

The relationship of an appropriation to the agency's budget request is another important factor in determining purpose availability. If a budget submission requests a specific amount of money for a specific purpose, and Congress makes a specific line-item appropriation for that purpose, the purpose aspects of the appropriation are relatively clear and simple. The appropriation is legally available only for the specific object described.

The trend in recent decades, however, has favored the enactment of lump-sum appropriations, which are stated in terms of broad object categories such as "salaries and expenses," "operations and maintenance," or "research and development." In analyzing the relationship of a lump-sum appropriation to its corresponding budget request from the perspective of purpose availability, there are two basic rules.

First, where an amount to be expended for a specific purpose which is not otherwise prohibited is included in a budget estimate, the appropriation is legally available for the expenditure even though the appropriation act does not make specific reference to it. 35 Comp. Gen. 306, 308 (1955); 28 Comp. Gen. 296, 298 (1948); 26 Comp. Gen. 545, 547 (1947); 23 Comp. Dec. 547 (1917); B-125935,

It should be emphasized that the prior decisions were overruled only to the extent inconsistent with the new holding. Two specific elements of 58 Comp. Gen. 202 were not involved in the 1981 decision and remain valid. First, use of appropriated funds to serve meals or refreshments remains improper except under specific statutory authority. 58 Comp. Gen. at 206.[45] Second, 58 Comp. Gen. 202 found the purchase of commercial insurance on art objects improper. Id. at 207. This portion also remains valid.

The decision at 60 Comp. Gen. 303 was expanded in B-199387, March 23, 1982, to include small "samples" of ethnic foods prepared and served during a formal ethnic awareness program as part of the agency's equal employment opportunity program. In the particular program being considered, the attendees were to pay for their own lunches, with the ethnic food samples of minimal proportion provided as a separate event. Thus, the samples could be distinguished from meals or refreshments, which remain unauthorized. (The decision did not specify how many "samples" an individual might consume in order to develop a fuller appreciation.)

Although 60 Comp. Gen. 303 was not cast in precisely these terms, it is another example of the "theory of relativity" in purpose availability to which we have alluded in various places in this chapter. Equality in all aspects of federal employment is now a legal mandate. An agency is certainly within its discretion to determine that fostering racial and ethnic awareness is a valid—perhaps indispensable—means of advancing this objective. This being the case, it is not at all far-fetched to conclude that certain expenditures that might be wholly inappropriate in other contexts could reasonably relate to this purpose. Thus, hiring an African dance troupe could not be justified to further an objective of, for example, conducting a financial audit or constructing a building or procuring a tank, but the relationship changes when the objective is promoting cultural awareness.

Once the concept of the preceding paragraph is understood, it should be apparent why, in 64 Comp. Gen. 802 (1985), GAO distinguished the cultural awareness cases and concluded that the Army [45]Compare B-208729, May 24, 1983, in which an Army unit sponsored a catered luncheon to commemorate Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., but—properly—charged attendees for the meal.

could not use appropriated funds to provide free meals for handicapped employees attending a luncheon in honor of National Employ the Handicapped Week. This is not to say that an agency's EEO program should not embrace the handicapped—on the contrary, it can, should, and is required to—but merely that "[u]nlike ethnic and cultural minorities, handicapped persons do not possess a common cultural heritage" within the intended scope of the cultural awareness cases. Id. at 804 (quoting from the request for decision).

d. Entertainment of Non-Government Personnel

Just as the entertainment of government personnel is generally unauthorized, the entertainment of non-government personnel is equally impermissible. The basic rule is the same regardless of who is being fed or entertained: Appropriated funds are not available for entertainment, including free food, except under specific statutory authority.

Two of the most frequently cited decisions for this proposition are 5 Comp. Gen. 455 (1925) and 26 Comp. Gen. 281 (1946). In 5 Comp. Gen. 455, expenditures by two Army officers for entertaining officials of foreign governments while making arrangements for an around-the-world flight were disallowed. In 26 Comp. Gen. 281, appropriations were held unavailable for dinners and luncheons for "distinguished guests" given by a commissioner of the Philippine War Damage Commission. Other early decisions on point are: 5 Comp. Gen. 1018 (1926); B-85555, June 6, 1949; and A-10221, October 8, 1925. A limited exception was recognized in B-22307, December 23, 1941, to permit entertainment of officials of foreign governments incident to the gathering of intelligence for national security.

As with the cases dealing with government employees, a large proportion of the decisions tend to involve food. In 43 Comp. Gen. 305 (1963), funds were not available to furnish food or refreshments at "recognition ceremonies" for volunteers at Veterans Administration field stations. The ceremonies had been designed as an inducement to the volunteers to continue rendering service. Naturally, the situation would be permissible under specific statutory authority. B-152331, November 19, 1975. Other examples are 26 Comp. Gen. 281, cited above, and B-138081, January 13, 1959, disallowing the cost of a breakfast meeting with Canadian officials called at the initiative of the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Several more recent decisions illustrate the continued application of the rule and some of the exceptions permitted by statute. In 68 Comp. Gen. 226 (1989), the Department of Housing and Urban Development used its research and technology appropriations for entertainment expenses incident to a trade show it sponsored in the Soviet Union. Since HUD had no authority to sponsor the show, the related expenditures were improper. The decision further pointed out that, even if the trade show itself had been authorized, the research and technology appropriations still would not have been available for entertainment, although HUD could then have used its "official reception and representation" funds. See also 65 Comp. Gen. 16 (1985) (free in-flight meals during weather research flight unauthorized for non-government personnel).

In 57 Comp. Gen. 806 (1978), the Comptroller General held that appropriations available to the judiciary for jury expenses could not be used to buy coffee and refreshments for jurors during recesses in trial proceedings. The situation was analogized to the cases prohibiting the purchase of food from appropriated funds for employees working under unusual conditions. The decision noted that statutory authority existed to pay actual subsistence expenses for jurors under sequestration, not an issue in the case at hand. The relevant appropriation language was subsequently amended to provide for refreshments, and the authority was made permanent in 1989.[46]

In a 1979 decision, appropriations of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission were found not available to host a reception for Hispanic leaders in conjunction with a planning conference. B-193661, January 19, 1979. The case fell squarely within the general rule. So did B-205292, June 2, 1982, involving a Fourth of July fireworks display by a Navy station, justified as a community relations measure. While good community relations may be desirable for all government agencies, fireworks are not necessary to the operation and maintenance of the Navy.

The propriety of using appropriated funds to furnish luncheons to public school officials in conjunction with Marine Corps recruiting programs was considered in B-162642, August 9, 1976. A statute authorized reimbursement of necessary expenses incurred by recruiters, and applicable regulations permitted the reimbursement to include small amounts spent for occasional lunches, snacks, or non-alcoholic beverages. GAO, however, did not consider a planned luncheon involving a formal presentation with a guest speaker as within the intended scope of the statute or regulations. Since the statute and regulations were broadly worded, payment in that case was authorized. The decision cautioned, however, against incurring similar expenses in the future unless the regulations were first revised to provide adequate guidelines and limitations.

[46]Departments of Commerce, Justice, and State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-162, 103 Stat. 988, 1012 (1989).

The National Park Service has authority to provide for "interpretive demonstrations" at Park Service sites. 16 U.S.C. § 1a-2(g). GAO reviewed this authority and its legislative history in 68 Comp. Gen. 544 (1989), concluding that it could properly include some level of entertainment, as long as it was sufficiently related to the significance of the particular site. Thus, there was no objection to the 1988 Railroader's Festival at the Golden Spike National Historic Site, which included musical entertainment by a band specializing in railroad and 19th century western American music. (Golden Spike is the site of the completion of the first U.S. transcontinental railroad in 1869.) Similarly within this authority was the decoration of a historic ranch house at the Grant-Kohrs Ranch National Historic Site to "interpret" how the ranch celebrated Christmas during the frontier era. B-226781, January 11, 1988. However, an "open house" with refreshments and a visit by Santa Claus had "too indirect and conjectural a bearing" on the Park Service's mission and was therefore unauthorized. Id.

No discussion of entertainment would be complete without B-182357, December 9, 1975. The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, authorized funds for an informational program to give foreign military trainees a greater exposure to American culture. To implement the program, the Department of Defense set up a program whereby officers would serve as escorts for foreign military trainees to impart to them an active appreciation of American values and ideals. The case involved a voucher submitted by a civilian employee of the Navy for expenses incurred as escort officer for a group of 12 senior foreign naval officers being trained in the United States. The voucher included visits to a variety of restaurants, night clubs, and bars. One of the items was a visit to the Boston Playboy Club. The claimant justified the visit as "symbolic of the United States" and "one of the most enjoyable experiences" the trainees had during their stay in America. Apparently to get more symbolism, the party returned for a second visit. In reviewing the case, the Comptroller General noted that, under the statutory program, the funds could have been given directly to the trainees to be spent as they desired, and the agency would therefore have considerable discretion in spending the money for the trainees. In addition, the regulations provided "no guidance whatsoever" on the limits of the program. Somewhat reluctantly, the Comptroller General was forced to conclude that "the lack of adequate guidance to the escort officer leaves us no alternative but to allow him credit for the expenses incurred."

e. Recreational and Welfare Facilities for Government Personnel

(1) The rules: older cases and modern trends

The basic rule for recreational facilities—which, as we shall see, has become more flexible in recent years—was established in early decisions: Appropriations are not available unless the expenditure is authorized by express statutory provision or by necessary implication. Thus, in 18 Comp. Gen. 147 (1938), appropriations for a river and harbor project on Midway Island were held not available to provide recreational facilities such as athletic facilities and motion pictures for the working force. Similarly, in 27 Comp. Gen. 679 (1948), the Comptroller General advised that Navy appropriations were not available to hire full-time or part-time employees to develop and supervise recreational programs for civilian employees of the Navy. The reason in both cases was that the expenditure would have at best only an indirect bearing on the purposes for which the appropriations were made.

Other early decisions applying the general rule are B-49169, May 5, 1945 (rental of motion picture by Bonneville Power Administration); B-37344, October 14, 1943 (footballs and basketballs for employees in Forest Service camps); and A-55035, May 19, 1934 (billiard tables for Tennessee Valley Authority employees). In B-49169, the Comptroller General pointed out that the Administrator's authority to make such expenditures as he "may find necessary" does not mean anything he may approve, regardless of its nature, but the expenditures must bear a direct relationship to the purposes to be accomplished under the particular legislation.

It follows that, as a general proposition, appropriated funds may not be used to underwrite travel to sports or recreational events since this is not the performance of public business. E.g., 42 Comp.

Gen. 233 (1962). Of course, the particular circumstances may warrant an exception. Thus, appropriations for "student athletic and related activities" at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center may be used to provide limited off-site busing to shopping centers, recreational facilities, and places of worship in the nearest town several miles away. The students—government employees in travel status—must live at the Center for several weeks, most do not have cars, and there is no public transportation to the nearest town. B-214638, August 13, 1984.

One area in which recreational and welfare expenditures have been permitted with some regularity is where employees are located at a remote site, where such facilities would not otherwise be available. Expenditures were permitted in the following cases:

- Purchase of ping pong paddles and balls by the Corps of Engineers to equip a recreation room on a seagoing dredge. B-61076, February 25, 1947.
- Transportation of musical instruments, billiard and ping pong tables, and baseball equipment, obtained from surplus military stock, to isolated Weather Bureau installations in the Arctic. B-144237, November 7, 1960.
- Purchase of playground equipment for children of employees living in a government-owned housing facility in connection with the operation of a dam on the Rio Grande River in an isolated area. 41 Comp. Gen. 264 (1961). The agency in that case had statutory authority to provide recreational facilities for employees and the question was whether that authority extended to employees' families as well. It did.
- Use of an appropriation of the Federal Aviation Administration for construction of "quarters and related accommodations" to provide tennis courts and playground facilities in an isolated sector of the Panama Canal Zone. B-173009, July 20, 1971.
- Purchase of a television set and antenna for use by the crew on a ship owned by the Environmental Protection Agency. The ship was used to gather and evaluate water samples from the Great Lakes and cruises lasted for up to 15 days. The alternative would have been to extend the length of the cruises to permit more frequent docking. 54 Comp. Gen. 1075 (1975).
- Provision of television services for National Weather Service employees on a remote island in the Bering Sea. The agency was authorized to furnish recreational facilities by the Fur Seal Act of 1966, but the statute also required that the employees be charged a reasonable fee. B-186798, September 16, 1976.

In recent decades, the role of certain "employee welfare" activities in employee morale and productivity has been increasingly recognized. In some instances, the recognition has been accompanied by statutory authority. For example, the Defense Department has specific authority to use appropriated funds for welfare and recreation. The authority originated in general provisions contained in annual appropriation acts, and was made permanent in 1983.[47]

The civilian agencies generally do not have comparable statutory authority, and decisions must be made, for the most part, under 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) and the necessary expense doctrine. Even here, however, the rather strict rule of the early decisions has undergone some liberalization, even in non-remote locations. While the general rule expressed in 18 Comp. Gen. 147 and 27 Comp. Gen. 679 remains as a bar to indiscriminate expenditures, it may now be said that an agency has reasonable discretion to spend its money for employee welfare purposes if the expenditure can be said to enhance employee morale and to be a significant factor in hiring and retention. The test remains one of necessity, but it is evaluated in terms of the agency's legitimate interest in the welfare, morale, and productivity of its employees. Determinations must be made on a case-by-case basis.

A good illustration of this evolution is the treatment of programmed "incentive music" (sometimes called "Muzak"[48] or, by its detractors, "elevator music"). When GAO first visited the issue, it concluded that an agency could not, within its legitimate range of discretion, find this to be a "necessary expense." B-86148, November 8, 1950. The issue arose again 20 years later when the Bureau of the Public Debt, Treasury Department, asked if it could use its Salaries and Expenses appropriation to provide programmed incentive music for its employees. The system had been installed by a previous tenant and the speakers were located in central work areas rather than in private offices. The Bureau pointed out that private concerns had found that such music enhanced employee morale by "creating a pleasantly stimulating and efficient atmosphere during the workday" and helped to minimize employee boredom. GAO had rejected similar arguments in the 1950 decision. This time, GAO concurred, accepting the Bureau's justification that the expenditure would improve employee morale and increase productivity. 51 Comp. Gen. 797 (1972), overruling B-86148. In terms of the legal principle involved, whether GAO agreed with the justification or not was irrelevant; all that matters is that the determination is now viewed as a proper exercise of agency discretion.

Another example of a permissible expenditure in this area is the subsidization of employee cafeterias, previously discussed. Still another is parking facilities, discussed later in the section on personal expenses. Two items covered in the section on health and medical care—physical fitness activities and smoking cessation programs—further illustrate evolving trends in the area of employee welfare and morale. A final example is our next topic, child care.

(2) Child care

Like the cultural awareness programs previously discussed, child care is another example of evolution in the law to accommodate a changing society. Not too many decades ago, questions of using appropriated funds to provide child care services for government employees would not have received serious consideration. The typical government employee (male) simply did not need them because his spouse stayed home to take care of the kids. In fact, comprehensive child care legislation was vetoed as recently as 1971.[49]

Times have changed and the federal government, as an employer, is not immune from the changes. The number of single-parent families in America has increased dramatically, as has the number of two-parent families in which both parents work, out of either economic necessity, personal choice, or some combination of factors. The [49]Veto of Economic Opportunity Amendments of 1971 [S. 2007, 92d Cong.], 7 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 1634 (December 11, 1971). The legislation included child care for federal employees. The veto message did express support for child care for welfare recipients and the working poor.

inevitable result is a heightened awareness of the need for child care.[50]

GAO's first written discussion of the authority to spend appropriated funds to provide child care services for government employees, B-39772-O.M., July 30, 1976, was not a decision to another agency but an internal memorandum from the General Counsel analyzing GAO's own authority. GAO was considering establishing a day care center in its own building, to be funded and operated by employees. GAO's administrative officials wanted to know what kinds of support the agency could or could not provide without statutory authority, which, at the time, did not exist.

The General Counsel analyzed the questions from the perspective of purpose availability, and concluded that the Comptroller General could allocate space in the GAO building for a day care center; could use GAO's appropriations to renovate the space and buy equipment; and could assume part or all of the rent payable to the General Services Administration for the space.

However, before any of these things could be done, the Comptroller General, as the agency head, would first have to determine that the expenditure would materially contribute to recruiting or retaining staff or maintaining employee morale and hence efficiency and productivity. Because of the lack of statutory authority, the memorandum cautioned that GAO should disclose any substantial capital expenditures for renovation in its budget presentation and to the Appropriations Committees if it chose to take such action. See also B-205342, December 8, 1981 (non-decision letter), reiterating the general conclusion of the 1976 memorandum. As it turned out, GAO did not establish a day care center until after the enactment of 40 U.S.C. § 490b, discussed below.

Prior to the enactment of more general legislation in 1985, some agencies had authority to provide day care facilities under agency-specific legislation. For example, legislation authorized the (then) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to donate space for day care centers. In 57 Comp. Gen. 357 (1978), the Comptroller [50]Some GAO reports on child care in the federal sector are: Child Care: Employer Assistance for Private Sector and Federal Employees, GAO/GGD-86-38 (February 11, 1986); Military Child Care Programs: Progress Made, More Needed, GAO/FPCD-82-30 (June 1, 1982); Child Care: Availability for Civilian Dependents at Selected DOD Installations, GAO/HRD-88-115 (September 15, 1988).

General held that the use of the term "donate" gave the agency discretion to provide the space without charge, or to lease space in other buildings for that purpose if suitable space was not available in buildings the agency already occupied. Also, as we have seen, the Defense Department has specific authority to use Operation and Maintenance appropriations for welfare expenditures.

In 1985, Congress enacted 40 U.S.C. § 490b, which authorizes, but does not require, federal agencies to provide space and services for child care centers. The term "services" is defined as including "lighting, heating, cooling, electricity, office furniture, office machines and equipment, telephone service (including installation of lines and equipment . . .), and security systems . . . ." Id. § 490b(b)(3).[51] The space and services may be provided with or without charge.

The Comptroller General's first opportunity to construe 40 U.S.C. § 490b came in response to an arbitration panel award that included a union day care proposal for the children of civilian employees. Council 214, American Federation of Government Employees, AFL-CIO, 15 F.L.R.A. 151 (1984), aff'd sub nom. Department of the Air Force v. Federal Labor Relations Authority, 775 F.2d 727 (6th Cir. 1985). The FLRA directed the Air Force to incorporate the award in its collective bargaining agreement,[52] and the Air Force in turn asked GAO whether, under 40 U.S.C.§ 490b, it had authority to use its appropriations to implement the award. The resulting decision, 67 Comp. Gen. 443 (1988), reached the following conclusions:

- The Air Force can, either with or without charge, allot space in government buildings under its control for child care facilities for civilian employees, and can provide the services outlined in the statute.
- The Air Force can use its appropriations to renovate, modify, or expand the space allotted to make it suitable for use as a child care facility.
- The Air Force can expand existing child care facilities for military personnel to accommodate the children of civilian employees.

[51]The definition was patterned generally after the statute authorizing agencies to provide space to federal credit unions, 12 U.S.C. § 1770, discussed in 66 Comp. Gen. 356 (1987).

[52]The fact that day care is involved cannot be determined from either opinion, both of which discuss procedural issues.

February 7, 1956; B-125404, September 16, 1955; B-51630, September 11, 1945; B-27425, August 7, 1942; A-22070, March 30, 1928.

For example, in preparing its budget request for a Salaries and Expenses appropriation, an agency will typically include such items as employee salaries, travel, training, incentive awards, contributions to health insurance and retirement, etc. An ensuing lump-sum appropriation in the simple form "for salaries and expenses, $X" will be legally available for all of the items specified.

A corollary to this rule is that the lack of a specific budget request for an item does not preclude an agency from making an expenditure for that item from a lump-sum appropriation which is otherwise available for items of that type. E.g., B-149163, June 27, 1962. See also 20 Comp. Gen. 631 (1941); B-198234, March 25, 1981.[5] Suppose in our previous example the agency neglected to budget for incentive awards for FY 1990. Since incentive awards are an authorized category of expenditure under a Salaries and Expenses appropriation and do not require specific appropriation language, the agency's 1990 S&E appropriation would be legally available for incentive awards, notwithstanding the absence of a budget estimate, provided the agency had enough discretionary money left in the account.

The second basic rule is as follows: The inclusion of an item in departmental budget estimates for an expenditure which is otherwise prohibited by law, and the subsequent appropriation of funds without specific reference to the item, do not constitute authority for the proposed expenditure or make the appropriation available for that purpose. 26 Comp. Gen. 545, 547 (1947); 6 Comp. Gen. 573 (1927); B-76841, August 23, 1948. See also 18 Comp. Gen. 533 (1938). Burying an item prohibited by law in budget justifications and then claiming that Congress must have intended to include that item because it was there in black and white in the budget materials and Congress did not object, is not enough. An appropriation would be available for an otherwise prohibited item only if it makes specific reference to the item. Congress can, in effect, "waive" a statutory prohibition, but it must do so explicitly. As the discussion

[5]These two cases do not explicitly state that there was no budget request for the item in question, although it is apparent from the context.

The decision also concluded that any reimbursements received from a child care center (which, as noted, are optional under 40 U.S.C. § 490b) must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

In 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-239708, January 31, 1991), GAO concluded that 40 U.S.C. § 490b does not preclude the General Services Administration from leasing space or constructing buildings for child care facilities if there is insufficient space available in existing federal buildings. The authority in section 490b to use existing space is not exclusive. (The 1988 decision to the Air Force, 67 Comp. Gen. 443, had expressed a contrary view and was overruled to that extent.)

In late 1989, Congress enacted new child care legislation for the armed forces, including the authority to use fees collected from parents. Military Child Care Act of 1989, title XV of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Years 1990 and 1991, Pub. L. No. 101-189, 103 Stat. 1352, 1589 (1989).

f. Reception and Representation Funds

Implicit in all of our discussion of entertainment is the point that otherwise improper expenditures may be authorized under specific statutory authority. Congress has long recognized that many agencies have a legitimate need for items that otherwise would be prohibited as entertainment, and has responded by making limited amounts available for official entertainment to those agencies which can justify the need. Entertainment appropriations originated from the need to permit officials of agencies whose activities involve substantial contact with foreign officials to reciprocate for courtesies extended to them by foreign officials. For example, the State Department would find it difficult to accomplish its mission if it could not spend any money entertaining foreign officials. In fact, some of the early entertainment appropriations were limited to entertaining non-U.S. citizens, and some could only be spent overseas. An example of the latter type is discussed in B-46169, December 21, 1944. Restrictions of this nature have become increasingly uncommon.

Entertainment appropriations may take various forms. Some agencies have their own well-established structures which may include permanent legislation. For example, the State Department has permanent authorization to pay for official entertainment. 22 U.S.C. § 4085. See also 22 U.S.C. § 2671, which authorizes expenditures for "unforeseen emergencies" which may include official entertainment in certain contexts. The authority of 22 U.S.C. § 4085 is implemented by means of annual appropriations under the heading "Representation Allowances."[53] State Department representation allowances have been found available for rental of formal evening wear by embassy officials accompanying the Ambassador to the United Kingdom in presenting his credentials to the Queen, 68 Comp. Gen. 638 (1989); hiring extra waiters and busboys to serve at official functions at foreign posts, 64 Comp. Gen. 138 (1984); and meals for certain embassy officials at Rotary Club meetings in Tanzania, if approved by the local Chief of Mission, B-232165, June 14, 1989. A GAO fact sheet reviewing expenditures at selected overseas posts is Representational Funds: State Department Expenditures at Selected Posts, GAO/NSIAD-87-73FS (February 1987).

The Defense Department also has its own structure. Under 10 U.S.C. § 127, the Secretary of Defense, or of a military department, within the limitations of appropriations made for that purpose, may use funds to "provide for any emergency or extraordinary expense which cannot be anticipated or classified." When so provided in an appropriation, the official may spend the funds "for any purpose he determines to be proper." Annual Operation and Maintenance appropriations include amounts for "emergencies and extraordinary expenses."[54] Although the title is not particularly revealing, it has long been understood that official representation expenses are charged to this account. See Internal Controls: Defense's Use of Emergency and Extraordinary Funds, GAO/AFMD-86-44 (June 4, 1986); DOD Use of Official Representation Funds to Entertain Foreign Dignitaries, GAO/ID-83-7 (December 29, 1982); 69 Comp. Gen. 197 (1990) (reception for newly assigned commander at U.S. Army School of the Americas); B-221257-O.M., February 6, 1986.

With these two major exceptions, most agencies follow a similar pattern and receive their entertainment funds, if they receive them at all, simply as part of their annual appropriations. The appropriation may specify that it will be available for "entertainment." See, e.g., B-20085, September 10, 1941. Far more commonly, however, the term used in the appropriation is "official reception and representation." This has come to be the technical "appropriations language" for entertainment.

[54]E.g., Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-165, 103 Stat. 1112, 1115 (Army, Navy), 1116 (Air Force, Defense Agencies) (1989).

While we cannot guarantee that one does not exist somewhere, we have not found a congressional definition of the term "official reception and representation." Absent a definition, we found it instructive to review agency justifications to see what sort of authority Congress thought it was conferring. The term seems to have originated—or at least became more widespread—in the early 1960's. We identified the first appearance of the term for a number of agencies, and selected two, the Departments of Agriculture and Interior, as illustrative. Both agencies first received "official R&R" funds in their appropriations for fiscal year 1963.[55]

The Department of Agriculture explained that the Secretary frequently finds it necessary to provide a luncheon or similar courtesy to various individuals and small groups in the conduct of official business, to promote effective working relationships with farm, trade, industry, and other groups which are directly related to accomplishing the Department's work. Such official courtesies benefit the government, and the Secretary and Under Secretary should not be required to bear these expenses from their own personal funds as was then the case. In conclusion, the justification observed that "[i]t is unseemly that the hospitality should always be left to the visitor."[56] Similarly, the Department of the Interior explained that its request for "not to exceed $2,000 for official reception and representation expenses" was intended to provide authority to use appropriated funds for expenses incurred by the Secretary "in fulfilling the courtesy and social responsibilities directly associated with his official duties," in situations much like those the Agriculture Department had noted. Such official expenses, the justification asserted, "rightly should be borne by the Government rather than be financed from personal funds."[57]

One point that is clear from these excerpts is that an R&R appropriation, whatever its origins may have been, is not limited to the entertainment of foreign nationals, unless of course the appropriation language so provides. The experience of the former Department of Health, Education, and Welfare provides further evidence that, absent some indication to the contrary, Congress does not intend that an "official R&R" appropriation be limited to entertaining foreign nationals. The Secretary of HEW first received an entertainment appropriation in HEW's FY 1960 appropriation act, but it was limited to certain foreign visitors.[58] The language was changed to "official reception and representation" in HEW's FY 1964 appropriation.[59] The conference report on the 1964 appropriation explained that the change was intended to expand the scope of the appropriation to include U.S. citizens as well as foreign visitors.[60]

It is clear that R&R appropriations have traditionally been sought, justified, and granted in the context of an agency's need to interact with various non-government individuals or organizations. Precisely who these individuals or organizations might be will vary with the agency. Of course, the fact that the thrust of the appropriation is the entertainment of non-government persons does not mean that government persons are precluded. For example, it has long been recognized that persons from other agencies (and by necessary implication members of the host agency as well) may be included incident to an authorized entertainment function for non-government persons. E.g., B-84184, March 17, 1949.

An agency has wide discretion in the use of its R&R appropriation. 61 Comp. Gen. 260, 266 (1982); B-212634, October 12, 1983. As a general proposition, "official agency events, typically characterized by a mixed ceremonial, social and/or business purpose, and hosted in a formal sense by high level agency officials" and relating to a function of the agency will not be questioned. B-223678, June 5, 1989. Accordingly, R&R funds have been found available for the following:

In a case previously noted in our coverage of award ceremonies, the Veterans Administration could not use its general appropriations to provide refreshments at an awards ceremony for volunteers, but it could use its R&R appropriation. 43 Comp. Gen. 305 (1963). An agency may also use its R&R funds, although it is not required to, for refreshments at award ceremonies under the Government Employees' Incentive Awards Act. 65 Comp. Gen. 738, 741 n.5.

As discussed later in our section on personal expenses, appropriated funds are not available for business or calling cards. However, R&R appropriations are available for business cards for employees whose jobs include representation. B-223678, June 5, 1989. Business cards, as the decision states, are a legitimate and accepted representation device.[62]

A case relied on in B-223678 was B-122515, February 23, 1955, in which the Comptroller General held that a "representation allowance" similar to the State Department appropriation discussed above could be used to purchase printed invitation cards and envelopes in connection with an official function at an overseas mission. In 42 Comp. Gen. 19 (1962) and in B-131611, May 24, 1957, however, a similar appropriation to the Foreign Agricultural Service

[61]The decision modified the result of an earlier decision, B-46169, December 21, 1944, based on a change in the relevant appropriation language. The 1944 decision contains a fuller statement of the facts.

[62]A possible impediment to implementation of this decision is the prohibition in the Government Printing and Binding Regulations on the printing or engraving of business cards. The decision advised the agency to consult the Joint Committee on Printing before spending the money.

was not available for printed invitations because an executive order provided that the Foreign Agricultural Service was to be governed by State Department regulations, and the applicable State Department regulations prohibited the use of representation allowances for printing cards.

Notwithstanding the discretion it confers, an R&R appropriation is not intended to permit government officials to feed themselves and one another incident to the normal day-to-day performance of their jobs. Thus, GAO has held that R&R funds may not be used to provide food or refreshments at intra-government work sessions or routine business meetings, even if held outside of normal working hours. B-223678, June 5, 1989.

A final but significant limitation on the use of representation funds stems from the appropriation language itself—R&R appropriations are made for the expenses of official reception and representation activities. There must be some connection with official agency business. Thus, it would be improper to use representation funds for a social function hosted and attended by private parties, such as a breakfast for Cabinet wives. 61 Comp. Gen. 260 (1982), affirmed upon reconsideration, B-206173, August 3, 1982. Similarly, R&R funds may not be used for entertainment incident to an activity which is itself unauthorized. 68 Comp. Gen. 226 (1989) (entertainment incident to trade show in Soviet Union which agency had no authority to sponsor). The impropriety of the underlying activity necessarily "taints" the entertainment expenditures.

6. Fines and Penalties

As a general proposition, no authority exists for the federal government to use appropriated funds to pay fines or penalties incurred as a result of its activities or those of its employees.

In the most common situation, a fine is assessed against an individual employee for some action he or she took in the course of performing official duties. The cases frequently involve traffic violations. The rule is that appropriated funds are not available to pay the fine or reimburse the employee. The theory is that, while an employee may have certain discretion as to precisely how to perform a given task, the range of permissible discretion does not include violating the law. If the employee chooses to violate the law, he is acting beyond the scope of his authority and must bear any resulting liability as his personal responsibility.

The earliest case stating the rule appears to be B-58378, July 31, 1946. Holding that a government employee ticketed for parking a government vehicle in a "no parking" zone could not be reimbursed, the Comptroller General stated:

> "[T]here is not known to this office any authority to use appropriated moneys for payment of the amount of a fine imposed by a court on a Government employee for an offense committed by him while in the performance of, but not as a part of, his official duty. Such fine is imposed on the employee personally and payment thereof is his personal responsibility."

The rule applies to forfeitures of collateral as well as fines. B-102829, May 8, 1951.

The first published decision stating the rule, and the case most often cited, is 31 Comp. Gen. 246 (1952). A government employee double-parked a government vehicle to make a delivery. While the employee was inside the building, the inner vehicle drove away, leaving the government vehicle unattended in the middle of the street, whereupon it was ticketed. Citing B-58378 and B-102829, the Comptroller General held that the employee could not be reimbursed from appropriated funds for the amount of the fine.[63]

GAO has applied the rule even in a case where the employee could establish that the speedometer on the government vehicle was inaccurate. B-173660, November 18, 1971. While at first glance this might seem like a harsh and unfair result, it in fact was not, at least in that particular case. In that case, the employee was ticketed for driving at 85 mph. The speedometer at the time read a mere 73 mph. Conceding the established inaccuracy of the speedometer, the employee nevertheless, by observing other vehicles on the road and applying common sense, should have suspected that he was driving at an excessive rate of speed.

The very statement of the rule as quoted above from B-58378 suggests that there may be situations in which reimbursement is permissible. The exception occurred in 44 Comp. Gen. 312 (1964). In connection with the case of Sam Giancana v. J. Edgar Hoover, 322 F.2d 789 (7th Cir. 1963), an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation was ordered by the court to answer certain questions. Based on Justice Department regulations and specific instructions from the Attorney General, the FBI agent refused to testify and was fined for contempt of court. The contempt order was upheld in Sam Giancana v. Marlin W. Johnson, 335 F.2d 372 (7th Cir. 1964). Finding that the employee had incurred the fine by reason of his compliance with Department regulations and instructions and that he was without fault or negligence, GAO held that the FBI could reimburse the agent from its Salaries and Expenses appropriation under the "necessary expense" doctrine.[64]

Subsequently, some people thought that 31 Comp. Gen. 246 and 44 Comp. Gen. 312 appeared inconsistent, and GAO has discussed the two lines of reasoning in several later decisions. The distinction is this: In 31 Comp. Gen. 246, the offense was committed while performing official duties but it was not a necessary part of those duties. The employee could have made the delivery without parking illegally. The fine in 44 Comp. Gen. 312 was "necessarily incurred" in the sense that the employee was following his agency's regulations and the instructions of his agency head. Thus, the actions that gave rise to the contempt fine could be viewed as a necessary part of the employee's official duties, although certainly not in the sense that it would have been physically impossible for the employee to have done anything else.

Applying these concepts, the Comptroller General held in B-205438, November 12, 1981, that the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service could reimburse a former employee for a contempt fine levied against him for refusal to testify, pursuant to agency regulations and instructions, on matters discussed at a mediation session at which he was present while employed by the agency.

Reimbursement was denied, however, in B-186680, October 4, 1976. There, a Justice Department attorney was fined for contempt for missing a court-imposed deadline. The attorney had been working under a number of tight deadlines and argued that it was impossible to meet them all. However, he had not been acting in compliance with regulations or instructions, had exercised his own judgment in missing the deadline in question, and the record did not support a determination that he was without fault or negligence in [64]The decision further held that a contempt fine, even though imposed by court order, is not a judgment against the United States and may not be paid from the permanent judgment appropriation, 31 U.S.C. § 1304.

the matter. Therefore, the case was governed by 31 Comp. Gen. 246 rather than 44 Comp. Gen. 312.

Reading all of these cases together, it seems fair to state that the mere fact of compliance with instructions will not by itself be sufficient to authorize reimbursement. There must be some legitimate government interest to protect. Thus, it would not be sufficient to instruct an employee to refuse to testify where the purpose is to avoid embarrassment or to avoid the disclosure of government wrongdoing. Similarly, it would follow that the prohibition against reimbursement of traffic fines could not be circumvented merely because some supervisor instructed a subordinate to park illegally.

The two lines of cases were discussed in the specific context of traffic violations in B-107081, January 22, 1980, a response to a Member of Congress. Summarizing the rules discussed above, the Comptroller General pointed out that they applied equally to law enforcement personnel. However, the Comptroller General alluded to one situation in which reimbursement might be authorized—a parking fine incurred by a law enforcement official as a necessary part of an official investigation. An example might be parking an unmarked undercover vehicle during a surveillance where there was no other feasible alternative. Compare 38 Comp. Gen. 258 (1958) concerning the reimbursement of parking meter fees.

Another situation in which a fine was held reimbursable is illustrated in 57 Comp. Gen. 476 (1978). Forest Service employees had loaded logs on a truck to transport them from Virginia to West Virginia. In Virginia, the driver was fined for improper loading (overweight on rear axle). The employees had loaded the logs in a forest and there was no way for them to have checked the weight. The fine did not result from any negligent or intentional act on the part of the driver. Under these circumstances, the Comptroller General found that the fine was not for any personal wrongdoing by the employee but was, in effect, a citation against the United States. Therefore, Forest Service appropriations were available to reimburse the fine. This situation is distinguishable from the case of an overweight fine levied against a commercial carrier, which is not reimbursable. 35 Comp. Gen. 317 (1955). A more recent case discussing similar issues in the context of a leased vehicle is 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-239511, December 31, 1990).

Similar reasoning applies with respect to penalties in the form of liquidated damages assessed against a government employee who fails to either use or cancel airline reservations in accordance with the carrier's applicable tariff. If the charges are unavoidable in the conduct of official travel or are incurred for reasons beyond the traveler's control and acceptable to the agency concerned, they may be reimbursed from the agency's travel appropriations. However, if the charges are not unavoidable in the performance of official business nor incurred for reasons beyond the employee's control and acceptable to the agency, they are personal to the employee and may not be reimbursed. 41 Comp. Gen. 806 (1962).

The cases discussed so far have all involved fines levied against individual employees. Questions may also arise over the liability of a federal agency for a fine or civil penalty. The question is essentially one of sovereign immunity. In order for a federal agency to be liable for a fine or penalty, there must be an express statutory waiver of sovereign immunity. E.g., Ohio v. United States Department of Energy, 904 F.2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1990).

For example, the Clean Air Act provides for the administrative imposition of civil penalties for violation of state or local air quality standards. The statute directs the federal government to comply with these standards and makes government agencies liable for the civil penalties to the same extent as nongovernmental entities. In view of this express waiver of sovereign immunity, the Comptroller General held that agency operating appropriations are available, under the "necessary expense" theory, to pay administratively imposed civil penalties under the Clean Air Act. B-191747, June 6, 1978. If the penalty is imposed by court action, it may be paid from the permanent judgment appropriation, 31 U.S.C. § 1304. However, if there is no legitimate dispute over the basis for liability or the amount of the penalty, an agency may not avoid use of its own appropriations by the simple device of refusing to pay and forcing the state or local authority to sue. 58 Comp. Gen. 667 (1979).

Absent the requisite statutory waiver of sovereign immunity, the agency's appropriations would not be available to pay a fine or penalty. For example, in 65 Comp. Gen. 61 (1985), appropriated funds were not available to pay a "fee," which was clearly in the nature of a penalty, imposed by a City of Boston ordinance for equipment malfunctions resulting in the transmission of false fire of repeal by implication in Chapter 2 points out, mention of the prohibited item in a lump-sum appropriation's legislative history is similarly insufficient to authorize the expenditure.

Finally, there is a middle-ground in limited circumstances. If an item is questionable but not clearly prohibited, and legislative history indicates that Congress intended to include that item in a lump-sum appropriation, GAO will regard the appropriation as available for the expenditure. E.g., A-30714, March 1, 1930. See also "Ratification by Appropriation" in Chapter 2.

3. New or Additional Duties

Appropriation acts tend to be bunched at certain times of the year while substantive legislation may be enacted any time. A frequently recurring situation is where a statute is passed imposing new duties on an agency but not providing any additional appropriations. The question is whether implementation of the new statute must wait until additional funds are appropriated, or whether the agency can use its existing appropriations to carry out the new function, either pending receipt of further funding through the normal budget process or in the absence of additional appropriations (assuming in either case the absence of contrary congressional intent).

The rule is that existing agency appropriations which generally cover the type of expenditures involved are available to defray the expenses of new or additional duties imposed by proper legal authority. The test for availability is whether the duties imposed by the new law bear a sufficient relationship to the purposes for which the previously-enacted appropriation was made so as to justify the use of that appropriation for the new duties.

For example, in the earliest published decision cited for the rule, the Comptroller General held that the Securities and Exchange Commission could use its general operating appropriation for fiscal year 1936 to perform additional duties imposed on it by the later-enacted Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. 15 Comp. Gen. 167 (1935).

Similarly, the Interior Department could use its 1979 "Departmental Management" appropriation to begin performing duties imposed by the Public Utilities Regulatory Policies Act of 1978, and to provide reimbursable support costs for the Endangered Species alarms. See also B-227388, September 3, 1987 (no authority to pay false alarm fines imposed by municipality).

What about a penalty assessed by one federal agency against another? In B-161457, May 9, 1978, the Comptroller General held that, absent a statute specifically so providing, an agency's appropriations are not available to pay penalties assessed by the Internal Revenue Service for late filing or underpayment of employment taxes. The reason is that this would constitute a use of the funds for a purpose other than that for which they were appropriated.

7. Firefighting and Other Municipal Services

a. Firefighting Services: Availability of Appropriations

A frequent subject of inquiry has been the authority of the federal government to voluntarily contract, or to pay involuntary assessments, for firefighting services rendered by local governments to federal property and buildings. The general rule is: If the political subdivision rendering the service is required by law to extinguish fires within its boundaries, then the United States cannot make additional payments in any form to underwrite that legal responsibility. The earliest published decision containing a detailed discussion of the rule and its rationale is 24 Comp. Gen. 599 (1945).

The rule proceeds from the premise that firefighting is a governmental rather than a proprietary or business function. Where a local firefighting organization (city or county fire department, fire protection district, etc.) is required by local law to cover a particular territorial area and to respond to fires without direct charge to the property owners, this duty extends to federal as well as nonfederal property within that territorial area. A charge to appropriated funds under these circumstances would amount to a tax or a payment in lieu of taxes and would, absent specific statutory authority, violate the government's constitutional immunity from taxation. It follows that the government may not contract for firefighting services which it would be legally entitled to receive in any event,[65] nor may it reimburse a political subdivision for the additional costs incurred in fighting a federal fire.[66] See 53 Comp. Gen. 410 (1973) and cases cited therein. In addition to the taxation problem, use of appropriated funds for this purpose would violate 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). 32 Comp. Gen. 91 (1952).

Limited reimbursement authority now exists by virtue of the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974, discussed later in this section. The present discussion concerns the availability of appropriations apart from that limited authority.

In applying the rule, it is irrelevant that a city cannot regulate building and fire codes for structures on a military establishment within the city limits. 24 Comp. Gen. 599 (1945). Also, the rule applies equally when the fire protection is provided by a volunteer fire department performing the mandatory governmental function for a political subdivision. The fact that the firefighters are unpaid does not affect the local government unit's legal duty to render the service. 26 Comp. Gen. 382 (1946); B-47142, April 3, 1970.

In 53 Comp. Gen. 410 (1973), GAO denied a claim by the St. Louis Community Fire Protection District and several surrounding fire districts and departments for equipment losses and supplemental payroll expenses incurred in fighting a massive fire at the St. Louis Federal Records Center. The St. Louis CFPD could not be reimbursed because the Records Center was within its territorial responsibility. The surrounding fire districts were also under a duty to respond to the alarm because they had entered into mutual aid agreements with the St. Louis CFPD which had the effect of extending their own areas of responsibility.

In some rural areas, firefighting services may be unavailable or very limited. In such areas, the government may have to provide its own fire protection. The Comptroller General had held, in 32 Comp. Gen. 91 (1952), that an agency could not enter into "mutual aid agreements" to extend that service to the general community beyond the boundaries of government property, even where the local inhabitants were predominantly government employees and where the additional protection could be accomplished without additional expense. Later, Congress enacted legislation specifically authorizing reciprocal agreements for mutual aid. 42 U.S.C.

[66]In addition to the cases cited in the text, see B-167709, September 9, 1969; B-153911, December 6, 1968; B-147731, January 22, 1962.

§§ 1856–1856d. This statutory authority is limited to mutual aid agreements and does not authorize an agency to enter into an agreement to reimburse a political subdivision for services unilaterally provided to the government. 35 Comp. Gen. 311, 313 (1955); B-126228, January 6, 1956; B-40387-O.M., June 24, 1966. An agency participating in a mutual aid agreement under this authority may contribute, on a basis comparable to other participants, to a common fund to be used for training and equipment incident to responding to fires and related emergencies such as hazardous waste accidents. B-222821, April 6, 1987.

If the government may not contract for or reimburse fire protection services which a local entity is legally required to provide, it follows that the government may not pay a "service charge" for fire protection provided by a municipality with respect to federal property within the city limits, at least where the assessment for fire protection is normally included in the city's property tax. In 49 Comp. Gen. 284 (1969), the city of New London, Connecticut, sought to charge the government on a direct cost-related basis for fire protection afforded the United States Coast Guard Academy. Fire protection was included in the city's real estate tax and the "service charge" was to apply only to tax-exempt property. In view of the city's duty to provide fire protection to the Academy, the Comptroller General found the proposed charge to be an unconstitutional tax on the government. See also B-160936, March 13, 1967. However, a flat-fee service charge levied by a utility district for extinguishing a fire in a postal vehicle was held permissible where the utility district was under no legal obligation to provide the service. B-123294, May 2, 1955.

In B-168024, December 13, 1973, a city was required to provide fire protection to all property within its boundaries, but was given the option under state law of financing the fire protection by service charges rather than from general tax revenues. In these circumstances, it was held that the United States could pay a valid service charge, although the charge in that particular case was held to be a tax and therefore invalid because it was based on the value of the property rather than the quantum of services provided. The decision contains a useful discussion of the distinction between a service charge and a tax.[67]

[67]For more on the distinction between a tax and a service charge, see "Other Municipal Services" later in this section, and Section C.15.

Because the rule is predicated on the existence of state laws requiring political subdivisions to provide firefighting services, it would not apply in instances where there is no entitlement to service. Thus, reimbursement was allowed in 3 Comp. Gen. 979 (1924) where a fire unit had no legal duty to respond to an emergency call outside its district. It was further noted that there was no violation of the prohibition on accepting voluntary services found in 31 U.S.C. § 1342 (part of the Antideficiency Act). Similarly, a contractual agreement for fire protection with the nearest fire district may be proper where the federal property in question is not served by any fire district. 35 Comp. Gen. 311 (1955). Under the same theory, the Comptroller General held that the Bureau of Indian Affairs could make a financial contribution to the "Community Fire Truck," a volunteer firefighting organization which otherwise would have been under no obligation to respond to fires at an Indian school outside the limits of the city served by the organization. 34 Comp. Gen. 195 (1954). See also B-163089, February 8, 1968; B-123294, May 2, 1955. However, there is no authority to pay for fire services rendered without a pre-existing legal obligation if such services were necessary to protect adjoining state or privately-owned property as to which such a legal duty existed. 30 Comp. Gen. 376 (1951).

A variation occurred in B-116333-O.M., October 15, 1953, in which it was held permissible to reimburse a private firefighting enterprise for repair and maintenance service to hydrants and fire alarm boxes on a government-owned and operated housing facility, irrespective of the duty of the municipality.

In the analysis of legal duty to provide protection, it is irrelevant that the government may have engaged in an activity causing the fire. 32 Comp. Gen. 401 (1953); B-167709, September 9, 1969; B-147731, December 28, 1961; B-6400, August 28, 1940.[68] Similarly, there is no estoppel created by the fact that the United States operated its own fire protection at a given installation for a period of time. If the legal duty to provide protection exists, the United States is entitled to claim protection at any time its own service

An exception to the general rule may exist in the case of a "federal enclave." This term usually describes large tracts of land held under exclusive federal jurisdiction. In 45 Comp. Gen. 1 (1965), the Comptroller General held that, despite locally available protection, a federal enclave could provide its own fire protection on a contract basis. Further, adjacent land under federal control but not part of the federal enclave could be protected under the same contractual arrangement. However, an additional factor in 45 Comp. Gen. 1 was that legitimate doubt existed as to whether the fire district was under a legal obligation under state law to provide services to the federal property involved, and the district had petitioned the state government to redraw its boundaries to exclude the federal property. The effect of this factor is unclear, and since that time, no case has been decided in which a federal enclave was involved. Note that the threatened exclusion of the federal property was based on a legitimate doubt as to whether protection was required by state law. If protection is required, exclusion would be improper. See B-129013, September 20, 1956. Cf. B-192641, May 2, 1979 (non-decision letter) (questioning a redistricting to exclude federal property which was not a federal enclave).

A 1981 decision addressed the authority of the Bureau of Land Management to contract with rural fire districts in Oregon and Washington for fire protection and firefighting services for federally-owned timberlands in those states. The Comptroller General reviewed the principles and precedents established over the years and concluded that, since the fire districts were legally required to protect the federal tracts, the Bureau could not enter into the desired contracts without specific statutory authority. However, Bureau installations with a federally-maintained firefighting capacity could enter into mutual aid agreements under 42 U.S.C. § 1856, discussed above. 60 Comp. Gen. 637 (1981).

b. Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974

In light of the huge losses suffered by local fire districts in the 1973 St. Louis Records Center fire, the need for some legislative action became apparent. The result was section 11 of the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974, 15 U.S.C. § 2210. This provision allows a fire service fighting a fire on federal property to file a claim for the direct expenses and direct losses incurred. The claim is filed with the United States Fire Administration, Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA).[69] The amount allowable is the amount by which the additional firefighting costs, over and above the claimant's normal operating costs, exceed the total of any payments made by the United States to the claimant or its parent jurisdiction for the support of fire services on the property in question, including taxes and payments in lieu of taxes.

FEMA, upon determining the amount allowable, must forward it to the Treasury Department for payment. The Comptroller General has determined that section 11 constitutes a permanent indefinite appropriation for the payment of these claims. B-160998, April 13, 1978. Disputes under section 11 may be adjudicated in the United States Claims Court. FEMA has issued implementing regulations at 44 C.F.R. Part 151.

Notwithstanding this authority, the decisions discussed previously in this section remain significant for several reasons. First, they define the extent to which an agency may use its own appropriations apart from 15 U.S.C. § 2210. Second, they define the extent to which an agency may contract for fire protection services. Finally, section 11 provides that payment shall be subject to reimbursement by the federal agency under whose jurisdiction the fire occurred, "from any appropriations which may be available or which may be made available for the purpose." Although no decision has been rendered on this point, it would seem that the existing body of decisions provides a starting point in determining the extent to which an agency's operating appropriations "may be available" to make this reimbursement.

c. Other Municipal Services

The principles involved in the firefighting cases are relevant to other municipal services as well.

The closest analogy is police protection. Like fire protection, police protection is a mandatory governmental function. Thus a municipality may not levy direct charges against the United States for ordinary police protective services provided within its area of jurisdiction. 49 Comp. Gen. 284, 286-87 (1969); B-187733, October 27, 1977. However, the United States may pay on a quantum meruit basis for police services over and above the ordinary level, where the city is not required to provide such extraordinary services and where the same charge would be imposed on non-federal users in like circumstances. Examples are: extra police for special events such as football games at the Coast Guard Academy (49 Comp. Gen. at 287); special police details at Bicentennial ceremonies (B-187733, October 27, 1977).

[69]The function was transferred to FEMA from the Commerce Department by Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1978.

The same principles have been applied to emergency ambulance services required to be furnished by a municipality. 49 Comp. Gen. 284. However, contracts with state or local governments or private entities for ambulance services have been held permissible where there was no requirement for the political subdivision involved to provide ambulance services without direct charge. 51 Comp. Gen. 444 (1972), modifying B-172945, June 22, 1971; B-198032, June 3, 1981. Another example is the maintenance of public highways. See B-199205, April 27, 1981.

A charge for services rendered by a state or local government to the United States is to be distinguished from a tax; the former may be paid while the latter may not. E.g., 20 Comp. Gen. 748 (1941). While this distinction does not apply to mandatory governmental functions such as police and fire protection, it has frequently been cited in connection with such things as water and sewer services. As a general proposition, a charge for water and/or sewer services is a permissible service charge rather than a tax if it is based on the quantum of direct services actually furnished. See 31 Comp. Gen. 405 (1952) (assessment for water/sewer services levied on city-wide basis rather than quantum of service rendered held a tax); 29 Comp. Gen. 120 (1949) (sewer service charge held payable on quantum meruit basis); 20 Comp. Gen. 206 (1940) (water charge held to be a tax where it was levied as a flat charge rather than on the basis of actual water consumption). See also 49 Comp. Gen. 284 (1969); B-168024, December 13, 1973; B-105117, March 16, 1953.

A reasonable charge based on the quantum of direct services actually furnished need not be considered a tax even though the services in question are provided to the taxpayers of the political subdivision without a direct charge, provided of course that the political subdivision is not required by law to furnish the service without direct charge. Such a charge may be paid if it is applied equally to all tax-exempt property, but not if it applies only to federal tax-exempt property. 50 Comp. Gen. 343 (1970).

A sewer service charge which is otherwise proper may be paid in advance if required by local law, notwithstanding 31 U.S.C. § 3324. The government's liability would also include late payment penalties to the extent required by local law. 39 Comp. Gen. 285 (1959).

GAO has applied the same principles to charges for 9-1-1 emergency service. In a series of cases, GAO examined 9-1-1 charges in several states and found that they amounted to a tax and therefore could not be assessed against the United States or its agencies. 66 Comp. Gen. 385 (1987) (Florida); 65 Comp. Gen. 879 (1986) (Maryland); 64 Comp. Gen. 655 (1985) (Texas); B-230691, May 12, 1988 (Tennessee); B-239608, December 14, 1990 (non-decision letter) (Rhode Island). One decision stated:

> "In our view, telephone access to police, fire and other municipal services is intrinsically connected to the services themselves. The fact that 9-1-1 service is more technologically sophisticated than normal telephone access does not change its essential character." 66 Comp. Gen. at 386.

In each case, the charges were included in telephone bills, with the telephone company acting as collection agent for the relevant governmental authority. As noted in 66 Comp. Gen. 385, 387, a 9-1-1 fee might be properly payable if a telephone company installed and operated the system itself and, as with directory assistance for example, offered the service as a component of its regular communications services. However, in none of the situations examined was this the case.

Several characteristics of the systems support the conclusion of non-liability: the service is provided by a local government or quasi-governmental unit; public funding of the service requires legal authority such as an ordinance or referendum; and the charge is not related to actual levels of service but is based on a flat rate per telephone line. 65 Comp. Gen. at 881. It is irrelevant that the 9-1-1 charge is called a "service charge" (B-230691) or a "service fee" (64 Comp. Gen. 655), or that state law provides that the charge shall not be construed as a tax (B-230691), or that the local government has threatened to cut off access (66 Comp. Gen. 385). The same analysis produced the same result in B-227388, September 3, 1987, in which a municipality tried to charge a federal agency a registration fee for 9-1-1 services.

The distinction between "vendor taxes" and "vendee taxes" discussed later in this chapter, i.e., the applicability or non-applicability to the government depending on the "legal incidence" of the tax, applies as well to 9-1-1 charges. Thus, in B-238410, September 7, 1990, GAO considered the Arizona 9-1-1 statute, found that it was a vendor tax and, distinguishing the prior 9-1-1 decisions, concluded that it could be assessed against the federal government.

A final group of cases involves the installation of traffic signals. At one point, GAO took the position, subsequently modified, that appropriated funds could not be used to pay for or contribute to the installation of traffic signals on public roads or highways, regardless of the resulting benefit to the government. Traffic control, so the reasoning went, is a municipal service financed by tax revenues the same as police or firefighting services, for which payment by a federal agency is not permissible. 51 Comp. Gen. 135 (1971); 36 Comp. Gen. 286 (1956).

A different situation was presented in 55 Comp. Gen. 1437 (1976). There, a state highway bisected an Army installation and the Army wanted to install a traffic light to regulate traffic at the intersection of the state highway and a road on the Army facility. Local authorities had agreed to repair and maintain the light if the Army would purchase and install it. Since the light would be located on federal property and would be for the primary benefit of the federal facility, even though it would regulate traffic on the state highway as well, GAO distinguished the prior cases and concluded that the Army could use its appropriations for the proposed expenditure.

In 1982, GAO modified the prior decisions and held that traffic signals at or near a federal facility, where the federal facility is the primary beneficiary and benefit to the general public is incidental, should be governed by the same tests applicable to other municipal services. If the state or local government is legally required to provide the service to all residents free of charge, the federal agency may not pay. If, however, the service is not legally required and the charge does not discriminate against the United States—i.e., any other resident would be subject to a similar charge—then the appropriations of the benefiting agency may be used. 61 Comp. Gen. 501 (1982).

Does the primary benefit shift where the federal agency is leasing the property from a private owner? GAO said no in 65 Comp. Gen.

847 (1986), but the lease in that case was to continue for at least another six years. The answer would presumably be different if the agency were about to vacate, but the decision does not purport to address precisely where the line should be drawn.

8. Gifts and Awards

a. Gifts

Appropriated funds may not be used for personal gifts, unless, of course, there is specific statutory authority. 68 Comp. Gen. 226 (1989). To state the rule in this manner is to make it appear rather obvious. If, for example, a General Counsel decided it would be a nice gesture and improve employee morale to give each lawyer in the agency a Christmas turkey, few would argue that the expense should be borne by the agency's appropriations. Appropriated funds could not be used because the appropriation was not made for this purpose (assuming, of course, that the agency has not received an appropriation for Christmas turkeys) and because giving turkeys to lawyers is not reasonably necessary to carry out the mission at least of any agency that now exists. Most cases, however, are not quite this obvious or simple.

The cases generally involve the application of the necessary expense doctrine, and the result is that items in the nature of gifts can rarely be justified. In making the analysis, it makes no difference whether the "gift items" are given to federal employees or to others. The connection is either there or, far more commonly, it is not. In each of the cases in which funds have been found unavailable, there was a certain logic to the agency's justification, and the amount of the expenditure in many cases was small. The problem is that, were the justification sufficient, there would be no stopping point. If a free ashtray might generate positive feelings about an agency or program or enhance motivation, so would a new car or an infusion of cash into the bank account. The rule prohibiting the use of appropriated funds for personal gifts reflects the clear potential for abuse and the impossibility of drawing a rational line.

In 53 Comp. Gen. 770 (1974), a certifying officer for the Small Business Administration asked GAO to rule on the propriety of an expenditure for decorative ashtrays which were distributed to federal employee participants of a conference sponsored by that agency.

Committee and Review Board created by the Endangered Species Act Amendments of 1978. Both statutes were enacted after Interior's 1979 appropriation. B-195007, July 15, 1980.

The rule has also been applied to additional duties imposed by Executive Order. 32 Comp. Gen. 347 (1953); 30 Comp. Gen. 258 (1951).

Additional cases are 30 Comp. Gen. 205 (1950); B-211306, June 6, 1983; B-153694, October 23, 1964.

A variation occurred in 54 Comp. Gen. 1093 (1975). The unexpended balance of a Commerce Department appropriation, which had been used to administer a loan guarantee program and to make collateral protection payments under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, was transferred to a similar but new program by the Trade Act of 1974. The 1974 statute repealed the earlier provisions. This meant that the transferred funds could no longer be used for expenses under the 1962 act—including payments on guarantee commitments—even though that was the purpose for which they were originally appropriated, unless the expenditures could also be viewed as relating to the Department's functions under the 1974 act. Applying the rationale of the later-imposed duty cases, the Comptroller General concluded that the purposes of the two programs were sufficiently related so that the Department could continue to use the transferred funds to make collateral protection payments and to honor guarantees made under the 1962 act.

A related question is the extent to which an agency may use current appropriations for preliminary administrative expenses in preparation for implementing a new law, prior to the receipt of substantive appropriations for the new program. Again, the appropriation is available provided it is sufficiently broad to embrace expenditures of the type contemplated. Thus, the National Science Foundation could use its fiscal year 1967 appropriations for preliminary expenses of implementing the National Sea Grant College and Program Act of 1966, enacted after the appropriation, since the purposes of the new act were basically similar to the purposes of the appropriation. 46 Comp. Gen. 604 (1967). The preliminary tasks in that case included such things as development of policies and plans, issuance of internal instructions, and the establishment of organizational units to administer the new program.

By passing out ashtrays, the agency intended that they would generate conversation concerning the conference and thereby further the SBA's objectives by serving as a reminder of the purposes of the conference. The decision held that the justification given by the agency was not sufficient because the recipients of the ashtrays were federal officials who were already charged by law to cooperate with the objectives of the SBA. Thus, there was no necessity that ashtrays be given away. The ashtrays were properly designated as personal gifts.

Similarly, in 54 Comp. Gen. 976 (1975), specially made key chains which were distributed to educators who attended seminars sponsored by the Forest Service were determined to be personal gifts despite the Department of Agriculture's claim that their distribution would generate future responses from participants. That decision stated:

"The appropriation . . . proposed to be charged with payment for the items in question is available for . . . expenses necessary for forest protection and utilization . . . . Since the appropriation is not specifically available for giving key chains to individuals, in order to qualify as a legitimate expenditure it must be demonstrated that the acquisition and distribution of such items constituted a necessary expense of the Forest Service."

The decision concluded that the key chains were not necessary to implement the appropriation and were, therefore, improper expenditures.

This line of reasoning was also used in 57 Comp. Gen. 385 (1978). There it was held that novelty plastic garbage cans containing candy in the shape of solid waste which were distributed by the Environmental Protection Agency to attendees at an exposition were personal gifts. The agency's argument that the candy was used to attract people to its exhibit on the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act and therefore to promote solid waste management was not sufficient to justify the expenditure.

In B-195247, August 29, 1979, the Comptroller General held that an expenditure of appropriated funds for the cost of jackets and sweaters as Christmas gifts to corpsmen at a Job Corps Center with the intent of increasing morale and enhancing program support was unauthorized. It was determined that these were not a necessary and proper use of appropriated funds and therefore were personal gifts.

The following cases are additional illustrations of expenditures which were found to be in the nature of personal gifts and therefore improper:

- T-shirts stamped with Combined Federal Campaign logo to be given to employees contributing a certain amount. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-240001, February 8, 1991).
- Winter caps purchased by National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration to be given to volunteer participants in weather observation program to create "esprit de corps" and enhance motivation. B-201488, February 25, 1981.
- Photographs taken at the dedication of the Klondike Gold Rush Visitor Center to be sent by the National Park Service as "mementos" to persons attending the ceremony. B-195896, October 22, 1979.
- "Sun Day" buttons procured by the General Services Administration and given out to members of the public to show GSA's support of certain energy policies. B-192423, August 21, 1978.
- Agricultural products developed in Department of Agriculture research programs (gift boxes of convenience foods, leather products, paperweights of flowers imbedded in plastic) to be given to foreign visitors and other official dignitaries. B-151668, June 30, 1970.
- Cuff links and bracelets to be given to foreign visitors by the Commerce Department to promote tourism to the United States. B-151668, December 5, 1963; B-151668, June 12, 1963 (same case).

As a number of the preceding cases point out (e.g., B- 151668, December 5, 1963), while the agency's administrative determination of necessity is given considerable weight, it is not controlling.

Some expenditures which resemble personal gifts have been approved because they were found necessary to carry out the purposes of the agency's appropriation. For example, in B-193769, January 24, 1979, it was held that the purchase and distribution of pieces of lava rocks to visitors of the Capulin Mountain National Monument was a necessary and proper use of the Department of the Interior's appropriated funds. The appropriation in question was for "expenses necessary for the management, operation, and maintenance of areas and facilities administered by the National Park Service . . . ." The distribution of the rocks furthered the objectives of the appropriation because it was effective in preserving the Monument by discouraging visitors from removing lava rock elsewhere in the Monument. Thus, the rocks were not considered to be personal gifts.

Similarly, GAO concluded in B-230062, December 22, 1988, that the Army could use its appropriations to give away framed recruiting posters as "prizes" in drawings at national conventions of student organizations. The students had to fill out cards to enter the drawings, and the cards would provide leads for potential recruits. Also, the Army is authorized to advertise its recruitment program, and posters are a legitimate form of advertising.

Another case in which GAO found adequate justification is 68 Comp. Gen. 583 (1989), concluding that the United States Mint may give complimentary specimens of commemorative coins and medals to customers whose orders have been mishandled. Since customers who do not receive what they paid for may be disinclined to place further orders, the goodwill gesture of giving complimentary copies to these customers would directly contribute to the success of the Mint's commemorative sales program.

b. Contests

(1) Entry fees

The Comptroller General has held that payment of an entry fee to enter agency publications in a contest sponsored by a private organization is improper and cannot be justified as a necessary expense, at least where the prize is a monetary award to be given to the editors of the winning publications. B-164467, June 14, 1968.

However, payment of a contest entry fee may be permissible where the prize is awarded to the agency and not to the individuals and where there is sufficient justification that the expense will further the objects of the appropriation. B-172556, December 29, 1971. The Comptroller General pointed out in that decision that whether appropriated funds may be used to enter a contest will depend on the nature of the contest, the nature of the prizes and to whom they are awarded, and the sufficiency of the administrative justification.

Thus, the Bureau of Mines could use its appropriations to enter an educational film it produced in an industrial film festival where entry was made in the Bureau's name, awards would be made to the Bureau and not to any individuals, and there was adequate justification that entry would further the Bureau's function of promoting mine safety. B-164467, August 9, 1971.

(2) Government-sponsored contests

In an early case, the Navy wanted to use its appropriation for naval aviation to sponsor a competition for the design of amphibious landing gear for Navy aircraft. Cash prizes would be awarded for the two most successful designs. The Comptroller General ruled, however, that the proposed expenditure was unauthorized because the prizes were not related to the reasonable value of the services of the successful contestants and because the appropriation contemplated that the design and development work would be performed by Navy personnel. 5 Comp. Gen. 640 (1926).

While 5 Comp. Gen. 640 may be said to express a general rule, later decisions have permitted agencies to, in effect, sponsor contests and competitions where artistic design was involved. Thus, in A-13559, April 5, 1926, the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission wanted to invite several firms to submit designs for a portion of the Arlington Memorial Bridge. Each design accepted by the Commission would be purchased for $2,000, estimated to approximate the reasonable cost of preparing a design. Since the $2,000 was reasonably related to the cost of producing a design, GAO viewed the proposal as amounting to a direct purchase of the satisfactory designs and distinguished 5 Comp. Gen. 640 on that basis. A significant factor was that the bridge was intended not merely as a functional device to cross the river but "as a memorial in which artistic features are a major, if not the primary, consideration."

This decision was followed in 9 Comp. Gen. 63 (1929), holding that the Marine Corps could offer a set sum of $1,000 for an acceptable original design for a service medal. The Comptroller General stated:

"Competition in the purchase of supplies or articles for Government use in its most common form is for the purpose of securing specified supplies or articles at the lowest possible price. Where, however, the purpose is the selection of the most suitable and artistic design . . . , the primary value of the subject being in its design, the ordinary procedure may be reversed and the amount to be expended fixed in advance at a sum considered to be the reasonable value of the services solicited and the bidders requested to submit the best design which they can furnish for that sum." Id. at 65.

The concept of A-13559 was followed and applied in several later decisions. See 19 Comp. Gen. 287, 288 (1939) (design of advertising literature for savings bonds); 18 Comp. Gen. 862 (1939) (plaster models for Thomas Jefferson Memorial); 14 Comp. Gen. 852 (1935) (bronze tablets and memorials for Boulder Dam); A-37686, August 1, 1931 (monument at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, as first permanent settlement west of the Allegheny Mountains); A-35929, April 3, 1931 (ornamental sculptured granite columns for the Arlington Memorial Bridge).

Thus, a prize competition per se is generally unauthorized in accordance with 5 Comp. Gen. 640. However, the procedure in A-13559 and its progeny is permissible where artistic features are the major consideration and the amount awarded is related to the reasonable cost of producing the design.

Apart from the artistic design line of cases, an agency may be authorized to sponsor a contest under the necessary expense theory, if the expenditure bears a reasonable relationship to carrying out some authorized activity. For example, in B-158831, June 8, 1966, prizes were awarded to enrollees at a Job Corps Conservation Center in a contest to suggest a name for the Center newspaper. GAO held the expenditure permissible because the enabling legislation authorized the providing of "recreational services" for the enrollees and the contest was viewed as a permissible exercise of administrative discretion in implementing the statutory objective.

In another case, the National Park Service sponsored a cross-country ski race in a national park, and awarded trophies to the winners. The cost of the trophies could not be charged to appropriations for management, operation, and maintenance of the national park system. However, the Park Service also received appropriations for recreational programs in national parks, and the trophies could properly have been charged to that account. B-214833, August 22, 1984. See also B-230062, December 22, 1988.

c. Awards

A number of early decisions established the proposition that, absent specific statutory authority, appropriations could not be used to purchase such items as medals, trophies, or insignia for the purpose of making awards. The rationale follows that of the gift cases. The prohibition was applied in 5 Comp. Gen. 344 (1925) (medals for winners of athletic events) and 15 Comp. Gen. 278

(1935) (annual trophies for Naval Reserve bases for efficiency). In 10 Comp. Gen. 453 (1931), the Comptroller General held that a general appropriation could be used to design and procure medals of honor for air mail flyers where the awarding of the medals had been authorized in virtually concurrent legislation. The general appropriation was viewed as available to carry out the specifically expressed intent of Congress and the express authorization obviated any need for a more specific appropriation.

The rule was restated in 45 Comp. Gen. 199 (1965) and viewed as prohibiting the purchase of a plaque to present to a state to recognize 50 years of achievement in forestry. While the voucher in that case was paid because the plaque had already been presented, the decision stated that payment was for that instance only and that congressional authority should be sought if similar awards were considered desirable in the future. A more recent case applying the prohibition is B-223447, October 10, 1986.

As with the gift cases, an occasional exception will be found based on an adequate justification under the necessary expense doctrine. One example, prompted perhaps by wartime considerations, is B-31094, January 11, 1943, approving the purchase of medals or other inexpensive insignia (but not cash payments) to be awarded to civil defense volunteers for heroism or distinguished service.

Similarly, the Comptroller General held in 17 Comp. Gen. 674 (1938) that an appropriation, one of whose purposes was "accident prevention," was available to purchase medals and insignia (but not to make monetary awards) to recognize mail truck drivers with safe driving records. There was sufficient discretion under the appropriation to determine the forms "accident prevention" should take. However, the discretion in recognizing safe job performance does not extend to distributing "awards" of merchandise selected from a catalogue. B-223608, December 19, 1988.[70] The same decision disapproved the distribution of ice scrapers imprinted with a safety message, based on the lack of adequate justification.

The prohibition does not apply to a government corporation with the authority to determine the character and necessity of its expenditures. 64 Comp. Gen. 124 (1984). (The expenditure in the case cited was to be made from donated funds.)

[70]Merchandise in that case was distributed to more than 80% of the work force at one project.

Several statutes now authorize the making of awards in various contexts. Perhaps the most important is the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act, enacted in 1954[71] and now found at 5 U.S.C. §§ 4501-4507. The Act authorizes an agency to pay a cash award to an employee who "by his suggestion, invention, superior accomplishment, or other personal effort contributes to the efficiency, economy, or other improvement of Government operations or achieves a significant reduction in paperwork" or performs a special act or service in the public interest related to his or her official employment. The agency may also incur "necessary expenses" in connection with an incentive award. Awards and related expenses under the Act are paid from appropriations available to the activity or activities benefited. The Office of Personnel Management is authorized to prescribe implementing regulations. OPM's regulations are found in 5 C.F.R. Parts 451 and 540, and Chapter 451 of the Federal Personnel Manual. A provision added in 1990, 5 U.S.C. § 4505a, authorizes cash awards for employees with fully successful performance ratings.[72]

The Incentive Awards Act applies to civilian agencies, civilian employees of the various armed services, the District of Columbia Government, and specified legislative branch agencies. 5 U.S.C. § 4501. Within the judicial branch, it applies to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts[73] and the United States Sentencing Commission. Id.[74] While it does not apply to members of the armed forces, the Defense Department has very similar authority for military personnel in 10 U.S.C. § 1124.

GAO has issued a number of decisions interpreting the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act. Thus, where an award is based [71]68 Stat. 1112. This was an expansion of similar but more limited authority enacted in 1946 (60 Stat. 809). GAO reviewed the Act's effectiveness in its report Federal Workforce: Federal Suggestion Programs Could Be Enhanced, GAO/GGD-89-71 (August 1989). Certain supervisory and management officials are excluded from the Incentive Awards Act, but are covered by virtually identical provisions in 5 U.S.C. § 5407.

on a suggestion resulting in monetary savings, the savings must be to government rather than non-government funds. 36 Comp. Gen. 822 (1957). Applying this principle, GAO found that a suggestion for changes in procedures that would decrease administrative expenses of state employment security offices would effect a savings to an appropriation for unemployment service administration grants to the states. Therefore, the appropriation was available to make an award to the employee who made the suggestion. 38 Comp. Gen. 815 (1959). An agency may make an award to an employee on detail from another agency. 33 Comp. Gen. 577 (1954). An agency may also make an award to one of its employees for service to a Federal Executive Board. B-240316, March 15, 1991. See also 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-236040, October 9, 1990).

An interesting situation occurred in B-192334, September 28, 1978. There, an employee made a suggestion that resulted in monetary savings to his own agency, but the savings would be offset by increased costs to other agencies. The decision concluded that, if the agency wanted to make an award on the basis of tangible benefits, it must measure tangible benefits to the government, that is, it must deduct the increased costs to other agencies from its own savings. However, the agency could view the suggestion as a contribution to efficiency or improved operations and make a monetary award based on intangible benefits.

As noted, the Act authorizes an agency to incur "necessary expenses" incident to its awards program. Thus, an agency may pay travel and miscellaneous expenses to bring recipients to Washington to participate in award ceremonies. These expenses are not chargeable against the statutory award ceiling (currently $10,000). 32 Comp. Gen. 134 (1952). The agency may also pay travel expenses for the recipient's spouse. 69 Comp. Gen. 38 (1989), overruling 54 Comp. Gen. 1054 (1975). In response to 69 Comp. Gen. 38, OPM issued FPM Letter 451-7 (July 25, 1990), extending the concept to "any individual related by blood or affinity." Travel and miscellaneous expenses may also be paid to a surviving spouse to receive an award on behalf of a deceased recipient. B-111642, May 31, 1957. Where a recipient is handicapped and cannot travel unattended, the travel and miscellaneous expenses of an attendant, whether or not a family member, may be paid. 55 Comp. Gen. 800 (1976).

The Act does not authorize "necessary expenses" incident to the receipt of an award from a non-federal organization. 40 Comp. Gen. 706 (1961). However, in limited situations where an award from a non-federal organization is closely related to the recipient's official duties, it may be possible to pay certain related expenses on other grounds. See 55 Comp. Gen. 1332 (1976).

In a case previously discussed in our section on entertainment, the Comptroller General held that the "necessary expense" language of the Incentive Awards Act may include refreshments at an agency's awards ceremony. 65 Comp. Gen. 738 (1986). See also B-167835, November 18, 1969. A 1990 decision applied the rationale of 65 Comp. Gen. 738 and held that an agency could pay a fee, which included a luncheon, for attendance at a Federal Executive Board regional award ceremony by agency employees who had been selected for awards and their supervisors. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-236040, October 9, 1990).

Awards under the Act may take forms other than cash. Thus, in 55 Comp. Gen. 346 (1975), the Comptroller General held that the Army Criminal Investigation Command could award marble paperweights and walnut plaques to Command employees, including those who had died in the line of duty, if the awards conformed to the Act and applicable regulations. In situations not covered by the statute (e.g., presentations to non-government persons to recognize cooperation and enhance community relations), however, such awards would be personal gifts and therefore improper. Similarly authorized as "honorary" awards are desk medallions (B-184306, August 27, 1980); telephones of nominal value (67 Comp. Gen. 349 (1988)); and $50 jackets bearing agency insignia (B-243025, May 2, 1991). Administrative leave can also be awarded if and to the extent authorized in OPM's implementing regulations. 5 U.S.C. § 4502(e)(2).[75] See also B-208766, December 7, 1982. Awards of merchandise to be selected from catalogues, however, are not authorized. B-223608, December 19, 1988 (citing OPM regulations). Whether the award is monetary or non-monetary, the act or service prompting it must be related to official employment. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-240001, February 8, 1991) (Incentive Awards Act does not authorize giving T-shirts to Combined Federal Campaign contributors).

The Act does not authorize cash awards based merely on length of service or upon retirement. However, honorary non-cash awards are permissible. For example, the Department of Agriculture wanted to present to retiring members of its Office of Inspector General engraved plastic holders containing their credentials. GAO found this authorized by the Act. 46 Comp. Gen. 662 (1967). The use of incentive awards for good sick leave records is inappropriate. 67 Comp. Gen. 349 (1988).

The making of an award—and therefore the refusal to make an award—under the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act is discretionary. Rosano v. United States, 9 Cl. Ct. 137, 144-45 (1985). As such, it is reviewable only for abuse of discretion. E.g., Shaller v. United States, 202 Ct. Cl. 571 (1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1092. A labor relations arbitrator may order an agency to prepare and submit an award recommendation, but cannot order the agency to actually make the award. 56 Comp. Gen. 57 (1976).

In B-202039, April 3, 1981, affirmed upon reconsideration, B-202039, May 7, 1982, two employees filed a claim where their agency had given them a cash award several years after implementing their suggestion. They claimed interest on the award, lost imputed investment earnings, an inflation adjustment, and compensation for higher income taxes paid as a result of the delay. The claim was denied. In the May 1982 decision, GAO pointed out that an agency's own regulations can have the effect of limiting the discretion it would otherwise have under the statute. See also Griffin v. United States, 215 Ct. Cl. 710 (1978). Thus, agency regulations can commit the agency to making an award if it adopts a suggestion. However, this does not create an entitlement to interest.

Finally, the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act is limited to government employees. Since no similar authority exists for persons other than government employees, an award may not be made to a nongovernment employee who submits a suggestion resulting in savings to the government. B-160419, July 28, 1967. The limitation to government employees is also noted in two internal GAO memoranda. B-224071-O.M., August 3, 1987 (GAO appropriations not available for cash awards to contract security guards); B-176600-O.M., August 18, 1978 (appropriations of agencies funding the Joint Financial Management Improvement Program not available to make cash awards to other than federal employees).

Similarly, the Bureau of Land Management could use current appropriations to determine fair market value and to initiate negotiations with owners in connection with the acquisition of mineral interests under the Cranberry Wilderness Act, even though actual acquisitions could not be made until funding was provided in appropriation acts. B-211306, June 6, 1983. See also B-153694, October 23, 1964; B-153694, September 2, 1964.

4. Termination of Program

If Congress appropriates money to implement a program, can the agency use that money to terminate the program? (Expenses of terminating a program could include such things as contract termination costs and personnel reduction-in-force expenses.)

If implementation of the program is mandatory, the answer is no. In 1973, for example, the administration attempted to terminate certain programs funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity, relying in part on the fact that it had not requested any funds for OEO for 1974. The programs in question were funded under a multiple-year authorization which directed that the programs be carried out during the fiscal years covered by the authorization. The United States District Court for the District of Columbia held that funds appropriated to carry out the programs could not be used to terminate them. Local 2677, American Federation of Government Employees v. Phillips, 358 F. Supp. 60 (D.D.C. 1973). The court cited 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) as one basis for its holding. Id. at 76 n.17. See also 63 Comp. Gen. 75, 78 (1983).

Where the program is nonmandatory, the agency has more discretion, but there are still limits. In B-115398, August 1, 1977, the Comptroller General advised that the Air Force could terminate B-1 bomber production, which had been funded under a lump-sum appropriation and was not mandated by any statute. Later cases have stated the rule that an agency may use funds appropriated for a program to terminate that program where (1) the program is nonmandatory, and (2) the termination would not result in curtailment of the overall program to such an extent that it would no longer be consistent with the scheme of applicable program legislation. 61 Comp. Gen. 482 (1982) (Department of Energy could use funds appropriated for fossil energy research and development to terminate certain fossil energy programs); B-203074, August 6, 1981. Several years earlier, GAO had held that the closing of all Public

In addition to the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act, several other statutes authorize various types of awards. Some examples are:

- 5 U.S.C. § 5384: authorizes lump-sum cash performance awards to members of the Senior Executive Service. Some representative decisions are 68 Comp. Gen. 337 (1989); 64 Comp. Gen. 114 (1984); and 62 Comp. Gen. 675 (1983).
- 10 U.S.C. § 1125 and 14 U.S.C. § 503: authorize the Defense Department and the Coast Guard, respectively, to award trophies and badges for certain accomplishments. The Coast Guard statute includes cash prizes. The statutes have been narrowly construed as limited essentially to proficiency in arms and related skills. 68 Comp. Gen. 343 (1989) (Coast Guard); 27 Comp. Gen. 637 (1948) (discussing predecessor of 10 U.S.C. § 1125).
- 5 U.S.C. §§ 4511–4514: Inspector General of an agency may make cash awards to employees whose disclosure of fraud, waste, or mismanagement results in cost savings for the agency. For an agency without an Inspector General, the agency head is to designate an official to make the awards. The President may make the awards where the cost savings accrue to the government as a whole. GAO reviews under this legislation indicate that the authority has been used sparingly, but that actual or projected cost savings appear reasonable in those cases where awards have been made.[76] The legislation was scheduled to expire on September 30, 1990. Even if it is not renewed, as the Office of Personnel Management pointed out in connection with an earlier sunset (FPM Letter 451-5, November 21, 1984), similar awards can be processed under the Incentive Awards Act.

9. Guard Services: Anti-Pinkerton Act

a. Evolution of the Law Prior to 57 Comp. Gen. 524

On July 6, 1892, in Homestead, Pennsylvania, a riot occurred between striking employees of the Carnegie, Phipps & Company steel mill and approximately 200 Pinkerton guards. The company had brought in the Pinkerton force ostensibly to protect company property. As the Pinkertons were being transported down the Monongahela River, the strikers sighted them and began firing on them. The strikers were heavily armed, and even had a cannon on the river bank. The violence escalated to the point where the strikers spread oil on the water and ignited it. Several of the Pinkerton men were killed and several of the strikers were indicted for murder. The riot received national attention.

The then-common practice of employing armed Pinkerton guards as strike-breakers in labor disputes became an emotionally charged issue. The Homestead riot, together with other similar although less dramatic incidents, made it clear that the use of these guards provoked violence. Although Congress was reluctant to legislate against their use in the private sector, some congressional action became inevitable. The result was the law that came to be known as the Anti-Pinkerton Act. Originally enacted as part of the Sundry Civil Appropriation Act of August 5, 1892, 27 Stat. 368, it was made permanent the following year by the Act of March 3, 1893, 27 Stat. 591. Now found at 5 U.S.C. § 3108, the Act provides:

"An individual employed by the Pinkerton Detective Agency, or similar organization, may not be employed by the Government of the United States or the Government of the District of Columbia."

As we will see, the statute has little impact today. Nevertheless, it remains on the books and could become relevant, albeit only in unusual circumstances. Therefore, it may be useful to briefly record the administrative interpretations of the law.

Although the Anti-Pinkerton Act was never the subject of any judicial decisions until the late 1970's, it was the subject of numerous decisions of the Comptroller General and the Comptroller of the Treasury. Several principles evolved through the decisions.

(1) The Act applies to contracts with "detective agencies" as firms or corporations as well as to contracts with or appointments of individual employees of such agencies. 8 Comp. Gen. 89 (1928); A–12194, February 23, 1926.

(2) The Act prohibits the employment of a detective agency or its employees, regardless of the character of the services to be performed. The fact that such services are not to be of a "detective" nature is immaterial. Thus, detectives or detective agencies within the scope of the Act may not be employed in any capacity. 51 Comp. Gen. 494 (1971); 26 Comp. Gen. 303 (1946).

(3) The statutory prohibition applies only to direct employment. It does not extend to subcontracts entered into with independent contractors of the United States. 26 Comp. Gen. 303 (1946). The legislative history of the original 1892 statute made it clear that Congress did not intend to reach subcontracts. However, the Act does apply to a contract under the Small Business Administration set-aside program since the contract is a prime contract vis-a-vis SBA even though it may be a subcontract vis-a-vis the actual employing agency. 55 Comp. Gen. 1472 (1976).

(4) Although the Comptroller General never defined "detective agency" for purposes of the Anti-Pinkerton Act, the decisions drew a distinction between detective agencies and protective agencies and held that the Act did not forbid contracts with the latter. 38 Comp. Gen. 881 (1959); 26 Comp. Gen. 303 (1946); B-32894, March 29, 1943. Thus, the government could employ a protective agency, but could not employ a detective agency to do protective work. An important test became whether the organization was empowered to do general investigative work.

(5) In determining whether a given firm is within the statutory prohibition, GAO considers the nature of the functions it may perform as well as the functions it in fact performs. Two factors are relevant here—the firm's authority under its corporate charter and its powers under licensing arrangements in the states in which it does business. If a firm is chartered as a detective agency and licensed as a detective agency, then the fact that it does not actually engage in detective work will not permit it to escape the statutory prohibition. Since virtually every corporation inserts in its charter an "omnibus" clause ("engage in any lawful act or activity for which corporations may be organized in this state" or similar language), an omnibus clause alone will not make a company a detective agency. Rather, specific charter authorization is needed. 41 Comp. Gen. 819 (1962); B-146293, July 14, 1961.

(6) The government may employ a wholly-owned subsidiary of a detective agency if the subsidiary itself is not a detective agency, even if the subsidiary was organized primarily or solely to avoid the Anti-Pinkerton Act. As long as there is prima facie separation of corporate affairs, the Act does not compel the government to

"pierce the corporate veil." 44 Comp. Gen. 564 (1965); 41 Comp. Gen. 819 (1962); B-167723, September 12, 1969.

(7) A telephone listing alone is not sufficient evidence that a given firm is a "detective agency" for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 3108, although the fact of such a listing should prompt further inquiry by the procuring agency. 55 Comp. Gen. 1472 (1976); B-181684, March 17, 1975; B-176307, March 21, 1973; B-177137, February 12, 1973.

(8) Corrections to charters and licenses may be made prior to contract award to avoid Anti-Pinkerton Act violations. Post-award corrections, while perhaps relevant to future procurements, do not, absent compelling circumstances, retroactively expunge ineligibility existing at the time of the award. 56 Comp. Gen. 225 (1977); B-172587, June 21, 1971; B-161770, November 21, 1967; B-160538, November 15, 1967; B-156424, July 22, 1965.

These principles were discussed and applied in many decisions over the years. For example, a contract for guard services was found to violate the Act where the contractor was expressly chartered and licensed as a detective agency. 55 Comp. Gen. 1472 (1976), affirmed on reconsideration, 56 Comp. Gen. 225 (1977). Similarly, a contract with a sole proprietorship was invalid where the owner was also the president of a corporation chartered and licensed as a detective agency. B-186347/B-185495, October 14, 1976, affirmed on reconsideration, B-186347/B-185495, March 7, 1977.

By the 1970's, the Anti-Pinkerton Act had become a hindrance to the government's guard service contracting activities. The federal government is a major consumer of guard services, and it was the rare solicitation that did not generate a squabble over who was or was not subject to the Act. Many companies, including Pinkerton itself, were forced to form subsidiaries in order to compete for government business.

b. 57 Comp. Gen. 524 and the Present State of the Law

The first reported judicial decision dealing with the Anti-Pinkerton Act was United States ex rel. Weinberger v. Equifax, 557 F.2d 456 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1035. The issue in that case was whether the Act applied to a credit reporting company. The Comptroller General, in B-139965, January 10, 1975, had already held that it did not. The court reached the same result, although on different reasoning. Relying heavily on the Act's legislative history, the court held:

"In light of the purpose of the Act and its legislative history, we conclude that an organization is not 'similar' to the (quondam) Pinkerton Detective Agency unless it offers quasi-military armed forces for hire." 557 F.2d at 463.

In a June 1978 circular letter to department and agency heads, published at 57 Comp. Gen. 524 (1978), the Comptroller General announced that GAO would follow the Equifax interpretation in the future. Therefore, the statutory prohibition will now be applied only if an organization can be said to offer quasi-military armed forces for hire. The Comptroller General declined, as did the Fifth Circuit, to attempt a definition of a quasi-military armed force but noted that, whatever it might mean, "it seems clear that a company which provides guard or protective services does not thereby become a 'quasi-military armed force,' even if the individual guards are armed." 57 Comp. Gen. at 525. It follows that whether that company also provides investigative or detective services is no longer relevant. The first decision applying this new standard was 57 Comp. Gen. 480 (1978).

Prior to the Equifax decision, GAO had gone on record as favoring repeal of the Anti-Pinkerton Act. See, e.g., 56 Comp. Gen. 225, 230 (1977). In light of the Equifax case and 57 Comp. Gen. 524, the case for repeal is considerably lessened. The statute is no longer a major impediment to legitimate guard service contracting, and certainly most would agree that the government should not deal with an organization that offers quasi-military armed forces for hire.

With the issuance of 57 Comp. Gen. 524 and 57 Comp. Gen. 480, GAO reviewed the prior decisions under the Anti-Pinkerton Act and designated them as either overruled or modified. If the result in the earlier case would have remained the same under the new standard, the decision was only "modified." If the new standard would have produced a different result, the earlier decision was "overruled." This is important because 57 Comp. Gen. 524 did not simply throw out all of the old rules. What it did is eliminate the "protective vs. investigative" distinction and adopt the Equifax standard as the definition of a proscribed entity. Thus, an organization will no longer violate the Act by providing general investigative services; it will violate the Act only if it "offers quasi-military armed forces for hire." If a given organization were found to offer quasi-military armed forces for hire—an event which is viewed as unlikely although not impossible—the rules in the earlier decisions would still be applicable even though the decisions themselves have been technically overruled or modified. Thus, the pre-1978 principles set forth previously in this discussion remain applicable, but the focal point is now whether the organization in question offers quasi-military armed forces for hire, not merely whether it provides general detective or investigative services. For purposes of guard service contracting, the burden of proof rests with the party alleging the violation. E.g., B-216534, January 22, 1985.

10. Insurance

a. The Self-Insurance Rule

One frequently hears that the government is a self-insurer. This is not completely true. There are many situations in which the government buys or pays for insurance. Among the more well-known examples are the Federal Employees' Health Benefits Program and Federal Employees' Group Life Insurance. Also, the government frequently pays for insurance indirectly through contracts, grants, and leases. E.g., B-72120, January 14, 1948 (lease). A comprehensive treatment may be found in a report of the Comptroller General entitled Survey of the Application of the Government's Policy on Self-Insurance, B-168106, June 14, 1972. Another useful report, although more limited in scope, is Extending the Government's Policy of Self-Insurance in Certain Instances Could Result in Great Savings, PSAD-75-105 (August 26, 1975).

However, the government is essentially a self-insurer in certain important areas, primarily loss or damage to government property and the liability of government employees insofar as the government is legally responsible or would ultimately bear the loss. The rule to be discussed in this section may be stated thus: In the absence of express statutory authority to the contrary, appropriated funds are not available for the purchase of insurance to cover loss or damage to government property or the liability of government employees. The rule and its evolution are summarized in B-158766, February 3, 1977.

The rationale for the rule is aptly summarized in the following two passages from early decisions:

"The basic principle of fire, tornado, or other similar insurance is the lessening of the burden of individual losses by wider distribution thereof, and it is difficult to conceive of a person, corporation, or legal entity better prepared to carry insurance or sustain a loss than the United States Government." 19 Comp. Gen. 798, 800 (1940).

"The magnitude of [the government's] resources obviously makes it more advantageous for the Government to carry its own risks than to shift them to private insurers at rates sufficient to cover all losses, to pay their operating expenses, including agency or broker's commissions, and to leave such insurers a profit." 19 Comp. Gen. 211, 214 (1939).

The "self-insurance rule" dates back to the 19th Century and has been stated and applied in numerous decisions of the Comptroller General and the Comptroller of the Treasury. In one early decision, 13 Comp. Dec. 779 (1907), the question was whether an appropriation for the education of natives in Alaska could be used to buy insurance to cover desks en route to Alaska which had been purchased from that appropriation. The Comptroller of the Treasury held that the insurance could not be considered a necessary expense incident to accomplishing the purpose of the appropriation unless it somehow operated either to preserve and maintain the property for use or to preserve the appropriation which was used to buy it. It did not do the first because insurance does not provide any added means to actually protect the property (life insurance does not keep you alive) but merely transfers the risk of loss. Neither could it "preserve the appropriation" because any recoveries would have to be deposited into the general fund (miscellaneous receipts) of the Treasury. Therefore the appropriation was not available to purchase the insurance.

The following year, the Comptroller held that appropriations for the construction and maintenance of target ranges for the National Guard (then called "organized militias") could not be used to insure buildings acquired for use in target practice. 14 Comp. Dec. 836 (1908). The decision closely followed the reasoning of 13 Comp. Dec. 779—the insurance would not actually protect the property from loss nor would it preserve the appropriation because any proceeds could not be retained by the agency but would have to be paid into the Treasury. Thus, the object of the appropriation "can be as readily accomplished without insurance as with it." Id. at 840.

Citing these and several other decisions, the Comptroller held similarly in 23 Comp. Dec. 269 (1916) that an appropriation for the construction and operation of a railroad in Alaska was not available to pay premiums for insurance on buildings constructed as part of the project.

A slightly different situation was presented in 24 Comp. Dec. 569 (1918). The Lincoln Farm Association had donated to the United States a memorial hall enclosing the log cabin in which Abraham Lincoln was born, together with a $50,000 endowment fund to preserve and maintain the property. The question was whether the fund could be used to buy fire insurance on the property. The Comptroller noted that the funds were not appropriated funds in the strict sense, but were nevertheless "government funds" in that legal title was in the United States. Therefore, the self-insurance rule applied. Recalling the reasoning of the earlier decisions, the Comptroller apparently could not resist commenting "[i]t should be remembered that fire insurance does not tend to protect or preserve a building from fire." Id. at 570.

The Comptroller General continued to apply the rule. In a 1927 case, a contracting officer attempted to agree to indemnify a contractor against loss or damage by casualty on buildings under construction. Since the appropriation would not have been available to insure the buildings directly, the stipulation to indemnify was held to exceed the contracting officer's authority and therefore imposed no legal liability against the appropriation. 7 Comp. Gen. 105 (1927). Boiler inspection insurance was found improper in 11 Comp. Gen. 59 (1931).

A more recent decision applying the self-insurance rule is 55 Comp. Gen. 1196 (1976). There, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) loaned certain property associated with the Apollo Moon Mission to the Air Force for exhibition. As a condition of the loan, NASA required the Air Force to purchase commercial insurance against loss or damage to its property. The Comptroller General found that the self-insurance rule applied to the loan of property from one federal agency to another, and that commercial coverage should not have been procured. Since the insurance had already been purchased and had apparently been procured and issued in good faith, the voucher could be paid. However, the decision cautioned against similar purchases in the future. See also B-237654, February 21, 1991.

As noted at the outset, the self-insurance rule applies to tort liability as well as property damage. This was established in a 1940 decision to the Federal Housing Administration, 19 Comp. Gen. 798 (1940). In holding that insurance could not be procured against possible tort liability, the Comptroller General noted that the self-insurance rule "relates to the risk and not to the nature of the risk." Id. at 800. Since the 1946 enactment of the Federal Tort Claims Act, the issue has become largely moot. However, questions still arise concerning the operation of motor vehicles, and these are discussed later in this section. Conceptually related is 65 Comp. Gen. 790 (1986), holding that an agency may not use its appropriations to insure against loss or damage to employee-owned hand tools. If the agency wishes to afford a measure of protection to employees who use their own tools, it may consider loss or damage claims under the Military Personnel and Civilian Employees Claims Act of 1964, 31 U.S.C. § 3721.

Another type of insurance which may not be paid for from appropriated funds is flight insurance. If a federal employee travelling by air on official business wishes to buy flight insurance, it is considered a personal expense and not reimbursable. 47 Comp. Gen. 319 (1967); 40 Comp. Gen. 11 (1960). Similarly non-reimbursable is trip cancellation insurance. 58 Comp. Gen. 710 (1979).

Insurance on household goods placed in storage incident to a permanent change of duty station may not be reimbursed to the employee unless the insurance is required by the storage company as a condition of accepting the goods for storage or is otherwise required by law. 28 Comp. Gen. 679 (1949).

Many of the decisions in this area include a statement to the effect that the government's practice of self-insurance "is one of policy and not of positive law." E.g., 21 Comp. Gen. 928, 931 (1942). While the statement is true, as it has been carried from decision to decision the word "positive" has occasionally been omitted and this has caused some confusion. All the statement means is that the rule is not mandated by statute, but has evolved administratively from the policy considerations summarized above.

b. Exceptions to the Rule

(1) Departments and agencies generally

Exceptions to the self-insurance rule may of course be authorized by statute. The absence of an express prohibition on insurance is not enough to authorize it; rather, specific statutory authority is required. 19 Comp. Gen. 798, 800 (1940); 14 Comp. Dec. 836, 839

(1908). Although legislation in this area has been minimal, Congress has occasionally authorized the procurement of insurance in some instances and prohibited it in others. By this pattern, congressional recognition of the rule may be inferred.

Also, the existence of statutory authority to buy insurance does not necessarily mean it has to be exercised. In one case, the Comptroller General recommended against the purchase of insurance although recognizing that it was statutorily authorized in that instance. 19 Comp. Gen. 211 (1939).

There are also non-statutory exceptions where the underlying policy considerations do not apply. The standards for exception were summarized in B-151876, April 24, 1964, as follows:

1. Where the economy sought by self-insurance would be defeated;

2. Where sound business practice indicates that a savings can be effected; or

3. Where services or benefits not otherwise available can be obtained by purchasing insurance.

Two World War II cases provide early illustrations of this approach. In B-35379, July 17, 1943, the procurement of airplane hull insurance by the Civil Aeronautics Administration was approved. It was determined that the Administration did not have in its employ, and was unable at the time to recruit, the number of qualified personnel that would be required to appraise damage and arrange for and supervise immediate repairs in connection with the War Training Service and that commercial insurance coverage could provide such services. Also, in B-59941, October 8, 1946, the purchase of pressure vessel insurance including essential inspection services from commercial sources was permissible because of the necessity and economy brought on by wartime conditions.

In 37 Comp. Gen. 511 (1958), GAO considered a provision in a shipbuilding contract which required the contractor to procure builder's risk insurance, including war risk insurance that was obtainable mainly from the government. Under the contract, title vested in the United States to the extent work was completed, but the risk of loss remained in the shipbuilder until the completed vessel was delivered to and accepted by the government. The government would

Health Service hospitals would exceed the Surgeon General's discretionary authority because a major portion of the Public Health Service Act would effectively be inoperable without the PHS hospital system. B-156510, February 23, 1971; B-156510, June 7, 1965.

The concepts are further illustrated in a series of cases involving the Clinch River Nuclear Breeder Reactor. In 1977, the administration proposed using funds appropriated for the design, development, construction, and operation of the reactor to terminate the project. Construction of a breeder reactor had been authorized, but not explicitly mandated, by statute. As contemplated by the program legislation, the Energy Research and Development Administration, the predecessor of the Department of Energy, had submitted program criteria for congressional approval. GAO reviewed the statutory scheme, found that the approved program criteria were "as much a part of [the authorizing statute] as if they were explicitly stated in the statutory language itself," and concluded that use of program funds for termination was unauthorized. B-115398, June 23, 1977. Two subsequent opinions reached the same conclusion, supported further by a provision in a 1978 supplemental appropriation act which specifically earmarked funds for the reactor. B-164105, March 10, 1978; B-164105, December 5, 1977.

By 1983 the situation had changed. Congressional support for the reactor had eroded considerably, no funds were designated for it for fiscal year 1984, and it became apparent that further funding for the project was unlikely. In light of these circumstances, GAO revisited the termination question and concluded that the Department of Energy now had a legal basis to use 1983 funds to terminate the project in accordance with the project justification data which provided for termination in the event of insufficient funds to permit effective continuation. 63 Comp. Gen. 75 (1983).

B. The "Necessary Expense" Doctrine

1. The Theory

The preceding discussion establishes the primacy of 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) in any discussion of purpose availability. The next point end up paying part of the premiums because their cost was included in the bid price. GAO approved the arrangement, finding that it did not improperly transfer the contractor's risk to the government.

Exceptions may be based on the funding arrangement of a particular agency or program. For example, the rule prohibiting the purchase of insurance does not apply to the Panama Canal Commission because the Commission operates on a self-sustaining basis, deriving its operating funds from outside sources. The vast resources available to the government, upon which the self-insurance rule is founded, are not intended to be available to the Commission. B-217769, July 6, 1987 (holding that the Commission could purchase "full scope" catastrophic insurance coverage if administratively determined to be necessary). In contrast, the fact that an agency's initial appropriation was placed in an interest-earning trust fund was found not sufficient to warrant an exception where the government's resources were nevertheless available to it. B-236022, January 29, 1991 (John C. Stennis Center for Public Service Training and Development).

The Comptroller General has held that the self-insurance rule does not apply to privately-owned property temporarily entrusted to the government. 17 Comp. Gen. 55 (1937) (historical items loaned to the government for exhibition purposes); 8 Comp. Gen. 19 (1928) (corporate books and records produced by subpoena for a federal grand jury); B-126535-O.M., February 1, 1956 (airplane models loaned by manufacturer). Compare 25 Comp. Dec. 358 (1918), disallowing a claim for insurance premiums by West Publishing Company for law books loaned to a federal employee, where correspondence from the claimant made it clear that it was loaning the books to the employee personally and not to the government.

However, insurance may be purchased on loaned private property only where the owner requires insurance coverage as part of the transaction. If the owner does not require insurance, private insurance is not a necessary expense and the government should self-insure. 63 Comp. Gen. 110 (1983) (works of art temporarily loaned by the Corcoran Gallery to the President's Commission on Executive Exchange); 42 Comp. Gen. 392 (1963) (school classrooms used for civil service examinations).

Foreign art treasures are frequently loaned to the United States for exhibition purposes. While insurance may be purchased by virtue of 17 Comp. Gen. 55, its extremely high cost has been a disincentive. To remedy this situation, Congress in 1975 passed the Arts and Artifacts Indemnity Act, 20 U.S.C. §§ 971–977. This statute authorizes the Federal Council on the Arts and Humanities to enter into agreements to indemnify against loss or damage to works of art and other materials while on exhibition under specified circumstances and within specified limits. Claims under the Act require specific appropriations for payment, but the agreements are backed by the full faith and credit of the United States. The Act constitutes authority to incur obligations in advance of appropriations and the agreements would therefore not violate the Antideficiency Act. See B-115398.01, April 19, 1977 (non-decision letter).

Since nonappropriated fund activities are by definition not financed from public funds, they are not governed by the self-insurance rule. Whether the rule should or should not be followed would generally be within the discretion of the activity or its parent agency. Thus, it is within the discretion of the Department of Defense to establish the rule by regulation for its nonappropriated fund activities. B-137896, December 4, 1958.

Finally, it is important to keep in mind that the self-insurance rule is aimed at insurance whose purpose is to protect the United States from risk of financial loss. Applying the rule from this perspective, GAO found that it would not preclude the Federal Bureau of Investigation from purchasing insurance in connection with certain of its undercover operations. The objective in these instances was not to protect the government against risk of loss, but to maintain the security of the operation itself, for example, by creating the appearance of normality for FBI-run undercover proprietary corporations. Thus, the FBI could treat the expenditure purely as a "necessary expense" question. B-204486, January 19, 1982. For additional exceptions, see 59 Comp. Gen. 369 (1980) and B-197583, January 19, 1981.

(2) Government corporations

In an early case, the Comptroller of the Treasury indicated that the self-insurance rule would not apply to a wholly-owned government corporation and suggested that it would generally take an act of Congress to apply the prohibition to a corporation's funds. 23 Comp. Dec. 297 (1916).

The Comptroller General followed this approach in 21 Comp. Gen. 928 (1942), noting that the rule "has not been observed strictly in cases involving insurance of property of government corporations." Id. at 931. The decision held that, while the funds of the Virgin Islands Company were subject to various statutory restrictions on the use of public funds, they could be used to insure the Company's property.

The Federal Housing Administration is treated as a corporation for many purposes although it is not chartered as one. See 53 Comp. Gen. 337 (1973). In 16 Comp. Gen. 453 (1936), the Comptroller General held that the Administration could purchase hazard insurance on acquired property based on a determination of necessity, but in 19 Comp. Gen. 798 (1940), declined to extend that ruling to cover insurance against possible tort liability. See also 55 Comp. Gen. 1321 (1976) (former Federal Home Loan Bank Board, although technically not a corporation, could nevertheless insure its new office building since Board's authority to cover losses by assessments against member banks made rationale of self-insurance rule inapplicable).

c. Specific Areas of Concern

(1) Property owned by government contractors

The cases previously discussed in which insurance was prohibited involved property to which the government held legal title. Questions also arise concerning property to which the government holds less than legal title, and property owned by government contractors.

A contractor will normally procure a variety of insurance as a matter of sound business practice. This may include hazard insurance on its property, liability insurance, and workers' compensation insurance. The premiums are part of the contractor's overhead and will be reflected in its bid price. When this is done, the government is paying at least a part of the insurance cost indirectly. Since the risks covered are not the risks of the government, there is no objection to this "indirect payment" nor, if administratively determined to be necessary, to the inclusion of an insurance stipulation in the contract. 39 Comp. Gen. 793 (1960); 18 Comp. Gen. 285, 298 (1938).

Similarly differentiating between the government's risk and the contractor's risk, the Comptroller General has applied the self-insurance rule where the government holds "equitable title" under a lease-purchase agreement. 35 Comp. Gen. 393 (1956); 35 Comp. Gen. 391 (1956). In both decisions, the Comptroller General held that, although the government could reimburse the lessor for the cost of insuring against its own (the lessor's) risk, it could not require the lessor to carry insurance for the benefit of the government.

(2) Use of motor vehicles

As noted previously, the self-insurance rule applies to tort liability as well as property damage. 19 Comp. Gen. 798 (1940). At present, the Federal Tort Claims Act provides the exclusive remedy for claims against the United States resulting from the negligent operation of motor vehicles by government employees within the scope of their employment. Thus, insurance questions have become largely moot. Nevertheless, the self-insurance rule has been involved in several situations involving the operation of motor vehicles.

A 1966 decision, 45 Comp. Gen. 542, involved Internal Revenue Service employees classified as "high mileage drivers." They were assigned government-owned cars for official use and, when warranted, could drive the cars home at the close of the workday so that they could proceed directly to an assignment from home the next morning. The Treasury Department asked whether IRS appropriations were available to reimburse the employees for having their commercial liability insurance extended to cover the government vehicles. Applying the self-insurance rule, and noting further that the travel would most likely be considered within the scope of employment for purposes of the Federal Tort Claims Act, the Comptroller General concluded that the funds could not be so used.

In B-127343, December 15, 1976, the Comptroller General concluded that the Federal Tort Claims Act applied to Senate employees operating Senate-owned vehicles within the scope of their employment. Therefore, the purchase of commercial insurance would be neither necessary nor desirable.

In 1972, the Veterans Administration asked whether it could use its appropriations to provide liability insurance coverage for disabled veteran patients being given VA-conducted driver training. Since the trainees were not government employees, they would not be covered by the Federal Tort Claims Act. Since the risk was not that of the government, the self-insurance rule was not applicable. Therefore, VA could procure the liability insurance upon administrative determinations that the driver training was a necessary part of a given patient's medical rehabilitation, and that the insurance coverage was necessary to its success. B-175086, May 16, 1972.

The Federal Tort Claims Act does not apply to claims arising in foreign countries and the rules are a bit different for driving overseas. Originally, notwithstanding the nonavailability of the Federal Tort Claims Act, the Comptroller General had prohibited the purchase of insurance for government-owned vehicles operated in foreign countries. 39 Comp. Gen. 145 (1959). Instances of specific statutory authority for the State Department and the Foreign Agricultural Service were viewed as precluding insurance in other situations without similar legislative sanction.

However, GAO reviewed and revised its position in 1976. In 55 Comp. Gen. 1343 (1976), the Comptroller General held that the General Services Administration could provide by regulation for the purchase of liability insurance on government-owned vehicles operated regularly or intermittently in foreign countries, where required by local law or necessitated by legal procedures which could pose extreme difficulties in case of an accident (such as arrest of the driver and/or impoundment of the vehicle). The decision also concluded that GSA could amend its regulations to permit reimbursement of federal employees for the cost of "trip insurance" on both government-owned and privately-owned vehicles in foreign countries where liability insurance is a legal or practical necessity. The decision was extended in 55 Comp. Gen. 1397 (1976) to cover the cost of required insurance on vehicles leased commercially in foreign countries on a long-term basis.

Some confusion may result from the statement in 55 Comp. Gen. 1343, 1347, that "39 Comp. Gen. 145 (1959), 19 Comp. Gen. 798 (1940), and similar decisions" are overruled "to the extent that they are inconsistent with this decision." Since 39 Comp. Gen. 145 prohibited insurance on government-owned vehicles in foreign countries, it is properly viewed as overruled by 55 Comp. Gen. 1343. However, 19 Comp. Gen. 798 and "similar decisions" remain valid insofar as they assert the general applicability of the self-insurance rule to tort liability and to motor vehicle usage in the United States. They should be viewed as modified to the extent that they no longer preclude purchase of insurance in the foreign country situations dealt with in 55 Comp. Gen. 1343 and 55 Comp. Gen. 1397.

Collision damage waiver coverage on commercial rental vehicles is discussed in the section entitled "Damage to Commercial Rental Vehicles" in Chapter 12.

A summary of the self-insurance rules as they relate to the operation of motor vehicles on official business may be found in General Services Administration Bulletin FPMR G-176, August 9, 1988.

(3) Losses in shipment

Early decisions had applied the self-insurance rule to the risk of damage or loss of valuable government property while in shipment. Thus, marine insurance could not be purchased for shipment of a box of silverware. 4 Comp. Gen. 690 (1925). Nor could it be purchased to cover shipment of $5,000 in silver dollars from San Francisco to Samoa. 22 Comp. Dec. 674 (1916), affirmed upon reconsideration, 23 Comp. Dec. 297 (1916).

In 1937, Congress enacted the Government Losses in Shipment Act, 40 U.S.C. §§ 721–729. The Act provides a fund for the payment of claims resulting from the loss or damage in shipment of government-owned "valuables" as defined in the Act. The Act also prohibits the purchase of insurance except as specifically authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury. If a given risk is beyond the scope of the Act, for example, if the items in question are not within the definition of "valuables" or if the particular movement does not qualify as "shipment," then the self-insurance rule and its exceptions would still apply. See, e.g., 17 Comp. Gen. 419 (1937).

(4) Bonding of government personnel

Prior to 1972, the federal government frequently required the surety bonding of officers and employees who handled money or other valuables. In 1972, Congress enacted legislation, now found at 31 U.S.C. § 9302, to expressly prohibit the government from requiring or obtaining surety bonds for its civilian employees or military personnel in connection with the performance of their official duties. The reasons for this legislation parallel the policy considerations behind the self-insurance rule. Indeed, the objective of the legislation was to substitute the principle of self-insurance for the practice of obtaining surety bonds on federal employees where the risk insured against is a loss of government funds or property in which the United States is the insured.[77] 56 Comp. Gen. 788, 790 (1977). Although 31 U.S.C. § 9302 does not define "officer" or "employee," the definitions in title 5 of the U.S. Code are available for guidance. B-236022, January 29, 1991.

Under the former system, the surety bonds were for the protection of the government, not the bonded employee. If a loss occurred and the government collected on the bond, the surety could attempt to recover against the individual employee. Thus, the elimination of bonding in no way affects the personal liability of federal employees, and 31 U.S.C. § 9302 specifies this. This principle has been noted several times in connection with the liability of accountable officers and the cases are cited in Chapter 9.

In 56 Comp. Gen. 788 (1977), the Comptroller General held that, by virtue of 31 U.S.C. § 9302, the United States became a self-insurer of restitution, reparation, and support moneys collected by probation officers under court order. The decision noted that the same result applied to litigation funds paid into the registry of the court (funds paid into the registry by a litigant pending distribution by the court to the successful party).

However, if an agency requires an employee to serve as a notary public and state law requires bonding of notaries, the employee's expense in obtaining the surety bond may be reimbursed notwithstanding 31 U.S.C. § 9302. The bond in such a situation is neither required by nor obtained by the federal government. It is required by the state and obtained by the employee. Also, the risk involved is not one in which the United States is the insured. B-185909, June 16, 1976.

[77]GAO had recommended the legislation. See report entitled Review of Bonding Program for Employees of the Federal Government, B-8201 (March 29, 1962); B-8201/B-59149, January 18, 1972.

Similarly, if a federal court designates a state court employee to perform certain functions in connection with the arrest and detention of federal offenders, 31 U.S.C. § 9302 does not preclude the Administrative Office of the United States Courts from requiring that the state employee be bonded since the statute applies only to federal employees. 52 Comp. Gen. 549 (1973).

11. Lobbying and Related Matters

a. Introduction

Lobbying—attempting to influence legislators—is nothing new. The term itself derives from the practice of advocates of a particular measure lying in wait in the corridors or "lobby" of the Capitol Building, there to collar passing members of Congress.[78]

Generally speaking, there are two types of lobbying. "Direct lobbying," as the term implies, means direct contact with the legislators, either in person or by various means of written or oral communication. "Indirect" or "grass roots" lobbying is different. There, the lobbyist contacts third parties, either members of special interest groups or the general public, and urges them to contact their legislators to support or oppose something. Of course, the term "lobbying" can also refer to attempts to influence decisionmakers other than legislators.

There is nothing inherently evil about lobbying. A House select committee investigating lobbying in 1950 put it this way:

> "Every democratic society worthy of the name must have some lawful means by which individuals and groups can lay their needs before government. One of the central purposes of government is that people should be able to reach it; the central purpose of what we call 'lobbying' is that they should be able to reach it with maximum impact and possibility of success. This is, fundamentally, what lobbying is about."[79]

Nevertheless, because of the obvious potential for abuse, there are legal restrictions on lobbying. This section will explore some of them. Because the focus of this publication is on the use of appropriated funds, coverage is limited for the most part to lobbying by government officials and does not include lobbying by private organizations. Restrictions on lobbying by government officials derive from two sources: criminal statutes and provisions in appropriation acts.

b. Criminal Statutes

Criminal sanctions are provided by 18 U.S.C. § 1913, originally enacted in 1919:

"No part of the money appropriated by any enactment of Congress shall, in the absence of express authorization by Congress, be used directly or indirectly to pay for any personal service, advertisement, telegram, telephone, letter, printed or written matter, or other device, intended or designed to influence in any manner a Member of Congress, to favor or oppose, by vote or otherwise, any legislation or appropriation by Congress, whether before or after the introduction of any bill or resolution proposing such legislation or appropriation; but this shall not prevent officers or employees of the United States or of its departments or agencies from communicating to Members of Congress on the request of any Member or to Congress, through the proper official channels, requests for legislation or appropriations which they deem necessary for the efficient conduct of the public business."

The statute goes on to provide penalties for violation: a $500 fine or a year in jail or both, plus removal from federal employment.

The context in which section 1913 was enacted is reflected in the following passage from the floor debate on the original 1919 legislation:

"The bill also contains a provision which . . . will prohibit a practice that has been indulged in so often, without regard to what administration is in power—the practice of a bureau chief or the head of a department writing letters throughout the country, sending telegrams throughout the country, for this organization, for this man, for that company to write his Congressman, to wire his Congressman, in behalf of this or that legislation. [Applause.] The gentleman from Kentucky . . . during the closing days of the last Congress was greatly worried because he had on his desk thousands upon thousands of telegrams that had been started right here in Washington by some official wiring out for people to wire Congressman Sherley . . . . Now, it was never the intention of Congress to appropriate money for this purpose, and [§ 1913] will absolutely put a stop to that sort of thing. [Applause.]" [80]

Since 18 U.S.C. § 1913 is a criminal statute, its enforcement is the responsibility of the Department of Justice and the courts. Therefore, GAO will not "decide" whether a given action constitutes a violation. GAO will, however, determine whether appropriated funds were used in a given instance, and refer matters to the Justice Department in appropriate cases. E.g., B-192658, September 1, 1978; B-164497(5), March 10, 1977. Generally, GAO will refer matters to the Justice Department if asked to do so by a Member of Congress or where available information provides reasonable cause to suspect that a violation may have occurred. B-145883, April 27, 1962.

In addition, since a violation of section 1913 is by definition an improper use of appropriated funds, such a violation could form the basis of a GAO exception or disallowance. However, GAO can take no action unless the Justice Department or the courts first determine that there has been a violation. B-164497(5), March 10, 1977.

Consistent with the legislative history noted above, the Justice Department construes section 1913 as applying primarily to indirect or "grass roots" lobbying, and not to direct communications between executive branch officials and Congress. 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 180 (1981); 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 160 (1978); 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 30 (1978).[81]

In evaluating particular fact situations to determine possible violations of section 1913, GAO applies the Justice Department's interpretation of that statute. Thus, GAO found that referral to Justice was not warranted in the following situations:

- Various judicial branch activities including direct contacts with legislators by federal judges, legislative liaison activities by the Judicial Conference of the United States, and some grass roots lobbying which did not involve the use of federal funds. 63 Comp. Gen. 624 (1984).
- Providing to a private lobbying group a copy of congressional testimony by the Secretary of State supporting the administration's Central American policies. 66 Comp. Gen. 707 (1987). The answer to emphasize is that 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) does not require, nor would it be reasonably possible, that every item of expenditure be specified in the appropriation act. While the statute is strict, it is applied with reason.

The spending agency has reasonable discretion in determining how to carry out the objects of the appropriation. This concept, known as the "necessary expense doctrine," has been around almost as long as the statute itself. An early statement of the rule is contained in 6 Comp. Gen. 619, 621 (1927):

> "It is a well-settled rule of statutory construction that where an appropriation is made for a particular object, by implication it confers authority to incur expenses which are necessary or proper or incident to the proper execution of the object, unless there is another appropriation which makes more specific provision for such expenditures, or unless they are prohibited by law, or unless it is manifestly evident from various precedent appropriation acts that Congress has specifically legislated for certain expenses of the Government creating the implication that such expenditures should not be incurred except by its express authority."

The necessary expense rule is really a combination of two slightly different but closely related concepts:

(1) An appropriation made for a specific object is available for expenses necessarily incident to accomplishing that object unless prohibited by law or otherwise provided for. For example, an appropriation to erect a monument at the birthplace of George Washington could be used to construct an iron fence around the monument where administratively deemed necessary to protect the monument. 2 Comp. Dec. 492 (1896).

(2) Appropriations, even for broad categories such as salaries, frequently use the term "necessary expenses." As used in this context, the term refers to "current or running expenses of a miscellaneous character arising out of and directly related to the agency's work." 38 Comp. Gen. 758, 762 (1959); 4 Comp. Gen. 1063, 1065 (1925).

Although the theory is identical in both situations, the difference is that expenditures in the second category relate to somewhat broader objects.

The Comptroller General has never established a precise formula for determining the application of the necessary expense rule. In would have been different if the State Department had used appropriated funds to develop material for the lobbying group rather than simply providing existing and readily available material. - Transmission of information by the Consumer Product Safety Commission to a private company advising of scheduled congressional hearings on legislation relevant to a problem the company was facing. B-229275-O.M., November 17, 1987. The memorandum stated:

> "We believe it is within the statutory authority of a regulatory agency to advise a regulated company that a remedy it seeks can only be obtained through legislation and that such legislative remedy may be initiated by a particular Congressional Committee."

A planned media campaign to further that objective would have been more questionable, but it was not carried out. Numerous additional examples may be found in our discussion of "pending legislation" appropriation restrictions later in this section.

GAO found the following situations sufficiently questionable to warrant referral to Justice:[82]

- An article written by a Commerce Department official and published in Business America, a Commerce Department publication, explicitly urging readers to contact their elected representatives in Congress to support certain amendments to the Export Administration Act. B-212235, November 17, 1983.
- Campaign by Air Force and Defense Department to use contractors' lobbyists and subcontractor network to lobby Congress in support of C-5B aircraft procurement. Improper Lobbying Activities by the Department of Defense on the Proposed Procurement of the C-5B Aircraft, GAO/AFMD-82-123 (September 29, 1982).

Of course, GAO's opinion that section 1913 has been violated—or, for that matter, an independent conclusion by the Justice Department that a violation has occurred—does not necessarily mean that a prosecution will follow. The Attorney General has what is known as "prosecutorial discretion." A great many factors, including the amount of public funds involved, may legitimately influence the prosecutorial decision. Justice states that there were no prosecutions under section 1913 as of early 1978. 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 30, 31 (1978). To our knowledge, this has not changed.

Judicial activity under 18 U.S.C. § 1913 has thus far been limited to the issue of whether the statute creates a private right of action. The answer is no. National Treasury Employees' Union v. Campbell, 482 F. Supp. 1122 (D.D.C. 1980), aff'd, 654 F.2d 784 (D.C. Cir. 1981), overruling National Association for Community Development v. Hodgson, 356 F. Supp. 1399 (D.D.C. 1973); Grassley v. Legal Services Corporation, 535 F. Supp. 818 (S.D. Iowa 1982);[83] American Trucking Associations, Inc. v. Department of Transportation, 492 F. Supp. 566 (D.D.C. 1980). The availability of injunctive relief to a private litigant may be inferred from American Public Gas Association v. Federal Energy Administration, 408 F. Supp.

[82]A few earlier cases will be found in which GAO held expenditures illegal under 18 U.S.C. § 1913. E.g., B- 139134-O.M., June 17, 1959 (Air Force paid registration fee for members to enter state rifle association shooting match; portion of fee set aside for fund to fight adverse gun legislation held improper payment); B-76695, June 8, 1948. GAO today would merely refer the cases to the Justice Department.

[83]The Grassley court also noted that section 1913 applies only to federal departments or agencies and their officers or employees. It would not, according to the court, apply to the Legal Services Corporation or its grantees. 535 F. Supp. at 826 n.6.

640 (D.D.C. 1976), but in view of the Campbell litigation, Public Gas must be regarded as modified to the extent it purports to recognize a private right of action under section 1913.

One other statute with penal sanctions deserves brief mention—the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, 2 U.S.C. §§ 261–270. Enacted in 1946, it requires the registration of certain persons and organizations engaged in lobbying as defined in the Act. Its constitutionality was upheld in United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612 (1954). While this statute encompasses direct lobbying, it does not apply to the legislative activities of government agencies. B-129874, August 15, 1978; B-164497(5), March 10, 1977.

c. Appropriation Act Restrictions: Publicity and Propaganda

(1) Origin and general considerations

In 1949, a House Resolution created a Select Committee on Lobbying Activities to review the operation of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act and to investigate all lobbying activities both by the private sector and by federal agencies. The Committee held extensive hearings and issued several reports. In its final report, the Committee had this to say about lobbying by government agencies:

"The existing law in this field, unlike the law governing lobbying by private interests, is not directed toward obtaining information of such activities, but is prohibitory in concept and character. It forbids the use of appropriated funds for certain types of lobbying activities and is specifically a part of the Criminal Code. Enacted in 1919, it is not a recent or in any sense a novel piece of legislation. Its validity has never been challenged and we consider it sound law. . . .

"It is our conclusion that the long-established criminal statute referred to above should be retained intact and that Congress, through the proper exercise of its powers to appropriate funds and to investigate conditions and practices of the executive branch, as well as through its financial watch dog, the General Accounting Office, can and should remain vigilant against any improper use of appropriated funds and any invasion of the legislative prerogatives and responsibilities of the Congress."[84]

When the Select Committee referred to the "proper exercise" of the congressional power to appropriate funds, it of course had in mind the use of that power to restrict the use of funds for activities considered undesirable. While the use of appropriation act restrictions to control lobbying had some earlier precedent, the practice began in earnest shortly after the issuance of the Select Committee's final report with some fiscal year 1952 appropriations, and has continued ever since.

The most common form of appropriation act restriction prohibits the use of funds for "publicity or propaganda." There are several variations of the provision, with varying degrees of specificity. Approximately half of the regular annual appropriation acts include some version. As of 1990, there is no governmentwide "publicity or propaganda" statute. Thus, some agencies will be subject to one version, other agencies to a different version, and still others to none at all. Nevertheless, it is possible to draw some generalizations.

The simplest version of the statute, and the most general, is this:

"No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used for publicity or propaganda purposes not authorized by the Congress."[85]

It prohibits expenditures for all unauthorized "publicity" or "propaganda." Unfortunately, as with most of the publicity and propaganda statutes over the years, there is no definition of either term. Thus, the statutes have been applied through administrative interpretation.

In construing and applying a "publicity or propaganda" provision, it is necessary to achieve a delicate balance between competing interests. On the one hand, every agency has a legitimate interest in communicating with the public and with the Congress regarding its functions, policies, and activities. The Select Committee recognized this, quoting in its Interim Report from the report of the Hoover Commission:

"Apart from his responsibility as spokesman, the department head has another obligation in a democracy: to keep the public informed about the activities of his agency. How far to go and what media to use in this effort present touchy issues of personal and administrative integrity. But of the basic obligation there can be little doubt."[86]

In addition, the courts have indicated that it is not illegal for government agencies to spend money to advocate their positions, even on controversial issues. See Joyner v. Whiting, 477 F.2d 456, 461 (4th Cir. 1973); Arrington v. Taylor, 380 F. Supp. 1348, 1364 (M.D.N.C. 1974).[87]

Yet on the other hand, the statute has to mean something. As the court said in National Association for Community Development v. Hodgson in reference to 18 U.S.C. § 1913, "Obviously, Congress intended to remedy some problem or further some cause, otherwise they would not have bothered enacting the statute." 356 F. Supp. at 1403. As long as the law exists, there has to be a point beyond which government action violates it. Testifying before the Select Committee on March 30, 1950, former Assistant Comptroller General Frank Weitzel made the following remarks:

"[I]f you set up an organization in the executive branch for the benefit of the three blind mice they would come up here with a budget program and prospectus which would convince any Member of Congress that that was one of the most important organizations in the executive branch. . . .

"And no doubt by that time there would also be some private organizations with branches which would parallel your Federal agency, which would be devoted to the propagation and dissemination of information about the three blind mice . . . ."[88]

In evaluating whether a given action violates a "publicity or propaganda" provision, GAO will rely heavily on the agency's administrative justification. In other words, the agency gets the benefit of any legitimate doubt. GAO will override the agency's determination only where it is clear that the action falls into one of a very few specific categories. Before discussing what those categories are, two threshold issues must be noted.

[87]Further useful discussion may be found in cases dealing with different but conceptually related issues such as United States v. Frame, 885 F.2d 1119 (3d Cir. 1989), and Block v. Meese, 793 F.2d 1303 (D.C. Cir. 1986).

[88]The Role of Lobbying in Representative Self-Government, Hearings before the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 1, at 158 (1950).

First, it must be determined, by examining the relevant appropriation act, whether the agency in question is subject to a "publicity or propaganda" restriction. If it is, then the version contained in the agency's appropriation act will determine the category or categories of potential violations. The existence and precise terms of the restriction can change over time, so it is always necessary to check the appropriation act for the year in which the questioned obligation or expenditure was made.

Second, a violation must be predicated on the use of public funds (either direct appropriations or funds which, although not direct appropriations, are treated as appropriated funds). If appropriated funds are not involved, there is no violation no matter how blatant the conduct may be. 56 Comp. Gen. 889 (1977) (involving a newsletter concerning the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project containing material which would have been illegal had it been financed in any way with appropriated funds).

(2) Self-aggrandizement

As noted above, the broadest form of the publicity and propaganda restriction prohibits the use of appropriated funds "for publicity or propaganda purposes not authorized by the Congress." A variation limits the restriction to activities "within the United States."[89]

The Comptroller General first had occasion to construe this provision in 31 Comp. Gen. 311 (1952). The National Labor Relations Board asked whether the activities of its Division of Information amounted to a violation. Reviewing the statute's scant legislative history, the Comptroller General concluded that it was intended "to prevent publicity of a nature tending to emphasize the importance of the agency or activity in question." Id. at 313. Therefore, the prohibition would not apply to the "dissemination to the general public, or to particular inquirers, of information reasonably necessary to the proper administration of the laws" for which an agency is responsible. Id. at 314. Based on this interpretation, GAO concluded that the activities of the Board's Division of Information were not improper. The only thing GAO found that might be questionable, the decision noted, were certain press releases reporting speeches of members of the Board.

Thus, 31 Comp. Gen. 311 established the important proposition that the statute does not prohibit an agency's legitimate informational activities. See also B-223098/B-223098.2, October 10, 1986; B-177704, February 7, 1973. It is geared at activities whose obvious purpose is "self-aggrandizement" or "puffery."

GAO's approach to this statute is basically the same as its approach to the "pending legislation" version to be discussed in detail later. The statute does not provide adequate guidelines to distinguish the legitimate from the proscribed. Thus, without further clarification from Congress or the courts, GAO is reluctant to find a violation where the agency can provide a reasonable justification for its activities.

In a 1973 case, B-178528, July 27, 1973, the Republican National Committee financed a mass mailing of copies of editorials from British newspapers in praise of the President. The editorials were transmitted with a letter prepared by a member of the White House staff, on State Department letterhead stationery, and signed by the Ambassador to Great Britain. GAO again noted the extreme difficulty in distinguishing between disseminating information to explain or defend administration policies, which is permissible, and similar activities designed for purely political or partisan purposes. (See also B-194776, June 4, 1979.) In addition, a legitimate function of a foreign legation is to communicate information on press reaction in the host country to policies of the United States. Thus, GAO was unable to conclude that there was any violation of the publicity and propaganda law. In any event, the use of appropriated funds was limited to the cost of one piece of paper and the time it took the Ambassador to think about it and sign his name.

Other cases in which GAO found no violation are B-212069, October 6, 1983 (press release by Director of Office of Personnel Management excoriating certain Members of Congress who wanted to delay a civil service measure the administration supported), and B-161686, June 30, 1967 (State Department publications on Vietnam War). In neither case were the documents designed to glorify the issuing agency or official.

GAO did find a violation in B-136762, August 18, 1958. The Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Military Assistance Programs attended a meeting of the Aircraft Industries Association and made a speech "clearly designed to enlist the aid of the Aircraft Industries Association in publicizing and selling the Mutual Security program to the American public through the various media available to the Association." Reviewing the text of the speech, GAO found that it went far beyond any legitimate purpose of informing the public and that it therefore violated the publicity and propaganda restriction. However, the officer had been authorized to attend the meeting as related to the performance of official duty and would have been entitled to per diem for the full day even if he had not made the speech. Therefore, since the government incurred no additional expense by virtue of the speech, GAO declined to seek recovery either from the officer himself or from the accountable officers who had made the payment.

Some agencies have authority to disseminate material that is promotional rather than purely informational. For example, the Commerce Department is charged with promoting commerce. In so doing, it entered into a contract with the Advertising Council to undertake a national multi-media campaign to enhance public understanding of the American economic system. Finding that this was a reasonable means of implementing its function and that the campaign did not "aggrandize" the Commerce Department, GAO found nothing illegal. B-184648, December 3, 1975.

If an agency does not have promotional authority, the scope of its permissible activities is correspondingly more restricted. For example, GAO found the publicity and propaganda law violated when a Presidential advisory committee, whose sole function was to advise the President and which had no promotional role, set up and implemented a public affairs program which included the hiring of a "publicity expert." B-222758, June 25, 1986.

(3) Covert propaganda

Another type of activity which GAO has construed as prohibited by the "publicity or propaganda not authorized by Congress" statute is "covert propaganda," defined as "materials such as editorials or other articles prepared by an agency or its contractors at the behest of the agency and circulated as the ostensible position of parties outside the agency." B-229257, June 10, 1988. A critical element of the violation is concealment of the agency's role in sponsoring the material. Id.

In a 1986 case, the Small Business Administration prepared "suggested editorials" and distributed them to newspapers. The editorials urged support of an administration proposal to merge the SBA with the Department of Commerce. The editorials were clearly "propaganda." This, however, was not enough to violate the law. The problem was that they were misleading as to their origin. The plan presumably was for a newspaper to print the editorial as its own without identifying it as an SBA document. This, the Comptroller General concluded, went beyond the range of acceptable public information activities and therefore violated the publicity and propaganda law. B-223098/B-223098.2, October 10, 1986.

A similar holding is 66 Comp. Gen. 707 (1987), involving newspaper articles and editorials in support of Central American policy. The materials were prepared by paid consultants at government request, and published as the work of nongovernment parties. The decision also found that media visits by Nicaraguan opposition leaders, arranged by government officials but with that fact concealed, constituted another form of "covert propaganda." See also B-129874, September 11, 1978 ("canned editorials" and sample letters to the editor in support of Consumer Protection Agency legislation, had they been prepared, would have violated the law).

In B-229257, June 10, 1988, the Federal Trade Commission prepared a variety of materials critical of the Postal Service's "monopoly" on letter class mail, for distribution at a National Press Club breakfast which the Postmaster General was to attend. While the material was unquestionably "propaganda," it did not violate the law because it identified the FTC as the source.

(4) Providing assistance to private lobbying groups

Another type of "lobbying" activity GAO has found improper is the use of appropriated funds to provide assistance to private lobbying groups. This is largely an outgrowth of the concept that an agency should not be able to do indirectly that which it cannot do directly. The few cases in which violations have been found have involved a version of the publicity and propaganda statute tied in specifically to attempting to influence pending legislation. However, the activity in question would presumably also constitute a violation of the broader "publicity or propaganda not authorized by Congress" version.

In 1977, the Office of the Special Assistant to the President for Consumer Affairs and the Office of Consumer Affairs within the (then) Department of Health, Education and Welfare mounted an active campaign to obtain passage of legislation to establish a Consumer Protection Agency. As part of the campaign, the Special Assistant had instructed the Office of Consumer Affairs to informally clear its efforts with certain "public interest lobby members." In addition, two of the consumer lobby groups asked HEW to provide material illustrating situations where a Consumer Protection Agency could have had an impact had it been in existence. Before implementing the campaign, however, the Office of Consumer Affairs sought advice from the HEW General Counsel, who advised against certain elements of the plan, including the two items mentioned.

Since, pursuant to the General Counsel's advice, the more egregious elements of the plan were not carried out, the Comptroller General concluded that no laws were violated. However, the Comptroller pointed out that the "publicity and propaganda" statute would prohibit the use of appropriated funds to develop propaganda material to be given to private lobbying organizations to be used in their efforts to lobby Congress. An important distinction must be made. There would be nothing wrong with servicing requests for information from outside groups, lobbyists included, by providing such items as stock education materials or position papers from agency files, since this material would presumably be available in any event under the Freedom of Information Act. The improper use of appropriated funds arises when an agency assigns personnel or otherwise provides administrative support to prepare material not otherwise in existence to be given to a private lobbying organization. B-129874, September 11, 1978. See also 66 Comp. Gen. 707, 712 (1987), drawing the same distinction in the context of 18 U.S.C. § 1913.

In another example, the Maritime Administration ("MarAd") had become intimately involved with the National Maritime Council, a trade association of ship operators and builders. MarAd staff performed the administrative functions of the Council at MarAd headquarters and regional offices. In 1977, at a time when cargo preference legislation was pending in Congress, the Council, with MarAd's active assistance, undertook an extensive advertising campaign in national magazines and on television advocating a strong U.S. merchant marine. Some of the advertisements encouraged view of the vast differences among agencies, any such formula would almost certainly be unworkable. Rather, the determination must be made essentially on a case-by-case basis.

For an expenditure to be justified under the necessary expense theory, three tests must be met:

(1) The expenditure must bear a logical relationship to the appropriation sought to be charged. In other words, it must make a direct contribution to carrying out either a specific appropriation or an authorized agency function for which more general appropriations are available.

(2) The expenditure must not be prohibited by law.

(3) The expenditure must not be otherwise provided for, that is, it must not be an item that falls within the scope of some other appropriation or statutory funding scheme.

E.g., 63 Comp. Gen. 422, 427-28 (1984); B-230304, March 18, 1988.

a. Relationship to the Appropriation

The first test—the relationship of the expenditure to the appropriation—is the one that generates by far the lion's share of questions. On the one hand, the rule does not require that a given expenditure be "necessary" in the strict sense that the object of the appropriation could not possibly be fulfilled without it. Thus, the expenditure does not have to be the only way to accomplish a given object, nor does it have to reflect GAO's perception of the best way to do it. Yet on the other hand, it has to be more than merely desirable or even important. E.g., 34 Comp. Gen. 599 (1955); B-42439, July 8, 1944. An expenditure cannot be justified merely because some agency official thinks it is a good idea.

The important thing is not the significance of the proposed expenditure itself or its value to the government or to some social purpose in abstract terms, but the extent to which it will contribute to accomplishing the purposes of the appropriation the agency wishes to charge. For example, the Forest Service can use its appropriation for "Forest Protection and Utilization" to buy plastic litter bags for use in a national forest. 50 Comp. Gen. 534 (1971). However, operating appropriations of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are not available to pay to the Internal Revenue Service taxes due on judgment proceeds recovered by the EEOC in an members of the public to contact their elected representatives to urge them to support a strong merchant fleet. Reviewing the situation, GAO concluded that MarAd had violated the publicity and propaganda statute by expending appropriated funds to provide administrative support to the Council in the form of staff time, supplies, and facilities, when it knew the Council was attempting to influence legislation pending before Congress. See B-192746-0.M., March 7, 1979, and GAO report entitled The Maritime Administration and the National Maritime Council—Was Their Relationship Appropriate, CED-79-91, May 18, 1979.

In B-133332, March 28, 1977, the Smithsonian Institution had prepared an exhibit entitled "The Tallgrass Prairie: An American Landscape" and displayed it at a premiere showing for the benefit of the Tallgrass Prairie Foundation, a nonprofit organization. While appropriated funds were used to prepare the exhibit, none were used for the benefit itself since, under the Smithsonian's traveling exhibit program, administrative costs are paid by the host organization. The problem arose because the Tallgrass Prairie Foundation shared a large part of its membership with a lobbying organization known as "Save the Tallgrass Prairie, Inc." (There is no cause that does not have its lobbyists.) In addition, a leading member of both organizations had actually created the exhibit under contract with the Smithsonian. However, the exhibit itself was non-controversial and the Foundation had an independent legal existence. Thus, since no lobbying took place at the benefit, and since any lobbying by "Save the Tallgrass" or by the exhibit's creator could not be imputed to the Foundation nor to the Smithsonian, GAO concluded that the Smithsonian had not used its appropriations for any improper indirect lobbying.

(5) Pending legislation: overview

The version of the publicity and propaganda law which the Comptroller General has had the most frequent occasion to apply is narrower than the "publicity or propaganda not authorized by Congress" version previously discussed; it addresses only one type of publicity or propaganda—that designed to influence pending legislation.

For over 30 years, from the early 1950's to fiscal year 1984, the following provision was enacted every year:

"No part of any appropriation contained in this or any other Act, or of the funds available for expenditure by any corporation or agency, shall be used for publicity or propaganda purposes designed to support or defeat legislation pending before Congress."[90]

As long as this version was in effect, it applied, by virtue of the "this or any other act" language, to all government agencies regardless of which appropriation act provided their funds. It also applied expressly to government corporations, even those which did not receive direct appropriations. See, e.g., B-164497(5), March 10, 1977 (United States Railway Association); B-114823, December 23, 1974 (Export-Import Bank).

For fiscal year 1984, the "this or any other act" provision fell victim to a point of order and was dropped. See 64 Comp. Gen. 281 (1985). As of 1990, there is no governmentwide "pending legislation" provision. However, it continues to appear in individual appropriation acts in various forms. For example, a sampling of 1990 appropriation acts reveals the following versions:

"None of the funds made available by this Act shall be used in any way, directly or indirectly, to influence congressional action on any legislation or appropriation matters pending before the Congress."[91]

"No part of this appropriation shall be used for publicity or propaganda purposes or implementation of any policy including boycott designed to support or defeat legislation pending before Congress or any State legislature."[92]

"No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be available for any activity or the publication or distribution of literature that in any way tends to promote public support or opposition to any legislative proposal on which congressional action is not complete . . . ."[93]

"No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall be used, other than for normal and recognized executive-legislative relationships, for publicity or

propaganda purposes, for the preparation, distribution, or use of any kit, pamphlet, booklet, publication, radio, television, or film presentation designed to support or defeat legislation pending before the Congress, except in presentation to the Congress itself."[94]

If a given policy or activity is affected by pending or proposed legislation, any discussion of that policy or activity by officials will necessarily refer to such legislation, either explicitly or by implication, and will presumably be either in support of or in opposition to it. Thus, an interpretation of a "pending legislation" statute which strictly prohibited expenditures of public funds for dissemination of views on pending legislation would preclude virtually any comment by officials on agency or administration policy or activities. Absent a compelling indication of congressional intent, GAO has been unwilling to adopt this approach.

The Comptroller General has construed the "pending legislation" provisions as applying primarily to indirect or "grass roots" lobbying and not to direct contact with Members of Congress. In other words, the statute prohibits appeals to members of the public suggesting that they in turn contact their elected representatives to indicate support of or opposition to pending legislation, thereby expressly or implicitly urging the legislators to vote in a particular manner. This is essentially the same interpretation the Justice Department has given to the previously-discussed criminal statute, 18 U.S.C. § 1913.

The extent to which GAO will investigate an alleged lobbying violation depends in large measure on the amount of money involved. As a minimum, GAO will review materials submitted to it and will solicit the written justification of the agency in any case. The extent to which GAO will investigate beyond that depends on the potential amounts involved balanced against the likelihood of uncovering impropriety. See B-142983, September 18, 1962.

The court cases cited previously in our discussion of 18 U.S.C. § 1913 for the proposition that the criminal statute does not create a private cause of action also discuss, and reach the same conclusion with respect to, the appropriation act provision.

[94]Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-166, § 509, 103 Stat. 1159, 1190 (1989).

GAO concluded in a 1984 study that further statutory restraints on executive branch lobbying did not appear necessary. GAO did recommend, however, that the restriction on "grass roots" lobbying be enacted into permanent law. No Strong Indication That Restrictions on Executive Branch Lobbying Should Be Expanded, GAO/GGD-84-46 (March 20, 1984). See also B-206391/B-217896, October 30, 1985; B-206391, July 2, 1982. (Both of these are comments on proposed legislation which was not enacted.)

Before proceeding to the specific cases, certain threshold concerns should be noted. Most of the pre-1985 cases were decided under the governmentwide ("this or any other act") restriction. The cases are included to illustrate types of conduct that have been found either legitimate or questionable. The particular agencies involved may or may not still be subject to an anti-lobbying restriction. In addition, different versions of the statute could produce different results. It would also seem logical that the broader "publicity or propaganda not authorized by Congress" version should cover the specific type of publicity or propaganda designed to influence pending legislation, an application that was unnecessary while the "this or any other act" provision existed.[95]

In any event, the cases are relevant in evaluating the types of conduct that are more likely to raise questions under 18 U.S.C. § 1913, with one distinction. The criminal statute by its terms prohibits certain actions even before a bill is introduced; the appropriation act restrictions, unless specified to the contrary, require "pending legislation." Of course, this would include appropriation acts.

Finally, unless a particular provision specifically includes lobbying at the state level, the legislation must be pending before the United States Congress, not a state legislature. E.g., B-193545, March 13, 1979; B-193545, January 25, 1979.

(6) Cases involving "grass roots" lobbying violations

A bill was introduced in the 86th Congress to prohibit the Post Office Department from transporting first class mail by aircraft on a space available basis. The Post Office Department opposed the [95]Thus far, GAO has not applied the "publicity or propaganda not authorized by Congress" provision to "pending legislation" lobbying. See 66 Comp. Gen. 707 (1987); B-229257, June 10, 1988; B-223098/B-223098.2, October 10, 1986; B-217896, July 25, 1985. However, none of these cases involved forms of "grass roots" lobbying which GAO would have found improper.

bill and embarked on a campaign to defeat it. Among the tactics used were letters to postal patrons and "canned" editorials asking the public to contact Members of Congress to urge opposition to the bill. GAO found that this activity violated the anti-lobbying statute. B-116331, May 29, 1961.

Another violation resulted from the use of a kit entitled "Battle of the Budget 1973." The White House at the time was opposed to 15 bills then pending in Congress which it felt would exceed the administration's 1974 budget. White House staff writers assembled a package of materials that were distributed to executive branch officials in an effort to defeat the bills. The kit included statements that people should be urged to write their representatives in Congress to support the administration's opposition to the 15 bills. This, the Comptroller General held, violated the publicity and propaganda statute. B-178448, April 30, 1973.

Administration budget battles with Congress produced another violation in B-178648, September 21, 1973. This case involved prerecorded news releases provided to radio stations by executive branch agencies. GAO reviewed over 1,000 of these releases and while most were proper, nevertheless found several that violated the law. Examples of the violations are as follows:

(1)"If the President's position of resisting higher taxes resulting from big spending is to be upheld, the people need to be heard. The voice of America can reach Capitol Hill and can be a positive persuader."

(2)"If we are going to have economic stability and fiscal responsibility, we must all support the President's budget program—and let Congress know we support it."

The next two examples illustrate important points:

(3)"If we don't slow down Federal spending . . . we face a 15-percent increase in income taxes and more inflation. I don't think any American wants this. But, in the final analysis the responsibility rests with the voters and the taxpayers. They must let the Congress know how they feel on this critical issue."

Here, the listener is urged merely to make his or her "views" known to Congress. This is nevertheless a violation if the context makes it clear, as in the example, what those "views" are supposed to be.

(4)"All those unneeded new bills headed for the President's desk from Congress—all the unworthy Federal programs and projects—are guns pointed at the heads of American taxpayers. . . . Right now, Congress is getting all kinds of letters from special interest groups. Those groups are pleading their own selfish causes. I think Congress should hear from all Americans on what the President is trying to do whatever their views may be. And I say that regardless of whether those who contact their Congressmen happen to be in agreement with me."

The purported disclaimer in the last sentence does not cure the obvious violation.

A clear violation occurred in B-128938, July 12, 1976. The Environmental Protection Agency, as part of an authorized public information program, contracted with a nonprofit organization to publish a newsletter in California entitled "Water Quality Awareness." One of the articles discussed a pending bill which environmentalists opposed. The article went on to name the California representatives on the House committee that was considering the bill and exhorted readers to "[c]ontact your representatives and make sure they are aware of your feelings concerning this important legislation." As with some of the violations in B-178648, the context of the article left no doubt what those "feelings" were supposed to be. The fact that EPA did not publish the article directly did not matter since an agency has a duty to insure that its appropriations are not used to violate a statutory prohibition. See also B-202975, November 3, 1981.

Two more recent cases in which violations were found are B-212235, November 17, 1983, and Improper Lobbying Activities by the Department of Defense on the Proposed Procurement of the C-5B Aircraft, GAO/AFMD-82-123 (September 29, 1982), both of which are summarized in our previous discussion of 18 U.S.C. § 1913.

It is not necessary for a statement to explicitly refer to the particular piece of pending legislation. Thus, a lobbying campaign using appropriated funds urging the public to write to Members of Congress to support a strong merchant marine at a time when cargo preference legislation is pending violates the law. B-192746-0.M., March 7, 1979.

There is one case in which GAO found conduct short of the traditional form of "grass roots" lobbying to constitute a violation, but its precedent value is unclear. The 1979 Interior Department appropriation act (Pub. L. No. 95-465, § 304) included a provision very similar to the 1990 anti-lobbying provision quoted earlier.[96] In 59 Comp. Gen. 115 (1979), GAO reasoned that section 304 must be read as covering certain activities which would have been permissible under the standard "this or any other act" provision then in effect, otherwise there would have been no purpose in enacting section 304. Accordingly, GAO found section 304 violated by a mass mailing by the National Endowment for the Arts of an information package supporting the Livable Cities Program. Although the literature did not directly exhort readers to lobby Congress, its tenor was clearly designed to promote public support for the program, and the mailing was timed to reach the public just before House reconsideration of a prior refusal to fund the program. Since the result in 59 Comp. Gen. 115 was based on the parallel existence of the "this or any other act" statute, it is unclear whether the same result would be reached in the absence of that statute. In any event, the Interior Department provision, as with similar provisions, applies to appeals to the public rather than direct communication with legislators. Id. See also report entitled Alleged Unauthorized Use of Appropriated Moneys by Interior Employees, CED-80-128 (August 13, 1980).

(7) Pending legislation: cases in which no violation was found

As indicated above, GAO has consistently taken the position that the anti-lobbying statute does not prohibit direct communication, solicited or unsolicited, between agency officials and Members of Congress. This is true even where the contact is an obvious attempt to influence legislation. Thus, GAO concluded that the publicity and propaganda statute was not violated in the following cases:

- Contacts with Members of Congress by federal judges and legislative liaison activities by the Judicial Conference of the United States. 63 Comp. Gen. 624 (1984).

- Visits to Members of Congress by National War College students as part of a seminar on the legislative process. B-209584, January 11, 1983.
- Director of the Office of Management and Budget sent a letter to all Members of the House of Representatives urging opposition to a disapproval resolution on a Presidential Reorganization Plan. B-192658, September 1, 1978.

See also B-200250, November 18, 1980 (agency sent position paper to Members of Congress opposing particular piece of pending legislation); B-164497(5), March 10, 1977 (entertainment in form of dinners for Members of Congress); B-114823, December 23, 1974 (personal visits to Capitol Hill by agency officials during floor debate on authorizing legislation, at request of congressional proponents of the legislation); B-164786, November 4, 1969 (cruises with Members of Congress on Presidential yacht, paid for from entertainment appropriation); B-145883, October 10, 1967 (unsolicited letter to Members of Congress from agency head urging support for continuation of agency programs); B-93353, September 28, 1962 (telegram sent by agency head to all Members of Congress).

A government contractor lobbying with its own corporate (i.e., nonfederal) funds would generally not violate the appropriation act restriction. However, applicable contract cost principles may restrict or prohibit reimbursement. See, e.g., Federal Acquisition Regulation, 48 C.F.R. § 31.205-22; B-218952, August 21, 1985; Nuclear Test Lobbying: DOE Regulations for Contractors Need Reevaluation, GAO/RCED-88-25BR (October 9, 1987). In addition, there may be legislation applicable to contractor lobbying.[97]

Also as indicated above, an agency will not violate the anti-lobbying statute by disseminating material to the public which is essentially expository in nature. Even if the material is promotional, there is no violation, at least of the anti-lobbying statute, as long as it is not clearly designed to induce members of the public to contact their elected representatives. Again, several cases will illustrate.

[97]One of the previously-cited "pending legislation" statutes—the Labor-HHS provision—has an additional sentence, not included in our quotation, barring the use of appropriated funds to pay the salary or expenses of any grant or contract recipient, or agent of such recipient, related to any activity designed to influence pending legislation. In addition, 31 U.S.C. § 1352, enacted in October 1989 and summarized later in our discussion of lobbying with grant funds, includes governmentwide restrictions on certain lobbying activities by contractors.

For example, the Department of Transportation set up displays on U.S. Capitol grounds of passenger cars equipped with passive restraint systems (airbags). DOT employees at the displays distributed brochures, explained the devices, and answered questions from Members of Congress and the public. All this was done while legislation was pending to prohibit mandatory enforcement of the airbag standard. While, considering the timing and location of the displays, one would have to be pretty stupid not to see this as an obvious lobbying ploy, that did not make it illegal since there was no evidence that DOT urged members of the public to contact their elected representatives. Thus, since it was not illegal for DOT to advocate the use of airbags or to communicate with Congress directly, there was no violation. B-139052, April 29, 1980. The apparent intent alone is not enough; it must be translated into action.

Similarly, the statute was not violated by the following actions:

- Speech by Secretary of the Air Force urging defense contractors to direct their advertising towards convincing the public of the need for a strong defense rather than promoting particular weapon systems manufactured by their companies. Speech did not refer to legislation nor urge anyone to contact Congress. B-216239, January 22, 1985.
- Bumper stickers purchased by Department of Transportation and affixed to government vehicles urging compliance with 55 mph speed limit. B-212252, July 15, 1983.
- Various trips by the District of Columbia Police Chief during which he made speeches supporting the administration's law enforcement policy. B-118638, August 2, 1974.
- Statements by cabinet members, distributed to news media, which discussed pending legislation but were limited to an exposition of the administration's views. B-178648, December 27, 1973.
- Mailings by the National Credit Union Administration to federally chartered credit unions consisting of reprints from the Congressional Record giving only one side of a controversial legislative issue. B-139458, January 26, 1972.

See also B-147578, November 8, 1962 (White House Regional Conferences); B-150038, November 2, 1962 (Department of Agriculture press release); B-148206, March 20, 1962 (radio and television announcements by Commerce Department supporting foreign trade legislation).

Generally speaking, funds appropriated to carry out a particular program would not be available for political purposes, i.e., for a propaganda effort designed to aid a political party or candidate. See B-147578, November 8, 1962. If for no other reason, such an expenditure would be improper as a use of funds for other than their intended purpose in violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). However, the publicity and propaganda statute does not provide adequate guidelines to distinguish between legitimate and purely political activities and is therefore applicable to "political" activities only to the extent that the activities would otherwise constitute a violation. See B-130961, October 26, 1972.

In more general terms, it is always difficult to find that conduct is so purely political as to constitute a purpose violation. As stated in B-144323, November 4, 1960:

> "[The question is] whether in any particular case a speech or a release by a cabinet officer can be said to be so completely devoid of any connection with official functions or so political in nature that it is not in furtherance of the purposes for which Government funds were appropriated, thereby making the use of such funds . . . unauthorized. This is extremely difficult to determine in most cases as the lines separating the nonpolitical from the political cannot be precisely drawn.
> ". . . As a practical matter, even if we were to conclude that the use of appropriated funds for any given speech or its release was unauthorized, the amount involved would be small, and difficult to ascertain; and the results of any corrective action might well be more technical than real."

Apart from considerations of whether any particular law has been violated, GAO has taken the position that the government should not disseminate misleading information. On occasion, the Comptroller General has characterized publications as "propaganda" and attacked them from an audit perspective.

In 1976, the former Energy Research and Development Administration published a pamphlet entitled "Shedding Light on Facts About Nuclear Energy." Ostensibly created as part of an employee motivational program, ERDA printed copies of the pamphlet far in excess of any legitimate program needs, and inundated the State of California with them in the months preceding a nuclear safeguards initiative vote in that state. The pamphlet had a strong pro-nuclear bias and urged the reader to "Let your voice be heard." On the legal side, the pamphlet did not violate any anti-lobbying statute because enforcement action. While the payment would further a purpose of the IRS, it would not contribute to fulfilling the purposes of the EEOC appropriation. 65 Comp. Gen. 800 (1986).

If the basic test is the relationship of the expenditure to the appropriation sought to be charged, it should be apparent that the "necessary expense" concept is a relative one. As stated in 65 Comp. Gen. 738, 740 (1986):

"We have dealt with the concept of 'necessary expenses' in a vast number of decisions over the decades. If one lesson emerges, it is that the concept is a relative one: it is measured not by reference to an expenditure in a vacuum, but by assessing the relationship of the expenditure to the specific appropriation to be charged or, in the case of several programs funded by a lump-sum appropriation, to the specific program to be served. It should thus be apparent that an item that can be justified under one program or appropriation might be entirely inappropriate under another, depending on the circumstances and statutory authorities involved."

The evident difficulty in stating a precise rule emphasizes the role and importance of agency discretion. It is in the first instance up to the administrative agency to determine that a given item is reasonably necessary to accomplishing an authorized purpose. Once the agency makes this determination, GAO will normally not substitute its own judgment for that of the agency. In other words, the agency's administrative determination of necessity will be given considerable deference. The standard GAO uses in evaluating purpose availability is summarized in the following passage from B-223608, December 19, 1988:

"When we review an expenditure with reference to its availability for the purpose at issue, the question is not whether we would have exercised that discretion in the same manner. Rather, the question is whether the expenditure falls within the agency's legitimate range of discretion, or whether its relationship to an authorized purpose or function is so attenuated as to take it beyond that range."

A decision on a "necessary expense" question therefore involves (1) analyzing the agency's appropriations and other statutory authority to determine whether the purpose is authorized, and (2) evaluating the adequacy of the administrative justification, to decide whether the agency has properly exercised, or exceeded, its discretion.

applicable restrictions did not extend to lobbying at the state level. B-130961-0.M., September 10, 1976. However, GAO's review of the pamphlet found it to be oversimplified and misleading. GAO characterized it as "propaganda" not suitable for distribution to anyone, employees or otherwise, and recommended that ERDA cease further distribution and recover and destroy any undistributed copies. See GAO report entitled Evaluation of the Publication and Distribution of "Shedding Light on Facts About Nuclear Energy," EMD-76-12 (September 30, 1976).

In a later report, GAO reviewed a number of publications related to the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project and found several of them to be oversimplified and distorted propaganda and as such questionable for distribution to the public. However, the publications were produced by the private sector components of the Project and paid for with utility industry contributions and not with federal funds. While GAO was thus powerless to recommend termination of the offending publications, it nevertheless recommended that the Department of Energy work with the private sector components in an effort to eliminate this kind of material, or at the very least insure that such publications include a prominently displayed disclaimer statement making it clear that the material was not government-approved. GAO report entitled Problems with Publications Related to the Clinch River Breeder Reactor Project, EMD-77-74 (January 6, 1978).

d. Lobbying With Grant Funds

The use of grant funds by a federal grantee for lobbying presents somewhat more complicated issues. On the one hand, there is the principle, noted in various contexts throughout this publication, that an agency should not be able to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. Thus, if an agency cannot make a direct expenditure of appropriated funds for certain types of lobbying, it should not be able to circumvent this restriction by the simple device of passing the funds through to a grantee. Yet on the other hand, there is the seemingly countervailing rule that where a grant is made for an authorized grant purpose, grant funds in the hands of the grantee largely lose their identity as federal funds and are no longer subject to many of the restrictions on the direct expenditure of appropriations.

In some instances, Congress has dealt with the problem by legislation. For example, legislation enacted late in 1989, known as the Byrd Amendment, imposes limited governmentwide restrictions.

Section 319 of the 1990 Interior Department appropriation act, Pub. L. No. 101-121, 103 Stat. 701, 750 (1989), is a piece of permanent legislation to be codified at 31 U.S.C. § 1352. Subsection (a)(1) provides:

"None of the funds appropriated by any Act may be expended by the recipient of a Federal contract, grant, loan, or cooperative agreement to pay any person for influencing or attempting to influence an officer or employee of any agency, a Member of Congress, an officer or employee of Congress, or an employee of a Member of Congress in connection with any Federal action described in paragraph (2) of this subsection."

The actions identified in paragraph (2) are the awarding of any federal contract, the making of any federal grant or loan, the entering into of any cooperative agreement, and the extension, continuation, renewal, amendment, or modification of any federal contract, grant, loan, or cooperative agreement. The law includes detailed disclosure requirements and civil penalties. Subsection (e)(1)(C) stresses that the new section 1352 should not be construed as permitting any expenditure prohibited by any other provision of law. Thus, the new law supplements other anti-lobbying statutes; it does not supersede them.

Subsection (b)(7) of 31 U.S.C. § 1352 directs the Office of Management and Budget to issue guidance for agency implementation. OMB published "interim final guidance" on December 20, 1989 (54 Fed. Reg. 52306), supplemented on June 15, 1990 (55 Fed. Reg. 24540). An "interim final rule" for grants was issued jointly by OMB and 28 grantor agencies as a common rule on February 26, 1990 (55 Fed. Reg. 6736). For contracts, interim rules amending the Federal Acquisition Regulations were published on January 30, 1990 (55 Fed. Reg. 3190).

Another example is the legislation governing the Legal Services Corporation. Under the Legal Services Corporation Act, recipients of funds, both contractors and grantees, may not use the funds directly or indirectly to attempt to influence the passage or defeat of legislation. The prohibition covers legislation at the state and local level as well as federal legislation. The statute permits three exceptions: (1) recipients may testify before and otherwise communicate with legislative bodies upon request; (2) they may initiate contact with legislative bodies to express the views of the Corporation on legislation directly affecting the Corporation; and (3) they may engage in certain otherwise prohibited lobbying activities when necessary to the proper representation of an eligible client. 42 U.S.C. § 2996f(a)(5).[98] For a general discussion of these provisions, see B-129874-O.M., October 30, 1978. See also B-202569, April 27, 1981.

Three 1981 cases illustrate the application of the Legal Services Corporation statute. In one case, the Board of Aldermen for the City of Nashua, New Hampshire, was considering a resolution to authorize a "food stamp workfare" demonstration project. An attorney employed by the New Hampshire Legal Assistance group, a Legal Services Corporation grantee, wrote to members of the Board urging them to reject the resolution. Since the letter was not related to the representation of any specific client or group of clients but rather had been self-initiated by the attorney, the use of federal funds to prepare and distribute the letter was illegal. B-201928, March 5, 1981.

In the second case, 60 Comp. Gen. 423 (1981), the Corporation and its grantees conducted a lobbying campaign to drum up support for the Corporation's reauthorization and appropriation legislation. The Corporation argued that the actions were permissible under the exception authorizing contact with legislative bodies on legislation directly affecting the Corporation. While recognizing that the statute permitted direct self-initiated contact in these circumstances, GAO reviewed the legislative history and concluded that the exception did not permit "grass roots" lobbying either by the Corporation itself or by its grantees.

In the third case, the Managing Attorney of a Legal Services Corporation grantee made a mass mailing of a form letter to local attorneys. The letter solicited their support for continuation of the LSC program and urged them to contact a local Congressman opposed to reauthorization of the LSC to try to persuade him to change his vote. This too constituted impermissible "grass roots" lobbying. B-202787, December 29, 1981.[99]

[98]Similar provisions, found in 42 U.S.C. § 2996e(c), apply to the Corporation itself. An illustrative case is B-231210, June 7, 1988, aff'd upon reconsideration, B-231210, June 4, 1990, holding that the Corporation is not authorized to retain a private law firm to lobby Congress on its behalf.

[99]Government lobbying has a tendency to adjust to changes in the political climate. A 1988 case, B-231210, June 7, 1988, found the Corporation lobbying to reduce its appropriations.

More recently, GAO found the statute violated when a grantee used LSC grant funds to oppose the confirmation of Judge Robert Bork to the United States Supreme Court. The finding was based largely on LSC regulations which broadly define "legislation" to include action on appointments. B-230743, June 29, 1990.

Another provision in the LSC enabling legislation prohibits both the Corporation and its grantees from contributing or making available "corporate funds or program personnel or equipment for use in advocating or opposing any ballot measures, initiatives, or referendums." 42 U.S.C. § 2996e(d)(4). The Corporation and one of its grantees violated this one by providing funds and personnel for a campaign to defeat a ballot measure in California. 62 Comp. Gen. 654 (1983).

In addition to the Corporation's enabling legislation, appropriation acts providing funds for the Corporation have included a version of the "publicity and propaganda" restriction, known as the "Moorhead Amendment," which prohibits the use of Corporation funds for publicity or propaganda designed to support or defeat legislation pending before Congress or any state legislature. While serving largely to reemphasize the prohibitions contained in the Corporation's enabling legislation, the Moorhead Amendment makes it clear that the exception for the proper representation of eligible clients does not extend to grass roots lobbying. See 60 Comp. Gen. 423 (1981); B-163762, November 24, 1980.[100]

Still another example of legislation expressly applicable to grantees is discussed in B-202787(1), May 1, 1981. The appropriation act providing funds for the Community Services Administration contained a variety of the "publicity and propaganda" provision which prohibited the use of funds "to pay the salary or expenses of any grant or contract recipient . . . to engage in any activity designed to influence legislation or appropriations pending before the Congress." GAO found this provision violated when a local community action agency used grant funds for a mass mailing of a letter to members of the public urging them to write to their Congressmen to [100]The Moorhead Amendment has not always been obvious. For example, the Corporation's 1988 appropriation barred the use of funds "for any purpose prohibited or limited by or contrary to any of the provisions of Public Law 99-180." Pub. L. No. 100-202, 101 Stat. 1329, 1329-33. Public Law 99-180 was the Corporation's 1986 appropriation act and contained the Moorhead Amendment (99 Stat. 1162).

oppose abolition of the agency. In addition, CSA had issued a regulation purporting to exempt CSA grantees from the appropriation act restriction. Finding that CSA had exceeded its authority, the Comptroller General recommended that CSA rescind its ruling. The Justice Department also found the CSA regulations invalid, construing the statute as constituting "an unqualified prohibition against lobbying by federal grantees" and not merely a restriction on grass roots lobbying. 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 180 (1981).

The provision discussed in the preceding paragraph was also violated when a university, using grant funds received from the Department of Education, encouraged students to write to Members of Congress to urge their opposition to proposed cuts in student financial aid programs. GAO report entitled Improper Use of Federal Student Aid Funds for Lobbying Activities, GAO/HRD-82-108 (August 13, 1982).

The question of lobbying with grant funds becomes more difficult when the situation is not covered by the new 31 U.S.C. § 1352 and applicable appropriation act restrictions do not expressly cover grantees. Until late in 1981, whether "publicity and propaganda" provisions silent as to grantees applied to grantee expenditures had not been definitively addressed in a decision of the Comptroller General. An early case held that telegrams to Members of Congress by state agencies funded by Labor Department grants constituted an improper use of federal funds where they were clearly designed to influence pending legislation. B-76695, June 8, 1948. This case pre-dated the "publicity and propaganda" provisions and was decided under 18 U.S.C. § 1913. While, as noted earlier, GAO would today be more circumspect in drawing conclusions under the criminal statute,[101] the concept of applying the prohibition to grantee expenditures would arguably be the same under the appropriation act restrictions. In a 1977 letter, GAO noted the principle that funds in the hands of a grantee largely lose their identity as federal funds and said that the applicability of the publicity and propaganda statute was therefore "questionable." B-158371, November 11, 1977 (non-decision letter). A 1978 letter to a Member of the Senate said that the issue should be addressed on a case-by-case basis. B-129874, August 15, 1978.

[101]In fact, 18 U.S.C. § 1913 is now regarded as applicable only to officers and employees of the federal government and not to contractors or grant recipients. See B-214455, October 24, 1984 (citing a May 24, 1983 letter to GAO from the Justice Department's Criminal Division).

In B-128938, July 12, 1976, GAO said that an agency has a responsibility to insure that its appropriations are not used to violate the anti-lobbying statute. While the case involved expenditures by a contractor, the principle would seemingly apply as well to a grantee.

Finally, in B-202975, November 3, 1981, the Comptroller General resolved the uncertainty, applied the concept of B-128938, and concluded that:

"Federal agencies and departments are responsible for insuring that Federal funds made available to grantees are not used contrary to [the publicity and propaganda] restriction."

The case involved the Los Angeles Downtown People Mover Authority, a grantee of the Urban Mass Transportation Administration, Department of Transportation. Fearing that its funding was in jeopardy, the Authority prepared and distributed a newsletter urging readers to write to their elected representatives in Congress to support continued funding for the People Mover project. The Comptroller General found that this newsletter, to the extent it involved UMTA grant funds, violated the anti-lobbying statute.

In our preceding discussion of lobbying by government agencies, we noted that publicity and propaganda statutes are usually limited to lobbying the United States Congress and do not apply to lobbying at the state level unless expressly so provided. The same principle applies with respect to lobbying with grant funds. B-214455, October 24, 1984; B-206466, September 13, 1982.

e. Government Employees Training Act

A restriction on the use of appropriated funds in connection with lobbying, although not by government officials, is contained in the Government Employees Training Act. The law prohibits the training of government employees (and hence the expenditure of appropriated funds to support such training) "by, in, or through a non-Government facility a substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation." 5 U.S.C. § 4107(b)(1).

As of 1990, there have been no Comptroller General decisions applying this provision. However, the statute contains a similarly-worded restriction on subversive activities—5 U.S.C. § 4107(a)(1)—and decisions under that restriction are relevant in construing the identical language in the lobbying restriction. Thus, the term "non-Government facility" applies to individuals contracting with or employed by the government to provide training as well as to organizations. 38 Comp. Gen. 857 (1959). However, where an organization is conducting the training, the term does not apply to individual employees of that organization where there is no contractual relationship between those employees and either the government or the government employees receiving the training. Id. See also B-182398, October 24, 1979 (non-decision letter). A test of whether an organization violates the subversive activities prohibition is to determine if it is included in the Attorney General's subversive organization list. See 51 Comp. Gen. 199 (1971); 38 Comp. Gen. 857 (1959). An analog for the lobbying restriction would be to determine if the organization has registered under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act.

f. Informational Activities

As we have noted previously, a government agency has a legitimate interest in informing the public about its programs and activities. Just how far it can go depends on the nature of its statutory authority. Certainly there is no need for statutory authority for an agency to issue a press release describing a recent speech by the agency head, or for the agency head or some other official to participate in a radio, television, or magazine interview. Activities of this type are limited only by applicable restrictions on the use of public funds such as the anti-lobbying statutes previously discussed.

A 1983 decision illustrates another form of information dissemination which is permissible without the need for specific statutory support. Military chaplains are required to hold religious services for the commands to which they are assigned. 10 U.S.C. § 3547. Publicizing such information as the schedule of services and the names and telephone numbers of installation chaplains is an appropriate extension of this duty. Thus, GAO advised the Army that it could procure and distribute calendars on which this information was printed. 62 Comp. Gen. 566 (1983). Applying a similar rationale, the decision also held that information on the Community Services program, which provides various social services for military personnel and their families, could be included.

Some agencies have specific authority to disseminate information. Such authority will permit a broader range of activities and gives the agency discretion to choose the appropriate means, the selection being governed by the necessary expense doctrine.

The agency may use common devices such as newsletters (e.g., B-128938, July 12, 1976) or conferences or seminars (e.g., B-166506, July 15, 1975). In one case, the Comptroller General approved a much less conventional means. Shortly after World War II, the Labor Department wanted to publicize its employment services for veterans. It did this by discharging balloons from a float in a parade. Attached to the balloons were mimeographed messages asking employers to list their available jobs. Since the Department was charged by statute with publishing information on the program, the cost of the balloons was permissible. B-62501, January 7, 1947. Other pertinent cases are 32 Comp. Gen. 487 (1953) (publication of Public Health Service research reports in scientific journals); 32 Comp. Gen. 360 (1953) (the recording of Office of Price Stabilization forum discussions to be used at similar meetings in other regions); B-89294, August 6, 1963 (use of motion picture by United States Information Agency); B-15278, May 15, 1942 (photographs); A-82749, January 7, 1937 (radio broadcasts).

However, in 18 Comp. Gen. 978 (1939), radio broadcasts by the Veterans Administration were held to violate 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) because the agency did not have statutory authority to disseminate information about its activities. Similarly, the Bureau of Printing and Engraving needed statutory authority to publish a 100-year history to commemorate its centennial because the Bureau is essentially an "industrial and service" establishment and lacked authority to disseminate information. 43 Comp. Gen. 564 (1964).

g. Advertising and the Employment of Publicity Experts

(1) Commercial advertising

Suppose you opened this publication and found on the inside front cover a full-page advertisement for somebody's soap or underwear or aluminum siding or the local pool parlor. We assume most readers would find this offensive. There is in fact a long-standing policy against involving the government in commercial advertising. In the case of government publications, the policy is codified in section 13 of the Government Printing and Binding Regulations issued by the Joint Committee on Printing (1986 reprint):

"No Government publication or other Government printed matter, prepared or produced with either appropriated or nonappropriated funds or identified with an activity of the Government, shall contain any advertisement inserted by or for any private individual, firm, or corporation; or contain material which implies in any manner that the Government endorses or favors any specific commercial product, commodity, or service."

An explanatory paragraph included in the regulations summarizes many of the reasons for this prohibition. Advertising would be unfair to competitors in that it would, regardless of intent, unavoidably create the impression of government endorsement. It would also be unfair to non-government publications which compete for advertising dollars and need those dollars to stay in business. Acceptance of advertising could also pose ethical, if not legal, problems. (Imagine, for example, lobbyists scrambling to purchase advertising space in the Congressional Record.)

A different situation was presented in 67 Comp. Gen. 90 (1987). The United States Information Agency is authorized to accept donations of radio programs from private syndicators for broadcast over the Voice of America. Some donations were conditioned on the inclusion of commercial advertising. GAO noted that, in the case of public broadcast stations (which are supported by the Corporation for Public Broadcasting), commercial advertising is expressly prohibited by 47 U.S.C. § 399b(b). However, there is no comparable statute applicable to USIA. Therefore, the conditional donations were not subject to any legal prohibition. In view of the traditional policy against commercial advertising, GAO suggested that USIA first consult the appropriate congressional committees.

(2) Advertising of government programs, products, or services

Even the casual viewer of commercial television will note that the government is heavily "into" advertising. Turn on one channel and "Smokey Bear" is pleading with you not to ignite the national forests. Flip to another channel and a feathered character named "Woodsy Owl" admonishes against pollution.[102] Try still another and someone may be telling you to observe the speed limit or join a carpool or collect postage stamps or write for a catalogue of available government publications. A brief description of some of the methods the government uses to advertise may be found in a GAO report entitled Federal Energy Administration's Contract with the [102]Should anyone have any doubt, both of these characters are recognized (and protected) by act of Congress. See 16 U.S.C. § 580p. Mess with Smokey or Woodsy and you can go to jail. 18 U.S.C. §§ 711 and 711a.

Advertising Council, Inc., for a Public Relations Campaign on the Need to Save Energy, PSAD-77-151 (August 31, 1977).

Whether an agency's appropriations are available for advertising, like any other expenditure, depends on the agency's statutory authority. Whether to advertise and, if so, how far to go with it are determined by the precise terms of the agency's program authority in conjunction with the necessary expense doctrine and general restrictions on the use of public funds such as the various anti-lobbying statutes. E.g., B-229732, December 22, 1988 (Department of Housing and Urban Development had no authority to incur promotional expenses at a trade show in the Soviet Union the purpose of which was to enhance the potential for sale of American products and services in the Soviet Union, a purpose unrelated to HUD's mission).

As noted previously, some agencies have express promotional authority. For example, the Department of Energy may promote energy conservation. See B-139965, April 16, 1979 (non-decision letter). Similarly, the United States Postal Service has statutory authority to advertise its philatelic services to encourage stamp collecting. B-114874.30, March 3, 1976 (non-decision letter).

As with the dissemination of information, where promotional authority exists, agencies have reasonable discretion, subject to "necessary expense" considerations, in selecting appropriate means. Thus, the Navy could exercise its statutory authorization to promote safety and accident prevention by procuring book matches with safety slogans printed on the covers and distributing them without charge at naval installations. B-104443, August 31, 1951. Another example is B-184648, December 3, 1975.

Activities of the United States Mint furnish additional illustrations. While the Postal Service has long been in the business of promoting the sale of its products to collectors (see, e.g., B-119784, May 18, 1954), the Mint is a relative newcomer. Several statutes in recent years have authorized the Mint to produce and market various commemorative coins. Sales proceeds are applied first to recover production costs, with the balance going to the Treasury or other specified source. In B-206273, September 2, 1983, GAO considered the Mint's promotional authority under legislation authorizing coins to commemorate the 1984 Los Angeles Summer Olympics. GAO concluded that the Mint could stage media events and receptions, and

The role of discretion in purpose availability is further complicated by the fact that not all federal establishments have the same range of discretion. For example, a government corporation with the authority to determine the character and necessity of its expenditures has, by virtue of its legal status, a broader measure of discretion than a "regular" agency. But even this discretion is not unlimited and is bound at least by considerations of sound public policy. See 14 Comp. Gen. 755 (1935), affirmed upon reconsideration in A-60467, June 24, 1936.

Two decisions involving the Bonneville Power Administration will illustrate. In 1951, the Interior Department asked whether funds appropriated to BPA could be used to enter into a contract to conduct a survey to determine the feasibility of "artificial nucleation and cloud modification" (artificial rainmaking in English) for a portion of the Columbia River drainage basin. If the amount of rainfall during the dry season could be significantly increased by this method, the amount of marketable power for the region would be enhanced. Naturally, BPA did not have an appropriation specifically available for rainmaking. However, in view of BPA's statutory role in the sale and disposition of electric power in the region, GAO concluded that the expenditure was authorized. B-104463, July 23, 1951.

The Interior Department then asked whether, assuming the survey results were favorable, BPA could contract with the rainmakers. GAO thought this was going too far and questioned whether BPA's statutory authority to encourage the widest possible use of electric energy really contemplated artificial rainmaking. GAO emphasized that the expenditure would be improper for a department or agency with the "ordinary authority usually granted" to federal agencies. However, the legislative history of BPA's enabling statute indicated that Congress intended that it have a degree of freedom similar to public corporations and that it be largely free from "the requirements and restrictions ordinarily applicable to the conduct of Government business." Therefore, while the Comptroller General expressly refused to "approve" the rainmaking contract, he felt compelled to hold that BPA's funds were legally available for it. B-105397, September 21, 1951.

For the typical federal department or agency, the range of discretion will be essentially the same, with variations in the kinds of things justifiable under the necessary expense umbrella stemming could give away occasional sample coins at these events, if (1) the expenditures were deemed necessary to further the statutory objectives, (2) a reasonable relationship were found to exist between a given expenditure and a marketing benefit for the program, and (3) promotional expenses were recouped from sales proceeds. In 68 Comp. Gen. 583 (1989), GAO applied the same standards to the commemorative coin program generally, but declined to expand the scope of legitimate promotional activities to include the printing of business cards for sales representatives.

The line between promotion and information dissemination is occasionally thin, but the concepts are nevertheless different. Thus, an agency may be authorized to disseminate information but not to promote. If so, its "advertising" must be tailored accordingly. For example, the Federal Housing Administration could disseminate authentic information on available benefits or related procedures under a loan insurance program, but could not use its funds for an advertising campaign to create demand. 14 Comp. Gen. 638 (1935). Similarly, when the United States Metric Board was first created, it could provide information, assistance, and coordination for voluntary conversion to metrics but could not advocate metric conversion. See GAO report entitled Getting A Better Understanding of the Metric System—Implications If Adopted by the United States, CED-78-128, October 20, 1978, and letters B-140399, June 19, 1979, and B-140399, May 29, 1979.

(3) Publicity experts

A statute originally enacted in 1913, now found at 5 U.S.C. § 3107, provides:

"Appropriated funds may not be used to pay a publicity expert unless specifically appropriated for that purpose."

GAO has had little occasion to interpret or apply 5 U.S.C. § 3107 and, from the earliest cases, has consistently noted certain difficulties in enforcing the statute. In GAO's first substantive discussion of 5 U.S.C. § 3107, the Comptroller General stated "[i]n its present form, the statute is ineffective." A-61553, May 10, 1935. The early cases[103]

[103]There is no mention of the 1913 statute before the 1930's. A small group of cases then arose. In addition to A-61553, cited in the text, see B-26689, May 4, 1943; A-93988, April 19, 1938; A-82332, December 15, 1936; A-57297, September 11, 1934. Another stretch of silence followed and the statute did not arise again until B-181254, February 28, 1975.

identified three problem areas, summarized in B-181254, February 28, 1975.

First, the prohibition is against compensating any "publicity expert," but the statute does not define the term "publicity expert" nor does it provide criteria for determining who is one. Traditionally, persons employed for or engaged in so-called publicity work have not been appointed as "publicity experts" but under some other designation, and often have other duties as well. Everyone who prepares a press release is not a "publicity expert." Testifying before the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities in 1950, Assistant Comptroller General Weitzel said:

> "I might mention one of the great difficulties in enforcing that language is it is very, very rare, if ever, the case that a man is on the pay roll as publicity experts [sic]. He can be called almost anything else, and usually and frequently will have other duties, so that that in itself, is a very difficult statute to enforce."[104]

Second, employees engaged in so-called publicity work are normally assigned to their duties by their supervisors. It would be harsh, in the absence of much more definitive legislative or judicial guidance, to withhold the compensation of an employee who is merely doing his or her assigned job. Some thought was given in the 1930's and early 1940's to amending the statute to cure this problem, but the legislation was not enacted. See B-181254, February 28, 1975; B-26689, May 4, 1943; A-82332, December 15, 1936.

Third, the effective implementation of the duties of some agencies requires the acquisition and dissemination of information, although agencies normally do not receive specific appropriations for the required personnel.

Based on these considerations, GAO does not view 5 U.S.C. § 3107 as prohibiting an agency's legitimate informational functions or legitimate promotional functions where authorized by law. The apparent intent of the statute is to prohibit publicity activity "for the purpose of reflecting credit upon an activity, or upon the officials charged with its administration, rather than for the purpose of furthering the work which the law has imposed upon it." A-82332, December 15, 1936. See also B-181254, February 28, 1975. In this sense, 5 U.S.C. § 3107 is closely related to the prohibition on self-aggrandizement previously discussed, although the focus is different in that, to violate 5 U.S.C. § 3107, the activity must be performed by a "publicity expert."

In the only two cases in the 1970's with any substantial discussion of 5 U.S.C. § 3107, GAO considered a mass media campaign by the Federal Energy Administration, now part of the Department of Energy, to educate the American public on the need for and means of energy conservation. Based on the considerations discussed above and on the FEA's statutory authority to disseminate information and to promote energy conservation, GAO found no basis on which to assess a violation of 5 U.S.C. § 3107. B-181254, February 28, 1975; B-139965, April 16, 1979 (non-decision letter). In both cases GAO stressed its view that the statute is not intended to interfere with the dissemination of information which an agency is required or authorized by statute to disseminate, or with promotional activities authorized by law.

The only case in the 1980's to apply 5 U.S.C. § 3107 is B-222758, June 25, 1986. The Chemical Warfare Review Commission, a Presidential advisory committee, hired a public affairs consultant. The Commission's functions were solely advisory; it had no authority to engage in promotional activities or to maintain a public affairs program. In view of the consultant's duties, job title, and reputation, GAO found that he was a "publicity expert." As such, and given the nature of the Commission's functions and its lack of statutory authority, the hiring was held to violate 5 U.S.C. § 3107.

12. Membership Fees

a. 5 U.S.C. § 5946

Appropriated funds may not be used to pay membership fees of an employee of the United States or the District of Columbia in a society or association. 5 U.S.C. § 5946. The prohibition does not apply if an appropriation is expressly available for that purpose, or if the fee is authorized under the Government Employees Training Act. Under the Training Act, membership fees may be paid if the fee is a necessary cost directly related to the training or a condition precedent to undergoing the training. 5 U.S.C. § 4109(b).

The rule that has evolved under 5 U.S.C. § 5946 is that membership fees for individuals may not be paid, regardless of the resulting benefit to the agency. An agency may, however, purchase a membership in its own name, upon an administrative determination that the expenditure would further the authorized activities of the agency, and this is not affected by any incidental benefits that may accrue to individual employees.[105]

In 24 Comp. Gen. 814 (1945), the Veterans Administration asked whether it could pay membership fees for VA facilities in the American Hospital Association. Facility membership would enable individual employees to apply for personal membership at reduced rates. The Comptroller General responded that the facility memberships were permissible if administratively determined necessary to accomplish the objectives of the appropriation to be charged. The indirect benefit to individual officials would not operate to invalidate the agency membership. However, the expenditure would be improper if its purpose was merely to enable the officials to obtain the reduced rates for personal memberships. VA could not, of course, pay for the individual memberships.

Similarly, GAO advised the Environmental Protection Agency that it could not pay the membership fees for its employees in professional organizations (such as the National Environment Research Center and the National Solid Waste Management Association), notwithstanding the allegation that the benefits of membership would accrue more to the agency than to the individuals. EPA could, however, purchase a membership in its own name if it justified the expenditure as being of direct benefit to the agency and sufficiently related to carrying out the purposes of its appropriation. 53 Comp. Gen. 429 (1973).[106]

In another 1973 decision, the Comptroller General held that the Department of Justice could not reimburse an electronics engineer employed by the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs for membership in the Institute of Electrical and Electronic Engineers.

[105]A few very early decisions will be found to the effect that 5 U.S.C. § 5946 prohibits agency memberships as well as individual memberships. E.g., 19 Comp. Gen. 838 (1940); 24 Comp. Dec. 473 (1918). While these decisions do not appear to have been explicitly overruled or modified, they must be regarded as implicitly repudiated by the subsequent body of case law to the extent they purport to prohibit adequately justified agency memberships.

[106]The last sentence of the decision uses the term "essential." This word is too strong. The necessary expense doctrine does not require that an expenditure be "essential."

The Department had argued that the government benefited from the membership by virtue of reduced subscription rates to Institute publications and because the membership contributed to employee development. These factors were not sufficient to overcome the prohibition of 5 U.S.C. § 5946. Once again, GAO pointed out that the Bureau could become a member of the Institute in its own name if administratively determined to be necessary. 52 Comp. Gen. 495 (1973). To the same effect is B-205768, March 2, 1982 (Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service can purchase agency membership in Association of Labor Related Agencies upon making appropriate administrative determinations).

In another case, the Comptroller General held that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration could not pay the membership fee of one of its employees in Federally Employed Women, Inc., notwithstanding the employee's designation as the agency's regional representative. The mere fact that membership may be job-related does not overcome the statutory prohibition. B-198720, June 23, 1980. See also 19 Comp. Dec. 650 (1913) (Army could not pay for Adjutant General's membership in International Association of Chiefs of Police). Similarly, the fact that membership may result in savings to the government, such as reduced travel rates for members, does not overcome the prohibition against individual memberships. 3 Comp. Gen. 963 (1924).

As noted, an agency may purchase membership in its own name in a society or association since 5 U.S.C. § 5946 prohibits only memberships for individual employees. The distinction, however, is not a distinction in name only. An expenditure for an agency membership must be justified on a "necessary expense" theory. To do this, the membership must provide benefits to the agency itself. For example, in 31 Comp. Gen. 398 (1952), the Economic Stabilization Agency was permitted to become a member of a credit association because members could purchase credit reports at reduced cost and the procurement of credit reports was determined to be necessary to the enforcement of the Defense Production Act. In 33 Comp. Gen. 126 (1953), the Office of Technical Services, Commerce Department, was permitted to purchase membership in the American Management Association. The appropriation involved was an appropriation under the Mutual Security Act to conduct programs including technical assistance to Europe, and the membership benefit to the agency was the procurement of Association publications for foreign trainees and foreign productivity centers.

Citing 31 Comp. Gen. 398 and 33 Comp. Gen. 126, the Comptroller General held in 57 Comp. Gen. 526 (1978), that the Department of Housing and Urban Development could purchase, in the name of the Department, air travel club memberships to obtain discount air fares to Hawaii. Similarly, the General Services Administration could join a shippers association to obtain the benefit of volume transportation rates. B-159783, May 4, 1972.

GAO has also approved membership by the Federal Law Enforcement Center in the local Chamber of Commerce, B-213535, July 26, 1984, and by a naval installation in the local Rotary Club, 61 Comp. Gen. 542 (1982). In the latter decision, however, GAO cautioned that the result was based on the specific justification presented, and that the decision should not be taken to mean that "every military installation or regional Government office can use appropriated funds to join the Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, and similar organizations." Id. at 544.

The acquisition of needed publications for the agency is sufficient benefit to justify purchase of an agency membership. 20 Comp. Gen. 497 (1941) (membership of Naval Academy in American Council on Education); A-30185, February 5, 1930 (membership of Phoenix Indian School in National Education Association). See also 33 Comp. Gen. 126 (1953). Compare 52 Comp. Gen. 495 (1973), holding that acquisition of publications is not sufficient to justify an individual, as opposed to agency, membership.

A variation occurred in 19 Comp. Gen. 937 (1940). The Cleveland office of the Securities and Exchange Commission desired access to a law library maintained by the Cleveland Law Library Association. Access was available only to persons who were stockholders in the Association. The alternative to the SEC would have been the purchase of its own library at a much greater cost. Under the circumstances, GAO advised that 5 U.S.C. § 5946 did not prohibit the stock purchases or the payment of stockholders assessments. GAO further noted, however, that a preferable alternative would be a contract with the Association for a flat-rate service charge.

Where there is no demonstrable benefit to the agency, the membership expense is improper. Thus, in 32 Comp. Gen. 15 (1952), the cost of membership fees for the New York Ordnance District of the Army in the Society for Advancement of Management was disallowed. The membership was in actuality four separate memberships for four individuals and the primary purpose was to enhance the knowledge of those individuals.

Since the benefit to the agency must be in terms of furthering the purposes for which its appropriation was made, a benefit to the United States as a whole rather than the individual agency may not be sufficient. In 5 Comp. Gen. 645 (1926), the former Veterans Bureau owned herds of livestock and wanted to have them registered. Reduced registration costs could be obtained by joining certain livestock associations. The benefit of registration would be a higher price if the agency sold the livestock. However, sales proceeds would have to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts and would thus not benefit the agency's appropriations. Membership was therefore improper. (The agency's appropriation language was subsequently changed and the membership was approved in A-38236, March 30, 1932.)

Several of the decisions have pointed out that an agency may accept a gratuitous membership without violating the Antideficiency Act. 31 Comp. Gen. 398, 399 (1952); A-38236, March 30, 1932, quoted in 24 Comp. Gen. 814, 815 (1945).

In addition, payment of a membership fee at the beginning of the period of membership does not violate the prohibition on advance payments found in 31 U.S.C. § 3324. B-221569, June 2, 1986. What is being purchased is a "membership," and the "membership" is received upon payment.

The evolution of the statutory law on membership fees produced a somewhat anomalous result in some of the early cases. 5 U.S.C. § 5946 originally prohibited—and still prohibits—not only membership fees but also the expenses of attending meetings. In the early decades of the statute, some agencies received specific authority to pay the expenses of attendance at meetings, but many did not. Thus, as the individual vs. agency membership distinction developed, some of the decisions were forced to conclude that an agency could purchase a membership in an association but that nobody could attend the meetings since attending meetings could not be done by "the agency" but only through an individual. See, e.g., 24 Comp. Gen. 814, 815 (1945); A-30185, February 5, 1930. Two provisions of the Government Employees Training Act, 5 U.S.C.

§§ 4109 and 4110, now permit attendance at meetings in certain situations. Thus, as a general proposition, if an organization is closely enough related to an agency's official functions to justify agency membership, it is presumably closely enough related to justify sending a representative to its meetings.

As noted above, the prohibition in 5 U.S.C. § 5946 against individual memberships does not apply if the fee is authorized by the Government Employees Training Act. An illustration is 61 Comp. Gen. 162 (1981), holding that the Defense Department could pay the licensing fees of Methods Time Measurement instructors for the Army Management Engineering Training Agency. The instructors had to be trained and certified—hence the fee—before they could train others. Further, the fee was not a matter of "personal qualification" since the certifications would be restricted to the training of Defense Department personnel and would be of no personal use to the instructors apart from their Defense Department jobs.

Another example is B-223447, October 10, 1986, approving certain individual memberships for U.S. Army Corps of Engineers employees in the Toastmasters International organization as a source of public speaking training. The organization required membership in order to obtain the training. Because the Government Employees Training Act does not apply to active duty members of the uniformed services (68 Comp. Gen. 127 (1988)), the Act's exception to 5 U.S.C. § 5946, and cases applying the Act or the exception, apply to civilian employees of the military departments but not to uniformed personnel.

b. Attorneys

A number of cases have dealt with the expenses of admission to the bar and related items for attorneys employed by the government.

The question first came up in 22 Comp. Gen. 460 (1942), when the Federal Trade Commission asked if it could reimburse one if its attorneys the fee he paid to be admitted to the bar of the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals. The attorney had paid the fee in order to make an appearance to represent the agency in a suit filed against it. The Comptroller General said no, stating the rule as follows:

"It has been the consistent holding of the accounting officers of the United States that an officer or employee of the Government has upon his own shoulders the duty of qualifying himself for the performance of his official duties and that if a personal license is necessary to render him competent therefor, he must procure it at his own expense." Id. at 461.

In 1967, the National Labor Relations Board asked GAO to reconsider the rule in a fact situation similar to that in 22 Comp. Gen. 460. GAO reviewed the basis for the prior decision in light of the Government Employees Training Act, but found no reason to change it. Pointing out that "the privilege to practice before a particular court is personal to the individual and is his for life unless disbarred regardless of whether he remains in the Government service," the Comptroller General again held that the bar admission fee was personal to the attorney and could not be paid from appropriated funds. 47 Comp. Gen. 116 (1967).

The same result was reached in B-161952, June 12, 1978, again to the National Labor Relations Board. The fact that an attorney might require admission to several courts rather than just one in the performance of official duties was found immaterial and GAO rejected the suggestion that the court admission would be of very limited value to the attorney after leaving the government.

Questions have also arisen over the requirement for a government attorney to remain a member in good standing of the bar of some state or the District of Columbia. In a jurisdiction with a "unified" or "integrated" bar, the attorney must pay an annual fee to remain a member in good standing, and membership in the state's bar association goes along with the fee. (Some states require annual fees to remain on the active rolls but do not include bar association membership.) In B-171667, March 2, 1971, the annual fee for an Internal Revenue Service attorney to remain in good standing in the California bar, an integrated bar jurisdiction, was held not reimbursable from appropriated funds. The fee remains a matter of personal qualification and the principle is the same whether applied to a one-time fee or to dues or fees charged on a recurring basis. The decision cited 5 U.S.C. § 5946 as an additional reason. GAO reached the same result in 51 Comp. Gen. 701 (1972), concerning a Patent Office attorney's membership in the unified bar of the District of Columbia; again in B-204213, September 9, 1981, concerning mandatory dues for continued membership in the North Carolina bar; and still again in B-204215, December 28, 1981, concerning the membership of an Internal Revenue Service estate tax attorney in the New Jersey bar.

Another case applying the prohibition is B-187525, October 15, 1976. The decision further pointed out that an agency may not pay the costs incurred by one of its attorneys in taking a bar examination since the examination is part of the employee's personal qualification process. See also 55 Comp. Gen. 759 (1976) concerning examinations in general.

In 61 Comp. Gen. 357 (1982), GAO held that the Merit Systems Protection Board could not pay the bar membership fees of its appeals officers. It made no difference that the requirement for appeals officers to be bar-admitted attorneys was a new one the Board had imposed on incumbent employees. In addition, the Board could not pay bar review course fees. (The decision distinguished B-187525, cited above, which had permitted bar review course fees in a very limited situation.)

13. Personal Expenses and Furnishings

Items which are classified as personal expenses or personal furnishings may not be purchased with appropriated funds without specific statutory authority. Most of the cases tend to involve government employees, the theory being simply that there are certain things an employee is expected to provide for him(her)self. A prime example is food, covered in detail previously in this chapter.

The rule on personal expenses and furnishings was stated as follows in 3 Comp. Gen. 433 (1924):

> "[P]ersonal furnishings are not authorized to be purchased under appropriations in the absence of specific provision therefor contained in such appropriations or other acts, if such furnishings are for the personal convenience, comfort, or protection of such employees, or are such as to be reasonably required as a part of the usual and necessary equipment for the work on which they are engaged or for which they are employed."

This decision is still cited frequently and the rule is applied in many contexts. Of course, over the years, exceptions have evolved, both statutory and non-statutory. The remainder of this section explores several categories of personal expenses.

a. Business or Calling Cards

Business cards or calling cards are commonly used in the commercial world. (We use the terms synonymously here even though there may be technical distinctions.) As far as the government is concerned, they are inherently personal in nature. Therefore, they are from program differences. For example, necessary expenses for an agency with law enforcement responsibilities may include items directly related to that authority which would be inappropriate for agencies without law enforcement functions. Thus, the Immigration and Naturalization Service could use its "salaries and expenses" appropriation to purchase and install lights, automatic warning devices, and observation towers along the boundary between the United States and Mexico. 29 Comp. Gen. 419 (1950). See also 7 Comp. Dec. 712 (1901). Similarly, in B-204486, January 19, 1982, the Federal Bureau of Investigation could buy insurance on an undercover business not so much to insure the property but to enhance the credibility of the operation.

The procurement of evidence is also authorized as a necessary expense for an agency with law enforcement responsibilities. For example, Forest Service appropriations could be used to pay towing and storage charges for a truck seized as evidence of criminal activities in a national forest. B-186365, March 8, 1977. See also 27 Comp. Gen. 516 (1948); 26 Comp. Dec. 780, 783 (1920); B-56866, April 22, 1946.

Cases involving fairs and expositions provide further illustration. For the most part, when Congress desires federal participation in fairs or expositions, it has authorized it by specific legislation. See, e.g., B-160493, January 16, 1967, discussing legislation which authorized federal participation in HemisFair 1968 in San Antonio. For another example, U.S. participation in the 1927 International Exposition in Seville, Spain, was specifically authorized by statute. See 10 Comp. Gen. 563, 564 (1931).

However, specific statutory authority is not essential. If participation is directly connected with and is in furtherance of the purposes for which a particular appropriation has been made, and an appropriate administrative determination is made to that effect, the appropriation is available for the expenditure. 16 Comp. Gen. 53 (1936); 10 Comp. Gen. 282 (1930); 7 Comp. Gen. 357 (1927); 4 Comp. Gen. 457 (1924).[6] Authority to disseminate information will generally provide adequate justification. E.g., 7 Comp. Gen. 357; 4 Comp. Gen. 457.

[6]A few early cases purporting to require specific authority, such as 2 Comp. Gen. 581 (1923), must be regarded as implicitly modified by the later cases.

considered a personal expense and not payable from appropriated funds without specific statutory authority.

The rule is long-standing and has been applied in a number of decisions. In 20 Comp. Dec. 248 (1913), the Comptroller of the Treasury considered the argument that has been presented in every case—that the cards are used for official business purposes. Be that as it may, business or calling cards are more a matter of personal convenience than necessity. Therefore, the Comptroller advised the State Department that their cost is a personal expense and not chargeable to public funds.[107] The decision also pointed out a practical basis for the rule: If the cards were permitted for certain officials, it would be impossible to draw a fair and enforceable line.

The rule was reiterated in 41 Comp. Gen 529 (1962), in which the purchase of business cards from appropriated funds was held improper for Department of Agriculture officials at overseas posts.

In a more recent case, the Comptroller General applied the prohibition to deny reimbursement to an employee of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration who had purchased business cards at his own expense. B-195036, July 11, 1979. More recently still, GAO advised the Forest Service that appropriated funds were not available to buy "identification cards" for use by a public affairs officer. The cards were the same as traditional business cards and were to be used for the same purposes. 68 Comp. Gen. 467 (1989). See also B-149151, July 20, 1962, in which the cards were called "cards of introduction." Devising a new name for the same thing does not make a difference. For other cases holding business cards to be personal expenses and therefore unauthorized, see 68 Comp. Gen. 583 (1989); 12 Comp. Gen. 565 (1933); 12 Comp. Dec. 661 (1906); 10 Comp. Dec. 506 (1904); B-131611, February 15, 1968; B-131611, May 24, 1957. The fact that the cost is to be charged to a revolving fund rather than a "direct" appropriation is immaterial. B-234603, August 11, 1989.

The rule is also reflected in the Government Printing & Binding Regulations, section 20 (1986 reprint):

[107]"[I]n official life it has been the practice for the official himself to furnish his own cards, the salaries in most instances being adequate for such expenditures," the Comptroller chided. 20 Comp. Dec. at 250.

"Printing or engraving of calling or greeting cards is considered to be personal rather than official and shall not be done at Government expense."

A variation occurred in B-173239, June 15, 1978. The Board for International Broadcasting wanted to use what it termed "transmittal slips" to accompany the distribution of its annual report. The "transmittal slip" resembled a business card and contained the words "With the compliments of (name and title), Board for International Broadcasting." It was not necessary to decide whether the "slips" were business cards or not, because 44 U.S.C. § 1106 expressly provides that documents distributed by an executive department or independent establishment may not contain or include a notice that they are being sent with "the compliments" of a government official. Use of the transmittal slips was therefore unauthorized.

For the application of these rules to Members of Congress, see B-198419, November 25, 1980, and B-198419, July 8, 1980.

There is one significant exception. Reception and representation (or comparable forms of "entertainment") appropriations may be used to purchase business cards for employees whose jobs include representation. B-223678, June 5, 1989 (noting that business cards are a "legitimate and accepted" representation device); 68 Comp. Gen. 467, 468 n.1 (1989).

Finally, "name tags" to be worn on the person are not the same as business cards and may be provided from appropriated funds. 69 Comp. Gen. 82 (1989). A name tag is more closely analogous to a government identification card, which is clearly not a personal expense. 2 Comp. Gen. 429 (1923). See also 11 Comp. Gen. 247 (1931) (identification insignia to be worn on caps).

b. Health, Medical Care and Treatment

(1) Medical care

The rule for medical care is that, except for illness directly resulting from the nature of the employment, medical care and treatment are personal to the employee and payment may not be made from appropriated funds unless provided for in a contract of employment or by statute or valid regulation. 57 Comp. Gen. 62 (1977); 53 Comp. Gen. 230 (1973). The case most frequently cited for this rule is 22 Comp. Gen. 32 (1942), which contains citations to many of the earlier decisions.[108]

Exceptions have been recognized where a particular item could be justified as being primarily for the benefit of the government rather than the employees. The exceptions involve primarily physical examinations and inoculation. For example, appropriated funds were held available in the following cases:

- 41 Comp. Gen. 387 (1961) (desensitization treatment for a Department of Agriculture horticulturist with a known history of severe reaction to bee and wasp stings).
- 23 Comp. Gen. 888 (1944) (purchase of drugs and their administration by private doctor to employees exposed to spinal meningitis in line of duty; otherwise, agency would have risked having to quarantine the employees and close the facility).
- B-108693, April 8, 1952 (X-rays for Weather Bureau personnel being assigned to Alaska, presumably necessitated by a high incidence of tuberculosis among Eskimos).

By virtue of legislation enacted in 1946 and now found at 5 U.S.C. § 7901, each agency is authorized to establish a health service program to promote and maintain the physical and mental fitness of employees under its jurisdiction. The statute expressly limits authorized health service programs to (1) treatment of on-the-job illness and dental conditions requiring emergency attention; (2) preemployment and other examinations; (3) referral of employees to private physicians and dentists; and (4) preventive programs relating to health.

Under this legislative authority, the Comptroller General advised, for example, that an agency could, upon determining that it will be in the government's interest to do so, provide immunization against specific diseases without charge to employees. 47 Comp. Gen. 54 (1967).

[108]Although not directly related to medical care, there is a very early group of cases, on which the earlier medical care cases partly relied, standing for the proposition that appropriated funds are not available for the burial of a deceased civilian employee unless necessary for the health and/or safety of other employees, in which event the "reasonable expenses of a decent burial" are permissible. 3 Comp. Gen. 111 (1923); 11 Comp. Dec. 789 (1905); 6 Comp. Dec. 447 (1899); 2 Comp. Dec. 347 (1896).

In 57 Comp. Gen. 62 (1977), the Comptroller General held that the Environmental Protection Agency was authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 7901 to procure diagnostic and preventive psychological counseling services for its employees. The service could encompass problem identification, referral for treatment or rehabilitation to an appropriate service or resource, and follow-up to help an employee readjust to the job during and after treatment, but could not include the actual treatment and rehabilitation. Actual treatment and rehabilitation remain the employee's responsibility.

In B-198804, December 31, 1980, GAO refused to expand the holding in 57 Comp. Gen. 62 to permit an agency to pay the expenses of alcoholism treatment and rehabilitation for one of its employees. Treatment and rehabilitation, as stressed in 57 Comp. Gen. 62, are the employee's responsibility. It made no difference that the employee had been erroneously advised that the expenses would be covered by her health insurance and had already incurred the expenses, since the government cannot be bound by the unauthorized acts or representations of its agents.

Federal agencies are authorized under 5 U.S.C. § 7901 to establish smoking cessation programs for their employees, and may use their operating appropriations to pay the costs. 68 Comp. Gen. 222 (1989). In light of the body of evidence of the health hazards of smoking, the decision reasoned, programs to help employees quit smoking are clearly "preventive programs relating to health" for purposes of the statute.[109]

Physical fitness programs may qualify as preventive health programs under 5 U.S.C. § 7901 to the extent permissible under applicable regulations such as OMB Circulars, the Federal Personnel Manual, and regulations of the General Services Administration. In addition, it may be possible to justify some programs under the necessary expense concept without the need to invoke the statute. For example, in 63 Comp. Gen. 296 (1984), GAO applied the necessary expense doctrine to conclude that Bureau of Reclamation funds were available for physical exercise equipment to be used in a mandatory physical fitness program for firefighters.

[109]The 1989 decision modified 64 Comp. Gen. 789 (1985), which had found smoking cessation programs unauthorized. The 1985 case had correctly held that such programs were not a form of "medical care," but had failed to properly evaluate them as preventive programs.

In 64 Comp. Gen. 835 (1985), GAO considered the scope of a permissible fitness program under section 7901, concluding that a program could include comprehensive physical fitness evaluations and laboratory blood tests. Based on the statute alone, it could also include physical exercise. However, regulations then in effect precluded use of appropriated funds for physical exercise as part of a health service program. The decision further noted, as 63 Comp. Gen. 296 had held, that physical exercise costs incident to a mandatory program necessitated by the demands of designated positions could be paid as a necessary expense without the need to rely on 5 U.S.C. § 7901. See also B-216852-O.M., March 6, 1985 (discussing GAO's own authority to establish a fitness program); B-216852, December 17, 1984 (non-decision letter).

Subsequent to 64 Comp. Gen. 835, the Office of Personnel Management revised its regulations to include physical fitness programs and facilities as permissible preventive health services. Based on the revised regulations, an agency may now use appropriated funds to provide access to a private fitness center's exercise facilities, although both GAO and OPM caution that expenditures of this type should be carefully monitored and should be undertaken only where all other resources have been considered and rejected. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-240371, January 18, 1991).

Medical treatment not within the scope of 5 U.S.C. § 7901 remains subject to the general rule expressed in cases such as 22 Comp. Gen. 32. Thus, the cost of an ambulance called by an agency medical officer to take an employee to a hospital could not be paid from appropriated funds. B-160272, November 14, 1966. (This is the kind of expense that can be covered by employee health insurance plans.) In another case, GAO rejected the contention that medical expenses are automatically "necessary expenses," and concluded that Internal Revenue Service appropriations were not available to reimburse the State Department for medical services provided to IRS overseas employees and their dependents under the Foreign Service Act of 1946. 53 Comp. Gen. 230 (1973). The decision noted that several other agencies had received specific statutory authority to participate in the program.

A review of the decisions involving medical examinations will further illustrate the relationship of 5 U.S.C. § 7901 to the decisional rules. Prior to the enactment of section 7901, a pre-employment physical examination, the purpose of which was to determine an applicant's eligibility for a federal job, was the applicant's responsibility and was not chargeable to appropriated funds. 22 Comp. Gen. 243 (1942).

Applying the "primary benefit of the government" standard, however, the Comptroller General found post-employment examinations permissible in certain situations. Thus, in 22 Comp. Gen. 32 (1942), GAO told the Army that it could use its appropriations to provide periodic physical examinations to detect arsenic poisoning in civilian workers in a chemical warfare laboratory. The decision noted that instances of arsenic poisoning "might have a depressing effect on the morale of fellow workers"[110] and might make it more difficult to find qualified people to do the work.[111] In another case, a civilian employee joined the Army during World War II. He received a medical discharge, and thereafter applied for reinstatement to his former civilian job. GAO advised that the agency could pay for a physical examination which it required prior to reinstatement. 23 Comp. Gen. 746 (1944).

In 1946, 5 U.S.C. § 7901 was enacted. Now, agencies have specific authority to include medical examinations, including pre-employment examinations, without charge to applicants, in the health programs they are authorized to establish. 30 Comp. Gen. 493 (1951). While the statute authorizes establishment of government programs, it does not authorize the reimbursement of privately-incurred expenses. Thus, an applicant who declines to use an available government doctor for a pre-employment examination and instead chooses to have it performed by a private doctor may not be reimbursed. 31 Comp. Gen. 465 (1952).

In situations not covered by the statute, the "primary benefit of the government" test continues to apply. Thus, based on the earlier precedents, the cost of medical examinations by private physicians was approved in the following cases:

[111]While this may sound heartless, the expenditure could be justified only if it was determined to be necessary to carry out the objects of the appropriation, and the appropriation in this instance was for chemical warfare service, not for employee health.

- 30 Comp. Gen. 387 (1951) (physical examinations of Department of Agriculture employees engaged in testing repellents and insecticides for use by the armed forces; no government medical facilities available).
- 41 Comp. Gen. 531 (1962) (annual physical examinations for Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation employees engaged in strenuous physical work, often under severe weather conditions; no public health facilities in area).

The examinations in both of the above cases could have been included in an authorized health service program. As noted, however, facilities were not available in either case. Thus, since the examinations were for the primary benefit of the government, appropriated funds were available to have them performed by private physicians.

In 65 Comp. Gen. 677 (1986), the Navy could pay for a medical examination required for a private individual joining a government research exercise under invitational travel orders. Although government medical facilities were presumably available, there was no need to note this fact in the decision. Since the individual was neither a government employee nor an applicant for a government job, she could not be required to use the government facility and, since the Navy wanted her participation, it could not very well expect her to bear the expense.

(2) Purchase of health-related items [112]

The purchase of health-related items, while conceptually related to the medical care cases, is also an application of the "personal expense" rule set forth in 3 Comp. Gen. 433, cited at the beginning of this section, that personal equipment needed to qualify an employee to perform the regular duties of his or her position may not be paid from appropriated funds. The rule is illustrated in B-187246, June 15, 1977. There, a Community Services Administration employee's doctor had placed him under certain restrictions because of a back injury. Specifically, he was to use a "sacro-ease positioner" for his office chair and could drive cars only with a minimum 116-inch wheel base, bucket seats, and full power. While the equipment may have been necessary for that particular individual to perform his duties, it was not essential to the transaction of official business from the government's standpoint. Therefore, the items could not be provided from appropriated funds.

In B-166411, September 3, 1975, an employee who, as a result of a back injury, needed a bedboard while travelling could not be reimbursed beyond the normal per diem. The bedboard was a personal expense. Similarly, gratuities for wheelchair services while travelling were held non-reimbursable in B-151701, July 3, 1963.

A different type of situation arose in B-215640, January 14, 1985. An agency asked whether it could purchase a heavy-duty office chair for an employee who needed extra physical support because he weighed over 300 pounds and had broken 15 regular chairs. While the particular type of chair in question was necessitated by the employee's physical condition, it is nevertheless the case that an office chair is not "personal equipment" but is an item the government is normally expected to provide for its employees. The purchase was therefore authorized.

Another exception occurred in 23 Comp. Gen. 831 (1944). There, GAO approved the rental of an amplifying device to be attached to an official telephone for use by an employee with a hearing handicap. The device was seen as a means of obtaining the best results from available personnel. The precedent value of this decision is somewhat speculative. On the one hand, the device would not become the property of the individual. Yet on the other hand, the decision seems to have been based largely on the difficulty of hiring "qualified" employees in view of the wartime draft situation. (Whether consideration was given to hiring women is not mentioned.)

Generally, however, exceptions stem from some statutory basis. Thus, in 56 Comp. Gen. 398 (1977), the Comptroller General approved the purchase of a motorized wheelchair for use by a Social Security Administration employee. The decision emphasized that a wheelchair is normally the employee's personal expense. In this case, however, the employee had his own non-powered wheelchair and needed a motorized wheelchair only because the agency had not complied with the Architectural Barriers Act of 1968. The wheelchair would, of course, become the property of the government and was approved only as a temporary expedient pending compliance with the statute. More recently, GAO advised that the purchase of a motorized wheelchair for a quadriplegic employee who spent half of his time on official travel could be regarded as a "reasonable accommodation" in accordance with regulations implementing the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, again on condition that the wheelchair remain the property of the government. B-240271, October 15, 1990.

In B-188710, September 23, 1977, training funds were held available to procure the taping and brailling of training materials and to provide related services such as interpreters for the deaf and readers for the blind. The decision pointed out that these items would be personal expenses if used in connection with regular duties in that each employee is presumptively qualified to perform the official duties of his or her position. However, in view of the policy in the Rehabilitation Act of providing equal opportunity for handicapped employees, the expenditures were held proper in the limited context of training under the Government Employees Training Act. In contrast, expenses for personal attendants to provide handicapped employees attending training with required personal care (such as help in dressing, bathing, getting in and out of bed) were held not to be proper expenditures from training funds because they are not directly related to training. B-188710, March 23, 1978. (For non-training situations, the employment of reading assistants for blind employees and interpreting assistants for deaf employees is now covered by 5 U.S.C. § 3102.)

Health-related items may also be authorized as "special protective equipment" under 5 U.S.C. § 7903, discussed later under "Wearing Apparel." Thus, prescription ground safety glasses may be purchased for employees engaged in hazardous duties. The glasses become and remain the property of the government. The government can also pay the cost of related eye refraction examinations in limited circumstances. 51 Comp. Gen. 775 (1972); 42 Comp. Gen. 626 (1963).

Relying on 3 Comp. Gen. 433 rather than 5 U.S.C. § 7903, GAO, in 45 Comp. Gen. 215 (1965), approved the purchase of special prescription filter spectacles and clinical eye examinations necessary to obtain the proper prescription for employees operating stereoscopic map plotting instruments. Employees who did not use special glasses frequently lost the required visual skills before reaching the normal retirement age. Also, the special glasses would be of no personal use to the employees except during working hours and would remain the property of the government. However, the purchase of eyeglasses for employees who work at video display terminals is not authorized. There is no applicable safety standard in the Occupational Safety and Health Act, the work is not (or at least has not yet been found to be) hazardous to the eyes if proper care is used, and not all employees who work at terminals need eyeglasses. 63 Comp. Gen. 278 (1984).

The 1980's saw a veritable flood of cases involving the purchase of air purifiers ("smokeeaters") as the campaign against smoking became a fashionable "cause celebre." The rules, distilled from several decisions,[113] are as follows:

- Appropriated funds are not available to purchase air purifiers for the private office of an employee who objects to tobacco smoke unless the employee's hypersensitivity to smoke qualifies him or her as handicapped under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973.
- Air purifiers may be purchased for "common areas" such as reading rooms.
- Air purifiers may be placed on the desks of employees who smoke if they will provide a general benefit to all employees working in the area.

c. Office Furnishings (Decorative Items)

An agency's appropriations are available without question to furnish the space it occupies with such necessary items as desks, filing cabinets, and other ordinary office equipment. Questions occasionally arise when the item to be procured is decorative rather than utilitarian.

The availability of appropriations for certain decorative items has long been recognized. In 7 Comp. Dec. 1 (1900), the Comptroller of the Treasury advised the Secretary of the Treasury that "paintings suitable for the decoration of rooms" were within the meaning of the term "furniture." Therefore, an appropriation for the furnishing of public buildings was available to purchase cases and glass coverings for paintings of deceased judges. The paintings had been donated to the government for display in a courtroom.

In the absence of either statutory authority or an adequate justification under the necessary expense doctrine, the expenditure, like any other expenditure, is illegal. Thus, the Department of Housing and Urban Development had no authority to finance participation at a trade exhibition in the Soviet Union where HUD's primary purpose was to enhance business opportunities for American companies. 68 Comp. Gen. 226 (1989); B-229732, December 22, 1988. Regardless of whether it may or may not have been a good idea, commercial trade promotion is not one of the purposes for which Congress appropriates money to HUD.

No discussion would be complete without some mention of the "marauding woodpecker" case. It appears that in 1951, "marauding woodpeckers" were causing considerable damage to government-owned transmission lines and the Southwestern Power Administration, Department of the Interior, wanted to buy guns with which to shoot the woodpeckers. Interior first went to the Army, but the Army advised that the types of guns and ammunition desired were not available, so Interior next came to GAO. The Comptroller General held that, if administratively determined to be necessary to protect the transmission lines, Interior could buy the guns and ammunition from the Southwestern Power Administration's construction appropriation. The views of the woodpeckers were not solicited. B-105977, December 3, 1951. Actually, this was not a totally novel issue. Several years earlier, GAO had approved the use of an Interior Department "maintenance of range improvements" appropriation for the control of coyotes, rodents, and other "predatory animals." A-82570, December 30, 1936. See also A-82570/B-120739, August 21, 1957.[7]

[7]Everyone loves a good animal case. Unfortunately, the animals in most GAO decisions are dead or, as in the cases cited in the text, soon to become dead. Readers interested more in amusement than precedent might also check out 7 Comp. Gen. 304 (1927) (removal of a horse "found dead lying on its back in a hole"); 18 Comp. Gen. 109 (1938) (another dead horse); B-86211, July 26, 1949 (death of hogs allegedly caused by being fed garbage purchased from Navy installation; it was pointed out that other hogs had eaten the same government-furnished garbage and managed to survive); B-47255, February 6, 1945 (burial of three dead bulls); B-37205, October 19, 1943 (mule fell off cable swing bridge); A-92649, April 22, 1938 (still another dead horse); B-115434-O.M., June 19, 1953 (agency borrowed a bull from another agency for breeding purposes, then had it slaughtered when it became vicious). These cases are being memorialized here because they will probably never be cited anywhere else. Insects do not escape either. See 34 Comp. Gen. 236 (1954) (grasshopper control in national forests). We're still looking for cases on fish.

The Comptroller followed this decision in 9 Comp. Dec. 807 (1903), holding that Treasury appropriations were available to buy portraits as furniture for the Ellis Island immigration station if administratively determined "necessary for the public service."

Citing both of these decisions, the Comptroller General held in B-178225, April 11, 1973, that the appropriation for salaries and expenses of the Tax Court was available for portraits of the Chief Judges of the Tax Court, to be hung (the portraits, not the judges) in the main courtroom. Similarly, the Tax Court could purchase artwork and other decorative items for judges' individual offices. 64 Comp. Gen. 796 (1985).

Other decisions approving the use of appropriated funds for decorative items are B-143886, September 14, 1960 (oil painting of agency head for "historical purposes" and public display); B-121909, December 9, 1954 ("solid walnut desk mount attached to a name plate"); B-114692, May 13, 1953 (framing of Presidential Certificates of Appointment for display in the appointee's office).

Purchase of decorative items for federal buildings is now covered in the Federal Property Management Regulations. The regulations authorize expenditures for pictures, objects of art, plants, flowers (both artificial and real), and other similar items. However, such items may not be purchased solely for the personal convenience or to satisfy the personal desire of an official or employee.

The regulation was discussed and the rule restated in 60 Comp. Gen. 580 (1981). Decorative items may be purchased if the purchase is consistent with work-related objectives and the items to be purchased are not "personal convenience" items.[114] The determination of "necessity" is within the agency's discretion, subject to the regulations. The regulations apply equally to space leased by an agency in a privately-owned building. See also 64 Comp. Gen. 796 (1985); 63 Comp. Gen. 110, 113 (1983).

As noted, one type of permissible decorative item is plants. A restriction in a 1980 appropriation act prohibited the use of funds [114]The decision also noted that the items must be for permanent rather than "seasonal" use. 60 Comp. Gen. at 582. The rule prohibiting use of appropriated funds for seasonal (e.g., Christmas) decorations has since been modified. See 67 Comp. Gen. 87 (1987), discussed in Section C.13.f.

for plant maintenance contracts. The Comptroller General construed this provision to apply to office space to which particular federal employees were actually assigned. The provision's legislative history suggested that it was not intended to apply to outdoor plants or to plants in common areas which were not the assigned work space of any particular employee or group of employees. 59 Comp. Gen. 428 (1980).

d. Personal Qualification Expenses

Expenses necessary to qualify a government employee to do his or her job are personal expenses and not chargeable to appropriated funds. As stated in an early decision:

> "That which is required of a person to become invested with an office must be done at his own expense unless specific provision is made by law for payment by the Government."

2 Comp. Dec. 262, 263 (1895). Somewhat coldly, the Comptroller added, "if he does not desire the office, he need not accept it." Id. See also United States v. Van Duzee, 140 U.S. 169, 171 (1890) ("[I]t is the duty of persons receiving appointments from the government . . . to qualify themselves for the office"). One example of this rule, bar membership expenses for attorneys, has already been covered in the section on membership fees.

Another commonly encountered example is a license to operate a motor vehicle. A driver's license is considered a personal expense incident to qualifying for the position for which employed. 21 Comp. Gen. 769, 772 (1942); 6 Comp. Gen. 432 (1926); 23 Comp. Dec. 386 (1917). An exception was recognized in B-115463, September 18, 1953, for Army civilian employees on temporary duty of at least six months' duration in foreign countries, where the employees did not already possess driver's licenses, operating a motor vehicle was not part of the job for which the employees were hired but the Army wanted to include driving as part of their TDY duties as a less expensive alternative to hiring additional personnel, and the license was required by the host country. See also B-87138-O.M., July 19, 1949 (Virgin Islands).

The rule has also been applied in the following situations:

- License to practice medicine. 49 Comp. Gen. 450 (1970); 46 Comp. Gen. 695 (1967).

- License for pesticide applicators. B-235727, February 28, 1990; B-186512, January 17, 1977.
- License to operate motion picture projection equipment. 31 Comp. Gen. 81 (1951).
- License to operate a gasoline pump. 3 Comp. Gen. 663 (1924).

Several of the decisions note that licenses of this nature amount to taxes and should not be imposed on federal employees performing federal functions. Whether a particular item does or does not amount to a tax, the result is the same: An employee who pays cannot be reimbursed.

It is not uncommon for agencies to have some of their employees commissioned as notaries public. By statute, an employee whose job includes serving as a notary public may be reimbursed the expense required to obtain the commission. 5 U.S.C. § 5945. The expense is reimbursable even though the employee uses the notarial power for private as well as government business. 36 Comp. Gen. 465 (1956).

e. Photographs

General rule: The cost of photographs of individual government employees is a personal expense not chargeable to appropriated funds in the absence of specific statutory authority. 31 Comp. Gen. 452 (1952). Thus, the dissemination to the press of photographs of a new agency official upon his appointment was held to be an improper expenditure in B-111336, September 16, 1952.

The rule is intended to prevent the use of public funds for the personal publicity of a particular individual. Exceptions have accordingly been recognized where there is adequate justification that the expenditure is necessary to accomplish some purpose for which the appropriation was made. For example, the distribution of photographs of an area director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was held permissible in 47 Comp. Gen. 321 (1967) where the purpose was to increase cooperation with the EEOC by publicizing its activities and functions. The decision further pointed out that the expense was chargeable to the fiscal year in which the photographs were taken rather than the year in which they were actually used.

Another acceptable justification is illustrated in B-123613, June 1, 1955, involving photographs of the Under Secretary of the Interior. One of the Under Secretary's functions is to represent the Secretary in various parts of the country. The photographs were obtained in order to respond to requests by organizations in preparing programs or by the press, in connection with this official travel. Similar justifications were found sufficient in B-114344, May 19, 1953, and B-47547, February 15, 1945.

Photographs for use on identification cards or badges are permissible when administratively determined necessary to protect government property or for security reasons. 23 Comp. Gen. 494 (1944); 20 Comp. Gen. 566 (1941); 20 Comp. Gen. 447 (1941); 2 Comp. Gen. 429 (1923).

At one time, travel regulations did not provide for the reimbursement of passport photographs, and they were held to be non-reimbursable personal expenses unless and until the regulations should be amended. 9 Comp. Gen. 311 (1930). The regulations were subsequently amended and passport photographs are now reimbursable. See 52 Comp. Gen. 177 (1972).

While earlier decisions state the rule in terms of photographs of individual employees, it applies to other photographs as well. The expense will be permitted where it clearly constitutes a means of effecting a proper agency function and disallowed where adequate justification does not exist.

For example, distribution of photographs of a department store display was viewed as a proper means of carrying out a statutory function of encouraging public cooperation toward economic stabilization. B-113464, January 29, 1953. Similar types of justification were found sufficient in B-175434, April 11, 1972; B-113026, January 19, 1953; and B-15278, May 15, 1942. However, inadequate justification was found in B-149493, December 28, 1977, in which a group photograph of interagency participants in a training symposium, sent free to participants, was held a personal, rather than a necessary, expense. Similarly, photographs taken at the dedication of the Klondike Gold Rush Visitor Center to be sent by the National Park Service as "mementos" to persons attending the ceremony were disallowed as a personal gift in B-195896, October 22, 1979.

f. Seasonal Greeting Cards and Decorations

(1) Greeting cards

The cost of seasonal greeting cards is a personal expense to be borne by the officer who ordered and sent them, and may not be charged to public funds.

In a 1957 case, an agency with overseas posts wanted to send Christmas cards to "important individuals" in the countries where the posts were located. The agency tried to justify the expense as a means of disseminating information and thereby to promote mutual understanding. The Comptroller General ruled, however, that the expense was a personal one and could not be paid from the agency's appropriations. 37 Comp. Gen. 360 (1957). As to the purported justification, the Comptroller said "it seems to us that very little, if any, information in that regard is contained on the ordinary Christmas greeting card." Id. at 361. See also 7 Comp. Gen. 481 (1928) and B-115132, June 17, 1953.

It is immaterial that the card is "nonpersonal," that is, sent by the agency and not containing the names of any individuals. The expenditure is still improper. 47 Comp. Gen. 314 (1967); B-156724, July 7, 1965.

In 47 Comp. Gen. 314, it was also held immaterial that the expenditure had been charged to a trust fund in which donations, which the agency was statutorily authorized to accept, had been deposited.

Transmitting the greetings in the form of a letter rather than a card does not legitimize the expenditure. In 64 Comp. Gen. 382 (1985), an agency head sent out a letter stating that the entire staff of the agency "joins me in wishing you a joyous holiday. We look forward to working with you and your staff throughout the coming year." A Member of Congress questioned the propriety of sending these letters in penalty mail envelopes. GAO noted that the letter "transacts no official business" and "is the essence of a Christmas card." Id. at 384. Therefore, the costs should not have been charged to appropriated funds.

While all of the above cases deal with Christmas greetings, the rule would presumably apply equally to other holiday or seasonal cards. It would also apply to "greetings" not tied in to any particular holiday. B-149151, July 20, 1962 ("thank you for hospitality" cards). The point is that while sending greetings may be a nice gesture, it is not the sort of thing that should be charged to the taxpayers.

(2) Seasonal decorations

Prior to 1987, based in part on the reasoning that seasonal decorations are significantly different from ordinary office furnishings designed for permanent use, it had been GAO's position that Christmas decorations (trees, lights, ornaments, etc.) were not a proper charge to appropriated funds. 52 Comp. Gen. 504 (1973); B-163764, February 25, 1977 (non-decision letter).

In 1987, GAO overruled 52 Comp. Gen. 504, concluding that the rules for office decorations should be the same whether the decorations are seasonal or permanent. 67 Comp. Gen. 87 (1987). Thus, seasonal decorations are now permissible "where the purchase is consistent with work-related objectives [such as enhancement of morale], agency or other applicable regulations, and the agency mission, and is not primarily for the personal convenience or satisfaction of a government employee." Id. at 88. See also B-226781, January 11, 1988. In implementing this decision, agencies should be appropriately sensitive (whatever that means) with respect to the display of religious symbols. 67 Comp. Gen. at 89.

The rationale of 67 Comp. Gen. 87 does not apply to Christmas cards, which remain "basically individual good will gestures and are not part of a general effort to improve the work environment." Id.

g. Traditional Ceremonies

Expenditures which might otherwise be prohibited as personal may be permissible when they are incurred incident to certain traditional ceremonies. Groundbreaking ceremonies and dedication ceremonies for the laying of cornerstones in public buildings are the most common examples of such traditional ceremonies.

For example, in B-158831, June 8, 1966, the cost of flowers used as centerpieces at a dedication ceremony was held to be a proper expenditure. Similarly, the cost of engraving and chrome-plating a ceremonial shovel used in a groundbreaking ceremony was viewed as a necessary expense of the ceremony. 53 Comp. Gen. 119 (1973). In the cited decision, however, the voucher could not be paid because there was no evidence as to who authorized the work, where the shovel originated, the subsequent use to be made of the shovel, and why there was a year's delay between the ceremony and the engraving.

Expenses necessarily incident to a groundbreaking or cornerstone ceremony are chargeable to the appropriation for the construction of the building. B-158831, June 8, 1966; B-11884, August 26, 1940 (cost of printing programs and invitations to cornerstone ceremony); A-88307, August 21, 1937 (recording of presidential speech and group photograph at cornerstone ceremony); B-107165-0.M., April 3, 1952 (cost of dedication ceremony).

In 56 Comp. Gen. 81 (1976), the rationale of the above cases was extended to Armed Forces change of command ceremonies. The decision held that the cost of printing invitations to a change of command ceremony for a Coast Guard vessel could be paid from the Coast Guard's appropriations for operating expenses. In view of the traditional role of change of command ceremonies in the military, the Comptroller General concluded that the invitations were not inherently personal. The case was therefore distinguishable from the decisions previously discussed prohibiting the use of public funds for business cards and greeting cards.

The "traditional ceremony" concept has also been applied to a vessel "christening" ceremony at a Navy Yard (A-74436, May 19, 1936), and a Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences annual graduation ceremony (B-211700, March 16, 1984).

The precise scope of the "traditional ceremony" concept still needs some clarification. One early Comptroller of the Treasury decision, 7 Comp. Dec. 31 (1900), not overruled or modified as of 1990, disallowed expenses for printing, decorations, music, and refreshments at opening exercises for new buildings at the Ellis Island immigrant station. If a building opening is to be distinguished from a cornerstone ceremony, then the decision may still be valid. If not, then the holding as it relates to printing, and probably decorations, has been implicitly superseded by the later cases. Whether music and refreshments are permissible has yet to be discussed.

h. Wearing Apparel

The starting point is the principle that "every employee of the Government is required to present himself for duty properly attired according to the requirements of his position." 63 Comp. Gen. 245, 246 (1984), quoting from B-123223, June 22, 1955. In other words, the government will not clothe the naked, at least where the naked are receiving government salaries.

Nevertheless, there are certain out-of-the-ordinary items, required by the nature of the job, that the government should furnish. The test was described in 3 Comp. Gen. 433 (1924), and that discussion is still relevant today:

"In the absence of specific statutory authority for the purchase of personal equipment, particularly wearing apparel or parts thereof, the first question for consideration in connection with a proposed purchase of such equipment is whether the object for which the appropriation involved was made can be accomplished as expeditiously and satisfactorily from the Government's standpoint, without such equipment. If it be determined that use of the equipment is necessary in the accomplishment of the purposes of the appropriation, the next question to be considered is whether the equipment is such as the employee reasonably could be required to furnish as part of the personal equipment necessary to enable him to perform the regular duties of the position to which he was appointed or for which his services were engaged. Unless the answer to both of these questions is in the negative, public funds can not be used for the purchase. In determining the first of these questions there is for consideration whether the Government or the employee receives the principal benefit resulting from use of the equipment and whether an employee reasonably could be required to perform the service without the equipment. In connection with the second question the points ordinarily involved are whether the equipment is to be used by the employee in connection with his regular duties or only in emergencies or at infrequent intervals and whether such equipment is assigned to an employee for individual use or is intended for and actually to be used by different employees."

Id. at 433-34. Under the rule set forth in 3 Comp. Gen. 433, most items of apparel were held to be the personal responsibility of the employee. E.g., 5 Comp. Gen. 318 (1925) (rubber boots and coats for custodial employees in a flood-prone area); 2 Comp. Gen. 258 (1922) (coats and gloves for government drivers). But there were limited exceptions. Thus, caps and gowns for staff workers at Saint Elizabeths Hospital in Washington were viewed as for the protection of the patients rather than the employees and could therefore be provided from appropriated funds as part of the hospital equipment. 2 Comp. Gen. 652 (1923). See also 5 Comp. Gen. 517 (1926). Similarly, aprons for general laboratory use were held permissible in 2 Comp. Gen. 382 (1922). Another exception was wading trousers for Geological Survey engineers as long as the trousers remained the property of the government and were not for the regular use of any particular employee. 4 Comp. Gen. 103 (1924). One category of apparel not permissible under the early decision was uniforms. Uniforms were viewed as personal furnishings to be procured at the expense of the wearer. 24 Comp. Dec. 44 (1917).

There are now three statutory provisions which permit the purchase of items of apparel from appropriated funds in certain circumstances.

The first is 5 U.S.C. § 7903, enacted as part of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946. It provides:

"Appropriations available for the procurement of supplies and material or equipment are available for the purchase and maintenance of special clothing and equipment for the protection of personnel in the performance of their assigned tasks. For the purpose of this section, 'appropriations' includes funds made available by statute [to wholly-owned government corporations]."

In order for an item to be authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 7903, three tests must be met: (1) the item must be "special" and not part of the ordinary and usual furnishings an employee may reasonably be expected to provide for himself; (2) the item must be for the benefit of the government, that is, essential to the safe and successful accomplishment of the work, and not solely for the protection of the employee, and (3) the employee must be engaged in hazardous duty. See 32 Comp. Gen. 229 (1952); B-193104, January 9, 1979. Thus, this provision is but a slight liberalization of the rule in 3 Comp. Gen. 433.

Applying 5 U.S.C. § 7903, the Comptroller General has held that raincoats and umbrellas for employees who must frequently go out in the rain are not special equipment but are personal items which the employee must furnish. B-193104, January 9, 1979; B-122484, February 15, 1955. Similarly unauthorized are coveralls for mechanics (B-123223, June 22, 1955) and running shoes for Department of Energy nuclear materials couriers (B-234091, July 7, 1989). Nor does 5 U.S.C. § 7903 authorize reimbursement for ordinary clothing and toiletry items purchased by narcotics agents on a "moving surveillance." B-179057, May 14, 1974.

An illustration of the type of apparel authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 7903 is found in 51 Comp. Gen. 446 (1972). There, the Comptroller General advised the Department of Agriculture that snowmobile suits, mittens, boots, and crash helmets for personnel required to operate snowmobiles over rough and remote forest terrain were clearly authorized by the statute. Similarly authorized are down-filled parkas for Office of Surface Mining employees temporarily assigned to Alaska or the high country of the Western states. 63 Comp. Gen. 245 (1984).[115]

Items other than wearing apparel may be furnished under 5 U.S.C. § 7903 if the tests set forth above have been met. See, e.g., 28 Comp. Gen. 236 (1948) (mosquito repellent for certain Forest Service employees).

Continuing the old rule, however, the Comptroller General held that 5 U.S.C. § 7903 does not constitute general authority for the purchase of uniforms. 32 Comp. Gen. 229 (1952).

Congress addressed the uniform problem with the second statutory provision under consideration, 5 U.S.C. § 5901, the so-called Federal Employees Uniform Act, most recently amended by section 202 of the Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990, section 529 of the FY 1991 Treasury-Postal Service-General Government appropriation act, Pub. L. No. 101-509 (November 5, 1990), 104 Stat. 1389, 1456. This provision authorizes annual appropriations to each agency, on a showing of necessity or desirability, to provide a uniform allowance of up to $400 a year (or more if authorized under Office of Personnel Management regulations) to each employee who wears a uniform in the performance of official duties. The agency may pay a cash allowance or may furnish the uniform.

Note that 5 U.S.C. § 5901 is merely an authorization of appropriations. An appropriation is still required in order for payments to be made or obligations incurred. 35 Comp. Gen. 306 (1955). While the decision stated that specific appropriation language is preferable, it recognized that the inclusion of an item for uniforms in an agency's budget request which is then incorporated into a lump-sum appropriation is legally sufficient.

An example of an item that could properly be required under 5 U.S.C. § 5901 is frocks for Department of Agriculture meat grader employees. 57 Comp. Gen. 379, 383 (1978). Another example is robes for administrative law judges of the Occupational Safety and [115]The distinction between this case and the "foul weather" cases cited in the preceding paragraph is that an employee is expected to provide his or her own clothing suitable for the climate in which the employee normally works or resides. See B-230820, April 25, 1988 (non-decision letter). For example, it is not reasonable to expect an employee who normally lives and works in Florida to own clothing suitable for Alaska in January.

b. Expenditure Otherwise Prohibited

The second test under the necessary expense doctrine is that the expenditure must not be prohibited by law. As a general proposition, neither a necessary expense rationale nor the "necessary expense" language in an appropriation act can be used to overcome a statutory prohibition. E.g., 38 Comp. Gen. 758 (1959); 4 Comp. Gen. 1063 (1925). In the two cited decisions, the Comptroller General held that the necessary expense language did not overcome the prohibition in 41 U.S.C. § 12 against contracting for public buildings or public improvements in excess of appropriations for the specific purpose. In large measure, this is little more than an application of the rule against repeal by implication discussed in Chapter 2.

There are exceptions where applying the rule would make it impossible to carry out a specific appropriation. A very small group of cases stands for the proposition that, where a specific appropriation is made for a specific purpose, an expenditure which is "absolutely essential" to accomplishing the specific object may be incurred even though the expenditure would otherwise be prohibited. In order for this exception to apply, the expenditure must literally be "absolutely essential" in the sense that the object of the appropriation could not be accomplished without it. Also, the rule would not apply to the use of a more general appropriation.

For example, in 2 Comp. Gen. 133 (1922), modifying 2 Comp. Gen. 14 (1922), an appropriation to provide air mail service between New York, Chicago, and San Francisco was held available to construct hangars and related facilities at a landing field in Chicago notwithstanding the requirement for a specific appropriation in 41 U.S.C. § 12. The reason was that it would have been impossible to provide the service, and hence to accomplish the purpose of the appropriation, without erecting the facilities. See also 17 Comp. Gen. 636 (1938) and 22 Comp. Dec. 317 (1916). (The 1938 decision cites the rule but the decision itself is an ordinary necessary expense case.)

An 1899 case, 6 Comp. Dec. 75, provides another good illustration of the concept. The building housing the Department of Justice had become unsafe and overcrowded. Congress enacted legislation to authorize and fund the construction of a new building for the Department. The statute specifically provided that the new building be constructed on the site of the old building, but did not address the question of how the Department would function during the construction period. The obvious solution was to rent another

Health Review Commission. B-199492, September 18, 1980. (The decision concluded merely that the expenditure would be legal, not that it was an especially good idea, pointing out that federal judges pay for their own robes.)

In 48 Comp. Gen. 678 (1969), a National Park Service employee was given a uniform allowance but, in less than a year, was promoted to a higher position which required substantially different uniforms. The Comptroller General held that the employee could receive the uniform allowance of his new position even though the sum of the two allowances would exceed the statutory annual ceiling. To hold otherwise would have been inconsistent with the statutory purpose.

While the uniform allowance under 5 U.S.C. § 5901 may be in cash or in kind, there is no similar option for "special clothing or equipment" under 5 U.S.C. § 7903. The latter statute authorizes the furnishing of covered items in kind only. 46 Comp. Gen. 170 (1966).

The third piece of legislation which may permit the purchase of items of apparel from appropriated funds is the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (OSHA). Section 19 of OSHA, 29 U.S.C. § 668, requires each federal agency to establish an occupational safety and health program and to acquire necessary safety and protective equipment. Thus, protective clothing may be furnished by the government if the agency head determines that it is necessary under OSHA and its implementing regulations.

Under the OSHA authority, the following items have been held permissible:

- Snowmobile suits, mittens, boots, and crash helmets for Department of Agriculture employees required to operate snowmobiles over rough and remote terrain. 51 Comp. Gen. 446 (1972). (This decision has already been noted in the discussion of 5 U.S.C. § 7903 above. The decision held that the items were justifiable on either basis.)
- Down-filled parkas for Interior Department employees temporarily assigned to Alaska or the high country of the Western states during the winter months. 63 Comp. Gen. 245 (1984). (This decision is also noted under 5 U.S.C. § 7903. As with 51 Comp. Gen. 446, the items could be justified under either statute.)

- Protective footwear for Drug Enforcement Administration agents assigned to temporary duty in jungle environments. The footwear remains the property of the United States and must be disposed of in accordance with the Federal Property Management Regulations. B-187507, December 23, 1976.
- Cooler coats and gloves for Department of Agriculture meat grader employees. 57 Comp. Gen. 379 (1978).
- Ski boots for Forest Service snow rangers, where determined to be necessary protective equipment in a job-hazard analysis. B-191594, December 20, 1978.
- Steel-toe safety shoes for an Internal Revenue Service supply clerk whose work includes moving heavy objects. 67 Comp. Gen. 104 (1987). This item also could have been justified under 5 U.S.C. § 7903. Id.

If an item is authorized under OSHA, it is unnecessary to determine whether it meets the tests under 5 U.S.C. § 7903. E.g., B-187507, cited above. As noted in the above listing, however, several of the decisions have discussed both statutes. If an item does not qualify under OSHA, it is still necessary to examine the other possibilities. E.g., B-234091, July 7, 1989 (running shoes unauthorized under either statute).

Thus, there are three statutes under which purchase of wearing apparel may be authorized—5 U.S.C. § 7903 (special clothing for hazardous occupations), 5 U.S.C. § 5901 (uniform allowances), and OSHA (protective clothing). A decision summarizing all three is 63 Comp. Gen. 245 (1984). If none of these applies, then the rule of 3 Comp. Gen. 433 continues to govern.

An illustration of the continued applicability of the decisional rules is the rental of formal evening wear, a situation which, thus far at least, no one has suggested fits under any of the three statutes.

In a 1955 case, an employee on travel status in England rented a dinner jacket to attend a dinner related to the purposes of the trip. Based on the rule of 3 Comp. Gen. 433, the Comptroller General denied reimbursement for the cost of renting the jacket. 35 Comp. Gen. 361 (1955). "The claimant's failure to take with him necessary clothing to meet reasonably anticipated personal necessities is not considered sufficient to shift the burden of the cost of procuring such clothing from personal to official business." Id. at 362. This decision was followed in a similar situation involving the rental of a tuxedo in 45 Comp. Gen. 272 (1965), and again in 64 Comp. Gen. 6 (1984).

A different situation was presented in 48 Comp. Gen. 48 (1968), in which it was held that the Secret Service could pay the rental charges on formal dress attire required to be used by special agents when attending formal functions incident to their furnishing protective services to persons whom they are assigned to protect. In this situation, the purpose of the formal attire is not merely to be "socially acceptable," but is necessary for security purposes, to make the agents less readily identifiable as such.

Similarly, in the not-too-distant past, attorneys arguing before the Supreme Court were required to wear formal cutaway coats and striped pants. In B-164811, July 28, 1969, GAO approved reimbursement for the rental of these items by Justice Department attorneys who were only occasionally required to appear before the Supreme Court. A more recent case restating the rules is 67 Comp. Gen. 592 (1988) (advising agency to resolve certain conflicting information and pay or deny the claim accordingly).

Finally, the rules we have been discussing for wearing apparel apply to government employees. Questions may arise with respect to nongovernment employees, in which event the answer is a pure application of the necessary expense doctrine, in light of whatever statutory authority may exist. For example, in B-62281, December 27, 1946, the State Department was administering a training program for citizens of the Philippines to assist in post-war rehabilitation. The decision held that the government could provide "special purpose" clothing required for the training, such as uniforms, overalls, or work aprons. However, this could not include the furnishing of complete wardrobes adaptable to the cooler climate of the United States; this was a personal expense. See also 29 Comp. Gen. 507 (1950) (clothing for indigent narcotic patients upon release from Public Health Service Hospitals, as therapeutic measure to aid rehabilitation).

i. Miscellaneous Personal Expenses

Several "personal expense" matters are dealt with elsewhere in this chapter, for example, the sections on entertainment and membership fees. Apart from those topics specifically covered elsewhere, the preceding portions of this section cover the situations which have generated the largest number of cases. There are, however, other frequently encountered situations.

(1) Commuting and parking

One personal expense everyone is familiar with is commuting to and from work (more precisely, between permanent residence and permanent duty location). The employee is expected to be at work; how the employee chooses to get there is entirely his or her own business. 27 Comp. Gen. 1 (1947); 16 Comp. Gen. 64 (1936).

Along with commuting goes parking. It is equally clear that parking incident to ordinary commuting is also a personal expense. 63 Comp. Gen. 270 (1984); 43 Comp. Gen. 131 (1963); B-162021, July 6, 1977. These cases stand for the proposition that the government may not be required to provide parking facilities for its employees. However, an agency may provide employee parking facilities if it determines that the lack of parking facilities will significantly impair the operating efficiency of the agency and will be detrimental to the hiring and retention of personnel. 49 Comp. Gen. 476 (1979); B-168946, February 26, 1970; B-155372-O.M., November 6, 1964. If severely disabled employees are forced to pay parking costs higher than those paid by non-disabled employees working at the same facility,[116] the agency can subsidize the difference. 63 Comp. Gen. 270 (1984).

As several of the cases cited in the preceding paragraph discuss, agencies must generally obtain parking accommodations through the General Services Administration under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act unless they have independent statutory authority or a delegation from GSA. GSA regards a delegation of authority to lease parking facilities as a delegation of authority to enter into a service contract, which can be approved at the regional level, rather than a delegation of leasing authority. GSA Temp. Reg. No. D-73, § 101-17.201-2 (1989). If an agency has independent statutory or delegated authority to procure space and facilities and has made the requisite morale and efficiency determinations, it may provide for employee parking in a collective bargaining agreement. See 55 Comp. Gen. 1197 (1976).

A governmentwide provision in the 1991 Treasury-Postal Service-General Government Appropriation Act authorizes federal agencies to participate in state or local government programs designed to encourage employees to use public transportation. Pub. L. No.

[116]For example, the disabled employee may have to park closer to the facility at higher rates.

101-509, § 629, 104 Stat. 1478 (1990). Thus, an agency may use its general operating appropriations to subsidize the use of discounted transit passes by its employees. The "subsidy" is not additional pay for purposes of the prohibition in 5 U.S.C. § 5536. Id.; B-243677/ B-243674, May 13, 1991. The legislation has a sunset date of December 31, 1993.

(2) Miscellaneous employee expenses

Personal expense questions may occur in contexts which arise infrequently and for which there is little precedent. The rationale of the decisions cited and discussed throughout this section should provide the approach necessary to analyze the problem.

For example, the Forest Service requested a lodge owner to furnish lodging and meals to a group of summer employees on temporary duty on a forest project in Maine. While the Forest Service made the request on behalf of the employees, it did not contract directly with the lodge owner. The individual employees received a per diem allowance and were expected to settle their own accounts with the lodge. One of the employees left at the end of the summer without paying his bill and the lodge owner filed a claim against the government. Under these circumstances, the unpaid bill was nothing more than a personal debt of the individual and there was therefore no basis for government liability. B-191110, September 25, 1978. (Had the government contracted directly with the lodge, the result might have been different. See section entitled "Cancelled Hotel Reservations" in Chapter 12.)

In another case, the Navy asked whether it could use appropriated funds to buy luggage for use by members of the Navy's Recruit Mobile Training Team. Normally, luggage is a personal expense. The employee who travels on government business is generally expected to provide his or her own luggage. In this case, however, the members of the team travelled an average of 26 weeks a year. The Comptroller General applied the test set forth in 3 Comp. Gen. 433, discussed at various points throughout this section, and accepted the Navy's judgment that it would be unreasonable to require the team members to furnish their own luggage in view of this excessive amount of travel. Therefore, Navy could buy the luggage, but only on the conditions that it would become Navy property and be stored in Navy facilities. In other words, the members could not use the luggage for any personal business. B-200154, February 12, 1981. The Comptroller General declined to state a precise rule as to how much travel is enough to justify government purchase of luggage, and emphasized that the purchase would be permitted only in highly unusual circumstances.

The payment of a federal employee's union dues is the employee's personal obligation even though payment by payroll withholding is authorized. If an agency wrongfully fails to withhold the dues, it may use appropriated funds to reimburse the labor union, but must then recover the payment from the employee unless the debt can be waived. 60 Comp. Gen. 93 (1980); B-235386, November 16, 1989.

A new situation for the federal government is "flexiplace"—permitting an employee to work at home. An agency may compensate an employee for work done at home in limited circumstances. However, increased utility expenses (heating, air conditioning, lighting, etc.) incurred by the employee by virtue of working at home are personal expenses and may not be reimbursed in the absence of statutory authority. 68 Comp. Gen. 502 (1989). As the decision points out, along with the increased utility costs, the employee also incurs savings from reduced commuting, child care, meal, and/or clothing expenses. "How the balance should be struck, if at all, . . . is a legislative judgment." Id. at 506.

14. Rewards

This section discusses when appropriated funds may be used to offer and pay rewards. As a general proposition, statutory authority is needed. Exactly how explicit this statutory authority has to be depends somewhat on the nature of the information or services for which the reward is contemplated and its relationship to the authority of the paying agency.

a. Rewards to Informers

(1) Reward as "necessary expense"

One group of decisions deals with rewards for the furnishing of information regarding violations of civil and criminal laws. The rule is that, if the information is "essential or necessary" to the effective administration and enforcement of the laws, a reward may be offered if it can be tied in to a particular appropriation under the "necessary expense" theory. In that situation, the statutory authority does not have to expressly provide for the payment of rewards. If, however, the information is merely "helpful or desirable," then more explicit statutory authority is needed. Since the distinction is difficult to administer as a practical matter, statutory authority has been granted in many situations.[117]

The Comptroller General addressed the issue in 8 Comp. Gen. 613, 614 (1929), stating:

> "An appropriation general in terms is available to do the things essential to the accomplishment of the work authorized by the appropriation to be done. As to whether such an appropriation may properly be held available to pay a reward for the furnishing of information, not essential but probably helpful to the accomplishment of the authorized work, the decisions of the accounting officers have not been uniform. The doubt arises generally because such rewards are not necessarily in keeping with the value of the information furnished and possess elements of a gratuity or gift made in appreciation of helpful assistance rendered."

While the reward in that particular case was permitted, the decision announced that specific legislative authority would be required in the future. See also 9 Comp. Gen. 309 (1930); A-26777, May 22, 1929.

Whether a reward to an informer is necessary or merely helpful depends largely on the nature of the agency's organic authority and its appropriations language. For example, the Forest Service is responsible for protecting the national forests "against destruction by fire and depredations." 16 U.S.C. § 551. It receives appropriations for expenses necessary for "forest protection and utilization." Under this authority, the Comptroller General held that information relating to violations (such as deliberately set forest fires, theft of timber, unauthorized occupancy, and vandalism) could be considered necessary rather than just helpful, and the Forest Service could therefore offer rewards to informers without more specific statutory authority. B-172259, April 29, 1971. See also 5 Comp. Dec. 118 (1898). The ruling was extended in B-172259, August 2, 1972, to cover "endorsements" (the "endorsement" by an informant of an undercover agent to help him gain acceptance with the suspects).

Similarly, the Commerce Department could pay rewards to informers as a necessary expense under a provision of the Export Control Act of 1949 which authorized the obtaining of confidential information incident to enforcement of the act. B-117628, January 21, 1954.

The rule was also applied in B-106230, November 30, 1951, in which GAO advised the Treasury Department that rewards to informers for information or evidence on violations of the revenue, customs, or narcotics laws could be offered under an appropriation for the necessary expenses of law enforcement. As long as the information was necessary and not just helpful, more specific appropriations language was not needed. The result would be different if the agency did not have specific law enforcement authority. A.D. 6669, May 15, 1922.

(2) Payments to informers: Internal Revenue Service

One reward to informers most people are familiar with is the reward offered by the Internal Revenue Service for the detection of tax cheats. While the pertinent Internal Revenue Code provision does not use the term "reward," it authorizes the payment of sums deemed necessary "for detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal revenue laws." 26 U.S.C. § 7623. Where information leads to an actual recovery of back taxes or penalties, IRS may pay the informer a reward based on a percentage of the amount recovered, up to a 10 percent maximum set by regulation. GAO approved this scheme as within the statutory authority in 3 Comp. Gen. 499 (1924). The determinations of whether to pay a reward and, if so, its amount are discretionary and, short of a showing of no rational basis, are not reviewable by the courts or by GAO. Saracena v. United States, 508 F.2d 1333 (Ct. Cl. 1975); Thomas v. United States, 22 Cl. Ct. 749 (1991); B-131689, June 7, 1957; B-10761, June 29, 1940; B-5768, September 16, 1939; A-96942, August 23, 1938. The same statute has been held to authorize rewards for information on violations where no tax or fine is collected. 24 Comp. Dec. 430 (1918).

The IRS statute has been held to constitute an "indefinite reward offer." The informant responds by his conduct, and an "enforceable contract" arises when the parties fix the amount of the reward. Merrick v. United States, 846 F.2d 725 (Fed. Cir. 1988). The plaintiff in that case provided information on an illegal tax shelter in which 1,585 persons had invested, resulting in the recovery of over $10 million. The court upheld the position of the IRS that the taxpayers were "related taxpayers" in a single tax avoidance scheme, thereby limiting the reward to $50,000 for the aggregate recovery rather than $50,000 per person as the plaintiff had sought. Merrick v. United States, 18 Cl. Ct. 718 (1989).

The issue in B-137762.32, July 11, 1977 was whether IRS could contract with an attorney representing an unnamed informant (i.e., a "partially disclosed principal"). The decision discussed the general prohibition against contracting with a partially disclosed principal, but approved the proposed agreement, noting that the reasons for the rule in the ordinary procurement context did not apply to the IRS reward situation. See also B-117628, January 21, 1954. However, Treasury regulations required that the informant's identity be disclosed before any claim could actually be paid. Therefore, disclosure would be necessary if and when a reward became payable but not before then.

An additional issue in B-137762.32 was when an obligation has to be recorded under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a). No contractual liability to make payment exists until IRS has evaluated the worth of the information and has assessed and collected any underpaid taxes and penalties. This is when the appropriate IRS official determines that a reward should be paid and its amount, and it is at this point that a recordable obligation arises. This is consistent with the Federal Circuit's holding in Merrick.

The Internal Revenue Service may also make "support and maintenance" payments to informers under its general investigation and enforcement authority. In B-183922, August 5, 1975, the Comptroller General held that IRS could not make payments to an informer who was simultaneously being paid by the Justice Department under its Witness Protection Program. However, IRS could make the payments if administratively determined to be necessary after the informer had been disenrolled from the Justice Department's program.

(3) Payments to informers: Customs Service

The Customs Service also has statutory authority to pay rewards. Under 19 U.S.C. § 1619, a person (other than a government employee) who detects and seizes any vessel, vehicle, aircraft, merchandise, or baggage subject to seizure and forfeiture under the customs or navigation laws, or who furnishes original information, leading to a monetary recovery, may be paid a reward of 25 percent of the amount recovered, not to exceed $250,000 in any case. Rewards are payable from "appropriations available for the collection of the customs revenue." Id. § 1619(d).

This reward is in the nature of compensation for services rendered rather than a personal gratuity. 5 Comp. Gen. 665 (1926). The statute has been deemed mandatory in the sense that an informant who complies with its terms has a legal and judicially-enforceable claim for the reward. Wilson v. United States, 135 F.2d 1005 (3d Cir. 1943); Tyson v. United States, 32 F. Supp. 135 (Ct. Cl. 1940); Rickard v. United States, 11 Cl. Ct. 874 (1987); B-217636, March 4, 1985 (non-decision letter).

The information furnished must be "original" information, that is, the first information the Customs Service has concerning the particular fraud or violation. Lacy v. United States, 607 F.2d 951, 953 (Ct. Cl. 1979); Cornman v. United States, 409 F.2d 230, 234 (Ct. Cl. 1969); Tyson, 32 F. Supp. at 136.

In cases where the furnishing of information leads to recoveries from multiple parties, the monetary ceiling on the reward "for any case" applies to the information furnished, not to the number of recoveries it produces. Cornman v. United States, citing and following 24 Comp. Dec. 17 (1917).

Liquidated damages assessed under customs bonds are "recoveries" for purposes of 19 U.S.C. § 1619. 34 Comp. Gen. 70 (1954). So are recoveries under bail bonds. 19 U.S.C. § 1619(e). Moneys received by customs officers as bribes, however, are not "recoveries" for purposes of the reward. 11 Comp. Gen. 486 (1932).

The statute applies to recoveries under the "customs laws or the navigation laws." See 16 Comp. Gen. 1051 (1937). Recoveries under other laws do not qualify. Thus, in 32 Comp. Gen. 405 (1953), a reward could not be paid where recovery was made under several building until the new one was ready, but 40 U.S.C. § 34 prohibits the rental of space in the District of Columbia except under an appropriation specifically available for that purpose, and the Department had no such appropriation. On the grounds that any other result would be absurd, the Comptroller of the Treasury held that the Department could rent interim space notwithstanding the statutory prohibition. While the decision was not couched in terms of the expenditure being "absolutely essential," it said basically the same thing. Since the Department could not cease to function during the construction period, the appropriation for construction of the new building could not be fulfilled without the expenditure for interim space.

c. Expenditure Otherwise Provided for

The third test is that an expenditure cannot be authorized under a necessary expense theory if it is otherwise provided for under a more specific appropriation or statutory funding mechanism. The fact that the more specific appropriation may be exhausted is immaterial. Thus, in B-139510, May 13, 1959, the Navy could not use its shipbuilding appropriation to deepen a channel in the Singing River near Pascagoula, Mississippi, to permit submarines then under construction to move to deeper water. The reason was that this was a function for which funds were traditionally appropriated to the Corps of Engineers, not the Navy. The fact that appropriations had not been made in this particular instance was irrelevant.

Similarly, the Navy could not use appropriations made for the construction or procurement of vessels and aircraft to provide housing for civilian employees engaged in defense production activities because funds for that purpose were otherwise available. 20 Comp. Gen. 102 (1940).

In a more recent case, Federal Prison Industries could use its revolving fund to build industrial facilities incident to a federal prison, or to build a residential camp for prisoners employed in federal public works projects, but could not use that fund to construct other prison facilities because such construction was statutorily provided for elsewhere. B-230304, March 18, 1988.

In these cases, the existence of a more specific source of funds, or a more specific statutory mechanism for getting them, is the governing factor and overrides the "necessary expense" considerations.

laws and the amount attributable to the customs laws or navigation laws could not be ascertained. Similarly, a violation of the Anti-Dumping Act is not a violation of the customs laws for purposes of 19 U.S.C. § 1619. Fraters Valve & Fitting Co. v. United States, 347 F.2d 990 (Ct. Cl. 1965). Nor is a violation of the internal revenue laws. Wilson v. United States, 135 F.2d 1005 (3d Cir. 1943).

The reward is authorized, based on appraised value, if the item forfeited is destroyed or "delivered to any governmental agency for official use" rather than sold. Under this provision, seized merchandise donated to state governmental agencies under General Services Administration regulations qualifies for the reward since the statutory language is not limited to federal agencies. B-146223, November 27, 1961. Similarly, where forfeited distilled spirits, wines, or beer, which are required by statute to be delivered to GSA for disposal, are subsequently given to "eleemosynary institutions" for medicinal purposes, the reward is payable because the initial delivery to GSA counts as delivery to a "governmental agency for official use" under 19 U.S.C. § 1619. B-146223, February 2, 1962.

b. Missing Government Employees

The only decisions that exist on rewards for locating missing government employees concern military deserters. No decision has been found discussing whether a reward could be offered for the apprehension of a military deserter in the absence of statutory authority, although one early case stated that "[t]here is no reward for the apprehension or delivery of a deserter by operation of law." 20 Comp. Dec. 767 (1914). The reason the issue has not been discussed is probably that the authority has existed by statute for a long time. For many years, a provision in the annual Defense Department appropriation acts authorized payment of expenses of the apprehension and delivery of deserters, including a small reward. In 1984, the provision was made permanent and is now found at 10 U.S.C. § 956(1). The Coast Guard also has permanent authority to offer rewards for the apprehension of deserters. 14 U.S.C. § 644.

Thus, the decisions that do exist concern mainly questions of interpretation under the statutory language and implementing regulations. For example, the term "apprehension" was construed to permit payment of the reward where an Army deserter voluntarily surrendered to a civil officer. 6 Comp. Gen. 479 (1927).

The statute and implementing regulations limit the amount payable as expenses, but this limitation applies only to the period before the deserter is returned to military control. Expenses incurred after return to military control, for example, continued civil detention at the request of military authorities, are not subject to the limitation and may be paid. B-179920, July 18, 1974; B-147496-0.M., January 4, 1962. Three early decisions permitted payment of expenses incurred in apprehending a deserter in excess of the statutory limit where the deserter was also wanted for other criminal offenses (such as forgery or embezzlement). 16 Comp. Dec. 132 (1909); 11 Comp. Dec. 124 (1904); B-3591, May 27, 1939.[118]

c. Lost or Missing Government Property

It has long been established that no payment may be made to one who finds lost government property unless a reward has been offered prior to the return of the property. 11 Comp. Dec. 741 (1905); 5 Comp. Dec. 37 (1898); A-23019, May 24, 1928; B-117297-0.M., February 12, 1954. To offer a reward for the recovery of lost or missing property, an agency needs some statutory basis. Examples are 10 U.S.C. § 2252 (Defense, military departments) and 14 U.S.C. § 643 (Coast Guard). While the degree of explicitness required has not been definitively addressed, the rules appear to be the same as in the case of rewards for information discussed above.

Two early decisions permitted the use of military "contingent expense" appropriations. In 6 Comp. Gen. 774 (1927), GAO told the Army that it could offer a reward from its contingent expense appropriation for the recovery of stolen platinum. In B-33518, April 23, 1943, prior to the enactment of 10 U.S.C. § 2252, the Navy wanted to use a general appropriation to offer rewards for locating lost aircraft. The Comptroller General advised that the general appropriation could not be used since the reward was not essential to carrying out its purposes, but, relying on 6 Comp. Gen. 774, the Navy could use its contingent expense appropriation.

In 41 Comp. Gen. 410 (1961), the Treasury Department asked if the Coast Guard had any general authority beyond 14 U.S.C. § 643 to make reasonable payments to persons who found lost property. The Comptroller General replied that he knew of none. Based on these decisions, it appears that a general operating appropriation is [118]The excess payment in each of these cases was authorized from the Army's appropriation for "contingent expenses." While the "contingent expense" language is no longer used, the military departments receive similar appropriations for "emergencies and extraordinary expenses." See 53 Comp. Gen. 707 (1974).

not available to offer or pay rewards for the recovery of lost property.

In B-79173, October 18, 1948, the Civil Aeronautics Administration had an appropriation for the temporary relief of distressed persons. The question presented was whether the appropriation was available to pay a reward to someone who had found a lost airplane four months after it disappeared. The Comptroller General said no, because the passengers could all be presumed dead after four months, but expressly declined to decide whether the appropriation would have been available if the airplane had been found "with such promptness as to afford reasonable hope that survivors might be found and given relief." The reasoning is similar to that in the information cases—the reward might have been considered necessary to carrying out the relief appropriation if there was a reasonable chance of survivors, but after the passage of several months it would be at best helpful. As with the necessary expense theory in general, "necessary" relates not to the importance of the object itself but to carrying out the purposes of the particular appropriation.

Stolen property was involved in 53 Comp. Gen. 707 (1974). The Air Force asked if it could pay a reward, pursuant to local custom, to two Thai police officers whose services had been instrumental in recovering a stolen road grader. Based on 6 Comp. Gen. 774, the Comptroller General held that the Air Force could pay the reward from its appropriation for emergencies and extraordinary expenses, successor to the old "contingent expense" appropriation. However, apart from that particular appropriation, the decision held that there was no authority for the reward. This part of the decision was based on 8 Comp. Gen. 613, once again implying that the rules in the information cases would apply to missing property as well. (This case would now be covered by 10 U.S.C. § 2252.)

d. Contractual Basis

The basis of the right to a reward is contractual; that is, there must be an offer and an acceptance. The rationale is that "no person by his voluntary act can constitute himself a creditor of the Government." 20 Comp. Dec. 767, 769 (1914).

Where a reward is based on the "necessary expense" theory rather than on explicit statutory authority, the decisions hold that there must be an offer of reward before a reward can be claimed. Performance of the service constitutes the acceptance. See, e.g., 26

Comp. Gen. 605 (1947); 3 Comp. Gen. 734 (1924). The offer may be in the form of a "standing offer" promulgated by regulation. See, e.g., B-131689, June 7, 1957, in which a Treasury Decision constituted the offer for an IRS reward. Another example is 28 C.F.R. Part 7, a "standing offer" by the Attorney General for rewards for the capture, or information leading to the capture, of escaped federal prisoners.

Consistent with contract theory in general, it is also possible for an offer to be implied from practice or course of conduct. For example, a reward was held payable to an informer under the prohibition laws without a specific offer in 4 Comp. Gen. 255 (1924). The informer was a member of a "gang of whiskey thieves" and the Comptroller General noted that "[u]nder such conditions no specific agreement for compensation is generally made, but with a man of such character there is, and practically must be, to obtain the information, an understanding that there will be compensation." Id. at 256. The course of conduct and standing offer concepts were combined in A-23019, May 24, 1928, involving a reward for finding a lost Navy torpedo. In view of the prevailing understanding in the area and past practice, the Navy's regulations were viewed as "implicitly" making a standing offer.

Similarly, where a reward is based on express statutory authority and the statute either is discretionary or authorizes the agency to "offer and pay" a reward, there must be an offer before payment can be made. 41 Comp. Gen. 410 (1961) (14 U.S.C. § 643); 20 Comp. Dec. 767 (1914) (apprehension of a deserter). On the other hand, if a statute provides for a reward as a matter of entitlement, the reasons for requiring an offer are less compelling; the terms of the statute and any implementing regulations will determine precisely how and when the "contract" comes into existence. E.g., Merrick v. United States, discussed above in connection with the Internal Revenue Service statute.

As to whether the claimant must have knowledge of the offer, the decisions are not entirely consistent. Cases involving the apprehension of deserters have held that performance of the service gives rise to an obligation on the part of the government to pay the offered reward notwithstanding the claimant's lack of knowledge of the offer when he performed the service. 27 Comp. Dec. 47 (1920); 20 Comp. Dec. 767 (1914); B-41659, May 26, 1944. On the other hand, cases involving the finding of lost property have held that knowledge is required. Thus, in 26 Comp. Gen. 605 (1947), a reward the Navy had offered for the discovery of a lost airplane was denied where the person discovering the airplane had no knowledge of the offer at the time he performed the service. This ruling was followed in 41 Comp. Gen. 410 (1961), holding that the Coast Guard could not pay a reward under 14 U.S.C. § 643 to one who had no knowledge of the published offer. See also A-35247, April 1, 1931 (escaped prisoner). The latter group of decisions purports to be based on the "great weight of authority." 26 Comp. Gen. at 606.

Since reward payments for information furnished to the government are in the nature of compensation for services rendered rather than personal gratuities, the right to file a claim for the reward vests at the time the compensation is earned (i.e., the services performed). Consequently, that right is not defeated where the informant dies prior to filing a claim or receiving the reward. The issue was discussed in 5 Comp. Gen. 665 (1926), in which GAO approved the payment of a reward to the legal representative of an informant's estate for information furnished under the predecessor of 19 U.S.C. § 1619, even though the informant had not filed a claim prior to his death. See also 2 Comp. Dec. 514 (1896) (customs); B-131689, June 7, 1957 (internal revenue); B-129886-0.M., December 28, 1956 (internal revenue).

e. Rewards to Government Employees

A reward may not be paid to a government employee for services rendered within the scope of his or her official duties. For example, in 4 Comp. Gen. 687 (1925), a Deputy United States Marshal claimed a reward for apprehending a military deserter. The Comptroller General held that the reward could not be paid since the Marshal had been acting in his official capacity (i.e., doing his job) rather than his personal capacity. See also 7 Comp. Gen. 307 (1927); A-35247, April 1, 1931; A-17808, March 30, 1927. Under the Defense Department's statutory authority to pay expenses plus a small reward, a federal employee may be reimbursed actual expenses incurred, but may not be paid the reward. 32 Comp. Gen. 219 (1952). In addition, some statutes, 19 U.S.C. § 1619 for one example, expressly exclude government employees from eligibility.

However, if an employee performs services beyond the scope of his official duties for which a reward has been offered, the reward may be paid since the employee was acting in his capacity as a private citizen. Thus, a reward was held payable to a patrol inspector for the Immigration Service who had apprehended a military deserter since the action was outside the scope of his official duties. 5 Comp. Gen. 447 (1925). See also A-17066, March 2, 1927.

The prohibition against an employee's receiving a reward for services performed in the course of his official duties applies as well to rewards offered by non-government sources. The principle is illustrated in 49 Comp. Gen. 819 (1970). An Air Force Major, flying a low-level training mission in the Republic of Colombia, spotted a cargo plane unloading in a suspicious location. He notified the Colombian authorities who seized what turned out to be a load of contraband. Under Colombian law, the informant was entitled to a reward of 25 percent of the total value of the contraband. However, any earnings of an employee in excess of his regular compensation, earned in the course of performing his official duties, belong to the government. Therefore, the Major could not keep the reward but had to turn it in for deposit in the Treasury. Another reason the Major could not keep the reward is the prohibition in the Constitution (Art. I, § 9, cl. 8) against the acceptance by a government officer or employee of gifts or emoluments from a foreign government without the consent of Congress.

15. State and Local Taxes

a. Introduction

It has long been held that the doctrine of sovereign immunity and the Supremacy Clause of the Constitution (Art. VI, cl. 2) combine to prohibit the states from taxing the federal government or its activities. McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). This early interpretation was aimed essentially at the preservation of the federal system. Chief Justice Marshall penned his famous dictum in McCulloch that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." 17 U.S. at 431.

Since Justice Marshall's time, federal activities and state taxing schemes have grown in complexity and sophistication. Today, while the basic rule of federal immunity from state and local taxation is easy to state, it is far less easy to apply. In the words of the Supreme Court, federal immunity from state and local taxation is a "much litigated and often confused field." United States v. City of Detroit, 355 U.S. 466, 473 (1958). It "has been marked from the beginning by inconsistent decisions and excessively delicate distinctions" (United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720, 730 (1982)), with the line between taxability and immunity "drawn by an unsteady hand" (United States v. County of Allegheny, 322 U.S. 174, 176 (1944)).

In the simplest situation, federal tax immunity applies to attempts to directly tax the property or activities of a federal department or agency. More difficult problems arise when the entity being taxed is not a "traditional" federal agency. The test enunciated by the Supreme Court is whether the entity is "so closely connected to the Government that the two cannot realistically be viewed as separate entities, at least insofar as the activity being taxed is concerned." United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720, 735 (1982). The most common situation calling for the application of this test, the taxation of government contractors, will be discussed later.

Funds paid over to a grantee under a federal grant program may be used to pay a nondiscriminatory state sales tax on purchases made with grant funds. 37 Comp. Gen. 85 (1957). The same result would apply to purchases by a contractor under a contract with a grantee financed from federal grant funds (B-177215, November 30, 1972), and to state or local taxation of the income of a grantee's employees (14 Comp. Gen. 869 (1935)). The reason is that the funds, once paid over to the grantee, lose their identity as federal funds and are no longer subject to many of the restrictions on the direct expenditure of appropriations. Appropriations for National Guard operations, however, are not grants to the states and the government's immunity from taxation therefore applies. 42 Comp. Gen. 631 (1963).

The government's constitutional immunity from state taxation has been held to extend to federal credit unions. United States v. Michigan, 851 F.2d 803 (6th Cir. 1988). However, a municipal sales tax imposed on a "village corporation" established under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and funded in part by federal funds is not a tax on the United States since the village corporation is not a federal agency and the funds, once distributed to the corporation, are essentially private funds. B-205150, January 27, 1982 (non-decision letter).

In 46 Comp. Gen. 363 (1966), the Comptroller General considered a program under which the United States was to share the cost of materials and services procured by farmers to carry out a conservation program. The Department of Agriculture had proposed a procedure whereby the United States would make its cost-sharing payments directly to the vendors. Since the materials purchased would not become the property of the United States, the procedure was viewed as essentially a "credit device" provided to the farmers, and the Comptroller General concluded that the payments could include state sales taxes.

Evidence of tax-exempt status may take various forms, depending on the circumstances. For example, use of a government credit card or purchase order identifies the purchaser as an agency or instrumentality of the United States. Other forms are listed in the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR), 48 C.F.R. § 29.305. When other evidence is not available or is inapplicable, immunity is normally established by use of a "tax exemption certificate." This is a printed form (Standard Form 1094) and is usually processed individually. It is prescribed by and illustrated in the FAR. 48 C.F.R. §§ 29.302(b), 53.229, 53.301-1094.

Consistent with the guidance in 48 C.F.R. § 29.302(b), the GAO Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies (title 7, Appendix 4, Section E (1990)), advocates cost-effectiveness in the use of the certificates. This does not mean that small taxes should automatically be paid without attempting to assert the government's immunity. What it means is that taxes in small amounts should be paid regardless of the government's entitlement to immunity where no other evidence is at hand and where a tax exemption certificate would otherwise be required to take advantage of the immunity. The use of blanket exemption certificates and multiple exemption certificates is discussed in 41 Comp. Gen. 560 (1962).

In some jurisdictions, tax exemption can be established by reciting a "tax exempt number" obtained from the taxing authority. Where this procedure exists, it is governed by state regulation. Where available, this can be a simple and cost-effective way of invoking the government's tax immunity in situations where the amounts involved do not justify obtaining a tax exemption certificate. See B-206804-O.M., February 7, 1983.

State taxation problems center on two distinct types of taxing schemes: taxes linked to business transactions involving the federal government, typically sales and use taxes, and property-oriented taxes linked to ownership or use of various types of real and personal property located within the geographical boundaries of a state. In addition, government employees frequently incur various types of state and local taxes while performing government business. These three broad categories form the framework of our discussion.

b. Tax on Business Transactions to Which the Federal Government Is a Party

(1) General principles [119]

The key question in determining whether the federal government may pay a sales or other tax imposed on its purchase of goods or services within a state depends on where the legal incidence of the tax falls. This concept was enunciated by the Supreme Court in Alabama v. King and Boozer, 314 U.S. 1 (1941). There, a construction contractor building a federal project objected to the state's imposition of sales tax on its purchase of building materials used in construction. It argued that such purchases should be exempt from state taxation as the costs would ultimately be borne by the federal government and thereby violate federal immunity from state taxation. The Supreme Court disagreed, drawing a distinction between the economic burden imposed on the United States when it must pay more for goods and services because of sales taxes levied against the seller of goods to the government, and the constitutionally impermissible burden which occurs when the government, as a purchaser of goods, is directly liable to the state for taxes imposed on a transaction. In other words, if the "legal incidence" of a tax falls on the seller and the seller alone is obligated to pay, the government may reimburse the seller for his total cost including tax. But if the buyer is in any way legally responsible for the payment of the tax, the federal government as a buyer cannot be required to pay.

A few years earlier, the Court had applied the same distinction in sustaining a state gross receipts tax imposed on a government contractor. James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134 (1937).

[119]Two points must be emphasized at the outset. First, there are dozens of cases in this area and it is impossible to treat them all here. The cases included have been selected to illustrate the more important principles and the kinds of problems that arise. Second, mention of a particular state in the following discussion is designed primarily to illustrate a type of tax and is not presented as a definitive statement of the law of that state. State laws and their judicial interpretations may change from time to time. Thus, while a cited decision may still reflect the law of that state, there is no guarantee of this and other decisions involving that state may exist which are not cited.

The rule that the government may pay a valid "vendor tax" even if it ends up bearing the ultimate economic burden, but is constitutionally immune from a "vendee tax," has been recognized and applied in numerous decisions of the Comptroller General. E.g., 46 Comp. Gen. 363 (1966); 24 Comp. Gen. 150 (1944); 23 Comp. Gen. 957 (1944); 21 Comp. Gen. 1119 (1942); 21 Comp. Gen. 733 (1942). Where a state tax applies to rentals as well as purchases, the rule will apply to rentals also. See 49 Comp. Gen. 204 (1969); B-168593, January 13, 1971; B-170899, November 16, 1970. In the context of sales taxes, the hallmark of a vendor tax is that the law establishing the tax requires the seller to pay it notwithstanding any inability or unwillingness on the part of the seller to collect it from the purchaser. E.g., B-225123, May 1, 1987 (non-decision letter).

In determining whether the legal incidence of a particular tax is on the vendor or the vendee, GAO will follow judicial precedent where available. If there are no federal judicial decisions on point, the determination of the highest court of the state in question will be controlling. 21 Comp. Gen. 843 (1942); B-211093, May 10, 1983; B-172025, March 30, 1971.

Nowhere is the vendor/vendee concept more clearly illustrated than in the many cases considered by GAO on the payment of state gasoline taxes. In 57 Comp. Gen. 59 (1977), the Comptroller General held that, under the Vermont tax on gasoline distributors which was required by law to be passed along to dealers and which dealers in turn were required to collect from consumers, the consumer was legally obligated to pay the tax. This tax collection mechanism constituted a vendee tax, and where the government was the vendee, it was constitutionally immune. Subsequently, the Comptroller General advised a certifying officer that, based on 57 Comp. Gen. 59, he could not properly certify vouchers covering the Vermont fuel tax. B-190293, September 22, 1978. In 1979, Vermont amended its tax law to delete the requirement for pass-through to dealers and consumers. With this amendment, the tax became a vendor tax and the government's immunity no longer applied. 63 Comp. Gen. 49 (1983). It is immaterial that, as a practical matter, the tax will be reflected in the retail price of the fuel. While the economic incidence might still fall on the purchaser, the legal incidence no longer did.

Another example of a vendee tax was the California state gasoline tax, which the dealer was required to collect from a consumer

2. General Operating Expenses

An illustration of how the necessary expense concept works common to all agencies is the range of expenditures permissible under general operating appropriations. All agencies, regardless of program differences, have certain things in common. Specifically, they all have employees, occupy space in buildings, and maintain an office environment. To support these functions, they incur a variety of administrative expenditures. Some are specifically authorized by statute; others flow logically from the requirements of maintaining a workforce.

All agencies receive general operating appropriations for these administrative expenses. Depending largely on the size of the agency, they may be separate lump-sum appropriations or may be combined with program funds. The most common (but not the only) form of general operating appropriation is entitled "Salaries and Expenses." Although an "S&E" appropriation may contain earmarks, it for the most part does not specify the types of "expenses" for which it is available. Employee salaries, together with related items such as agency contributions to health insurance and retirement, of course comprise the bulk of an S&E appropriation. This section summarizes some of the other items chargeable to S&E funds as necessary expenses of running the agency which are not covered elsewhere in this chapter.

a. Training

Training of government employees is governed by the Government Employees Training Act, 5 U.S.C. Chapter 41, aspects of which are discussed in several places in this chapter. The authority of the Government Employees Training Act is broad, but it is not unlimited. For example, tryouts for the United States Olympic Shooting Team do not constitute training under the Act. 68 Comp. Gen. 721 (1989). Nor do routine meetings, however formally structured, qualify as training. 68 Comp. Gen. 606 (1989). See also 68 Comp. Gen. 604 (1989).

For an entity not covered by the definition of "agency" in the Act, the authority to conduct training is limited. The particular training program must be (1) necessary to carry out the purpose for which the appropriation is made, (2) for a period of brief duration, and (3) special in nature. 36 Comp. Gen. 621 (1957) (including extensive citations to earlier decisions). See also 68 Comp. Gen. 127 (1988).

Training of nonfederal personnel, where necessary to the implementation of a federal program, is a straightforward "necessary

"insofar as possible." 55 Comp. Gen. 1358 (1976). That finding was predicated in part on the Supreme Court's determination in Diamond National Corp. v. State Board of Equalization, 425 U.S. 268 (1976), that the California sales tax, which had an identically worded requirement, was imposed on the vendee.

In 55 Comp. Gen. 1358, GAO also considered gasoline taxes in Pennsylvania, New Mexico, and Hawaii. Pennsylvania's tax was an excise tax on dealer-users (meaning retail service station operators). The statute did not provide any mechanism for the dealer-user to seek reimbursement from the consumer and therefore it was assumed that the tax levied against the dealer-user would become a part of that retailer's operating expenses. Accordingly, the government could pay, as a part of the purchase price, the amount of tax on the retailer who was required by statute to assume that tax as a cost of doing business.

The New Mexico gasoline tax was a tax on the users of state highways, collected by the retail dealer of gasoline. The tax was added at the pump to the per-gallon cost of gasoline. Since the incidence of this tax was on the vendee, when the United States purchased fuel in New Mexico, it was exempt from the tax. In Hawaii the tax was in the form of a license fee paid by retail distributors of gasoline. This license fee was imposed directly on the distributors with no direct recourse against the consumers of gasoline, although the amount of the license fee was undoubtedly considered in setting the basic cost of fuel sold by those retailers. For this reason the government was authorized to pay the full retail price including whatever amount was attributable to the tax.[120]

In a 1963 case, California law provided for a refund of the tax paid on gasoline for vehicles operated entirely off state highways. The state courts had found that the term "highway" did not encompass roads running in and through national parks. Therefore, relying on the state's interpretation of its own statute, GAO concluded that no tax was payable on gasoline used in vehicles driven only on the grounds of a national monument. 42 Comp. Gen. 593 (1963).

[120]In 28 Comp. Gen. 706 (1949), a Washington State tax on gasoline distributors was similarly found to be a vendor tax and the United States was therefore required to pay the amount added to the purchase price of gasoline to represent the tax. See also B-154266, June 25, 1964, considering the same tax as applied to government-rented commercial vehicles.

Even if a tax is a valid vendor tax, a state may not apply it discriminatorily to the United States and not to other buyers. See, e.g., B-156561, June 22, 1965.

Thus the immunity of the United States from taxation depends on whether the government is itself being taxed, in which case the seller of goods is merely a collection agent for the state. Similarly, an agency relationship between the United States and a contractor whereby the contractor is acting solely as the government's purchasing agent and title to goods purchased never vests in the contractor, has been held to create a situation where constitutional immunity from tax can be invoked. See Kern-Limerick, Inc. v. Scurlock, 347 U.S. 110 (1954); B 177215, November 30, 1972. However, the "contractor as agent" concept is a very limited one. See United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720, 742 (1982).

A type of "vendor tax" which the federal government must nearly always pay is a business privilege or gross receipts tax, a personal tax on domestic and foreign concerns for the privilege of doing business in the state commonly measured as a percentage of gross receipts. An example of this kind of tax is the Illinois Retailers Occupational Tax discussed in 43 Comp. Gen. 721 (1964), 42 Comp. Gen. 517 (1963), and B-162452, October 6, 1967. Similar taxes have been held to be payable in the states of Arizona (27 Comp. Gen. 767 (1948) and B-167150, February 17, 1970), Hawaii (49 Comp. Gen. 204 (1969) and 37 Comp. Gen. 772 (1958)), New Mexico (B-147615, December 14, 1961), and South Dakota (B-211093, May 10, 1983). A "business privilege" tax on motor fuel sellers imposed by Kansas City, Missouri, was held payable in 32 Comp. Gen. 423 (1953).

The imposition of state taxes—sales, use, gross receipts, etc.—on government contractors has produced more than its share of litigation. Questions arise, for example, because the tax may be based on the value of property in the contractor's possession but owned by the government, or purchased for use in performing the contract. For the most part, the taxes will be upheld. The most comprehensive recent discussion by the Supreme Court is United States v. New Mexico, 455 U.S. 720 (1982). The Court reviewed prior cases and concluded:

"[T]ax immunity is appropriate in only one circumstance: when the levy falls on the United States itself, or on an agency or instrumentality so closely connected to the Government that the two cannot realistically be viewed as separate entities, at least insofar as the activity being taxed is concerned." Id. at 735.

Government contractors will generally be unable to meet this test except in very limited circumstances such as the Kern-Limerick case noted above. 455 U.S. at 742. In New Mexico, the Court sustained use and gross receipts taxes imposed on government contractors which, in that case, operated under an "advance funding" system whereby the contractors met their obligations by using Treasury funds which had been placed in a special bank account. Id. at 725–26.[121]

In imposing taxes on government contractors, a state may not discriminate against the federal government or substantially interfere with its activities. New Mexico, 455 U.S. at 735 n.11; Phillips Chemical Co. v. Dumas Independent School District, 361 U.S. 376 (1960); City of Detroit v. Murray Corp., 355 U.S. 489, 495 (1958); United States v. City of Manassas, 830 F.2d 530 (4th Cir. 1987), aff'd mem., 485 U.S. 1017 (1988).

The Federal Acquisition Regulation provisions on state and local taxes are found in 48 C.F.R. Subpart 29.3, and the prescribed contract clauses at 48 C.F.R. § 52.229. The typical language in government contracts for the purchase of goods or services recites that the offered price includes all applicable state and local taxes. The purpose of this language is to shift to the contractor the burden of determining which taxes apply, the theory being that the contractor is in a better position than the contracting agency to know this. B-220977, January 15, 1986; B-209430, January 25, 1983. Under this clause, the government cannot be required to pay any additional amount for tax. B-162667, December 19, 1967; B-134347, March 1, 1966. Unless otherwise specified in the contract, this applies even to taxes which are first imposed while the contract is in existence. B-160129, December 7, 1966. In such circumstances it is not relevant that the tax involved has been found to be a valid [121]Some additional Supreme Court cases sustaining the imposition of state taxes on government contractors in various contexts are Washington v. United States, 460 U.S. 536 (1983); United States v. Boyd, 378 U.S. 39 (1964); City of Detroit v. Murray Corp., 355 U.S. 489 (1958); Alabama v. King and Boozer, 314 U.S. 1 (1941); James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134 (1937). There are others. Dravo is regarded as starting the current trend. New Mexico, 455 U.S. at 731-32.

vendor tax from which the United States is not immune; there can be no liability unless the contract agrees to reimburse taxes. 45 Comp. Gen. 192 (1965); 23 Comp. Gen. 957 (1944); B-148311-0.M., April 20, 1962.

A contract can include a contingency clause for after-imposed state and local taxes. Failure to include such a clause is regarded as the contractor's business decision, in which event the government will not be liable for any additional taxes. Midcon of New Mexico, Inc., ASBCA No. 37249, 90-1 BCA ¶ 22,621 (1990).

Other contract language, of course, may dictate different results. A contract for the "actual costs" would justify reimbursement to a contractor of back taxes and interest assessed against him when a court found that the contractor was not exempt on a constitutional basis. B-147316-0.M., January 9, 1962. The same result would apply in the case of a contract for a cost plus fixed fee, such as the contract in Alabama v. King and Boozer, cited above. 35 Comp. Gen. 378 (1955). Likewise, a contract to pay 50 percent of any new tax imposed by a state would include a business privilege tax assessed against a corporate contractor. B-152325, December 12, 1963.

A contractor may be entitled to equitable relief in certain limited circumstances where both the contractor and the government are mistaken as to the applicability of a state tax to a particular contract and where the contractor reasonably relies on an innocent representation of a government agent that no tax applies. In such cases, the contract may be reformed and the price increased to include the applicable state tax. Cases reaching this result in various fact situations include 64 Comp. Gen. 718 (1985); B-186949, October 20, 1976; B-180071, February 25, 1974; B-169959, August 3, 1970; B-159064, May 11, 1966; and B-153472, December 2, 1965. The underlying legal concept is unjust enrichment resulting from mutual mistake, the theory being that a party, in this case the government, making a misrepresentation, however innocently, should not benefit at the expense of a party who reasonably relies on that misrepresentation. Mutual mistake is an essential element of recovery in these cases. If the contractor cannot establish mutual mistake, the contract is payable as written and the contractor must absorb the additional expense. E.g., Hugh S. Ferguson Co., PSBCA No. 2178, 89-1 BCA ¶ 21,294 (1988) (distinguishing 64 Comp. Gen. 718).

If a contractor entitled under the contract to be reimbursed for state taxes pays a state tax which is later judicially determined to be invalid, the contractor is nevertheless entitled to reimbursement (43 Comp. Gen. 721 (1964)), unless the contractor paid the tax without being required to do so (38 Comp. Gen. 624 (1959)).

Throughout the preceding discussion, the government has been the buyer. Tax problems may also arise where the government is the seller, although there have been few decisions in this area. In one case, the Texas use tax statute required sellers to obtain a permit, collect the tax, and remit collections to the State Comptroller. The Comptroller General held that the state could not impose these requirements on the disposal of surplus federal property by the General Services Administration under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. 41 Comp. Gen. 668 (1962). The theory is that a state may not infringe on the right of the federal government to conduct its official activities free from state control or regulation.

(2) Public utilities

As with any other occupant of a building, the federal government is a consumer of services from public utilities. A utility bill may include various elements in addition to the basic charge for services used. Some of these elements may be taxes which the government may properly pay; others may be taxes from which the government is immune; still others may not be taxes at all.

In determining whether appropriated funds may be used to pay taxes appearing on or included in utility bills, the principles described above apply—such as the distinction between vendor and vendee taxes—with one additional feature based on the nature of the rate-fixing process. Utility rates are usually set by the state legislature or by a public service commission to which the power has been delegated. Rates established through this process apply to federal and nonfederal users alike. Unless they are unreasonable or discriminatory, federal agencies are expected to pay them. E.g., 27 Comp. Gen. 580 (1948).

For example, state sales taxes which qualify as vendor taxes and which have been factored into the utility rates through the applicable rate-setting process are payable by the government. 45 Comp. Gen. 192 (1965); B-134602, December 26, 1957; B-123206, June 30, 1955. The same result applies with respect to a vendor sales tax on the utility which is billed separately to the agency. B-211093, May 10, 1983.

Business privilege or gross receipts taxes are frequently imposed on public utilities. When this is done by law and the utility company is permitted to treat the tax as an operating expense and incorporate the amount of tax into its basic billing rate, a constitutionally permissible vendor tax is created. B-144504, June 9, 1967; B-148667, May 15, 1962. This is true even where the pass-through is required by a state utility regulatory body, as long as the tax itself, based on the statute that established it, qualifies as a "vendor tax." The Comptroller General applied this principle in 61 Comp. Gen. 257 (1982), concluding that Veterans Administration Medical Centers were liable for that portion of their electric bills attributable to a rate increase reflecting the Alabama public utility license tax. The Justice Department considered the same situation and reached the same result. 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 273 (1982).

Where the business privilege tax is a valid vendor tax, it can be paid even if it is attributed as a tax and stated on the utility bill as a separate item. 32 Comp. Gen. 577 (1953); B-171756, February 22, 1971; B-144504, June 30, 1970; B-225123, May 1, 1987 (non-decision letter).[122] The theory is that the "tax," even though separately stated, is, in effect, an authorized rate increase designed to recover the revenue necessary to permit the utility to maintain the allowed rate of return on its investment. See B-167999, December 31, 1969. However, payment may not be approved where the tax is collected only from the federal government or where the collection of the tax would have a discriminatory effect on federal activities. B-159685, April 7, 1967.

Another charge occasionally encountered is a "lifeline" surcharge. This is a surcharge designed to subsidize the providing of reduced-cost utility service to low-income or elderly customers. GAO regards a lifeline surcharge as not a tax at all, but merely part of the authorized rate, and therefore properly payable by federal users. 67 Comp. Gen. 220 (1988); B-189149, September 7, 1977.

[122]Another type of "tax" appearing on utility bills is a charge for 9-1-1 emergency service, discussed in Section C.7.c of this chapter.

c. Property-Related Taxes

Federal land located within state borders is also exempt from state property taxes on the same constitutional theory discussed above. E.g., Clallam County v. United States, 263 U.S. 341 (1923); Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U.S. 151 (1886). However, as with the contractor cases previously discussed, the immunity is generally limited to attempts to levy the tax directly against the federal government. Thus, the Supreme Court has sustained a state property tax on federally-owned land leased to a private party for the conduct of for-profit activities (United States v. City of Detroit, 355 U.S. 466 (1958)), and on the "possessory interest" of Forest Service employees living in government-owned housing (United States v. County of Fresno, 429 U.S. 452 (1977)).[123]

For loss of income due to the presence of large federal holdings of real property within a particular district or state, Congress may compensate local taxing authorities by means of payments in lieu of taxes. See B-149803, May 15, 1972. The rationale is that Congress chooses specifically to compensate a local taxing authority for the hardship which the exemption of federal lands from property tax works on the local government's activities.[124] Payments may also be made pursuant to specific legislation setting up a new federal enclave. See B-145801, September 20, 1961.

Just as states and their political subdivisions are barred from levying general property taxes against federal property, they are likewise prevented from making assessments against federal land for local improvements. Such assessments are typically made for [123]A tax lien which attaches to property before title passes to the government is not a tax on government property. The lien is a valid encumbrance against the property, although it is unenforceable as long as the government holds the property. United States v. Alabama, 313 U.S. 274 (1941). In a series of early decisions, however, GAO advised that the acquiring agency could use its appropriations to extinguish the lien if administratively determined to be in the best interests of the government, for example, to clear title prior to disposition of the property. B-46548, January 26, 1945; B-41677, May 8, 1944; B-28443, December 9, 1943; B-21817, February 12, 1942.

[124]The most important statute in this area is the Payments in Lieu of Taxes Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 6901-6907, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make payments, pursuant to statutory criteria, to units of local government in which "entitlement land" is located. GAO has issued a number of decisions and opinions construing the PILT statute. See, e.g., 65 Comp. Gen. 849 (1986); 58 Comp. Gen. 19 (1978); B-212145, October 2, 1984; B-214267, August 28, 1984.

paving or repairing streets or sidewalks, installing sewers, and similar local governmental services. An assessment for local improvements is an involuntary exaction in the nature of a tax. Hagar v. Reclamation District No. 108, 111 U.S. 701, 707 (1884). As such, the decisions have uniformly held that the United States may not be required to pay. E.g., National Railroad Passenger Corp. v. Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission, 665 F. Supp. 402 (E.D. Pa. 1987);[125] United States v. Harford County, 572 F. Supp. 239 (D. Md. 1983); 27 Comp. Gen. 20 (1947); 18 Comp. Gen. 562 (1938); B-226503, September 24, 1987; B-184146, August 20, 1975; B-160936, March 13, 1967; B-155274, October 7, 1964; B-150207, November 8, 1962. Any assessment which is related to a fixed dollar amount multiplied by the number of front feet of the government's property, or computed on a square footage basis, is not payable on the grounds that it is a tax. E.g., Harford County; B-168287, February 12, 1970; B-159084, May 11, 1966; B-178517-O.M., April 22, 1974.

It makes no difference whether the land on which the improvements are to be made is federally-owned or state-owned. B-157435, October 6, 1965. See also 32 Comp. Gen. 296 (1952). Also, the determination of whether a particular assessment can be paid does not depend on the taxing authority's characterization of the payment. Thus, payment has been denied where the assessment was termed a "benefit assessment" (B-168287, November 9, 1970), a "systems development charge" (B-183094, May 27, 1975), or an "invoice for services" (49 Comp. Gen. 72 (1969)). Regardless of the designation, if the charge is computed on a footage basis or in the same manner as the taxes levied against other property owners, it cannot be paid.

However, even though an assessment may not be paid as such, a state or municipality may be compensated on a quantum meruit basis for the fair and reasonable value of the services actually received by the United States. United States v. Harford County; 49 Comp. Gen. 72 (1969); 18 Comp. Gen. 562 (1938); B-226503, September 24, 1987; B-168287, November 9, 1970.

[125]The cited case deals with Amtrak. Whether Amtrak should be regarded as an instrumentality of the United States for purposes of tax immunity was not necessary to decide, however, as Amtrak's enabling legislation specifically provides for tax immunity. 665 F. Supp. at 411; 45 U.S.C. § 546b.

The method of computation is the primary means of determining whether the charge represents the fair value of services received. Thus, in order to be paid on a quantum meruit basis, the claimant must show how it arrived at the amount claimed. An unsupported statement that the sum represents the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered is not sufficient. Although the claim need not be presented on a strict "quantity of use" basis, only when it is clearly shown that the specified method of computation is based purely upon the value of the particular services rendered to the government may any payment be made. B-177325, November 27, 1972; B-168287-O.M., July 28, 1972; B-168287-0.M., March 29, 1971. However, where a precise determination of the benefit received by the government cannot reasonably be made, payment has been allowed where the method of computation used did not appear unreasonable under the circumstances. B-168287-0.M., July 28, 1972. In any event, the quantum meruit payment cannot exceed the amount of the statutory assessment. B-168287-0.M., May 15, 1973.

Applying the above principles, the Comptroller General concluded in one case that a special assessment based on the federal property's ratable share of the cost of necessary repairs and improvements to a septic sewage system could be paid on a quantum meruit basis. B-177325, November 27, 1972. However, in B-179618, November 13, 1973, an assessment against an Air Force base for maintenance of a drainage ditch based on the "benefit" to the land could not be paid since there was no indication of how the amount of the "benefit" had been computed and no showing that the assessment represented the fair and reasonable value of the services rendered to the government. Similarly, a municipal assessment based on such factors as land area, structure value, and size was found to be a tax and therefore not payable in B-183094, May 27, 1975.

Using the same analysis, GAO advised the Air Force in B-207695, June 13, 1983, that it was not required to pay fees for well registration and withdrawal of groundwater which a state had attempted to impose on the Air Force's right to draw water from wells on federal property. There was no showing that the fees bore any relationship to any services provided to the government. However, fees for permits or certificates for the right to use state-owned water represent charges for services rendered rather than taxes and may therefore be paid. 5 Comp. Gen. 413 (1925); 1 Comp. Gen. 560

(1922). Similarly, one-time connection fees for hooking up federal facilities, whether new construction or improvements, to local sewer systems are payable as authorized service charges. 39 Comp. Gen. 363 (1959); 9 Comp. Gen. 41 (1929). Where the hook-up is incident to new construction, the fee is chargeable to the construction appropriation. 19 Comp. Gen. 778 (1940).

The principle that a state or municipality may be paid on a quantum meruit basis for services actually rendered is another way of saying that a "service charge" for services rendered is not a tax. E.g., 49 Comp. Gen. 72 (1969). However, this has no relevance to services which the governmental unit is required by law to provide, such as police or firefighting services. (Section C.7, this chapter.)

Where a local government finances major improvements, such as sewers, by means of issuing revenue bonds, and levies a surcharge on its service charge to liquidate the bonded indebtedness, a federal user of the sewer service under a contractual obligation to pay the service charge may also pay the surcharge. 42 Comp. Gen. 653 (1963). However, GAO has questioned the payment of bond interest where that interest was attributable to the municipality's share of initial construction costs. B-180221-0.M., March 19, 1974.

The assessments we have been discussing thus far are assessments levied by governmental entities. Tax immunity would not apply to assessments levied by private entities, in which case the government's liability is determined by application of traditional concepts of contract and property law, subject of course to any applicable federal statutory provisions. For example, in B-210361, August 30, 1983, GAO advised that the Forest Service was liable for assessments levied by a private homeowners' association on a parcel the Forest Service had acquired by donation. The obligation to pay the assessments amounted to a covenant running with the land, and the United States became contractually bound by accepting the deed with notice of the covenant.

The principles we have discussed in the context of real property apply equally to personal property. E.g., 27 Comp. Gen. 273 (1947) (no legal basis to pay state registration fee on government-owned outboard motors). Several earlier decisions applied the government's immunity in the context of state motor vehicle license plate and title registration fees. 21 Comp. Gen. 769 (1942); 4 Comp. Gen. 412 (1924); 1 Comp. Gen. 150 (1921); 15 Comp. Dec. 231 (1908).

expense" question under the relevant program appropriation. E.g., 18 Comp. Gen. 842 (1939).

In B-148826, July 23, 1962, the Comptroller General held that the Defense Department could pay $1 each to students participating in a civil defense training course as consideration for a release from liability.

b. Travel

Reimbursement for travel expenses incurred on official travel is now authorized by statute. E.g., 5 U.S.C. § 5702. However, even before the legislation was enacted, expenses incurred on authorized official travel were reimbursable as a necessary expense. 4 Comp. Dec. 475 (1898).

Of course there are limits, and expenses are reimbursable only to the extent authorized by statute and implementing regulations. Thus, in an early case, expenses of a groom and valet incurred by an Army officer in Belgium could not be regarded as necessary travel expenses and therefore could not be reimbursed from Army appropriations. 21 Comp. Dec. 627 (1915). See GAO's Personnel Law Manuals for extensive coverage of travel entitlements.

Senior-level officials frequently travel for political purposes. As the Justice Department has pointed out, it is often impossible to neatly categorize travel as either purely business or purely political. To the extent it is possible to distinguish, appropriated funds should not be used for political travel. 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 214 (1982). GAO has conducted occasional reviews in this area, and has commented on the lack of legally binding guidelines against which to evaluate particular expenditures. E.g., Review of White House and Executive Agency Expenditures for Selected Travel, Entertainment, and Personnel Costs, AFMD-81-36 (March 6, 1981); Review of the Propriety of White House and Executive Agency Expenditures for Selected Travel, Entertainment, and Personnel Costs, FGMSD-81-13 (October 20, 1980).

Finally, there are situations in which expenses of congressional travel may be chargeable to the appropriations of other agencies. Under 31 U.S.C. § 1108(g):

"Amounts available under law are available for field examinations of appropriation estimates. The use of the amounts is subject only to regulations prescribed by the appropriate standing committees of Congress."

(Most government-owned vehicles today would have government plates.)

A final type of property-related state tax we may briefly mention is the so-called "death tax." Death taxes are of two types, estate taxes and inheritance taxes. An estate tax is based on the value of the taxable estate in its entirety; an inheritance tax is based on the value of taxable property passing to a particular beneficiary. Property given to the United States by testamentary disposition may be subject to a state inheritance tax. The Supreme Court has held that a state may impose an inheritance tax on property bequeathed to the United States, and indeed may completely prohibit testamentary gifts to the United States by its domiciliaries. Death taxes on gifts to the United States do not involve federal immunity because the taxes are imposed before the property reaches the hands of the beneficiary. (See also Chapter 6, section on donations to the government, which includes citations to the leading cases.)

There may be situations, although they should be uncommon, in which it may be desirable to pay a state death tax from appropriated funds. In an early case, the Comptroller of the Treasury advised the Smithsonian Institution that it could use its appropriation for "preservation of collections" to pay a state inheritance tax on a legacy bequeathed to the Smithsonian. 26 Comp. Dec. 480 (1919). This type of situation could arise, for example, if a decedent bequeathed specific real or personal property to the United States and the estate contained insufficient assets to pay an applicable death tax without liquidating the property.

d. Taxes Paid by Federal Employees

Another way in which the federal government sometimes pays a state or local tax is by way of reimbursement to a federal employee who incurred the tax during the performance of official business or other activities which qualify for reimbursement. For example, a member of the Armed Services was entitled to reimbursement under a government-supported health insurance plan for the full amount of a doctor's bill, including the amount which was attributable to New Mexico gross receipts tax, a valid vendor tax. B-130520, November 30, 1970. See also 36 Comp. Gen. 681 (1957) (state gasoline tax); B-203151, September 8, 1981 (local sales tax on rental vehicle); B-160040, July 13, 1976 (certain intangible property taxes reimbursable as relocation expenses incident to transfer). Some other commonly encountered situations are described below.

(1) Parking taxes

Questions here arise in two contexts—parking meter fees and municipal taxes on parking in parking lots or garages.

The rule for parking meters on public streets is: Unless and until there is a contrary judicial determination, appropriated funds may be used to reimburse a federal employee for street parking meter fees incurred while driving a government-owned vehicle on official business, except (1) where the fee would impose an impermissible burden on the performance of a federal function, or (2) where the particular fee has been held by a court to be a tax or a revenue raising measure (as opposed to a traffic regulation device). 46 Comp. Gen. 624 (1967).[126]

To the extent a parking meter fee may be held to be a tax under the above rule, it can be imposed neither against the government nor against the employee-driver as the government's agent. 41 Comp. Gen. 328 (1961). However, even where the fee is a tax, if the car is unmarked and being used in investigative work, the fee can be reimbursed as a necessary cost of the investigation. 38 Comp. Gen. 258 (1958).

The two preceding paragraphs apply to government-owned vehicles. If the employee is using a privately-owned vehicle on official business, 5 U.S.C. § 5704 expressly authorizes reimbursement of parking fees. 41 Comp. Gen. 328 (1961).

Parking meter fees in a municipally owned off-street parking lot are not viewed as taxes for purposes of the rule stated in 46 Comp. Gen. 624. These fees may therefore be reimbursed whether the employee is driving a government-owned or privately-owned vehicle. 44 Comp. Gen. 578 (1965).

A local tax on parking in a parking lot or garage cannot be imposed on a government-owned vehicle on official business. 51 Comp. Gen. 367 (1971). However, if the amount of the tax is so small as not to justify issuance of a tax exemption certificate, the employee may be reimbursed notwithstanding the government's immunity. 52 Comp. Gen. 83 (1972). The rationale is that the administrative cost of asserting the immunity by using the certificate would be prohibitive for very small amounts. As with the parking meter fees, an employee using a privately-owned vehicle on official business may be reimbursed under 5 U.S.C. § 5704 for local taxes levied on parking in lots or garages. 51 Comp. Gen. 367 (1971).

[126]46 Comp. Gen. 624 overruled several earlier decisions and modified several others. The text attempts to reflect those elements of the modified decisions which remain valid.

To sum up the rules on parking taxes and fees:

1. Privately-owned vehicles on official business: Employee may be reimbursed for meter fees either on a street or in a municipal lot, and for taxes on parking in a lot or garage.

2. Government-owned vehicle, metered parking: Employee may be reimbursed for meter fees on a public street unless one of the exceptions in 46 Comp. Gen. 624 applies, and for meter fees in a municipal lot.

3. Government-owned vehicle, unmetered parking: Employee may be reimbursed for local taxes on parking in a lot or garage if the amount is too small for the issuance of a tax exemption certificate, at least where the taxing entity requires the certificate as evidence of tax-exempt status.

(2) Hotel and meal taxes

A frequent occurrence is the addition of a tax to the price of lodging secured by government employees travelling on official business. When a federal employee rents a room directly from the proprietor, the employee becomes personally liable for the amount of the rental, including tax. The government is not a party to the transaction and the tax is therefore not viewed as a tax on the government. Accordingly, the employee must pay the tax and cannot assert the government's immunity from local taxes. The fact that the government may reimburse the full rental price as part of the employee's travel expenses does not transform the tax into a tax on the government. 55 Comp. Gen. 1278 (1976); B-172621-O.M., August 10, 1976. If local law exempts federal employees from the tax, the employees should use tax exemption certificates to claim the exemption. See B-172621, April 4, 1973 (non-decision letter).

However, if the government rents the rooms directly, that is, if there is a direct contractual relationship between the United States and a hotel or motel for the rental of rooms to federal employees or others, the government is entitled to assert its immunity from local taxes. 55 Comp. Gen. 1278 (1976). The Justice Department reached the same result in 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 348 (1981), holding that the Office of the Vice President was not required to pay local hotel taxes when reserving a block of rooms for an official trip.[127]

Similar results would occur where a tax was imposed on commercial rental of a vehicle or any other travel-related activity such as meals or other transportation. B-167150, April 3, 1972. On the theory that the contract defines the limits of liability, however, a meal ticket good for the purchase of food up to a maximum dollar amount may include amounts attributable to a valid vendor tax up to the specified dollar limit. In the event the dollar limit were exceeded, however, the remainder of the expense would be personal, including the extra amounts for tax. 41 Comp. Gen. 719 (1962).

(3) Tolls

As anyone who drives in certain areas of the United States well knows, state authorities frequently charge tolls for the use of state-owned highways, bridges, or tunnels. It has long been established that a toll is not a tax, but is a charge for the use of the road, bridge, or tunnel. Sands v. Manistee River Improvement Co., 123 U.S. 288, 294 (1887). Thus, tolls do not raise questions of federal tax immunity and are properly payable where necessarily incurred in the performance of official business. 9 Comp. Gen. 41, 42 (1929); 4 Comp. Gen. 366 (1924); 24 Comp. Dec. 45 (1917). Statutory authority now exists for the reimbursement of tolls incurred by government employees on official travel. 5 U.S.C. § 5704(b); 35 Comp. Gen. 92 (1955).

GAO has also held that appropriated funds may be used to purchase annual toll road permits where justified by anticipated usage. Such purchase does not violate the statutory prohibition on advance payments. 36 Comp. Gen. 829 (1957). Similarly, if an employee who frequently uses a toll road on official business purchases an annual permit for his or her own automobile, the agency may reimburse the toll charges that would otherwise have been incurred, on a per-[127]The Justice Department opinion notes that even where an individual employee is procuring the accommodation, the government could, if it wanted to change existing practice, compel recognition of federal immunity. 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel at 349 n.2.

trip basis, not to exceed the cost of the annual permit. 34 Comp. Gen. 556 (1955).

Some of the early decisions state that a toll may not be paid if the particular highway, bridge, or tunnel was constructed with the aid of federal funds. 9 Comp. Gen. at 42; 24 Comp. Dec. at 48. The statement in 24 Comp. Dec. was based on legislation which authorized federal financial assistance but also prohibited the charging of "tolls of all kinds." Id. at 47. The Federal-Aid Highway Act includes an almost identical prohibition (23 U.S.C. § 301), but also authorizes tolls in certain circumstances (23 U.S.C. § 129). The editors have found no discussion of this issue under the modern legislation, nor have we found any guidance as to how, apart from the interstate highway system, an employee is supposed to know which items have received federal aid. Be that as it may, it would seem prudent to apply the concept of 52 Comp. Gen. 83, discussed above under parking taxes, in conjunction with the reimbursement authority of 5 U.S.C. § 5704.

(4) State and local income taxes

Payment of state and local income taxes is basically the responsibility of the individual employee. In the absence of statutory authority, state or local withholding requirements would not apply to the federal government because a state may not "regulate" the governmental activities of the United States. 27 Comp. Gen. 372 (1948). The requisite statutory authority now exists. For the District of Columbia and any other state, city, or county which provides for the collection of income tax by withholding, the Secretary of the Treasury must enter into an agreement with the applicable jurisdiction to withhold the tax from federal employees. 5 U.S.C. §§ 5516, 5517, 5520.

(5) Possessory interest taxes

This is essentially a type of property tax. An example is the California tax on "possessory interests" in improvements on tax-exempt land. The Supreme Court upheld the validity of the tax in a suit brought by federal employees required to live in housing owned by the Forest Service. The Court found that the tax was nondiscriminatory and that its legal incidence falls upon the employees and not the United States. United States v. County of Fresno, 429 U.S. 452 (1977). See also B-191232, June 20, 1978.

REV_00257050

Where the government provides quarters for employees and collects rent under 5 U.S.C. § 5911, the rental rate may be adjusted to discount an applicable possessory interest tax, but the adjustment must be approved by the Office of Management and Budget and may not be retroactive. B-194420, October 15, 1981.

(6) Occupational license fees

Occupational license fees or employment taxes are fees imposed by a state or local jurisdiction, usually on members of a particular occupation or profession, such as doctors, as a prerequisite to being able to work or practice in that jurisdiction. Federal employees may or may not be exempted. Apart from the question of a state's authority to impose such fees on federal employees performing federal functions, even if the fee is valid, it is considered a personal expense and not reimbursable from appropriated funds. For further discussion and case citations, see Sections C.13.d (Personal Qualification Expenses) and C.12.b (Membership Fees—Attorneys) of this chapter. As in the case of state and local income taxes, state or local withholding requirements for employment taxes do not apply to the federal government absent statutory authority. 28 Comp. Gen. 101 (1948). Statutory authority now exists in 5 U.S.C. § 5520 where withholding is provided by city or county ordinance.

e. Refund and Recovery of Tax Improperly Paid

GAO has held that improperly paid taxes may be recovered by setoff against other moneys payable to a state. B-150228, August 5, 1973; B-100300, March 12, 1965. Setoff may be asserted against any money payable to any other agency of the state, whether or not related to the source of the erroneous payments. B-154778, August 6, 1964; B-154113, June 24, 1964; B-150228, August 5, 1963. With the enactment of the Debt Collection Act of 1982, the question of using offset against state or local governments has become much more controversial and is explored more fully in Chapter 13. Also, as discussed in Chapter 10, setoff against advances under a federal grant program may be improper in some instances.

Some states provide for refunds of certain taxes paid by the United States. In evaluating these refund provisions, it is important to determine whether the tax subject to refund is a vendor tax or a vendee tax. If the tax is a vendor tax, the United States is not constitutionally immune from payment. Thus, any right to a refund is purely a creature of state law and the United States must comply with any conditions and limitations imposed by state law.

B-100300, June 28, 1965. The fact that state law may permit refunds to the United States as the ultimate bearer of the tax in certain situations does not transfer the legal incidence of the tax to the vendee. B-152995, January 30, 1964. See also 27 Comp. Gen. 179 (1947).

If, however, the tax is a vendee tax, the government's right to a refund is based on the Constitution and is wholly independent of state law. Therefore, in claiming a refund in this situation, the United States is not bound by restrictions in state law, such as state statutes of limitations. United States v. Michigan, 851 F.2d 803, 809-10 (6th Cir. 1988); B-100300, June 28, 1965; B-154778, August 6, 1964.

If a refund mechanism is available, this would be the preferred method of recovering improperly paid taxes. 42 Comp. Gen. 593 (1963). Thus, upon the request of a state, and as long as the interests of the government will be adequately protected, setoff may be deferred pending the filing of a formal claim with the appropriate state agency. B-151095, January 2, 1964. However, if the state refuses a refund to which the United States is entitled, setoff is again, to the extent legally available, the proper remedy. 39 Comp. Gen. 816 (1960); B-162005, April 8, 1968.

Where a sales tax has been improperly paid, the vendor is little more than a collection agent for the state and the state is the ultimate beneficiary of the improper payment. Therefore, collection action should proceed against the state rather than by setoff against the vendor. 42 Comp. Gen. 179 (1962).

In the course of resolving problems over the liability of the United States to pay a particular tax, the government has entered into various arrangements with states pending the outcome of litigation. In one case, the government agreed with a state taxing authority to file tax forms without remitting any money, and to make the actual payments upon a final judicial determination in a pending test case that the tax was valid. B-160920, May 10, 1967. (The decision, after the Supreme Court upheld the validity of the tax, held that the back taxes should be paid notwithstanding expiration of the state statute of limitations.) In another case, the government negotiated an agreement with contractors whose contracts were being subjected to a questionable state sales tax, under which the General Services Administration agreed to pay the tax and the contractors promised to refund the amounts paid if it was ultimately determined that the government's immunity applied. B-170899, November 16, 1970. See also 50 Comp. Gen. 343 (1970).

16. Telephone Services

a. Telephone Service to Private Residences

(1) The statutory prohibition

A problem which existed during the early years of the 20th century was an apparent tendency on the part of government officials to have telephones installed in their homes at government expense. See 53 Comp. Gen. 195, 197 (1973); 19 Comp. Dec. 350, 352 (1912). It must be remembered that telephones were much more of a novelty in those days; we were still decades from the point where almost every American home has a private telephone. In any event, Congress enacted legislation in 1912 to prevent the use of public funds for private telephone service for government officials. The portion of the statute we are concerned with here, 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(1), provides:

"Except as provided in this section, appropriations are not available to install telephones in private residences or for tolls or other charges for telephone service from private residences."

The decisions are fond of saying that the statute has, for the most part, been strictly applied. Indeed, the earlier decisions are packed with the "reflex" observations that the language of the statute is "plain and comprehensive," the "prohibition is mandatory," and the statute "leaves no room for the exercise of discretion on the part of the accounting officers of the Government." E.g., 21 Comp. Gen. 997, 999 (1942). Thus, except for long-distance calls properly certified as necessary (discussed later), the rule is that charges for residential telephones (installation, connection, monthly equipment rental, and basic service charges) may not be paid from appropriated funds. As we will see, however, there are some exceptions.

(2) Funds to which the statute applies

The statute is a direct restriction on the use of appropriated funds. As such, it applies not only to direct appropriations from the Treasury but also to funds which constitute appropriated funds by operation of law. Thus, the statute applies to expenditures from the revolving fund established by the Federal Credit Union Act since the authority to maintain a revolving fund constitutes a continuing appropriation. 35 Comp. Gen. 615, 618 (1956). Similarly, the authority to retain rentals from certain defense housing projects and to use the funds for maintenance of the housing units makes them appropriated funds and therefore subject to 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(1). 21 Comp. Gen. 239 (1941).

Along these same lines, the Comptroller General held in 4 Comp. Gen. 19 (1924) that the Alaska Railroad could not designate residential telephones as "operating expenses" and pay for them from revenues derived from operating the railroad. The Comptroller pointed out in that case that the authority to do "all necessary things" to accomplish a statutory purpose confers legal discretion, not unlimited discretion, and the authority is therefore subject to statutory limitations such as 31 U.S.C. § 1348. Id. at 20. The same point was made in 35 Comp. Gen. at 618, and in B-130288, February 27, 1957.

(3) What is a private residence?

Simply stated, a private residence is where you live as opposed to where you work, assuming the two can be distinguished. Cases where the two cannot be distinguished are discussed later. For purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1348, it makes no difference that the residence is government-owned or on public land. 35 Comp. Gen. 28 (1955); 7 Comp. Gen. 651 (1928); 19 Comp. Dec. 198 (1912). The statute therefore fully applies to permanent residential quarters on a military installation. 21 Comp. Gen. 997 (1942); B-61938, September 8, 1950; A-99355, January 11, 1939. It does not apply, however, to tents or other temporary structures on a military post which are not available for family occupancy, notwithstanding that military personnel may use them as temporary sleeping quarters. 21 Comp. Gen. 905 (1942).

In 41 Comp. Gen. 190 (1961), the statutory prohibition was held not applicable to the installation of telephones in hotel rooms occupied by officials on temporary duty where necessitated by the demands of the mission. (One would have thought that all hotel rooms were already equipped with telephones by 1961.)

An early decision stated that "private" means set apart for the exclusive personal use of any one person or family. 19 Comp. Dec.

198, 199 (1912). Following this approach, the Comptroller General held that appropriated funds could be used to install and operate local-service telephones in Army barracks occupied by large numbers of enlisted personnel. 53 Comp. Gen. 195 (1973). An earlier decision, 35 Comp. Gen. 28 (1955), applied the prohibition to several government-owned residences, one of which was used to house a number of employees. While these two cases may appear inconsistent at first glance in that the telephones in both instances would be available for the personal use of the residents, the apparent distinction is that Army appropriations are available for the welfare and recreation of military personnel so that the "personal use" aspect in the Army barracks case was not necessarily dispositive.

Since the statute uses only the term "residence," it has been held not to prohibit service charges for a dedicated telephone line, on which a Navy-supplied fax machine was installed for official use, in the private business office of a Naval Reserve officer. B-236232, October 25, 1990.

(4) Application of the general rule

A large number of decisions has established that the prohibition applies even though the telephones are to be extensively used in the transaction of public business and even though they may be desirable or necessary from an official standpoint. 59 Comp. Gen. 723, 724 (1980) and cases cited therein. In this respect, there is no discretion involved.

Relevant factors are whether the telephone will be freely available for the employee's personal use and whether facilities other than the employee's residence exist for the transaction of official business. The employee's personal desires are irrelevant. Thus, it makes no difference that the employee doesn't want the telephone and has asked to have it removed. 33 Comp. Gen. 530 (1954); A-99355, January 11, 1939. The fact that a telephone is unlisted is also immaterial. 15 Comp. Gen. 885 (1936).

The rule is well illustrated in a 1980 decision in which the District Commander of the Seventh Coast Guard District sought to be reimbursed for a telephone installed in his residence. The Commander was in charge of the Cuban Refugee Freedom Flotilla in the Florida Straits. He was in daily contact with the various federal, state, and local agencies involved and was required to be available 24 hours a

Thus, travel expenses of congressional committee members and staff incident to "field examinations" of appropriation requests may be charged to the agency whose programs and budget are being examined. B-214611, April 17, 1984; B-129650, January 2, 1957. Before the above provision was enacted as permanent legislation, similar provisions had appeared for many years in various appropriation acts. See 6 Comp. Gen. 836 (1927); 23 Comp. Dec. 493 (1917).

Travel expenses of congressional spouses (Members and staff) may not be paid from appropriated funds. B-204877, November 27, 1981.

c. Postage Expenses

Agencies are required to reimburse the Postal Service for mail sent by or to them as penalty mail. Reimbursement is to be made "out of any appropriations or funds available to them." 39 U.S.C. § 3206(a). This statute amounts to an exception to the general purpose statute, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a), in that the expenditure may be charged to any appropriation available to the agency. Penalty mail costs do not have to be charged to the particular bureau or activity which generated the cost. 33 Comp. Gen. 206 (1953). By virtue of this statutory authority, the use of appropriations for one component of an agency to pay penalty mail costs of another component funded under a separate appropriation does not constitute an unauthorized transfer of appropriations. 33 Comp. Gen. 216 (1953). The same principle applies to reimbursement for registry fees. 36 Comp. Gen. 239 (1956).

While agencies are not required by the statute to allocate penalty mail costs among using components on a pro rata basis, the Office of Management and Budget could require it for accounting and budgetary reasons. B-117401, February 13, 1957.

d. Books and Periodicals

Expenditures for books and periodicals are evaluated under the necessary expense rule. Thus, the American Battle Monuments Commission could use its Salaries and Expenses appropriation to buy books on military leaders to help it decide what people and events to memorialize. 27 Comp. Gen. 746 (1948).[8] [8]Decisions in this area prior to 1946 applying a stricter standard, such as 21 Comp. Gen. 339 (1941) and 22 Comp. Dec. 317 (1916), should be disregarded as they reflected prohibitory legislation enacted in 1898 (30 Stat. 316) and repealed in 1946.

day. Since this situation placed a burden on the Commander's immediate family by restricting their personal use of the home telephone, he had another telephone installed for official business. In view of the statutory prohibition, and since the Commander was already provided with an office by the Coast Guard, reimbursement could not be allowed. 59 Comp. Gen. 723 (1980). For an earlier decision applying the prohibition notwithstanding the need for employees to be available on a 24-hour basis, see 11 Comp. Gen. 87 (1931).

A somewhat similar situation was presented in B-130288, February 27, 1957. There, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service sought authority to pay for telephones in the homes of mediators stationed in cities where office accommodations were not provided. The mediators had to work out of their homes and were required to be available 24 hours a day. Applying the statutory prohibition, the Comptroller General concluded that the agency could not pay for the telephones, nor could it pay for an answering service. However, there was no reason a mediator couldn't list his private telephone number under the agency's name, and the government could pay for this listing. By doing this, the government would not be paying for personal use of the telephone.

In B-175732, May 19, 1976, it was proposed to install a telephone in the "galley" (kitchen) of the Coast Guard Commandant's home, for use by a "subsistence specialist" who worked there and presumably had no access to other telephones. The argument was that while the galley may have been part of the Commandant's private residence, it was the subsistence specialist's duty station and since he had no other office, he had to conduct government business from the galley. GAO found the proposal prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(1). Although the duties of the subsistence specialist—the procurement of food, supplies, and services—were official to him, they nevertheless accrued largely if not exclusively to the personal benefit of the Commandant and were not sufficient to justify an exception.

(5) Exceptions

To say that the statute is strictly applied is not to suggest that there are no exceptions.

REV_00257056

First, there are statutory exceptions. One example is 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(2), for residences owned or leased by the United States in foreign countries for use of the Foreign Service. Another statutory exception is 31 U.S.C. § 1348(c), enacted in 1922, covering telephones deemed necessary in connection with the construction and operation of locks and dams for navigation, flood control, and related water uses, under regulations of the Secretary of the Army. Still another is 16 U.S.C. § 580f, for telephones necessary for the protection of national forests.

Next, there are some nonstatutory exceptions. They fall generally into two categories. The first, dictated by common sense, involves situations where private residence and official duty station are one and the same. If the government has made available office facilities elsewhere, it is clear that a residential telephone cannot be charged to appropriated funds no matter how badly it is needed for official business purposes. E.g., 59 Comp. Gen. 723 (1980); 22 Comp. Dec. 602 (1916). However, exceptions have been recognized where a government-owned private residence was the only location available under the circumstances for the conduct of official business. E.g., 4 Comp. Gen. 891 (1925) (isolated lighthouse keeper); 19 Comp. Dec. 350 (1912) (lock tender); 19 Comp. Dec. 212 (1912) (national park superintendent).

Note that in all of these cases the combined residence/duty station was government-owned. The exception has not been extended to privately-owned residences which are also used for the conduct of official business. 26 Comp. Gen. 668 (1947); B-130288, February 27, 1957; B-219084-O.M., June 10, 1985. The theory seems to be that, in a privately-owned residence, the degree of personal use as opposed to likely official need is considered so great as to warrant a stricter prohibition since there would be no other practical way to control abuse, whereas some flexibility is afforded for government-owned residences where sufficient official use for telephones exists. 53 Comp. Gen. 195, 197-98 (1973). Cf. 68 Comp. Gen. 502 (1989).

It should also be noted that isolation alone is not sufficient to justify an exception. In 35 Comp. Gen. 28 (1955), 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(1) was held to prohibit payment for telephones in government-owned residences of Department of Agriculture employees at a sheep experiment station. The employees claimed need for the telephones because they frequently received calls outside of normal office hours from Washington or to notify them of unexpected visitors and shipments of perishable goods, and because they were sometimes stranded in their residences by severe blizzards. 4 Comp. Gen. 891 was distinguished because the telephone in that case was installed in a room equipped and used only as an office and was not readily available for personal use.

The second category of nonstatutory exceptions stems from the recognition that the "evil" 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a)(1) is intended to address is not the physical existence of a telephone, but the potential for charging the government for personal use. Thus, a series of cases has approved exceptions where (1) there is an adequate justification of necessity for a telephone in a private residence, and (2) there are adequate safeguards to prevent abuse.

This category seems to have first developed in the context of "military necessity" and national security justifications. For example, an exception was made to permit the installation in the residence of the Pearl Harbor Fire Marshal (a civilian employee) of a telephone extension which was mechanically limited to emergency fire calls. 32 Comp. Gen. 431 (1953), modifying 32 Comp. Gen. 271 (1952). See also 21 Comp. Gen. 905 (1942). In B-128144, June 29, 1956, GAO approved a proposal to install direct telephone lines from an Air Force Command Post switchboard to the private residences of certain high level civilian and military officials to ensure communications in the event of a national emergency. Air Force regulations prohibited the use of these lines for anything but urgent official business in the event of a national emergency and authorized the recording of conversations as a safeguard against abuse.

However, a "necessity" which is little more than a matter of convenience is not enough to overcome the prohibition. For example, in A-99355, January 11, 1939, a telephone could not be maintained at government expense in the private quarters of the Officer-in-Charge on a Navy installation because several telephones were available in established offices on the station. This decision was followed in 21 Comp. Gen. 997 (1942) and 33 Comp. Gen. 530 (1954).

The prohibition applies equally to an intra-base system not connected to outside commercial trunk lines. B-61938, September 8, 1950.[128]

Relying largely on B-128144, GAO approved a General Services Administration proposal to install Federal Secure Telephone Service telephones in the residences of certain high level civilian and military officials certified by their agency heads as having national security responsibilities. 61 Comp. Gen. 214 (1982). The system was designed to provide a secure communications capability to permit the discussion of classified material that could not be discussed over private telephones. As in B-128144, the proposal included a number of safeguards against abuse, which GAO deemed adequate.

The concept established in the military necessity/national security cases would subsequently be applied in other contexts as well. Thus, GAO approved exceptions in the following cases:

- Installation of telephone equipment by the Internal Revenue Service in the homes of customer "assistors" who were intermittent, part-time employees. The phones to be installed had no outcall capability and could receive calls only from IRS switching equipment. Separate lines were essential because the employees' personal phones could not be used with the IRS equipment. B-220148, June 6, 1986.
- Installation of telephones in the homes of Internal Revenue Service criminal investigators who were authorized to work from their homes, to be used for portable computer data transmission. GAO found the agency's justification adequate and approved the expenditure, contingent upon the establishment of adequate safeguards, such as those in 61 Comp. Gen. 214, to prevent personal use. 65 Comp. Gen. 835 (1986).
- Installation of separate telephone lines in the homes of IRS data transcribers authorized to work at home under a "flexiplace" program, again subject to the establishment of adequate safeguards. 68 Comp. Gen. 502 (1989).

[128]The Navy now has statutory authority to use its appropriations to pay for the installation and use (except for personal long-distance calls) of extension telephones connecting public quarters occupied by naval personnel (but not civilian employees) with station switchboards. 10 U.S.C. § 7576.

- Installation of telephones in the homes of certain high level Nuclear Regulatory Commission officials to assure immediate communication capability in the event of a nuclear accident. The phones would be capable of dialing only internal NRC numbers, with any other calls to be placed through the NRC operator. B-223837, January 23, 1987.

Some of the cases noted earlier in which the prohibition was applied, such as 59 Comp. Gen. 723, also presented strong justifications. The primary feature distinguishing these cases from the exceptions described above is the existence in the latter group of adequate safeguards against abuse.

Finally, a couple of cases have dealt with payment for telephone services during periods of non-occupancy. In order to ensure continuous service, the government secures telephone service for the residence of the Air Deputy for the Allied Forces Northern Europe in Norway by long-term lease with the Norwegian Telephone Company. Normally, the Air Deputy pays the charges. The question presented in 60 Comp. Gen. 490 (1981) was who should pay the charges accruing during a vacancy in the position. The Comptroller General held that since the quarters were not the private residence of either the outgoing or the incoming Air Deputy during the period of vacancy, no public official received the benefit of the service during that period. Therefore, payment from appropriated funds would not thwart the statutory purpose.

The decision distinguished an earlier case, 11 Comp. Gen. 365 (1932), denying payment for telephone service to the residence of the U.S. Ambassador to Mexico during a period when the position was vacant. In the 1932 case, the service had been retained during the interim period mainly through inadvertence. In 60 Comp. Gen. 490, on the other hand, retention of the service was necessary to avoid delays in reinstallation when the new Air Deputy moved in. The decision did note, however, that except in limited situations of public necessity such as the one involved, telephone service should ordinarily be cancelled during periods of non-occupancy.

b. Long-Distance Calls

(1) Residential telephones

"Appropriations of an agency are available to pay charges for a long-distance call if required for official business and the voucher to pay for the call is sworn to by the head of the agency. Appropriations of an executive agency are available only if the head of the agency also certifies that the call is necessary in the interest of the Government." 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b).

Note that the statute requires two different things. As a practical matter, the requirement that the voucher be "sworn to" by the agency head is met by the normal certification of the payment voucher by an authorized certifying officer. However, the official business certification prescribed in the second sentence, further described under "Government telephones" below, is a separate requirement.

In any event, the import of section 1348(b) is that, if properly certified as necessary, a long-distance call made from an employee's personal telephone can be paid by the employing agency. Presumably, although we have found no cases, the same principle would apply to a call made from a public pay phone and billed to the employee, or to a call made from any other residential phone.

Calls billed on a message unit basis are regarded as local calls. B-75124, May 10, 1948; A-13067, April 30, 1940; A-13067, June 17, 1939. Thus, multi-message unit charges are not reimbursable even if incurred on official business. This is true regardless of whether the calls are dialed directly or placed through an operator. 35 Comp. Gen. 615 (1956); B-126760, August 21, 1972.

Normally, the original itemized bill from the telephone company is required in order to obtain reimbursement. However, in one case where the agency lost the original invoice and the telephone company was unable to furnish a copy of the original itemized bill, a letter from the telephone company indicating the exact amount representing long-distance toll charges was held acceptable as the best evidence obtainable. 32 Comp. Gen. 432 (1953).

In B-149048, July 18, 1962, GAO evaluated a proposed Department of Justice regulation which would have required Federal Marshals to pay the cost of long-distance telephone calls from their homes to their offices on evenings and weekends. The Department felt that a marshal's choice not to live in the city of his headquarters was a matter of personal convenience and therefore the cost of communication should be a personal expense. Since there was no requirement for marshals to live near their work site, and since statutory authority existed to reimburse long-distance calls necessary for official business, GAO recommended against the proposed regulation.

(2) Government telephones

The provisions of 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b), quoted above, apply to government as well as residential telephones. The official business certification requirement is particularly significant in the context of government telephones. An employee who wants reimbursement for a long-distance call placed from his or her home must present the bill to the agency and establish that the call was necessary for official business. Certification should thus be a simple matter, at least in most cases. Long-distance calls are routine occurrences on government telephones, however, and for the most part the agency cannot determine from the bill itself which calls are business and which are personal.

The cost of a call is a factor to be considered in determining whether the call was necessary. B-149048, July 18, 1962. The administrative approval of a travel voucher, including long-distance telephone calls, will satisfy 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b) and separate certification is not required. 56 Comp. Gen. 28 (1976). A certifying officer will not be liable for improperly certified long-distance calls as long as the "official business certification" was made by the agency head or an agency official to whom the authority has been specifically delegated. Id.

The certification can be a simple statement such as:

"Pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b), I certify that the use of the telephone for the official long-distance calls listed herein was necessary in the interest of the government." (Adapted from 18 Comp. Gen. 1017 (1939).)

Agencies should maintain documentation of the officials authorized to make the certification. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, Appendix IV (1990). Statements, such as that in 18 Comp. Gen. 1017, that copies of the documentation should be submitted to GAO are obsolete and should be disregarded.

As noted above, calls billed on a message unit basis are regarded as local calls. Therefore, message unit calls do not have to be certified under 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b). See cases cited under "Residential telephones" above. In addition, calls made using the Federal Telecommunications System (FTS) do not have to be certified since the flat rate charge to agencies under FTS is a rental payment for the lease of the lines rather than a payment for long-distance tolls within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b). 43 Comp. Gen. 163 (1963).[129]

In 57 Comp. Gen. 321 (1978), the Internal Revenue Service asked how to apply the certification requirement to its Hartford, Connecticut office, where the telephone company did not use a message unit system but rather listed and billed all calls separately as toll calls. The Comptroller General pointed out that all calls billed as long-distance calls must be certified under 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b). However, certification for "short haul" toll calls may be based on statistical sampling. The sampling procedure must include a large enough number of calls to assure probable accuracy. The decision contains further guidelines on establishing an adequate statistical sampling system.

A few years later, GAO took the logical next step, determined that there was no reason to distinguish between "short haul" and other toll calls for statistical sampling purposes, and advised that the official business certification requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b) could generally be satisfied through an appropriate statistical sampling system. 63 Comp. Gen. 241 (1984).

What do you do if the volume of calls is not large enough to make statistical sampling feasible? GAO addressed this question in 65 Comp. Gen. 19 (1985). In that case, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission proposed to base certification on an annually-adjusted percentage estimate reflecting past experience. The NRC would pay this percentage immediately to minimize Prompt Payment Act penalties, pending completion of internal verification. GAO approved the proposal, but cautioned that the person making the certification must have reasonable assurance that the verification process provides a high degree of accuracy.

[129]If an agency withdraws from the FTS system, the General Services Administration is authorized to charge that agency with direct costs associated with the termination, and is not required to assess those costs among remaining users. 69 Comp. Gen. 65 (1989). This authority was not affected by the 1987 amendment to 40 U.S.C. § 757 which merged the former Federal Telecommunications Fund into the newly established Information Technology Fund. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-231044.3, February 6, 1991) (Army and Air Force Exchange Service); 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-231044.2, February 6, 1991) (Tennessee Valley Authority); B-238181, January 9, 1991 (National Trust for Historic Preservation).

The 1985 decision emphasized the distinction between a certifying officer's certification of a payment voucher and the "administrative certification" required by 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b), which is not a certification for payment even if it appears on the payment voucher, and reiterated the point made in 56 Comp. Gen. 29 that a certifying officer may rely on the "official business certification" without risking personal liability for improper payments. 65 Comp. Gen. at 20-21.

Several cases have dealt with the government's liability to a telephone company for calls placed in violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b). A contract for telephone services must be viewed as having been made subject to 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b), and no authority exists to waive the statutory requirements. Thus, where the agency cannot make the required certification, it cannot pay that portion of the bill unless it first collects from the individual(s) responsible for the unauthorized calls. B-172155, August 13, 1971; B-165102, September 10, 1968; B-164699, July 8, 1968; B-90487, November 29, 1949; B-36190, August 12, 1943.

To illustrate, in B-172155, August 13, 1971, an airman had applied for telephone service in a barracks and was assigned a special billing identification number. Another airman used the telephone and special billing number without permission and made several unauthorized long-distance calls. Since the statute amounts to a legislative limitation on an agency's contracting authority, the Air Force could not use appropriated funds to pay the telephone company for the unauthorized calls.

Questions also arise under 31 U.S.C. § 1348 concerning telephone installation and use charges incident to travel, temporary duty, or relocation. See, e.g., 68 Comp. Gen. 307 (1989) (government may pay installation and reinstallation charges where employee is required to temporarily vacate government-furnished residence through government action over which employee has no control); 56 Comp. Gen. 767 (1977) (same result with respect to relocation of mobile home required by government); 44 Comp. Gen. 595 (1965); B-196549, January 31, 1980. Further coverage of these areas may be found in GAO's Personnel Law Manuals.

c. Telephones in Automobiles

If having your own personal telephone in your home was the status symbol of the early 1900's, car phones appear well on their way to becoming the status symbol of the 1990's. There is at the present time very little case law in this area, and no government-wide statutory guidance.

In a 1988 case, B-229406, December 9, 1988, an agency official used his own funds to purchase a cellular telephone and have it installed in his personal automobile. GAO considered the relevance of both 31 U.S.C. § 1348(a) and § 1348(b). With respect to § 1348(a), the simple fact is that the statute addresses residences, not automobiles. Concluding that "section 1348 does not apply to cellular phones located in private automobiles," GAO advised that the agency could reimburse local business calls as long as there were adequate safeguards to prevent abuse. The safeguards existed in this case because all local calls were individually itemized on a monthly basis. The agency could also reimburse necessary long-distance calls provided it makes the certification required by section 1348(b). The decision cautioned, however, that "agency heads should strictly scrutinize automobile telephone calls before certifying them for reimbursement," to ensure that the most economical means of communication are being used.

With respect to the purchase price of the phone itself, the decision found the agency's appropriations unavailable. However, it was clear in that case that the official intended the phone to be his own property. What about purchase and installation of a car phone that is to remain the property of the government? An early decision held that appropriated funds were not available to install radio equipment in a private automobile even though the equipment was to remain government-owned. 15 Comp. Gen. 260 (1935). Whether this decision can withstand B-229406 is open to question. It is certainly possible to argue that the rationale of the cases recognizing exceptions in the case of residences, where there is a statutory prohibition, should apply as well to automobiles, where there is no comparable statutory prohibition. Under this approach, the answer would depend on the administrative justification and the existence of adequate safeguards. In any event, these issues must await future resolution.

GAO has also considered the purchase of cellular telephones for use by Members of the Senate and concluded that the expenditure is authorized from the Senate's contingent fund. B-227763, September 17, 1987; B-186877, August 12, 1976. The 1976 opinion took a negative view of the question from the policy perspective, however, and suggested that more specific legislative authority would be

The National Science Foundation could subscribe to a publication called "Supervisory Management" to be used as training material in a supervisory training program under the Government Employees Training Act. If determined necessary to the course, the subscription could be paid from the Foundation's Salaries and Expenses appropriation. 39 Comp. Gen. 320 (1959). Similarly, the Interior Department's Mining Enforcement and Safety Administration could subscribe to the "Federal Employees News Digest" if determined to be necessary in carrying out the agency's statutory functions. 55 Comp. Gen. 1076 (1976).

Subsequently, when the Federal Employees News Digest came under some criticism, it became necessary to explain that a decision such as 55 Comp. Gen. 1076 is neither an endorsement of a particular publication nor an exhortation for agencies to buy it. It is merely a determination that the purchase is legally authorized. B-185591, February 7, 1985.

In B-171856, March 3, 1971, the Interior Department was permitted to purchase newspapers to send to a number of Eskimo families in Alaska. Members of the families had been transported to Washington (state) to help in fighting a huge fire, and the newspapers were seen as necessary to keep the families advised of the status of the operation and also as a measure to encourage future voluntarism.

e. Miscellaneous Items Incident to the Federal Workplace

Agencies may spend their appropriations, within reason, to cooperate with government-sanctioned charitable fund-raising campaigns, including such things as permitting solicitation during working hours, preparing campaign instructions, and distributing campaign materials. 67 Comp. Gen. 254 (1988) (Combined Federal Campaign); B-155667, January 21, 1965; B-154456, August 11, 1964; B-119740, July 29, 1954. This does not, however, extend to giving T-shirts to Combined Federal Campaign contributors. 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-240001, February 8, 1991).

An agency may use its general operating appropriations to fund limited amounts of promotional material in support of the United States savings bond campaign. B-225006, June 1, 1987.

Support which agencies are authorized by law to provide to federal credit unions may, if administratively determined to be necessary, include automatic teller machines. 66 Comp. Gen. 356 (1987). The

Availability of Appropriations: Time

A. General Principles—Duration of Appropriations

1. Introduction

As we have emphasized in several places in this publication, the concept of the "legal availability" of appropriations is defined in terms of three elements—purpose, time, and amount. Chapter 4 focused on purpose; this chapter addresses the second element, time.

The two basic "uses" of appropriations are obligations and expenditures. An obligation is a binding commitment against an appropriation which will require an expenditure at some later time. An expenditure is the actual disbursement of funds. This chapter will discuss the limitations on the use of appropriations relating to time—when they may be obligated and when they may be expended. Many of the rules are statutory and will be found in the provisions of Title 31, United States Code, cited throughout this chapter.

Our starting point is the firmly established proposition that—

> "Congress has the right to limit its appropriations to particular times as well as to particular objects, and when it has clearly done so, its will expressed in the law should be implicitly followed."

13 Op. Att'y Gen. 288, 292 (1870). The placing of time limits on the availability of appropriations is one of the primary means of congressional control. By imposing a time limit, Congress reserves to itself the prerogative of periodically reviewing a given program or agency's activities.

When an appropriation is by its terms made available for a fixed period of time or until a specified date, the general rule is that the availability relates to the authority to obligate the appropriation, and does not necessarily prohibit payments after the expiration date for obligations previously incurred, unless the payment is otherwise expressly prohibited by statute. 37 Comp. Gen. 861, 863 (1958); 23 Comp. Gen. 862 (1944); 18 Comp. Gen. 969 (1939); 16 Comp. Gen. 205 (1936). Thus, a time-limited appropriation is available for obligation only during the period for which it is made, but remains available beyond that period, within limits, for expenditures to liquidate properly made obligations. In this connection, 31 U.S.C. § 1502(a) provides:

"The balance of an appropriation or fund limited for obligation to a definite period is available only for payment of expenses properly incurred during the period of availability or to complete contracts properly made within that period of availability and obligated consistent with section 1501 of this title. However, the appropriation or fund is not available for expenditure for a period beyond the period otherwise authorized by law."

In addition, there are situations in which appropriations may be "held over" for obligation beyond their expiration date by judicial decree. The concepts summarized in this paragraph will be explored in depth elsewhere in this chapter.

2. Types of Appropriations

Classified on the basis of duration, appropriations are of three types: annual, multiple-year, and no-year.

Annual appropriations (also called fiscal year or one-year appropriations) are made for a specified fiscal year and are available for obligation only during the fiscal year for which made. The federal government's fiscal year begins on October 1 and ends on September 30 of the following year. 31 U.S.C. § 1102. Thus, fiscal year 1991 begins on October 1, 1990, and ends on September 30, 1991. Routine activities of the federal government are, for the most part, financed by annual appropriations.

All appropriations are presumed to be annual appropriations unless the appropriation act expressly provides otherwise. There are several reasons for this. First, as required by 1 U.S.C. § 105, the title and enacting clause of all regular and supplemental appropriation acts specify the making of appropriations "for the fiscal year ending September 30, 19XX." Thus, everything in an appropriation act is presumed to be applicable only to the fiscal year covered unless specified to the contrary. Second, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(c) provides that, with specified exceptions:

"(c) An appropriation in a regular, annual appropriation law may be construed to be permanent or available continuously only if the appropriation—

"(2) expressly provides that it is available after the fiscal year covered by the law in which it appears."

Third, appropriation acts commonly include the following general provision:

"No part of any appropriation contained in this Act shall remain available for obligation beyond the current fiscal year unless expressly so provided herein."[1]

Under the plain terms of this provision, the origin of which has previously been discussed in Chapter 2, Section C.2.d, the availability of an appropriation may not be extended beyond the fiscal year for which it is made absent express indication in the appropriation act itself. See 58 Comp. Gen. 321 (1979); B-118638, November 4, 1974.

A limitation item included in an appropriation (for example, a lump-sum appropriation with a proviso that not to exceed a specified sum shall be available for a particular object) is subject to the same fiscal year limitation attaching to the parent appropriation unless the limitation is specifically exempted from it in the appropriation act. 37 Comp. Gen. 246, 248 (1957).

Annual appropriations are available only to meet bona fide needs of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated. The so-called "bona fide needs rule" is covered in detail in Section B.

If an agency fails to obligate its annual funds by the end of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated, they cease to be available for obligation and are said to have "expired" for obligational purposes. This rule—that time-limited budget authority ceases to be available for obligation after the last day of the specified time period—has been termed an "elementary principle" of federal fiscal law. See also 18 Comp. Gen. 969, 971 (1939). Annual appropriations remain available for an additional five fiscal years beyond expiration, however, to make payments to liquidate liabilities arising from obligations made within the fiscal year for which the funds were appropriated. 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a), as amended by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1405(a), 104 Stat. at 1676 (1990). The principles summarized in this paragraph are discussed in Section D.

The above principles are illustrated in 56 Comp. Gen. 351 (1977). In that case, the Interior Department proposed to obtain and exercise options on certain land, obligate the full purchase price, and take immediate title to and possession of the property. Payment of the purchase price, however, would be disbursed over a period of up to 4 years. The reason for this was that, in view of the capital gains tax, the seller would have insisted on a higher purchase price if payment was to be made in a lump sum. The Comptroller General concluded that the proposal was not legally objectionable, provided that (a) a bona fide need for the property existed in the fiscal year in which the option was to be exercised, and (b) the full purchase price was obligated against appropriations for the fiscal year in which the option was exercised. As long as these conditions were met—obligation within the period of availability for a legitimate need existing within that period—the timing of actual disbursements over a 4-year period was irrelevant.

Just as Congress can by statute expand the obligational availability of an appropriation beyond a fiscal year, it can also reduce the availability to a fixed period less than a full fiscal year. To illustrate, a fiscal year 1980 appropriation for the now-defunct Community Services Administration included funds for emergency energy assistance grants. Since the program was intended to provide assistance for increased heating fuel costs, and Congress did not want the funds to be used to buy air conditioners, the appropriation specified that awards could not be made after June 30, 1980.[2]

Due to a severe heat wave in the summer of 1980, the program was expanded to include fans and the appropriation was subsequently extended to the full fiscal year. Pub. L. REV_00257073

Appropriations available for obligation for less than a full fiscal year are, however, uncommon.

Multiple-year appropriations are available for obligation for a definite period in excess of one fiscal year. 37 Comp. Gen. 861, 863 (1958). For example, if a fiscal year 1990 appropriation act includes an appropriation which specifies that it shall remain available until September 30, 1991, it is a 2-year appropriation. As a more specific illustration, the Navy's "Shipbuilding and Conversion" appropriation, found in the annual Defense Department appropriation acts, is typically a 5-year appropriation.[3]

Apart from the extended period of availability, multiple-year appropriations are subject to the same principles applicable to annual appropriations and do not present any special problems.

A no-year appropriation is available for obligation without fiscal year limitation. In order for an appropriation to be a no-year appropriation, the appropriating language must expressly so provide. 31 U.S.C. § 1301(c). The standard language used to make a no-year appropriation is "to remain available until expended." 40 Comp. Gen. 694, 696 (1961); 3 Comp. Dec. 623, 628 (1897). However, other language will suffice as long as its meaning is unmistakable, such as "without fiscal year limitation." See 57 Comp. Gen. 865, 869 (1978).

The rules relating to no-year appropriations are simple. Apart from one important restriction (31 U.S.C. § 1555, discussed later in connection with the closing of accounts), all statutory time limits as to when the funds may be obligated and expended are removed, and the funds remain available for their original purposes until expended. 43 Comp. Gen. 657 (1964); 40 Comp. Gen. 694 (1961). Thus, there has been little occasion for the Comptroller General to render decisions on the availability of no-year appropriations, at least from the time perspective.

A small group of decisions involves the effect of subsequent congressional action on the availability of a prior year's no-year appropriation. In one case, Congress had made a no-year appropriation to the Federal Aviation Administration for the purchase of aircraft. A question arose as to the continued availability of the appropriation because, in the following year, Congress explicitly denied a budget request for the same purpose. The Comptroller General held that the subsequent denial did not restrict the use of the unexpended balance of the prior no-year appropriation. The availability of the prior appropriation could not be changed by a later act "except in such respects and to such extent as is expressly stated or clearly implied by such act." 40 Comp. Gen. 694 (1961). See also B-200519, November 28, 1980.

In another case, a no-year appropriation for the National Capital Park and Planning Commission included a monetary ceiling on non-contract services during the fiscal year. Based on the apparent intent of the ceiling, GAO concluded that the specific restriction had the effect of suspending the "available until expended" provision of prior unrestricted no-year appropriations as far as personal services were concerned, for any fiscal year in which the restriction was included. Thus, unobligated balances of prior unrestricted no-year appropriations could not be used to augment the ceiling. 30 Comp. Gen. 500 (1951). A similar issue was considered in 62 Comp. Gen. 692 (1983). The Nuclear Regulatory Commission received a no-year appropriation which included a prohibition on compensating intervenors. The decision held that the unobligated balance of a prior unrestricted no-year appropriation could be used to pay an Equal Access to Justice Act award to an intervenor made in a restricted year, where part of the proceeding giving rise to the award was funded by an unrestricted appropriation. Unlike the situation in 30 Comp. Gen. 500, the restriction in the 1983 case was expressly limited to "proceedings funded in this Act," and thus could have no effect on the availability of prior appropriations.

Similar issues were considered in the context of multiple-year appropriations in 31 Comp. Gen. 368 (1952) and 31 Comp. Gen. 543 (1952), overruling 31 Comp. Gen. 275 (1952). In both of these cases, based on a determination of congressional intent, it was held that the current restriction had no effect on the availability of unobligated balances of prior unrestricted appropriations.

Deobligated no-year funds, as well as no-year funds recovered as a result of cost reductions, are available for obligation on the same basis as if they had never been obligated, subject to the restrictions of 31 U.S.C. § 1555. 40 Comp. Gen. 694, 697 (1961); B-211323, January 3, 1984; B-200519, November 28, 1980. One early decision concerned the disposition of liquidated damage penalties deducted Outplacement assistance to employees may be regarded as a legitimate matter of agency personnel administration if the expenditures are found to benefit the agency and are reasonable in amount. 68 Comp. Gen. 127 (1988). The Government Employees Training Act authorizes training in preparation for placement in another federal agency under conditions specified in the statute. 5 U.S.C. § 4103(b).

Otherwise unrestricted operating appropriations are available to protect a government official who has been threatened or is otherwise in danger, if the agency determines that the risk impairs the official's ability to carry out his or her duties and hence adversely affects the efficient functioning of the agency. Certain officials, specified in 18 U.S.C. § 3056(a), are entitled to Secret Service protection. 54 Comp. Gen. 624 (1975), as modified by 55 Comp. Gen. 578 (1975).

Payment of an honorarium to an invited guest speaker (other than a government employee) is permissible under a necessary expense rationale. from payments made to a contractor. The Comptroller General concluded that, if the contractor had not objected to the deduction within two years, the funds could be treated as unobligated balances available for expenditure in the same manner as other funds in the account, assuming the no-year account contained a sufficient balance for the discharge of unanticipated claims. 23 Comp. Gen. 365 (1943). There was nothing magic about the suggested two-year period. It was simply GAO's estimate of a point beyond which the likelihood of a claim by the contractor would be sufficiently remote. Id. at 367.

No-year appropriations have advantages and disadvantages. The advantages to the spending agency are obvious. From the legislative perspective, a key disadvantage is a loss of congressional control over actual program levels from year to year. GAO has expressed the position that no-year appropriations should not be made in the absence of compelling programmatic or budgetary reasons. See GAO report entitled No-Year Appropriations in the Department of Agriculture, PAD-78-74 (September 19, 1978).

3. Permissible Actions Prior to Start of Fiscal Year

In considering what may and may not be done before the start of a fiscal year, it is necessary to keep in mind the Antideficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a), which prohibits obligations or expenditures in advance of appropriations. By virtue of this law, certainly no obligations may be incurred before the appropriation act is enacted, unless specifically authorized by law.

If the appropriation act is enacted prior to the start of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is being made, contracts may be entered into upon enactment and before the start of the fiscal year, provided that no payments or expenditures may be made under them until the start of the fiscal year. Any such contract should make this limitation clear. 20 Comp. Gen. 868 (1941); 16 Comp. Gen. 1007 (1937); 4 Comp. Gen. 887 (1925); 2 Comp. Gen. 739 (1923); B-20670, October 18, 1941; A-19524, August 26, 1927; B-213141-O.M., March 29, 1984; 11 Comp. Dec. 186 (1904); 4 Lawrence, First Comp. Dec. 132 (1883). The contract is not regarded as an obligation in violation of the Antideficiency Act since, even though the time period covered by the appropriation to be charged has not yet started, the appropriation has already been enacted into law.

Of course, Congress may by statute authorize the actual expenditure of appropriations prior to the beginning of the fiscal year, in which event the above rule does not apply. 4 Comp. Gen. 918 (1925). This result may also follow if an appropriation is made to carry out the provisions of another law which clearly by its terms requires immediate action. E.g., 1 Comp. Dec. 329 (1895). However, the general rule remains that (a) expenditures prior to the beginning of the fiscal year(s) covered by the appropriation are unauthorized; and (b) obligations prior to the start of the fiscal year are permissible only if the relevant appropriation act has already been enacted and only where actual disbursements are deferred until after the start of the new fiscal year.

The Comptroller General has also held that the awarding of a "conditional contract" prior to the enactment of the relevant appropriation act does not violate statutory funding restrictions. A "conditional contract" must expressly provide that the government's liability is contingent upon the future availability of appropriations. Under this arrangement, performance cannot begin prior to the date of enactment of the appropriation, although it may begin after the enactment of the appropriation but before the start of the fiscal year. The contract must also provide that the government is under no obligation to make any contract payments until the start of the fiscal year. 39 Comp. Gen. 776 (1960); 39 Comp. Gen. 340 (1959); 21 Comp. Gen. 864 (1942); B-171798(1), August 18, 1971, at 11–12.

B. The Bona Fide Needs Rule

1. The Concept

One of the fundamental principles of appropriations law is the so-called bona fide needs rule: A fiscal year appropriation may be obligated only to meet a legitimate, or bona fide, need arising in, or in some cases arising prior to but continuing to exist in, the fiscal year for which the appropriation was made. Citations to this principle are numerous. See, e.g., 68 Comp. Gen. 170, 171 (1989); 58 Comp. Gen. 471, 473 (1979); 54 Comp. Gen. 962, 966 (1975); 33 Comp. Gen. 57, 61 (1953); B-183184, May 30, 1975.

Bona fide need questions arise in many forms. An agency may wish to enter into or modify a contract or make some other obligation or expenditure, the question being which fiscal year to charge. The question may be whether an obligation previously recorded was a proper charge against that fiscal year's appropriation. An agency may have taken certain actions which it should have recorded as an obligation but did not; when the time for payment arrives, the question again is which fiscal year to charge. These are all facets of the same basic question—whether an obligation, proposed or made, recorded or unrecorded, voluntarily incurred or imposed by operation of law, bears a sufficient relationship to the legitimate needs of the period of obligational availability of the appropriation charged or sought to be charged.

The bona fide needs rule has a statutory basis. As noted in Chapter 1, the first general appropriation act in 1789 made appropriations "for the service of the present year," and this concept continues to this time. This "one-year" concept is also reflected in 31 U.S.C. § 1502(a), sometimes called the "bona fide needs statute." Originally enacted in 1870 (16 Stat. 251), section 1502(a) provides that the balance of a fixed-term appropriation "is available only for payment of expenses properly incurred during the period of availability or to complete contracts properly made within that period . . . ." The key word here is "properly"—expenses "properly incurred" or contracts "properly made" within the period of availability. See, e.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 155 (1957). Additional statutory support for the rule may be found in the Antideficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a), and the so-called Adequacy of Appropriations Act, 41 U.S.C. § 11. (Bona fide need questions may involve other statutory restrictions as well. It also should be apparent that they are closely related to the subject matter covered in Chapter 7 on obligations.) For an early but still relevant and useful discussion, see 6 Comp. Dec. 815 (1900).

While the rule itself is universally applicable, determination of what constitutes a bona fide need of a particular fiscal year depends largely on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. 44 Comp. Gen. 399, 401 (1965); 37 Comp. Gen. 155, 159 (1957).

In its most elementary form—where the entire transaction (contract or purchase, delivery or other performance, and payment) takes place during the same fiscal year—the rule means simply that the appropriation is available only for the needs of the current year. A common application of the rule in this context is that an appropriation is not available for the needs of a future year. For example, suppose that, as the end of a fiscal year approaches, an agency purchases a truckload of pencils when it is clear that, based on current usage, it already has in stock enough pencils to last several years into the future. It would seem apparent that the agency was merely trying to use up its appropriation before it expired, and the purchase would violate the bona fide needs rule.

We do not mean to suggest that an agency may purchase only those supplies which it will actually use during the fiscal year. Agencies normally maintain inventories of common use items. The bona fide needs rule does not prevent maintaining a legitimate inventory at reasonable and historical levels, the "need" being to maintain the inventory level so as to avoid disruption of operations. The problem arises when the inventory crosses the line from reasonable to excessive. Future years' needs and year-end spending are covered further in Section B.2 of this chapter.

What about the needs of a prior year? The rules here are not quite so simple. There are situations in which current appropriations may (and even must) be used to satisfy unmet needs arising in a prior year, and situations in which current appropriations are not available for that purpose. Prior years' needs are covered in Section B.3.

Bona fide need questions also frequently involve transactions which cover more than one fiscal year. In the typical situation, a contract is made (or attempted to be made) in one fiscal year, with performance and payment to extend at least in part into the following fiscal year. The question is which fiscal year should be charged with the obligation. In this context, the rule is that, in order to obligate a fiscal year appropriation for payments to be made in a succeeding fiscal year, the contract imposing the obligation must have been made within the fiscal year sought to be charged, and the contract must have been made to meet a bona fide need of the fiscal year to be charged. E.g., 35 Comp. Gen. 692 (1956); 33 Comp. Gen. 57, 61 (1953); 20 Comp. Gen. 436 (1941); 16 Comp. Gen. 37 (1936); 21 Comp. Dec. 822 (1915). More detailed discussion of the rule and its rationale is contained in 4 Comp. Dec. 553 (1898) and 37 Comp. Gen. 155 (1957).

The principle that payment is chargeable to the fiscal year in which the obligation is incurred as long as the need arose, or continued to exist in, that year applies even though the funds are not to be disbursed and the exact amount owed by the government cannot be determined until the subsequent fiscal year. E.g., 21 Comp. Gen. 574 (1941). Thus, in a case where the United States entered into an agreement with a state to provide assistance for the procurement of civil defense items for the state and to pay a specified percentage of the cost, the Comptroller General found that the need arose in the year the agreement with the state was made. Therefore, appropriations current at that time were to be charged with the cost, notwithstanding the fact that the actual procurement contracts with suppliers, including the exact price, were not negotiated and executed until a subsequent fiscal year. 31 Comp. Gen. 608 (1952).

Several sections of this chapter, starting with B.4, explore the application of the bona fide needs rule in various aspects of government contracting in which transactions cover more than one fiscal year. We have structured these sections in large measure on a comprehensive and well-documented article entitled Legal Aspects of Funding Department of the Army Procurements by Capt. Dale Gallimore, 67 Mil. L. Rev. 85 (1975).

The bona fide needs rule applies to multiple-year as well as fiscal-year appropriations. 68 Comp. Gen. 170 (1989); 55 Comp. Gen. 768, 773-74 (1976); B-235678, July 30, 1990. See also 64 Comp. Gen. 163, 166 (1984). In other words, an agency may use a multiple-year appropriation for needs arising at any time during the period of availability.

An argument can be made, not wholly without logic, that a multiple-year appropriation can be obligated at any time during its availability, but only to meet a bona fide need of the year in which the funds were appropriated. Suppose, for example, that an agency receives a two-year appropriation every year. For FY 1989, it receives an appropriation available through FY 1990; for FY 1990, it receives an appropriation available through FY 1991, and so on. It is possible to apply the bona fide needs rule to require that the FY 1990 appropriation be used only for needs arising in FY 1990, although obligation may occur any time prior to the end of FY 1991. The Comptroller General specifically rejected this approach in 68 Comp. Gen. 170, holding that the Defense Logistics Agency could use its FY 1987 2-year Research and Development appropriation for a need arising in FY 1988. "There is no requirement that 2-year funds be used only for the needs of the first year of their availability." Id. at 172.

It follows that the bona fide needs rule does not apply to no-year funds. 43 Comp. Gen. 657, 661 (1964).

2. Future Years' Needs

An appropriation may not be used for the needs of some time period subsequent to the expiration of its period of availability. As most appropriations are annual appropriations, a more common statement of the rule is that an appropriation for a given fiscal year is not available for the needs of a future fiscal year.[4] Determining the year to which a need relates is not always easy. Some illustrative cases are listed below:

- Rent on property leased by National Park Service from National Park Foundation could be paid in advance, but lease could not cross fiscal year lines. Proposal was for lease to run from May 1 through April 30 and for the full annual rent to be paid in advance on May 1. However, appropriations available as of May 1 could not be used for period of October 1 through April 30 since rent for these months constituted a need of the following fiscal year. B-207215, March 1, 1983.
- Envelopes ordered near the end of one fiscal year, which were delivered in and were intended for use in the following fiscal year, could be charged only to appropriations for the latter year. 5 Comp. Dec. 486 (1899). (Maintaining an inventory level was not a factor in this case.)
- Balance of an appropriation for salaries remaining unexpended at the end of one fiscal year could not be used to pay salaries for services rendered in the following fiscal year. 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 412 (1886).
- Department of Housing and Urban Development recorded certain obligations for public housing subsidies on estimated basis. At end of fiscal year, obligations were found to be in excess of actual needs. It was held improper to send excess funds to state agency's operating reserve to offset subsidy for following year, since this amounted to using the funds for the needs of a subsequent year.

[4]The topic of obligating for needs of a future year arises in a variety of contexts and is also involved in several later sections of this chapter (e.g., B.4, B.5, B.8).

Proper course of action was to deobligate the excess. 64 Comp. Gen. 410 (1985).

Any discussion of obligating for future years' needs inevitably leads to the question of year-end spending. Federal agencies as a fiscal year draws to a close are often likened to sharks on a feeding frenzy, furiously thrashing about to gobble up every appropriated dollar in sight before the ability to obligate those dollars is lost. While there can be no doubt that this happens, the issue is far from one-sided.

The legal issue was stated very simply in an early decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury:

"An appropriation should not be used for the purchase of an article not necessary for the use of a fiscal year in which ordered merely in order to use up such appropriation. This would be a plain violation of the law."

8 Comp. Dec. 346, 348 (1901). Thus, where an obligation is made toward the end of a fiscal year and it is clear from the facts and circumstances that the need relates to the following fiscal year, the bona fide needs rule has been violated. The obligation is not a proper charge against the earlier appropriation, but must be charged against the following year's funds. This was the result, for example, in 1 Comp. Gen. 115 (1921), in which an order for gasoline had been placed three days before the end of FY 1921, with the gasoline to be delivered in monthly installments in FY 1922. The Comptroller General stated:

"It is not difficult to understand how the need for an article of equipment, such as a typewriter, might arise during the fiscal year 1921 and its purchase be delayed until the latter part of June, but as to supplies that are consumed as used, such as gasoline, it can not be held that they were purchased to supply a need of the fiscal year 1921 when the contract is made late in the month of June and expressly precludes the possibility of delivery before July 1, 1921."

Id. at 118. See also 4 Comp. Dec. 553 (1898) (cement ordered late in one fiscal year to be delivered several months into the following fiscal year).[5]

[5]"There is no authority in an appropriation made specifically for the service of a particular fiscal year to enter into contracts for supplies, etc., for the service of a subsequent fiscal year, and therefore as to that appropriation such a contract is not 'properly made within that year.'" 4 Comp. Dec. at 556.

Yet this is only one side of the coin. The other side is illustrated in another passage from 8 Comp. Dec. at 348:

"An appropriation is just as much available to supply the needs of the [last day] of a particular year as any other day or time in the year."

Thus, a year-end obligation perhaps raises the possibility that the agency is trying to "dump" its remaining funds and warrants a further look, but the timing of the obligation does not, in and of itself, establish anything improper. 38 Comp. Gen. 628, 630 (1959); 6 Comp. Dec. 815, 818 (1900).

GAO has conducted several studies of year-end spending and has consistently reported that year-end spending is not inherently more or less wasteful than spending at any other time of the year. In one report, GAO suggested that year-end spending surges are really symptomatic of a larger problem—inadequate management of budget execution—and that the apportionment process could be more effectively used to provide the desired management. Federal Year-End Spending: Symptom of a Larger Problem, PAD-81-18 (October 23, 1980), pp. 7–9.[6]

GAO also noted in its October 1980 report that there are several reasons for year-end spending, some of which are perfectly valid. For example, some programs have predictable fourth quarter surges due to cyclical or seasonal fund requirements. If, for example, you are administering a fire suppression program, you should expect a fourth quarter surge because the fourth quarter of the federal fiscal year is the major fire season in many states. PAD-81-18 at 3. In other situations, it may be desirable to delay obligations to have funds available for emergencies that may arise during the year. Id. at 4.

In evaluating a year-end obligation, it is important to determine exactly what the need is from the agency's perspective. In one case, for example, the Small Business Administration awarded cooperative agreements to certain Small Business Development Centers on the last day of a fiscal year. The Centers then provided management and technical assistance to small businesses, all of which would obviously be done in the following year. GAO found no bona fide need violation because the need, from the perspective of implementing SBA's appropriation, was merely to provide assistance to the Centers, and there was no reason this could not be done on the last day of the year. B-229873, November 29, 1988.

[6]Other GAO reports in this area are: Federal Year-End Spending Patterns for Fiscal Years 1982, 1983, and 1984, GAO/AFMD-85-75 (November 4, 1985); Limitations on Fiscal Year 1981 Fourth Quarter Obligations in Certain Agencies, GAO/PAD-82-43 (July 16, 1982); Government Agencies Need Effective Planning to Curb Unnecessary Year-End Spending, PSAD-80-67 (July 28, 1980).

One device Congress has employed to control year-end spending surges is legislation limiting the amount of obligations that may be incurred in the last month or two-month period or quarter of the fiscal year. For example, the Defense Department's 1990 appropriation contained a provision limiting obligations during the last two months of the fiscal year to not more than 20 percent of the total fiscal-year appropriations.[7] In comments on legislative proposals of this type, GAO has pointed out that they are difficult to administer, but has supported them as temporary measures pending more fundamental improvements in budget execution management and procurement planning.[8] In addition, there is the risk that limitations of this type may have the effect of simply moving the spending surges back a few months, accomplishing nothing.

3. Prior Years' Needs

There are situations in which it is not only proper but mandatory to use currently available appropriations to satisfy a need which arose in a prior year. We refer to this as the "continuing need." If a need arises during a particular fiscal year and the agency chooses not to satisfy it during that year, perhaps because of insufficient funds or higher priority needs, and the need continues to exist in the following year, the obligation to satisfy that need is properly chargeable to the later year's funds. "An unfulfilled need of one period may well be carried forward to the next as a continuing need with the next period's appropriation being available for funding." B-197274, September 23, 1983. Thus, an important corollary to the bona fide needs rule is that a continuing need is chargeable to funds current for the year in which the obligation is made, regardless of the fact that the need may have originated in a prior year.

An illustration is B-207433, September 16, 1983. The Army contracted for a specific quantity of thermal viewers. The contract provided for a downward adjustment in the contract price in the case of an "underrun," that is, if the contractor was able to perform at less than the contract price. After the appropriation charged with the contract had expired, the contractor incurred an underrun and proposed to use the excess funds to supply an additional quantity of viewers. It was undisputed that the need for additional viewers could be attributed to the year in which the contract was entered into, and that the need continued to exist. GAO agreed with the Army that the proper course of action was to deobligate the excess funds and to charge the obligation for the additional quantity, if the Army still wished to procure them, to current year's appropriations. The fact that the need arose in a prior year was immaterial. The decision, at pages 4–5, offered the following explanation:

"The essence of the [bona fide needs] rule is simply that an appropriation may be validly obligated only to meet a legitimate need existing during the period of availability. Under this concept, payments are chargeable to the year in which the obligation took place, even though not actually disbursed until a later year, as long as the need existed when the funds were obligated. . . .

"Certainly the Army could have used underrun funds to procure additional viewers at any time during the period those funds remained available for obligation. Also, we are of course aware that an unmet need does not somehow evaporate merely because the period of availability has expired. However, nothing in the bona fide needs rule suggests that expired appropriations may be used for an item for which a valid obligation was not incurred prior to expiration merely because there was a need for that item during that period. . . . Once the obligational period has expired, the procurement of an increased quantity must be charged to new money, and this is not affected by the fact that the need for that increased quantity may in effect be a 'continuing need' that arose during the prior period."

Another illustration is B-226198, July 21, 1987. In late FY 1986, the U.S. Geological Survey ordered certain microcomputer equipment, to be delivered in early FY 1987, charging the purchase to FY 1986 funds. The equipment was delivered and accepted, but was stolen before reaching the ordering office. The decision held that a reorder, placed in FY 1987, had to be charged to FY 1987 funds. As with the thermal viewers in B-207433, the fact that the need for the equipment arose in 1986 was immaterial.

C. Specific Purpose Authorities and Limitations

1. Introduction

This section will explore a number of specific topics concerning purpose availability. Sections C.2 through C.16 cover areas which have generated considerable activity over the years and which require somewhat detailed presentation. While our topic selection is designed to highlight certain restrictions, our objective is to describe what is authorized as well as what is unauthorized. Most of the topics are a mixture of both.

Restrictions on the purposes for which appropriated funds may be spent come from a variety of sources. Some may stem from the Constitution itself. An example is the prohibition on paying certain state and local taxes, Section C.15. Others are found in permanent legislation, such as the restrictions on residential and long distance telephone service discussed in Section C.16.

A common source of purpose restrictions is the appropriation act itself. Restrictions are often included as provisos to the appropriating language or as general provisions or "riders." For example, B-202716, October 29, 1981, construes an appropriation act restriction prohibiting the use of Legal Services Corporation funds for the representation of illegal aliens. Another example is the restriction on "publicity and propaganda" expenditures found in some appropriation acts, discussed in Section C.11.

Finally, a number of restrictions have evolved from decisions of the Comptroller General and his predecessor, the Comptroller of the Treasury. An example is the government's policy on self-insurance, Section C.10. The restrictions that have evolved administratively usually date back to the 19th Century, are firmly embedded in appropriations law, and for the most part have been recognized by

In another case, cost overruns caused the Army to delete certain items from a FY 1979 procurement. The Army repurchased the canceled items in 1981, charging 1981 appropriations. GAO agreed that the repurchase was properly chargeable to 1981, rather than 1979, funds. B-206283-O.M., February 17, 1983.

The essential requirements of the "continuing need" corollary are that (1) the need, unmet in the year in which it arose, must continue to exist in the subsequent obligational period; (2) the incurring of an obligation must have been discretionary with the agency to begin with; and (3) no obligation was in fact incurred during the prior year.

If the agency has no discretion as to the timing of an obligation (for example, in situations where the obligation arises by operation of law), or, even in discretionary situations, if the agency has actually incurred a valid obligation in the prior year (whether recorded or unrecorded), then the "continuing need" concept has no application and the obligation must be charged to the prior year. Absent statutory authority, current appropriations are not available to fund an obligation or liability (as opposed to an unmet and unobligated-for need) of a prior obligational period. If insufficient funds remain in the prior year's appropriation, the agency must seek a supplemental or deficiency appropriation and must further consider the possibility that the Antideficiency Act has been violated.

In an early case, for example, an agency had contracted for repairs to a building toward the end of fiscal year 1904. Since it was clear that the repairs were needed at the time they were ordered, they were chargeable to FY 1904 appropriations, and the exhaustion of the 1904 appropriation did not permit use of 1905 funds. 11 Comp. Dec. 454 (1905). (The contract constituted a valid obligation against the 1904 appropriation.) See also 21 Comp. Dec. 822 (1915).

Similarly, an obligation occurs under 5 U.S.C. § 504, the administrative portion of the Equal Access to Justice Act, when the agency renders its decision approving a fee application. The obligation is against funds current as of the time of the award. If funds are not currently available to satisfy the award, the agency may not use the following year's appropriation. 62 Comp. Gen. 692, 698-700 (1983).

In B-226801, March 2, 1988, GAO considered various entitlement programs administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs. Under these programs, the obligation arises when the VA determines eligibility through its adjudication process, and must be recorded at that time. If the obligations would exceed available funds, it is not proper to defer the recording and charge the following year's appropriation. Since the obligations are required by law, overobligation would not violate the Antideficiency Act, but they must still be recognized and recorded when they arise. Congress subsequently began including an administrative provision in the VA's appropriation act permitting the use of appropriations for these programs to pay obligations required to be recorded in the last quarter of the preceding fiscal year.[9]

For additional cases, see 55 Comp. Gen. 768, 773-74 (1976) (current year's appropriations not available to fund prior year's Antideficiency Act violation); 54 Comp. Gen. 393, 395 (1974) (deficiency appropriation necessary to pay claims against exhausted appropriation); B-133001, March 9, 1979 (fiscal-year refugee assistance appropriation not available to pay for services performed in prior year); B-14331, January 24, 1941; A-76081, June 8, 1936 (appropriations not available for past obligations unless clearly indicated by language and intent of appropriation act); B-221204-O.M., January 31, 1986 (meals under child nutrition program served in September of one fiscal year may not be charged to subsequent year's appropriation). Congressional denial of a request for a deficiency appropriation does not make current appropriations available to satisfy the prior year's obligation. B-114874, September 16, 1975 (postage charges under 39 U.S.C. § 3206).

4. Delivery of Materials Beyond the Fiscal Year

When the government purchases goods or materials in one fiscal year and delivery occurs in whole or in part in a subsequent fiscal year, the question is whether the contract meets a bona fide need of the fiscal year in which it was made. This was the central legal issue in our discussion of year-end spending in Section B.2, but the issue exists regardless of when in the fiscal year the contract is made. This section will explore the topic in more general terms.

[9]E.g., Departments of Veterans Affairs and Housing and Urban Development, and Independent Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-144, title I, 103 Stat. 839, 843-44 (1989).

An agency may not obligate funds when it is apparent from the outset that there will be no requirement until the following fiscal year. For example, it was found that annual appropriations obligated to fund an agreement between the General Services Administration and the Federal Power Commission whereby GSA agreed to renovate space in a federal building incident to relocation of FPC personnel, were not available since the relocation was not required to, and would not, take place by the end of the fiscal year, and because the space in question would not be made "tenantable" until the following fiscal year. B-95136-O.M., August 11, 1972.

However, the timing of delivery, while obviously a relevant factor, is not conclusive. There are perfectly legitimate situations in which an obligation may be incurred in one year with delivery to occur in a subsequent year. Thus, where materials cannot be obtained in the same fiscal year in which they are needed and contracted for, provisions for delivery in the subsequent fiscal year do not violate the bona fide needs rule as long as the time intervening between contracting and delivery is not excessive and the procurement is not for standard commercial items readily available from other sources. 38 Comp. Gen. 628, 630 (1959).

Similarly, an agency may contract in one fiscal year for delivery in a subsequent year if the material contracted for will not be obtainable on the open market at the time needed for use, provided the intervening period is necessary for production or fabrication of the material. 37 Comp. Gen. 155, 159 (1957).

If an obligation is proper when made, unforeseen delays which cause delivery or performance to extend into the following fiscal year will not invalidate the obligation. In one case, for example, although work under a construction contract was performed during the fiscal year following its execution, the Comptroller General approved payment to the contractor under the original obligation since the agency had awarded the contract as expeditiously as possible and had made provision for the work to begin within the current fiscal year, but experienced a delay in obtaining certain materials the government had agreed to provide. 1 Comp. Gen. 708 (1922). See also 23 Comp. Gen. 82 (1943); 20 Comp. Gen. 436 (1941).

If deliveries are scheduled only for a subsequent fiscal year, or if contract timing effectively precludes delivery until the following fiscal year, it will be presumed that the contract was made in the earlier fiscal year only to obligate funds from an expiring appropriation and that the goods or materials were not intended to meet a bona fide need of that year. See 38 Comp. Gen. 628, 630 (1959); 35 Comp. Gen. 692 (1956); 33 Comp. Gen. 57, 60-61 (1953); 21 Comp. Gen. 1159 (1941) (circular letter); 1 Comp. Gen. 115 (1921); 27 Comp. Dec. 640 (1921).

In 44 Comp. Gen. 695 (1965), where an agency had requisitioned the printing of sales promotion material near the end of a fiscal year, the Comptroller General determined that the material did not meet a bona fide need of the fiscal year in which the order was placed. Because the items were especially created for a particular purpose and required a lengthy period for creation, the printing requisitions could not be viewed as "replacement of stock" and did not lawfully obligate the current annual appropriation. Further, since the manuscript copy did not accompany the original order and was not furnished to the Government Printing Office until seven months after the end of the fiscal year, the printing could not have fulfilled a need of the fiscal year in which the requisition was issued.

As suggested in 44 Comp. Gen. 695, an order or contract for the replacement of stock is viewed as meeting a bona fide need of the year in which the contract is made as long as it is intended to replace stock used in that year, even though the replacement items will not be used until the following year. This being the case, scheduling delivery for the following year would seem irrelevant. "Stock" in this context refers to "readily available common-use standard items." Id. at 697. See also 32 Comp. Gen. 436 (1953). There are limits, however. GAO has questioned the propriety, from the bona fide needs perspective, of purchases of materials carried in stock for more than a year prior to issuance for use. B-134277, December 18, 1957.

A 1935 decision, A-60589, July 12, 1935, concerned a "requirements contract" for supplies in which no definite quantity was required to be purchased and under which no legal obligation would be imposed on the government until an order was placed, other than the requirement not to purchase the items elsewhere. The decision held that such a contract could extend into the following fiscal year, i.e., could cross fiscal year lines, as long as the contract term was not for more than one year.[10] However, in 42 Comp. Gen. 272 (1962), the type of requirements contract involved in A-60589 was distinguished from a three-year "requirements" contract for equipment and services to maintain an Air Force base at Wake Island, to be funded from an annual appropriation of the first contract year, on the grounds that, under the Wake Island contract, the need for the equipment and services was certain to arise as long as the base remained open. The Wake Island contract was held to violate not only the bona fide needs rule but the Antideficiency Act as well.

Both decisions—42 Comp. Gen. 272 and A-60589—were discussed several years later in 48 Comp. Gen. 497 (1969), in which the Comptroller General stated:

"For the reasons stated in 42 Comp. Gen. 272, we are not convinced that the decision of July 12, 1935, A-60589, permitting requirements contracts under fiscal year appropriations to cover 1-year periods extending beyond the end of the fiscal year is technically correct. Since that practice, however, has been followed for over 30 years apparently in reliance upon the July 12, 1935, decision, no objection will be made to its continuance." Id. at 500.

If, however, a variable quantity contract does not include the requirement not to purchase the items elsewhere and does not guarantee a minimum purchase, then there is really no "contract" and obligations arise only as orders are actually placed. A given payment must be charged to the fiscal year in which the order creating the obligation was definitely placed. See 60 Comp. Gen. 219 (1981).

5. Services Rendered Beyond the Fiscal Year

Services are generally viewed as chargeable to the appropriation current at the time the services are rendered. E.g., 38 Comp. Gen. 316 (1958) (salaries of government employees). However, a need may arise in one fiscal year for services which, by their nature, cannot be separated for performance in separate fiscal years. The Comptroller General has held that the question of whether to charge the appropriation current on the date the contract is made,

[10]A-60589 was also based in part on 41 U.S.C. § 13, which prohibits the making of contracts for "stationery or other supplies" for terms in excess of one year. See, e.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 155, 159 (1957), stating that "[w]hen a continuing supply of materials is needed over a period of time, the contract term may not exceed one year, and only the needs of the first fiscal year may be considered a bona fide need of the year in which the contract is made." Most agencies are now exempt from 41 U.S.C. § 13. See 63 Comp. Gen. 129, 135 (1983).

or to charge funds current at the time the services are rendered, depends upon whether the services are "severable" or "entire."

"The fact that the contract covers a part of two fiscal years does not necessarily mean that payments thereunder are for splitting between the two fiscal years involved upon the basis of services actually performed during each fiscal year. In fact, the general rule is that the fiscal year appropriation current at the time the contract is made is chargeable with payments under the contract, although performance thereunder may extend into the ensuing fiscal year."

23 Comp. Gen. 370, 371 (1943). A contract which is viewed as "entire" is chargeable to the fiscal year in which it was made, notwithstanding that performance may have extended into the following fiscal year. The determining factor for whether services are severable or entire appears to be whether they represent a single undertaking. Thus, in 23 Comp. Gen. 370, a contract for the cultivation and protection of a tract of rubber-bearing plants, payable upon the completion of the services, was chargeable against fiscal year funds for the year in which the contract was made. Because the services necessarily covered the entire growing period which extended into the following fiscal year, the Comptroller General characterized them as a single undertaking which "although extending over a part of two fiscal years, nevertheless was determinable both as to the services needed and the price to be paid therefor at the time the contract was entered into." Id. at 371.

The rationale of 23 Comp. Gen. 370 was applied in 59 Comp. Gen. 386 (1980) (requisition for printing accompanied by manuscript sufficient for Government Printing Office to proceed with job). See also 65 Comp. Gen. 741 (1986) (contract for study and final report on psychological problems among Vietnam veterans); 10 Comp. Dec. 284 (1903).

However, where the services are continuing and recurring in nature, the contract is severable and the services must be charged to the fiscal year(s) in which they are rendered. 65 Comp. Gen. at 743; 33 Comp. Gen. 90 (1953) (trucking services). As stated in 33 Comp. Gen. at 92:

"The need for current services, such as those covered by the contract here under consideration, arises only from day to day, or month to month, and the Government cannot, in the absence of specific legislative authorization, be obligated for such services by any contract running beyond the fiscal year."

See also 35 Comp. Gen. 319 (1955), modified by B-125444, February 16, 1956 (gardening and window cleaning services). Service contracts which are "severable" may not cross fiscal year lines unless authorized by statute. 58 Comp. Gen. 321, 324 (1979); B-192518, August 9, 1979; B-133001, March 9, 1979; B-187881, October 3, 1977.

Another factor identified in some of the decisions is whether the services are viewed as personal or nonpersonal. Personal services are presumptively severable by their nature and are properly chargeable to the fiscal year in which the services are rendered. B-187881, October 3, 1977 (overseas school teachers with employment contracts); B-174226, March 13, 1972 (performance on an evaluation team). Legal services have been viewed as either personal or nonpersonal, depending on the nature of the work to be done. B-122596, February 18, 1955; B-122228, December 23, 1954.

The distinction appears to have derived from the distinction between services performed under an employer-employee relationship (personal) and those performed under an independent contractor relationship (nonpersonal). In the context of applying the bona fide needs rule, however, the distinction is not particularly useful since it is still necessary to look at the nature of the services involved in the particular case. In other words, characterizing services as personal or nonpersonal does not provide you with an automatic answer. In fact some of the more recent cases have merely considered the nature of the work without characterizing it as personal or nonpersonal, which would have added nothing to the analysis. E.g., 50 Comp. Gen. 589 (1971) (fees of attorneys appointed under Criminal Justice Act chargeable to appropriations current at time of appointment); B-224702, August 5, 1987 (contract for legal support services held severable since it consisted primarily of clerical tasks and required no final report or end product).

Research may also be severable or nonseverable, depending on the particular facts. See B-235678, July 30, 1990. A contract for cancer research services viewed as an "entire job" was found nonseverable in B-141839-O.M., May 2, 1960. In 64 Comp. Gen. 359 (1985), biomedical research grants awarded by the National Institutes of Health were held severable because they represented continuous, ongoing work and did not contemplate a required outcome or end product.

A 1981 decision applied the above principles to agreements made by the Small Business Administration with private organizations to provide technical and management assistance to businesses eligible for assistance under the Small Business Act. The typical agreement covered one calendar year and crossed fiscal year lines. Under the agreement, payment was to be made only for completed tasks and SBA was under no obligation to place any orders, or to place all orders with any given contractor. The question was whether the "contract" was chargeable to the fiscal year in which it was executed. The Comptroller General found that the services involved were clearly severable and that the agreement was not really a contract since it lacked mutuality of obligation. Accordingly, SBA created a contract obligation only when it placed a definite order, and each fiscal year could be charged only with obligations incurred during that fiscal year. 60 Comp. Gen. 219 (1981). The principles were reiterated in 61 Comp. Gen. 184 (1981).

In another 1981 case, GAO considered the District of Columbia's recording of obligations for social security disability medical examinations. A person seeking to establish eligibility for disability benefits is given an appointment for a medical examination and a purchase order is issued at that time. However, for a number of reasons beyond the District's control, the examination may not take place until the following fiscal year (for example, person makes application at end of fiscal year or does not show up for initial appointment). Nevertheless, the need for the examination arises when the applicant presents his or her claim for disability benefits. The decision concluded that the obligation occurs when the purchase order is issued and is chargeable to that fiscal year. 60 Comp. Gen. 452 (1981).

Training tends to be nonseverable. Thus, where a training obligation is incurred in one fiscal year, the entire cost is chargeable to that year, regardless of the fact that performance may extend into the following year. B-233243, August 3, 1989; B-213141-O.M., March 29, 1984. In 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-238940, February 25, 1991), training which began on the first day of FY 1990 was held chargeable to 1989 appropriations where the training had been identified as a need for 1989, scheduling was beyond the agency's control, and the time between procurement and performance was not excessive. If some particular training were severable (it is not entirely clear when this might be the case), the contract could not cross fiscal year lines and payment would have to be apportioned between the fiscal years in which the training is actually conducted. See 34 Comp. Gen. 432 (1955).

A "level-of-effort" contract is a type of cost-reimbursement contract in which the scope of work is defined in general terms, with the contractor being obligated to provide a specified level of effort (e.g., a specified number of person-hours) for a stated time period. Federal Acquisition Regulation, 48 C.F.R. § 16.306(d)(2). Level-of-effort contracts may be severable or nonseverable. The determination is based not on the contract type but on the nature of the work being performed, and is, in the first instance, the responsibility of the contracting agency. B-235678, July 30, 1990. A 1985 case, 65 Comp. Gen. 154, had implied that all level-of-effort contracts were severable by definition (id. at 156), and to that extent was modified by B-235678.

As a final thought, there is a fairly simple test which is often helpful in determining whether a given service is severable or nonseverable. Suppose that a service contract is to be performed half in one fiscal year and half in the next. Suppose further that the contract is terminated at the end of the first fiscal year and is not renewed. What do you have? In the case of a window-cleaning contract, you have half of your windows clean, a benefit which is not diminished by the fact that the other half is still dirty. What you paid for the first half has not been wasted. These services are clearly severable. Now consider a contract to conduct a study and prepare a final report, as in 65 Comp. Gen. 741 (1986). If this one is terminated halfway through, you essentially have nothing. The partial results of an incomplete study, while perhaps beneficial in some ethereal sense, do not do you very much good when what you needed was the complete study and report. Or suppose the contract is to repair a broken frammis. If the repairs are not completed, certainly some work has been done but you still don't have an operational frammis. The latter two examples are nonseverable.

6. Replacement Contracts

In an early decision, the Comptroller of the Treasury was asked whether fiscal year 1902 funds originally obligated under a contract but unexpended because of contractor default could be used in the following year to continue the original object of the contract. The Comptroller stated:

REV_00257094

"A contract was properly made within the fiscal year 1902, and it would seem that any part of the consideration of that contract which failed of use owing to the default of the contractor could still be used in carrying out the object of the original contract within the meaning of [31 U.S.C. § 1502(a)]. Appropriations are made to be used and not to be defeated in their use, and it would be a narrow construction to hold that a default on a properly made contract would prevent the use of the appropriation for the object for which it was made and for carrying out which the contract was executed."

9 Comp. Dec. 10, 11 (1902). This marked the beginning of the replacement contract theory.

The rule in its traditional form is well-settled, that where it becomes necessary to terminate a contract because of the contractor's default, the funds obligated under the original contract are available, beyond their original period of obligational availability, for the purpose of engaging another contractor to complete the unfinished work. 60 Comp. Gen. 591 (1981); 55 Comp. Gen. 1351 (1976); 44 Comp. Gen. 623 (1965); 40 Comp. Gen. 590 (1961); 32 Comp. Gen. 565 (1953); 2 Comp. Gen. 130 (1922); 21 Comp. Dec. 107 (1914); B-160834, April 7, 1967; B-105555, September 26, 1951; A-22134, April 12, 1928.

Implicit in the rule is the premise that the original contract validly obligated then-current funds. See 34 Comp. Gen. 239 (1954). In addition, the rule is based on the notion that the default termination does not eliminate the bona fide need of the fiscal year in which the original contract was executed. 44 Comp. Gen. 399, 401 (1965). Accordingly, the replacement contract seeks only to meet the pre-existing and continuing need.

In order for funds to remain available beyond expiration for a replacement contract, three conditions must be met:

- A bona fide need for the work, supplies, or services must have existed when the original contract was executed, and it must continue to exist up to the award of the replacement contract. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 1351, 1353 (1976); 34 Comp. Gen. 239, 240 (1954). If a terminated contract is found to have been improperly made to fulfill a need of a fiscal year other than the year against which the obligation was recorded, it would also be improper to charge that same appropriation for obligations incident to a replacement contract. 35 Comp. Gen. 692 (1956).

Availability of Appropriations: Purpose

A. General Principles

1. Introduction: 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a)

This chapter introduces the concept of the "availability" of appropriations. The decisions are often stated in terms of whether appropriated funds are or are not "legally available" for a given obligation or expenditure. This is simply another way of saying that a given item is or is not a legal expenditure. Whether appropriated funds are legally available for something depends on three things:

(1) The purpose of the obligation or expenditure must be authorized;

(2) The obligation must occur within the time limits applicable to the appropriation; and

(3) The obligation and expenditure must be within the amounts Congress has established.

Thus, there are three elements to the concept of availability: purpose, time, and amount. All three must be observed for the obligation or expenditure to be legal. Availability as to time and amount will be covered in Chapters 5 and 6. This chapter discusses availability as to purpose.

One of the most fundamental statutes dealing with the use of appropriated funds is 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a):

> "Appropriations shall be applied only to the objects for which the appropriations were made except as otherwise provided by law."

Simple, concise, and direct, this statute was originally enacted in 1809 (2 Stat. 535) and is one of the cornerstones of congressional control over the federal purse. Since money cannot be paid from the Treasury except under an appropriation (U.S. Const. art. I, § 9, cl. 7), and since an appropriation must be derived from an act of Congress, it is for Congress to determine the purposes for which an appropriation may be used. Simply stated, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) says that public funds may be used only for the purpose or purposes for which they were appropriated. It prohibits charging authorized items to the wrong appropriation, and unauthorized items to any

Congress at least implicitly by the practice of legislating the occasional exception.

Purpose restrictions will commonly prohibit the use of funds for an item except "under specific statutory authority," or except under "an appropriation specifically available therefor," or similar language. The "specific authority" needed to create an exception in these situations need not be found in the appropriation act itself, but may be contained in authorizing or enabling legislation as long as it is clearly applicable to the appropriation sought to be charged. 23 Comp. Gen. 859 (1944); 16 Comp. Gen. 773 (1937). Of course, Congress is always free to legislate exceptions whether it has specifically reserved that prerogative to itself or not. Thus, an "unless otherwise authorized by law" clause largely restates what the law would be even without that language.

2. Attendance at Meetings and Conventions

Meetings have become a way of life in contemporary American society and the federal bureaucracy is no exception. It seems that there are meetings on just about everything. Quite often they can be very useful. They can also be expensive. It is no surprise that lots of meetings are held in places like Honolulu and San Francisco. This section will explore when appropriated funds may be used to send people, government employees and others, to meetings. Congress has passed a number of statutes in this area and the cases usually involve the interpretation and application of the various statutory provisions. For purposes of this discussion, the term "meeting" includes other designations such as conference, congress, convention, seminar, symposium, and workshop; what the particular gathering is called is irrelevant.

a. Government Employees

(1) Statutory framework

To understand the law in this area, it is necessary to understand the interrelationship of several statutes. Listed in the order of their enactment, they are: 5 U.S.C. § 5946, 31 U.S.C. § 1345, 5 U.S.C. § 4109, and 5 U.S.C. § 4110. This interrelationship is best seen by outlining the statutory evolution.

The first piece of legislation was enacted in 1912. As relevant here, section 8 of the Act of June 26, 1912, 37 Stat. 139, 184, prohibited the payment, without specific statutory authority, of the expenses

- The replacement contract must not exceed the scope of the original contract. If it does, it is a new obligation and must be charged to funds currently available for obligation at the time the replacement contract is entered into. E.g., 44 Comp. Gen. 399 (1965); B-181176-O.M., June 26, 1974.
- The replacement contract must be awarded within a reasonable time after termination of the original contract. E.g., 60 Comp. Gen. 591, 593 (1981). Excessive delay raises the presumption that the original contract was not intended to meet a then-existing bona fide need. The same result may follow if there is unwarranted delay in terminating the original contract. 32 Comp. Gen. 565 (1953).

At one time, the replacement contract rule was mostly (but not exclusively) limited to the default situation. E.g., 24 Comp. Gen. 555 (1945) (overruled by 55 Comp. Gen. 1351 (1976)). It has, however, been expanded. Thus, in 34 Comp. Gen. 239 (1954), a default termination was found to be erroneous and was converted to a termination for convenience by agreement of the parties to permit settlement of the contractor's claim for damages. The decision held that, in view of the original termination, the funds originally obligated were available for the timely execution of a new contract for the performance of the unfinished work.[11] A further question in that case was whether the replacement contract rule was affected by the newly-enacted 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a), which requires that contractual obligations be supported by a binding agreement in writing executed prior to expiration of the appropriation's availability. No problem, the decision noted, since the original contract met these requirements. Id. at 241.

More recently, a contract for flooring repairs was awarded in FY 1975 obligating FY 1975 funds, conditioned upon a determination from the Small Business Administration that the contractor qualified as a small business. The SBA found the contractor not to be a small business. Concluding that the original award was sufficient to support an obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a), the Comptroller General applied the replacement contract rule and held that the [11]A 1981 case, 60 Comp. Gen. 591, drew a distinction based on whether the awarding of the replacement contract preceded or followed the conversion, suggesting that the original obligation was extinguished in the latter situation, the precise sequence involved in 34 Comp. Gen. 239. Although 60 Comp. Gen. 591 cites 34 Comp. Gen. 239 several times, it does not address this point. Especially in view of later decisions, the distinction would not appear relevant. See 68 Comp. Gen. 158 (1988).

funds obligated for the contract in FY 1975 could be used to resolicit in FY 1976. 55 Comp. Gen. 1351 (1976).

In 66 Comp. Gen. 625 (1987), however, the Comptroller General declined to extend the rule in a situation involving a voluntary modification reducing the scope of a contract. The Navy had contracted for the construction of 12 ships. The contractor encountered financial difficulties and filed for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Act under which the contractor could, with court approval, reject the contract. To avert this possibility, the Navy agreed to a contract modification which, among other things, reduced the number of ships to be provided from 12 to 10. The question was whether the funds originally obligated for the two ships deleted by the modification were available post-expiration to fund a reprocurement. GAO concluded that they were not, because there had been no default, nor was there an actual rejection under the Bankruptcy Code. "[T]he modification was an essentially voluntary act on the part of the Navy, and as such is beyond the scope of the replacement contract rule." Id. at 627. Therefore, any replacement contract for the two deleted ships would have to be charged to appropriations current at the time it was made.

Cases involving the termination of erroneously or improperly awarded contracts have been less than consistent, although a clear direction now appears evident. The earliest decisions applied the replacement contract rule. Thus, 17 Comp. Gen. 1098 (1938) held, without much discussion, that funds obligated by an award to a bidder subsequently determined not to have been the low bidder could be used for an award to the otherwise low bidder in the following fiscal year. In a 1953 case, a contract had to be partially canceled because the contractor's bid had not conformed to the advertised specifications. GAO noted that "the obligating instrument was legally defective in such a way as to render the contract voidable at the election of the Government," but nevertheless applied the replacement contract rule. B-116131, October 19, 1953. See also B-89019, May 31, 1950.

GAO's position seemed to change with the enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) in 1954, on the theory that a contract award found to be invalid did not constitute a binding agreement so as to support a recordable obligation. 38 Comp. Gen. 190 (1958); B-118428, September 21, 1954, overruling B-116131 and B-89019. However, B-116131 was at least arguably "reinstated" by B-152033, May 27,

1964, which followed both the "voidable at the election of the government" rationale and the result of B-116131, without citing either it or the case which presumably overruled it. See also B-173244(2), August 10, 1972; B-158261, March 9, 1966. This latter group of cases was in turn cited with approval in 55 Comp. Gen. 1351, 1353 (1976).

The apparent direction indicated by 55 Comp. Gen. 1351 and the cases it cited was called into question by statements in 60 Comp. Gen. 591 (1981) to the effect that the replacement contract rule does not apply to terminations for the convenience of the government, whether initiated by the contracting agency or on recommendation of some other body such as GAO. Of course, the typical situation in which a replacement contract is needed following a termination for convenience is where the original contract is found to have been improperly awarded. An important clarification occurred in 68 Comp. Gen. 158 (1988), which modified 60 Comp. Gen. 591 and held the replacement contract rule applicable where a contract must be terminated for convenience, without a prior default termination, pursuant to a determination by competent administrative or judicial authority (court, board of contract appeals, GAO) that the contract award was improper. As noted previously, the bona fide need of the original contract must continue, and the replacement contract must be made without undue delay after the original contract is terminated and must be awarded on the same basis as, and be substantially similar in scope and size to, the original contract.

Logically and inevitably, the next question would be why the rule shouldn't be the same regardless of whether the defect leading to termination is determined by an external reviewing body or by the contracting agency itself. It should make no difference, GAO concluded in 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-238548, February 5, 1991). The essence of the problem—a legal impropriety in the procurement process requiring corrective action—is no different. Thus, the replacement contract rule, with its attendant conditions, applies where the contracting agency determines that a contract award was improper and terminates the contract for the convenience of the government, provided there is clear evidence that the award was erroneous and the agency documents its determination with appropriate findings of fact and law. 7. Contract Modifications and Amendments Affecting Price

Contract performance may extend over several years. During this time, the contract may be modified or amended for a variety of reasons at the instigation of either party. An amendment within the general scope of the contract which does not increase the contract price remains an obligation of the year in which the contract was executed. B-68707, August 19, 1947. If the modification results in an increase in contract price and the appropriation charged with the original contract has expired for obligation purposes, the question from the bona fide needs perspective is which fiscal year to charge with the modification.

If the modification exceeds the general scope of the original contract, for example, by increasing the quantity of items to be delivered, the modification amounts to a new obligation and is chargeable to funds current at the time the modification is made. 37 Comp. Gen. 861 (1958); B-207433, September 16, 1983.

In the case of a contract for services which are severable, a modification providing for increased services must be charged to the fiscal year or years in which the services are rendered, applying the principles discussed in Section B.5. 61 Comp. Gen. 184 (1981), aff'd upon reconsideration, B-202222, August 2, 1983; B-224702, August 5, 1987. In 61 Comp. Gen. 184, for example, a contract to provide facilities and staff to operate a project camp was modified in the last month of FY 1980. The modification called for work to be performed in FY 1981. Regardless of whether the contract was viewed as a service contract or a contract to provide facilities, the modification did not meet a bona fide need of FY 1980. The modification amounted to a separate contract and could be charged only to FY 1981 funds, notwithstanding that it purported to modify a contract properly chargeable to FY 1980 funds.

For modifications within the general scope of the original contract, the situation is a bit more complicated. Most government contracts contain provisions which, under certain conditions, render the government liable to make equitable adjustments in the contract price. Such liability may arise due to changes in specifications, government-caused delay, changed conditions, increased overhead rates, etc. These conditions are set out in standard contract clauses such as the "Changes" clause, "Government Property" clause, or "Negotiated Overhead Rates" clause.

Because there is no way to know whether the government will actually incur liability under these provisions, and if so, the amount of such liability, until the occurrence of the specified conditions (cf. 50 Comp. Gen. 589, 591 (1971)), the appropriations charged with the cost of the contract are not firmly obligated to cover future price increases which arise due to the operation of these clauses. Nevertheless, as noted, government contracts frequently contemplate that performance will extend into subsequent fiscal years. When an upward price adjustment is necessitated in a subsequent year, the general approach is to ask whether the adjustment is attributable to "antecedent liability"—that is, whether it arises and is enforceable under a provision in the original contract. If the answer to this question is yes, then a within-scope price adjustment which is requested and approved in a subsequent fiscal year, for example, under the "Changes" clause, will—with one important qualification to be noted later—be charged against the appropriation current at the time the contract was originally executed. Cases supporting this proposition in various contexts are 59 Comp. Gen. 518 (1980); 23 Comp. Gen. 943 (1944); 21 Comp. Gen. 574 (1941); 18 Comp. Gen. 363 (1938); A-15225, September 24, 1926; B-146285-O.M., September 28, 1976.[12] See also B-197344, August 21, 1980, where supplemental work was done without issuance of a formal contract modification. This principle is occasionally referred to as the doctrine of "relation back." E.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 861, 863 (1958).

The reasoning is that a change order does not give rise to a new liability, but instead, only renders fixed and certain the amount of the government's pre-existing liability to adjust the contract price. Since that liability arises at the time the original contract is executed, the subsequent price adjustment is viewed as reflecting a bona fide need of the same year in which funds were obligated for payment of the original contract price. The concept was stated as follows in 23 Comp. Gen. 943, 945 (1944):

"It is true that at the time the contract was executed it was not known that there would, in fact, be any changes ordered . . . for which the contractor would be entitled to be paid an amount in addition to amounts otherwise payable under the contract. Also, it is true that [the Changes clause] contemplates the execution of amendments to the contract from time to time covering such changes. However, the fact remains that the obligations and liabilities of the parties respecting such changes are fixed by the terms of the original contract, and the various amendments merely render definite and liquidated the extent of the Government's liability in connection with such changes."

[12]Similarly, costs incurred under a termination for convenience are chargeable to the appropriation originally obligated for the contract. B-203074, August 6, 1981.

In order to avoid over-obligating the original appropriation, the contracting officer must estimate the expected net additional obligations to insure that available appropriations are not committed to other purposes. E.g., 61 Comp. Gen. 609, 612 (1982); B-192036, September 11, 1978. It is also true, however, that estimated liabilities of this type require constant review to insure that appropriations do not remain encumbered in excess of the amounts which will actually be needed to meet the total liability under the contract.

For contracts spanning lengthy periods of time, funding of within-scope modifications involves the use of expired appropriations. As discussed later in this chapter, the balances in expired accounts prior to closing are available without further congressional action. Thus, within-scope modifications can result in significant cost escalation with minimal congressional oversight.

Not all price adjustments arising from contract modifications or amendments represent a bona fide need of the year in which the agreement was made. If, as noted above, the change or amendment exceeds the general scope of the contract, or is not made pursuant to a provision in the original contract, then it is not based on any antecedent liability, in which event it may obligate only appropriations current at the time it is issued. 56 Comp. Gen. 414 (1977). See also 25 Comp. Gen. 332 (1945) (purported change order issued after completion of contract, covering work contractor was not legally bound to do under original contract, amounted to new contract).

As noted above, there is an important exception or qualification to the antecedent liability rule. In cost reimbursement contracts, discretionary cost increases (i.e., increases which are not enforceable by the contractor) which exceed funding ceilings established by the contract may be charged to funds currently available when the discretionary increase is granted by the contracting officer. 61 Comp. Gen. 609 (1982). It would be unreasonable, the decision pointed out, to require the contracting officer to reserve funds in anticipation of increases beyond the contract's ceiling. Id. at 612. Changes which do not exceed the stipulated ceiling continue to be chargeable to funds available when the contract was originally made (id. at 611), as do amounts for final overhead in excess of the ceiling where the contractor has an enforceable right to those amounts (id. at 612). Since prior decisions such as 59 Comp. Gen. 518 had not drawn the below-ceiling/above-ceiling distinction, 61 Comp. Gen. 609 modified them to that extent. A more recent case applying 61 Comp. Gen. 609 is 65 Comp. Gen. 741 (1986).

Once an account has been closed (generally five fiscal years after the expiration of obligational availability), questions of antecedent liability or relation back are no longer relevant since account balances upon closing cease to be available for any purpose and only current funds may be used, up to specified limits, for such obligations. 31 U.S.C. §§ 1552 and 1553, as amended by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1405(a), 104 Stat. 1485, 1676 (1990).

For contract changes which would require the contractor to perform additional work, as opposed to increases under an escalation clause or to pay claims, the use of expired fixed-year appropriations is subject to two approval requirements. If a proposed contract change chargeable to an expired account would cause a cumulative increase of more than $4 million during a fiscal year for contract changes for the relevant program, project, or activity, the obligation must be approved by the agency head or by an official within the agency head's immediate office to whom the authority has been delegated. If the cumulative increase would exceed $25 million, the agency head must report the proposed obligation to the relevant authorizing committees and the appropriations committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, and must defer making the obligation for 30 days after submitting the report. 31 U.S.C. § 1553(c), as amended by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1405(a), 104 Stat. at 1677 (1990).

8. Multi-Year Contracts

Any discussion of multi-year contracting must inevitably combine the bona fide needs rule with material from Chapter 6 on the Antideficiency Act and from Chapter 7 on obligations.

The term "multi-year contract" has been used in a variety of situations to describe a variety of contracts touching more than one fiscal year. To prevent confusion, we think it is important to start by establishing a working definition. A multi-year contract, as we will use the term in this discussion, is a contract covering the requirements of more than one fiscal year.[13] A contract for the needs of the current year, even though performance may extend over several years, is not a "multi-year contract." Thus, a contract to construct a ship which will take 3 years to complete is not a multi-year contract; a contract to begin constructing one ship a year for the next 3 years is.

Multi-year contracting, like most things in life, has advantages and disadvantages. Some of the potential benefits are:[14]

- Multi-year contracting can reduce costs by permitting the contractor to amortize nonrecurring "start up" costs over the life of the contract. Without multi-year authority, the contractor may insist on recovering these costs under the one-year contract (since there is no guarantee of getting future contracts), thus resulting in increased unit prices.
- Multi-year contracting may enhance quality by reducing the uncertainty of continued government business and enabling the contractor to maintain a stable work force.
- Multi-year contracting may increase competition by enabling small businesses to compete in situations where nonrecurring start-up costs would otherwise limit competition to larger concerns.

However, the situation is not one-sided. Multi-year contracting authority also has potential disadvantages:[15]

- Competition may decrease because there will be fewer opportunities to bid.
- A contractor who is able to amortize start-up costs in a multi-year contract has, in effect, a government-funded competitive price advantage over new contractors in subsequent solicitations. This could evolve into a sole-source posture.

[13]This is essentially the same as the definition in the Federal Acquisition Regulation, "contracts covering more than 1-year's but not in excess of 5-year's [sic] requirements, unless otherwise authorized by statute." 48 C.F.R. § 17.101.

[14]S. Rep. No. 98-417, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 4-8 (1984). This is a report by the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs on a bill (S. 2300) designed to extend limited multi-year contracting authority to civilian agencies. The legislation was not enacted.

[15]H.R. Rep. No. 97-71, Part 3, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 21 (1981) (report of the House Committee on Government Operations on the 1982 Defense Department authorization bill).

- Being locked into a contract for several years is not always desirable, particularly where the alternative is to incur cancellation charges which could offset initial savings.

An agency may use multi-year contracting only (1) if it has no-year funds or multiple-year funds covering the entire term of the contract, or (2) under specific statutory authority. 67 Comp. Gen. 190, 192 (1988); B-171277, April 2, 1971 (multi-year contract permissible under no-year trust fund); Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR), 48 C.F.R. § 17.102-1(a). To restate this, an agency may enter into a multi-year contract with fiscal year appropriations (or for a term exceeding the period of availability of a multiple-year appropriation) only if it has specific statutory authority to do so. Thus far, Congress has seen fit to grant this authority sparingly.

If neither of the above situations applies, a multi-year contract violates several statutory funding restrictions, including the Antideficiency Act and the bona fide need statute (31 U.S.C. § 1502(a)). E.g., 67 Comp. Gen. 190 (1988); 66 Comp. Gen. 556 (1987); 64 Comp. Gen. 359 (1985); 48 Comp. Gen. 497 (1969); 42 Comp. Gen. 272 (1962); 27 Op. Att'y Gen. 584 (1909). Multi-year commitments were found illegal in various contexts in each of these cases, although each case does not necessarily discuss each funding statute. See also FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 17.102-1(a).

In 42 Comp. Gen. 272, for example, the Air Force had awarded a three-year contract for aircraft maintenance, troop billeting, and base management services on Wake Island. The Air Force contended that no funds were obligated under 31 U.S.C. § 1501 until requisitions were issued, thereby exempting the contract from the statutory funding restrictions. However, the Comptroller General refused to adopt this characterization of the contract as, in effect, a requirements contract. Although the contractor had expressly agreed to perform only services for which he had received the contracting officer's order, GAO found that there was no need for an administrative determination that requirements existed, since the contract services were "automatic incidents of the use of the air field." Id. at 277. Only a decision to close the base would eliminate the requirements. Consequently, the contract was found to be an unauthorized multi-year contract.

If an agency is contracting with fiscal year appropriations and does not have multi-year contracting authority, the only authorized course of action, apart from a series of separate fiscal-year contracts, is a fiscal-year contract with renewal options, with each renewal option (1) contingent on the availability of future appropriations, and (2) to be exercised only by affirmative action on the part of the government (as opposed to automatic renewal unless the government refuses). Leiter v. United States, 271 U.S. 204 (1926); 67 Comp. Gen. 190 (1988); 66 Comp. Gen. 556 (1987); 36 Comp. Gen. 683 (1957); 33 Comp. Gen. 90 (1953); 29 Comp. Gen. 91 (1949); 28 Comp. Gen. 553 (1949); B-88974, November 10, 1949. Thus, in 42 Comp. Gen. 272, the Comptroller General, while advising the Air Force that under the circumstances it could complete that particular contract, also advised that the proper course of action would be either to use an annual contract with renewal options or to obtain specific multi-year authority from Congress. Id. at 278.

Statutory authority for multi-year contracting with annual funds does exist in certain situations. For example, the military departments are authorized by 10 U.S.C. §§ 2306(g) and (h) to enter into multi-year contracts for periods of not more than five years if certain administrative determinations are made. Subsection (g), enacted in response to the Wake Island decision (see 67 Comp. Gen. 190, 193 (1988)), applies to such things as installation maintenance and support, maintenance or modification of aircraft and other complex military equipment, specialized training, and base services. Subsection (h) extends the concept to the acquisition of weapon systems and associated items and services. If funds are not made available for continuation in a subsequent fiscal year, cancellation or termination costs may be paid from appropriations originally available for the contract, appropriations currently available for the same general purpose, or appropriations made specifically for those payments. 10 U.S.C. §§ 2306(g)(3), (h)(5). Subsection (g) is also available to the Coast Guard and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. 10 U.S.C. § 2303(a).

A multi-year contract entered into under authority of 10 U.S.C. § 2306 is binding on both parties for the full term of the contract unless terminated as provided in the statute. Beta Systems, Inc. v. United States, 838 F.2d 1179, 1183 n.2 (Fed. Cir. 1988); Beta Systems v. United States, 16 Cl. Ct. 219, 228 (1989).

A contract under section 2306 must relate to the bona fide needs of the contract period. The statute does not authorize the advance of attendance of an individual at meetings or conventions of members of a society or association. With exceptions to be noted below, this statute is now found at 5 U.S.C. § 5946. For the most part, it has always been viewed as applying to attendance by federal employees at non-federally sponsored meetings. See, e.g., B-140912, November 24, 1959.

There were many early cases under the 1912 statute. Since the prohibition is directed at meetings of a "society or association," other types of meetings were not covered. Thus, the Federal Power Commission could, if determined to be in the furtherance of authorized activities, send a representative to the World Power Conference (in Basle, Switzerland) since it was not a meeting of a "society or association." 5 Comp. Gen. 834 (1926). Similarly, the statute did not prohibit travel by United States Attorneys "to attend a conference of attorneys not banded together into a society or association, but called together for one meeting only for conference in a matter bearing directly on their official duties." 1 Comp. Gen. 546 (1922).

However, if a given gathering was viewed as a meeting or convention of a society or association, the expenses were consistently disallowed. E.g., 16 Comp. Gen. 252 (1936); 5 Comp. Gen. 599 (1926), affirmed by 5 Comp. Gen. 746 (1926); 3 Comp. Gen. 883 (1924). GAO often told agencies in those days that if they thought attendance would be in the interest of the government, they should present the matter to Congress. E.g., 5 Comp. Gen. at 747. In fact Congress granted specific authority to a number of agencies (for an example, see B-136324, August 1, 1958), and later, as will be seen below, enacted general legislation which renders 5 U.S.C. § 5946, as it relates to attendance at meetings, of very limited applicability.

The next congressional venture in this field was Public Resolution No. 2, 74th Congress, 49 Stat. 19 (1935), aimed primarily at restricting the use of appropriated funds to pay expenses of nongovernment persons at conventions. This statute, now codified at 31 U.S.C. § 1345, provides in relevant part:

"Except as specifically provided by law, an appropriation may not be used for travel, transportation, and subsistence expenses for a meeting. This section does not prohibit—

"(1) an agency from paying the expenses of an officer or employee of the United States Government carrying out an official duty; . . . ."

procurement of materials not needed during the 5-year term of the contract. 64 Comp. Gen. 163 (1984); B-215825-O.M., November 7, 1984. Cf. 35 Comp. Gen. 220 (1955).

Another example of statutory authority for multi-year contracting is 40 U.S.C. § 481(a)(3), which authorizes contracts for public utility services for periods not exceeding ten years. The purpose of the statute is to enable the government to take advantage of discounts offered under long-term contracts. 62 Comp. Gen. 569, 572 (1983); 35 Comp. Gen. 220, 222-23 (1955). For purposes of applying this statute, the nature of the product or service and not the nature of the provider is the governing factor. Thus, the statute applies to obtaining utility services from other than a "traditional" form of public utility. 62 Comp. Gen. 569. When entering into a contract under 40 U.S.C. § 481(a)(3), the contracting agency need have sufficient budget authority only to obligate the first year's costs. 62 Comp. Gen. at 572; 44 Comp. Gen. 683, 687-88 (1965).

In contrast, if an agency does not have specific multi-year contracting authority but is using a multi-year contract solely under authority of a multiple-year or no-year appropriation, it has been held that the full contract amount must be obligated. B-195260, July 11, 1979. However, GAO approved the incremental funding of a multi-year contract using no-year funds in 43 Comp. Gen. 657 (1964). Under the scheme involved in that case, funds would be made available, and obligated, on a year-by-year basis, together with a "commitment" to cover maximum cancellation costs. The cancellation costs represented amortized start-up costs, which would be adjusted downward each year. Thus, funds would be available to cover the government's maximum potential liability in each year. See also 62 Comp. Gen. 143 (1983) (similar approach for long-term vessel charters under Navy Industrial Fund); 51 Comp. Gen. 598, 604 (1972) (same); 48 Comp. Gen. 497, 502 (1960) (either obligational approach acceptable under revolving fund).[16] (As we will see later, this type of arrangement under a fiscal-year appropriation presents problems.)

Other examples of specific multi-year authority are 40 U.S.C. § 490(h), which authorizes the General Services Administration to enter into leases for periods of up to 20 years; 40 U.S.C. § 757(c), [16]While 43 Comp. Gen. 657 had used the somewhat cryptic term "commitment," the three subsequent decisions require the actual obligation of the cancellation costs.

which authorizes GSA to use the Information Technology Fund for contracts of up to five years for information technology hardware, software, or services; and 10 U.S.C. § 2828(d), under which the military departments may lease family housing units in foreign countries for periods of up to 10 years, to be paid from annual appropriations.

Multi-year arrangements may be permissible without specific statutory authority if they are structured in such a way as not to violate the Antideficiency Act or the bona fide needs rule. An example was discussed in 63 Comp. Gen. 129 (1983). The General Services Administration proposed using 3-year "Multiple Award Schedule" contracts for Federal Supply Schedule items. There was no commitment to order any specific quantity of items. Rather, the commitment was for an agency with a requirement for a scheduled item to order it from the contractor if the contractor has offered the lowest price. If an agency found the item elsewhere for less than the contract price, it was free to procure the item from that other source without violating the contract. Since entering into the MAS contracts did not require the obligation of funds, there was no violation of statutory funding restrictions. Obligations would occur only when agencies placed specific orders, presumably using funds currently available to them at that time.[17]

Also, contracts which do not require the expenditure of appropriated funds are not subject to the same fiscal year strictures. E.g., 10 Comp. Gen. 407 (1931) (no legal objection to multi-year leases or contracts for the operation of concessions on federal property).

In a one-year contract with renewal options, the contractor can never be sure whether the renewal options will be exercised, thereby enabling the contractor to amortize initial investment costs. To protect against this possibility, contractors occasionally seek to provide for a contract termination penalty equal to the unamortized balance of initial investment costs if the government fails to renew the contract for any fiscal year. However, the Comptroller General has held that these provisions contravene the bona fide needs rule:

[17]Although the MAS proposal was similar to the proposal considered in A-60589, July 12, 1935, discussed above in Section B.4, GSA had since been exempted from the one-year requirement of 41 U.S.C. § 13. See 63 Comp. Gen. at 135.

"The theory behind such obligations (covering amortized facility costs unrecovered at time of termination) has been that a need existed during the fiscal year the contracts were made for the productive plant capacity represented by the new facilities which were to be built by the contractor to enable him to furnish the supplies called for by the contracts. After thorough consideration of the matter, we believe that such obligations cannot be justified on the theory of a present need for productive capacity.

". . . The real effect of the termination liability is to obligate the Commission to purchase a certain quantity of magnesium during each of five successive years or to pay damages for its failure to do so. In other words, the termination charges represent a part of the price of future, as distinguished from current, deliveries and needs under the contract, and for that reason such charges are not based on a current fiscal year need."

Attempts to impose penalty charges for early termination (sometimes called "separate charges") have occurred in a number of cases involving automated data processing (ADP) procurements. In one case, a competitor for a contract to acquire use of an ADP system for a 65-month period proposed to include a provision under which the government would be assessed a penalty if it failed to exercise its annual renewal options. The Comptroller General noted that the penalty was clearly intended to recapitalize the contractor for its investment based upon the full life of the system in the event the government did not continue using the equipment. Accordingly, he concluded that the penalty did not reasonably relate to the value of the equipment's use during the fiscal year in which it would be levied. The penalty charges would, therefore, not be based on a bona fide need of the current fiscal year and their payment would violate statutory funding restrictions. 56 Comp. Gen. 142 (1976), aff'd, 56 Comp. Gen. 505 (1977). See also 56 Comp. Gen. 167 (1976); B-190659, October 23, 1978.

One scheme, however, has been found to be legally sufficient to permit the government to realize the cost savings that may accrue through multi-year contracting. The plan approved by the Comptroller General in 48 Comp. Gen. 497, 501-02 (1969) provided for a one-year rental contract with an option to renew each subsequent year. If the government completed the full rental period by continuing the contract on a year-by-year basis, it would be entitled to have monthly rental credits applied during the final months of the rental period. The Comptroller General noted that:

"Under this arrangement the Government would not be obligated to continue the rental beyond the fiscal year in which made, or beyond any succeeding fiscal year, unless or until a purchase order is issued expressly continuing such rental during the following fiscal year. In effect, the company is proposing a one-year rental contract with option to renew. Also, under this proposal rental for any contract year would not exceed the lowest rental otherwise obtainable from [the contractor] for one fiscal year. We have no legal objection to this type of rental plan for ADP equipment."

GAO has recommended the enactment of legislation to authorize all federal agencies to engage in limited multi-year procurement. See GAO report Federal Agencies Should Be Given General Multiyear Contracting Authority for Supplies and Services, PSAD-78-54 (January 10, 1978). However, its use should be based on case-by-case assessments of the benefits and drawbacks noted previously. B-214545, August 7, 1985 (comments on proposed legislation).

9. Exceptions to the Bona Fide Needs Rule

Congress may, of course, grant exceptions from the bona fide needs requirement, either in general or for a particular agency or program, and may do so either in permanent legislation or in appropriation acts.

An example is 41 U.S.C. § 11a, which authorizes the Secretary of the Army "to incur obligations for fuel in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements for one year without regard to the current fiscal year," and to pay from appropriations either for the fiscal year in which the obligation is incurred or for the ensuing fiscal year. See 28 Comp. Gen. 614 (1949) (construing the term "fuel" in that statute to include gasoline and other petroleum fuel products).

Another example is 31 U.S.C. § 1308, which permits charges for telephone and other utility services for a time period beginning in one fiscal year and ending in another to be charged against appropriations current at the end of the covered time period.

C. Advance Payments

1. The Statutory Prohibition

Advance payments in general are prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 3324, which provides in part:

"(a) Except as provided in this section, a payment under a contract to provide a service or deliver an article for the United States Government may not be more than the value of the service already provided or the article already delivered.

"(b) An advance of public money may be made only if it is authorized by—

"(1) a specific appropriation or other law . . . ."

The quoted portion of 31 U.S.C. § 3324 is derived from legislation originally enacted in 1823 (3 Stat. 723).

The primary purpose of 31 U.S.C. § 3324 is to protect the government against the risk of non-performance—"to preclude the possibility of loss to the Government in the event a contractor—after receipt of payment—should fail to perform his contract or refuse or fail to refund moneys advanced." 25 Comp. Gen. 834, 835 (1946). See also 65 Comp. Gen. 806, 809 (1986); B-180713, April 10, 1974. Thus, in its simplest terms, the statute prohibits the government from paying for goods before they have been received or for services before they have been rendered. The Floyd Acceptances, 74 U.S. (7 Wall.) 666, 682 (1868); 10 Op. Att'y Gen. 288, 301 (1862). The statute has been described as "so plain that construction of it is unnecessary." 27 Comp. Dec. 885, 886 (1921). While that may be true if section 3324 is viewed in isolation, the situation today is nowhere near that simple. Advance payments are now permissible in a number of situations. What we now have is a basic statutory prohibition with a network of exceptions, both statutory and non-statutory, some of which are of major importance.

The advance payment statute permits exceptions, which may be found in appropriation acts or in "other law." Examples of specific exemptions are: 10 U.S.C. § 2396, 31 U.S.C. §§ 3324(b)(2) and (d), 19

U.S.C. §§ 2076–2078 and 2080. Numerous other statutory exemptions exist in various contexts. A major exception, discussed in Section C.2, permits advance and progress payments under procurement contracts in certain situations.

Another major exception exists in the case of grants. Since many grants by their nature anticipate payment in advance, it has been held that 31 U.S.C. § 3324 does not preclude advance funding in authorized grant relationships. 60 Comp. Gen. 208 (1981); 59 Comp. Gen. 424 (1980); 41 Comp. Gen. 394 (1961). There are, however, limitations on the advance funding of grants. For example, the grantee must establish or demonstrate the willingness and ability to establish procedures to minimize the time elapsing between the advance of funds and their disbursement by the grantee. These concepts are further explored in Chapter 10.

Advance payment problems may nevertheless arise in grant-related cases. Under the College Work-Study Program, a student is placed with an employer, which may be a federal agency. The student's salary is paid from two sources: 80 percent is paid by the college under a Department of Education grant, and the remaining 20 percent is paid by the employer. In one case, a proposal for the employing federal agency to pay 100 percent of the student's salary and to collect 80 percent from the college at a later date was found to violate 31 U.S.C. § 3324. B-159715, August 18, 1972. Several years later, a proposal for the agency/employer to advance its 20 percent share to the college which would in turn place the funds in an escrow account for payment to the student after the work was performed was similarly found to contravene 31 U.S.C. § 3324. 56 Comp. Gen. 567 (1977). In the latter decision, the Comptroller General rejected a suggestion that the proposed arrangement might be authorized by 41 U.S.C. § 255.

Payments to or on behalf of federal civilian employees and military personnel constitute another area in which exceptions exist. For example, section 303 of the Career Compensation Act of 1949, 37 U.S.C. § 404, authorizes advance payments of certain travel and transportation allowances to military personnel. The authority does not, however, extend to station housing allowances, 56 Comp. Gen. 180 (1976), nor does it authorize the advance payment of trailer allowances, 39 Comp. Gen. 659 (1960), or rental vehicle expenses, 54 Comp. Gen. 764 (1975). The advance payment statute has also been held to prohibit advances to a military member for the travel of dependents incident to the member's release from active duty. 40 Comp. Gen. 77 (1960). Advances of travel and transportation allowances for federal civilian employees are authorized by 5 U.S.C. §§ 5705 and 5724(f).

Prior to late 1990, the advance payment of salary, as opposed to the various allowances discussed in the preceding paragraph, remained prohibited, with a limited exception in 5 U.S.C. § 5522 for certain emergency or "national interest" evacuations. This situation caused occasional hardship for new employees resulting from delay in receiving their first regular paycheck. In 58 Comp. Gen. 646 (1979), GAO had concurred in a proposal to minimize this hardship by using imprest funds to make partial salary payments to new federal employees early in the week following the first week of employment, but cautioned that, in view of 31 U.S.C. § 3324, no payments could be made before the work had been performed. Section 107 of the Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990 (FEPCA), section 529 of the FY 1991 Treasury-Postal Service-General Government appropriation act, Pub. L. No. 101-509 (November 5, 1990), 104 Stat. 1389, 1449, added a new 5 U.S.C. § 5524a, authorizing agencies to make advance payments of up to two pay periods of basic pay to new employees.[18]

Advance payment of salary remains prohibited in situations not covered by the statutes noted above. Thus, GAO has advised that partial or emergency salary payments can be made if a salary check is lost in the mail or an electronic deposit goes astray, but must be subject to "advance payment" safeguards similar to those discussed in 58 Comp. Gen. 646. B-193867.2, January 12, 1990 (non-decision letter). Similarly, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission can reschedule its commissioners' pay days that fall on weekends or holidays to the preceding work day, provided that payments made prior to the end of a pay period may not include salary applicable to days remaining in the pay period. B-237963, June 28, 1990.

Certain tuition payments may be paid in advance. For example, legislation authorizing the Coast Guard to provide training for its personnel at private or state colleges and universities and to pay certain expenses including tuition was viewed as authorization by "other law" within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. § 3324. Tuition could therefore be paid at the time of enrollment if required by the educational institution. 41 Comp. Gen. 626 (1962). See also B-70395, October 30, 1947 (tuition payments by Public Health Service in connection with research fellowships); B-56585, May 1, 1946 (tuition payments by the [former] Veterans Administration in connection with schooling of veterans). Exceptions are also provided in the Government Employees Training Act, 5 U.S.C. § 4109, and in 10 U.S.C. § 2396(a)(3) for the Defense Department. (Military personnel are not covered by the Training Act.)

Exceptions to the advance payment prohibition may appear in appropriation acts as well as permanent legislation. An exception in an appropriation act will, of course, be limited to the appropriation(s) in the act to which it applies, unless it can be construed as permanent legislation. Also, the bona fide needs rule would apply. In one case, a FY 1955 appropriation for an Indian education program included authority for the Bureau of Indian Affairs to make certain payments in advance. The Comptroller General held that the funds could be obligated only for the bona fide needs of the period for which appropriated. Therefore, the advance payment authority was limited to the portion of the program to be furnished during FY 1955 and could not operate to extend the period of availability of the appropriation, i.e., could not be used to pay for portions of the program extending into FY 1956. 34 Comp. Gen. 432 (1955).[19] This principle would be equally applicable to advance payment authority contained in permanent legislation.

If a given situation does not fall within any existing exception, the statutory prohibition will apply. E.g., 65 Comp. Gen. 806 (1986) (advance payment for published advertisement); 64 Comp. Gen. 710 (1985) (advance payments under contract for office equipment maintenance found to violate statute notwithstanding Federal Supply Schedule contract language to the contrary).

[19]This case is cited for the limited purpose of illustrating that advance payment authority does not negate application of the bona fide needs rule. It does not illustrate the general application of the bona fide needs rule to training obligations. On the contrary, as noted earlier in this chapter, most training tends to be non-severable.

2. Government Procurement Contracts

a. Contract Financing

First, it is important to define a few terms. We take our definitions from the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR), 48 C.F.R. § 32.102. In the context of government contracting, "advance payments" are payments to a prime contractor "before, in anticipation of, and for the purpose of complete performance under one or more contracts." Advance payments are not measured by performance. "Progress payments" are payments made to the contractor as work progresses on the contract. They may be based on costs incurred by the contractor or a percentage or stage of completion. "Partial payments" are payments "for accepted supplies and services that are only a part of the contract requirements." Advance payments and progress payments based on costs incurred are regarded as forms of "contract financing." Partial payments and progress payments based on a percentage or stage of completion are viewed simply as payment methods.

Generally speaking, the government's preference is that the contractor be able to perform using private financing, i.e., the contractor's own resources or financing obtained in the private market. FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 32.106. However, the need for government assistance in various situations has long been recognized. In this context, it must be remembered that government contracting, while primarily intended to serve the government's needs, is also designed to foster a variety of social and economic objectives.

The extent to which various forms of what we now call "contract financing" are permissible under the advance payment statute was the subject of many early decisions. In one early case, the advance payment statute was applied to a question regarding the legality of government partial (progress) payments for materials which had not been delivered. The Comptroller General held that the statute does not necessarily require withholding of payment under a contract until the entire subject has been completed and delivered to the government. The statute "was not intended to prevent a partial payment in any case in which the amount of such payment had actually been earned by the contractor and the United States had received an equivalent therefor." 1 Comp. Gen. 143, 145 (1921). The partial payments proposed in that case were not in excess of the amount actually expended by the contractor in performance of the contract, and because the contract provided that title to all property upon which payment was made vested in the government, the government would receive the corresponding benefit. Partial payments in advance of complete delivery were therefore permissible.

In 20 Comp. Gen. 917 (1941), the Comptroller General approved a proposed contract amendment to provide for partial payment of the contract price prior to delivery to the government on the condition that title to the materials would pass to the government at the time of payment.

From these and similar cases, a rule evolved, applied both by the accounting officers and by the Attorney General, that partial payments for equipment or land made in advance of their delivery into the actual possession of the United States would not violate the advance payment statute if title therein had vested in the government at the time of payment, or if the equipment or land was impressed with a valid lien in favor of the United States in an amount at least equal to the payment. 28 Comp. Gen. 468 (1949); 20 Comp. Gen. 917 (1941).[20]

Applying this rule, GAO has approved the payment of "earnest money" under a contract for the sale of real estate to the government. The arrangement was found sufficient to protect the government's interests because the contract (a) vested equitable title in the government prior to the vesting of legal title, which remained in the seller only to secure payment of the purchase price, and (b) obligated the seller to deliver title insurance commitment. 34 Comp. Gen. 659 (1955).

Authority to make advance payments under certain contracts is now recognized by statute, and this is one of the major exceptions to 31 U.S.C. § 3324. The Federal Property and Administrative Services Act (41 U.S.C. § 255) and the Armed Services Procurement Act (10 U.S.C. § 2307) authorize advance, partial, progress or other payments, not to exceed the unpaid contract price, under contracts for property or services. Within their discretion, agencies may include in bid solicitations a provision limiting advance or progress payments to small business concerns. Under both statutes, advance [20]Some other cases in this evolution are: 17 Comp. Dec. 894 (1911); 17 Comp. Dec. 231 (1910); 29 Op. Att'y Gen. 46 (1911); 20 Op. Att'y Gen. 746 (1894); 18 Op. Att'y Gen. 105 (1885).

Significantly, 31 U.S.C. § 1345 does not apply to government employees in the discharge of official duties. Thus, as of 1935, attendance by private parties at government expense was prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1345; attendance by government employees was prohibited by the 1912 statute for meetings of a society or association (regardless of the relationship to official duties), and by 31 U.S.C. § 1345 for other types of meetings unless attendance was in the discharge of official duties.

The next relevant legislative action came in 1958 with two provisions of the Government Employees Training Act, 72 Stat. 327. Section 10 of the Act, 5 U.S.C. § 4109, authorizes payment of certain expenses in connection with authorized training. Section 19(b) of the Act, 5 U.S.C. § 4110, makes travel appropriations available for expenses of attendance at meetings "which are concerned with the functions or activities for which the appropriation is made or which will contribute to improved conduct, supervision, or management of the functions or activities." When Title 5 of the United States Code was recodified in 1966, qualifying language was added to 5 U.S.C. § 5946 to make it clear that the requirement for specific statutory authority no longer applied to the extent payment was authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 4109 or § 4110. See 38 Comp. Gen. 800 (1959).

With this statutory framework as background, it is now possible to attempt to state some rules.

A government employee may attend a non-government sponsored meeting at government expense (1) if it is part of an authorized training program under 5 U.S.C. § 4109, or (2) if it is related to agency functions or management under 5 U.S.C. § 4110.

For example, the Labor Department could use its Salaries and Expenses appropriation to pay the attendance fees of its Director of Personnel at a conference of the American Society of Training Directors since the meeting qualified under the broad authority of 5 U.S.C. § 4110. 38 Comp. Gen. 26 (1958). The expenses of attendance may not be paid if the employing agency refuses to authorize attendance, even if authorization would have been permissible under the statute. B-164372, June 12, 1968. (This was sort of an odd case. An employee wanted to attend a conference in Tokyo, Japan. The agency refused authorization because the employee had announced his intention to resign after the conference. The payments may be made only if (a) the agency head determines that advance payments are in the public interest, and (b) adequate security is provided. The authority under both of these statutes applies to both advertised and negotiated procurements. See B-158487, April 4, 1966.

Detailed guidance on the use of the authority granted by 41 U.S.C. § 255 and 10 U.S.C. § 2307 is contained in the Federal Acquisition Regulation. Advance payments are covered by 48 C.F.R. Subpart 32.4. Application for advance payments may be made, before or after the award of a contract, in accordance with the procedures set forth in the FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 32.408. Short of following these procedures, a bid conditioned upon the receipt of advance payments at variance with the terms of the solicitation may be rejected as nonresponsive. 57 Comp. Gen. 89 (1977); B-205088, October 28, 1981; B-197471.2, August 14, 1981.

"Adequate security" will normally include a lien in favor of the government, paramount to all other liens, covering property being acquired, balances in the bank account in which the advance payments are deposited, and property acquired by the contractor for performance of the contract. 41 U.S.C. § 255(c); 10 U.S.C. § 2307(c); 48 C.F.R. § 32.409-3(c). Other forms of security which may be required are outlined in the FAR.

Security requirements may vary to fit the circumstances of the particular case. 48 C.F.R. § 32.409-3(d). In B-214446, October 29, 1984, GAO considered a proposal to certify payment before the services were rendered. The check would be held in escrow under the government's control until contract obligations were met, at which time it would be released to the contractor. This arrangement was deemed adequate for purposes of 41 U.S.C. § 255. In an earlier case, GAO declined approval of a "purchase order draft" procedure which called for the government to send a blank check to the supplier upon placing an order. The supplier was to fill in the check for the actual amount due, not to exceed a sum specified on the check, thereby effecting immediate payment and eliminating the need for the supplier to bill the government. GAO concluded that an agency head could not reasonably find that this plan would provide adequate security for the government. B-158873, April 27, 1966.

The advance payment authority of 41 U.S.C. § 255 and 10 U.S.C. § 2307 is a financing tool to be used sparingly. It is considered the least preferred method of contract financing. 48 C.F.R. §§ 32.106 and 32.402(b); 57 Comp. Gen. 89, 94 (1977).

Advance payments are also authorized under Public Law 85-804, 50 U.S.C. §§ 1431–35. This law permits agencies designated by the President to enter into contracts, or to modify or amend existing contracts, and to make advance payments on those contracts, "without regard to other provisions of law relating to the making, performance, amendment, or modification of contracts, whenever [the President] deems that such action would facilitate the national defense." 50 U.S.C. § 1431. Agencies authorized to utilize Public Law 85-804 are listed in Executive Order No. 10789, November 14, 1958, as amended (reprinted as note following 50 U.S.C. § 1431). The FAR subpart on advance payments includes provisions addressing Public Law 85-804, which applies only during a declared national emergency. 50 U.S.C. § 1435.[21]

Progress payments based on costs incurred, as opposed to advance payments (see definitions at beginning of this section), are covered in the FAR at 48 C.F.R. Subpart 32.5.

Progress payments, where authorized, are made periodically based on costs incurred, with the total not to exceed 80 percent of the total contract price. 48 C.F.R. §§ 32.501-1 and 52.232-16 (required contract clause for fixed-price contracts). In an incrementally funded fixed-price contract, GAO has construed "total contract price" as the price for complete performance rather than the amount already allotted to the contract, provided that payment may not exceed the total amount allotted. 59 Comp. Gen. 526 (1980). See also 48 C.F.R. § 32.501-3.

A key condition where cost-based progress payments are authorized is the vesting in the government of title to work in process and certain other property allocable to the contract. 48 C.F.R. §§ 32.503-14 and 52.232-16. These title provisions are an outgrowth of the case law noted earlier in this section.

[21]The National Emergencies Act, enacted in 1976, provided that powers and authorities resulting from the existence of any national emergency still in effect on September 14, 1976, were to terminate two years from that date. 50 U.S.C. § 1601. Specifically, the national emergency declared by President Truman in 1950 for the Korean conflict had never been revoked. However, 50 U.S.C. § 1651 makes the termination inapplicable with respect to certain provisions of law, one of which is Public Law 85-804. Thus, for purposes of Public Law 85-804, the Korean War has never ended. This is discussed in more detail in B-193687, August 22, 1979.

The nature of the government's interest under this title-vesting provision has produced disagreement among the courts. The majority view is that title means full, absolute title, which cannot be defeated by subsequent liens. In re American Pouch Foods, Inc., 30 Bankr. 1015 (N.D. Ill. 1983), aff'd, 769 F.2d 1190 (7th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1082; In re Reynolds Manufacturing Co., 68 Bankr. 219 (Bankr. W.D. Penn. 1986); In re Denalco Corp., 51 Bankr. 77 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1985); In re Economy Cab and Tool Co., 47 Bankr. 708 (Bankr. D. Minn. 1985). The minority view is that the title-vesting provision gives the government a security interest in the form of a lien relative to progress payments identified with specific property, paramount to the liens of general creditors. Marine Midland Bank v. United States, 687 F.2d 395 (Ct. Cl. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1037; Welco Industries, Inc. v. United States, 8 Cl. Ct. 303 (1985), aff'd mem., 790 F.2d 90 (Fed. Cir. 1986).[22] The American Pouch and Marine Midland decisions, while reaching different conclusions, contain detailed discussions of the evolution of contract financing in relation to the advance payment statute.

b. Payment

Under a strict interpretation of 31 U.S.C. § 3324 standing alone, payment could not be made until property being acquired was actually received and accepted by the government. Thus, in one early case, a supply contract provided for payment "for articles delivered and accepted" and for the contractor to retain responsibility for the supplies or materials until they were actually in the possession of a government representative at their destination. The Comptroller General held that payments on the basis of vouchers or invoices supported by evidence of shipment only, without evidence of arrival of the supplies at destination and without assurance of receipt or acceptance by the government, would be unauthorized. 20 Comp. Gen. 230 (1940).

As with the forms of contract financing discussed above, the enactment of 41 U.S.C. § 255 and 10 U.S.C. § 2307 permitted more latitude in payment procedures. In view of this statutory authority, the Comptroller General, in B-158487, April 4, 1966, approved an advance payment procedure under which the General Services Administration would make payments on direct delivery vouchers prior to the receipt of "receiving reports" from the consignees. The proposal was designed to effect savings to the government by enabling GSA to take advantage of prompt payment discounts.[23] GAO's approval was conditioned upon compliance with the conditions specified in 41 U.S.C. § 255 that advance payment be in the public interest and that adequate security be provided.

GAO has since approved similar accelerated payment or "fast pay" procedures for other agencies in B-155253, March 20, 1968 (Defense Department) and B-155253, August 20, 1969 (Federal Aviation Administration), and reaffirmed them for GSA in 60 Comp. Gen. 602 (1981).

The Federal Acquisition Regulation provides for fast payment procedures in 48 C.F.R. Subpart 13.3. An agency may pay for supplies based on the contractor's submission of an invoice under, among others, the following conditions:

- The individual order does not exceed $25,000. Agencies have discretionary authority to set higher limits for specified items or activities.
- Geographical separation and lack of adequate communications facilities between receiving and disbursing activities make it impractical to make timely payment based on evidence of acceptance.
- Title vests in the government upon delivery to a post office or common carrier or, if shipment is by means other than Postal Service or common carrier, upon receipt by the government.
- The contractor agrees to repair, replace, or otherwise correct any items not received at destination, damaged in transit, or not conforming to purchase requirements.

The invoice is the contractor's representation that the goods have been delivered to a post office, common carrier, or point of first receipt by the government.

Accelerated payment procedures should have adequate internal controls. GAO's recommended controls are outlined in 60 Comp. Gen. 602 (1981) and B-205868, June 14, 1982. "Fast pay" procedures should be subject to monetary ceilings (now required by the FAR), [23]For the method of determining the correct date of payment for prompt payment discount purposes, see Foster Co. v. United States, 128 Ct. Cl. 291 (1954); 61 Comp. Gen. 166 (1981); B-214446, October 29, 1984; B-107826, July 29, 1954.

limited to contractors which have an ongoing relationship with the agency, and reviewed periodically to ensure that benefits outweigh costs. The agency must keep records adequate to determine that the agency is getting what it pays for. The system should permit the timely discovery of discrepancies and require prompt follow-up action. GAO has also recommended that an agency test the procedure before agencywide implementation. B-205868 at 3.

It has also been held that the use of imprest or petty cash funds to purchase supplies under C.O.D. (cash on delivery) procedures does not violate 31 U.S.C. § 3324, even where payment is made prior to examination of the shipment. 32 Comp. Gen. 563 (1953).[24]

Another "fast pay" issue was discussed in B-203993-O.M., July 12, 1982, in which GAO's General Counsel advised the GAO finance office that it could pay the invoice amount, without the need for further verification, if goods are shipped "f.o.b. origin" and the difference between the estimated price in the purchase order and the amount shown on the invoice is based solely on transportation costs. Any discrepancy regarding the transportation costs could be determined and adjusted through post-audit procedures under 31 U.S.C. § 3726. This would not apply to goods shipped "f.o.b. destination" because transportation charges are included as part of the purchase price.

As a general proposition, since fast pay procedures permit the agency to dispense with pre-payment voucher audits, GAO's approval of fast pay procedures has been based on the assumption that the agency would conduct 100 percent post-payment audits. In 67 Comp. Gen. 194 (1988), GAO approved in concept a General Services Administration proposal to combine fast pay procedures with the use of statistical sampling in post-audit for utility invoices. "We see no reason why these two techniques cannot be combined in appropriate circumstances if they result in economies and adequately protect the interests of the government." Id. at 199. However, GAO found that the specific proposal did not provide adequate controls. GSA modified its proposal, and the Comptroller General approved it in 68 Comp. Gen. 618 (1989).

[24]The decision refers to something called "Joint Regulations for Small Purchases Utilizing Imprest Funds." This was a regulation, issued jointly by GAO, GSA, and the Treasury Department, and published at 31 Comp. Gen. 768 (1952). It was rescinded in 1959.

3. Lease and Rental Agreements

The advance payment statute has been consistently construed as applicable to lease or rental agreements as well as purchases, and applies with respect to both real and personal property. 18 Comp. Gen. 839 (1939); 3 Comp. Gen. 542 (1924); B-188166, June 3, 1977. Thus, when the government acquires land by leasing, payments must be made "in arrears" unless the applicable appropriation act or other law provides an exemption from 31 U.S.C. § 3324. 19 Comp. Gen. 758, 760 (1940). The FAR advance payment provisions do not apply to rent. 48 C.F.R. § 32.404(a)(1).

In 57 Comp. Gen. 89 (1977), the Comptroller General held that a leasing arrangement of telephone equipment called "tier pricing," under which the government would be obligated to pay the contractor's entire capital cost at the outset of the lease, would violate 31 U.S.C. § 3324. See also 58 Comp. Gen. 29 (1978).

The advance payment of annual rent on property leased from the National Park Foundation, a statutorily created charitable nonprofit organization, was found permissible in B-207215, March 1, 1983, based on the "unique status" of the lessor.

Certain long-term lease/rental agreements may present more complicated problems in that they may involve not only 31 U.S.C. § 3324 but also the Antideficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341. Since appropriations are made only for the bona fide needs of a particular fiscal year, and since a lease purporting to bind the government for more than one fiscal year would necessarily include the needs of future years, such a lease would be contrary to the Antideficiency Act prohibition against contracting for any purpose in advance of appropriations made for such purpose. Thus, a lease agreement for the rental of nitrogen gas cylinders for a 25-year period, the full rental price to be paid in the first year, would violate both statutes. 37 Comp. Gen. 60 (1957). A contractual arrangement on an annual basis with an option in the government to renew from year to year was seen as the only way to accomplish the desired objective. Id. at 62. See also 19 Comp. Gen. 758 (1940).

4. Publications

Advance payment is authorized for "charges for a publication printed or recorded in any way for the auditory or visual use of the agency." 31 U.S.C. § 3324(d)(2).

The original exemption for publications was enacted in 1930 (46 Stat. 580) and amended in 1961 (75 Stat. 211). It authorized advance payments for "subscriptions or other charges for newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and other publications for official use." Prior to 1974, a seemingly endless stream of cases arose over the meaning of the terms "publications" or "other publications" as used either in the general exemption or in specific appropriation acts.[25] Based on judicial precedent, GAO construed the terms to mean publications in the customary and commonly understood sense of the word, that is, books, pamphlets, newspapers, periodicals, or prints. B-125979, June 14, 1957. The exemption was also held to include other types of "visual" material such as microfilm products, 41 Comp. Gen. 211 (1961), and 35-millimeter slides, 48 Comp. Gen. 784 (1969). However, the term "publications" was held not to include items made to be heard rather than read, such as phonograph records (21 Comp. Gen. 524 (1941), B-125979, June 14, 1957) or tape-recorded material (46 Comp. Gen. 394 (1966), B-137516, October 28, 1958). In 35 Comp. Gen. 404 (1956), the use of advance payments for the procurement of books through "book club" facilities was held permissible.[26]

In 1974, Congress resolved the problems over the interpretation of "other publications" by enacting legislation to codify some of the GAO decisions and modify others, by defining "other publications" as including "any publication printed, microfilmed, photocopied, or magnetically or otherwise recorded for auditory or visual usage" (88 Stat. 1731). This was condensed into the present version of 31 U.S.C. § 3324(d)(2) when Title 31 was recodified in 1982.

[25]The 1930 version of the exemption authorized advance payment only for "newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals," although a few agencies had broader authority under agency-specific legislation. For agencies subject to the quoted language, the sole issue in several decisions was whether a given publication could also be regarded as a "periodical" and thus within the statute. E.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 720 (1958); 17 Comp. Gen. 455 (1937); A-90102, September 3, 1938. The 1961 amendment expanded the authority to include "other publications," rendering these decisions obsolete. In addition, the 1974 legislation discussed in the text further expanded the definition of "publication." Thus, most pre-1974 decisions in this area are wholly or partly obsolete; their continuing validity must be assessed in light of the present statutory language.

[26]This decision originally applied only to the former Veterans Administration, which had specific authority. It did not apply to agencies subject to the then-existing version of the general exemption since the books were not "periodicals." This part of the decision should now be disregarded (see supra note 25), and the holding in 35 Comp. Gen. 404 would now apply to any agency which can justify the need.

A 1978 decision considered the question of whether a microfilm library could be acquired under a lease/rental arrangement or whether the advance payments were authorized only where the government actually purchased the library. The Comptroller General concluded that in the absence of statutory language or evidence of legislative intent to the contrary, there is no meaningful difference between the purchase and rental of publications needed by the government, and that the rental or leasing of a microfilm library for official government use fell within the purview of the publications exemption. 57 Comp. Gen. 583 (1978). However, advance payments for items of equipment necessary for use in conjunction with a microfilm library are still prohibited. B-188166, June 3, 1977. (The cited decision, although not clear from the text itself, dealt with reader/printers.)

More recent decisions have construed the publications exemption found in 31 U.S.C. § 3324(d)(2) as permitting advance payment for coupons to be used for the purchase of articles from medical journals and redeemable for cash if unused (67 Comp. Gen. 491 (1988)); verification reports of physicians' board certifications (B-231673, August 8, 1988); and hospital evaluation reports based on data submitted by participating government hospitals and including, as part of the subscription price, a laboratory kit for use in obtaining the data required for the reports, the kit being regarded as "a part of the publication process" (B-210719, December 23, 1983).

The FAR advance payment provisions do not apply to subscriptions to publications. 48 C.F.R. § 32.404(a)(6).

5. Other Governmental Entities

The Comptroller General has not applied the advance payment prohibition to payments to other federal agencies. As noted previously, the primary purpose of the prohibition is to preclude the possibility of loss in the event a contractor, after receipt of payment, should fail to perform and fail or refuse to refund the money to the United States. The danger of such a loss is minimized when the contractor is another government agency. Thus, 31 U.S.C. § 3324 does not prohibit advance payment of post office box rentals. 25 Comp. Gen. 834 (1946). Also, the Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1535, expressly authorizes advance payments for transactions within its scope.

GAO has applied the same rationale to exempt state and local governments from the advance payment prohibition. E.g., 57 Comp.

Gen. 399 (1978) (no objection to advance payment of rent under lease of land from state). This exception, however, applies only where the state is furnishing noncommercial services reasonably available only from the state. 39 Comp. Gen. 285 (1959) (sewer service charge); B-118846, March 29, 1954 (expenses of state water commissioner administering Indian irrigation project pursuant to court order); B-109485, July 22, 1952 (repair, operation, and maintenance of roads in conjunction with permanent transfer of federal roads to county); B-34946, June 9, 1943, and B-65821, May 29, 1947 (state court fees and other items of expense required to litigate in state courts in compliance with the requirements of state law); B-36099, August 14, 1943 (lease of state lands); B-35670, July 19, 1943 (state forest fire prevention and suppression services).

Conversely, where a state provides the federal government with services that are freely and readily available in the commercial market, the statutory advance payment restrictions applicable to private contractors govern. 58 Comp. Gen. 29 (1978) (telephone services).

In B-207215, March 1, 1983, GAO advised the National Park Service that it could make advance payments of annual rent on property leased from the National Park Foundation. The National Park Foundation is a charitable nonprofit organization created by statute to accept and administer gifts to the National Park Service, and its board of directors includes the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Park Service. GAO concluded that the Foundation's "unique status virtually assures that there is no threat of loss to the Government." Even though technically the Foundation is neither a state nor a federal agency, it is, in effect, tantamount to one for advance payment purposes.

The exception recognized in the case of state and local governments has not been extended to public utilities. 42 Comp. Gen. 659 (1963) (telephone services). See also 27 Comp. Dec. 885 (1921). Thus, a government agency cannot use a utility "budget plan" which would provide for level monthly payments in a predetermined amount throughout the year. B-237127, December 12, 1989 (non-decision letter). Similarly, monthly charges under a utility service contract for cable television service to a Naval hospital may not be paid in advance. B-237789, December 10, 1990.

D. Disposition of Appropriation Balances

1. Terminology

Annual funds which remain unobligated at the end of the fiscal year for which they were appropriated are said to "expire" for obligational purposes.[27] In other words, they cease to be available for new obligations. The same principle applies to multiple-year appropriations as of the end of the last fiscal year for which they were provided. For purposes of this discussion, annual and multiple-year appropriations are referred to cumulatively as "fixed appropriations." 31 U.S.C. § 1551(a)(3).[28]

The portion of an appropriation which has not actually been spent at the end of the fiscal year (or other definite period of availability) is called the "unexpended balance."[29] It consists of two components—the obligated balance and the unobligated balance.

The obligated balance is defined as "the amount of unliquidated obligations applicable to the appropriation less amounts collectible as repayments to the appropriation." 31 U.S.C. § 1551(a)(1). Restated, obligated balance means the amount of undisbursed funds remaining in an appropriation against which definite obligations have been recorded.

The unobligated balance is "the difference between the obligated balance and the total unexpended balance." Id. § 1551(a)(2). It represents that portion of the unexpended balance unencumbered by obligations recorded under 31 U.S.C. § 1501.

[27]The term "lapse" is also sometimes used in this context although there is a technical distinction. Traditionally, an appropriation was said to "lapse" when it ceased to be available to the spending agency to liquidate prior obligations.

[28]Throughout this section, except as otherwise specified, references to 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551 through 1557 reflect amendments made by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1405(a), 104 Stat. 1485, 1675 (1990).

[29]Depending on the specific context in which the term is used, "unexpended balance" may refer to the entire undisbursed balance or to the unobligated balance only. 22 Comp. Gen. 59 (1942). We use it here in the broader sense.

employee went anyway, and for some reason filed a claim for his expenses. GAO said no.) Where attendance is authorized, the fact that the sponsor is a profit-making organization is immaterial. B-161777, July 11, 1967.

The express inclusion of "management" in 5 U.S.C. § 4110 is significant. Before the Training Act, GAO had strictly construed grants of statutory authority for attendance at meetings as excluding meetings concerning general problems such as management which are common to all agencies. 37 Comp. Gen. 335 (1957). This type of meeting is now expressly authorized.

If neither 5 U.S.C. § 4109 nor 5 U.S.C. § 4110 applies and the meeting is a meeting of a "society or association," then it is subject to the prohibition of 5 U.S.C. § 5946.

The continuing viability of 5 U.S.C. § 5946 requires further elaboration. GAO held in 38 Comp. Gen. 800 (1959) that the Government Employees Training Act repealed section 5946 by implication to the extent that the two statutes were incompatible. While this is true, some of the language in that decision has generated some confusion. The decision stated that the restriction in section 5946 "is inapplicable so far as agencies and personnel covered by the Government Employees Training Act are concerned," and that those agencies no longer need to obtain specific appropriation provisions to authorize attendance at meetings. Of course this statement is based on the premise that an agency is not likely to seek, nor is Congress likely to grant, specific appropriation authority for an agency to send its employees to meetings which have nothing to do with agency business. Thus, it is not accurate to say that section 5946 simply no longer applies to civilian employees of the government. It does apply, except that its scope is considerably reduced by virtue of the broad authority of the Training Act. If attendance cannot be authorized under either of the Training Act provisions, 5 U.S.C. § 5946 still applies. This relationship is correctly stated in 55 Comp. Gen. 1332, 1335-36 (1976). For cases where expenses were disallowed because they could not be justified under these standards, see B-202028, May 14, 1981; B-195045, February 8, 1980; B-166560, May 27, 1969.

It is also possible for 31 U.S.C. § 1345 to apply to government employees, although it would be the rare case. As noted above,

Unexpended balances are both necessary and unavoidable. There are, however, potential adverse implications if those balances should become too large. GAO studied the area in a report entitled Budget Issues: Governmentwide Analysis of the Growth in Unexpended Balances, GAO/AFMD-86-24BR (January 17, 1986). GAO discovered a trend reflecting increased growth in unexpended balances during the first half of the 1980's. Since much of these balances represent actual or potential liabilities which will eventually have to be liquidated through future revenues or borrowing, GAO cautioned that a high growth rate in unexpended balances could adversely affect deficit reduction efforts.

2. Evolution of the Law

Congressional treatment of unexpended balances has changed a number of times over the years, most recently in November 1990. Some knowledge of the past is useful in understanding the pre-1991 decisions and in determining which portions of them remain applicable.

Prior to 1949, unexpended balances of annual appropriations retained their fiscal year identity for two full fiscal years following expiration, after which time the remaining undisbursed balance had to be covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury. The agency involved no longer had access to the balance for any purpose, and subsequent claims against the appropriation had to be settled by GAO. E.g., B-24565, April 2, 1942; B-18740, July 23, 1941. The appropriation was said to "lapse" when it was covered into the surplus fund of the Treasury. See 24 Comp. Gen. 942, 945 (1945); 21 Comp. Gen. 46 (1941).

The problem with this arrangement was that, in view of Article I, section 9 of the Constitution, once the money was covered into the Treasury, another appropriation was needed to get it back out. E.g., 23 Comp. Gen. 689, 694 (1944). This was true even for simple, undisputed claims. Congress tried various devices to pay claims against lapsed appropriations—reappropriation of lapsed funds, definite and indefinite appropriations for the payment of claims under $500, and appropriations for specific claims—but none proved entirely satisfactory.

In 1949, Congress enacted the Surplus Fund-Certified Claims Act (63 Stat. 407), intended to permit payment of claims against lapsed appropriations without the need for specific appropriations or reappropriations. The statute provided for the transfer of unexpended balances remaining after two years to a Treasury account designated "Payment of Certified Claims." Funds in this account remained available until expended for the payment of claims certified by the Comptroller General to be lawfully due and chargeable to the respective balances in the account. See B-61937, September 17, 1952. Like the pre-1949 system, this arrangement too proved unsatisfactory in that all claims payable from the certified claims account, undisputed invoices included, still had to come through GAO.

The system changed again in 1956 (Pub. L. No. 84-798, 70 Stat. 647), upon the recommendation of the second Hoover Commission.[30] The most significant change made by the 1956 law was to pass the direct responsibility for making payments from lapsed appropriations from GAO to the cognizant agencies. For the first time, agencies could dispose of clearly valid claims against prior year appropriations without the need for any action by either Congress or GAO. The statutory evolution is discussed in more detail in B-179708-O.M., November 20, 1973.

The 1956 law, which was to remain in effect until late 1990, prescribed different procedures for obligated and unobligated balances. The obligated balance retained its fiscal year identity for two full fiscal years following the expiration date, at which time any remaining obligated but unexpended balance was transferred to a consolidated successor account, where it was merged with the obligated balances of all other appropriation accounts of that department or agency for the same general purpose. These successor accounts were known as "M" accounts. Funds in an "M" account were available indefinitely to liquidate obligations properly incurred against any of the appropriations from which the account was derived. Upon merger in the "M" account, the obligated but unexpended balances of all annual and multiple-year appropriations of the agency lost their fiscal-year identity for expenditure purposes.

With fiscal-year identity no longer a concern, there was no need to relate a payment from the "M" account to the specific balance which had been transferred from the particular year in which the obligation had occurred. Thus, as a practical matter, once an appropriation balance reached the "M" account, the potential for violations of the Antideficiency Act became highly remote. B-179708-O.M., June 24, 1975. An Antideficiency Act violation could occur only if identifiable obligations exceeded the entire "M" account balance plus the aggregate of all funds potentially restorable from withdrawn unobligated balances.

The unobligated balances of fixed-year appropriations were "withdrawn" upon expiration of the period of obligational availability, and were returned to the general fund of the Treasury. A withdrawn unobligated balance retained its fiscal year identity on the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years, during which time it was called "surplus authority." At the end of the two-year period, the balances were transferred to "merged surplus" accounts, at which point they lost their fiscal-year identity.

Withdrawn unobligated balances could be restored to adjust previously recorded obligations where the amount originally recorded proved to be less than the actual obligation, or to liquidate obligations which arose but were not formally recorded prior to the appropriation's expiration, provided that the obligations met one of the criteria specified in 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) and were otherwise valid. Some cases discussing this restoration authority are 68 Comp. Gen. 600 (1989); 63 Comp. Gen. 525 (1984); B-236940, October 17, 1989; B-232010, March 23, 1989; B-164031(3).150, September 5, 1979.

From the perspective of congressional control, one weakness of the system described above was that it permitted the accumulation of large amounts in "M" accounts. While agencies were supposed to review their "M" accounts annually and return any excess to the Treasury, this was not always done. This situation, in conjunction with the previously discussed rules on the funding of contract modifications, created the potential for large transactions with minimal congressional oversight. For example, a 1989 GAO report discussed an Air Force proposal, completely legal under existing legislation, to use over $1 billion from expired accounts to fund B-1B contract modifications. Strategic Bombers: B-1B Program's Use of Expired Appropriations, GAO/NSIAD-89-209 (September 1989).

Congressional concern mounted during 1990, and the treatment of expired appropriations was changed once again by section 1405 of the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1991, Pub.

L. No. 101-510 (November 5, 1990), 104 Stat. 1485, 1675. Section 1405 applies to both military and civilian agencies, and includes transition provisions to deal with existing merged surplus and "M" accounts. Unrestored merged surplus authority was canceled as of December 5, 1990, with no further restorations authorized after that date. "M" accounts are to be phased out over a three-year period, with any remaining "M" account balances canceled on September 30, 1993.

3. Expired Appropriations and Closing of Accounts [31]

Section 1405(a) of Pub. L. No. 101-510 amended 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557. Two of the key provisions are quoted below:

"On September 30th of the 5th fiscal year after the period of availability for obligation of a fixed appropriation account ends, the account shall be closed and any remaining balance (whether obligated or unobligated) in the account shall be canceled and thereafter shall not be available for obligation or expenditure for any purpose." 31 U.S.C. § 1552(a).

"After the end of the period of availability for obligation of a fixed appropriation account and before the closing of that account under section 1552(a) of this title, the account shall retain its fiscal-year identity and remain available for recording, adjusting, and liquidating obligations properly chargeable to that account." 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a).

Just as under the prior system, a one-year or multiple-year appropriation expires on the last day of its period of availability and is no longer available for new obligations, although unobligated balances no longer revert immediately to the general fund of the Treasury.

Upon expiration of a fixed appropriation, the obligated and unobligated balances retain their fiscal-year identity in an "expired account" for that appropriation for an additional five fiscal years. As a practical matter, agencies must maintain separate obligated and unobligated balances within the expired account as part of their internal financial management systems in order to insure compliance with the Antideficiency Act. Also relevant in this connection is 31 U.S.C. § 1554(a), under which applicable audit requirements, limitations on obligations, and reporting requirements remain applicable to the expired account.

[31] This section summarizes the provisions enacted in November 1990. Decisions and opinions cited in the text predating the 1990 legislation reflect principles which should still remain valid. Requirements and procedures under the 1990 law are set forth in OMB Circular No. A-34, Part XI (January 1991).

During this five-year period, treatment of the balances is similar to the first two post-expiration fiscal years under the 1956 legislation. Obligated balances for any of those five years may be used to liquidate obligations properly chargeable to that fiscal year. The unobligated balance remains available to make legitimate obligation adjustments, i.e., to record previously unrecorded obligations and to make upward adjustments in previously underrecorded obligations.

The authority to use unobligated balances to make obligation adjustments is analogous to the restoration authority of the law prior to the 1990 revision, again with the exception that there is no longer a point at which balances merge and lose their fiscal-year identity. The authority is available only to satisfy an unrecorded or underrecorded obligation properly chargeable to the funds of that particular year, and cannot be used to satisfy an obligation properly chargeable to current appropriations (see 50 Comp. Gen. 863 (1971)), or to any other year of the five-year period. The authority of 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a) is intended to permit agencies to adjust their accounts to more accurately reflect obligations and liabilities actually incurred during the period of availability. See 63 Comp. Gen. 525, 528 (1984). However, arbitrary deobligation in reliance upon the authority to make subsequent adjustments is not consistent with the statutory purpose. See B-179708-O.M., July 10, 1975.

During the five-year period, the potential for an Antideficiency Act violation exists if identifiable obligations chargeable to one of those five years exceed the sum of the obligated balance for that year plus the amount available for adjustment from the unobligated balance for the same year. Should this happen, the excess can be liquidated only pursuant to a supplemental or deficiency appropriation or other congressional action. See B-179708-O.M., June 24, 1975 (applying same principle during first two post-expiration years under prior law).

At the end of the five-year period, the account is closed. Any remaining unexpended balances, both obligated and unobligated, are canceled, returned to the general fund of the Treasury,[32] and are thereafter no longer available for any purpose.

Once an account has been closed:

"[O]bligations and adjustments to obligations that would have been properly chargeable to that account, both as to purpose and in amount, before closing and that are not otherwise chargeable to any current appropriation account of the agency may be charged to any current appropriation account of the agency available for the same purpose."

31 U.S.C. § 1553(b)(1). This is a major exception to the rule previously discussed that current appropriations are not available to satisfy obligations properly chargeable to a prior year. The authority is limited, however. The cumulative total of old obligations payable from current appropriations under 31 U.S.C. § 1553(b)(1) may not exceed one percent of the current appropriation. 31 U.S.C. § 1553(b)(2). The authority to use current appropriations to pay obligations attributable to canceled balances may not be used to exceed the original appropriation.[33]

Congress may, by specific legislation, exempt an appropriation from the above rules and may otherwise fix the period of its availability for expenditure. 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551(b), 1557. An agency should consider seeking an exemption if it administers a program which by its nature requires disbursements beyond the five-year period. One form of exemption simply preserves the availability for disbursement of previously obligated funds. An example is discussed in B-243744, April 24, 1991 (concluding that the exemption does not create new budget authority). Another form is a provision applicable to certain Agency for International Development one-year appropriations which effectively converts them to no-year funds upon proper obligation (thereby permitting reobligation for authorized purposes should the funds be deobligated after the end of the [32]We commonly talk about "returning" appropriation balances to the Treasury. In point of fact, for the most part, they never left the Treasury to begin with. An appropriation does not represent cash actually set aside in the Treasury. Government obligations are liquidated as needed through revenues and borrowing. Thus, the reversion of funds to the Treasury is not a movement of actual cash, but a bookkeeping adjustment which, in the various ways discussed in the text, affects the government's legal authority to make obligations and expenditures.

[33]In view of this requirement, it will be necessary to maintain records of the balances returned to the Treasury upon cancellation beyond the end of the five-year period, and to adjust these balances as subsequently presented obligations are liquidated, as there is no other way to ensure that payments do not exceed the original appropriation.

fiscal year). Although not originally conceived as an exemption from the account closing requirement, the AID provision amounts to one because the account closing requirement applies only to fixed appropriations. Foreign Assistance: Funds Obligated Remain Unspent for Years, GAO/NSIAD-91-123 (April 1991), at 21.

To the extent of its applicability, the statutory scheme found at 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557 provides the exclusive method for the payment of obligations chargeable to expired appropriations. See B-101860, December 5, 1963. Thus, there is generally no authority to transfer appropriations to some form of trust fund or working fund for the purpose of preserving their availability. Id. (See also 31 U.S.C. § 1532, which prohibits the transfer of appropriations to a working fund without statutory authority.)

The rules for certain legislative branch appropriations are a bit different. The provisions of 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557 do not apply to appropriations to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate or the Clerk of the House of Representatives. 31 U.S.C. § 1551(c)(2). For these appropriations, unobligated balances more than two years' old cannot be used short of an act of Congress. Instead, obligations chargeable to appropriations which have been expired for more than two years "shall be liquidated from any appropriations for the same general purpose, which, at the time of payment, are available for disbursement." 2 U.S.C. § 102a. See B-213771.3, September 17, 1986.

4. No-Year Appropriations

There is one important statutory restriction on the availability of no-year funds. Under 31 U.S.C. § 1555, a no-year account is to be closed if (a) the agency head or the President determines that the purposes for which the appropriation was made have been fulfilled, and (b) no disbursement has been made against the appropriation for two consecutive fiscal years. Upon closing, any remaining balance in the account, obligated or unobligated, is canceled and is no longer available for obligation or expenditure for any purpose. The purpose of section 1555 is to permit the closing of inactive appropriations. 39 Comp. Gen. 244 (1959); B-182101, October 16, 1974.

This principle also applies to revenues earned by a government agency where Congress has authorized the agency to retain such revenues without any fiscal year limitations. For example, in section 111(h) of the Energy Reorganization Act of 1974, 42 U.S.C. § 5821(h), Congress authorized the Department of Energy, when so specified in appropriation acts, to retain revenues from uranium enrichment services and use them to offset the costs of providing such services, the funds to remain available until expended. In light of 31 U.S.C. § 1555, however, the Department of Energy could not retain or set aside the revenues indefinitely. B-159687-O.M., October 25, 1979.

As with fixed appropriations, obligations attributable to the canceled balance of a no-year account may be paid from current appropriations for the same purpose, and subject to the same one-percent limitation. 31 U.S.C. § 1553(b).

Like a no-year appropriation, a permanent indefinite appropriation (e.g., 31 U.S.C. § 1304) is not subject to fiscal year limitations. However, 31 U.S.C. § 1555 does not apply to permanent indefinite appropriations since the "remaining balance" by definition is the general fund of the Treasury. Cf. 11 Comp. Dec. 400 (1905).

5. Repayments and Deobligations

To prevent the overstatement of obligated balances, the term "obligated balance" is defined in 31 U.S.C. § 1551(a)(1), for purposes of 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557, as the amount of unliquidated obligations applicable to the appropriation "less amounts collectible as repayments to the appropriation." Once an account has been closed pursuant to either 31 U.S.C. § 1552(a) or 31 U.S.C. § 1555, collections received after closing which could have been credited to the appropriation account if received prior to closing, must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 31 U.S.C. § 1552(b).

The term "repayment" is a general term referring to moneys received by a federal agency which are authorized to be credited to the receiving agency's appropriation and are not required to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Treasury Department-General Accounting Office Joint Regulation No. 1, September 22, 1950, § 2, published at 30 Comp. Gen. 595, divides repayments into two subcategories, reimbursements (statutory authority for agency to retain receipts) and refunds (certain nonstatutory situations such as recovery of overpayments and erroneous payments).

Reimbursements are considered a budgetary resource subject to apportionment by the Office of Management and Budget, whereas refunds are treated as reductions of expenditures and obligations. Reimbursements operate to augment the original amount appropriated by Congress. Refunds are reductions of, and must be directly related to, previous disbursements. See 30 Comp. Gen. 614 (1950).[34]

As a general proposition, where the appropriation to be credited has expired, reimbursements must be credited to the expired account and not to the current account. See "Augmentation of Appropriations" in Chapter 6 for case citations. A prominent example is the Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1535. Where a transaction between government agencies is governed solely by the Economy Act, reimbursements for work, services, or other materials must be credited to the fiscal year appropriations which earned them, regardless of when the reimbursements are collected. If the appropriation which earned the reimbursement remains available for obligation at the time of collection, there is no distinction between a credit to the year earned or to the year collected. If, however, the appropriation which earned the reimbursement has expired for obligation purposes at the time of collection, then reimbursement can be credited only to the expired account. B-194711-O.M., January 15, 1980; B-179708-O.M., December 1, 1975. After closing, the reimbursement would have to go to miscellaneous receipts.

Excess obligations which are later deobligated are accounted for in the same manner as repayments. The difference, of course, is that the excess obligations are already in the expired account. Deobligated amounts which are not needed to liquidate recorded obligations should be accounted for under the "unobligated balance" portion of the expired account. See 52 Comp. Gen. 179 (1972).

If an agency deobligates funds after the expiration of the period of availability, the funds are not available for any new obligation. To avoid this result, Congress may, by statute, authorize an agency to reobligate any such deobligated sums. This is called deobligation-reobligation ("deob-reob") authority. The reobligation will usually be for the same general purpose as the original obligation, although the precise purposes will depend on the terms of the legislation. See [34]The citation refers to an "Accounting Systems Memorandum," an obsolete form of GAO guidance. They used to be published as appendices in the annual "Comp. Gen." volumes. Although obsolete as GAO documents, they often, as in this case, contain useful background and explanatory discussion.

B-218762-O.M., September 18, 1985, for an illustration. Deobligation-reobligation authority is not necessary for no-year funds, and this is true even though Congress may have eliminated such authority with respect to certain fiscal year appropriations of the same agency. B-200519, November 28, 1980.

E. Effect of Litigation on Period of Availability

If the entitlement to unobligated funds is tied up in litigation, the statutory expiration and closing procedures could come into conflict with a claimant's right to pursue a claim with the courts.

Suppose, for example, Congress made an appropriation directing the Comptroller General to pay a huge bonus to the editors of this book. Suppose further that the agency refused to make payment because it thought the idea economically unsound or just plain ridiculous. Maybe the agency would rather use the money for other purposes or simply let it revert to the Treasury. The editors of course could sue and would presumably be entitled to pursue the suit through the appellate process if necessary. But this could take years. If the obligational availability of the appropriation were to expire at the end of the fiscal year, the suit might very well have to be dismissed as moot. See, e.g., Township of River Vale v. Harris, 444 F. Supp. 90, 93 (D.D.C. 1978). What, then, can be done to prevent what one court has termed (presumably with tongue in judicial cheek) "the nightmare of reversion to the federal treasury"?[35]

The answer is two-fold: the equitable power of the federal judiciary and a statute, 31 U.S.C. § 1502(b). While the cases discussed in this section predate the 1990 revision of 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557 and thus use language that is in some respects obsolete, the concepts would appear applicable either directly or by analogy to the new procedures. For example, if a court could enjoin reversion to the Treasury under the old law, it can presumably equally enjoin expiration under the new law.

The cases establishing the equitable power of the courts involve two distinct situations—the normal expiration of annual appropriations at the end of the fiscal year and the expiration of budget authority in accordance with the terms of the applicable authorizing legislation. For purposes of the principles to be discussed, the distinction is not material. See B-115398.48, December 29, 1975

31 U.S.C. § 1345 does not apply to government employees in the discharge of official duties. A number of earlier cases will be found which cite the statute in passing for this proposition. E.g., 27 Comp. Gen. 627 (1948); 26 Comp. Gen. 53 (1946); 22 Comp. Gen. 315 (1942); B-117137, September 25, 1953; B-87691, August 2, 1949; B-80621, October 8, 1948; B-77404, June 29, 1948; B-77613, June 23, 1948; B-13888, December 10, 1940.[9]

Since the exception for government employees in 31 U.S.C. § 1345 is limited to the discharge of official duties, the statutory prohibition applies to government employees to the extent that a given meeting is not part of the discharge of official duties. If a meeting is not part of authorized training under 5 U.S.C. § 4109 and cannot qualify as related to agency functions under 5 U.S.C. § 4110, it would certainly not be within the exception in 31 U.S.C. § 1345 for the discharge of official duties. If the meeting is a meeting of a "society or association," it is, as noted above, subject to 5 U.S.C. § 5946. If the meeting is not a meeting of a "society or association" and is not within the exception for the discharge of official duties, 31 U.S.C. § 1345 would apply. An example of a situation in which this rationale might apply is B-195045, February 8, 1980, in which attendance expenses at an executive board meeting of the Combined Federal Campaign were disallowed. (The case was decided on the basis of regulations and prior decisions.)

(2) Inability to attend

If an employee is scheduled to participate in a meeting or conference and is unable to attend, the government may be liable for attendance fees in certain situations. Two cases will illustrate.

In B-159059, June 28, 1966, an Interior Department employee had been accepted to attend an energy seminar. The seminar announcement provided a cut-off date for cancellation of reservations but permitted substitutions. Due to the press of other necessary work, the employee did not attend the seminar, nor did he send a substitute or request cancellation before the cut-off date. GAO found that the sponsor's acceptance of the employee's application, which had [9]All of these cases also involve the pre-Training Act version of 5 U.S.C. § 5946 and may no longer be valid to that extent. The editors have made no attempt to examine each of the cases from this perspective. Thus, while the pre-1958 cases remain valid to the limited extent that they involve 31 U.S.C. § 1345, the results in those cases may no longer apply in view of the subsequent enactment of 5 U.S.C. §§ 4109 and 4110.

(non-decision letter). Thus, we have generally not specified which of the two each case involves.

The concept of applying the courts' equity powers to stave off the expiration of budget authority seems to have first arisen, at least to any significant extent, in a group of impoundment cases in the early 1970's. A number of potential recipients under various grant and entitlement programs filed suits to challenge the legality of executive branch impoundments. The device the courts commonly used was a preliminary injunction for the express purpose of preventing expiration of the funds. For example, in National Council of Community Mental Health Centers, Inc. v. Weinberger, 361 F. Supp. 897 (D.D.C. 1973), plaintiffs challenged the impoundment of grant funds under the Community Mental Health Centers Act. Pending the ultimate resolution on the merits, the court issued a preliminary injunction to prevent expiration of unobligated funds for the grant programs in question. Id. at 900.

Other cases employing similar devices to preserve the availability of funds are: Maine v. Fri, 486 F.2d 713 (1st Cir. 1973); Bennett v. Butz, 386 F. Supp. 1059 (D. Minn. 1974); Guadamuz v. Ash, 368 F. Supp. 1233 (D.D.C. 1973); Community Action Programs Executive Directors Ass'n of New Jersey, Inc. v. Ash, 365 F. Supp. 1355 (D.N.J. 1973); Oklahoma v. Weinberger, 360 F. Supp. 724 (W.D. Okla. 1973).

In several of the cases (e.g., National Council of Community Mental Health Centers v. Weinberger, Community Action Programs Executive Directors Ass'n v. Ash, Bennett v. Butz), the court not only enjoined expiration of the funds but directed the agency to record an obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a). One of these cases, Bennett v. Butz, spawned a decision of the Comptroller General, 54 Comp. Gen. 962 (1975), in which GAO confirmed that such an order would constitute a valid obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(6).

The concept has also been applied in non-impoundment cases. An example is City of Los Angeles v. Adams, 556 F.2d 40 (D.C. Cir. 1977). The Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970 established a formula for the apportionment of airport development grant funds. The statute also established minimum aggregate amounts for the grants, but subsequent appropriation acts imposed monetary ceilings lower than the authorized amounts. The court held that the appropriation ceilings controlled, but that the money still had to be apportioned in accordance with the formula in the enabling legislation. To preserve the availability of the additional grant funds the plaintiff was seeking, the district court had ordered the Federal Aviation Administration to obligate the amount in question prior to the statutory deadline, and the court of appeals confirmed this as proper. Id. at 51.[36]

Thus, what we may view as the "first wave" of cases firmly established the proposition that a federal court can enjoin the statutory expiration of budget authority. Inevitably, the next group of cases to arise would involve the power of the courts to act after the funds have expired for obligational purposes—in other words, the power of the courts to "revive" expired budget authority.

The "leading case" in this area appears to be National Association of Regional Councils v. Costle, 564 F.2d 583 (D.C. Cir. 1977). The plaintiff sued to force the Environmental Protection Agency to make available unobligated contract authority under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1972. The court first noted that contract authority is a form of budget authority, and when made available for a definite period, terminates at the end of that period the same as direct appropriations.[37] The court then reaffirmed the proposition that courts may "order that funds be held available beyond their statutory lapse date if equity so requires." 564 F.2d at 588. However, the court found the rule inapplicable because the suit had not been filed prior to the relevant expiration date, and the court therefore did not acquire jurisdiction of the case prior to expiration. The essence of the Costle decision is the following excerpt:

"Decisions that a court may act to prevent the expiration of budget authority which has not terminated at the time suit is filed are completely consistent with the accepted principle that the equity powers of the courts allow them to take action to preserve the status quo of a dispute and to protect their ability to decide a case properly before them. In such situations, the courts simply suspend the operation of a lapse provision and extend the term of already existing budget authority. If, however, budget authority has lapsed before suit is brought, there is no underlying congressional authorization for the court to preserve. It has vanished, and any order of the court to obligate public money conflicts with the constitutional provision vesting sole power to make such authorizations in the Congress. [Footnote omitted.] Equity empowers the courts to prevent the termination of budget authority which exists, but if it does not exist, either because it was never provided or because it has terminated, the Constitution prohibits the courts from creating it no matter how compelling the equities." 564 F.2d at 588-89.

[36]The court also noted that the district court could "obtain assistance from the Comptroller General's expertise in matters of expenditures, reductions by appropriations, and impoundments." 556 F.2d at 51.

[37]GAO had previously expressed the same view. 32 Comp. Gen. 29, 31 (1952), cited in Costle, 564 F.2d at 587 n.10.

Costle is also significant in that it explained and clarified several prior cases which had purported to establish a similar, and in one instance even broader, principle. Specifically:

- National Association of Neighborhood Health Centers, Inc. v. Mathews, 551 F.2d 321 (D.C. Cir. 1976). This was a suit challenging the administration of the Hill-Burton Act. The court found that certain funds had been improperly used, and directed their recovery and reallocation. The court further noted that the district court could order that the funds be held available if necessary to prevent their expiration upon recovery. However, the Costle court pointed out that the funds in Mathews had already been obligated and thus had not expired before suit was filed. 564 F.2d at 588.
- Jacksonville Port Authority v. Adams, 556 F.2d 52 (D.C. Cir. 1977). The plaintiff, in a suit to obtain additional funds under the Airport and Airway Development Program, had sought a temporary restraining order to prevent expiration of the funds, which the district court denied. The court of appeals found denial of the TRO to be an abuse of discretion, and held that, in the words of the Costle court, "relief was still available because it would have been available if the district court had initially done what should have been done," that is, grant the preservation remedy. 564 F.2d at 588. A similar case is Wilson v. Watt, 703 F.2d 395 (9th Cir. 1983) (reversing district court's denial of preliminary injunction and directing preservation of funds as necessary).
- Pennsylvania v. Weinberger, 367 F. Supp. 1378 (D.D.C. 1973). This was an impoundment suit involving the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Noting the then-existing authority of agencies to restore expired unobligated balances, the court concluded that it had even broader equitable power to order the restoration of expired appropriations. The Costle court expressly rejected the broad view that "once it is shown that Congress has authorized the restoration of lapsed authority under some circumstances then the courts may order the restoration and obligation of lapsed authority whenever they deem it appropriate." 564 F.2d at 589. The Pennsylvania decision was nevertheless correct, however, in that a separate statutory provision had extended the availability of the funds in question. 564 F.2d at 589 n.12. A case similar to Pennsylvania is Louisiana v. Weinberger, 369 F. Supp. 856 (E.D. La. 1973). The analog under current legislation would be obligation adjustments under 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a).

Thus, under Costle, the crucial test is not whether the court actually acted before the budget authority expired, but whether it had jurisdiction to act. As long as the suit is filed prior to the expiration date, the court acquires the necessary jurisdiction and has the equitable power to "revive" expired budget authority, even where preservation is first directed at the appellate level.

The principles set forth in Costle have been followed and applied in several more recent cases. Connecticut v. Schweiker, 684 F.2d 979 (D.C. Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1207 (1983); International Union, UAW v. Donovan, 570 F. Supp. 210 (D.D.C. 1983); Burton v. Thornburgh, 541 F. Supp. 168 (E.D. Pa. 1982); Grueschow v. Harris, 492 F. Supp. 419 (D.S.D. 1980), aff'd, 633 F.2d 1264 (8th Cir. 1980); Sodus Central School District v. Kreps, 468 F. Supp. 884 (W.D.N.Y. 1978); Township of River Vale v. Harris, 444 F. Supp. 90 (D.D.C. 1978). See also Dotson v. Department of Housing and Urban Development, 731 F.2d 313, 317 n.2 (6th Cir. 1984).

The application of the Costle doctrine "assumes that funds remain after the statutory lapse date." West Virginia Association of Community Health Centers, Inc. v. Heckler, 734 F.2d 1570, 1577 (D.C. Cir. 1984). Consequently, where all funds have properly been disbursed (the key word here is "properly"), the Costle doctrine no longer applies. Id. To an extent, this gives agencies the potential to circumvent the Costle doctrine simply by spending the money, as long as the obligations and disbursements are "proper." Recognizing this, the West Virginia court cautioned that "we do not mean to suggest our approval, in every case, of government decisions to expend funds over which a legal controversy exists." 734 F.2d at 1577 n.8. In addition, to prevent this potential loophole from swallowing up the rule, there is a logical corollary to the Costle doctrine to the effect that courts may enjoin the disbursement of funds already obligated where disbursement would have the effect of precluding effective relief and thereby rendering the case moot. Population Institute v. McPherson, 797 F.2d 1062 (D.C. Cir. 1986).[38] Similarly, the district court's injunction in Bennett v. Butz, quoted in 54 Comp. Gen. 962, included a provision mandating retention of the obligated balances until further order of the court.

In addition to the judicial authority noted above, there is a statute that seems to point in the same direction, 31 U.S.C. § 1502(b), which provides:

"A provision of law requiring that the balance of an appropriation or fund be returned to the general fund of the Treasury at the end of a definite period does not affect the status of lawsuits or rights of action involving the right to an amount payable from the balance."

The statute was enacted as part of a continuing resolution in 1973 (87 Stat. 134). Its legislative history, which is extremely scant, is found at 119 Cong. Rec. 22326 (June 29, 1973), and indicates that it was generated by certain impoundment litigation then in process.

For the most part, the courts have relied on their equitable powers and have made little use of 31 U.S.C. § 1502(b). Connecticut v. Schweiker cited the statute in passing in a footnote. 684 F.2d 979, at 996 n.29. The court in Township of River Vale v. Harris noted the statute, 444 F. Supp. at 94, but found it inapplicable because the funds in that case would have reverted to a revolving fund rather than the general fund of the Treasury. In Population Institute v. McPherson, 797 F.2d at 1081, and International Union v. Donovan, 570 F. Supp. at 220, the court cited section 1502(b) essentially as additional support for the rule that courts have the equitable power to prevent the expiration of budget authority in appropriate cases.

Note that the statute uses the words "lawsuits or rights of action." One court has relied on this language to reach a result perhaps one step beyond Costle. In Missouri v. Heckler, 579 F. Supp. 1452 (W.D. Mo. 1984), the plaintiff state sued the Department of Health and Human Services for reimbursement of expenditures under the Medicaid program. Based on Connecticut v. Schweiker, the court [38]The premise underlying all of these cases is that any monetary relief ultimately granted to the plaintiff is payable only from, and to the extent of, the preserved balances. See Chapter 14, section entitled "Impoundment/Assistance Funds" for case citations.

concluded that the plaintiff was clearly entitled to be paid. The court then reviewed a provision of the Department's FY 1983 continuing resolution and directed that the claims be paid in fiscal years 1984 through 1986. Alternatively, the court applied 31 U.S.C. § 1502(b) and held that the claims were payable from and to the extent of the unobligated balance of FY 1981 funds. Although Missouri had not filed its lawsuit prior to the end of FY 1981, it had filed its claims for reimbursement with HHS before then. The court found that "Missouri's right to reimbursement arose when it filed its claims in a timely fashion . . . and otherwise complied with the law and regulations then in effect. With this right to reimbursement came the concomitant right of action to enforce the claim for reimbursement." 579 F. Supp. at 1456.

The Missouri court further noted that if section 1502(b) is to meaningfully preserve the "status" of rights of action, it should also be construed as preserving the availability of funds. 579 F. Supp. at 1456 n.4.

The Comptroller General followed a similar approach in 62 Comp. Gen. 527 (1983). A labor union had filed an unfair labor practice charge with the statutorily created Foreign Service Labor Relations Board, based on a refusal by the United States Information Agency to implement a decision of the Foreign Service Impasse Disputes Panel. The dispute concerned fiscal year 1982 performance pay awards for members of the Senior Foreign Service. The question presented to GAO was the availability of FY 1982 funds to pay the awards after the end of the fiscal year. GAO first found 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(6) inapplicable, and then concluded that, by virtue of 31 U.S.C. § 1502(b), the unobligated balance of FY 1982 funds remained available for the awards. The unfair labor practice proceeding was a "right of action," and the statute therefore operated to preserve the availability of the funds.

Under the 1990 revision of 31 U.S.C. §§ 1551–1557, funds are "returned to the general fund of the Treasury" only when the account is closed, raising the question whether section 1502(b) continues to apply to expiration in addition to closing. If section 1502(b) is to be construed in light of its purpose, the answer would appear to be yes. See 70 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-238615, February 4, 1991).

Similar problems exist in the case of bid protests. If a protest is filed near the end of a fiscal year and the contract cannot be awarded until the protest is resolved, the contracting agency risks expiration of the funds. Congress addressed this situation in late 1989 by enacting a new 31 U.S.C. § 1558(a) as follows:[39]

"(a) [F]unds available to an agency for obligation for a contract at the time a protest is filed in connection with a solicitation for, proposed award of, or award of such contract shall remain available for obligation for 90 working days after the date on which the final ruling is made on the protest. A ruling is considered final on the date on which the time allowed for filing an appeal or request for reconsideration has expired, or the date on which a decision is rendered on such an appeal or request, whichever is later."

This provision applies to protests filed with GAO, the contracting agency, or a court under 31 U.S.C. §§ 3552 and 3556, and to protests filed with the General Services Board of Contract Appeals, the contracting agency, or a court under 40 U.S.C. § 759(f). 31 U.S.C. § 1558(b).

been duly approved (in this particular case, the applicant was also the approving official), obligated the government to pay the seminar fee subject to timely cancellation. Since the agency failed to give timely notice of cancellation, it was liable for the seminar fee.

In another 1966 case, a Defense Department employee was scheduled to attend a training seminar in New York but a severe snow storm prevented him from leaving Washington. (By Washington standards, this could have been two inches.) Since the employee's nonattendance was in no way attributable to the organization conducting the seminar, GAO concluded (citing B-159059) that the seminar fee should be paid. GAO rejected a contention that the government's obligation should be excused on the grounds of impossibility (the employee's nonattendance resulted from natural forces) since the arrangement permitted substitution of personnel. B-159820, September 30, 1966.

(3) Federally-sponsored meetings

Federally-sponsored meetings for employees (intra–agency or interagency), such as management or planning seminars, are not prohibited by 5 U.S.C. § 5946 since they are not meetings of a "society or association," nor are they prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1345 because they concern the discharge of official duties. The authority for this type of meeting is essentially a "necessary expense" question.

An increasingly common type of agency meeting is the "retreat type" conference. In this situation, some agency official with authority to do so determines that the participants should get away from their normal work environment and its associated interruptions such as telephones. Frequently, they need to get just far enough away to justify the payment of per diem allowances. While this type of meeting may be criticized as extravagant, it is within the agency's administrative discretion under the "necessary expense" rule and therefore not illegal. See B-193137, July 23, 1979.

Agency meetings at or near the participant's normal duty station may present special problems with respect to reimbursement for meals. In many cases, meals or snacks will be unauthorized even though there is nothing improper about conducting the meeting itself. This area is discussed in detail in Section C.5.

(4) Rental of space in District of Columbia

Originally enacted in 1877 (19 Stat. 370), 40 U.S.C. § 34 provides:

"No contract shall be made for the rent of any building, or part of any building, to be used for the purposes of the Government in the District of Columbia, until an appropriation therefor shall have been made in terms by Congress, and this clause shall be regarded as notice to all contractors or lessors of any such building or any part of building."

The statute does not prohibit the procurement of short-term conference facilities if otherwise proper. 54 Comp. Gen. 1055 (1975). In rendering this decision, which overruled several earlier cases, the Comptroller General relied heavily on the Federal Property Management Regulations, in which the General Services Administration construed the procurement of short-term conference facilities as a service contract rather than a rental contract.

However, the statute does prohibit the procurement of lodging accommodations in the District of Columbia in connection with a meeting or conference without specific statutory authority. 56 Comp. Gen. 572 (1977), modifying and affirming B-159633, September 10, 1974; 49 Comp. Gen. 305 (1969).[10] In 56 Comp. Gen. 572, GAO approved payment to the hotel of the difference between full per diem and the reduced per diem actually paid to the participating employees. This is because the agency could, without violating the statute, have paid full per diem to the employees if they had made the arrangements themselves on an individual basis. Thus, the difference represented a cost the agency would have properly incurred had it not procured the accommodations directly.

(5) Military personnel

Attendance at meetings by military personnel is governed by 37 U.S.C. § 412:

"Appropriations of the Department of Defense that are available for travel may not, without the approval of the Secretary concerned or his designee, be used for expenses incident to attendance of a member of an armed force under that department at a meeting of a technical, scientific, professional, or similar organization."

[10]49 Comp. Gen. 305 was one of the decisions listed as overruled in 54 Comp. Gen. 1055. However, the overruling action was later recognized to be erroneous and 49 Comp. Gen. 305 was reinstated in 56 Comp. Gen. 572, 574.

This statute, designed to provide a broad exception for the Defense Department from 5 U.S.C. § 5946, originated as an appropriation act rider in the mid-1940's and was enacted as permanent legislation by section 605 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Act for 1954, 67 Stat. 349.

The Government Employees Training Act, enacted in 1958 and discussed above, applies to civilian employees of the military departments but not to members of the uniformed services. 38 Comp. Gen. 312 (1958). Accordingly, the Comptroller General held in 1959 that the administrative approval specified in 37 U.S.C. § 412 was no longer required for civilian employees covered by the Training Act. However, the requirement of 37 U.S.C. § 412 remains applicable to members of the uniformed services. 38 Comp. Gen. 800 (1959). See also 55 Comp. Gen. 1332, 1335 (1976). The recodification of Title 37 in 1962 recognized this distinction and reworded the statute to its present form so as to apply only to members of the armed forces.

The administrative approval required by the statute is a prerequisite to the availability of the appropriation, and has the effect of removing the appropriation from the prohibition of 5 U.S.C. § 5946 to the extent of such approval. 34 Comp. Gen. 573, 575 (1955). Oral approval, if satisfactorily established by the record, is sufficient to meet the requirement of the statute. B-140082, August 19, 1959. However, where implementing departmental regulations establish more stringent requirements, such as advance approval in writing, the regulations will control. B-139173, June 2, 1959.

The administrative approval requirement of 37 U.S.C. § 412 does not apply to meetings sponsored by a federal department or agency. 50 Comp. Gen. 527 (1971).

b. Non-Government Personnel

(1) 31 U.S.C. § 1345

Quoted previously, 31 U.S.C. § 1345 prohibits the payment of travel, transportation, or subsistence expenses of private parties at meetings without specific statutory authority.

The Comptroller General set the tone for GAO's approach to 31 U.S.C. § 1345 in two cases decided shortly after the statute was enacted. In 14 Comp. Gen. 638 (1935), the Comptroller held that the Federal Housing Administration could not pay the travel and lodging expenses for attendance at meetings of private citizens who were cooperating with the FHA in a campaign to encourage the repair and modernization of real estate. GAO had no difficulty in finding that the statute barred payment:

> "There seems very little if any room for doubt as to the reasonable meaning and legal effect of [31 U.S.C. § 1345]. Simply stated, it is that no convention or other form of assemblage or gathering may be lodged, fed, conveyed, or furnished transportation at Government expense unless authority therefor is specifically granted by law." Id. at 640.

A few months later, relying on 14 Comp. Gen. 638, the Comptroller General held similarly that 31 U.S.C. § 1345 prohibited the American Battle Monuments Commission from providing transportation and refreshments for private individuals at monument dedication ceremonies in Europe. 14 Comp. Gen. 851 (1935). Other early decisions applying the statutory prohibition are 15 Comp. Gen. 1081 (1936); B-53554, November 6, 1945; B-27441, August 25, 1942; and A-66869, January 31, 1936.

Some more recent cases in which GAO found expenditures prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1345 are summarized below:

- The Environmental Protection Agency could not pay transportation and lodging expenses of state officials attending a National Solid Waste Management Association Convention. B-166506, July 15, 1975, affirmed in 55 Comp. Gen. 750 (1976).
- The Mine Safety and Health Administration, Department of Labor, could not pay travel and subsistence expenses of miners and mine operators attending safety and health training seminars. B-193644, July 2, 1979.
- Maritime Administration could not pay transportation and subsistence expenses of non-federal participants in a 2-week seminar for general publication maritime writers. B-168627, May 26, 1970.
- Navy could not pay for a dinner and cocktail party for non-government minority group leaders. B-176806-0.M., September 18, 1972.
- National Highway Traffic Safety Administration could not pay travel and lodging expenses of state officials at a workshop on odometer fraud. 62 Comp. Gen. 531 (1983).

GAO has not attempted to define precisely what types of gatherings are within the scope of the statutory prohibition. The determination is made on a case-by-case basis. The statutory language is broad and could presumably be construed to cover any situation where two or more persons are gathered together in one place. However, GAO has never adopted such a rigid view. For example, in 45 Comp. Gen. 476 (1966), a certifying officer of the Department of Agriculture asked whether he could "properly certify for payment a voucher covering payment for rental of a chartered bus for the transportation of female guests from Albuquerque to Grants, New Mexico, and return, for purposes of providing social and recreational services to Job Corps enrollees." (This is what the case says. The editors are not making it up.) The Comptroller General found that this was simply not the kind of "meeting" 31 U.S.C. § 1345 was intended to prohibit. Further, there was statutory authority for providing "recreational services" for the enrollees. Therefore, the expenditure was not illegal. The decision does not specify precisely what "social and recreational services" the women were bused in to provide.

As noted, the prohibition of 31 U.S.C. § 1345 can be overcome by specific statutory authority. An example of such authority is language in an appropriation act making the appropriation available for "expenses of attendance at meetings" or similar language.[11] See 34 Comp. Gen. 321 (1955); 24 Comp. Gen. 86 (1944); 17 Comp. Gen. 838 (1938); 16 Comp. Gen. 839 (1937); B-117137, September 25, 1953. (This is the same language used before enactment of the Government Employees Training Act to grant exceptions from 5 U.S.C. § 5946.)

In one case, less-than-specific authority was found adequate. In 35 Comp. Gen. 129 (1955), GAO considered a statute which (1) provided for a "White House Conference on Education;" (2) specified that the conference be broadly representative of educators and other interested persons from all parts of the United States; and (3) authorized appropriations necessary for the "administration" of the act. The decision held this sufficient to make the ensuing appropriations available for the travel costs of the invitees. While the decision does not mention 31 U.S.C. § 1345, the distinction is readily apparent. Here, holding the conference was more than merely a legitimate means of implementing the enabling statute; it was the very purpose of the statute and hence the only means. See also [11] In some cases, the authority has been made permanent. An example is 31 U.S.C. § 326(a) for the Treasury Department, construed in 37 Comp. Gen. 708 (1958). Another example is subsection (2) of 31 U.S.C. § 1345 concerning meetings of 4-H Clubs, noted in B-166506, July 15, 1975.

appropriation. Anything less would render congressional control largely meaningless. One early Treasury Comptroller was of the opinion that the statute did not make any new law, but merely codified what was already required under the Appropriations Clause of the Constitution. 4 Lawrence, First Comp. Dec. 137, 142 (1883).

Administrative applications of the purpose statute can be traced back almost to the time the statute was enacted. See, for example, 36 Comp. Gen. 621, 622 (1957), which quotes part of a decision dated February 21, 1821. In an 1898 decision captioned "Misapplication of Appropriations," the Comptroller of the Treasury talked about 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) in these terms:

> "It is difficult to see how a legislative prohibition could be expressed in stronger terms. The law is plain, and any disbursing officer disregards it at his peril." 4 Comp. Dec. 569, 570 (1898).

The starting point in applying 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) is that, absent a clear indication to the contrary, the common meaning of the words in the appropriation act and the program legislation it funds governs the purposes to which the appropriation may be applied. To illustrate, the Comptroller General held in 41 Comp. Gen. 255 (1961) that an appropriation available for the "replacement" of state roads damaged by nearby federal dam construction could be used only to restore those roads to their former condition, not for improvements such as widening. Similarly, funds provided for the modification of existing dams for safety purposes could not be used to construct a new dam, even as part of an overall safety strategy. B-215782, April 7, 1986.

If a proposed use of funds is inconsistent with the statutory language, the expenditure is improper, even if it would result in substantial savings or other benefits to the government. Thus, while the Federal Aviation Administration could construct its own roads needed for access to FAA facilities, it could not contribute a share for the improvement of county-owned roads, even though the latter undertaking would have been much less expensive. B-143536, August 15, 1960. See also 39 Comp. Gen. 388 (1959).

The concept of purpose permeates much of this publication. Thus, many of the rules discussed in Chapter 2 relate to purpose. For example:

35 Comp. Gen. 198 (1955) (discussing other funding issues under the same legislation). A more recent case applying 35 Comp. Gen. 129 to a similar situation is B-242880, March 27, 1991.

However, general statutory authority to disseminate information to the public, or to promote or encourage cooperation with the private sector, or to provide technical assistance or education to specified segments of the private sector, is not sufficiently specific to overcome 31 U.S.C. § 1345. See 62 Comp. Gen. 531 (1983); B-193644, July 2, 1979; B-166506, July 15, 1975; B-168627, May 26, 1970.

A distinction must be drawn between the authority to sponsor a meeting and the authority to pay the types of expenses prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1345. An agency may be able to do the former but not the latter. Thus, in B-166506, July 15, 1975, GAO pointed out that the Environmental Protection Agency could hold a solid waste management convention as a legitimate means of implementing its functions under the Solid Waste Disposal Act. What it could not do without more specific statutory authority was pay the travel and lodging expenses of the state participants. Sponsoring the meeting itself is essentially a "necessary expense" question. See also 62 Comp. Gen. 531 (1983). Cf. 45 Comp. Gen. 333 (1965); B-147552, November 29, 1961.

Thus, depending on the agency's statutory authority, it may be authorized to incur such expenses as renting conference facilities, financing the participation of its own employees, bringing in guest speakers, both federal and non-federal, and preparing and disseminating literature. The prohibition of 31 U.S.C. § 1345 comes into play only when the agency purports to pay the travel, transportation, or subsistence expenses of non-federal attendees.

Another thing the agency may be able to do is permit the use of government facilities for the meeting. For example, in B-168627, May 26, 1970, while the Maritime Administration could not pick up the tab for the participation of non-government persons at a seminar, it could permit the seminar to be held at the United States Merchant Marine Academy. The rule, stated in that decision, is that an agency has authority to grant to a private individual or business a "revocable license" to use government property, subject to termination at any time at the will of the government, provided that such use does not injure the property in question and serves some purpose useful or beneficial to the government.

(2) Invitational travel

Another statute we should note is 5 U.S.C. § 5703, which provides:

"An employee serving intermittently in the Government service as an expert or consultant . . . or serving without pay or at $1 a year, may be allowed travel or transportation expenses, under this subchapter, while away from his home or regular place of business and at the place of employment or service."

This statute originated as an appropriation act rider in 1945 and was enacted as permanent legislation the following year as section 5 of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 608). To the extent it authorizes payment in the so-called "invitational travel" situation—a private party called upon by the government to confer or advise on government business—it represents a limited exception to 31 U.S.C. § 1345.

Even before 5 U.S.C. § 5703 was enacted, GAO had recognized that a private individual "invited" by the government to confer on official business was entitled to reimbursement of travel expenses if specified in the request and justified as a necessary expense. 8 Comp. Gen. 465 (1929); 4 Comp. Gen. 281 (1924); A-41751, April 15, 1932.

The enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1345 in 1935 did not change this. Thus, the Comptroller General recognized in 15 Comp. Gen. 91, 92 (1935) that while the newly-enacted statute might prohibit the payment of expenses of private individuals called together as a group, it would not apply to "individuals called to Washington or elsewhere for consultation as individuals." See also A-81080, October 27, 1936. Viewed in this light, the 1946 enactment of 5 U.S.C. § 5703 in large measure merely gave express congressional sanction to a rule that had already developed in the decisions.

Although GAO did not directly address the relationship between 5 U.S.C. § 5703 and 31 U.S.C. § 1345 until 1976 (55 Comp. Gen. 750, below), the relevant principles were established in several earlier cases. In one of GAO's earliest decisions under 5 U.S.C. § 5703, the Comptroller General held that persons who are not government officers or employees may, "when requested by a proper officer to travel for the purpose of conferring upon official Government matters," be regarded as persons serving without pay and therefore entitled to travel expenses under 5 U.S.C. § 5703. 27 Comp. Gen. 183 (1947). See also 39 Comp. Gen. 55 (1959). Thus, the rule of 8 Comp.

Gen. 465 now had a statutory basis. A critical prerequisite is this: In order to qualify under 5 U.S.C. § 5703, the individual must be performing a direct service for the government. 37 Comp. Gen. 349 (1957).

Once the proposition of 27 Comp. Gen. 183 is accepted, it is but a short step to recognizing that a private individual called upon to advise on government business may be called upon to do so in the form of making a presentation at a meeting or conference. See, for example, B-111310, September 4, 1952, and 33 Comp. Gen. 39 (1953), in which payment under 5 U.S.C. § 5703 was authorized. The statute could not reasonably be limited to "one-on-one" consultations. As stated in B-196088, November 1, 1979, "[i]t is not unusual for the Government to invite an individual with a particular expertise to attend a meeting and to share the benefit of his views without compensation other than by way of reimbursement for his travel and transportation expenses."

Thus, travel expenses of private individuals "invited" to participate in meetings sponsored by the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Working Life were properly paid under 5 U.S.C. § 5703. B-192734, November 24, 1978. Similarly, the Internal Revenue Service could invoke 5 U.S.C. § 5703 to buy lunches for guest speakers invited to participate in a ceremony observing National Black History Month since the ceremony was an authorized part of the agency's formal program to advance equal opportunity objectives. 60 Comp. Gen. 303 (1981).

There is a limit to this rationale and a point at which 5 U.S.C. § 5703 collides head-on with 31 U.S.C. § 1345. This point was discussed in 55 Comp. Gen. 750 (1976) and reiterated in B-193644, July 2, 1979. As noted above, 55 Comp. Gen. 750 affirmed B-166506, July 15, 1975, holding that 31 U.S.C. § 1345 prohibited the Environmental Protection Agency from paying travel and lodging expenses of state officials at a solid waste management convention; B-193644 reached the same result for safety and training seminars for miners and mine operators. In both cases, the Comptroller General rejected the suggestion that the expenses could somehow be authorized under the "invitational travel" statute. In neither case were the attendees providing a direct service for the government, even though in both cases the government may have derived some incidental benefit in terms of enhancement of program objectives. The following passage illustrates the "collision point:"

"We thus do not believe that [5 U.S.C. § 5703] was ever intended to establish the proposition that anyone may be deemed a person serving without compensation merely because he or she is attending a meeting or convention, the subject matter of which is related to the official business of some Federal department or agency . . . . We believe that being called upon to confer with agency staff on official business is different from attending a meeting or convention in which a department or agency is also interested." 55 Comp. Gen. at 752-53.

Thus, 5 U.S.C. § 5703 permits an agency to invite a private individual (or more than one) to a meeting or conference at government expense, but only if that individual is legitimately performing a direct service for the government such as making a presentation or advising in an area of expertise. However, it is not a device for circumventing 31 U.S.C. § 1345. The "direct service" test is not met merely because the agency is interested in the subject matter of the conference or because the conference will enhance the agency's program objectives.

(3) Use of grant funds

One of the principles of grant law is that, where a grant is made for an authorized grant purpose, the grant funds in the hands of the grantee largely lose their identity as federal funds and are no longer subject to many of the restrictions applicable to the direct expenditure of appropriations. One of those restrictions which does not apply to grant funds in the hands of a grantee is 31 U.S.C. § 1345.

For example, the American Law Institute could use funds provided by the Environmental Protection Agency in the form of a statutorily authorized training grant to defray transportation and subsistence expenses of law students and practicing environmental lawyers at an environmental law seminar. 55 Comp. Gen. 750 (1976). For this result to apply, the grant must be made for an authorized grant purpose and there must be no provision to the contrary in the grant agreement. Once these conditions are met, the grantee's use of the funds is not impaired by 31 U.S.C. § 1345. However, an agency may not use the grant mechanism for the sole purpose of circumventing 31 U.S.C. § 1345, that is, to do indirectly that which it could not do directly. In other words, if an agency makes a grant for an authorized purpose, and the grantee sponsors a meeting or conference as a means of implementing that purpose, the grantee's use of the funds will not be restrained by 31 U.S.C.

§ 1345. However, unless otherwise authorized, the agency could not make the grant for the purpose of sponsoring the conference and thereby permitting payments it could not make by direct expenditure.

Depending on the precise statutory authority involved, there may be situations in which sponsoring or helping to sponsor a conference is itself an authorized grant purpose. One example is B-83261, February 10, 1949 (grant to American Cancer Society under Public Health Service Act).

The treatment of grant funds described above does not apply to procurement contracts. 62 Comp. Gen. 531 (1983).

3. Attorney's Fees

a. Introduction

Questions on the availability of appropriated funds to pay attorney's fees arise in many contexts. Attorney's fees awarded by courts are discussed in Chapter 14. This section deals with administrative payments.

Traditionally, the United States has followed what has come to be known as the "American Rule," that each party in litigation or administrative proceedings is personally responsible for his or her own attorney's fees. In other words, in the absence of statutory authority to the contrary, the losing party may not be forced to pay the winner's attorney. Alyeska Pipeline Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240 (1975).

One application of the American Rule is that a claimant who prosecutes an administrative claim against the United States is not entitled to reimbursement of legal fees unless authorized by statute. E.g., 57 Comp. Gen. 554 (1978); 49 Comp. Gen. 44 (1969); 37 Comp. Gen. 485, 487 (1958); B-189045, January 26, 1979. To illustrate, a vendor who successfully filed a claim for the payment of goods sold and delivered to a Navy vessel was not entitled to reimbursement of attorney's fees. B-187877, April 14, 1977. Similarly non-reimbursable were legal fees incurred incident to prosecuting a claim for damages for breach of an oral agreement. B-188607, July 19, 1977. "Fairness" and "decency," however appealing, do not compensate for the lack of statutory authority. 67 Comp. Gen. 574, 576 (1988); 57 Comp. Gen. 856, 861 (1978).

Payments to attorneys also arise in a number of situations which are, strictly speaking, not applications of the American Rule, that is, which do not involve payment of fees to a "prevailing party." The approach in these cases is to look first for statutory authority and if express statutory authority does not exist, apply the various principles discussed throughout this publication, such as the necessary expense doctrine.

For example, a private attorney sought reimbursement for out-of-pocket expenses he incurred incident to a "special proceeding" initiated by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to investigate charges of misconduct raised by the attorney against NRC staff members and by the staff members against the attorney. There was no statutory authority to reimburse the attorney, nor could the payment be justified as a necessary expense since it was not reasonably necessary to carrying out NRC functions. Therefore, payment was unauthorized. B-192784, January 10, 1979. In another case, the Small Business Administration could not reimburse a bank for legal fees the bank incurred in protecting its interest in an SBA-guaranteed loan since SBA neither contracted with the attorney nor did it benefit from his services. B-187950, April 26, 1977.

The Justice Department has held that legal fees incurred by a Cabinet nominee in connection with Senate confirmation hearings, for services rendered before the nominating administration took office, could be paid either from Presidential Transition Act appropriations or from private sources. 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 126 (1981).

The remainder of this section will discuss the situations which have been most commonly addressed in decisions of the Comptroller General.

b. Hiring of Attorneys by Government Agencies

During the first century of the Republic, government agencies who needed lawyers either as counsellors or litigators simply went out and hired them. Not only was this system expensive (payments from the public treasury are not conducive to reduced fees), it resulted in inconsistencies in the government's legal position. Congress remedied the situation in 1870 by creating the Department of Justice, headed by the Attorney General. Act of June 22, 1870, 41st Cong., 2d Sess., ch. 150, 16 Stat. 162.

To assure that the objectives of the 1870 legislation would be achieved, Congress included section 17 which (a) prohibited executive agencies from employing attorneys at the expense of the United States, and (b) prohibited payments to attorneys, except those employed by the Justice Department, unless the Attorney General certified that the services could not be performed by the Justice Department. The two parts of section 17 subsequently became Revised Statutes §§ 189 and 365.

As the federal government grew in size and complexity, it became apparent that the need for centralization of legal services within the Justice Department related primarily to the specialty of litigation. Thus, with congressional approval, federal agencies regularly employed attorneys to serve as legal advisers. (The term "Attorney-Adviser" is still commonly used to designate staff attorneys in many government agencies.) When Title 5 of the United States Code was recodified in 1966, the successors of Revised Statutes §§ 189 and 365 were combined into the new 5 U.S.C. § 3106. This statute, reflecting the evolved state of the law, prohibits agencies, unless otherwise authorized by law, from employing attorneys "for the conduct of litigation in which the United States, an agency, or employee thereof is a party, or is interested." The agencies are required to refer such matters to the Justice Department.[12] Thus, agencies routinely employ attorneys to provide legal services other than litigation, but may not employ attorneys as litigators unless they have statutory authority to conduct their own litigation or unless that authority has been delegated to them by the Attorney General.

Normally, in view of the existence of the Justice Department and the agency's own staff attorneys, the need for a federal agency to retain private counsel should rarely occur. Indeed, GAO has found it unauthorized for an agency to retain private counsel to provide legal opinions on matters within the Justice Department's jurisdiction under statutes such as 28 U.S.C. §§ 511-514. 16 Comp. Gen. 1089 (1937). In limited situations, the Comptroller General has held that the retention of private attorneys as experts or consultants under 5 U.S.C. § 3109 is authorized. For example, in B-192406, October 12, [12]Many early decisions will be found dealing with Revised Statutes §§ 189 and 365. E.g., 6 Comp. Gen. 517 (1927); 5 Comp. Gen. 382 (1925). For the most part they may be disregarded as applying statutory provisions which have since become obsolete. However, decisions under R.S. §§ 189 and 365 remain valid to the extent they concern the elements of those statutes which survived into 5 U.S.C. § 3106. E.g., 32 Comp. Gen. 118 (1952).

1978, GAO concluded that the (then) Civil Service Commission could hire a private law firm under 5 U.S.C. § 3109 to serve as "special counsel" to the Chairman to investigate alleged merit system abuses, since the matter was not covered by 5 U.S.C. § 3106 nor otherwise under the jurisdiction of the Justice Department. Similarly, the Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Commission could retain a private attorney under 5 U.S.C. § 3109 as an independent contractor to handle matters beyond the Justice Department's jurisdiction, where the workload was insufficient to justify hiring a full-time attorney. B-114868.18, February 10, 1978.

For similar holdings, see Boyle v. United States, 309 F.2d 399 (Ct. Cl. 1962) (retired government patent lawyer retained on part-time basis); 61 Comp. Gen. 69 (1981) (U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy could hire law firm to provide legal analysis of its authority and independence); B-210518, January 18, 1984 (Environmental Protection Agency could retain private counsel to provide independent analysis of issues relating to congressional contempt citation of Administrator); B-133381, July 22, 1977; B-141529, July 15, 1963.

Agencies may have specific authority to retain special counsel in addition to the lawyers on the regular payroll. For example, appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission have traditionally included "special counsel fees." The Comptroller General has construed this authority as permitting contractual arrangements with former employees as retired annuitants to perform functions for which they were uniquely qualified. Since the appropriation provision constitutes independent authority, the contracts are not subject to the salary limitations of 5 U.S.C. § 3109. 53 Comp. Gen. 702 (1974); B-180708, January 30, 1976. However, the authority is limited to services of the legal profession and does not embrace "counsel" in a broader sense. B-180708, July 22, 1975.

c. Suits Against Government Officers and Employees

At one time, government employees were considered largely immune from being sued for actions they took while performing their official duties. This is no longer true. For a variety of reasons, it is no longer uncommon for a government employee to be sued in his individual capacity for something he did (or failed to do) while performing his job. For example, the Supreme Court held in 1978 that an Executive official has only a "qualified immunity" for so-called "constitutional torts" (alleged violations of constitutional rights). Butz v. Economou, 438 U.S. 478 (1978). In any event, regardless of whether the employee ultimately wins or loses, he has to defend the suit and therefore will need professional legal representation.

As a general proposition, GAO considers the hiring of an attorney to be a matter between the attorney and the client, and this is no less true when the client is a government officer or employee. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 1418, 1419 (1976). However, the decisions have long recognized another principle as well: Where an officer of the United States is sued because of some official act done in the discharge of an official duty, the expense of defending the suit should be borne by the United States. E.g., 6 Comp. Gen. 214 (1926). This section will discuss when appropriated funds may be used for attorney's fees to defend a government officer or employee.

Generally, when a present or former employee is sued for actions performed as part of his official duties, his defense is provided by the Department of Justice. In order for a given case to be eligible for Justice Department representation, the Justice Department must determine that the employee's action which gave rise to the suit was performed within the scope of federal employment, and that providing representation is in the interest of the United States.

The role of the Justice Department derives from a number of statutory provisions: 28 U.S.C. §§ 515-519, 543, and 547. See also Executive Order No. 6166, § 5 (1933). These provisions establish the Justice Department as the government's litigator,[13] which for the most part means representation by Justice Department attorneys. To reinforce these provisions, 5 U.S.C. § 3106, previously noted, prohibits executive or military agencies from employing attorneys for the conduct of litigation in which the United States or one of its agencies or employees is a party or is interested. The agencies must refer such matters to the Justice Department. The Justice Department has also issued implementing regulations, found at 28 C.F.R. §§ 50.15 and 50.16.[14] This statutory and regulatory scheme is designed to encourage employees to vigorously carry out their [13]For a discussion of the historical evolution and current legal basis of the Attorney General's role as "chief litigator," see 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 47 (1982). In addition, an agency may call upon the Justice Department for help in performing the legal investigation of any claim pending in that agency. 28 U.S.C. § 514.

duties by assuring them of an adequate defense at no cost if they should be sued in the course of executing their responsibilities.

However, the Attorney General's decision to provide or not provide counsel to an individual employee sued for official actions is discretionary and not subject to judicial review. Falkowski v. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 783 F.2d 252 (D.C. Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 478 U.S. 1014. The Attorney General may take into consideration "how blameworthy or litigation-prone the employee seeking representation may be." Id. at 254.

In addition, the Comptroller General has recognized that the statutes cited above authorize the Justice Department to retain private counsel, payable from Justice Department appropriations, if determined necessary and in the interest of the United States. E.g., B-22494, January 10, 1942. For example, the Justice Department will not provide representation if the employee is the target of a criminal investigation, but may authorize private counsel at Justice Department expense if a decision to seek an indictment has not yet been made. The Justice Department may also authorize private counsel if it perceives a conflict of interest between the legal or factual positions of different government defendants in the same case. 28 C.F.R. §§ 50.15 and 50.16. See 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 66 (1978); 56 Comp. Gen. 615, 621-624 (1977);[15] B-150136/B-130441, May 19, 1978; B-130441, May 8, 1978; B-130441, April 12, 1978.

Thus, an employee who learns that he is being sued should first explore the possibility of obtaining representation through the Justice Department. Procedures for requesting representation are found in 28 C.F.R. § 50.15(a). The importance of this step must be emphasized. If the employee fails to immediately seek Justice Department representation, he may find, as discussed below, that he is stuck footing the bill for his attorney's fees even in cases where the expense might otherwise have been paid by the government.

If Justice Department representation is unavailable, there are limited situations in which appropriations of the employing agency may be available to retain private counsel. Generally, before an [15]56 Comp. Gen. 615 dealt with civil actions against employees under section 7217 of the Internal Revenue Code for improper disclosure of tax returns. Section 7217 has since been repealed, and the remedy is now a suit for damages against the United States under 26 U.S.C. § 7431.

- A specific appropriation must be used to the exclusion of a more general appropriation which might otherwise have been viewed as available for the particular item. Chapter 2, Section B.2.
- Transfer between appropriations is prohibited without specific statutory authority, even where reimbursement is contemplated. Chapter 2, Section B.3.

It follows that deliberately charging the wrong appropriation for purposes of expediency or administrative convenience, with the expectation of rectifying the situation by a subsequent transfer from the right appropriation, violates 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). 36 Comp. Gen. 386 (1956); 26 Comp. Gen. 902, 906 (1947); 19 Comp. Gen. 395 (1939); 14 Comp. Gen. 103 (1934); B-97772, May 18, 1951; B-104135, August 2, 1951.[1] The fact that the expenditure would be authorized under some other appropriation is irrelevant. Charging the "wrong" appropriation, unless authorized by some statute such as 31 U.S.C. § 1534, violates the purpose statute. For several examples, see GAO report entitled Improper Accounting for Costs of Architect of the Capitol Projects, PLRD-81-4 (April 13, 1981).

The transfer rule illustrates the close relationship between 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) and statutes relating to amount such as the Antideficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341. An unauthorized transfer violates 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) because the transferred funds would be used for a purpose other than that for which they were originally appropriated. If the receiving appropriation is exceeded, the Antideficiency Act is also violated.

Although every violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) is not automatically a violation of the Antideficiency Act, and every violation of the Antideficiency Act is not automatically a violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a), cases frequently involve elements of both. Thus, an expenditure in excess of an available appropriation violates both statutes. The reason the purpose statute is violated is that, unless the disbursing officer used personal funds, he or she must necessarily have used money appropriated for other purposes. 4 Comp. Dec. 314, 317 (1897). The relationship between purpose violations and the Antideficiency Act is explored further in Chapter 6.

[1]The situation dealt with in B-97772 and B-104135, advances of travel expenses to government employees serving as witnesses, is now authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 5751.

agency can consider using its own funds, Justice Department representation must first have been sought and must be appropriate but unavailable, and representation must be in the interest of the United States. The employee's personal interest in the outcome does not automatically preempt a legitimate government interest. The two may exist side-by-side.

One case, 53 Comp. Gen. 301 (1973), dealt with suits against federal judges and other judicial officers. The suits arise in a variety of contexts, often involving collateral attacks on the judges' rulings in original actions. While many of the suits are frivolous, some sort of defense, even if only a pro forma submission, is almost always necessary. In many cases, such as actions where no personal relief is sought against the judicial officer, or in potential conflict of interest situations, the Justice Department has determined that it cannot or will not provide representation. The Comptroller General held that judiciary appropriations are available to pay the costs of litigation, including "minimal fees" to private attorneys, if determined to be in the best interest of the United States and necessary to carry out the purposes of the appropriation. However, the Comptroller General added that (1) the Justice Department must have declined representation, although individual requests are not required for cases falling within the Attorney General's stated policy; (2) the determination of necessity cannot be made by the individual defendant but must be made by the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts; and (3) the Administrative Office should make full disclosure to the appropriate congressional committees. Under similar circumstances, appropriations for the public defender service are available to defend federal public defenders appointed under the Criminal Justice Act who are sued for actions taken within the scope of their duties. Id. at 306.

In 55 Comp. Gen. 408 (1975), the United States Attorney had agreed to defend a former Small Business Administration employee who was sued for acts performed within the scope of his employment. The U.S. Attorney later withdrew from the case even though the government's interest in defending the former employee continued. In order to protect his own interests, the employee retained the services of a private attorney. Since the Justice Department had determined that it was in the interest of the United States to defend the employee and had undertaken to provide him with legal representation, the Comptroller General held that SBA could reimburse the employee for legal fees incurred as a result of his obtaining private counsel when representation by the United States subsequently became unavailable.

While 53 Comp. Gen. 301 and 55 Comp. Gen. 408 are widely viewed as establishing the concept that, in appropriate circumstances, agency appropriations may be available to pay private attorney's fees to defend an employee, several later cases established some of the limits on the concept.

If the employee fails to request Justice Department representation in a timely fashion, the employee may be forced to bear the expense of any private legal fees incurred. In B-195314, June 23, 1980, an employee of the Internal Revenue Service was sued for improper disclosure of confidential information. The employee requested Justice Department representation, but not until after she had hired a private attorney to file an answer in order to avoid a default judgment. The Justice Department agreed to provide representation, but declined to pay the private legal fees since the case was not within either of the situations permitted under the Justice Department regulations. Since the facts could not support a finding that Justice Department representation was appropriate but unavailable, IRS appropriations could not be used either. The need to take prompt action to avoid a default judgment makes no difference since the regulations expressly provide for provisional representation on the basis of telephone contact.

If the actions giving rise to the suit are not within the scope of the employee's official duties, even though related, there is no entitlement to government representation and hence no legal basis to reimburse attorney's fees. For example, in 57 Comp. Gen. 444 (1978), a Department of Agriculture employee was sued for libel by his supervisor because of allegations contained in letters the employee had written to various public officials. At the employee's insistence, Agriculture wrote to the Justice Department to request representation. However, Agriculture concluded that, while some of the employee's actions had been within the scope of his official duties, others—such as writing letters to the President and to a Senator—were not. Before Justice reached its decision, the employee retained private counsel and was successful in having the suit dismissed. Subsequently, Justice determined that the employee would not have been eligible for representation since Agriculture had been unwilling to say that all of the employee's actions were within the scope of his official duties. On this basis, GAO found no entitlement to government representation and disallowed the employee's claim for reimbursement of his legal fees.

Similarly, GAO denied a claim for legal fees where an Army Reserve member on inactive duty was arrested by the FBI, charged with larceny of government property, and the charge was later dismissed. The government property involved consisted of service weapons and ammunition. The member had been authorized to retain weapons and ammunition in his personal possession, although it is not clear from the decision how this authority justified the possession of seven guns and over 100,000 rounds of ammunition, which is what the FBI found. In any event, the member's actions did not result from the performance of required official duties but were at best permissible under existing regulations. Therefore, there was no entitlement to either government-furnished or government-financed representation. B-185612, August 12, 1976.

A related situation is where an employee incurs legal fees defending against a fine. In the section of this chapter on Fines and Penalties, a distinction is drawn between an action which is a necessary part of an employee's official duties and an action which, although taken in the course of performing official duties, is not a necessary part of them. By logical application of this reasoning, where the fine itself is not reimbursable, related legal fees are similarly non-reimbursable. Thus, in 57 Comp. Gen. 270 (1978), the Comptroller General held that the employing agency could not pay legal fees incurred by one of its employees defending against a reckless driving charge, where the Justice Department had declined to provide representation or to authorize retention of private counsel. See also B-192880, February 27, 1979 (non-decision letter).

Questions over reimbursement of legal fees also arise in a number of non-judicial contexts. In B-193712, May 24, 1979, GAO concluded that the Central Intelligence Agency could reimburse a staff psychiatrist, who had been directed to prepare a psychological profile of Daniel Ellsberg as part of his official duties, for the cost of legal representation before congressional investigating committees and professional organizations. While the Justice Department regulations authorize representation at congressional proceedings on the same basis as in lawsuits (28 C.F.R. § 50.15(a)), this is not an area within Justice's exclusive representation authority. Therefore, while it may be desirable to first request Justice Department representation, failure to do so in this case did not preclude the use of CIA appropriations, based on an administrative determination that the psychiatrist's activities were necessary to carry out authorized CIA functions. As in the judicial context, payment is generally unauthorized where it is not in furtherance of an official agency interest. See GAO report, Postal Service: Board of Governors' Contract for Legal Services, GAO/GGD-87-12 (February 1987) (questioning propriety of payment of legal fees of Board member incident to congressional investigation of pre-nomination activities).

The Justice Department will not provide representation in administrative disciplinary proceedings because of the potential conflict in the event the employee later sues the government. In one case, GAO concluded that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission could retain private counsel to represent two NRC staff members at a disciplinary proceeding where the agency determined that the employees had been acting within the scope of their authority. B-127945, April 5, 1979. See also B-192784, January 10, 1979.

In another case, however, 58 Comp. Gen. 613 (1979), the Securities and Exchange Commission could not reimburse the legal fees of an SEC employee at a disciplinary hearing even though the proceeding was ultimately resolved in the employee's favor. The distinction is that in the NRC case, the misconduct charge had been raised and pursued by a third party, whereas in the SEC case, while the charge was initially raised by an outside party, it was pursued based on the SEC's independent determination to investigate the allegation. Also, the determination to provide legal representation must be made at the outset of the proceedings and not at the end based on the outcome. GAO reached the same result in B-212487, April 17, 1984 (Inspector General misconduct investigation).

An agency may use its appropriated funds to provide legal representation for an employee brought before the Merit Systems Protection Board on complaint by the MSPB Special Counsel, if the agency determines that the employee's conduct was in furtherance of or incident to carrying out his or her official duties, and that providing representation would be in the government's interest. 67 Comp. Gen. 37 (1987); 61 Comp. Gen. 515 (1982). If the agency makes the required determinations, the expenditure is viewed as a "necessary expense" of the agency or function. While the necessary expense theory is the legal basis, the underlying policy is expressed in the following excerpt:

"Surely federal employees must be answerable for illegal conduct. Yet it can be in the interest of neither the government as a whole nor the taxpayers we serve to have employees afraid to function out of fear of being bankrupted by a lawsuit arising out of the good faith performance of their jobs." 67 Comp. Gen. at 37-38.

Appropriated funds may not be used to pay legal fees incurred by an "alleged discriminating official" in a discrimination complaint. 61 Comp. Gen. 411 (1982); B-201183, February 1, 1985.

Government-financed legal counsel was also held improper at a grievance hearing where the legal liability of the employee was not an issue and the purpose of the hearing was solely to develop facts. 55 Comp. Gen. 1418 (1976).

Where reimbursement of legal fees under the above principles is authorized, it is a discretionary payment and not a legal entitlement of the employee. The agency's responsibilities and discretion are summarized in the following paragraph from 67 Comp. Gen. 37, 38 (1987):

"[I]t should be understood that payment in this type of case is not a legal liability on the part of the agency, but is essentially a discretionary payment. As such, an agency is not required to pay the entire amount of the fees actually charged in any given case. The controlling concept under fee-shifting statutes is a 'reasonable' attorney's fee, and there is a vast body of judicial precedent applying this concept under statutes such as the Back Pay Act and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. This body of precedent is available to provide guidance to agencies in evaluating the reasonableness of claims. Also, since payment is discretionary, an agency is free to formulate administrative policies with respect to treatment of claims of this type. Of course, any such policies should be applied fairly and consistently."

The preceding cases have all involved legal fees incurred for representation of the employee. A different situation occurred in 59 Comp. Gen. 489 (1980). In 1969, local police raided a Chicago apartment housing members of the Black Panther Party. The raid erupted into violence and two of the occupants were killed. Subsequently, the surviving occupants and the estates of the deceased sued state law enforcement officials and several agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, alleging violations of civil rights and the Illinois wrongful death statute. The Justice Department represented the federal defendants, who were being sued in their individual capacities.

As the litigation progressed, a possibility emerged that the court might grant the plaintiffs an award of attorney's fees, in part against the FBI agents. The Justice Department asked whether FBI appropriations would be available to reimburse such an award. In the past, the Comptroller General has at times declined to render decisions on questions which are premature and essentially hypothetical. Here, however, in view of the legal strategy proposed by the Justice Department (the case also involved issues raising the potential liability of the United States), it was important to know if the fees could be reimbursed because if they could not, it might be necessary for the defendants to retain private counsel to represent their interests. The Comptroller General resolved the question by applying the necessary expense doctrine. If the FBI made an administrative determination, supported by substantial evidence, that the actions giving rise to the award constituted officially authorized conduct and were taken as a necessary part of the defendants' official duties, it could reimburse the award from its Salaries and Expenses appropriation.

Finally, the concept of using agency appropriations for legal fees when Justice Department representation is unavailable has arisen in one context that is unrelated to suits against government employees. Under 25 U.S.C. § 175, the United States Attorneys will generally represent Indian tribes, and under 25 U.S.C. § 13, the Bureau of Indian Affairs may spend money appropriated for the benefit of Indians for general and incidental expenses relating to the administration of Indian affairs. Construing these provisions, the Comptroller General has held that the Bureau of Indian Affairs could use appropriated funds to pay legal fees incurred by Indian tribes in judicial litigation, including intervention actions and cases where the tribe is the plaintiff, when conflict of interest makes Justice Department representation unavailable. However, the Bureau must first give the Justice Department the option of providing or declining to provide representation. The Bureau may also use appropriated funds for legal fees of Indian tribes in administrative proceedings in which the Justice Department does not participate. 56 Comp. Gen. 123 (1976).

d. Claims by Federal Employees

(1) Discrimination proceedings

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, made applicable to the federal government by the Equal Employment Opportunity Amendments of 1972, broadly prohibits employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. Two statutory provisions are relevant to the awarding of attorney's fees. Judicial awards, covered in Chapter 14, are governed by 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(k), which authorizes courts to award reasonable attorney's fees to non-federal prevailing parties. In addition, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-16(b) directs the (former) Civil Service Commission to enforce Title VII in the federal government "through appropriate remedies . . . as will effectuate the policies of this section." The enforcement function was transferred to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in 1978.

The concept of administrative fee awards developed largely as the result of a series of court decisions. First, the courts held that a court can award attorney's fees to include compensation for services performed in related administrative proceedings as well as the lawsuit itself. Parker v. Califano, 561 F.2d 320 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Johnson v. United States, 554 F.2d 632 (4th Cir. 1977). Then, the District Court for the District of Columbia held that Title VII authorized the administrative awarding of attorney's fees. Patton v. Andrus, 459 F. Supp. 1189 (D.D.C. 1978); Smith v. Califano, 446 F. Supp. 530 (D.D.C. 1978). However, this view was not unanimous. The court in Noble v. Claytor, 448 F. Supp. 1242 (D.D.C. 1978), held that there was no authority for administrative awards and that only the court could award fees.

GAO was initially inclined towards the view expressed in the Noble decision. See B-167015, April 7, 1978. However, GAO reconsidered its position and subsequently announced that it would not object to the issuance of regulations by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to include the awarding of attorney's fees at the administrative level. B-193144, November 3, 1978; B-167015, September 12, 1978; B-167015, May 16, 1978 (all non-decision letters).

EEOC issued interim regulations on April 9, 1980 (45 Fed. Reg. 24130) and subsequently finalized them. The regulations, found at 29 C.F.R. § 1613.271, provide for awards of reasonable attorney's fees both by EEOC and by the agencies themselves. With the issuance of these regulations, federal agencies now have the requisite authority. B-199291, June 19, 1981; B-195544, May 7, 1980 (nondecision letter).

Attorney's fees awarded under the EEOC regulations are payable from the employing agency's operating appropriations and not from the permanent judgment appropriation established by 31 U.S.C. § 1304. 64 Comp. Gen. 349, 354 (1985); B-199291, June 19, 1981.

GAO will not review awards of, nor consider claims for, attorney's fees under Title VII. 69 Comp. Gen. 134 (1989); 61 Comp. Gen. 326 (1982).

Title VII is not the only statute prohibiting discrimination in federal employment. Discrimination on the basis of age or handicap is prohibited, respectively, by the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 621 et seq., and the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. §§ 701 et seq. The EEOC has enforcement responsibility for federal employment under these statutes as well as Title VII.[16]

Initially, GAO had held that the EEOC could provide by regulation for the awarding of attorney's fees at the administrative level under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act and the Rehabilitation Act, just as in the Title VII situation. 59 Comp. Gen. 728 (1980). Subsequently, the courts held that the Age Discrimination in Employment Act did not authorize fees at the administrative level, and GAO partially overruled 59 Comp. Gen. 728 in 64 Comp. Gen. 349 (1985). However, that portion of 59 Comp. Gen. 728 dealing with the Rehabilitation Act remains valid. See also B-204156, September 13, 1982. This treatment is consistent with the EEOC regulations, which authorize administrative fee awards under Title VII and the Rehabilitation Act, but not the Age Discrimination Act. See 29 C.F.R. § 1613.271(d).

The situation may become more complicated where an employee alleges discrimination on more than one grounds. In 69 Comp. Gen. 469 (1990), an agency settled a complaint in which the employee had alleged both age and sex discrimination. Based on the agency's assertion that the result would have been the same if the employee had pursued only the sex discrimination charge, GAO concluded that the agency was not required to "apportion" the attorney's fee claim between the two charges and that the entire fee claim could be paid.

[16]EEOC is not responsible for the entire Rehabilitation Act. The Architectural and Transportation Barriers Compliance Board is responsible for insuring compliance with the standards prescribed in the Architectural Barriers Act of 1968. 29 U.S.C. § 792.

(2) Other employee claims

Prior to October 1978, there was no authority to award attorney's fees to federal employees in connection with claims, grievances, or administrative proceedings involving back pay, adverse personnel actions, or other personnel matters. During this time period, GAO consistently denied claims for attorney's fees based on the general rule barring the payment of legal fees in the absence of statutory authority. E.g., 52 Comp. Gen. 859 (1973) (administrative grievance proceeding); B-167461, August 9, 1978 (unfair labor practice proceeding); B-184200, April 13, 1976 (reduction in grade); B-183038, May 9, 1975 (improper removal for disciplinary reasons).

In October 1978, the Civil Service Reform Act added two attorney's fee provisions as part of its general overhaul of the system.

First, it authorized the Merit Systems Protection Board to require the employing agency to pay reasonable attorney's fees if the employee is the prevailing party and the Board determines that the fee award is "warranted in the interest of justice." 5 U.S.C. § 7701(g). Fees awarded under this provision are payable directly to the attorney, not the party. Jensen v. Department of Transportation, 858 F.2d 721 (Fed. Cir. 1988).

Second, it added an attorney's fee provision to the Back Pay Act, 5 U.S.C. § 5596. Now, if an employee, on the basis of a timely appeal or an administrative determination, including grievance or unfair labor practice proceedings, is found by "appropriate authority"[17] to have suffered a loss or reduction of pay as a result of an "unjustified or unwarranted personnel action," the employee is entitled to [17]The term "appropriate authority" includes the head of the employing agency, a court, the Office of Personnel Management, the Merit Systems Protection Board (but not the MSPB Special Counsel, 59 Comp. Gen. 107 (1979)), the Comptroller General (see, e.g., 63 Comp. Gen. 170 (1984) and 62 Comp. Gen. 464 (1983)), the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the Federal Labor Relations Authority, plus a few others. 5 C.F.R. § 550.803.

recover reasonable attorney's fees in addition to back pay. Id. § 5596(b). See generally B-231813, August 22, 1989.

Regulations to implement the Back Pay Act are issued by the Office of Personnel Management and are found at 5 C.F.R. Part 550, Subpart H. Under the regulations, fees may be awarded only if the "appropriate authority" determines that payment is in the interest of justice, applying standards established by the Merit Systems Protection Board under 5 U.S.C. § 7701. 5 C.F.R. § 550.807(c)(1). The standards are set forth in Allen v. United States Postal Service, 2 M.S.P.R. 420 (1980), and discussed in Sterner v. Department of the Army, 711 F.2d 1563 (Fed. Cir. 1983), and in 62 Comp. Gen. 464 (1983).

GAO will not review decisions awarding or declining to award, nor consider claims for, fees under 5 U.S.C. § 7701. 63 Comp. Gen. 170, 174 (1984); 61 Comp. Gen. 578 (1982); 61 Comp. Gen. 290 (1982). The Back Pay Act regulations provide for review of fee determinations only "if provided for by statute or regulation." 5 C.F.R. § 550.806(g). Thus, absent some statute or regulation to the contrary, GAO will similarly decline to review fee determinations under 5 U.S.C. § 5596 where the "appropriate authority" is someone other than the Comptroller General. 61 Comp. Gen. 290 (1982).

Under a provision added in 1989, if an employee, former employee, or applicant for employment is the prevailing party before the Merit Systems Protection Board, and the Board's decision is based on a finding of a "prohibited personnel practice" (defined in 5 U.S.C. § 2302), "the agency involved shall be liable" to the complainant for reasonable attorney's fees. The same liability applies with respect to appeals from the Board, regardless of the basis of the decision. 5 U.S.C. § 1221(g), added by the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-12, 103 Stat. 16, 30.

Employee claims outside the scope of the Back Pay Act or the MSPB authority remain subject to the general rule prohibiting fee awards except under specific statutory authority. Thus, administrative claims for attorney's fees were denied in the following situations:

- Applicant for employment with Nuclear Regulatory Commission successfully challenged adverse information in security investigation file. B-194507, August 20, 1979.

In addition, several other chapters of this publication are related to purpose availability, for example, Chapter 14 on the payment of judgments. Thus, the concept of purpose must always be kept in mind when analyzing an appropriations problem.

Brief mention should also be made of the axiom that an agency cannot do indirectly what it is not permitted to do directly. Thus, an agency cannot use the device of a contract or grant to accomplish a purpose it could not do by direct expenditure. See 18 Comp. Gen. 285 (1938) (contract stipulation to pay wages in excess of Davis-Bacon Act rates held unauthorized). Similarly, a grant of funds for unspecified purposes would be improper. 55 Comp. Gen. 1059, 1062 (1976).

2. Determining Authorized Purposes

a. Statement of Purpose

Where does one look to find the authorized purposes of an appropriation? The first place, of course, is the appropriation act itself and its legislative history. If the appropriation is general, it may also be necessary to consult the legislation authorizing the appropriation, if any, and the underlying program or organic legislation, together with their legislative histories.

The actual language of the appropriation act is always of paramount importance in determining the purpose of an appropriation. Every appropriation has one or more purposes in the sense that Congress does not provide money for an agency to do with as it pleases, although purposes are stated with varying degrees of specificity. One end of the spectrum is illustrated by this old private relief act:

"[T]he Secretary of the Treasury . . . is hereby authorized and directed to pay to George H. Lott, a citizen of Mississippi, the sum of one hundred forty-eight dollars . . . ." Act of March 23, 1896, ch. 71, 29 Stat. 711.

This is one extreme. There is no need to look beyond the language of the appropriation; it was available to pay $148 to George H. Lott, and for absolutely nothing else. Language this specific leaves no room for administrative discretion. For example, the Comptroller General has held that language of this type does not authorize reimbursement to an agency where the agency erroneously paid the

- Former employee successfully prosecuted administrative patent interference action against National Aeronautics and Space Administration. B-193272, August 21, 1981.
- Fees incurred incident to prosecution of claim for relocation expenses. 68 Comp. Gen. 456 (1989); B-186763, March 28, 1977.
- Employee, selling residence incident to transfer of duty station, incurred legal fees in excess of customary range of charges for services rendered. B-200207, September 29, 1981. (Legal fees within customary range of charges are reimbursable. See cases cited in B-200207.)
- Administrative grievance proceeding involving neither an appeal to the Merit Systems Protection Board nor a reduction or denial of pay or allowances. 68 Comp. Gen. 366 (1989); 61 Comp. Gen. 411 (1982).

The same rule applies to expert witness expenses incurred by an employee. They are reimbursable only under specific statutory authority. In 67 Comp. Gen. 574 (1988), a Department of Energy employee had requested an administrative hearing incident to a security clearance. The agency, due to the sudden unavailability of its witness, was forced to reschedule the hearing. The employee's witness, a clinical psychologist, was unable to reschedule his patients to fill the now freed-up time slot, and charged the employee for the 3 hours he had set aside to testify. GAO found no authority to reimburse the employee.

e. Criminal Justice Act

The Criminal Justice Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3006A, was originally enacted in 1964 and substantially amended on several subsequent occasions. Reflecting a series of Supreme Court decisions on the right of a criminal defendant to counsel, the Act establishes a system of government-financed counsel for indigent defendants in federal criminal cases. In general, any person charged with a felony or misdemeanor, including juvenile delinquency, and who is "financially unable to obtain adequate representation" is eligible for counsel under the Act. Counsel is to be provided at every stage of the proceeding, from the first appearance before a magistrate through appeal, including appropriate ancillary matters. As the Supreme Court has expanded the right to counsel to encompass every meaningful stage at which significant rights may be affected (see, e.g., Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)), the right to counsel under the Criminal Justice Act has similarly expanded.

The lawyers, who are court-appointed, may be private attorneys appointed on an individual basis or members of a Federal Public Defender Organization or Community Defender Organization established and funded under the Act. The attorneys are paid at rates of compensation specified in the statute. Appropriations are made to the Judiciary to carry out the Act and payments are supervised by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

(1) Types of actions covered

Originally, GAO had held that the Criminal Justice Act did not apply to probation revocation proceedings. 45 Comp. Gen. 780 (1966). Subsequently, following the Supreme Court's holding in Mempa v. Rhay, 389 U.S. 128 (1967), GAO modified the 1966 decision to recognize the applicability of the Act to probation proceedings coupled with deferred sentencing. However, GAO continued to hold the Act inapplicable to a "simple" probation revocation proceeding (one not involving deferred sentencing). 50 Comp. Gen. 128 (1970). Two months after the issuance of 50 Comp. Gen. 128, Congress passed Public Law 91-447, substantially amending the Criminal Justice Act. One of the changes made by these amendments was to expressly cover probation proceedings. The legislative history of Public Law 91-447 indicates that it was intended to recognize Mempa v. Rhay. H.R. Rep. No. 1546, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1970). GAO has not had occasion to issue any further decisions on probation proceedings.

Another change made by the 1970 amendments was to add parole revocation proceedings, with counsel to be provided at the discretion of the court or magistrate. Subsequent legislation made appointment of counsel mandatory, and the Comptroller General held that appropriations under the Criminal Justice Act are available to provide counsel for indigents at parole revocation and parole termination proceedings under the Parole Commission and Reorganization Act. B-156932, June 16, 1977.

Representation may be provided, at the discretion of the court or magistrate, to an indigent prosecuting a writ of habeas corpus (28 U.S.C. §§ 2241, 2254, 2255). 18 U.S.C. § 3006A(a)(2). This authority does not extend to civil rights actions brought by indigent prisoners under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. 53 Comp. Gen. 638 (1974); B-139703, June 19, 1975.

In 51 Comp. Gen. 769 (1972), GAO held that the Criminal Justice Act applied to prosecutions brought in the name of the United States in the District of Columbia Superior Court and Court of Appeals. In 1974, Congress passed the District of Columbia Criminal Justice Act (Public Law 93-412), which established a parallel criminal justice system for the District of Columbia patterned after 18 U.S.C. § 3006A. With the enactment of this legislation, the Criminal Justice Act was amended to remove the District of Columbia courts from its coverage. GAO considered the D.C. statute in 61 Comp. Gen. 507 (1982) and construed it to include sentencing. The result should apply equally to the federal statute inasmuch as the language being construed is virtually identical in both laws.

(2) Miscellaneous cases

When a court appoints an attorney under the Criminal Justice Act, the government's contractual obligation, and hence the obligation of appropriations, occurs at the time of the appointment and not when the court reviews the voucher for payment, even though the exact amount of the obligation is not determinable until the voucher is approved. Where fiscal year appropriations are involved, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts must record the obligation based on an estimate, and the payment is chargeable to the fiscal year in which the appointment was made. 50 Comp. Gen. 589 (1971).

An attorney appointed and paid under the Criminal Justice Act does not thereby enter into an employer-employee relationship with the United States for purposes of the dual compensation laws. 44 Comp. Gen. 605 (1965). (This decision pre-dated the 1970 amendments to the Criminal Justice Act which created the Federal Public Defender Organizations, and would presumably not apply to full-time salaried attorneys employed by such organizations.)

An attorney regularly employed by the federal government who is appointed by a court to represent an indigent defendant, in either federal or state cases, may not be excused from duty without loss of pay or charge to annual leave. 61 Comp. Gen. 652 (1982); 44 Comp. Gen. 643 (1965).

An attorney appointed under the Criminal Justice Act is expected to use his or her usual secretarial resources. As a general proposition, secretarial and other overhead expenses are reflected in the statutory fee and are not separately reimbursable. However, there may be exceptional situations, and if the attorney can demonstrate to the court that extraordinary stenographic or other secretarial-type expenses are necessary, they may be reimbursed from Criminal Justice Act appropriations. 53 Comp. Gen. 638 (1974).

f. Equal Access to Justice Act

A significant diminution of the American Rule occurred in 1980 with the enactment of the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), which authorizes the awarding of attorney's fees and expenses in a number of administrative and judicial situations where fee-shifting had not been previously authorized. This section describes the authority for administrative awards.

The administrative portion of the EAJA is found in 5 U.S.C. § 504. There are four key elements to the statute:

(1) The administrative proceeding generating the fee request must be an "adversary adjudication," defined as an adjudication under the Administrative Procedure Act in which the position of the United States is represented by counsel or otherwise. §§ 504(a)(1), (b)(1)(C). The definition excludes adjudications to fix or establish a rate or to grant or renew a license, but proceedings involving the suspension, annulment, withdrawal, limitation, amendment, modification, or conditioning of a license are covered if they otherwise qualify.[18] (Application in the context of government procurement is discussed separately later.)

(2) The party seeking fees must be a "prevailing party other than the United States." § 504(a)(1). The meaning of "prevailing party" is to be determined by reference to case law under other fee-shifting statutes.[19] Of course before you can be a "prevailing party" you must first be a "party," and the law prescribes financial and other eligibility criteria. § 504(b)(1)(B).

(3) The law is not self-executing. The party must, within 30 days after final disposition of the adversary adjudication, submit an application to the agency showing that it is a prevailing party and meets the eligibility criteria, documenting the amount sought, and alleging that the position of the United States was not "substantially justified." § 504(a)(2). If the United States appeals the underlying merits, action on the application must be deferred until final resolution of the appeal. Id.

[18]S. Rep. No. 253, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 17 (1979) (report of the Senate Judiciary Committee).

[19]S. Rep. No. 253, supra note 18, at 7; H.R. Rep. No. 1418, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 11 (1980) (report of House Judiciary Committee).

(4) If the above criteria are met, the fee award is mandatory unless the agency adjudicative officer finds that "the position of the agency was substantially justified or that special circumstances make an award unjust." § 504(a)(1).[20] Substantial justification or lack thereof is to be determined "on the basis of the administrative record as a whole, which is made in the adversary adjudication." Id. The "position of the agency" includes the agency's action or failure to act which generated the adjudication as well as the agency's position in the adjudication itself. § 504(b)(1)(E). A party who "unreasonably protracts" the proceedings risks reduction of the award. Id.; § 504(a)(3).

The award includes "fees and other expenses." "Fees" means a reasonable attorney's fee, generally capped at $75 per hour unless the agency determines by regulation that cost of living increases or other special factors justify a higher rate.[21] "Other expenses" include such items as expert witness expenses and the necessary cost of studies, analyses, engineering reports, etc. § 504(b)(1)(A).

Agencies are required to establish, by regulation, uniform procedures for administering the statute, in consultation with the Administrative Conference of the United States (ACUS). § 504(c)(1). ACUS has published a set of non-binding model rules, found at 1 C.F.R. Part 315. In addition, the supplementary information statement to these rules, found at 51 Fed. Reg. 16659 (May 6, 1986), contains much useful information. The requirement to consult with ACUS will be met by simply notifying ACUS of the publication of proposed regulations, or by sending ACUS a prepublication draft for review and comment. Id.

[20]A position is "substantially justified" if it is "justified to a degree that could satisfy a reasonable person." Pierce v. Underwood, 487 U.S. 552, 565 (1988).

[21]Pierce v. Underwood, supra note 20, identified a number of factors that may not be used as "special factors" to justify exceeding the cap: novelty and difficulty of issues; undesirability of the case; work and ability of counsel (except for counsel with "distinctive knowledge or specialized skill" relevant to the case); results obtained; customary fees and awards in other cases; contingent nature of the fee. 487 U.S. at 571-74.

Payment of awards under 5 U.S.C. § 504 is addressed in § 504(d):

"Fees and other expenses awarded under this subsection shall be paid by any agency over which the party prevails from any funds made available to the agency by appropriation or otherwise."[22]

As with judicial awards under 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d), § 504 awards are payable from agency operating appropriations with no need for specific, line-item, or "earmarked" appropriations.[23]

The obligation of the agency's appropriations occurs when the agency issues its decision on the fee application. 62 Comp. Gen. 692, 699 (1983). This determines the fiscal year to be charged.

Section 504 permits fee awards to intervenors who otherwise meet the statutory criteria. 62 Comp. Gen. at 693. As noted in that decision, the Administrative Conference expressed the same position in the preamble to an earlier version of the model rules, although commenting further that intervenors would rarely be in a position to actually receive awards. Id. at 693-94. A specific appropriation act restriction on compensating intervenors will override the more general authority of 5 U.S.C. § 504. 62 Comp. Gen. 692; Electrical District No. 1 v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, 813 F.2d 1246 (D.C. Cir. 1987); Business and Professional People for the Public Interest v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 793 F.2d 1366 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (court agreed with result in 62 Comp. Gen. 692, implicitly accepting premise that EAJA itself could apply to intervenors).

We previously reviewed statutory authorities for awarding attorney's fees in a variety of matters involving federal employees. Some mention of EAJA in this context is necessary, if only to point out that the law is not entirely settled. The Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has held that 5 U.S.C. § 504 does not authorize the MSPB to award attorney's fees in cases involving employee selection or tenure. Gavette v. Office of Personnel Management, 808 F.2d 1456 (Fed. Cir. 1986); Olsen v. Department of Commerce, Census Bureau, 735 F.2d 558 (Fed. Cir. 1984). This is because the definition of "adversary adjudication" in section 504 refers to 5 U.S.C. § 554 (part of the Administrative Procedure Act), which expressly excludes "the selection or tenure of an employee." This was consistent with an earlier decision of the District of Columbia Circuit. Hoska v. Department of the Army, 694 F.2d 270 (D.C. Cir. 1982). However, the court in Miller v. United States, 753 F.2d 270 (3d Cir. 1985), reached a contrary result.

[22]This provision was added in 1985. The payment provision in the original EAJA was complex and confusing. The amendment was designed to preclude payment under 31 U.S.C. § 1304, the permanent judgment appropriation.

[23]Authorities for this proposition are cited in Chapter 14 in our discussion of the judicial portion of EAJA, which has an identical payment provision.

Prior to Gavette, the Board had taken the position that the existence of other fee-shifting statutes made EAJA inapplicable. Social Security Administration v. Goodman, 28 M.S.P.R. 120, 126 (1985). However, in view of the implication of Gavette that EAJA might apply in cases not involving employee selection or tenure, the Board reopened the Goodman appeal, found that fees could be awarded in that case under 5 U.S.C. § 7701, and declined to comment further on the applicability of EAJA. Social Security Administration v. Goodman, 33 M.S.P.R. 325, 326-27 n.1 (1987).

GAO held in 68 Comp. Gen. 366 (1989) that EAJA did not authorize a fee award to an employee who prevailed in an agency grievance proceeding which did not meet the standard of an "adversary adjudication." (This being the case, it was irrelevant whether or not the grievance involved selection or tenure.)

Where a Board decision is appealed to the courts, including a decision involving selection or tenure, the majority view is that EAJA permits the court to award fees for the judicial proceedings, the relevant standard now being a "civil action" under 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d) rather than an "adversary adjudication" under 5 U.S.C. § 504. Brewer v. American Battle Monuments Commission, 814 F.2d 1564 (Fed. Cir. 1987); Gavette, 808 F.2d at 1462-65; Miller, 753 F.2d at 274-75; Olsen, 735 F.2d at 561. Here, however, the Hoska case is in disagreement.

To the extent EAJA is inapplicable either to the Board or to a court reviewing a Board action, all is not necessarily lost to the fee applicant because EAJA is not exclusive in these situations. The Board and the courts both may award fees under the Back Pay Act in appropriate cases, and the Board additionally has 5 U.S.C. § 7701. Thus, for example, Hoska, while finding EAJA inapplicable, awarded fees under the Back Pay Act.

g. Contract Matters

(1) Bid protests

Prior to 1984, attorney's fees incurred by a bidder for a government contract in pursuing a bid protest with GAO were not compensable. 57 Comp. Gen. 125, 127 (1977); B-197174, August 25, 1980; B-192910, April 11, 1979. The question arose again upon enactment of the Equal Access to Justice Act in 1980. However, since a bid protest at GAO is not an adversary adjudication governed by the Administrative Procedure Act, EAJA was equally unavailing. 63 Comp. Gen. 541 (1984); 62 Comp. Gen. 86 (1982); B-211105.2, January 19, 1984.

Fee-shifting authority came with enactment of the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984.[24] Now, upon determining that a solicitation or contract award violates a statute or regulation, the Comptroller General "may declare an appropriate interested party to be entitled to" bid and proposal preparation costs and the costs of filing and pursuing the protest, including reasonable attorney's fees. The costs and fees are payable from the contracting agency's procurement appropriations. 31 U.S.C. § 3554(c).

GAO's approach under 31 U.S.C. § 3554(c) is to determine the entitlement and leave it to the protester and agency to negotiate the appropriate amount. If the parties cannot agree, GAO will determine the amount. 4 C.F.R. §§ 21.6(d) and (e). Sample cases involving awards under section 3554(c) are 67 Comp. Gen. 442 (1988) and 67 Comp. Gen. 131 (1987).

GAO's bid protest authority is not exclusive. A protester may seek resolution with the contracting agency, or may go directly to court in lieu of filing a protest with GAO, or may seek judicial review of a GAO decision. 31 U.S.C. § 3556. Once a case is in court, 31 U.S.C. § 3554(c) is out of the picture, and the court may consider a fee application under the judicial portion of EAJA. E.g., Essex Electro Engineers, Inc. v. United States, 757 F.2d 247 (Fed. Cir. 1985); Laboratory Supply Corporation of America v. United States, 5 Cl. Ct. 28 (1984).

Another portion of the Competition in Contracting Act amended the so-called Brooks Act, 40 U.S.C. § 759, to authorize the General Services Administration Board of Contract Appeals to hear protests involving automatic data processing procurements. Upon finding that the contracting agency has violated a statute, regulation, or delegation of procurement authority, the GSBCA may award the costs of filing and pursuing the protest, including reasonable attorney's fees, and bid and proposal preparation costs. The awards are payable, at least in the first instance, from the permanent judgment appropriation, 31 U.S.C. § 1304. 40 U.S.C. § 759(f)(5). Questions have arisen as to whether the payments must be reimbursed from the contracting agency's appropriations, but there has thus far been no definitive determination. E.g., United States v. Julie Research Laboratories, Inc., 881 F.2d 1067 (Fed. Cir. 1989) (question viewed as an "intra-government dispute" not presenting a justiciable controversy).

[24]Title VII of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-369, 98 Stat. 494, 1175 (1984).

The Brooks Act fee provision does not authorize contracting agencies to pay attorney's fees as part of an agency settlement of a protest (i.e., where there is no order from the GSBCA based on one of the violations specified in the statute), nor does it authorize contracting agencies to make monetary settlements of any type solely to avoid operational delays by "buying off" the protester (a practice which has been termed "Fedmail"). See GAO report, ADP Bid Protests: Better Disclosure and Accountability of Settlements Needed, GAO/GGD-90-13 (March 1990), at 31.

(2) Contract disputes

Under the original (1980) version of the Equal Access to Justice Act, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit held that (1) a court, reviewing a decision of an agency board of contract appeals, could, under the judicial portion of EAJA, make a fee award covering services before both the board and the court, but that (2) boards of contract appeals were not authorized to independently make EAJA fee awards. Fidelity Construction Co. v. United States, 700 F.2d 1379 (Fed. Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 826.

The 1985 EAJA amendments legislatively overturned Fidelity to the extent it held 5 U.S.C. § 504 inapplicable to boards of contract appeals. Specifically, the law amended the definition of "adversary adjudication" to expressly include appeals to boards of contract appeals under the Contract Disputes Act. The 1985 amendments also added language to 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d) to make it clear that fee awards are authorized when a contractor appeals a contracting officer's decision directly to court instead of to a board of contract appeals, as authorized by the Contract Disputes Act. (As noted in the preceding paragraph, appeals to court from board decisions were already covered.)

h. Public Participation in Administrative Proceedings: Funding of Intervenors

A number of regulatory agencies conduct administrative proceedings and take actions that have a direct public impact. A prime example is licensing. An important concern has been that the agency may not receive a balanced presentation of viewpoints. The reason is that the industries being regulated usually have adequate resources to ensure representation of their interests, while lack of resources may preclude participation by various non-industry "public interest" representatives.

The Comptroller General has had frequent occasion to consider questions of intervenor funding. An "intervenor" in this context means someone who is not a direct party to the proceedings. Stated briefly, the rule is that an agency may use its appropriations to fund intervenor participation, including attorney's fees, if—

1. Intervenor participation is authorized, either expressly by statute or by necessary implication derived from a regulatory or licensing function;

2. The agency determines that the participation is reasonably necessary to a full and fair determination of the issues before it; and

3. The intervenor could not otherwise afford to participate.

This is essentially an application of the "necessary expense" doctrine discussed previously in this chapter. Thus, intervenor funding does not require express statutory authority, but it must relate to accomplishing the objectives of the appropriation sought to be charged, and of course must not be otherwise prohibited. The agency must have authority to encourage or accept intervenor participation in connection with an authorized function for which its appropriations are available. In this sense, it may be said that intervenor funding must have a statutory foundation.

Historically the concept of intervenor funding emerged in the early 1970's. In 1970, the Federal Trade Commission held that an indigent respondent in an FTC hearing was entitled to government-furnished counsel. American Chinchilla Corp., 1970 Trade Reg. Rep. ¶ 19059. Following the Chinchilla case, the FTC asked whether it individual before the private act had been passed. In this situation, the purpose for which the appropriation was made had ceased to exist. B-151114, August 26, 1964.

At the other extreme, smaller agencies may receive only one appropriation. The purpose of the appropriation will be to enable the agency to carry out all of its various authorized functions. For example, the Consumer Product Safety Commission receives but a single appropriation "for necessary expenses of the Consumer Product Safety Commission."[2] To determine permissible expenditures under this type of appropriation, it would be necessary to examine all of the agency's substantive legislation, in conjunction with the "necessary expense" doctrine discussed later in this chapter.

Between the two extremes are many variations. A common form of appropriation funds a single program. For example, the Interior Department receives a separate appropriation to carry out the Payments in Lieu of Taxes Act.[3] While the appropriation is specific in the sense that it is limited to PILT payments and associated administrative expenses, it is nevertheless necessary to look beyond the appropriation language and examine the PILT statute to determine authorized expenditures.

Once the purposes have been determined by examining the various pieces of legislation, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) comes into play to restrict the use of the appropriation to these purposes only, together with one final generic category of payments—payments authorized under general legislation applicable to all or a defined group of agencies and not requiring specific appropriations. For example, legislation enacted in 1982 amended 12 U.S.C. § 1770 to authorize federal agencies to provide various services, including telephone service, to employee credit unions. Prior to this legislation, an agency would have violated 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) by providing telephone service to a credit union, even on a reimbursable basis, because this was not an authorized purpose under any agency appropriation. 60 Comp. Gen. 653 (1981). The 1982 amendment could pay certain related expenses for the indigent respondent, such as transcript costs and attorney's expenses. It also asked whether it could pay the same expenses when incurred by an indigent intervenor rather than the respondent.

In the first of the intervenor cases, B-139703, July 24, 1972, GAO answered "yes" to both questions. Noting that FTC had statutory authority to grant intervention "upon good cause shown," the Comptroller General responded to the intervenor question as follows:

> "Thus, if the Commission determines it necessary to allow a person to intervene in order to properly dispose of a matter before it, the Commission has the authority to do so. As in the case of an indigent respondent, and for the same reasons, appropriated funds of the Commission would be available to assure proper case preparation."

A few years later, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission asked whether it was authorized to provide financial assistance to participants in its adjudicatory and rulemaking proceedings. Finding that NRC had statutory authority to admit intervenors, the Comptroller General applied the "necessary expense" rationale of B-139703, and answered "yes." B-92288, February 19, 1976.

In this decision, GAO explained why the "American rule" as set forth in Alyeska Pipeline Co. v. Wilderness Society, 421 U.S. 240 (1975), does not apply to bar the payment of attorney's fees. The distinction is that the American rule limits the power of a court or an agency to require an unwilling defendant to pay the attorney's fees of a prevailing plaintiff or intervenor. In cases like B-139703 and B-92288, an administrative body, exercising its rulemaking function, is attempting to encourage public participation in its proceedings. It does this by willingly assuming representation costs for intervenors who would otherwise be financially unable to participate, in order to obtain their input for a balanced rulemaking effort. Only by obtaining a balanced view can the agency perform its function of protecting the public interest.

Next, in a letter to the Chairman of the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, GAO advised that the rationale of B-92288, February 19, 1976, applied equally to nine agencies under the Subcommittee's jurisdiction. The nine were: Federal Communications Commission, Federal Trade Commission, Federal Power Commission, Interstate Commerce Commission, Consumer Product Safety Commission, Securities and Exchange Commission, Food and Drug Administration, Environmental Protection Agency, and National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. B-180224, May 10, 1976.

GAO pointed out in the same letter that there were several possible ways of providing assistance to qualifying participants:

1. Provision of funds directly to participants.

2. Modification of agency procedural rules so as to ease the financial burdens of public participation.

3. Provision of technical assistance by agency staff. However, this cannot include assigning staff members to participants to help them with their advocacy positions.

4. Provision of legal assistance by agency staff, but again not as advocates.

5. Creation of an independent public counsel. However, the public counsel cannot be beyond the agency's jurisdiction and control.

6. Creation of a consumer assistance office, as long as it remains under the agency's jurisdiction and control and does not act as an advocate.

In subsequent decisions and advisory opinions, GAO examined aspects of the programs of several specific agencies. In each case, GAO consistently applied the rationale of the earlier decisions. The cases are:

- Environmental Protection Agency: 59 Comp. Gen. 424 (1980); B-180224, April 5, 1977.
- Federal Communications Commission: B-139703, September 22, 1976.
- Food and Drug Administration: 56 Comp. Gen. 111 (1976).
- Nuclear Regulatory Commission: 59 Comp. Gen. 228 (1980).
- Economic Regulatory Administration (a component of the Department of Energy): B-192213-0.M., August 29, 1978; letter report EMD-78-111, October 2, 1978.

While the decisions have consistently upheld the legality of intervenor funding under the necessary expense theory, GAO has nevertheless emphasized the desirability of an agency's seeking specific statutory authority to embark on a public participation program. E.g., B-180224, May 10, 1976; B-92288, February 19, 1976. Congress has acted in several instances, authorizing intervenor funding in some cases and prohibiting it in others.

For example, the Federal Trade Commission was given specific authority to fund intervenor participation in 1975 by the Magnuson-Moss Warranty-Federal Trade Commission Improvement Act, 15 U.S.C. § 57a(h). Under this legislation, payments for legal services may not exceed the costs actually incurred, even though the participant uses "house counsel" whose rate of pay is lower than prevailing rates. 57 Comp. Gen. 610 (1978). Similarly, the Environmental Protection Agency has intervenor funding authority under the Toxic Substances Control Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2605(c), and the Consumer Product Safety Commission has such authority under the Consumer Product Safety Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2056(c).

Restrictions in appropriation acts have prohibited intervenor funding programs for several agencies. For example, a provision in the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 1981 appropriation prohibited the use of funds for the expenses of intervenors. The Comptroller General construed this restriction as prohibiting the NRC from adopting a "cost reduction program" of providing transcripts and other documents free to intervenors. B-200585, December 3, 1980. However, NRC could reduce the number of copies of documents required to be filed. Id. Also, NRC could decide to provide free transcripts to all parties, intervenors included, without violating the restriction. B-200585, May 11, 1981. Other cases construing the NRC restriction, or successor versions, are Business and Professional People for the Public Interest v. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, 793 F.2d 1366 (D.C. Cir. 1986); 67 Comp. Gen. 553 (1988); and 62 Comp. Gen. 692 (1983).

Appropriation act restrictions have also prohibited intervenor funding by the Economic Regulatory Administration and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. A case involving the FERC prohibition is Electrical District No. 1 v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, 813 F.2d 1246 (D.C. Cir. 1987). In addition, the conference committee on the 1980 appropriation for the National

Highway Traffic Safety Administration and the former Civil Aeronautics Board directed that no funds be allocated by these agencies for intervenor funding programs.[25]

A restriction contained solely in legislative history and not carried into the statutory language itself is not legally binding on the agency. The history of the NRC prohibition will illustrate this. For fiscal year 1980, the prohibition was expressed in committee reports but not in the appropriation act itself. Accordingly, GAO told NRC that, while it would be well advised to postpone its program, the restriction was not legally binding. 59 Comp. Gen. 228 (1980). For fiscal year 1981, the prohibition was written into NRC's appropriation act. Similarly, the restriction noted above for the transportation agencies later "graduated" to a general provision in the statute.[26]

One court has disagreed with the GAO decisions. Greene County Planning Board v. Federal Power Commission, 559 F.2d 1227 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1086.[27] There, after several years of litigation, the plaintiff Board had finally prevailed in its attempt to compel relocation of a proposed high kilovolt power line through a scenic portion of the county. The only question remaining was the ability of the Federal Power Commission to reimburse the plaintiff's attorney's fees. (Though not "indigent," the counsel fees had drained a disproportionate amount of the county's resources.) The FPC had denied reimbursement on the grounds that the Board was protecting its own, not the public, interest and because it thought it lacked authority to reimburse the fees. After first concluding that the issue should be remanded to the FPC so that it could determine the propriety of reimbursement in accordance with the Comptroller General's decisions, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals granted a rehearing en banc. On rehearing, the majority opinion held that the FPC lacked authority to reimburse the attorney's fees. 559 F.2d at 1238.

[26]E.g., Department of Transportation and Related Agencies Appropriations Act, 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-164, § 306, 103 Stat. 1069, 1092 (1989).

[27]The Greene County litigation produced several published decisions: 455 F.2d 412 (2d Cir. 1972), 490 F.2d 256 (2d Cir. 1973), 528 F.2d 38 (2d Cir. 1975), and the decision cited in the text, known as "Greene County IV."

Subsequently, both GAO and the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel took the position that Greene County IV applied only to the former Federal Power Commission, and not to other federal agencies or even to the agencies which succeeded to the FPC's responsibilities. 59 Comp. Gen. 228 (1980); 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 60 (1978). In addition, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia has likewise determined that Greene County IV does not extend generally to all agencies. Chamber of Commerce v. United States Department of Agriculture, 459 F. Supp. 216 (D.D.C. 1978), upholding the authority of the Department of Agriculture to fund a consumer study on the impact of certain proposed rules.

Thus, to determine whether a given agency has intervenor funding authority, it is necessary first to examine the legislation, including appropriation acts, applicable to that agency, as well as pertinent judicial decisions. In the absence of statutory direction one way or the other, and if there are no judicial decisions on point, it is then appropriate to apply the necessary expense rationale of the GAO decisions.

The more recent decisions have somewhat refined the standards expressed in the earlier cases. For example, in order to constitute a "necessary expense," the participation does not have to be absolutely indispensable in the sense that the issues could not be decided without it. It is sufficient for the agency to determine that a particular expenditure for participation can reasonably be expected to contribute substantially to a full and fair determination of the issues. 56 Comp. Gen. 111 (1976). This is consistent with the application of the necessary expense doctrine in other contexts as discussed throughout this chapter. Assuming the requisite statutory basis for intervention exists, the determination of necessity must be made by the administering agency itself, not by GAO. Id. See also B-92288, February 19, 1976.

The standard of the participant's financial status was discussed in 59 Comp. Gen. 424 (1980). While the participant need not be literally indigent, the authority to fund intervenor participation extends only to individuals and organizations which could not afford to participate without the assistance. In making this determination, the agency should consider the income and expense statements, as well as the net assets, of an applicant. An applicant does not qualify for assistance merely because it cannot afford to participate in all activities it desires. The applicant is expected to choose those activities it considers most significant and to allocate its resources accordingly.

Some of the earlier cases held that advance funding was prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 3324. 56 Comp. Gen. 111 (1976); B-139703, September 22, 1976. However, in view of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act of 1977, an agency with statutory authority to extend financial assistance in the form of grants may be able to utilize advance funding in its public participation program. A 1980 decision, 59 Comp. Gen. 424, applied this concept to the program of the Environmental Protection Agency.

The decisions have all dealt with participation in the agency's own proceedings. There would generally be no authority to fund intervenor participation in someone else's proceedings, for example, participation by a state agency in a state utility ratemaking proceeding. B-178278, April 27, 1973 (non-decision letter).

Finally, the GAO decisions in no way imply that an agency is compelled to fund intervenor participation. They hold merely that, if the various standards are met, an agency has the authority to do so if it wishes. See B-92288, February 19, 1976.

A summary and discussion of intervenor funding through early 1981 may be found in a GAO report entitled Review of Programs for Reimbursement for Public Participation in Federal Rulemaking Proceedings, PAD-81-30 (March 4, 1981). See also "Payment of Intervenors' Expenses in Agency Regulatory Proceedings" by Rollee H. Efros, in Cases in Accountability: The Work of the GAO, Erasmus H. Kloman ed. (Westview Press 1979), pp. 171-181.

4. Compensation Restrictions

"If an officer is not satisfied with what the law gives him for his services, he may resign." Embry v. United States, 100 U.S. 680, 685 (1879), quoted in Lincoln v. United States, 418 F. Supp. 1094, 1095 (N.D. Cal. 1976).

As a general proposition, restrictions on the compensation of federal employees are regarded as matters of personnel law, and are covered in GAO's Civilian and Military Personnel Law Manuals. However, they may also be viewed as restrictions on the "purpose availability" of appropriations. We treat two compensation-related topics in this chapter—the restriction on employing aliens and the statutes concerning forfeiture of retirement annuities and retired pay—as illustrations of the different ways in which Congress may exercise its constitutional role of controlling the public purse by prescribing the purposes for which appropriated funds may be used. The provision on aliens is a restriction appearing in annual appropriation acts. The forfeiture statutes are permanent provisions found in the United States Code; while not phrased in terms of appropriation restrictions, the effect is the same.

a. Employment of Aliens

For many years, with minor variations from year to year, various appropriation acts have included provisions restricting the federal employment of aliens. The typical prohibition, with exceptions to be noted below, bars the use of appropriated funds to pay compensation to any officer or employee of the United States whose post of duty is in the continental United States unless that person is a United States citizen. In more recent years, the prohibition has appeared as a general provision in the Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government appropriation acts, applicable to funds contained "in this or any other act."[28] A recurring general provision in the Defense Department appropriation act exempts Defense Department personnel from the alien restriction.[29]

The prohibition applies to all appropriated funds unless expressly provided otherwise. Therefore, it applies to the special deposit accounts established by statute for the Senate and House restaurants since these accounts amount to permanent indefinite appropriations. 50 Comp. Gen. 323 (1970). It also applies to working capital funds supported by appropriations. B-161976, August 10, 1967.[30]

There are a number of statutory exceptions to the restriction on compensating aliens. As noted, one significant exemption is for Defense Department personnel. See B-188507, December 16, 1977; B-110831, August 4, 1952. Others are 42 U.S.C. § 2473(c)(10)

[28]For example, the 1990 provision is found in Pub. L. No. 101-136, § 603, 103 Stat. 783, 816 (1989).

[29]The 1990 provision is Pub. L. No. 101-165, § 9003, 103 Stat. 1112, 1129 (1989).

[30]The cited decision refers to the Naval Industrial Fund established under 10 U.S.C. § 2208. The decision makes no mention of the statutory exemption for the Defense Department, which was in effect in 1967. For purposes of this discussion, whether B-161976 could have been disposed of more simply based on the DOD exemption is irrelevant. The decision is cited here merely for the proposition noted in the text.

(National Aeronautics and Space Administration, permanent legislation); 2 U.S.C. § 169 (Library of Congress, derived from annual appropriation acts); 22 U.S.C. § 1474(1) (limited permanent authority for United States Information Agency); and 22 U.S.C. § 2672 (limited permanent authority for State Department). Since appropriation act exceptions may appear, disappear, or vary from time to time, it is important to scrutinize the relevant appropriation act for any given year. Absent an applicable exception, the general prohibition will apply. For an illustration of the complexities that may arise when the provisions vary from year to year, see 57 Comp. Gen. 172 (1977). GAO has supported enactment of the general restriction as permanent legislation. B-130733, March 6, 1957.

In addition to the agency-wide exemptions noted above, the alien restriction itself contains a number of exceptions. Several of these are summarized below.

Declaration of intention exception. The prohibition does not apply to a person in the federal service on the date of enactment of the appropriation act who is actually residing in the United States, is eligible for citizenship, and has filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen. The employee must have filed the declaration prior to the date of enactment. Subsequent filing will not cure the disqualification. 17 Comp. Gen. 1104 (1938). A declaration timely filed but which had become void by operation of law due to lapse of time has also been held insufficient. B-138854, April 1, 1959.

Specific country exceptions. The statute typically exempts nationals of certain specified countries. The countries specified in any given appropriation act change from time to time according to the political climate. The exception usually includes the Philippines and the Baltic countries (Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia). B-134230, November 18, 1957. Dual citizenship will not negate the exception as long as one of the countries is within the exception, even where the individual has entered the United States from the non-exempt country. B-194929, June 20, 1979.

Allied country exception. The prohibition does not apply to nationals of "countries allied with the United States in the current defense effort." GAO will not decide whether a country meets this test. The determination is the responsibility of the employing agency, perhaps with the assistance of the State Department. GAO will not question a determination based on reasonable grounds.

35 Comp. Gen. 216 (1955); B-151064, March 25, 1963; B-146142, June 22, 1961; B-139667, June 22, 1959. The reason for GAO's position is that "it is not the responsibility nor the proper province of the accounting officers to initially determine political facts." B-107288, February 14, 1952; B-107579, February 14, 1952.

GAO will, however, venture an assertion in the more obvious cases. Thus, Canada meets the test. B-133877, October 16, 1957; B-188852, July 19, 1977. So does Japan. B-113780, March 4, 1953. Russia was allied with the United States during World War II but no longer is, or at least wasn't in 1955. 35 Comp. Gen. 216 (1955). The Republic of China was allied with the United States during World War II. B-178882, May 7, 1974. The Republic of China (Taiwan) still is. B-161976, August 10, 1967. Romania probably is not, or at least was not as of B-119760, April 27, 1954. Even in these cases, the determination, strictly speaking, is up to the employing agency.

Allegiance exception. The prohibition does not apply to a person who "owes allegiance to the United States." This means "absolute and permanent allegiance" as distinguished from "qualified and temporary allegiance." 17 Comp. Gen. 1047 (1938); B-119760, April 27, 1954. The exemption was apparently prompted by a concern for a very limited class—"Filipinos in the service of the United States on March 28, 1938." 17 Comp. Gen. at 1048.

The allegiance exception includes a clause to the effect that a signed affidavit will be regarded as prima facie evidence of allegiance. This clause has been construed to apply to non-citizen nationals and not to non-national aliens. Yuen v. Internal Revenue Service, 497 F. Supp. 1023 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), aff'd, 649 F.2d 163 (2d Cir. 1981). The district court opinion includes an exhaustive review of legislative history.

Emergency exception. The prohibition does not apply to "temporary employment in the field service . . . as a result of emergencies." The term "emergency" in this context means "flood, fire, or other catastrophe." B-146142, June 22, 1961.

An alien appointed in contravention of the statutory prohibition may not retain compensation already paid. 35 Comp. Gen. 216 (1955); 18 Comp. Gen. 815 (1939). (The statute expressly gives the United States the right to recover.) If there is no statutory bar—for example, if the employment would have qualified under the "allied country" exception but the agency failed to make the required determination—the alien may be paid as a "de facto employee." Earlier decisions distinguished between appointments "void ab initio" and those that are merely "voidable." E.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 483 (1958); 35 Comp. Gen. 216 (1955); B-178882, August 29, 1973; B-188852, July 19, 1977. The distinction proved confusing and GAO has moved away from it. The current rule is stated in 58 Comp. Gen. 734 (1979). For further information on de facto employees and their specific entitlements, see GAO's Civilian Personnel Law Manual.

As a final note, the Supreme Court in 1976 invalidated a Civil Service Commission regulation requiring citizenship as a prerequisite to federal employment. Hampton v. Mow Sun Wong, 426 U.S. 88 (1976). The Court did not, however, invalidate the appropriation act restrictions. See B-188507, December 16, 1977. The Yuen litigation cited earlier specifically upheld the restriction against a charge of violation of the Equal Protection clause.

b. Forfeiture of Annuities and Retired Pay

(1) General principles

Under 5 U.S.C. § 8312 (the so-called "Hiss Act"), a civilian employee of the United States or a member of the uniformed services who is convicted of certain criminal offenses relating to the national security will forfeit his or her retirement annuity or retired pay. Further, the annuity or retired pay may not be paid to the convicted employee's survivors or beneficiaries. The offenses which will result in forfeiture are specified in the statute. Examples are: gathering or delivering defense information to aid a foreign government; gathering, transmitting, or losing defense information; disclosure of classified information; espionage; sabotage; treason; rebellion or insurrection; seditious conspiracy; advocating the overthrow of the government; enlistment to serve in an armed force against the United States; and certain violations of the Atomic Energy Act. In addition, perjury by falsely denying the commission of one of the specified offenses is itself an offense for purposes of forfeiture.

An employee for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 8312 includes a Member of Congress and an individual employed by the government of the District of Columbia. 5 U.S.C. § 8311(1). The specific types of retirement made the providing of special services to credit unions an authorized agency function, and hence an authorized purpose, which it could fund from unrestricted general operating appropriations. 66 Comp. Gen. 356 (1987). Other examples are interest payments under the Prompt Payment Act and administrative settlements under $2,500 under the Federal Tort Claims Act.

b. Specific Purpose Stated in Appropriation Act

Where an appropriation specifies the purpose for which the funds are to be used, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) applies in its purest form to restrict the use of the funds to the specified purpose. For example, an appropriation for topographical surveys in the United States was held not available for topographical surveys in Puerto Rico. 5 Comp. Dec. 493 (1899). Similarly, an appropriation to install an electrical generating plant in the custom-house building in Baltimore could not be used to install the plant in a nearby post office building, even though the plant would serve both buildings and thereby reduce operating expenses. 11 Comp. Dec. 724 (1905). An appropriation for the extension and remodeling of the State Department building was not available to construct a pneumatic tube delivery system between the State Department and the White House. 42 Comp. Gen. 226 (1962). And, as noted previously, an appropriation for the "replacement" of state roads could not be used to make improvements on them. 41 Comp. Gen. 255 (1961).

The following cases will further illustrate the interpretation and application of appropriation acts denoting a specific purpose to which the funds are to be dedicated. In each of the examples, the appropriation in question was the United States Forest Service's appropriation for the construction and maintenance of "Forest Roads and Trails."

In 37 Comp. Gen. 472 (1958), the Forest Service sought to construct airstrips on land in or adjacent to national forests. The issue was the extent to which the costs could be charged to the Roads and Trails appropriation as opposed to other Forest Service appropriations such as "Forest Protection and Utilization." At hearings before the appropriations committees, Forest Service officials had announced their intent to charge most of the landing fields to the Roads and Trails appropriation. The appropriation act in question provided that "appropriations available to the Forest Service for the current fiscal year shall be available for" construction of the landing fields up to a specified dollar amount, but the item was not mentioned in any of the individual appropriations. GAO concluded annuities and retired pay subject to forfeiture are enumerated in 5 U.S.C. §§ 8311(2) and (3).

Since 5 U.S.C. § 8312 imposes a forfeiture, it is penal in nature. Therefore, it must be strictly construed. GAO will not construe the statute as applicable to situations which are not expressly covered by its terms. 35 Comp. Gen. 302 (1955).

In the absence of an authoritative judicial decision to the contrary, the effective date of a conviction for stoppage of retired pay should be determined in a manner which will result in the least expenditure of public funds. Thus, the date a guilty verdict is returned should be considered the date of conviction rather than a later date when the judgment is ordered executed, and retired pay should be stopped the following day. 39 Comp. Gen. 741 (1960). Using the cited decision to illustrate: the jury returned a guilty verdict on December 2, 1959; judgment was entered on January 29, 1960; the date of conviction is December 2, 1959, and retired pay should be stopped effective December 3.

In the absence of an authoritative judicial decision to the contrary, a plea of "nolo contendere" should be regarded as a conviction for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 8312. 41 Comp. Gen. 62 (1961).

(2) The Alger Hiss case

The event which, more than any other single incident, gave rise to the original enactment of 5 U.S.C. § 8312, was the case of Alger Hiss. A former State Department employee, Hiss was convicted in 1950 of perjury stemming from testimony before a grand jury investigating alleged espionage violations. When Hiss was released from prison after serving his sentence, considerable public and congressional attention was directed at the fact that he was still entitled to receive his government pension. Given the political climate of the times, the result was the enactment of 5 U.S.C. § 8312 in 1954 (68 Stat. 1142).

Hiss applied for his pension in 1967 and the (then) Civil Service Commission denied the application based on 5 U.S.C. § 8312. Hiss subsequently sued for restoration of his forfeited pension. In Hiss v. Hampton, 338 F. Supp. 1141 (D.D.C. 1972), the court, finding that the statute had been aimed more at punishing Alger Hiss than regulating the federal service, held 5 U.S.C. § 8312 to be an ex post facto law and therefore unconstitutional as it had been applied to Hiss for conduct which occurred prior to the date of its enactment. Therefore, the court ordered the Civil Service Commission to pay Hiss his annuity retroactively with interest.

The Hiss case gave rise to two GAO decisions—52 Comp. Gen. 175 (1972), affirmed by B-115505, December 21, 1972—holding that the interest payable to Hiss, as with the annuity itself, must be paid from the Civil Service Retirement Fund rather than the permanent judgment appropriation, 31 U.S.C. § 1304. The court case and decisions are summarized in B-115505, May 15, 1973.

(3) Types of offenses covered

Under the original version of 5 U.S.C. § 8312, forfeiture was not strictly limited to national security offenses. An employee could lose his or her retirement annuity or retired pay simply by committing a felony "in the exercise of his authority, influence, power, or privileges as an officer or employee of the Government." There were numerous examples of forfeitures for such infractions as falsifying a travel voucher or using a government-owned vehicle for personal purposes.[31]

Recognizing that in many cases the punishment was too severe for the offense, especially in cases where the offense occurred after many years of government service, Congress amended the statute in 1961 (75 Stat. 640) to limit it to offenses relating to national security and to "retroactively remove therefrom those provisions of the statute which prohibited payment of annuities and retired pay to persons who commit offenses, acts or omissions which do not involve the security of the United States." 41 Comp. Gen. 399, 400 (1961). Thus, numerous offenses which would have caused forfeiture before 1961 no longer do. See, e.g., B-155823, September 15, 1965 (conspiracy to embezzle government funds); B-155558, November 25, 1964 (false statement). Of course, to the extent that the pre-1961 decisions establish principles apart from the specific offenses involved, such as the general principles noted above, they remain valid.

The original 1954 enactment of 5 U.S.C. § 8312 did not expressly cover offenses under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, and this omission generated many GAO decisions prior to the 1961 amendment. E.g., 40 Comp. Gen. 601 (1961); 38 Comp. Gen. 310 (1958); 35 Comp. Gen. 302 (1955). The UCMJ decisions came to an abrupt halt with the enactment of the 1961 amendment. The current version of 5 U.S.C. § 8312 expressly covers UCMJ offenses, again limited to national security violations. Now, a conviction under the UCMJ will produce a forfeiture if the offense involves certain UCMJ articles specified in the statute, or if it involves any other article of the UCMJ where the charges and specifications describe a violation of certain of the U.S. Code offenses, and if the "executed sentence" includes death, dishonorable discharge, or dismissal from the service.

[31]See, e.g., 41 Comp. Gen. 114 (1961); 40 Comp. Gen. 364 (1960); 40 Comp. Gen. 176 (1960).

(4) Related statutory provisions

When a forfeiture is invoked under 5 U.S.C. § 8312, the individual is entitled to a refund of his contribution toward the annuity less any amounts already paid out or refunded. 5 U.S.C. § 8316.

Forfeiture may not be invoked where an individual is convicted of an offense "as a result of proper compliance with orders issued, in a confidential relationship, by an agency or other authority" of the United States Government or the District of Columbia government. 5 U.S.C. § 8320.

If a payment of annuity or retired pay is made in violation of 5 U.S.C. § 8312 "in due course and without fraud, collusion, or gross negligence," the relevant accountable officer will not be held responsible. 5 U.S.C. § 8321.

In addition to 5 U.S.C. § 8312, retirement annuities or retired pay may be forfeited for willful absence from the United States to avoid prosecution for a section 8312 offense (5 U.S.C. § 8313); refusal to testify in national security matters (5 U.S.C. § 8314);[32] or knowingly falsifying certain national security-related aspects of a federal or District of Columbia employment application (5 U.S.C. § 8315).

5. Entertainment—Recreation—Morale and Welfare

a. Introduction

The concept to be explored in this section is the rule that appropriated funds may not be used for entertainment except when specifically authorized by statute and also authorized or approved by proper administrative officers. E.g., 43 Comp. Gen. 305 (1963). The basis for the rule is that entertainment is essentially a personal expense even where it occurs in some business-related context. Except where specifically appropriated for, entertainment cannot normally be said to be necessary to carry out the purposes of an appropriation.

The reader will readily note the sharp distinction between government practice and corporate practice in this regard. "Entertainment" as a business-related expense is an established practice in the corporate sector. No one questions that it can be equally business-related for a government agency. The difference—and the policy underlying the rule for the government—is summarized in the following passage from B-223678, June 5, 1989:

> "The theory is not so much that these items can never be business-related, because sometimes they clearly are. Rather, what the decisions are really saying is that, because public confidence in the integrity of those who spend the taxpayer's money is essential, certain items which may appear frivolous or wasteful—however legitimate they may in fact be in a specific context—should, if they are to be charged to public funds, be authorized specifically by the Congress."

(1) Application of the rule

As a general proposition, the rule applies to all federal departments and agencies operating with appropriated funds. For example, it has been held applicable to the Alaska Railroad. B-124195-0.M., August 8, 1977.

The question in B-170938, October 30, 1972, was whether the entertainment prohibition applied to the revolving fund of the National Credit Union Administration. The fund is derived from fees collected from federal credit unions and not direct appropriations from the Treasury. Nevertheless, the authority to retain and use the collections constitutes a continuing appropriation since, but for that authority, the fees would have to be deposited in the Treasury and Congress would have to make annual appropriations for the agency's expenses. Therefore, the revolving fund could not be used for entertainment.

There are three situations in which the rule has not been applied. The first is certain government corporations. For example, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, since it was established as a private non-profit corporation and is not an agency or establishment of the United States Government (notwithstanding that it receives appropriations), could use its funds to hold a reception in the Cannon House Office Building. B-131935, July 16, 1975.

The rule has also been held not to apply to government corporations which are classed as government agencies but which have statutory authority to determine the character and necessity of their expenditures. B-127949, May 18, 1956 (Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation); B-35062, July 28, 1943. There are limits, however. See, e.g., B-45702, November 22, 1944, disallowing the cost of a "luncheon meeting" of government employees.

The second exception is donated funds where the recipient agency has statutory authority to accept and retain the gift. The availability of donated funds for entertainment is discussed further, with case citations, in Chapter 6.

The third exception, infrequently applied, is for certain commissions with statutory authority to procure supplies, services, or property, and to make contracts, without regard to the laws and procedures applicable to federal agencies, and to exercise those powers that are necessary to enable the commission to carry out the purposes for which it was established efficiently and in the public interest. B-138969, April 16, 1959 (Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission); B-138925, April 15, 1959 (Civil War Centennial Commission); B-129102, October 2, 1956 (Woodrow Wilson Foundation).

(2) What is entertainment?

The Comptroller General has not attempted a precise definition of the term "entertainment." In one decision, GAO noted that one court had defined the term as "a source or means of amusement, a diverting performance, especially a public performance, as a concert, drama, or the like." Another court said that entertainment

"denotes that which serves for amusement and amusement is defined as a pleasurable occupation of the senses, or that which furnishes it, as dancing, sports, or music." 58 Comp. Gen. 202, 205 (1979),[33] overruled on other grounds by 60 Comp. Gen. 303 (1981).

For purposes of this discussion, the term "entertainment," as used in decisions of the Comptroller General and Comptroller of the Treasury, is an "umbrella" term which includes: food and drink, either as formal meals or as snacks or refreshments; receptions, banquets, and the like; music, live or recorded; live artistic performances; and recreational facilities. Our treatment includes one other category which, even though not "entertainment" as such, is closely related to the entertainment cases: facilities for the welfare or morale of employees.

Earlier decisions from time to time had occasion to address the components of entertainment. Can it include liquor? Responding to an inquiry from the Navy, a Comptroller of the Treasury, obviously not a teetotaler, said: "Entertainments . . . without wines, liquors or cigars, would be like the play of Hamlet with the melancholy Dane entirely left out of the lines." 14 Comp. Dec. 344, 346 (1907).[34]

In a 1941 decision (B-20085, September 10, 1941), the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs asked whether authorized entertainment could include such items as cocktail parties, banquets and dinners, theater attendance, and sightseeing parties. The Comptroller General, recognizing that an appropriation for entertainment conferred considerable discretion, replied, in effect, "all of the above."

That's entertainment.

b. Food for Government Employees

It may be stated as a general rule that appropriated funds are not available to pay subsistence or to provide free food to government employees at their official duty stations ("at headquarters"). In addition to the obvious reason that food is a personal expense and government salaries are presumed adequate to enable employees to [33]Citing, respectively, People v. Klaw, 106 N.Y.S. 341, 351 (Ct. Gen. Sess. 1907), and Young v. Board of Trustees of Broadwater County High School, 90 Mont. 576, 4 P.2d 725, 726 (1931).

[34]The Comptroller's comments should not be confused with the rule that alcoholic beverages are not reimbursable as subsistence expenses. B-164366, March 31, 1981; B-164366, August 16, 1968; B-157312, May 23, 1966. The exclusion applies even against a claim that consumption of alcohol is required by religious beliefs. B-202124, July 17, 1981.

eat regularly,[35] furnishing free food might violate 5 U.S.C. § 5536, which prohibits an employee from receiving compensation in addition to the pay and allowances fixed by law. See, e.g., 68 Comp. Gen. 46, 48 (1988); 42 Comp. Gen. 149, 151 (1962); B-140912, November 24, 1959.

The "free food" rule applies to snacks and refreshments as well as meals. For example, in 47 Comp. Gen. 657 (1968), the Comptroller General held that Internal Revenue Service appropriations were not available to serve coffee to either employees or private individuals at meetings. Similarly prohibited was the purchase of coffeemakers and cups. Although serving coffee or refreshments at meetings may be desirable, it is not a "necessary expense" in the context of appropriations availability. See also B-159633, May 20, 1974.

The question of food for government employees arises in many contexts and there are certain well-defined exceptions. For example, the government may pay for the meals of civilian and military personnel in travel status because there is specific statutory authority to do so.[36] The rule and exception are illustrated by 65 Comp. Gen. 16 (1985), in which the question was whether the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration could provide in-flight meals, at government expense, to persons on extended flights on government aircraft engaged in weather research. The answer was yes for government personnel in travel status, no for anyone else, including government employees not in official travel status.

While feeding employees may not be regarded as a "necessary expense" as a general proposition, it may qualify when the agency is carrying out some particular statutory function where the necessary relationship can be established. Thus, in B-201186, March 4, 1982, it was a permissible implementation of a statutory accident prevention program for the Marine Corps to set up rest stations on highways leading to a Marine base to serve coffee and doughnuts to Marines returning from certain holiday weekends. Another example is 65 Comp. Gen. 738 (1986) (refreshments at awards ceremonies), discussed later in this section. Exceptions of this type illustrate the relativity of the necessary expense doctrine pointed out earlier in our general discussion.

[36]5 U.S.C. § 5702 (civilian employees); 37 U.S.C. § 404 (military personnel). We do no more here than note the existence of the authority. The entitlements of government employees while on official travel or temporary duty are covered in GAO's Personnel Law Manuals. Brief mention should be made, however, of the rule that snacks and refreshments which are not part of a regular meal are not necessary subsistence expenses and hence not reimbursable. B-185826, May 28, 1976; B-167820, October 7, 1969.

We turn now to a discussion of the rule and its exceptions in several other contexts.

(1) Working at official duty station under unusual conditions

The well-settled rule is that the government may not furnish free food (the decisions sometimes get technical and use terms like "per diem" or "subsistence") to employees at their official duty station, even when they are working under unusual circumstances.[37]

An early illustration is 16 Comp. Gen. 158 (1936), in which the expense of meals was denied to an Internal Revenue investigator who was required to maintain a 24-hour surveillance. The reason payment was denied is that the investigator would presumably have eaten (and incurred the expense of) three meals a day even if he had not been required to work the 24-hour shift.

Payment was also denied in 42 Comp. Gen. 149 (1962), where a postal official had bought carry-out restaurant food for postal employees conducting an internal election who were required to remain on duty beyond regular working hours.[38]

Similarly, the general rule was applied in the following situations:

- Federal mediators required to conduct mediation sessions after regular hours. B-169235, April 6, 1970; B-141142, December 15, 1959.
- District of Columbia police officers involved in clean-up work after a fire in a municipal building. B-118638.104, February 5, 1979.
- Geological Survey inspectors at offshore oil rigs who had little alternative than to buy lunch from private caterers at excessive prices. B-194798, January 23, 1980. See also B-202104, July 2, 1981 (Secret Service agents on 24-hour-a-day assignment required to buy meals at high cost hotels).

[37]The cases under this heading obviously do not involve "entertainment" as most of us understand the term. The rule, however, fits under the same conceptual umbrella.

[38]This and several other cases cited in the text also involve the "voluntary creditor" rule, discussed in Chapter 12.

REV_00256883

- Law enforcement personnel retained at staging area for security purposes prior to being dispatched to execute search warrants. B-234813, November 9, 1989.
- Air Force enlisted personnel assigned to a security detail at an off-base social event. B-232112, March 8, 1990.

An exception was permitted in 53 Comp. Gen. 71 (1973). In that case, the unauthorized occupation of a building in which the Bureau of Indian Affairs was located necessitated the assembling of a cadre of General Services Administration special police, who spent the whole night there. Agency officials purchased and brought in sandwiches and coffee for the cadre. GAO concluded that it would not question the agency's determination that the expenditure was incidental to the protection of government property during an extreme emergency, and approved reimbursement. The decision emphasized, however, that it was an exception and that the rule still stands.

A similar exception was permitted in B-189003, July 5, 1977, where agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been stranded in their office during a severe blizzard in Buffalo, New York. The area was in a state of emergency and was later declared a national disaster area. GAO agreed with the agency's determination that the situation presented a danger to human life.

The rationale of 53 Comp. Gen. 71 and B-189003 was applied in B-232487, January 26, 1989, for government employees required to work continually for a 24-hour period to evacuate and secure an area threatened by the derailment of a train carrying toxic liquids.

The exception, however, is limited. The requirement to remain on duty for a 24-hour period, standing alone, is not enough. In B-185159, December 10, 1975, for example, the cost of meals was denied to Treasury Department agents required to work over 24 hours investigating a bombing of federal offices. The Comptroller General pointed out that dangerous conditions alone are not enough. Under the exception established in 53 Comp. Gen. 71, it is necessary to find that the situation involves imminent danger to human life or the destruction of federal property. Also, in that case, the agents were only investigating a dangerous situation which had already occurred and there was no suggestion that any further bombings were imminent. A similar case is B-217261, April 1, 1985, involving a Customs Service official required to remain in a motel room for several days on a surveillance assignment. See also 16 Comp. Gen. 158 (1936) and B-202104, July 2, 1981.

Short of the emergency situation described in B-189003, July 5, 1977, inclement weather is not enough to support an exception. There are numerous cases in which employees have spent the night in motels rather than returning home in a snowstorm, in order to be able to get to work the following day. Reimbursement for meals has consistently been denied. 68 Comp. Gen. 46 (1988); 64 Comp. Gen. 70 (1984); B-226403, May 19, 1987; B-200779, August 12, 1981; B-188985, August 23, 1977. It makes no difference that the employee was directed by his or her supervisor to rent the room (B-226403 and B-188985),[39] or that the federal government in Washington was shut down (68 Comp. Gen. 46).[40]

Naturally, statutory authority will overcome the prohibition. Thus, where the Veterans Administration had statutory authority to accept uncompensated services and to contract for related "necessary services," the VA could, upon an administrative determination of necessity, contract with local restaurants for meals to be furnished without charge to uncompensated volunteer workers at VA outpatient clinics when their scheduled assignment extended over a meal period. B-145430, May 9, 1961. There is also authority to make subsistence payments to law enforcement officials and members of their immediate families when threats to their lives force them to occupy temporary accommodations. 5 U.S.C. § 5706a.

(2) Attendance at meetings and conferences

In Section C.2 of this chapter, we discuss when appropriated funds may be used to finance the attendance of government employees at meetings and conferences. This section addresses when the government may pay for meals at meetings and conferences when attendance is authorized under the principles and statutes set forth in Section C.2.

[39]A supervisor has no authority to do so. As noted in B-226403, such an erroneous exercise of authority does not bind the government.

[40]While the storm in 68 Comp. Gen. 46 was certainly more than flurries, it nevertheless remains the case that the government in Washington will be disrupted by storms that do not approach the severity of the Buffalo blizzard in B-189003. There is also a practical distinction. To feed and lodge a potentially large number of employees every time it snows in Washington is simply not realistic.

that the proposal to indiscriminately charge the landing fields to Roads and Trails would violate 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). The Roads and Trails appropriation could be used for only those landing fields that were directly connected with and necessary to accomplishing the purposes of that appropriation. Landing fields not directly connected with the purposes of the Roads and Trails appropriation, for example, airstrips needed to assist in firefighting in remote areas, had to be charged to the appropriation to which they were related, such as Forest Protection and Utilization. The mere mention of intent at the hearings was not sufficient to alter the availability of the appropriations.

Later, in 53 Comp Gen. 328 (1973), the Comptroller General held that the Forest Roads and Trails appropriation could not be charged with the expense of closing roads or trails and returning them to their natural state, such activity being neither "construction" nor "maintenance."

Again, in B-164497(3), February 6, 1979, GAO decided that the Forest Service could not use the Roads and Trails appropriation to maintain a part of a federally-constructed scenic highway on Forest Service land in West Virginia, although the state was prevented from maintaining it due to the fact that the scenic highway was closed to commercial traffic. The Roads and Trails account was improper to charge with the maintenance because the term "forest road" was statutorily defined as a service or access road "necessary for the protection, administration, and utilization of the [national forest] system and the use and development of its resources." The highway, a scenic parkway reserved exclusively for recreational and passenger travel through a national forest, was not the type of forest road the appropriation was available to maintain. The decision further noted, however, that the Forest Protection and Utilization appropriation was somewhat broader and could be used for the contemplated maintenance.

A 1955 case illustrates a type of expenditure which could properly be charged to the Roads and Trails account. Construction of a timber access road on a national forest uncovered a site of old Indian ruins. Since the road construction itself was properly chargeable to the Roads and Trails appropriation, the Forest Service could use the same appropriation to pay the cost of archaeological and exploratory work necessary to obtain and preserve historical data from the ruins before they were destroyed by the

For meetings sponsored by non-government organizations, the attendee will commonly be charged a fee, usually but not necessarily called a registration fee. If a single fee is charged covering both attendance and meals and no separate charge is made for meals, the government may pay the full fee, assuming of course that funds are otherwise available for the cost of attendance. 38 Comp. Gen. 134 (1958); B-66978, August 25, 1947. The same is true for an evening social event where the cost is a mandatory non-separable element of the registration fee. 66 Comp. Gen. 350 (1987).

If a separate charge is made for meals, the government may pay for the meals if there is a showing that (1) the meals are incidental to the meeting, (2) attendance of the employee at the meals is necessary to full participation in the business of the conference, and (3) the employee is not free to take the meals elsewhere without being absent from essential formal discussions, lectures, or speeches concerning the purpose of the conference. B-160579, April 26, 1978; B-166560, February 3, 1970. Absent such a showing, the government may not pay for the meals. B-154912, August 26, 1964; B-152924, December 18, 1963; B-95413, June 7, 1950; B-88258, September 19, 1949. As an examination of the cited cases will reveal, these rules apply regardless of whether the conference takes place within the employee's duty station area or someplace else.

Where the government is authorized to pay for meals under the above principles, the employee normally cannot be reimbursed for purchasing alternate meals. See B-193504, August 9, 1979; B-186820, February 23, 1978. Personal taste is irrelevant. Thus, an employee who, for example, loathes broccoli will either have to eat it anyway, pay for a substitute meal from his or her own pocket, or go without. For an employee on travel or temporary duty status, which is where this rule usually manifests itself, per diem is reduced by the value of the meals provided. E.g., 60 Comp. Gen. 181, 183-84 (1981). The rule will not apply, however, where the employee is unable to eat the meal provided (and cannot arrange for an acceptable substitute) because of bona fide medical or religious reasons. B-231703, October 31, 1989 (per diem not required to be reduced where employee, an Orthodox Jew who could not obtain kosher meals at conference, purchased substitute meals elsewhere).

For the most part, the above rules will not apply to agency-sponsored meetings. Attendance at agency-sponsored meetings and conferences will generally be subject to the prohibition on furnishing free food to employees at their official duty stations. Thus, the cost of meals and coffee breaks could not be provided for government officials attending a one-day conference on implementation of the Speedy Trial Act. B-188078, May 5, 1977. Similarly, meals could not be provided at a conference of field examiners of the National Credit Union Administration. B-180806, August 21, 1974. Use of appropriated funds was prohibited for coffee breaks at a management seminar, B-159633, May 20, 1974; meals served during "working sessions" at Department of Labor business meetings, B-168774, January 23, 1970; and meals at monthly luncheon meetings for officials of law enforcement agencies, B-198882, March 25, 1981. See also 47 Comp. Gen. 657 (1968); B-45702, November 22, 1944.

In B-137999, December 16, 1958, the commissioners of the Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission had statutory authority to be reimbursed for actual subsistence expenses. This was held to include the cost of lunches during meetings at a Washington hotel. However, the cost of lunches for staff members of the Commission could not be paid.

Merely calling the cost of meals a "registration fee" will not avoid the prohibition. In a 1975 case, the cost of meals was disallowed for Army employees at an Army-sponsored "Operations and Maintenance Seminar." The charge had been termed a registration fee but covered only luncheons, dinner, and coffee breaks. B-182527, February 12, 1975. See also B-195045, February 8, 1980.

In B-187150, October 14, 1976, grant funds provided to the Government of the District of Columbia under the Social Security Act for personnel training and administrative expenses could not be used to pay for a luncheon at a 4-hour conference of officials of the D.C. Department of Human Resources. The conference could not be reasonably characterized as training and did not qualify as an allowable administrative cost under the program regulations.

This is not to say that the rules for meals at non-government meetings and conferences will never apply to government-sponsored meetings at the employee's duty station. In 1980, the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped held its annual meeting in the Washington Hilton Hotel. The affair was to last for three days and included a luncheon and two banquets. There was no registration fee for the meeting but there were charges for the meals. GAO's Equal Employment Opportunity Office planned to send three employees to the meeting and asked whether the agency could pick up the tab for the meals.

The three employees were to make a presentation at the meeting and it seemed clear that attendance was authorized under 5 U.S.C. § 4110. Also, if a registration fee were involved, the prior decisions noted above would presumably have answered the question. The Comptroller General reviewed the precedents such as B-160579, April 26, 1978, and B-166560, February 3, 1970, and took the logical step of applying them to the situation at hand. Thus, GAO could pay for the meals if administrative determinations were made that (1) the meals were incidental to the meeting, (2) attendance at the meals was necessary for full participation at the meeting, and (3) the employees would miss essential formal discussions, lectures, or speeches concerning the purpose of the meeting if they took their meals elsewhere. B-198471, May 1, 1980.[41]

This decision, so it seems, became perceived as the loophole through which the lunch wagon could be driven. So apparently compelling is the quest for free food that it became necessary to issue several additional decisions to clarify B-198471 and to explain precisely what the rationale of that decision does and does not authorize.

In 64 Comp. Gen. 406 (1985), the Comptroller General held that the cost of meals could not be reimbursed for employees attending monthly meetings of the Federal Executive Association within their duty station area. The meetings were essentially luncheon meetings at which representatives of various government agencies could discuss matters of mutual interest. The decision stated:

"What distinguishes [B-198471] . . . is that the President's annual meeting was a 3-day affair with meals clearly incidental to the overall meeting, while in [the cases in which reimbursement has been denied] the only meetings which took place were the ones which took place during a luncheon meal. . . . In order to meet the three-part test [of B-198471], a meal must be part of a formal meeting or conference that includes not only functions such as speeches or business carried out during a seating at a meal but also includes substantial [41]This is a relatively rare instance of the Comptroller General's issuing a formal decision to a GAO requester. Although it doesn't happen often, it will be done when the situation warrants it.

functions that take place separate from the meal. [W]e are unwilling to conclude that a meeting which lasts no longer than the meal during which it is conducted qualifies for reimbursement." Id. at 408.

A similar case the following year, 65 Comp. Gen. 508 (1986), reiterated that the above-quoted test of 64 Comp. Gen. 406 must precede the application of the three-part test of B-198471. The three-part test, and hence the authority to reimburse, relates to a meal which is incident to a meeting, not a meeting which is incident to a meal. 65 Comp. Gen. at 510; 64 Comp. Gen. at 408.

Two 1989 decisions, 68 Comp. Gen. 604 and 68 Comp. Gen. 606, defined the rules further, holding that 5 U.S.C. § 4110 and B-198471 do not apply to purely internal business meetings or conferences sponsored by government agencies. Noting that this result is consistent with the legislative history of 5 U.S.C. § 4110 as summarized in prior decisions,[42] both decisions stated:

"We think . . . that there is a clear distinction between the payment of meals incidental to formal conferences or meetings, typically externally organized or sponsored, involving topical matters of general interest to governmental and nongovernmental participants, and internal business or informational meetings primarily involving the day-to-day operations of government. With respect to the latter, 5 U.S.C. § 4110 has little bearing . . . ." 68 Comp. Gen. at 605 and 608.

One of the decisions went a step further and commented that the claim in 65 Comp. Gen. 508 "should have been summarily rejected based on the application of the general rule." 68 Comp. Gen. at 609.

Naturally, if the meeting or conference does not have the necessary connection with official agency business, the cost of meals may not be paid regardless of who sponsors the meeting or where it is held. Thus, a registration fee consisting primarily of the cost of a luncheon was disallowed for three Community Services Administration employees attending a Federal Executive Board meeting at which Combined Federal Campaign awards were to be presented.

[42] E.g., 46 Comp. Gen. 135, 136-37 (1966); B-140912, November 24, 1959.

B-195045, February 8, 1980.[43] Similarly, an employee of the Department of Housing and Urban Development could not be reimbursed for meals incident to meetings of a local business association. B-166560, May 27, 1969.

In a 1981 case, the Internal Revenue Service bought tickets for several of its agents to attend the Fourth Annual Awards and Scholarship Dinner of the National Association of Black Accountants. The purposes of attending the banquet were to establish contacts for recruitment purposes and to demonstrate the commitment of the IRS to its equal opportunity program. However, attendance could not be authorized under either 5 U.S.C. § 4109 or 5 U.S.C. § 4110, and the expenditure was therefore prohibited by 5 U.S.C. § 5946. B-202028, May 14, 1981.

Before we depart the topic, two cases involving a different twist—payment for meals not eaten—deserve mention. In B-208729, May 24, 1983, the Army Missile Command sponsored a luncheon to commemorate Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., open to both government employees and members of the local community. Attendees were to be charged a fee for the lunch. In order to secure the necessary services, the Army contracted with a caterer (in this case the local Officers Club), guaranteeing a minimum revenue based on the anticipated number of guests. Bad weather on the day of the luncheon resulted in reduced attendance. Under the circumstances, GAO approved payment of the guaranteed minimum as a program expense.

GAO similarly approved payment of a guaranteed minimum balance in B-230382, December 22, 1989, this time involving the Army's "World-Wide Audio Visual Conference." As in B-208729, attendees were charged for the meal but attendance was less than expected. This case had two additional complications. First, the official who made the arrangements lacked the authority to do so. Payment could therefore be authorized only on a quantum meruit basis.

[43]A later decision, 67 Comp. Gen. 254 (1988), held that agencies may spend appropriated funds, within reason, to support efforts to solicit contributions to the CFC from their employees. While 67 Comp. Gen. 254 did not involve meals, it nevertheless raises the question of whether this aspect of B-195045 (insufficient relationship for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 4110) would still be followed. Either way, the disallowance in B-195045 was correct because the meeting was within the "duty station area" and the fee was little more than a disguised charge for the lunch.

Second, the arrangements also included a buffet, open bar, and several coffee breaks. Payment for these items could not be authorized, even under the quantum meruit concept, since they would not have been authorized had proper procurement procedures been followed.

(3) Government Employees Training Act

Under the Government Employees Training Act, an agency may pay, or reimburse an employee for, necessary expenses incident to an authorized training program. 5 U.S.C. § 4109. The Comptroller General has held that the government can provide meals under this authority if the agency determines that the providing of meals is necessary to achieve the objectives of the training program. 48 Comp. Gen. 185 (1968); 39 Comp. Gen. 119 (1959); B-193955, September 14, 1979. The government may also furnish meals to non-government speakers as an expense of conducting the training. 48 Comp. Gen. 185.

In 50 Comp. Gen. 610 (1971), the Training Act was held to authorize the procurement of catering services for a Department of Agriculture training conference where government facilities were deemed inadequate in view of the nature of the program.

The fact that an agency characterizes its meeting as "training" is not controlling. In other words, for purposes of authorizing the government to feed participants, something does not become "training" simply because it is called "training." In B-168774, September 2, 1970, headquarters employees of the (then) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare met with consultants in a nearby hotel at what the agency termed a "research training conference." However, the conference consisted of little more than "working sessions" and included no employee training as defined in the Government Employees Training Act. Therefore, the cost of meals could not be paid. See also 68 Comp. Gen. 606 (1989); B-208527, September 20, 1983; B-187150, October 14, 1976; B-140912, November 24, 1959.

In 65 Comp. Gen. 143 (1985), GAO held that a Social Security Administration employee who had been invited as a guest speaker at the opening day luncheon of a legitimate agency training conference in the vicinity of her duty station could be reimbursed for the cost of the meal. The decision unfortunately confuses 5 U.S.C.

§§ 4109 and 4110 by analyzing the case under section 4110 yet concluding that reimbursement is authorized "as a necessary training expense," which is the standard under section 4109.

(4) Award ceremonies

General operating appropriations may be used to provide refreshments at award ceremonies under the Government Employees Incentive Awards Act. 65 Comp. Gen. 738 (1986). This result, as noted in the decision, is consistent with guidance from the Office of Personnel Management contained in the Federal Personnel Manual.

In 65 Comp. Gen. 738, the Social Security Administration asked whether it could use operating appropriations, apart from its limited entertainment appropriation, to provide refreshments at its annual awards ceremony. GAO observed that the Incentive Awards Act (5 U.S.C. § 4503) authorizes agencies to "pay a cash award to, and incur necessary expense for the honorary recognition of" employees. The decision reasoned that the concept of a necessary expense is, within limits, a relative one based on the relationship of the expenditure to the particular appropriation or program involved. Thus, while the necessary relationship does not exist with respect to an agency's day-to-day operations, the agency would be within its legitimate discretion to determine that refreshments would materially enhance the effectiveness of a ceremonial function, specifically in this case an awards ceremony which is a valid component of the agency's statutorily authorized awards program.

The decision essentially followed B-167835, November 18, 1969, which had concluded that the Incentive Awards Act authorized the National Aeronautics and Space Administration to fund part of the cost of a banquet at which the President was to present the Medal of Freedom to the Apollo 11 astronauts. What made the fuller treatment in 65 Comp. Gen. 738 necessary was that a 1974 decision, B-114827, October 2, 1974, had found the cost of refreshments at an awards ceremony under the Incentive Awards Act payable only from specific entertainment appropriations. The 1986 case partially modified B-114827 to the extent it had held that an entertainment appropriation was the only available funding source. Finally, 65 Comp. Gen. 738 distinguished 43 Comp. Gen. 305 (1963), which had disallowed the cost of refreshments at an awards ceremony for persons who were not federal employees (and therefore not authorized under the Incentive Awards Act nor governed by the "necessary expense" language of that statute).

The Government Employees Incentive Awards Act does not apply to members of the armed forces. However, the uniformed services have similar authority, including the identical "necessary expense" language, in 10 U.S.C. § 1124. Therefore, 65 Comp. Gen. 738 applies equally to award ceremonies conducted under the authority of 10 U.S.C. § 1124. 65 Comp. Gen. at 739 n.2.

(5) Cafeterias and lunch facilities

The government has no general responsibility to provide luncheon facilities for its employees. 10 Comp. Gen. 140 (1930).[44] However, plans for the construction of a new government building may include provision for a lunch room or cafeteria, in which event the appropriation for construction of the building will be available for the lunch facility. 9 Comp. Gen. 217 (1929).

An agency may subsidize the operation of an employees' cafeteria if the expenditure is administratively determined to be necessary to the efficiency of operations and a significant factor in the hiring and retaining of employees and in promoting employee morale. B-216943, March 21, 1985; B-169141, November 17, 1970; B-169141, March 23, 1970. See also B-204214, January 8, 1982 (temporarily providing paper napkins in new government cafeteria) and GAO report entitled Benefits GSA Provides by Operating Cafeterias in Washington, D.C., Federal Buildings, LCD-78-316 (May 5, 1978).

The purchase of equipment for use in other than an established cafeteria may also be authorized in certain circumstances. In B-173149, August 10, 1971, GAO approved the purchase of a set of stainless steel cooking utensils for use by air traffic controllers to prepare food at a flight service station. There were no other readily accessible eating facilities and the employees were required to remain at their post of duty for a full 8-hour shift. Similar cases are:

- B-180272, July 23, 1974: purchase of a sink and refrigerator to provide lunch facilities for the Occupational Safety and Health Review [44]By way of contrast, it has long been conceded that drinking water is a necessity. See 22 Comp. Dec. 31 (1915) and 21 Comp. Dec. 739 (1915).

REV_00256893

Commission where there was no government cafeteria on the premises.

- B-210433, April 15, 1983: purchase of microwave oven by Navy facility to replace non-working stove. Facility was in operation 7 days a week, some employees had to remain at their duty stations for 24-hour shifts, and there were no readily accessible eating facilities in the area during nights and weekends.

c. Entertainment for Government Employees Other Than Food

(1) Miscellaneous cases

There have been relatively few cases in this area, probably because there are few situations in which entertainment for government employees could conceivably be authorized.

An early decision held that 10 U.S.C. § 4302, which authorizes training for Army enlisted personnel "to increase their military efficiency and to enable them to return to civilian life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and business occupations," did not include sending faculty members and students of the Army Music School to grand opera and symphony concerts. 4 Comp. Gen. 169 (1924). Another decision found it improper to hire a boat and crew to send federal employees stationed in the Middle East on a recreational trip to the Red Sea. B-126374, February 14, 1956.

A 1970 decision deserves brief mention although its application will be extremely limited. Legislation in 1966 established the Wolf Trap Farm Park in Fairfax County, Virginia, as a park for the performing arts and directed the Interior Department to operate and maintain it. A certifying officer of the National Park Service asked whether he could certify a voucher for symphony, ballet, and theater tickets for Wolf Trap's Artistic Director. The Comptroller General held that such payments could be made if an appropriate Park Service official determined that attendance was necessary for the performance of the Artistic Director's official duties. The justification was that the Artistic Director attended these functions not as personal entertainment but so that he could review the performances to determine which cultural and theatrical events were appropriate for booking at Wolf Trap. B-168149, February 3, 1970. As noted, this case would seem to have little precedent value except for the Artistic Director at Wolf Trap.

(2) Cultural awareness programs

One area that has generated several decisions, and a change in GAO's position, has been equal employment opportunity special emphasis or cultural awareness programs. There are many areas in which the law undergoes refinement from time to time but remains essentially unchanged. There are other areas in which the law has changed to reflect changes in American society. This is one of those latter areas.

The issue first arose in 58 Comp. Gen. 202 (1979). In that case, the Bureau of Mines, Interior Department, in conjunction with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, sponsored a program of live entertainment for National Hispanic Heritage Week. The program consisted of such items as a lecture and demonstration of South American folk music, a concert, a slide presentation, and an exhibit of Hispanic art and ceramics. The decision concluded that, while the Bureau's Spanish-Speaking Program was a legitimate component of the agency's overall EEO program, appropriated funds could not be used to procure entertainment. This holding was followed in two more cases, B-194433, July 18, 1979, and B-199387, August 22, 1980.

In 1981, however, GAO reconsidered its position. The Internal Revenue Service asked whether it could certify a voucher covering payments for a performance by an African dance troupe and lunches for guest speakers at a ceremony observing National Black History Month. The Comptroller General held the expenditure proper in 60 Comp. Gen. 303 (1981). The decision stated:

"[W]e now take the view that we will consider a live artistic performance as an authorized part of an agency's EEO effort if, as in this case, it is part of a formal program determined by the agency to be intended to advance EEO objectives, and consists of a number of different types of presentations designed to promote EEO training objectives of making the audience aware of the culture or ethnic history being celebrated." Id. at 306.

Further, the lunches for the guest speakers could be paid under 5 U.S.C. § 5703 if they were in fact away from their homes or regular places of business. The prior inconsistent decisions—58 Comp. Gen. 202, B-194433, and B-199387—were overruled.

prescribe precisely how this is to be done. Apart from subsection (b), the substance of section 1514 derives from a 1950 amendment to the Antideficiency Act (64 Stat. 765). In testimony on that legislation, the Director of the (then) Bureau of the Budget stated:

"At the present time, theoretically, I presume the agency head is about the only one that you could really hold responsible for exceeding [an] apportionment. The revised section provides for going down the line to the person who creates the obligation against the fund and fixes the responsibility on the bureau head or the division head, if he is the one who creates the obligation."[56]

Thus, depending on the agency regulations and the level at which administrative responsibility is fixed, the violating individual could be the person in charge of a major agency bureau or operating unit, or it could be a contracting officer or finance officer.

Identifying the person responsible for a violation will be easy in probably the majority of cases. However, where there are many individuals involved in a complex transaction, and particularly where the actions producing the violation occurred over a long period of time, the pinpointing of responsibility can be much more difficult. Hopkins and Nutt, in their study of the Antideficiency Act, present the following as a sensible approach:

"Generally, [the individual to be held responsible] will be the highest ranking official in the decision-making process who had knowledge, either actual or constructive, of (1) precisely what actions were taken and (2) the impropriety or at least questionableness of such actions. There will be officials who had knowledge of either factor. But the person in the best and perhaps only position to prevent the ultimate error—and thus the one who must be held accountable—is the highest one who is aware of both."[57]

Thus, Hopkins and Nutt conclude, where multiple individuals are involved in a violation, the individual to be held responsible "must not be too remote from the cause of the violation and must be in a position to have prevented the violation from occurring."[58]

h. Expenditures in Excess of Apportionment

The former subsection (h) of the Antideficiency Act, now 31 U.S.C. § 1517(a), provides:

"(a) An officer or employee of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia government may not make or authorize an expenditure or obligation exceeding—

"(1) an apportionment; or

"(2) the amount permitted by regulations prescribed under section 1514(a) of this title."

Section 1517(a) must be read in conjunction with sections 1341, 1512, and 1514, previously discussed.

Subsection (a)(1) is self-explanatory—it prohibits obligations or expenditures in excess of an apportionment. Thus, an agency must observe the limits of its apportionments just as it must observe the limits of its appropriations.

There is, however, one difference. It has been held that, under some circumstances, an agency may have a legal duty to seek an additional apportionment from OMB. Berends v. Butz, 357 F. Supp. 143, 155–56 (D. Minn. 1973); Blackhawk Heating & Plumbing Co. v. United States, 622 F.2d 539, 552 n.9 (Ct. Cl. 1980). In Berends v. Butz, the Secretary of Agriculture had terminated an emergency farm loan program, allegedly due to a shortage of funds. The court found the termination improper and directed reinstatement of the program. Since the shortage of funds related to the amount apportioned and not the amount available under the appropriation, the court found that the Secretary had a duty to request an additional apportionment in order to continue implementing the program. The case does not address the nature and extent of any duty OMB might have in response to such a request.

Subsection (a)(2) makes it a violation to obligate or expend in excess of an administrative subdivision of an apportionment to the extent provided in the agency's fund control regulations. The import of 31 U.S.C. § 1514 becomes much clearer when it is read in conjunction with 31 U.S.C. § 1517(a)(2). The statute does not prescribe the level of fiscal responsibility for violations below the apportionment level. It merely recommends that the agency set the level at the highest practical point and suggests no more than one subdivision below the apportionment level. The agency thus, under the statute, has a measure of discretion. If it chooses to elevate overobligations or overexpenditures of lower-tier subdivisions to the level of Antideficiency Act violations, it is free to do so in its fund control regulations.

At this point, it is important to return to OMB Circular No. A-34. Since agency fund control regulations must be approved by OMB, OMB has a role in determining what levels of administrative subdivision should constitute Antideficiency Act violations. Under A-34, overobligation or overexpenditure of an allotment or suballotment are always violations. Overobligation or overexpenditure of other administrative subdivisions are violations only if and to the extent specified in the agency's fund control regulations. OMB Circular No. A-34, §§ 21.1 and 32.2.

In 37 Comp. Gen. 220 (1957), GAO considered proposed fund control regulations of the Public Housing Administration. The regulations provided for allotments as the first subdivision below the apportionment level. They then authorized the further subdivision of allotments into "allowances," but retained responsibility at the allotment level. The "allowances" were intended as a means of meeting operational needs rather than an apportionment control device. GAO advised that this proposed structure conformed to the purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1514, particularly in light of the 1956 addition of section 1514(b), and that expenditures in excess of an "allowance" would not constitute Antideficiency Act violations.

For further illustration, see 35 Comp. Gen. 356 (1955) (overobligation of allotment stemming from misinterpretation of regulations); B-95136, August 8, 1979 (overobligation of regional allotments would constitute reportable violation unless sufficient unobligated balance existed at central account level to adjust the allotments); B-179849, December 31, 1974 (overobligation of allotment held a violation of section 1517(a) where agency regulations specified that allotment process was the "principal means whereby responsibility is fixed for the conduct of program activities within the funds available"); B-114841.2-O.M., January 23, 1986 (no violation in exceeding allotment subdivisions termed "work plans").

5. Penalties and Reporting Requirements

a. Administrative and Penal Sanctions

Violations of the Antideficiency Act are subject to sanctions of two types, administrative and penal. The Antideficiency Act is the only one of the Title 31 funding statutes to prescribe penalties of both types, a fact which says something about congressional perception of the Act's importance.

An officer or employee who violates 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a) (obligate/expend in excess or advance of appropriation), § 1342 (voluntary services prohibition), or § 1517(a) (obligate/expend in excess of an apportionment or administrative subdivision as specified by regulation) "shall be subject to appropriate administrative discipline including, when circumstances warrant, suspension from duty without pay or removal from office." 31 U.S.C. §§ 1349(a), 1518. For a case in which an official was reduced in grade and reassigned to other duties, see Duggar v. Thomas, 550 F. Supp. 498 (D.D.C. 1982) (upholding the agency's action against a charge of discrimination).

In addition, an officer or employee who "knowingly and willfully" violates any of the three provisions cited above "shall be fined not more than $5,000, imprisoned for not more than 2 years, or both." 31 U.S.C. §§ 1350, 1519. As far as the editors are aware, it appears that no officer or employee has ever been prosecuted, much less convicted, for a violation of the Antideficiency Act as of this writing. The knowing and willful failure to record an overobligation in order to conceal an Antideficiency Act violation is also a criminal offense. See 71 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-245856.7, August 11, 1992).

Earlier in this chapter, we pointed out that factors such as the absence of bad faith or the lack of intent to commit a violation are irrelevant for purposes of determining whether a violation has occurred. However, intent is relevant in evaluating the assessment of penalties. Note that the criminal penalties are linked to a determination that the law was "knowingly and willfully" violated, but the administrative sanction provisions do not contain similar language. Thus, intent or state of mind may (and probably should) be taken into consideration when evaluating potential administrative sanctions (whether to assess them and, if so, what type), but must be taken into consideration in determining applicability of the criminal sanctions. Understandably, the provisions for fines and/or jail are intended to be reserved for particularly flagrant violations.

Finally, it should be emphasized that the administrative and penal sanctions apply only to violations of the three provisions cited—31 U.S.C. §§ 1341(a), 1342, and 1517(a). They do not, for example, apply to violations of 31 U.S.C. § 1512. 36 Comp. Gen. 699 (1957).

b. Reporting Requirements

Once it is determined that there has been a violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a), 1342, or 1517(a), the agency head "shall report immediately to the President and Congress all relevant facts and a statement of actions taken." 31 U.S.C. §§ 1351, 1517(b). The report to the President is to be forwarded through the Director of OMB. Further instructions on preparing the reports may be found in OMB Circular No. A-34, §§ 32.2–32.4. The reports are to be signed by the agency head. Id. § 32.7.

As noted, the report is to include all pertinent facts and a statement of all actions taken (any administrative discipline imposed, referral to the Justice Department where appropriate, new safeguards imposed, etc.), presumably including a request for additional appropriations where necessary. It is also understood that the agency will do everything it can lawfully do to mitigate the financial effects of the violation. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 768, 772 (1976); B-114841.2-O.M., January 23, 1986. In view of the explicit provisions of 31 U.S.C. § 1351, it has been held that there is no private right of action for declaratory, mandatory, or injunctive relief under the Antideficiency Act. Thurston v. United States, 696 F. Supp. 680 (D.D.C. 1988).

Factors such as mistake, inadvertence, lack of intent, or the minor nature of a violation do not affect the duty to report. Of course, if the agency feels there are extenuating circumstances, it is entirely appropriate to include them in the report. 35 Comp. Gen. 356 (1955).

What if GAO uncovers a violation in the course of its audit activities but the agency thinks GAO is wrong? The agency should still make the required reports, and should include an explanation of the disagreement. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 32.5. See also GAO report entitled Anti-Deficiency Act: Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service Violates the Anti-Deficiency Act, GAO/AFMD-87-20 (March 1987).

6. Funding Gaps

The term "funding gap" refers to a period of time between the expiration or exhaustion of an appropriation and the enactment of a new one. A funding gap is one of the most difficult fiscal problems a federal agency may have to face. As our discussion here will demonstrate, the case law reflects an attempt to forge a workable solution to a bad situation.

Funding gaps occur most commonly at the end of a fiscal year when new appropriations, or a continuing resolution, have not yet been enacted. In this context, a gap may affect only a few agencies (if, for example, only one appropriation act remains unenacted as of October 1), or the entire federal government. A funding gap may also occur if a particular appropriation becomes exhausted before the end of the fiscal year, in which event it may affect only a single agency or a single program, depending on the scope of the appropriation.

Funding gaps occur for a variety of reasons. For one thing, the complexity of the budget and appropriations process makes it difficult at best for Congress to get everything done on time. Add to this the enormity of some programs and the need to address budget deficits and the scope of the problem becomes more apparent. Also, to some extent, funding gaps are perhaps an inevitable reflection of the political process.

As GAO has pointed out, funding gaps, actual or threatened, are both disruptive and costly.[59] They also produce extremely difficult legal problems under the Antideficiency Act. The basic question, easy to state but not quite as easy to try to answer, is what is an agency permitted or required to do when faced with a funding gap? Can it continue with "business as usual," or must it lock up and go home, or is there some acceptable middle ground?

In 1980, a congressional subcommittee asked whether agency heads could legally permit employees to come to work when the applicable appropriation for salaries had expired and Congress had not yet enacted either a regular appropriation or a continuing resolution for the next fiscal year. The Comptroller General replied that 31 U.S.C. §§ 1341(a) and 1342 were both violated if employees reported for work under those circumstances. The salaries of federal employees are generally fixed by law. Thus, permitting the employees to come to work would result in an obligation to pay salary for the time worked, an obligation in advance of appropriations in violation of section 1341(a). With respect to section 1342, no one was suggesting that the employees were offering to work gratuitously, even assuming they could lawfully do so, which for the most part they cannot. The fact that employees were willing to take the risk that the necessary appropriation would eventually be enacted did not avoid the violation. Clearly, the employees still expected to be paid eventually. B-197841, March 3, 1980. "During a period of expired appropriations," the Comptroller General stated, "the only way the head of an agency can avoid violating the Antideficiency Act is to suspend the operations of the agency and instruct employees not to report to work until an appropriation is enacted." Id. at 3.

However, GAO, like all other agencies, had been groping for a better solution. Whatever might be the cause of a particular funding gap, it seemed clear that it was not the intent of Congress that the federal government simply shut down. At the beginning of FY 1980, GAO prepared an internal memorandum to address its own operations. The memorandum said, in effect, that employees could continue to come to work, but that operations would have to be severely restricted. No new obligations could be incurred for contracts or small purchases of any kind, and of course the employees could not actually be paid until appropriations were enacted. The memorandum was printed in the Congressional Record, and at least one Senator viewed the approach as "commonsense guidelines."[60] The memorandum was noted in B-197841, discussed above, but it was conceded that those guidelines, however sensible they might appear, would nevertheless "legally produce widespread violations of the Antideficiency Act." Id. at 4.

Less than two months after B-197841 was issued, the Attorney General issued a formal opinion to the President. The Attorney General essentially agreed with GAO's analysis that permitting employees to work during a funding gap would violate the Antideficiency Act, but concluded further that the approach outlined in the GAO internal memorandum went beyond what the Act permitted. 43 Op. Att'y Gen. ___ (No. 24), 4A Op. Off. Legal Counsel 16 (1980). The opinion stated:

[60]125 Cong. Rec. 26974 (October 1, 1979).

"[T]here is nothing in the language of the Antideficiency Act or in its long history from which any exception to its terms during a period of lapsed appropriations may be inferred. . . .

"[F]irst of all . . ., on a lapse in appropriations, federal agencies may incur no obligations that cannot lawfully be funded from prior appropriations unless such obligations are otherwise authorized by law. There are no exceptions to this rule under current law, even where obligations incurred earlier would avoid greater costs to the agencies should appropriations later be enacted.

"Second, the Department of Justice will take actions to enforce the criminal provisions of the Act in appropriate cases in the future when violations of the Antideficiency Act are alleged. This does not mean that departments and agencies, upon a lapse in appropriations, will be unable logistically to terminate functions in an orderly way. . . . [A]uthority may be inferred from the Antideficiency Act itself for federal officers to incur those minimal obligations necessary to closing their agencies." 4A Op. Off. Legal Counsel at 19, 20.

This opinion seemed to say that agencies had little choice but to lock up and go home. A second formal opinion, 43 Op. Att'y Gen. ___, 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 1 (1981), went into much more detail on possible exceptions and should be read in conjunction with the 1980 opinion.

As set forth in the 1981 Attorney General opinion, the exceptions fall into two broad categories. The first category is obligations "authorized by law." Within this category, there are four types of exceptions:

(1) Activities under funds which do not expire at the end of the fiscal year, i.e., multiple-year and no-year appropriations.[61]

(2) Activities authorized by statutes which expressly permit obligations in advance of appropriations.

(3) Activities "authorized by necessary implication from the specific terms of duties that have been imposed on, or of authorities that have been invested in, the agency." To take the example given in the opinion, there will be cases where benefit payments under an [61]This would also include certain revolving fund operations, but not those whose use requires affirmative authorization in annual appropriation acts. B-241730.2, February 14, 1991 (Government Printing Office revolving fund).

entitlement program are funded from other than one-year appropriations, e.g., a trust fund, but the salaries of personnel who administer the program are funded by one-year money. As long as money for the benefit payments remains available, administration of the program is, by necessary implication, "authorized by law," unless the entitlement legislation or its legislative history provides otherwise or Congress takes affirmative measures to suspend or terminate the program.

(4) Obligations "necessarily incident to presidential initiatives undertaken within his constitutional powers." Example: the power to grant pardons and reprieves.[62]

The second broad category reflects the exceptions authorized under 31 U.S.C. § 1342—emergencies involving the safety of human life or the protection of property. The Attorney General suggested the following rules for interpreting the scope of this exception:

"First, there must be some reasonable and articulable connection between the function to be performed and the safety of human life or the protection of property. Second, there must be some reasonable likelihood that the safety of human life or the protection of property would be compromised, in some degree, by delay in the performance of the function in question."

5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel at 8. The Attorney General then cited the identical exception language in the deficiency apportionment prohibition of 31 U.S.C. § 1515, and noted that OMB followed a similar approach in granting deficiency apportionments over the years. Given the wide variations in agency activities, it would not be feasible to attempt an advance listing of functions or activities that might qualify under this exception. Accordingly, the Attorney General made the following recommendation:

"To erect the most solid foundation for the Executive Branch's practice in this regard, I would recommend that, in preparing contingency plans for periods of lapsed appropriations, each government department or agency provide for the Director of the Office of Management and Budget some written description, that could be transmitted to Congress, of what the head of the agency, assisted by its general counsel, considers to be the agency's emergency functions."

[62]The same rationale would apply to the legislative branch. B-241911, October 23, 1990 (non-decision letter).

5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel at 11. Lest this approach be taken too far, Congress added the following sentence to 31 U.S.C. § 1342:

"As used in this section, the term 'emergencies involving the safety of human life or the protection of property' does not include ongoing, regular functions of government the suspension of which would not imminently threaten the safety of human life or the protection of property."

Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508, § 13213(b), 104 Stat. 1388, 1388-621 (1990). The conference report on the 1990 legislation explains the intent:

"The conference report also makes conforming changes to title 31 of the United States Code to make clear that . . . ongoing, regular operations of the Government cannot be sustained in the absence of appropriations, except in limited circumstances. These changes guard against what the conferees believe might be an overly broad interpretation of an opinion of the Attorney General issued on January 16, 1981, regarding the authority for the continuance of Government functions during the temporary lapse of appropriations, and affirm that the constitutional power of the purse resides with Congress."

H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 964, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 1170 (1990).

The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals added to the list of exceptions, holding the suspension of the civil jury trial system for lack of funds unconstitutional. Armster v. United States District Court, 792 F.2d 1423 (9th Cir. 1986). Faced with the potential exhaustion of appropriations for juror fees, the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, at the direction of the Judicial Conference of the United States, had sent a memorandum to all district court judges advising that civil jury trials would have to be suspended until more money was available. Basing its holding on the Constitution and expressly declining to rule on the Antideficiency Act, the court held that a suspension for more than a "most minimal" time violated the seventh amendment. Id. at 1430. See also Hobson v. Brennan, 637 F. Supp. 173 (D.D.C. 1986).

Since the appropriation was not yet actually exhausted, and since there was still ample time for Congress to provide additional funds, the court noted that its decision did not amount to ordering Congress to appropriate money. The court noted, but did not address, the far more difficult question of what would happen if the appropriation became exhausted and Congress refused to appropriate additional funds. This, then, is the basic framework. There are a number of exceptions to the Antideficiency Act which would permit certain activities to continue during a funding gap. For activities not covered by any of the exceptions, however, the agency must proceed with prompt and orderly termination or violate the Act and risk invocation of the criminal sanctions. A very brief restatement may be found in 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 555 (1982).

Within this framework, GAO and the Justice Department have addressed a number of specific problems agencies have encountered in coming to grips with funding gaps. For example, towards the end of FY 1982, the President vetoed a supplemental appropriations bill. As a result, the Defense Department did not have sufficient funds to meet the military payroll. The total payroll obligation consisted of (1) the take-home pay of the individuals, and (2) various items the employing agency was required to withhold and transfer to someone else, such as federal income tax and Social Security contributions. The Treasury Department published a change to its regulations permitting a temporary deferral of the due date for payment of the withheld items, and the Defense Department, relying on the "safety of human life or protection of property" exception, used the funds it had available to pay military personnel their full take-home pay. The Attorney General upheld the legality of this action. 43 Op. Att'y Gen.___, 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 27 (1982). The Comptroller General agreed, but questioned the blanket assumption that all military personnel fit within the exception. B-208985, October 5, 1982; B-208951, October 5, 1982. The extent to which this device might be available to civilian agencies would depend on (1) Treasury's willingness to grant a similar deferral, and (2) the extent to which the agency could legitimately invoke the emergency exception.

Additional cases dealing with funding gap problems are:

- Salaries of commissioners of Copyright Royalty Tribunal attach by virtue of their status as officers without regard to availability of funds. Salary obligation is therefore viewed as "authorized by law" for purposes of Antideficiency Act, and commissioners could be retroactively compensated for periods worked without pay during a funding gap. 61 Comp. Gen. 586 (1982).
- Richmond district office of Internal Revenue Service shut down for half a day in October 1986 due to a funding gap. Subsequent legislation authorized retroactive compensation of employees affected. GAO concluded that the legislation applied to intermittent as well as regular full-time employees, and held that the intermittent employees could be compensated in the form of administrative leave for time lost during the half-day furlough. B-233656, June 19, 1989.

- Witness who had been ordered to appear in federal court was stranded without money to return home when court did not convene due to funding gap. Cash disbursement to permit witness to return home or secure overnight lodging was held permissible since hardship circumstances indicated reasonable likelihood that safety of witness would be jeopardized. 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 429 (1981).

There are also a few cases addressing actions an agency has taken to forestall the effects of a funding gap. In 62 Comp. Gen. 1 (1982), the Merit Systems Protection Board, faced with a substantial cut in its appropriation, placed most of its employees on half-time, half-pay status in an attempt to stretch its appropriation through the end of the fiscal year. A subsequent supplemental appropriation provided the necessary operating funds. GAO advised that it was within the Board's discretion, assuming the availability of sufficient funds, to grant retroactive administrative leave to the employees who had been affected by the partial shutdown.

GAO reviewed another furlough plan in 64 Comp. Gen. 728 (1985). The Interstate Commerce Commission had determined that if it continued its normal rate of operations, it would exhaust its appropriation six weeks before the end of the fiscal year. To prevent this from happening, it furloughed its employees for one day per week. GAO found that the ICC's actions were in compliance with the Antideficiency Act. While the ICC was thus able to continue essential services, the price was financial hardship for its employees, plus "serious backlogs, missed deadlines and reduced efficiency." Id. at 732.

GAO has issued several reports on funding gaps. The first was Funding Gaps Jeopardize Federal Government Operations, PAD-81-31 (March 3, 1981). In that report, GAO noted the costly and disruptive effects of funding gaps, and recommended the enactment of permanent legislation to permit federal agencies to incur obligations, but not disburse funds, during a funding gap. In the second report, Continuing Resolutions and an Assessment of Automatic Funding Approaches, GAO/AFMD-86-16 (January 1986), GAO compared several possible options but this time made no specific recommendation. OMB had pointed out, and GAO agreed, that automatic funding legislation could have the undesirable effects of (1) reducing pressure on Congress to make timely funding decisions, and (2) permitting major portions of the government to operate for extended periods without action by either House of Congress or the President. The ideal solution, both agencies agreed, is the timely enactment of the regular appropriation bills.

GAO continues to support the concept of an automatic continuing resolution in a form that does not reduce the incentive to complete action on the regular appropriation bills. Managing the Cost of Government: Proposals for Reforming Federal Budgeting Practices, GAO/AFMD-90-1 (October 1989) at 28–29. A 1991 report analyzed the impact of a funding gap which occurred over the 1990 Columbus Day weekend and again renewed the recommendation for permanent legislation to, at a minimum, allow agencies to incur obligations to compensate employees during temporary funding gaps but not pay them until enactment of the appropriation. Government Shutdown: Permanent Funding Lapse Legislation Needed, GAO/GGD-91-76 (June 1991). The report stated:

"In our opinion, shutting down the government during temporary funding gaps is an inappropriate way to encourage compromise on the budget. Beyond being counterproductive from a financial standpoint, a shutdown disrupts government services. In addition, forcing agency managers to choose who will and will not be furloughed during these temporary funding lapses severely tests agency management's ability to treat its employees fairly." Id. at 9.

D. Supplemental and Deficiency Appropriations

A supplemental appropriation may be defined as "an act appropriating funds in addition to those in an annual appropriation act."[63] The purpose of a supplemental appropriation is to fund projects and activities not included in the budget request for the current annual appropriation and which cannot be postponed until the next regular appropriation. Factors generating the need for supplemental appropriations include the following:

- Enactment of legislation adding new or increased functions
- Unanticipated surge in workload
- Inflation higher than that projected for the fiscal year
- Emergency situations involving unforeseen expenditures

[63]GAO, A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27, at 79.

REV_00257256

- Pay increases not previously budgeted
- Items not included in regular appropriation for lack of timely authorization
- Poor program planning

There is a technical distinction between supplemental appropriations and deficiency appropriations.[64] However, Congress stopped enacting separate "deficiency appropriation acts" in the 1960s and now, supplemental appropriations and deficiency appropriations are combined in "supplemental appropriation acts." The rules governing the availability of supplemental and deficiency appropriations are essentially the same. Thus, the term "supplemental appropriation" for purposes of the following discussion should be construed as including both types.

A supplemental appropriation "supplements the original appropriation, partakes of its nature, and is subject to the same limitations as to the expenses for which it can be used as attach by law to the original appropriation" unless otherwise provided. 4 Comp. Dec. 61 (1897). See also 27 Comp. Gen. 96 (1947); 25 Comp. Gen. 601 (1946); 20 Comp. Gen. 769 (1941). This means that a supplemental appropriation is subject to the purpose and time limitations, plus any other applicable restrictions, of the appropriation being supplemented.

Thus, an appropriation made to supplement the regular annual appropriation of a given fiscal year is available beyond the expiration of that fiscal year only to liquidate obligations incurred within the fiscal year. The unobligated balance of a supplemental appropriation will expire at the end of the fiscal year in the same manner as the regular annual appropriation. See 27 Comp. Gen. 96 (1947); 4 Comp. Dec. 61 (1897); 3 Comp. Dec. 72 (1896). Of course, a supplemental appropriation, just like any other appropriation, can be made available until expended (no-year). E.g., 36 Comp. Gen. 526 (1957); B-72020, January 9, 1948.

[64]A deficiency appropriation is an appropriation made to pay obligations legally created but for which sufficient funds are not available in the appropriation originally made for that purpose. 27 Comp. Gen. 96 (1947); 25 Comp. Gen. 601, 604 (1946); 4 Comp. Dec. 61, 62 (1897). The need for deficiency appropriations often results from violations of the Antideficiency Act, and they can be made in the same fiscal year as the overobligated appropriation or in a later year. Since they serve essentially the same purpose as supplemental appropriations, the distinction had become recognized by the late 1950s as a "distinction without a difference." See 103 Cong. Rec. 6420 (1957).

Unless otherwise provided, a restriction contained in an annual appropriation act will apply to funds provided in a supplemental appropriation act even though the restriction is not repeated in the supplemental. For example, a restriction in a foreign assistance appropriation act prohibiting the use of funds for assistance to certain countries would apply equally to funds provided in a supplemental appropriation for the same fiscal year. B-158575, February 24, 1966. Similarly, a provision in an annual appropriation act that "no part of any appropriation for the Bureau of Reclamation contained in this Act shall be used for the salaries and expenses" of certain officials who were not qualified engineers would apply as well to funds appropriated in supplemental appropriation acts for the same fiscal year. B-86056, May 11, 1949. The rule applies to supplemental authorizations as well as supplemental appropriations. B-106323, November 27, 1951. If a supplemental appropriation act includes a new appropriation which is separate and distinct from the appropriations being supplemented, restrictions contained in the original appropriation act will not apply to the new appropriation unless specifically provided. Id. The fiscal year limitations of the original appropriation, however, would still apply.

The rule that supplemental appropriations are subject to restrictions contained in the regular appropriation act being supplemented applies equally to specific dollar limitations. Thus, if a regular annual appropriation act specifies a maximum limitation for a particular object, either by using the words "not to exceed" or otherwise, a more general supplemental appropriation for the same fiscal year does not authorize an increase in that limitation. 19 Comp. Gen. 324 (1939); 4 Comp. Gen. 642 (1925); B-71583, February 20, 1948; B-66030, May 9, 1947. Naturally, this principle will not apply if the supplemental appropriation specifically provides for the object in question. 19 Comp. Gen. 832 (1940).

Restrictions appearing in a supplemental appropriation act may or may not reach back and apply to balances remaining in the original annual appropriation, depending on the precise statutory language used. Thus, without more, a restriction in a supplemental applicable by its terms to "this appropriation" would apply only to the supplemental funds. B-31546, January 12, 1943. See also 31 Comp. Gen. 543 (1952).

At one time, supplemental appropriation acts specified that the funds were for the same objects and subject to the same limitations as the appropriations being supplemented. The (then) Bureau of the Budget wanted to delete this language pursuant to its mandate to eliminate unnecessary words in appropriations.[65] The Comptroller General agreed that the appropriation language was unnecessary, pointing out that these conditions would apply even without being explicitly stated in the supplemental appropriation acts themselves. B-13900, December 17, 1940.

In addition to supplementing prior appropriations, a supplemental appropriation act may make entirely new appropriations which are separate and distinct from those made by an earlier appropriation act. Where a supplemental appropriation act contains new legislation, whether permanent or temporary, the new legislation will take effect on the date the supplemental is enacted absent a clear intent to make it retroactive. 20 Comp. Gen. 769 (1941). In the cited decision, an appropriation included in a supplemental appropriation act enacted late in fiscal year 1941 which for the first time permitted payment of transportation expenses of certain military dependents was held effective on the date of enactment of the supplemental act and not on the first day of FY 1941.

A supplemental appropriation may also provide for a new object within a lump-sum appropriation. If the original appropriation was not available for that object, then the supplemental amounts to a new appropriation. For example, a FY 1957 supplemental appropriation for the Maritime Administration provided $18 million for a nuclear-powered merchant ship under the heading "ship construction." Funds for the nuclear-powered ship had been sought under the regular "ship construction" lump-sum appropriation for FY 1957, but had been denied. Under the circumstances, the Comptroller General found that the supplemental appropriation amounted to a specifically earmarked maximum for the vessel, and that the agency could not exceed the $18 million by using funds from the regular appropriation. 36 Comp. Gen. 526 (1957).

[65]Prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, the mandate was found in 31 U.S.C. § 623. The recodifiers thought those words themselves were unnecessary, and the concept is now included in the general mandate in 31 U.S.C. § 1104(a) to "use uniform terms" in requesting appropriations.

E. Augmentation of Appropriations

1. The Augmentation Concept

As a general proposition, an agency may not augment its appropriations from outside sources without specific statutory authority. The prohibition against augmentation is a corollary of the separation of powers doctrine. When Congress makes an appropriation, it is also establishing an authorized program level. In other words, it is telling the agency that it cannot operate beyond the level that it can finance under its appropriation. To permit an agency to operate beyond this level with funds derived from some other source without specific congressional sanction would amount to a usurpation of the congressional prerogative. Restated, the objective of the rule against augmentation of appropriations is to prevent a government agency from undercutting the congressional power of the purse by circuitously exceeding the amount Congress has appropriated for that activity.

There is no statute which, in those precise terms, prohibits the augmentation of appropriated funds. The concept does nevertheless have an adequate statutory basis, although it must be derived from several separate enactments. Specifically:

- 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), the "miscellaneous receipts" statute.
- 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a), restricting the use of appropriated funds to their intended purposes. Early decisions often based the augmentation prohibition on the combined effect of 31 U.S.C. §§ 3302(b) and 1301(a). See, e.g., 17 Comp. Dec. 712 (1911); 9 Comp. Dec. 174 (1902).
- 18 U.S.C. § 209, which prohibits the payment of, contribution to, or supplementation of the salary of a government officer or employee as compensation for his or her official duties from any source other than the government of the United States.

The augmentation concept manifests itself in a wide variety of contexts. One application is the prohibition against transfers between appropriations without specific statutory authority. An unauthorized transfer is an improper augmentation of the receiving appropriation. E.g., 23 Comp. Gen. 694 (1944); B-206668, March 15, 1982. In B-206668, for example, a department received a General Administration appropriation plus separate appropriations for the administration of its component bureaus. The unauthorized transfer of funds from the bureau appropriations to the General Administration appropriation was held to be an improper augmentation of the latter appropriation. As with the transfer prohibition itself, however, the augmentation rule has no application at the agency allotment level within the same appropriation account. 70 Comp. Gen. 601 (1991).

It should also be apparent that the augmentation rule is related to the concept of purpose availability. For example, a very early case pointed out that charging a general appropriation when a specific appropriation is exhausted not only violates 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) by using the general appropriation for an unauthorized purpose, but also improperly augments the specific appropriation. [1] Bowler, First Comp. Dec. 257, 258 (1894). However, it is most closely related to the subject of this chapter—availability as to amount—because it has the effect of restricting executive spending to the amounts appropriated by Congress. In this respect, it is a logical, perhaps indispensable, complement to the Antideficiency Act.

For the most part, although the cases are not entirely consistent, GAO has distinguished between receipts of money and receipts of services, dealing with the former under the augmentation rule and the latter under the voluntary services prohibition (31 U.S.C. § 1342). For example, in B-13378, November 20, 1940, a private organization was willing to donate either funds or services. Since the agency lacked statutory authority to accept gifts, acceptance of a cash donation would improperly augment its appropriations. Acceptance of services was distinguished, however, and addressed under 31 U.S.C. § 1342. GAO drew the same distinction in B-125406, November 4, 1955. More recently, acceptance by the Federal Communications Commission of free space at industry trade shows was found not to constitute an augmentation of the Commission's appropriation because there had been no donation of funds. 63 Comp. Gen. 459 (1984).

In apparent conflict with these cases, however, is B-211079.2, January 2, 1987, which stated that, without statutory authority, an agency would improperly augment its appropriations by accepting the uncompensated services of "workfare" participants to do work which would normally be done by the agency with its own personnel and funds. Logic would seem to support the formulation in B-211079.2. Certainly, if I wash your car without charge or if I give you money to have it washed, the result is the same—the car gets washed and your own money is free to be used for something else. Be that as it may, the majority of the cases support limiting the augmentation rule to the receipt of money. In the final analysis, the distinction probably makes little practical difference. In view of 31 U.S.C. § 1342, limiting the augmentation rule to the receipt of funds does not mean that the rule can be negated by the unrestricted acceptance of services.

In a 1991 case, 70 Comp. Gen. 597, GAO concluded that the Interstate Commerce Commission would not improperly augment its appropriations by permitting private carriers to install computer equipment at the ICC headquarters, to facilitate access to electronically filed rate tariffs. Installation was viewed as a reasonable exercise of the ICC's statutory authority to prescribe the form and manner of tariff filing by those over whom the agency has regulatory authority. Somewhat similar in concept to the workfare case, however, the decision suggests that use of the equipment for other purposes, such as word processing by ICC staff, would be an improper augmentation, and advised the ICC to establish controls to prevent this.

2. Disposition of Moneys Received: Repayments and Miscellaneous Receipts

a. General Principles

(1) The "miscellaneous receipts" statute

A very important statute in the overall scheme of government fiscal operations is 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), known as the "miscellaneous receipts" statute. Originally enacted in 1849 (9 Stat. 398), 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) provides:

> "Except as provided in section 3718(b) of this title, an official or agent of the Government receiving money for the Government from any source shall deposit the money in the Treasury as soon as practicable without deduction for any charge or claim."

Penalties for violating 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) are found in 31 U.S.C. § 3302(d), and include the possibility of removal from office. In addition, if funds which should have been deposited in the Treasury but were not are lost or stolen, there is the risk of personal liability. E.g., 20 Op. Att'y Gen. 24 (1891) (liability would attach where funds, which disbursing agent had placed in bank which was not an authorized depositary, were lost due to bank failure).

"It is difficult to see," said an early decision, "how a legislative prohibition could be more clearly expressed." 10 Comp. Gen. 382, 384 (1931). Simply stated, any money an agency receives from a source outside of the agency must be deposited into the Treasury. This means deposited into the general fund ("miscellaneous receipts") of the Treasury, not into the agency's own appropriations, even though the agency's appropriations may be technically still "in the Treasury" until the agency actually spends them.[66] The Comptroller of the Treasury explained the distinction in the following terms:

> "It [31 U.S.C. § 3302(b)] could hardly be made more comprehensive as to the moneys that are meant and these moneys are required to be paid 'into the Treasury.' This does not mean that the moneys are to be added to a fund that has been appropriated from the Treasury and may be in the Treasury or outside. [Emphasis in original.] It seems to me that it can only mean that they shall go into the general fund of the Treasury which is subject to any disposition which Congress might choose to make of it. This has been the holding of the accounting officers for many years. [Citations omitted.] If Congress intended that these moneys should be returned to the appropriation from which a similar amount had once been expended it could have been readily so stated, and it was not."

22 Comp. Dec. 379, 381 (1916). See also 5 Comp. Gen. 289 (1925).

The term "miscellaneous receipts" does not refer to any single account in the Treasury. Rather, it refers to a number of receipt accounts under the heading "General Fund." These are all listed in the Treasury Department's "Federal Account Symbols and Titles" publication.

[66]As a general proposition, an agency's appropriations do remain "in the Treasury" until needed for a valid purpose. Unless Congress expressly so provides, an agency may not have its appropriations paid over directly to it to be held pending disbursement. 21 Comp. Gen. 489 (1941).

In addition to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), several other statutes require that moneys received in various specific contexts be deposited as miscellaneous receipts.[67] Examples are:

- 7 U.S.C. §§ 2241, 2242, 2246, 2247 (proceeds from sale of various products by Secretary of Agriculture)
- 10 U.S.C. § 2667 (moneys received by the military departments from authorized leases)
- 16 U.S.C. § 499 (revenue from the national forests, such as timber sales, subject to the deductions specified in 16 U.S.C. §§ 500 and 501)
- 19 U.S.C. § 527 (customs fines, penalties, and forfeitures)
- 40 U.S.C. § 485(a) (proceeds from sale of surplus public property, except as provided in other subsections of section 485)[68]

Although it is preferable, it is not necessary that the statute use the words "miscellaneous receipts." A statute requiring the deposit of funds "into the Treasury of the United States" will be construed as meaning the general fund of the Treasury. 27 Comp. Dec. 1003 (1921).

To understand the significance of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) and related statutes, it is necessary to recall the provision in Article I, section 9 of the Constitution directing that "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law." Once money is deposited into a "miscellaneous receipts" account, it takes an appropriation to get it back out. E.g., 3 Comp. Gen. 296 (1923); 2 Comp. Gen. 599, 600 (1923); 13 Comp. Dec. 700, 703 (1907). Thus, the effect of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) is to ensure that the executive branch remains dependent upon the congressional appropriation process. Viewed from this perspective, 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) emerges as another [67]Several specific references to miscellaneous receipts in the pre-1982 version of Title 31 were deleted in the recodification because they were regarded as covered by the general prescription of the new section 3302. An example is the so-called User Charge Statute. The pre-recodification version, 31 U.S.C. § 483a, required fees to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. The current version, 31 U.S.C. § 9701, omits the requirement because, as the Revision Note points out, it is covered by § 3302. Other examples are 31 U.S.C. §§ 485 and 487 (1976 ed.).

[68]Section 485 stems from the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. Prior to this law, proceeds from the sale of public property were required to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts under the more general authority of what is now 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). See Mammoth Oil Co. v. United States, 275 U.S. 13, 34 (1927); Pan American Petroleum and Transport Co. v. United States, 273 U.S. 456, 502 (1927). (These are the notorious "Teapot Dome" cases.) Property sales not governed by 40 U.S.C. § 485, such as the situation in 28 Comp. Gen. 38 (1948), for example, would remain subject to 31 U.S.C. § 3302.

element in the statutory pattern by which Congress retains control of the public purse under the separation of powers doctrine. See 51 Comp. Gen. 506, 507 (1972); 11 Comp. Gen. 281, 283 (1932); 10 Comp. Gen. 382, 383 (1931) (the intent is that "all the public moneys shall go into the Treasury; appropriations then follow").

Accordingly, for an agency to retain and credit to its own appropriation moneys which it should have deposited into the general fund of the Treasury is an improper augmentation of the agency's appropriation. This applies even though the appropriation is a no-year appropriation. 46 Comp. Gen. 31 (1966). (No-year status relates to duration, not amount.)

Receipts in the form of "monetary credits" are treated for deposit and augmentation purposes the same as cash. 28 Comp. Gen. 38 (1948) (use by government of monetary credits received as payment for sale of excess electric power held unauthorized unless agency transfers corresponding amount from its appropriated funds to miscellaneous receipts). This will not apply, however, where it is clear that the appropriation or other legislation involved contemplates a different treatment. B-125127, February 14, 1956 (transfer to miscellaneous receipts not required where settlement of accounts was to be made on "net balance" basis). See also 62 Comp. Gen. 70, 74–75 (1982) (credit procedure which would differ from treatment of cash receipts recognized in legislative history).

(2) Exceptions

Exceptions to the "miscellaneous receipts" requirement fall into two broad categories, statutory and nonstatutory:

1. An agency may retain moneys it receives if it has statutory authority to do so. In other words, 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) will not apply if there is specific statutory authority for the agency to retain the funds.

2. Receipts that qualify as "repayments" to an appropriation may be retained to the credit of that appropriation and are not required to be deposited into the General Fund. 6 Comp. Gen. 337 (1926); 5 Comp. Gen. 734, 736 (1926); B-138942-O.M., August 26, 1976.

These exceptions are embodied in Treasury Department-GAO Joint Regulation No. 1, § 2, reprinted at 30 Comp. Gen. 595 (1950), which defines authorized repayments in terms of two general classes, reimbursements and refunds, as follows:

"a. Reimbursements to appropriations which represent amounts collected from outside sources for commodities or services furnished, or to be furnished, and which by law may be credited directly to appropriations.

"b. Refunds to appropriations which represent amounts collected from outside sources for payments made in error, overpayments, or adjustments for previous amounts disbursed, including returns of authorized advances."

As used in the above definitions, the term "reimbursement" generally refers to situations in which retention by the agency is authorized by statute. The term "refund" embraces a category of mostly nonstatutory exceptions in which the receipt is directly related to, and is a direct reduction of, a previously recorded expenditure. Thus, the recovery of an erroneous payment or overpayment which was erroneous at the time it was made qualifies as a refund to the appropriation originally charged. E.g., B-139348, May 12, 1959 (utility overcharge refund); B-138942-O.M., August 26, 1976 (collections resulting from disallowances by GAO under the "Fly America Act"). Also, the return of an authorized advance, such as a travel advance, is a "refund."

At this point, an important distinction must be made. Moneys collected to reimburse the government for expenditures previously made are not automatically the same as "adjustments for previous amounts disbursed." Reimbursements must generally, absent statutory authority to the contrary, be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. The mere fact that the reimbursement is related to the prior expenditure—although this is an indispensable element of an authorized "refund"—is not in itself sufficient to remove the transaction from the scope of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). See, for example, 16 Comp. Gen. 195 (1936); 24 Comp. Dec. 694 (1918); 22 Comp. Dec. 253 (1915); B-45198, October 27, 1944. The controlling principles were stated as follows in two early decisions:

"The question as to whether moneys collected to reimburse the Government for expenditures previously made should be used to reimburse the appropriations from which the expenditures were made or should be covered into the general fund of the Treasury has often been before the accounting officers of the Treasury and this office, and it has been uniformly held that in the absence of an express provision in the statute to the contrary, such funds should be covered in as miscellaneous receipts." 5 Comp. Gen. 289, 290 (1925).

"On the other hand, if the collection involves a refund or repayment of moneys paid from an appropriation in excess of what was actually due such refund has been held to be properly for credit to the appropriation originally charged . . . ." 5 Comp. Gen. 734, 736 (1926).

The key language in the above passage is "in excess of what was actually due." Apart from the more obvious situations—refunds of overpayments, erroneous payments, unused portions of authorized advances—the type of situation contemplated by the "adjustments for previous amounts disbursed" portion of the definition is illustrated by 23 Comp. Gen. 652 (1944). The Agriculture Department was authorized to enter into cooperative agreements with states for soil conservation projects. Some states were prohibited by state law from making advances and were limited to making reimbursements after the work was performed. In these cases, Agriculture initially put up the state's share and was later reimbursed. The Comptroller General held that Agriculture could credit the reimbursements to the appropriation charged for the project. The distinction between this type of situation and the simpler "related to a previous expenditure" situation in which the money must go to miscellaneous receipts lies in the nature of the agency's obligation. Here, Agriculture was not required to contribute the state's share; it could simply have foregone the projects in those states which could not advance the funds. This is different from a situation in which the agency is required to make a given expenditure in any event, subject to later reimbursement. In 23 Comp. Gen. 652, the agency made payments larger than it was required to make, knowing that the "excess" of what it paid over what it had to pay would (or at least was required to) be returned. See also 64 Comp. Gen. 431 (1985); 61 Comp. Gen. 537 (1982); B-69813, December 8, 1947; B-220911.2-O.M., April 13, 1988.

For other examples of refunds as that term is used in the Joint Regulation, see 69 Comp. Gen. 260 (1990) (recoveries under False Claims Act to the extent of reimbursing erroneous payments); 65 Comp. Gen. 600 (1986) (rebates from Travel Management Center contractors); 62 Comp. Gen. 70 (1982) (partial repayment of contribution to International Natural Rubber Organization occasioned by addition of new members); B-139348, May 12, 1959 (refund of overcharge by public utility); B-209650-O.M., July 20, 1983 (same).

A repayment is credited to the appropriation initially charged with the related expenditure, whether current or expired. If the appropriation is still current, then the funds remain available for further obligation within the time and purpose limits of the appropriation. However, if the appropriation has expired for obligational purposes (but has not yet been closed), the repayment must be credited to the expired account, not to current funds. See 23 Comp. Gen. 648 (1944); 6 Comp. Gen. 337 (1926); B-138942-O.M., August 26, 1976. If the repayment relates to an expired appropriation, crediting the repayment to current funds is an improper augmentation of the current appropriation unless authorized by statute. B-114088, April 29, 1953. These same principles apply to a refund in the form of a credit, such as a credit for utility overcharges. B-139348, May 12, 1959; B-209650-O.M., July 20, 1983.[69] Once an appropriation account has been closed in accordance with 31 U.S.C. §§ 1552(a) or 1555, repayments must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts regardless of how they would have been treated prior to closing. 31 U.S.C. § 1552(b), as amended by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1405 (1990).

Where funds are authorized to be credited to an appropriation, restrictions on the basic appropriation apply to the credits as well as to the amount originally appropriated. A-95083, June 18, 1938.

The fact that some particular reimbursement is authorized or even required by law is not, standing alone, sufficient to overcome 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). E.g., 67 Comp. Gen. 443 (1988); 22 Comp. Dec. 60 (1915); 1 Comp. Dec. 568 (1895). The accounting for that reimbursement—whether it may be retained by the agency and, if so, how it is to be credited—will depend on the terms of the statute. Some statutes, for example, permit reimbursements to be credited to current appropriations regardless of which appropriation "earned" the reimbursement. As a general proposition, however, this practice, GAO has pointed out, diminishes congressional control. For further discussion of these concepts in the context of statutes applicable to the Defense Department, see GAO report entitled Reimbursements to Appropriations: Legislative Suggestions for Improved Congressional Control, FGMSD-75-52 (November 1, 1976).

As might be expected, there have been a great many decisions involving the "miscellaneous receipts" requirement. It is virtually impossible to draw further generalizations from the decisions other [69]It should not be automatically assumed that every form of "credit" accruing to the government under a contract will qualify as a "refund" to the appropriation. See, e.g., A-51604, May 31, 1977.

than to restate the basic rule: An agency must deposit into the General Fund of the Treasury any funds it receives from sources outside of the agency unless the receipt constitutes an authorized repayment or unless the agency has statutory authority to retain the funds for credit to its own appropriations.

(3) Timing of deposits

As to the timing of the deposit in the Treasury, 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) says merely "as soon as practicable." There is another statute, however, now found at 31 U.S.C. § 3302(c), which provides in relevant part:

"(1) A person having custody or possession of public money, including a disbursing official having public money not for current expenditure, shall deposit the money without delay in the Treasury or with a depositary designated by the Secretary of the Treasury under law. Except as provided in paragraph (2), money required to be deposited pursuant to this subsection shall be deposited not later than the third day after the custodian receives the money. . . .

"(2) The Secretary of the Treasury may by regulation prescribe that a person having custody or possession of money required by this subsection to be deposited shall deposit such money during a period of time that is greater or lesser than the period of time specified by the second sentence of paragraph (1)."

This statute, formerly designated as Revised Statutes § 3621, originated in 1857 (11 Stat. 249). It was amended in 1896 (29 Stat. 179) to specify a deadline of 30 days. The time limit was reduced to three days by section 2652(b)(1) of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 (98 Stat. 494, 1152).

Treasury Department regulations provide:

"An agency will achieve same day deposit of monies. Where same day deposit is not cost-effective or is impracticable, next day deposit of monies must be achieved."

31 C.F.R. § 206.5(a)(1) (1991). However, receipts of less than $1,000 may be accumulated and deposited when the total reaches $1,000. Id. § 206.5(b)(1). Further procedural guidance is contained in I Treasury Financial Manual Chapter 5-4000.

As a general proposition, section 3302(c) and the Treasury regulations place an outer limit on what is "practicable" under section 3302(b). 11 Comp. Gen. 281, 283–84 (1932); 10 Comp. Gen. 382,

385 (1931). The deadline applies to all receipts, including those to be credited to an appropriation account (which, of course, is "in the Treasury"), not just those for deposit as miscellaneous receipts. E.g., 10 Comp. Gen. 382 (1931).

(4) Money not received "for the Government"

As originally enacted, 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) required deposit in the Treasury of moneys received "for the use of the United States" (9 Stat. 398). The 1982 recodification of Title 31 changed this language to moneys received "for the Government." The meaning, of course, is the same. Although the Comptroller General has not attempted to define this phrase in any detail, its scope, consistent with the statutory purpose, is broad. There is no distinction between money received for the use of the United States and money received for the use of a particular agency; such a distinction would largely nullify the statute.

As will be seen from the following case summaries, situations in which the "for the use of the United States" clause was the primary basis for the decision do not fall into any particular pattern.

In B-205901, May 19, 1982, a railroad had furnished 15,000 gallons of fuel to the Federal Bureau of Investigation for use in an undercover investigation of thefts of diesel fuel from the railroad. The railroad and FBI agreed that the fuel or the proceeds from its sale would be returned upon completion of the investigation. In view of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), the FBI then asked whether money generated from the sale of the fuel had to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

In one sense, it could be argued that the money was received "for the use of the United States," in that the FBI planned to use it as evidence. However, the Comptroller General pointed out, this is not the kind of receipt contemplated by 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). Citing 33 Op. Att'y Gen. 316, 321 (1922), the decision concluded that "[f]unds are received for the use of the United States only if they are to be used to bear the expenses of the Government or to pay the obligations of the United States." Therefore, there was no legal barrier to returning the funds to the railroad.

In another case, GAO held that misconduct fines levied on Job Corps participants by the Labor Department need not be treated as money received for the use of the United States for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). The governing legislation specifically authorized "reductions of allowances" as a disciplinary measure. Labor felt that, in some cases, immediate collection of a cash fine from the individual's pocket would be more effective. Finding a legislative intent to confer broad discretion in matters of enrollee discipline, GAO agreed that the cash fines could be regarded as a form of disciplinary allowance reduction, and accordingly credited to Job Corps appropriations. B-130515, August 18, 1970. GAO followed the same approach in a similar question several years later in 65 Comp. Gen. 666, 671 (1986).

In 64 Comp. Gen. 217 (1985), a food service concession contract required the contractor to reserve a percentage of income to be used for the replacement of government-owned equipment. The reserve was found not to constitute money "for the Government" within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). GAO distinguished an earlier decision, 35 Comp. Gen. 113 (1955), because the reserve here was merely a bookkeeping entry whereas the proposal in the 1955 case would have required the actual transfer of funds to a bank account. 64 Comp. Gen. at 219.

Two cases deal with fees paid to contractors. In B-166506, October 20, 1975, the Environmental Protection Agency had a number of contracts with private firms for the processing, storage, and retrieval of various kinds of recorded environmental information. Much of this information was of value to private parties and available under the Freedom of Information Act. Fees collected by an agency under FOIA must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. Here, however, EPA proposed advising requesting parties to deal directly with the contractors, who would charge and retain fees for providing the data, although the requestors would retain the right to deal with EPA. GAO approved the proposal, concluding that fees charged by the contractors in these circumstances were not money received for the use of the United States. The decision cautioned, however, that the fees charged and retained by the contractors could not exceed the fees which EPA could charge if it provided the services directly. Thus, the fees could include the direct costs of document search and duplication, but not costs associated with developing the information. In 61 Comp. Gen. 285 (1982), GAO provided similar advice to the Federal Election Commission in connection with requests from the public for microfilm copies of its reports.

Finally, several of the trust fund cases noted later in this chapter have employed the "not received for the use of the United States" rationale. E.g., 60 Comp. Gen. 15, 26–27 (1980); B-241744, May 31, 1991; B-166059, July 10, 1969; B-43894, September 11, 1944; B-24117-O.M., April 21, 1942.

b. Contract Matters

(1) Excess reprocurement costs

We use the term "excess reprocurement costs" here to include two factually different but conceptually related situations:

1. Original contractor defaults. Agency still needs the work done and contracts with someone else to complete the work, almost invariably at a cost higher than the original contract price. Original contractor is liable to the government for these "excess reprocurement costs."

2. Agency incurs additional expense to correct defective work by original contractor. Contractor is liable for the amount of this additional expense.

Disposition of amounts recovered in these situations has generated numerous cases. As a general proposition, the answer depends on the timing of the recovery in relation to the agency's reprocurement or corrective action and the status of the applicable appropriation. The objective is to avoid the depletion of currently available appropriations to get what the government was supposed to get under the original obligation. The rules were most recently summarized, and the case law reviewed, in 65 Comp. Gen. 838 (1986).

The rules are as follows:

1. If, at the time of the recovery from the original contractor, the agency has not yet incurred the additional expense, the agency may retain the amount recovered to the extent necessary to fund the reprocurement or corrective measures. The collection is credited to the appropriation obligated for the original contract, without regard to the status of that appropriation.

2. If, at the time of recovery from the original contractor, the agency has already incurred the additional reprocurement or corrective expense, the agency may retain the recovery for credit to the applicable appropriation, to the extent necessary to reimburse itself, if that appropriation is still available for obligation. If the appropriation is no longer available for obligation, the recovery should go to miscellaneous receipts.

These rules apply equally to default and defective work situations. To restate them from the perspective of the type of appropriation involved, if the appropriation used to fund the original contract is a no-year appropriation, the recovery may be credited to that appropriation regardless of whether the agency has or has not yet actually incurred the additional costs. If the appropriation is an annual or multiple-year appropriation and the agency has not yet incurred the additional costs as of the time of recovery, the agency may credit the collection to the appropriation regardless of whether it is still current or expired. In the case of an annual or multiple-year appropriation where the agency has already incurred the reprocurement or corrective costs as of the time of recovery, the agency may retain the recovery if the appropriation is still available for obligation, but not if it has expired. (Where the excess costs have already been incurred and the appropriation has expired at the time of recovery, depletion of currently available funds is clearly not a concern.)

Prior to 1983, there were essentially two separate lines of cases, one dealing with defective work and the other dealing with default. The defective work cases, if one examines the facts and types of appropriations involved, had always applied the principles stated above, although not necessarily in those terms. Some illustrative cases are summarized below:

- 8 Comp. Gen. 103 (1928). Supplies delivered by a contractor were found upon inspection to be unsatisfactory for use, that is, not in accordance with the terms of the contract. It was held that a refund by the contractor could be credited to the appropriation originally charged, on the theory that the payment was improperly made from the appropriation in the first instance. The appropriation involved was an annual appropriation, and the corrective costs had not been paid as of the time of the recovery.
- 34 Comp. Gen. 577 (1955). An amount recovered from a contractor's surety because the work failed to meet specifications after the contractor received final payment was regarded as in the nature of a reduction in contract price representing the value of unfinished work, and therefore amounted to the recovery of an unauthorized overpayment. As such, it could be deposited in the appropriation charged with the contract and expended for completion of the work. The appropriation involved was a no-year appropriation.

- 44 Comp. Gen. 623 (1965). Recovery for defective work could be credited to an expired annual appropriation. Since the corrective work had not yet been undertaken, the funds would remain available for that corrective work under the "replacement contract" theory.
- 65 Comp. Gen. 838 (1986). Recovery for faulty design could be used for necessary corrective work. The appropriation involved was a multiple-year appropriation still available for obligation at the time of the recovery.

In the default situation, the earliest decisions held that the agency could retain excess reprocurement costs recovered from the defaulting contractor. Consistent with the defective work cases, the early default cases involved situations in which the recovered funds would still be available for obligation, either because the appropriation used for the contract was still available or under the replacement contract theory. 21 Comp. Dec. 107 (1914) (expired annual appropriation, reprocurement not yet effected); 16 Comp. Dec. 384 (1909) (no-year appropriation). However, the decisions inexplicably changed course, starting apparently with 23 Comp. Dec. 352 (1916), and for several decades thereafter consistently held, without attempting much further analysis, that excess reprocurement costs recovered from defaulting contractors had to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts.[70]

The two lines of cases met in a 1983 decision, 62 Comp. Gen. 678. That decision recognized that there was no real reason to distinguish between default and defective work for purposes of accounting for recoveries. The rules should be the same in both situations. Accordingly, 62 Comp. Gen. 678 modified the prior default cases and held, in effect, that the rules previously applied in the defective work cases should be applied in the future to all excess reprocurement cost cases "without reference to the event that gave rise to the need for the replacement contract—that is, whether occasioned by a default or by defective workmanship." Id. at 681. The decision went on to hold that the Bureau of Prisons could retain damages recovered from a

The rule was applied regardless of whether the funds were actually collected or merely withheld from contract payments due. 52 Comp. Gen. 45 (1972).

contractor charged with defective work, for credit to the appropriation which had been used to replace the defective work. Although not noted in the decision, the appropriation to be credited was a no-year appropriation. 65 Comp. Gen. 838, 841 n.3 (1986).

The decision added another new element: The rules would apply even where the recovery, by virtue of factors such as inflation or underbidding, exceeds the amount paid to the original contractor. Of course, the reason behind permitting retention of the funds is to enable the agency to get what it originally bargained for, not for the agency to make a "profit" on the transaction. Thus, any amounts recovered over and above what is actually necessary to fund the reprocurement or corrective work (or to reimburse the appropriation charged with that work, if it is still currently available) must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 62 Comp. Gen. at 683.

It follows logically from what has been said that the proceeds of a forfeited performance bond should be available to the contracting agency if and to the extent necessary to fund a replacement contract to complete the work of the original contract, and this was the holding in 64 Comp. Gen. 625 (1985). It had been held in an earlier case that, under a contract for the exchange of government property for private property, when the government delivers its property but the contractor defaults, moneys received from a surety under a performance bond, presumably representing the value of the government property delivered, could be regarded as in recoupment of the "advance payment" and used for a replacement purchase. 27 Comp. Gen. 117 (1947).[71]

In 65 Comp. Gen. 838 (1986), GAO reviewed the evolution of the case law on excess reprocurement costs, restated the rules, and pointed out that in no case had GAO approved agency retention of recovered funds where the reprocurement or corrective costs "had already been paid from an appropriation which, at the time of the recovery, was no longer available for obligation." Id. at 841 n.5.

Before leaving the subject, it may be helpful to once again summarize the rules in a slightly different manner. From the perspective of [71]27 Comp. Gen. 117 went on to state that any moneys recovered from the contractor over and above the amount of the performance bond had to go to miscellaneous receipts. It was this portion of the decision that was modified by 62 Comp. Gen. 678.

appropriation status and the timing of agency action, the fact patterns may be categorized as follows:

1. No-year appropriation; recovery made before agency incurs additional costs.

2. No-year appropriation; additional costs incurred prior to recovery.

3. Annual or multiple-year appropriation; recovery made before agency incurs additional costs; appropriation still current at time of recovery.

4. Annual or multiple-year appropriation; additional costs incurred prior to recovery; appropriation still current at time of recovery.

5. Annual or multiple-year appropriation; recovery made before agency incurs additional costs; appropriation expired at time of recovery.

6. Annual or multiple-year appropriation; additional costs incurred prior to recovery; appropriation expired at time of recovery.

In the first five situations, the agency may retain amounts recovered to the extent necessary to fund the reprocurement or corrective work, or to reimburse itself for costs already incurred. In the sixth situation, the recovery goes to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.[72]

(2) Other contract situations

The traditional rule for liquidated damages is that they may be retained in the appropriation originally charged. 44 Comp. Gen. 623 (1965); 23 Comp. Gen. 365 (1943); 9 Comp. Gen. 398 (1930); 18 Comp. Dec. 430 (1911). See also B-237421, September 11, 1991. The rationale for retaining liquidated damages in the appropriation account rather than depositing them in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts is that they effect an authorized reduction in the price of the individual contract concerned, and also that this would make them available for return to the contractor should the liability subsequently [72]It is entirely possible that some of the default cases modified by 62 Comp. Gen. 678 involved this precise situation, in which event the result in those cases would still be correct. However, since this cannot be known with certainty from the text of the decisions alone, it is best to disregard them.

be relieved. However, where this rationale does not apply—for example, in a case where the contractor did nothing and therefore earned nothing and the Comptroller General had denied the remission of liquidated damages under 41 U.S.C. § 256a—the liquidated damages should be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 46 Comp. Gen. 554 (1966).

In some liquidated damage situations, the agency will not have incurred any additional reprocurement or corrective costs. This might happen in a case where an agency received liquidated damages for delay in performance but the contractor's performance, though late, was otherwise satisfactory. In other cases, however, the agency will incur additional costs. In the situation described in 46 Comp. Gen. 554, for example, the agency would presumably need to reprocure, in which event it could retain the liquidated damages in accordance with the rules for excess reprocurement costs just discussed. 64 Comp. Gen. 625 (1985) (modifying 46 Comp. Gen. 554 to that extent). Consistent with these rules, liquidated damages credited to an expired appropriation may not be used for work which is not part of a legitimate replacement contract. B-242274, August 27, 1991.

Compensation paid by an insurance company for damage to government property caused by a contractor may not be used to augment the agency's appropriation used for the contract, absent specific statutory authority, and the moneys, whether paid to the government or to the contractor, are for deposit into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 67 Comp. Gen. 129 (1987); 48 Comp. Gen. 209 (1968). The retention of insurance proceeds was also involved in B-93322, April 19, 1950, an apparent exception based on the particular circumstances involved. In that case, the General Services Administration had entered into a contract for renovation of the Executive Mansion. The contract required the contractor to carry adequate fire and hazard insurance. The renovation project had been undertaken under a specific appropriation which was enough for the initial cost but would not have been sufficient for repairs in the event of a fire or other hazard. Since the renovation was a "particular job of temporary nature," and since a contrary result would defeat the purpose of the appropriation, the Comptroller General held that insurance proceeds received in the event a covered risk occurred could be retained and used for the cost of repairs.

Somewhat similarly, it was held in 39 Comp. Gen. 647 (1960) that to require amounts refunded to the United States for contract violations under the Great Plains Conservation Program to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts would deplete the appropriation to that extent and would thereby defeat the statutory purpose. However, the exception was permitted only for the refund of "unearned payments," that is, violations which amounted to a failure of consideration such that the payments did not result in any benefit to the program. Refunds of "earned payments," that is, where the payments had resulted in some benefit to the program, would have to go to miscellaneous receipts since their retention would constitute an improper augmentation. In recognizing the limited exception, the Comptroller General noted that the terms of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) "are general in nature and should receive a reasonable construction with respect to any particular form of income or receipt." Id. at 649. The decision also noted that the "contracts" involved were not procurement contracts but were more in the nature of grants. Id.

Refunds received by the government under a price redetermination clause may be credited to the appropriation from which the contract was funded. 33 Comp. Gen. 176 (1953). However, if the refund is entirely voluntary on the part of the contractor, the money goes to miscellaneous receipts. 24 Comp. Gen. 847, 851 (1945).

Refunds received by the government under a warranty clause may be considered as an adjustment in the contract price and therefore credited to the appropriation originally charged under the contract. 34 Comp. Gen. 145 (1954). The same result applies where the warranty refund is in the form of a replacement purchase credit. 27 Comp. Gen. 384 (1948). (These cases are conceptually related to the "defective work" cases discussed earlier, and the result follows logically from the result in those cases.)

A different type of credit was discussed in 53 Comp. Gen. 872 (1974). It was proposed to require prospective timber sale purchasers to make certain property surveys, the cost of which would be credited against the sale price. The surveys had previously been financed from Forest Service appropriations. GAO viewed the proposal as an unauthorized augmentation of those appropriations. Similarly, the Department of Agriculture could not apply savings in the form of credits accrued under a contract for the handling of food stamp sales receipts to offset the cost of a separate data collection contract, even though both contracts were necessary to the same program objective. A-51604, May 31, 1977.

The rule that money received by the government under a contract is governed by 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) unless one of the established exceptions applies is underscored by the case of Reeve Aleutian Airways, Inc. v. Rice, 789 F. Supp. 417 (D.D.C. 1992). The Air Force had awarded a contract to a commercial air carrier to provide passenger and cargo service to a remote base in the Aleutian Islands. The carrier's revenue would be derived almost entirely from fares either purchased directly or reimbursed by the United States (military personnel, their dependents, and government contractor employees). The contract granted the carrier landing rights and ground support at the base, and the contractor agreed to return a specified portion of its receipts as a "concession fee," to be deposited in the base morale, welfare, and recreation fund. "[I]nnovation consistent with the law should be encouraged," said the court, "but this transaction so plainly violates the express terms of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) . . . that it should be nipped in the bud." Id. at 421. Since there was no authority to divert the funds from the Treasury to the welfare fund, and since the diversion would actually increase the cost to the government, the court found the contract award to be arbitrary and capricious, and declared the contract "null, void and of no force and effect." Id. at 423.

A similar GAO decision is 35 Comp. Gen. 113 (1955), holding that a provision in a food services contract under which a portion of gross receipts would be set aside in a reserve fund for the repair and replacement of government-owned equipment was contrary to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b).

If a contract requires the government to pay a deposit on containers and provides for a refund by the contractor of the deposit upon return of the empty containers by the government, the refund may be credited to the appropriation from which the deposit was paid. B-8121, January 30, 1940. However, if the contract establishes a time limit for the government to return the empty containers and provides further that thereafter title to the containers shall be deemed to pass to the government, a refund received from the contractor after expiration of the time limit is treated as a sale of surplus property and must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. 23 Comp. Gen. 462 (1943).

c. Damage to Government Property and Other Tort Liability

As a general proposition, amounts recovered by the government for loss or damage to government property cannot be credited to the appropriation available to repair or replace the property, but must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 64 Comp. Gen. 431 (1985) (damage to government motor vehicle); 26 Comp. Gen. 618 (1947) (recovery from insurance company for damage to government vehicle); 3 Comp. Gen. 808 (1924) (loss of Coast Guard vessel resulting from collision).[73] While the recovery may well be "related" to a prior expenditure for repair of the property, it is not an "adjustment" of a previous disbursement for purposes of Treasury-GAO Joint Regulation No. 1. 64 Comp. Gen. 431, 433 (1985).

There are statutory exceptions. One involves property purchased and maintained by the General Services Administration from the General Supply Fund, a revolving fund established by 40 U.S.C. § 756. By virtue of 40 U.S.C. § 756(c), recoveries for loss or damage to General Supply Fund property are credited to the General Supply Fund. This includes recoveries from other federal agencies for damage to GSA motor pool vehicles. 59 Comp. Gen. 515 (1980).

Another is 16 U.S.C. § 579c, which authorizes the Forest Service to retain the proceeds of bond forfeitures resulting from failure to complete performance under a permit or timber sale contract, and money received from a judgment, compromise, or settlement of a government claim for present or potential damage to lands or improvements under the administration of the Forest Service. If the receipt exceeds the amount necessary to complete the required work or make the needed repairs, the excess must be transferred to miscellaneous receipts. This provision is discussed in 67 Comp. Gen. 276 (1988), holding that the proceeds of a bond forfeiture could be used to reimburse a general Forest Service appropriation which had been charged with the cost of repairs.

In addition, where an agency has statutory authority to retain income derived from the use or sale of certain property, and the governing legislation shows an intent for the particular program or activity to be self-sustaining, the agency may retain recoveries for loss or damage to that property. 24 Comp. Gen. 847 (1945); 22 Comp. Gen. 1133

[73]Further cases for this proposition are 35 Comp. Gen. 393 (1956); 28 Comp. Gen. 476 (1949); 15 Comp. Gen. 683 (1936); 5 Comp. Gen. 928 (1926); 20 Comp. Dec. 349 (1913); 14 Comp. Dec. 87 (1907); 9 Comp. Dec. 174 (1902).

(1943). While the two cited decisions involve recoveries from insurers, the principle applies equally to recoveries directly from the party responsible for the loss or damage. 27 Comp. Gen. 352 (1947).

There is also a nonstatutory exception. Where a private party responsible for loss or damage to government property agrees to replace it in kind or to have it repaired to the satisfaction of the proper government officials and to make payment directly to the party making the repairs, the arrangement is permissible and the agency is not required to transfer an amount equal to the cost of the repair or replacement to miscellaneous receipts.[74] The principle was first recognized in 14 Comp. Dec. 310 (1907), and has been followed, either explicitly or implicitly, ever since. E.g., 67 Comp. Gen. 510 (1988); B-87636, August 4, 1949; B-128209-O.M., July 12, 1956. The exception applies even though the money would have to go to miscellaneous receipts if the responsible party paid it directly to the government. 67 Comp. Gen. at 511; B-87636, August 4, 1949. For an apparent "exception to the exception" based on the specific legislation involved, see 28 Comp. Gen. 476 (1949).

If one regards 14 Comp. Dec. 310 from the standpoint of pure logic, it appears difficult to support. It is, in fact, one of the extremely few instances in which the decisions have sanctioned doing indirectly something that cannot be done directly. Be that as it may, the exception has been followed since 1907 and appears to be firmly entrenched. Thus, for example, in B-128209-O.M., July 12, 1956, GAO addressed the relationship between 14 Comp. Dec. 310 and 28 Comp. Gen. 476, stating that "14 Comp. Dec. 310 has been followed for almost 50 years and we have never expressed disagreement with the conclusion reached therein." The exception does not disturb the rule itself; it is "nothing more than an exception that may be advantageous if the timing of repair and payment can be made to coincide." 64 Comp. Gen. 431, 433 (1985).

The rule that recoveries for loss or damage to government property must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts applies equally to recoveries from common carriers for government property lost or [74]A 1943 case suggested a different result, i.e., the agency might have to transfer the value of the repairs to miscellaneous receipts, if the agency had a specific appropriation for repair or replacement of the property in question. 22 Comp. Gen. 1133, 1137 (1943). GAO indicated in 67 Comp. Gen. 510 (1988) that this would not be the case, although 67 Comp. Gen. 510 did not deal with a specific repair appropriation, which would appear to be a rare case in any event.

damaged in transit. 46 Comp. Gen. 31 (1966). See also 28 Comp. Gen. 666 (1949); 2 Comp. Gen. 599 (1923); 22 Comp. Dec. 703 (1916); 22 Comp. Dec. 379 (1916). There is a narrow exception in cases where the freight bill on the shipment of the property lost or damaged exceeds the amounts paid for repairs and both are payable from the same appropriation, in which event the bill is reduced and the amount deducted to cover the cost of repairs is allowed to remain to the credit of the appropriation. 21 Comp. Dec. 632 (1915), as amplified in 8 Comp. Gen. 615 (1929) and 28 Comp. Gen. 666 (1949). The rule and exception are discussed in 46 Comp. Gen. 31 and in B-4494, September 19, 1939. Also, as with receipts in general, the miscellaneous receipts requirement does not apply if the appropriation or fund involved is made reimbursable by statute. 46 Comp. Gen. at 33.

The requirement to deposit as miscellaneous receipts recoveries from carriers for property lost or damaged in transit does not apply to operating funds of the National Credit Union Administration since, even though the funds are treated as appropriated funds for most other purposes, they are technically not direct appropriations but fees and assessments collected from member credit unions. 50 Comp. Gen. 545 (1971).

While the preceding cases have all involved loss or damage to property, the United States may also recover amounts resulting from tortious injury to persons, for example, under the so-called Federal Medical Care Recovery Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2651. See, e.g., 57 Comp. Gen. 781 (1978). Such recoveries must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 52 Comp. Gen. 125 (1972).

A case involving the Military Personnel and Civilian Employees Claims Act of 1964, 31 U.S.C. § 3721, provides a good illustration of an adjustment to a prior disbursement, i.e., an authorized refund which the agency may retain for credit to the disbursing appropriation. The statute authorizes agencies to pay claims by their employees for personal property lost or damaged incident to service. In cases where there may be third-party liability (e.g., an insurer or carrier), the agency has a choice. It may pay the entire amount of the employee's claim and be subrogated to the employee's claim against the third party, or it may require the employee to pursue the third-party claim first. If the agency chooses the former option, it may retain any third-party recoveries for credit to the appropriation used to pay the claim. 61 Comp. Gen. 537 (1982). An agency adopting the former policy, the decision stated—

> "will be making payments in some cases that are, strictly speaking, higher than are required. In such cases, it is entirely legitimate to treat a third-party recovery as a reduction in the amount previously disbursed rather than as an augmentation of the agency's appropriation." Id. at 540.

A comparison of 61 Comp. Gen. 537 with the Federal Medical Care Recovery Act case, 52 Comp. Gen. 125, illustrates the distinction previously discussed with respect to applying the definition of "refund"— 61 Comp. Gen. 537 is an example of an adjustment to an amount previously disbursed; 52 Comp. Gen. 125 illustrates a collection which must go to miscellaneous receipts even though it is "related" to a prior expenditure. See 61 Comp. Gen. at 539—40; 64 Comp. Gen. 431, 432—33 (1985). In this respect, the situation in 61 Comp. Gen. 537 is very similar to the situation in 23 Comp. Gen. 652 (1944), described in our earlier discussion.

d. Fees and Commissions

Fees and commissions paid either to the government itself or to a government employee for activities relating to official duties must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts absent statutory authority to the contrary.

In the case of fees paid directly to the government, the result is a simple application of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). Thus, the following items, it has been held, must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts:

- Commissions from the use of pay telephones in government buildings. 59 Comp. Gen. 213 (1980); 44 Comp. Gen. 449 (1965); 23 Comp. Gen. 873 (1944); 14 Comp. Gen. 203 (1934); 5 Comp. Gen. 354 (1925); B-4906, October 11, 1951.
- Fees and related reimbursable incidental expenses paid to the Department of Agriculture in connection with the investigation of and issuance of certifications of quality on certain farm products. 2 Comp. Gen. 677 (1923).
- Fees collected under the Freedom of Information Act. 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 684, 687 (1980).

Of course, an agency may retain fees and use them to offset operating costs if and to the extent expressly authorized by statute. Examples are 28 U.S.C. § 1921(c) (fees collected by the United States Marshals Service for service of civil process and judicial execution seizures and sales, to the extent provided in advance in appropriation acts); 28 U.S.C. § 1931 (specified portions of filing fees paid to the clerk of court, to the extent provided in annual appropriation acts). The relevant legislation will determine precisely what may be retained. E.g., 34 Comp. Gen. 58 (1954).

Training fees illustrate both the general rule and statutory exceptions. Under the Government Employees Training Act, an agency may extend its training programs to employees of other federal agencies on a reimbursable or nonreimbursable basis. 5 U.S.C. § 4104. The agency may, unless it receives appropriations for interagency training, retain the fees. B-241269, February 28, 1991 (non-decision letter). Similarly, an agency may admit state and local government employees to its training programs, and may charge a fee or waive it in whole or in part. Fees received are credited to the appropriation to which the training costs were charged. 42 U.S.C. § 4742. The agency may also admit other private persons to its training programs on a space-available and fee basis, but unless it has statutory authority to the contrary, must deposit the fees as miscellaneous receipts. 42 Comp. Gen. 673 (1963); B-241269, February 28, 1991; B-190244, November 28, 1977.

Parking fees assessed by federal agencies under the authority of 40 U.S.C. § 490(k) are to be credited to the appropriation or fund originally charged for providing the service. However, any amounts collected in excess of the actual cost of providing the service must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. 55 Comp. Gen. 897 (1976). Parking fees may be authorized by statutes other than 40 U.S.C. § 490(k), in which event the terms of the particular statute must be examined. For example, parking fees at Department of Veterans Affairs medical facilities are addressed in 38 U.S.C. § 5009. Originally, the fees had to go to miscellaneous receipts under 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). 45 Comp. Gen. 27 (1965). However, 38 U.S.C. § 5009 was later amended and the fees now go into a revolving fund.

Income derived from the installation and operation of vending machines on government-owned or controlled property is generally for deposit as miscellaneous receipts. 32 Comp. Gen. 124 (1952); A-44022, August 14, 1944. However, there are two major exceptions. First, if the contractual arrangement with the vendor is made by an employee association with administrative approval, the employee group may retain the income. 32 Comp. Gen. 282 (1952); B-112840, February 2, 1953. Second, under the Randolph-Sheppard Act, 20 U.S.C. § 107d-3, vending machine income in certain cases must go to blind licensee-operators or state agencies for the blind. See B-238937, March 22, 1991 and B-199132, September 10, 1980 (non-decision letters).

For purposes of determining the disposition of amounts collected, there is a distinction between donations, which are voluntary, and fees and assessments, which are not. Statutory authority to accept gifts and donations does not include fees and assessments exacted involuntarily. 25 Comp. Gen. 637, 639 (1946); B-195492, March 18, 1980; B-225834.2-O.M., April 11, 1988. This is more of a presumption than a rule, however, and specific circumstances may warrant different treatment. E.g., B-232482, June 4, 1990 (not improper for Commerce Department to treat certain registration fees as "contributions" within scope of 22 U.S.C. § 2455(f); interpretation ratified first by appropriation, later by specific legislation).

Fees paid to individual employees require a two-step analysis. The first step is the principle that the earnings of a government employee in excess of the regular compensation gained in the course of or in connection with his or her services belong to the government and not to the individual employee. The second step is then the application of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). Using this analysis, GAO has held that fees were required to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts in the following instances:

- An honorarium paid to an Army officer for delivering a lecture at a university in his capacity as an officer of the United States. 37 Comp. Gen. 29 (1957).
- Fees collected from private individuals by government employees for their services as notaries public. 16 Comp. Gen. 306 (1936).
- Witness fees and any allowances for travel and subsistence, over and above actual expenses, paid to federal employees for testifying in certain state court proceedings. 36 Comp. Gen. 591 (1957); 23 Comp. Gen. 628 (1944); 15 Comp. Gen. 196 (1935); B-160343, November 23, 1966.

Applying the same analysis, a proposal under which a nonprofit corporation funded entirely by private industry would pay monthly "bonuses" to Army enlistees to encourage enlistment and satisfactory service, even if otherwise proper, could not be implemented without specific statutory authority because the payments could not be retained by the enlistees but would have to be deposited in the Treasury under 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). B-200013, April 15, 1981.

e. Economy Act

The Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 1535 and 1536, authorizes the inter- and intra-departmental furnishing of materials or performance of work or services on a reimbursable basis. It is a statutory exception to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), authorizing a performing agency to credit reimbursements to the appropriation or fund charged in executing its performance. However, this is not mandatory. The performing agency may, at its discretion, deposit reimbursements for both direct and indirect costs in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 57 Comp. Gen. 674, 685 (1978), modifying 56 Comp. Gen. 275 (1977).

There is one area in which the agency has no discretion. Reimbursements may not be credited to an appropriation against which no charges have been made in executing the order. This would constitute an improper augmentation. Such reimbursements must therefore be deposited into the General Fund as miscellaneous receipts. An example would be depreciation in some cases. 57 Comp. Gen. at 685–86.

f. Setoff

Collections by setoff may be factually distinguishable from direct collections, but the effect on the appropriation is the same. If crediting an agency appropriation with a direct collection in a particular instance would result in an improper augmentation, then retaining an amount collected by setoff would equally constitute an improper augmentation. Thus, setoffs must be treated the same as direct collections. If an agency could retain a direct collection in a given situation, it can retain the setoff. However, if a direct collection would have to go to miscellaneous receipts, the setoff also has to go to miscellaneous receipts. In this latter situation, the agency must take the amount of the setoff from its own appropriation and transfer it to the General Fund of the Treasury. E.g., 2 Comp. Gen. 599 (1923); 20 Comp. Dec. 349 (1913).

A hypothetical situation will illustrate. Suppose a contractor negligently damages a piece of government equipment and becomes liable to the government in the amount of $500. Suppose further that an employee of the contracting agency, in a separate transaction, negligently damages property of the contractor. The contractor files a claim under the Federal Tort Claims Act and the agency settles the claim for $600. Neither party disputes the validity or amount of either claim. The agency sets the contract debt off against the tort claim and makes a net payment to the contractor of $100. However, if the agency stops here, it has augmented its appropriation to the tune of $500. If the tort claim had never occurred and the agency collected the $500 from the contractor, the $500 would have to go to miscellaneous receipts (see "Contract Matters," above). Conversely, if the contract claim did not exist, the agency would end up paying $600 on the tort claim. Now, combining both claims, if both were paid without setoff, the net result would be that the agency is out $600. The setoff cannot operate to put the agency's appropriation in a better position than it would have been in had the agency and contractor simply exchanged checks. Thus, in addition to paying the contractor $100, the agency must deposit $500 from its own appropriation into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

A different type of "setoff" occurs under the Back Pay Act, 5 U.S.C. § 5596. When an agency pays an employee back pay under the Back Pay Act, it must deduct amounts the employee earned through other employment during the time period in question. The agency simply pays the net amount. There is no requirement to transfer the amount of the deduction for outside earnings to miscellaneous receipts. 31 Comp. Gen. 318 (1952). The deduction for outside earnings is not really a collection; it is merely part of the statutory formula for determining the amount of the payment.

g. Revolving Funds

A major exception to the requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) is the revolving fund. Under the revolving fund concept, receipts are credited directly to the fund and are available, without further appropriation by Congress (unless the legislation specifies otherwise), for expenditures to carry out the purposes of the fund. An agency must have statutory authority to establish a revolving fund. The enabling statute will specify the receipts that may be credited to the fund and the purposes for which they may be expended. An example is the General Services Administration's "General Supply Fund," noted above under "Damage to Government Property." Receipts that are properly for deposit to a revolving fund are, obviously, exempt from the miscellaneous receipts requirement of § 3302(b). E.g., 33 Op. Att'y Gen. 316 (1922).

However, the existence of a revolving fund does not automatically signal that 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) will never apply. In other words, it should not be assumed that a revolving fund is incapable of being improperly augmented. Thus, where the statute establishing the fund does not authorize the crediting of receipts of a given type back into the fund, those receipts must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. See 69 Comp. Gen. 260 (1990); 40 Comp. Gen. 356 (1960); 23 Comp. Gen. 986 (1944); 20 Comp. Gen. 280 (1940).

Augmentation of a revolving fund may occur in other ways, depending on the nature of the fund and the terms of the governing legislation. Examples are:

- Statute authorizes Bureau of Land Management to retain funds collected as a result of coal trespasses on federal lands, to use those funds to repair damage to the specific lands involved in the trespass, and, within the Bureau's discretion, to refund any excess. An excess of collections over repair costs which the Bureau determines is inappropriate to refund should not be retained in the revolving fund to be used for other purposes, but must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. B-204874, July 28, 1982.
- Corps of Engineers has a revolving fund used to provide supervision and administration of certain construction work for other agencies on a reimbursable basis. It charges a flat rate calculated to recover actual costs over the long run. Recovery from a contractor for faulty design may be reimbursed to the fund to the extent of the amount actually charged, but any excess must go to the Treasury. 65 Comp. Gen. 838 (1986). However, an "excess" representing costs which were not calculated into the flat rate may be reimbursed to the fund. B-237421, September 11, 1991.

Legislation which merely authorizes, or even requires, that certain expenditures be reimbursed is not sufficient to create a revolving fund. Reimbursements must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts unless the statute specifically authorizes retention by the agency. 67 Comp. Gen. 443 (1988); 22 Comp. Dec. 60 (1915); 1 Comp. Dec. 568 (1895).

h. Trust Funds

Moneys properly received by a federal agency in a trust capacity are not subject to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) and thus do not have to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. 60 Comp. Gen.

15, 26 (1980); 27 Comp. Gen. 641 (1948). In the latter case, the government of Persia had made a payment to the United States government to reimburse expenses incurred in sending an American vessel to Persia to return to the United States the body of an American official killed by a mob in Tehran. The State Department suggested that the money be used as a trust fund for the education of Persian students. However, the Comptroller General found that the funds had not been received under conditions which would constitute a "proper and legal trust" and therefore were properly deposited as miscellaneous receipts, the clear implication being that 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) would not apply to money received in a valid trust capacity.

Other authorities supporting this general proposition are Emery v. United States, 186 F.2d 900, 902 (9th Cir. 1951) (money paid to United States under court order as refund of overcharges by persons who had violated rent control legislation was held in trust for tenants and could be disbursed to them without need for appropriation); Varney v. Warehime, 147 F.2d 238, 245 (6th Cir. 1945) (assessments levied against milk handlers to defray certain wartime expenses were trust funds and did not have to be covered into the Treasury); United States v. Sinnott, 26 F. 84 (D. Ore. 1886) (proceeds from sale of lumber made at Indian sawmill were to be applied for benefit of Indians and were not subject to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b)); 62 Comp. Gen. 245, 251–52 (1983) (proceeds from sale of certain excess stockpile materials where federal agency was acting on behalf of foreign government); B-223146, October 7, 1986 (moneys received by Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation when acting in its trustee capacity); B-43894, September 11, 1944; B-23647, February 16, 1942 (taxes and fines collected in foreign territories occupied by American armed forces); B-24117-O.M., April 21, 1942 (penalty on defaulted bond received by United States as trustee for Indians).

In addition, receipts generated by activities financed with trust funds are generally credited to the trust fund and not deposited as miscellaneous receipts. B-166059, July 10, 1969 (recovery for damage to property purchased with trust funds); B-4906, October 11, 1951 (receipts accruing from activities financed from Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund). See also 50 Comp. Gen. 545, 547 (1971) (summarizing the holding in B-4906). In 51 Comp. Gen. 506 (1972), GAO advised the Smithsonian Institution that receipts generated by various activities at the National Zoo need not be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. The Smithsonian is financed in part by trust funds and in part by appropriated funds, although the activities in question were supported mostly by appropriated funds.

The Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel has cautioned against carrying this theory too far in the case of nonstatutory trusts created by executive action. For example, the United States and the Commonwealth of Virginia sued a transportation company for causing an oil spill in the Chesapeake Bay. A settlement was proposed under which the defendant would donate money to a private waterfowl preservation organization. The OLC found that the proposal would contravene 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b), stating:

> "In our view, the fact that no cash actually touches the palm of a federal official is irrelevant for purposes of § [3302(b)], if a federal agency could have accepted possession and retains discretion to direct the use of the money. The doctrine of constructive receipt will ignore the form of a transaction in order to get to its substance. . . . Since we believe that money available to the United States and directed to another recipient is constructively 'received' for purposes of § [3302(b)], we conclude that the proposed settlement is barred by that statute."

4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 684, 688 (1980). There was a solution in that case, however. Since the United States had not suffered any monetary loss, it was not required to seek damages. The proposed contribution by the defendant could be attributed to the co-plaintiff, Virginia, which of course is not subject to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). Id. [75]

GAO reached a similar conclusion in B-210210, September 14, 1983, holding that the Commodity Futures Trading Commission lacked authority to enter into a settlement agreement under which a party charged with violation of the Commodity Exchange Act would donate funds to an educational institution with no relationship to the violation. A more recent case concluded that, without statutory authority, permitting a party who owes a penalty to contribute to a research project in lieu of paying the penalty amounts to a circumvention of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) and improperly augments the agency's research appropriations. 70 Comp. Gen. 17 (1990). A case saying essentially the same thing in the context of Clean Air Act violations is B-247155, July 7, 1992.

[75]The opinion noted that the proposed settlement would be authorized under subsequent amendments to the governing legislation.

GAO considered similar issues in several cases involving consent orders between the Department of Energy and oil companies charged with violation of federal oil price and allocation regulations. The Department has limited authority to use recovered overcharge funds for restitutionary purposes, and in fact has a duty to attempt restitution. However, to the extent this cannot reasonably be accomplished or funds remain after restitution efforts have been exhausted, the funds may not be used for energy-related programs with no restitutionary nexus but must be deposited in the Treasury pursuant to 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). 62 Comp. Gen. 379 (1983); 60 Comp. Gen. 15 (1980). It is equally unauthorized to give the funds to charity or to use them to augment appropriations for administering the overcharge refund program. B-200170, April 1, 1981.

In a 1991 case, an agency had discovered a $10,000 bank account belonging to an employee morale club which had become defunct. No documentation of the club's creation or dissolution could be located. Thus, if the club had ever provided for the disposition of its funds, it could no longer be established. Clearly, the money was not received for the use of the government for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). It was equally clear that the money could not be credited to the agency's appropriations. GAO advised that the money could be turned over to a successor employee morale organization to be used for its intended purposes. If no successor organization stepped forward, the funds would have to be deposited in a Treasury trust account in accordance with 31 U.S.C. § 1322. B-241744, May 31, 1991.

i. Miscellaneous Cases: Money to Treasury

In addition to the categories discussed above, there have been numerous other decisions involving the disposition of receipts in various contexts. Some cases in which the Comptroller General held that receipts of a particular type must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts under 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) or related statutes are set forth below.

- Costs awarded to the United States by a court under 28 U.S.C. § 2412. 47 Comp. Gen. 70 (1967).
- Moneys collected as a fine or penalty. 70 Comp. Gen. 17 (1990) (civil penalties assessed against Nuclear Regulatory Commission licensees); 69 Comp. Gen. 260 (1990) (penalties—as opposed to the recovery of actual losses—under the False Claims Act); 47 Comp. Gen. 674 (1968) (dishonored checks); 23 Comp. Dec. 352 (1916);

B-235577.2-O.M., November 9, 1989 (civil penalties under Food Stamp Act). See also 39 Comp. Gen. 647, 649–50 (1960).

- Interest earned on grant advances by grantees other than states. E.g., 69 Comp. Gen. 660 (1990).
- Reimbursements received for child care services provided by federal agencies for their employees under authority of 40 U.S.C. § 490b. 67 Comp. Gen. 443, 448–49 (1988).
- Receipts generated by undercover operations by law enforcement agencies. 67 Comp. Gen. 353 (1988); 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 684, 686 (1980). In GAO's opinion, however, short-term operations (a card game or dice game, for example) may be treated as single transactions. 67 Comp. Gen. 353, clarifying B-201751, February 17, 1981. Thus, 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b) need not be read as requiring an undercover agent participating in a card game to leave the table to make a miscellaneous receipts deposit after every winning hand. If, however, the agent ends up with winnings at the end of the game, the money cannot be used to offset expenses of the operation.[76] Related cases are 5 Comp. Gen. 289 (1925) and 3 Comp. Gen. 911 (1924) (moneys used to purchase evidence for use in criminal prosecutions and recovered when no longer needed for that purpose must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts).
- Proceeds from silver and gold sold as excess property by the Interior Department as successor to the American Revolutionary Bicentennial Administration. (The silver and gold had been obtained by melting down unsold commemorative medals which had been struck by the Treasury Department for sale by the ARBA.) B-200962, May 26, 1981.
- Income derived from oil and gas leases on "acquired lands" (as distinguished from "public domain lands") of the United States used for military purposes. B-203504, July 22, 1981.

j. Miscellaneous Cases: Money Retained by Agency

Most cases in which an agency may credit receipts to its own appropriation or fund involve the areas previously discussed: authorized repayments, Economy Act transactions, revolving funds, [76]Starting in FY 1979, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and later the Drug Enforcement Administration as well, received authority annually, first in authorization acts and later in appropriation acts, to use proceeds from undercover operations to offset reasonable and necessary expenses of the operations. E.g., Pub. L. No. 102-140, § 102(b), 105 Stat. 782, 791–93 (1991) (FY 1992 Justice Department appropriation act). As soon as the proceeds or the balance thereof are no longer necessary for the conduct of the operation, they are to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. Id. § 102(b)(2). The Internal Revenue Service, the subject of 67 Comp. Gen. 353, received similar authority late in 1988 (Pub. L. No. 100-690, § 7601(c), 102 Stat. 4181, 4504), but it appears to have expired as of December 31, 1991 (Pub. L. No. 101-647, § 3301(a), 104 Stat. 4789, 4917).

or the other specific situations noted. There is another group of cases, not susceptible of further generalization, in which an agency simply has specific statutory authority to retain certain receipts. Examples are:

- Forest Service may retain moneys paid by permittees on national forest lands representing their pro rata share under cooperative agreements for the operation and maintenance of waste disposal systems under the Granger-Thye Act. 55 Comp. Gen. 1142 (1976).
- Customs Service may, under 19 U.S.C. § 1524, retain charges collected from airlines for preclearance of passengers and baggage at airports in Canada, for credit to the appropriation originally charged with providing the service. 48 Comp. Gen. 24 (1968).
- Overseas Private Investment Corporation may retain interest on loans of excess foreign currencies made under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. 52 Comp. Gen. 54 (1972).
- Payroll deductions for government-furnished quarters under 5 U.S.C. § 5911 are retained in the appropriation(s) or fund(s) from which the employee's salary is paid. 59 Comp. Gen. 235 (1980), as modified by 60 Comp. Gen. 659 (1981). However, if the employee pays directly rather than by payroll deduction, the direct payments must go to miscellaneous receipts unless the agency has specific statutory authority to retain them. 59 Comp. Gen. at 236.[77]
- Under the Mineral Lands Leasing Act of 1920, receipts from the sale or lease of public lands are distributed in the manner specified in the statute. This was held to include the proceeds of bid deposits forfeited by successful mineral lease bidders who fail to execute the lease. 65 Comp. Gen. 570 (1986).
- By virtue of provisions in the Job Training Partnership Act and annual appropriation acts, certain receipts generated by Job Corps Centers may be retained for credit to the Labor Department appropriation from which the Centers are funded. 65 Comp. Gen. 666 (1986).
- Legislation establishing the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution authorized the Commission to retain revenues derived from its licensing activities but did not address sales revenues. Sales revenues, therefore, had to be deposited as miscellaneous receipts. B-228777, August 26, 1988.

[77]For agencies funded under the annual Interior Department and Related Agencies appropriation acts, the rentals, whether collected by payroll deduction or otherwise, go into a "special fund" maintained by each agency to be used for maintenance and operation of the quarters. 5 U.S.C. § 5911 note.

In the occasional case, the authority may be less than specific. In B-114860, March 20, 1975, for example, based on the broad authority of the National Housing Act, GAO advised that the Department of Housing and Urban Development could require security deposits from tenants in HUD-owned multifamily projects. Consistent with practice in the private sector, the deposit would be considered the property of the tenant and held in an escrow account, to be either returned to the tenant upon completion of the lease or forfeited to the government in cases of breach.

A final case we will note is 24 Comp. Gen. 514 (1945), an exception stemming from the particular funding arrangement involved rather than a specific statute. The case dealt with certain government corporations which did not receive regular appropriations but instead received annual authorizations for expenditures from their capital funds for administrative expenses. An appropriation act had imposed a limit on certain communication expenditures and provided that savings resulting from the limit "shall not be diverted to other use but shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts." The Comptroller General construed this as meaning returned to the source from which made available. In the case of the corporations in question, this meant that the savings could be returned to their capital funds.

k. Money Erroneously Deposited as Miscellaneous Receipts

The various accounts that comprise the heading "miscellaneous receipts" are just that—they are receipt accounts, not expenditure or appropriation accounts. As noted earlier, by virtue of the Constitution, once money is deposited into miscellaneous receipts, it takes an appropriation to get it back out. What, therefore, can be done if an agency deposits some money into miscellaneous receipts by mistake?

This question really involves two separate situations. In the first situation, an agency receives funds which it is authorized, under the principles discussed above, to credit to its own appropriation or fund, but erroneously deposits them as miscellaneous receipts. The decisions have always recognized that the agency can make an appropriate adjustment to correct the error. In an early case, the Interior Department sold some property and deposited the proceeds as miscellaneous receipts when in fact it was statutorily authorized to credit the proceeds to its reclamation fund. The Interior Department then requested a transfer of the funds back to the reclamation fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury asked the Comptroller of the Treasury if it was authorized. Of course it was, replied the Comptroller:

"This is not taking money out of the Treasury in violation of paragraph 7, section 9, Article I of the Constitution . . . .

"The proceeds of the sale . . . have been appropriated by law. Taking it from the Treasury and placing it to the credit in the Treasury of the appropriation to which it belongs violates neither the Constitution nor any other law, but simply corrects an error by which it was placed to the unappropriated surplus instead of to the appropriation to which it belongs." 12 Comp. Dec. 733, 735 (1906).

This concept has consistently been followed. See 45 Comp. Gen. 724 (1966); 3 Comp. Gen. 762 (1924); 2 Comp. Gen. 599 (1923).[78]

In the second situation, a private party pays money to a federal agency, the agency deposits it as miscellaneous receipts, and it is subsequently determined that the party is entitled to a refund. Here, in contrast to the first situation, an appropriation is necessary to get the money out. E.g., 3 Comp. Gen. 296 (1923).

There is a permanent indefinite appropriation for refunding collections "erroneously received and covered" which are not properly chargeable to any other appropriation. 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2). The availability of this appropriation depends on exactly where the receipts were deposited. If the amount subject to refund was credited to some specific appropriation account, the refund is chargeable to the same account. If, however, the receipt was deposited in the general fund as miscellaneous receipts, then the appropriation made by 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) is available for the refund, provided that the amount in question was "erroneously received and covered." 61 Comp. Gen. 224 (1982); 55 Comp. Gen. 625 (1976); 17 Comp. Gen. 859 (1938).

Examples of cases in which use of the "Moneys Erroneously Received and Covered" appropriation was found authorized are 71 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-239769.2, July 24, 1992) (refund to investment company of late filing fee upon issuance of order by Securities and Exchange Commission exempting company from filing deadline for fiscal year in [78]The reverse adjustment is made when funds which should have been deposited as miscellaneous receipts are erroneously credited to an appropriation. The remedy is a transfer from the appropriation to the appropriate miscellaneous receipts account. E.g., B-48722, April 16, 1945.

question); 63 Comp. Gen. 189 (1984) (Department of Energy deposited overcharge recoveries from oil companies into general fund instead of first attempting to use them to make restitutionary refunds); B-217595, April 2, 1986 (interest collections subsequently determined to have been erroneous).

One case, 53 Comp. Gen. 580 (1974), combined elements of both situations. The Army Corps of Engineers had been authorized to issue discharge permits under the Refuse Act Permit Program. The program was statutorily transferred in 1972 to the Environmental Protection Agency. Under the User Charge Statute, 31 U.S.C. § 9701, both the Corps and EPA had charged applicants a fee. In some cases, the fees had been deposited as miscellaneous receipts before the applications were processed. The legislation that transferred the program to EPA also provided that EPA could authorize states to issue the permits. However, there was no provision that authorized EPA to transfer to the states any fees already paid. Thus, some applicants found that they had paid a fee to the Corps or EPA, received nothing for it, and were now being charged a second fee by the state for the same application. EPA felt that the original fees should be refunded. So did the applicants.

GAO noted that the User Charge Statute contemplates that the federal agency will furnish something in exchange for the fee. Since this had not been done, the fees could be viewed as having been erroneously deposited in the general fund. However, the fees had not been erroneously received—the Corps and EPA had been entirely correct in charging the fees in the first place—so the appropriation made by 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) could not be used. There was a way out, but the refunds would require a two-step process. The Corps and EPA should have deposited the fees in a trust account[79] and kept them there until the applications were processed, at which time depositing as miscellaneous receipts would have been proper. Thus, EPA could first transfer the funds from the general fund to its suspense account as the correction of an error, and then make the refunds directly from the suspense account.

In cases where the "Moneys Erroneously Received and Covered" appropriation is otherwise available, it is available without regard to [79]See also B-3596/A-51615, November 30, 1939. Use of a deposit fund suspense account is equally acceptable. B-158381, June 21, 1968.

whether the original payment was made under protest. 55 Comp. Gen. 243 (1975). Payments under 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) are made by the Treasury Department without the need for settlement action by GAO, except in doubtful cases. B-142380, March 24, 1960 (circular letter). The procedure is for the finance office of the agency making the refund to submit a Standard Form 1166 to the Treasury Department, citing account 20X1807 in the "appropriation summary" block. See B-217595, April 2, 1986; B-210638, July 5, 1984 (non-decision letter).

The appropriation made by 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) is available only to refund amounts actually received and deposited. If a given refund bears interest, for example, a refund claim approved by a contracting officer under the Contract Disputes Act, the interest portion must be charged to the contracting agency's operating appropriations for the fiscal year in which the award is made. B-217595, April 2, 1986.

If an agency collects money from someone to whom it owes a refund from a prior transaction, it should not simply deposit the net amount. The correct procedure is to deposit the new receipt into the general fund (assuming that's the proper receptacle), and then make the refund using the "Moneys Erroneously Received and Covered" appropriation. B-19882, October 28, 1941; A-96279, September 15, 1938. However, GAO has approved offsetting a refund against future amounts due from the same party in cases where there is a continuing relationship, but suggested that the party be given the choice. B-217595, April 2, 1986, at 4.

Clearly, if the receipt cannot be regarded as erroneous, 31 U.S.C. § 1322(b)(2) is not available. 53 Comp. Gen. 580 (1974); B-146111, July 6, 1961. Also, the "Moneys Erroneously Received and Covered" appropriation is available only where the amount to be refunded was deposited into the general fund. E.g., 11 Comp. Dec. 300 (1904). If a refund is due of moneys deposited somewhere other than the general fund, some other basis must be sought.

statutory authority is necessary. As the Supreme Court has said, "[u]ninterrupted usage from the foundation of the Government has sanctioned it." United States v. Burnison, 339 U.S. 87, 90 (1950). The gifts may be of real property or personal property, and they may be testamentary (made by will) or inter vivos (made by persons who are not dead yet). Since monetary gifts to the United States go to the general fund of the Treasury, there is no augmentation problem.

However, as the Supreme Court held in the Burnison case, a state may prohibit testamentary gifts by its domiciliaries to the United States. Also, a state may impose an inheritance tax on property bequeathed to the United States. United States v. Perkins, 163 U.S. 625 (1896). The tax is not regarded as a constitutionally impermissible tax on federal property "since the tax is imposed upon the legacy before it reaches the hands of the government. The legacy becomes the property of the United States only after it has suffered a diminution to the amount of the tax . . . ." Id. at 630.

While gifts to the United States do not require statutory authority, gifts to an individual federal agency stand on a different footing. The rule is that a government agency may not accept for its own use (i.e., for retention by the agency or credit to its own appropriations) gifts of money or other property in the absence of specific statutory authority. 16 Comp. Gen. 911 (1937). As the Comptroller General said in that decision, "[w]hen the Congress has considered desirable the receipt of donations . . . it has generally made specific provision therefor . . . ." Id. at 912. See also B-13378, November 20, 1940; A-44015, March 17, 1937.

Thus, acceptance of a gift by an agency lacking statutory authority to do so is an improper augmentation. If an agency does not have statutory authority to accept donations, it must turn the money in to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. E.g., B-139992, August 31, 1959 (proceeds of life insurance policy designating federal agency as beneficiary).

For purposes of this discussion, the term "gifts" may be defined as "gratuitous conveyances or transfers of ownership in property without any consideration." 25 Comp. Gen. 637, 639 (1946); B-217909, September 22, 1986. A receipt that does not meet this definition does not become a gift merely because the agency characterizes it as one. For example, a fee paid for the privilege of filming a motion picture in a national park is not a gift and must be deposited as miscellaneous receipts rather than in the agency's trust fund. 25 Comp. Gen. 637 (1946). See also B-61938, April 16, 1948. Similarly, a reduction of accrued liability in fulfillment of a contractual obligation is not a donation for purposes of a statute authorizing appropriations to match "donations." B-183442, October 21, 1975.

A number of departments and agencies have statutory authority to accept gifts. A partial listing is contained in B-149711, August 20, 1963. The statutory authorizations contain varying degrees of specificity as to precisely what may be accepted (money, property, services, etc.). For example, the State Department's gift statute, 22 U.S.C. § 2697, authorizes the acceptance of gifts of money or property, real or personal, and, in the Secretary's discretion, conditional gifts. A case discussing this statute is 67 Comp. Gen. 90 (1987) (United States Information Agency may accept donations of radio programs prepared by private syndicators for broadcast over Voice of America facilities). Another is 70 Comp. Gen. 413 (1991) (United States Information Agency may accept donations of foreign debt). Authority to accept voluntary services does not include donations of cash. A-86115, July 15, 1937; A-51627, March 15, 1937.

The authority of the Defense Department to accept gifts is found in several statutes. First, the Defense Department may accept contributions of money or real or personal property "for use by the Department of Defense" from any person, foreign government, or international organization. The money and proceeds from the sale of property are credited to the Defense Cooperation Account in the Treasury. The money is not automatically available to Defense, but is available for obligation or expenditure only in the manner and to the extent provided in appropriation acts. 10 U.S.C. § 2608 (Supp. III 1991). Second, the Department may accept services, supplies, real property, or the use of real property under a mutual defense or similar agreement or as reciprocal courtesies, from a foreign government for the support of any element of United States armed forces in that country. 10 U.S.C. § 2350g (Supp. III 1991). These authorities formed the basis for the United States to accept contributions from foreign governments and others to defray the costs of the 1991 military operations in the Persian Gulf. See GAO report, Operations Desert Shield/Storm: Foreign Government and Individual Contributions to the Department of Defense, GAO/NSIAD-92-144 (May 1992). Other limited-purpose authorities available to the military are found in 10 U.S.C. §§ 2601–2607.

We may also note a statute tailor-made for the philanthropist desiring to make a donation for the express purpose of reducing the national debt. (Some people think they already do this in April of each year.) The Secretary of the Treasury may accept gifts of money, obligations of the United States, or other intangible personal property made for the express purpose of reducing the public debt. Gifts of other real or personal property for the same purpose may be made to the Administrator of the General Services Administration. 31 U.S.C. § 3113.

Assuming the existence of the requisite statutory authority, it is quite easy to make a gift to the government. There are no particular forms required. A simple letter to the appropriate agency head transmitting the funds for the stated purpose will suffice. See B-157469, July 24, 1974 (non-decision letter).

A 1980 GAO study found that, during fiscal year 1979, 41 government agencies received a total of $21.6 million classified as gift revenue. See report entitled Review of Federal Agencies' Gift Funds, FGMSD-80-77 (September 24, 1980). The report pointed out that the use of gift funds dilutes congressional oversight because the funds do not go through the appropriation process. The report recommended that agencies be required to more fully disclose gift fund operations in their budget submissions.

The issue raised in most gift cases is the purpose for which gift funds may be used. This ultimately depends on the scope of the agency's statutory authority and the terms of the gift. Gift funds are accounted for as trust funds. They must be deposited in the Treasury as trust funds under 31 U.S.C. § 1321(b), to be disbursed in accordance with the terms of the trust. In 16 Comp. Gen. 650, 655 (1937), the Comptroller General stated:

> "Where the Congress authorizes Federal officers to accept private gifts or bequests for a specific purpose, often subject to certain prescribed conditions as to administration, authority must of necessity be reposed in the custodians of the trust fund to make expenditures for administration in such a manner as to carry out the purposes of the trust and to comply with the prescribed conditions thereof without reference to general regulatory and prohibitory statutes applicable to public funds."

While this passage correctly states the trust theory, agencies have sometimes misconstrued it to mean that they have free and unrestricted use of donated funds. This is not the case. On the one hand, donated funds are not subject to all of the restrictions applicable to direct appropriations. Yet on the other hand, they are still "public funds" in a very real sense. They can be used only in furtherance of authorized agency purposes and incident to the terms of the trust. See B-195492, March 18, 1980.

An interesting illustration of this point occurred in B-16406, May 17, 1941. A citizen had bequeathed money in her will to a hospital. When the will was made, the hospital belonged to the state of Louisiana. By the time the will was probated, however, it had been acquired by the United States. Louisiana was concerned that the bequest might, if deposited in the United States Treasury, be diverted from the decedent's intent. There was no need for concern, the Comptroller General advised. The money would have to be deposited as trust funds and would be available for expenditure only for the purposes specified in the trust, i.e., for the hospital.

Since gift funds are accounted for as trust funds, they are presumably subject to the Antideficiency Act. See OMB Circular No. A-34, § 21.1 (1985), which includes trust fund expenditure accounts in the definition of "appropriation or fund."

In evaluating the propriety of a proposed use of gift funds, it is first necessary to examine the precise terms of the statute authorizing the agency to accept the gift. Limitations imposed by that statute must be followed. Thus, under a statute which authorized the Forest Service to accept donations "for the purpose of establishing or operating any forest research facility," the Forest Service could not turn over unconditional gift funds to a private foundation under a cooperative agreement, with the foundation to invest the funds and use the proceeds for purposes other than establishing or operating forest research facilities. 55 Comp. Gen. 1059 (1976). See also 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 66 (1941) (Library of Congress could not, without statutory authority, share income from donated property with Smithsonian Institution); B-198730, December 10, 1986 (funds donated to Library of Congress to further purposes of Library's Center for the Book could not be used for unrelated Library programs).

Under a statute authorizing the Federal Board for Vocational Education to accept donations to be used "in connection with the appropriations hereby made or hereafter to be made, to defray the expenses of providing and maintaining courses of vocational rehabilitation," the funds could be used only to supplement the Board's regular appropriations and could not be used for any expense not legally payable from the regular appropriation. The statute here conferred no discretion. 27 Comp. Dec. 1068 (1921).

If an agency is authorized to accept conditional gifts (gifts made on the condition that the funds be used for a specific authorized purpose), the funds may be used to augment a "not to exceed" earmark applicable to that purpose. B-52501, November 9, 1945. (Although the statute involved in B-52501, the predecessor of 10 U.S.C. § 2608 noted above, no longer exists, the point of the decision is still valid.)

Once it is determined that the proposed use will not contravene the terms of the agency's authorizing statute, the agency will have some discretion under the trust theory. The area in which this discretion has most often manifested itself in the decisions is entertainment. Although appropriated funds are generally not available for entertainment, several decisions have established the proposition that donated funds may be used for entertainment. This does not mean any entertainment agency officials may desire. Donated funds may be used for entertainment only if the entertainment will further a valid function of the agency, if the function could not be accomplished as effectively from the government's standpoint without the expenditure, and if the expenditure does not violate any restrictions imposed by the donor on the use of the funds. 46 Comp. Gen. 379 (1966); B-170938, October 30, 1972; B-142538, February 8, 1961. See also B-195492, March 18, 1980; B-152331, November 19, 1975. (B-152331 involved a trust fund which included both gift and non-gift funds.) It follows that donated funds may not be used for entertainment which does not bear a legitimate relationship to official agency purposes. 61 Comp. Gen. 260 (1982), affirmed upon reconsideration, B-206173, August 3, 1982 (donated funds improperly used for breakfast for Cabinet wives and Secretary's Christmas party); B-198730, April 13, 1981 (non-decision letter).

The trust fund concept was also applied in 36 Comp. Gen. 771 (1957). The Alexander Hamilton Bicentennial Commission had been given statutory authority to accept gifts and wanted to use the donations to award Alexander Hamilton Commemorative Scholarships. The Commission was to have a brief existence and would not have sufficient time to administer the scholarship awards. The Comptroller General held that the Commission could, prior to the date of its expiration, transfer the funds to a responsible private organization for the purpose of enabling proper administration of the scholarship awards. The distinction between this case and 55 Comp. Gen. 1059, mentioned above, is that in 36 Comp. Gen. 771, the objective of transferring the funds to a private organization was to better carry out an authorized purpose. In 55 Comp. Gen. 1059, the objective was to enable the funds to be used for unauthorized purposes.

Another case illustrating permissible administrative discretion under the trust theory is B-131278, September 9, 1957. A number of persons had made donations to St. Elizabeth's Hospital to enable it to buy an organ for its chapel. The donors (organ donors?) had made the gifts on the condition that the Hospital purchase a high-quality (expensive) organ. When the Hospital issued its invitation for bids on the organ, the specifications were sufficiently restrictive so as to preclude offers on lower quality organs. The decision found this to be entirely within the Hospital's discretion in using the gift funds in accordance with their terms.

As noted above, however, the agency's discretion in administering its gift funds is not unlimited. Thus, for example, an agency may not use gift funds for purely personal items such as greeting cards. 47 Comp. Gen. 314 (1967); B-195492, March 18, 1980.

The particular statutory scheme will determine the extent to which donated funds are subject to other laws governing the expenditure of public funds. In two cases, for example, where it was clear that a designated activity was to be carried out solely or primarily with donated funds, GAO found that the recipient agency could invest the gift funds in non-Treasury interest-bearing accounts, and was not required to comply with the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 or the Federal Acquisition Regulation. 68 Comp. Gen. 237 (1989) (Christopher Columbus Quincentenary Jubilee Commission); B-211149, December 12, 1985 (Holocaust Memorial Council).

Availability of Appropriations: Amount

A. Introduction

The two preceding chapters have discussed the purposes for which appropriated funds may be used and the time limits within which they may be obligated and expended. This chapter will discuss the third major element of the concept of the "legal availability" of appropriations—restrictions relating to amount. It is not enough to know what you can spend appropriated funds for and when you can spend them. You must also know how much you have available for a particular object.

In this respect, the legal restrictions on government expenditures are different from those governing your spending as a private individual. For example, as an individual, you can buy a house and finance it with a mortgage that may run for 25 or 30 years. Of course you don't have enough money to cover your full legal obligation under the mortgage. You sign the papers on the hope and assumption that you will continue to have an income. If your income stops and you can't make the payments, you lose the house. The government cannot operate this way. The main reason why is the Antideficiency Act, discussed in Section C.

Under the "separation of powers" doctrine established by the Constitution, Congress makes the laws and provides the money to implement them; the executive branch carries out the laws with the money Congress provides. Under this system, Congress must have the "final word" as to how much money can be spent by a given agency or on a given program. In exercising this power, Congress may give the executive branch considerable discretion within broad limits, but it is ultimately up to Congress to determine how much the executive branch can spend. In applying this theory to the day-to-day operations of the federal government, it should be readily apparent that restrictions on purpose, time, and amount are very closely related. Again, the Antideficiency Act is one of the primary "enforcement devices." Its importance is underscored by the fact that it is the only one of the funding statutes to include both civil and criminal penalties for violation.

If the Antideficiency Act's prohibition against overobligating or overspending an appropriation is to be at all meaningful, agencies must be restricted to the appropriations Congress provides. The rule prohibiting the unauthorized "augmentation" of appropriations, covered in Section E, is thus a crucial complement to the Antideficiency Act.

Gifts which involve continuing expense present special problems. Although there are no recent cases, indications are that the agency needs specific statutory authority—not merely general authority to accept gifts—since the agency's appropriations would not otherwise be available to make the continuing expenses. For example, an individual made a testamentary gift to a United States naval hospital. The will provided that the money was to be invested in the form of a memorial fund, with the income to be used for specified purposes. The Comptroller General found this objectionable in that "the United States would become, in effect, a trustee for charitable uses, would never gain a legal title to the money, but would have the burden and obligation of administering in perpetuity a trust fund . . . ." Also, absent specific authorization by Congress, appropriations would not be available for the expenses of administering the trust. Therefore, absent congressional authorization to accept the donation "as made," it could not be accepted either by the naval hospital, 11 Comp. Gen. 355 (1932), or by the Treasury Department, A-40707, December 15, 1936. See also Story v. Snyder, 184 F.2d 454, 456 (D.C. Cir. 1950), cert. denied, 340 U.S. 866 ("[g]ifts to the United States which involve any duty, burden, or condition, or are made dependent upon some future performance by the United States, are not accepted by the Government unless by the express authority of Congress"); 10 Comp. Gen. 395 (1931); 22 Comp. Dec. 465 (1916)[80]; 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 527 (1916). A few of the cases (e.g., 10 Comp. Gen. 395 and 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 527) have tied the result in with the Antideficiency Act prohibition against incurring obligations in advance of appropriations.

A question which appears to have received little attention is whether an agency with statutory authority to accept gifts may use either appropriated funds or donated funds to solicit the gifts. GAO found that the Holocaust Memorial Council may use either appropriated or donated funds to hire a fund-raiser, but the cases have little precedent value since the legislation involved included specific authority to solicit as well as accept donations. See B-211149, December 12, 1985; B-211149, June 22, 1983.

An interesting, and hopefully unique, situation presented itself in B-230727, August 1, 1988. Congress had enacted legislation to establish a Commission on Improving the Effectiveness of the United [80]Some wag once said, jokingly we think, that if you looked hard enough you could probably find a case dealing with the use of appropriated funds to buy dog food. 22 Comp. Dec. 465 is it.

REV_00257304

Nations, to be funded solely from private contributions. The effective date of the legislation was March 1, 1989. Unfortunately, the legislation failed to provide a mechanism for anyone (Treasury Department or General Services Administration, for example) to accept and account for donations prior to the effective date, and the Commission itself could not do so since it had no legal existence. Thus, unless the statute were amended to authorize some other agency to act on the Commission's behalf, potential donors could not make contributions prior to the effective date since there was no one authorized to accept them.

Occasionally, someone makes a gift to the United States and later wants the money back. Where the elements of an unconditional gift have been satisfied (intent to make a gift, delivery, and acceptance), claims for refund have been denied. A-94582, June 6, 1938; B-151432-O.M., June 3, 1963.

Finally, if an agency is authorized to accept gifts, it may also accept a loan of equipment by a private party without charge to be used in connection with particular government work. The agency's appropriations for the work will be available for repairs to the equipment, but only to the extent necessary for the continued use of the equipment on the government work, and not after the government's use has terminated. 20 Comp. Gen. 617 (1941). In one case, GAO approved the loan of private property to a federal agency by one of its employees, without charge and apparently without statutory authority, where the agency administratively determined that the equipment was necessary to the discharge of agency functions and the loan was in the interest of the United States. 22 Comp. Gen. 153 (1942). The decision stressed, however, that the practice should not be encouraged. The decision seems to have been based in part on wartime needs and its precedent value would therefore seem minimal. See, e.g., B-168717, February 12, 1970.

b. Donations to Individual Employees

(1) Contributions to salary or expenses

As a general proposition, unless authorized by statute, private contributions to the salary or expenses of a federal employee are improper. First, they may in some circumstances violate 18 U.S.C. § 209, which prohibits the supplementation of a government employee's salary from private sources. "The evils of such, were it permitted, are obvious." Exchange National Bank v. Abramson, 295

F. Supp. 87, 90 (D. Minn. 1969). For purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 209, the proverb that it is better to give than to receive doesn't work. Both the giving and the receiving are criminal offenses under the statute. The employee would presumably violate the law by receiving more than he or she is entitled to receive under applicable statutes and regulations. 33 Op. Att'y Gen. 273 (1922).

Second, they are improper as unauthorized augmentations. To the extent the private contribution replaces the employee's government salary, it is a direct augmentation of the employing agency's appropriations. To the extent the contribution supplements the government salary, it is an augmentation in an indirect sense, the theory being that when Congress appropriates money for an activity, all expenses of that activity must be borne by that appropriation unless Congress specifically provides otherwise.

An early case in point is 2 Comp. Gen. 775 (1923). The American Jewelers' Protective Association offered to pay the salary and expenses of a customs agent for one year on the condition that the agent be assigned exclusively for that year to investigate jewelry smuggling. The Comptroller General found the arrangement improper, for the two reasons noted above. Whether the payments were to be made directly to the employee or to the agency by way of reimbursement was immaterial.

Most questions in this area involve schemes for private entities to pay official travel expenses. From the sheer number of cases GAO has considered, one cannot help feeling that the bureaucrat must indeed be a beloved creature. Prior to 1991, a long series of decisions established the proposition that donations from private sources for official travel to conduct government business constituted an unlawful augmentation unless the employing agency had statutory authority to accept gifts. If the agency had such authority, the donation could be made to the agency, not the individual employee, and the agency would then reimburse the employee in accordance with applicable travel laws and regulations, with the allowances reduced as appropriate in the case of contributions in kind.[81]

[81]Some cases from this series are 59 Comp. Gen. 415 (1980); 55 Comp. Gen. 1293 (1976); 49 Comp. Gen. 572 (1970); 46 Comp. Gen. 689 (1967); 36 Comp. Gen. 268 (1956); 26 Comp. Dec. 43 (1919).

One problem with this system was the lack of uniformity in treatment, varying with the agency's statutory authority. Congress addressed the situation in the Ethics Reform Act of 1989, Pub. L. No. 101-194, § 302, 103 Stat. 1716, 1745, codified at 31 U.S.C. § 1353. Subsection (a) provides as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Administrator of General Services, in consultation with the Director of the Office of Government Ethics, shall prescribe by regulation the conditions under which an agency in the executive branch (including an independent agency) may accept payment, or authorize an employee of such agency to accept payment on the agency's behalf, from non-Federal sources for travel, subsistence, and related expenses with respect to the attendance of the employee (or the spouse of such employee) at any meeting or similar function relating to the official duties of the employee. Any cash payment so accepted shall be credited to the appropriation applicable to such expenses. In the case of a payment in kind so accepted, a pro rata reduction shall be made in any entitlement of the employee to payment from the Government for such expenses."

GSA's implementing regulations, published on March 8, 1991 (56 Fed. Reg. 9878), are found at 41 C.F.R. Parts 304-1 and 304-2. Thus, as long as acceptance complies with the statute and regulations, there is no longer an augmentation problem. The existence or lack of separate statutory authority to accept gifts is immaterial.

Another relevant statute, which seemingly overlaps 31 U.S.C. § 1353 to some extent but was left untouched by it, is 5 U.S.C. § 4111, enacted as part of the Government Employees Training Act. Under this provision, an employee may accept (1) contributions and awards incident to training in nongovernment facilities, and (2) payment of travel, subsistence, and other expenses incident to attendance at meetings, but only if the donor is a tax-exempt nonprofit organization.[82] If an employee receives a contribution in cash or in kind under this section, travel and subsistence allowances are subject to an "appropriate reduction."

Section 4111 authorizes the employee to accept the donation. It does not authorize the agency to accept the donation, credit it to its appropriations, and then reimburse the employee. 55 Comp. Gen.

[82]The rules under 5 U.S.C. § 4111 are stated and applied in a number of sources in addition to the cases cited in the text. See, for example, B-171751, February 11, 1971, and two GAO reports involving the Agency for International Development (Travel Practices: Private Funding of AID Employees' Travel, GAO/NSIAD-87-92, March 1987, and Travel Practices: Use of Airline Bonus Coupons and Privately Funded Travel by AID Employees, GAO/NSIAD-86-26, November 1985).

1293 (1976). An employee who receives an authorized donation after the government has already paid the travel expenses cannot keep everything. The employee must refund to the government the amount by which his or her allowances would have been reduced had the donation been received before the allowances were paid. The agency may then credit this refund to its travel appropriation as an authorized repayment. Id. at 1294–95.

The statute requires an "appropriate reduction" in travel payments in order to preclude the agency from paying for something that has already been reimbursed by an authorized private organization. An employee being reimbursed on an "actual expense" basis should not be claiming items which would duplicate private reimbursements. Thus, the agency is not required to reduce the actual expense entitlement by the value of provided meals. 64 Comp. Gen. 185 (1985). However, the value of subsistence items furnished in kind must be deducted where the employee is being reimbursed on a per diem basis. Id. at 188; 49 Comp. Gen. 572, 576 (1970).

The authority conferred by 5 U.S.C. § 4111 is expressly limited to organizations exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C. § 501(c)(3) (religious, charitable, scientific, educational, etc.). It does not extend to organizations which may be tax-exempt under other portions of § 501. B-225986, March 2, 1987. Also, it does not apply to an organization whose application for exemption under § 501(c)(3) has not yet been approved; subsequent approval is not retroactive for purposes of 5 U.S.C. § 4111. B-225264, November 24, 1987 (non-decision letter).

Donations made under the express condition that they be used for some unauthorized purpose should be returned to the donor. 47 Comp. Gen. 319 (1967).

(2) Promotional and other travel-related items

In recent years, commercial airlines and others have devised a variety of schemes, which change from time to time, to reward frequent customers. Promotional materials awarded to customers may take various forms—bonus trips, reduced-fare coupons, cash, merchandise, credits toward future goods or services, etc. Government employees traveling on government business are eligible for these promotional items the same as anyone else. There is, however, one important distinction. "Anyone else" may keep them; the government employee, with certain exceptions, may not.

The fundamental principle underlying the decisions and regulations in this area is that any benefit, cash payment or otherwise, received by a government employee from private sources incident to or resulting from the performance of official duty is regarded as having been received on behalf of the government and is the property of the government.[83] It should also be noted that the promotional items are not really "gifts"; they are more in the nature of benefits "earned" as a result of the expenditure of federal funds. B-216052, January 29, 1985 (non-decision letter). While the cases are not "augmentation of appropriations" cases, they are sufficiently related to the subject matter of this section to warrant brief treatment here.

GAO's "leading case" in this area is 63 Comp. Gen. 229 (1984), and many of the points noted below will be found in that decision. In addition, the basic rules are reflected in the Federal Property Management Regulations (FPMR), 41 C.F.R. § 101-25.103, and Federal Travel Regulations (FTR), 41 C.F.R. Parts 301-1 and 301-3.

The primary rule is that, except as noted below, promotional items or benefits of any type received by a government employee resulting in whole or in part from official travel are the property of the government and may not be retained by the employee for personal use. 63 Comp. Gen. 229.[84] The fact that the individual obtains the benefit through a combination of official and personal travel is immaterial. Id.[85] An employee wishing to take advantage of promotional benefits should maintain separate accounts for official and personal travel. FTR, 41 C.F.R. § 301-1.6(f)(1). Whether the benefit is transferable or nontransferable is also immaterial. 63 Comp. Gen. 229, 232–33; B-215826, January 23, 1985.

[83]There are common-sense exceptions to this. For example, a 1977 Justice Department opinion, summarized in B-199656, March 21, 1984 (non-decision letter), held that a government employee may retain a public service award in the form of cash from a private organization even though the service was performed as a government employee.

Items such as promotional coupons that provide for future free or reduced-cost travel should be integrated into the agency's travel plans. FPMR, 41 C.F.R. § 101-25.103-2(b). Merchandise items which the receiving agency cannot use must be disposed of in accordance with General Services Administration regulations. Id. §§ 101-25.103-2(d), 101-25.103-4.

Since the benefit is the property of the government from the moment the employee receives it, an employee who uses it for personal travel or other personal use becomes indebted to the government for the full value of the benefit received. 63 Comp. Gen. 233 (1984); B-216822, March 18, 1985.[86]

The typical bonus program is not automatic, but requires the traveler to submit an application and, in some cases, pay a fee. An employee who has paid such a fee may be reimbursed, not to exceed the amount of expected savings to the government. FTR, 41 C.F.R. § 301-1.6(f)(2); 63 Comp. Gen. 229, 231.

The employee may retain two types of promotional "gift":

- Merchandise items of nominal intrinsic value (pens, pencils, note pads, calendars, etc.). 63 Comp. Gen. 229, 233.
- Benefits which have no value to the government, such as free upgrades to first class. 63 Comp. Gen. 229, 232; B-212559, February 24, 1984. The free upgrade should be used only for official travel. B-223387-O.M., August 22, 1986.

In addition, the Federal Travel Regulations were amended in 1989 to permit an employee, subject to agency approval, to obtain premium-class accommodations through the redemption of frequent traveler benefits.[87]

[86]At the time B-216822 was issued, the indebtedness could not be waived. The waiver statute, 5 U.S.C. § 5584, has since been amended to include debts arising from travel or transportation allowances, so this portion of the decision should be disregarded.

[87]41 C.F.R. § 301-3.3(d)(3)(ii)(F), added by 54 Fed. Reg. 47523, 47524 (November 15, 1989). GAO supported the amendment. See 67 Comp. Gen. 79, 83 (1987); B-235185, August 18, 1989 (non-decision letter). Prior to the amendment, such a redemption would not have been authorized under the guidelines set forth in the decisions. An employee may keep a prize won in a contest or lottery sponsored by an air carrier if the contest was open to the general public and not limited to ticket-holding passengers. B-199656, July 15, 1981.

Also, there is no problem with the acceptance of life insurance benefits offered to federal employees by travel management contractors at no additional cost to the government where the government would receive no financial benefit by declining. B-222234, December 9, 1986.

Similarly, if an employee chooses to charge official travel expenses to a personal credit card and subsequently receives a cash or credit rebate on purchases made with that card, the employee may keep the entire rebate since it is not directly related to official travel. B-236219, May 4, 1990. As the decision suggests, the answer would presumably be different if the rebate were based solely on use of the card for official travel.

Denied boarding compensation (compensation paid by an air carrier when a passenger is involuntarily "bumped") is payable to the government and not to the individual employee. 59 Comp. Gen. 95 (1979); B-227280, October 14, 1988; B-224590, November 10, 1986; B-148879, July 20, 1970, affirmed upon reconsideration, B-148879, August 28, 1970; FTR, 41 C.F.R. § 301-3.5(b). Since this is not a gift, but is more in the nature of damages, it must be deposited into miscellaneous receipts. 41 Comp. Gen. 806 (1962); FTR, supra. However, an employee who voluntarily vacates his or her seat and takes a later flight may retain overbooking compensation received from the airline, subject to offset for any additional travel expenses caused by the employee's voluntary action. 59 Comp. Gen. 203 (1980); B-196145, January 14, 1980.

A strange result occurs if a federal agency makes a mandatory space requisition that forces an airline to "bump" a passenger who turns out to be another federal employee. The airline can charge the agency for the overbooking compensation it is required to pay. 62 Comp. Gen. 519 (1983). The bumped employee turns the money in to his or her employing agency, which in turn deposits it in the Treasury. The net result is the transfer of the amount of the overbooking compensation from the requisitioning agency to the general fund of the Treasury. While 62 Comp. Gen. 519 did not expressly address the case of a bumped federal employee, there is no apparent reason why the result should be any different since the airline is entitled to be made whole in either case.

4. Other Augmentation Principles and Cases

As pointed out earlier in our introductory comments, the augmentation theory is relevant in a wide variety of contexts. The most common applications are the areas previously discussed—the spectrum of situations involving the miscellaneous receipts statute and the acceptance of gifts. This portion of the discussion will present a sampling of cases to illustrate other applications of the theory.

Another way of stating the augmentation rule is that when Congress appropriates funds for an activity, the appropriation represents a limitation Congress has fixed for that activity, and all expenditures for that activity must come from that appropriation absent express authority to the contrary. Thus, a federal institution is normally not eligible to receive grant funds from another federal institution. It is not necessary for the grant statute to expressly exclude federal institutions as eligible grantees; the rule will apply based on the augmentation theory unless the grant statute expressly includes federal institutions. 57 Comp. Gen. 662, 664 (1978); 23 Comp. Gen. 694 (1944); B-114868, April 11, 1975.

The improper treatment of reimbursable transactions may result in an augmentation. Thus, if a given reimbursement must be credited to the appropriation that "earned" it, i.e., that financed the transaction, and that appropriation has expired, crediting the reimbursement to current funds is an improper augmentation. An example of this type of transaction is the Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1535.

An agency may have the option of crediting reimbursements either to current funds or to the appropriation which financed the transaction. An example here is the Arms Export Control Act (Foreign Military Sales Act). Even here, however, crediting a reimbursement to an account which bears no relationship to the transaction would be an unauthorized augmentation. B-132900-O.M., November 1, 1977. Several statutes applicable to the Defense Department provide similar options. For a detailed discussion of these statutes, see B-179708-O.M., December 1, 1975; B- 179708-O.M., July 21, 1975; GAO report entitled Reimbursements to Appropriations: Legislative Suggestions for Improved Congressional Control, FGMSD-75-52 (November 1, 1976).

Failure to recover all required costs in a reimbursable Economy Act transaction improperly augments the appropriations of the ordering agency. 57 Comp. Gen. 674, 682 (1978).

Similarly, treating a transaction which should be reimbursed as nonreimbursable may result in an improper augmentation. For example, an agency receives appropriations to do its own work, not that of another agency. Accordingly, as a general proposition, interdepartmental loans of personnel on a nonreimbursable basis improperly augment the appropriations of the receiving agency. 65 Comp. Gen. 635 (1986); 64 Comp. Gen. 370 (1985).

Reimbursement by one agency to another in situations which are not the proper subject of an Economy Act agreement or where reimbursement is not otherwise statutorily authorized is improper for several reasons: It is an unauthorized transfer of appropriations; it violates 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) by using the reimbursing agency's appropriations for other than their intended purpose; and it is an improper augmentation of the appropriations of the agency receiving the reimbursement. (The cases do not always cite all of these theories; they again illustrate the close interrelationship of the various concepts discussed throughout this publication.) The situation arises, for example, when agencies attempt to use the Economy Act for a "service" which is a normal part of the providing agency's mission and for which it receives appropriations.

To illustrate, an agency acquiring land cannot reimburse the Justice Department for the legal expenses incurred incident to the acquisition because these are regular administrative expenses of the Justice Department for which it receives appropriations. 16 Comp. Gen. 333 (1936). Similarly, an agency cannot reimburse the Treasury Department for the administrative expenses incurred in making disbursements on its account. 17 Comp. Gen. 728 (1938).

Federal agencies may not reimburse the Patent Office for services performed in administering the patent and trademark laws since the Patent Office is required by law to furnish these services and receives appropriations for them. 33 Comp. Gen. 27 (1953). Nor may they reimburse the Library of Congress for recording assignments of copyrights to the United States. 31 Comp. Gen. 14 (1951). See also 40 Comp. Gen. 369 (1960) (Interior Department may not charge other agencies for the cost of conducting hearings incident to the

While Congress retains, as it must, ultimate control over how much an agency can spend, it does not attempt to control the disposition of every dollar. We began our general discussion of administrative discretion in Chapter 3 by quoting Justice Holmes' statement that "some play must be allowed to the joints if the machine is to work." This is fully applicable to the expenditure of appropriated funds. An agency's discretion under a lump-sum appropriation is discussed in Section F.

B. Types of Appropriation Language and the Concept of Earmarking

Congress has been making appropriations since the beginning of the Republic. Over the course of this time, certain forms of appropriation language have become standard. This section will point out the more commonly used language with respect to amount.

Congress may wish to specifically designate, or "earmark," part of a more general lump-sum appropriation for a particular object, as either a maximum, a minimum, or both.[1] For simplicity of illustration, let us assume that we have a lump-sum appropriation of $1,000 for "smoking materials" and a particular object within that appropriation is "Cuban cigars."

If the appropriation specifies "not to exceed" $100 for Cuban cigars or "not more than" $100 for Cuban cigars, then $100 is the maximum available for Cuban cigars. 64 Comp. Gen. 263 (1985).[2] A specifically earmarked maximum may not be augmented with funds from the general appropriation.

Statutory transfer authority will permit the augmentation of a "not to exceed" earmark in many, but not all, cases. In 12 Comp. Gen. 168 (1932), it was held that general transfer authority could be used to increase maximum earmarks for personal services, subject to the percentage limitations specified in the transfer statute. The decision pointed out that if the personal services earmark had been a separate

[1]We use the term "earmarking" here to mean a specific statutory designation of a portion of a lump-sum appropriation or authorization. The term is also used to refer to the statutory designation of revenues for particular uses. For a brief but nevertheless useful discussion of earmarking in this latter sense, see GAO report entitled Budget Issues: Earmarking in the Federal Government, GAO/AFMD-90-8FS (January 1990).

[2]A "not to exceed" earmark was held not to constitute a maximum in 19 Comp. Gen. 61 (1939), where the earmarking language was inconsistent with other language in the general appropriation.

validation of unpatented mining claims, although it may charge for other services in connection with the validation which it is not required to furnish); B-211953, December 7, 1984 (General Services Administration may not seek reimbursement for costs of storing records which it is required by law to store and for which it receives appropriations).

The Merit Systems Protection Board may not accept reimbursement from other federal agencies for travel expenses of hearing officers to hearing sites away from the Board's regular field offices. Holding the hearings is not a service to the other agency, but is a Board function for which it receives appropriations. The inadequacy of the Board's appropriations to permit sufficient travel is legally irrelevant. 59 Comp. Gen. 415 (1980), affirmed upon reconsideration, 61 Comp. Gen. 419 (1982). Where an agency provides personnel to act as hearing officers for another agency, it may be reimbursed if it is not required to provide the officers (B-192875, January 15, 1980), but may not be reimbursed if it is required to provide them (32 Comp. Gen. 534 (1953)).

Similar issues can arise when an agency is trying to decide which of its appropriations to use for a given object. In 68 Comp. Gen. 337 (1989), for example, the Railroad Retirement Board wanted to make performance awards to personnel in its Office of Inspector General, and was unsure whether to charge its appropriation for the IG's office or its general appropriation. A reasonable argument could be made to support either choice. Thus, the Board could make an election as long as it remained consistent thereafter. Since there was no indication that the IG appropriation was intended to be the exclusive funding source for the performance awards, using the general appropriation would not result in an improper augmentation of the IG appropriation.

A somewhat analogous situation could arise if an agency agrees to reduce or forgo receipts to which it is entitled, and the party owing those receipts agrees in return to make some expenditure which would otherwise have to be borne by a separate appropriation of the same agency. GAO examined such a situation in B-77467, November 8, 1950, involving the leasing of lands under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act at reduced rentals on condition that the lessees in return perform certain improvements to the land. There was no augmentation in that case, however, since the statute expressly authorized the leasing with or without consideration and on such terms as the Secretary of Agriculture determined would best accomplish the purposes of the act.

The following cases illustrate other situations which GAO found would result in unauthorized augmentations:

- The Customs Service may not charge the party-in-interest for travel expenses of customs employees incurred incident to official duties performed at night or on a Sunday or holiday. 43 Comp. Gen. 101 (1963); 3 Comp. Gen. 960 (1924). See also 22 Comp. Dec. 253 (1915).
- Department of Energy may not use overcharge refunds collected from oil companies to pay the administrative expenses of its Office of Hearings and Appeals. B-200170, April 1, 1981.
- Proposal for airlines to reimburse Treasury to permit Customs Service to hire additional staff to reduce clearance delays at Miami airport was unauthorized in that it would augment appropriations made by Congress for that service. 59 Comp. Gen. 294 (1980).

F. Lump-Sum Appropriations

1. The Rule—General Discussion

A lump-sum appropriation is one that is made to cover a number of specific programs, projects, or items. (The number may be as small as two.) In contrast, a line-item appropriation is available only for the specific object described.

Lump-sum appropriations come in many forms. Many smaller agencies receive only a single appropriation, usually termed "Salaries and Expenses" or "Operating Expenses." All of the agency's operations must be funded from this single appropriation. Cabinet-level departments and larger agencies receive several appropriations, often based on broad object categories such as "operations and maintenance" or "research and development." For purposes of this discussion, a lump-sum appropriation is simply one that is available for more than one specific object.

In earlier times when the federal government was much smaller and federal programs were (or at least seemed) much simpler, very specific line-item appropriations were more common. In recent decades, however, as the federal budget has grown in both size and complexity, a lump-sum approach has become a virtual necessity. For example, an appropriation act for an establishment the size of the Defense Department structured solely on a line-item basis would rival the telephone directory in bulk.

The amount of a lump-sum appropriation is not derived through guesswork. It is the result of a lengthy budget and appropriation process. The agency first submits its appropriation request to Congress through the Office of Management and Budget, supported by detailed budget justifications. Congress then reviews the request and enacts an appropriation which may be more, less, or the same as the amount requested. Variations from the amount requested are usually explained in the appropriation act's legislative history, most often in committee reports.

All of this leads logically to a question which can be phrased in various ways: How much flexibility does an agency have in spending a lump-sum appropriation? Is it legally bound by its original budget estimate or by expressions of intent in legislative history? How is the agency's legitimate need for administrative flexibility balanced against the constitutional role of the Congress as controller of the public purse?

The answer to these questions is one of the most important principles of appropriations law. The rule, simply stated, is this: Restrictions on a lump-sum appropriation contained in the agency's budget request or in legislative history are not legally binding on the department or agency unless they are carried into (specified in) the appropriation act itself, or unless some other statute restricts the agency's spending flexibility. Of course, the agency cannot exceed the total amount of the lump-sum appropriation, and its spending must not violate other applicable statutory restrictions. The rule applies equally whether the legislative history is mere acquiescence in the agency's budget request or an affirmative expression of intent.

The rule recognizes the agency's need for flexibility to meet changing or unforeseen circumstances, yet preserves congressional control in several ways. First, the rule merely says that the restrictions are not legally binding. The practical wisdom of making the expenditure is an entirely separate question. An agency that disregards the wishes of its oversight or appropriations committees will most likely be called upon to answer for its digressions before those committees next year. An agency that fails to "keep faith" with the Congress may find its next appropriation reduced or limited by line-item restrictions. That Congress is fully aware of this relationship is evidenced by the following statement from a 1973 House Appropriations Committee report:

"In a strictly legal sense, the Department of Defense could utilize the funds appropriated for whatever programs were included under the individual appropriation accounts, but the relationship with the Congress demands that the detailed justifications which are presented in support of budget requests be followed. To do otherwise would cause Congress to lose confidence in the requests made and probably result in reduced appropriations or line item appropriation bills."[88]

Second, restrictions on an agency's spending flexibility exist through the operation of other laws. For example, a "Salaries and Expenses" appropriation may be a large lump sum, but much of it is in fact nondiscretionary because the salaries of agency employees are fixed by law.[89] Third, reprogramming arrangements with the various committees provide another safeguard against abuse. Finally, Congress always holds the ultimate trump card. It has the power to make any restriction legally binding simply by including it in the appropriation act.[90] Thus, the treatment of lump-sum appropriations may be regarded as yet another example of the efforts of our legal and political systems to balance the conflicting objectives of executive flexibility and congressional control.[91]

[88]Report of the House Committee on Appropriations on the 1974 Defense Department appropriation bill, H.R. Rep. No. 662, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 16 (1973).

[89]Fisher, Presidential Spending Power 72 (1975).

[90]For possible limitations on this statement, see New York v. United States, ___ U.S. ___, 112 S. Ct. 2408, 2426 (1992); Nevada v. Skinner, 884 F.2d 445, 447 (9th Cir. 1989).

[91]The effort has not always been free from controversy. One senator, concerned with what he felt was excessive flexibility in a 1935 appropriation, tried to make his point by suggesting the following:

"Section 1. Congress hereby appropriates $4,880,000,000 to the President of the United States to use as he pleases.

"Sec. 2. Anybody who does not like it is fined $1,000."

79 Cong. Rec. 2014 (1935) (remarks of Sen. Arthur Vandenberg), quoted in Fisher, supra note 89, at 62–63.

REV_00257317

Two common examples of devices Congress uses when it wants to restrict an agency's spending flexibility are line-item appropriations and earmarks. Another approach is illustrated by the following provision, the most restrictive we have seen, from the 1988 continuing resolution:

"Amounts and authorities provided by this resolution shall be in accordance with the reports accompanying the bills as passed by or reported to the House and the Senate and in the Joint Explanatory Statement of the Conference accompanying this Joint Resolution."[92]

The 1983 appropriation act for the Department of Housing and Urban Development contained this restriction:

"Where appropriations in titles I and II of this Act are expendable for travel expenses and no specific limitation has been placed thereon, the expenditures for such travel expenses may not exceed the amounts set forth therefor in the budget estimates submitted for the appropriations . . . ."[93]

A provision prohibiting the use of a construction appropriation to start any new project for which an estimate was not included in the budget is discussed in 34 Comp. Gen. 278 (1954).

Also, the availability of a lump-sum appropriation may be restricted by provisions appearing in statutes other than appropriation acts, such as authorization acts. For example, if an agency receives a line-item authorization and a lump-sum appropriation pursuant to the authorization, the line-item restrictions and earmarks in the authorization act will apply just as if they appeared in the appropriation act itself. The topic is discussed in more detail, with citations, in Chapter 2.

2. Specific Applications

a. Effect of Budget Estimates

Perhaps the easiest case is the effect of the agency's own budget estimate. The rule here was stated in 17 Comp. Gen. 147, 150 (1937) as follows:

[92]Pub. L. No. 100-202, § 107, 101 Stat. 1329, 1329-434 (1987).

"The amounts of individual items in the estimates presented to the Congress on the basis of which a lump sum appropriation is enacted are not binding on administrative officers unless carried into the appropriation act itself."

See also B-63539, June 6, 1947; B-55277, January 23, 1946; B-35335, July, 17, 1943; B-48120-O.M., October 21, 1948.

It follows that the lack of a specific budget request will not preclude an expenditure from a lump-sum appropriation which is otherwise legally available for the item in question. To illustrate, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts asked for a supplemental appropriation of $11,000 in 1962 for necessary salaries and expenses of the Judicial Conference in revising and improving the federal rules of practice and procedure. The House of Representatives did not allow the increase but the Senate included the full amount. The bill went to conference but the conference was delayed and the agency needed the money. The Administrative Office then asked whether it could take the $11,000 out of its regular 1962 appropriation even though it had not specifically included this item in its 1962 budget request. Citing 17 Comp. Gen. 147, and noting that the study of the federal rules was a continuing statutory function of the Judicial Conference, the Comptroller General concluded as follows:

"[I]n the absence of a specific limitation or prohibition in the appropriation under consideration as to the amount which may be expended for revising and improving the Federal Rules of practice and procedure, you would not be legally bound by your budget estimates or absence thereof.

"If the Congress desires to restrict the availability of a particular appropriation to the several items and amounts thereof submitted in the budget estimates, such control may be effected by limiting such items in the appropriation act itself. Or, by a general provision of law, the availability of appropriations could be limited to the items and the amounts contained in the budget estimates. In the absence of such limitations an agency's lump-sum appropriation is legally available to carry out the functions of the agency."

This decision is B-149163, June 27, 1962. See also 20 Comp. Gen. 631 (1941); B-198234, March 25, 1981; B-69238, September 23, 1948. The same principle would apply where the budget request was for an amount less than the amount appropriated, or for zero. 2 Comp. Gen. 517 (1923); B-126975, February 12, 1958.

b. Restrictions in Legislative History

The issue raised in most of the decisions results from changes to or restrictions on a lump-sum appropriation imposed during the legislative process. The "leading case" in this area is 55 Comp. Gen. 307 (1975), the so-called "LTV case." The Department of the Navy had selected the McDonnell Douglas Corporation to develop a new fighter aircraft. LTV Aerospace Corporation protested the selection, arguing that the aircraft McDonnell Douglas proposed violated the 1975 Defense Department Appropriation Act. The appropriation in question was a lump-sum appropriation of slightly over $3 billion under the heading "Research, Development, Test, and Evaluation, Navy." This appropriation covered a large number of projects, including the fighter aircraft in question. The conference report on the appropriation act had stated that $20 million was being provided for a Navy combat fighter, but that "[a]daptation of the selected Air Force Air Combat Fighter to be capable of carrier operations is the prerequisite for use of the funds provided." It was conceded that the McDonnell Douglas aircraft was not a derivative of the Air Force fighter and that the Navy's selection was not in accord with the instructions in the conference report. The issue, therefore, was whether the conference report was legally binding on the Navy. In other words, did Navy act illegally in choosing not to follow the conference report?

The ensuing decision is GAO's most comprehensive statement on the legal availability of lump-sum appropriations. Pertinent excerpts are set forth below:

"[C]ongress has recognized that in most instances it is desirable to maintain executive flexibility to shift around funds within a particular lump-sum appropriation account so that agencies can make necessary adjustments for 'unforeseen developments, changing requirements, . . . and legislation enacted subsequent to appropriations.' [Citation omitted.] This is not to say that Congress does not expect that funds will be spent in accordance with budget estimates or in accordance with restrictions detailed in Committee reports. However, in order to preserve spending flexibility, it may choose not to impose these particular restrictions as a matter of law, but rather to leave it to the agencies to 'keep faith' with the Congress. . . .

"On the other hand, when Congress does not intend to permit agency flexibility, but intends to impose a legally binding restriction on an agency's use of funds, it does so by means of explicit statutory language. . . .

"Accordingly, it is our view that when Congress merely appropriates lump-sum amounts without statutorily restricting what can be done with those funds, a clear inference arises that it does not intend to impose legally binding restrictions, and indicia in committee reports and other legislative history as to how the funds should or are expected to be spent do not establish any legal requirements on Federal agencies. . . .

. . . .

"We further point out that Congress itself has often recognized the reprogramming flexibility of executive agencies, and we think it is at least implicit in such [recognition] that Congress is well aware that agencies are not legally bound to follow what is expressed in Committee reports when those expressions are not explicitly carried over into the statutory language. . . .

"We think it follows from the above discussion that, as a general proposition, there is a distinction to be made between utilizing legislative history for the purpose of illuminating the intent underlying language used in a statute and resorting to that history for the purpose of writing into the law that which is not there.

. . . .

"As observed above, this does not mean agencies are free to ignore clearly expressed legislative history applicable to the use of appropriated funds. They ignore such expressions of intent at the peril of strained relations with the Congress. The Executive branch . . . has a practical duty to abide by such expressions. This duty, however, must be understood to fall short of a statutory requirement giving rise to a legal infraction where there is a failure to carry out that duty."

55 Comp. Gen. at 318, 319, 321, 325. Accordingly, GAO concluded that Navy's award did not violate the appropriation act and the contract therefore was not illegal.

The same volume of the Comptroller General's decisions contains another often-cited case, 55 Comp. Gen. 812 (1976), the Newport News case. This case also involved the Navy. This time, Navy wanted to exercise a contract option for construction of a nuclear powered guided missile frigate, designated DLGN 41. The contractor, Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, argued that exercising the contract option would violate the Antideficiency Act by obligating more money than Navy had in its appropriation.

The appropriation in question, Navy's "Shipbuilding and Conversion" appropriation, provided "for the DLGN nuclear powered guided missile frigate program, $244,300,000, which shall be available only for construction of DLGN 41 and for advance procurement funding for DLGN 42 . . . ." The committee reports on the appropriation act and the related authorization act indicated that, out of the $244 million appropriated, $152 million was for construction of the DLGN 41 and the remaining $92 million was for long lead time activity on the DLGN 42. It was clear that, if the $152 million specified in the committee reports for the DLGN 41 was legally binding, obligations resulting from exercise of the contract option would exceed the available appropriation.

The Comptroller General applied the "LTV principle" and held that the $152 million was not a legally binding limit on obligations for the DLGN 41. As a matter of law, the entire $244 million was legally available for the DLGN 41 because the appropriation act did not include any restriction. Therefore, in evaluating potential violations of the Antideficiency Act, the relevant appropriation amount is the total amount of the lump-sum appropriation minus sums already obligated, not the lower figure derived from the legislative history.[94] As the decision recognized, Congress could have imposed a legally binding limit by the very simple device of appropriating a specific amount only for the DLGN 41, or by incorporating the committee reports in the appropriation language.

This decision illustrates another important point: The terms "lump-sum" and "line-item" are relative concepts. The $244 million appropriation in the Newport News case could be viewed as a line-item appropriation in relation to the broader "Shipbuilding and Conversion" category, but it was also a lump-sum appropriation in relation to the two specific vessels included. This factual distinction does not affect the applicable legal principle. As the decision explained:

"Contractor urges that LTV is inapplicable here since LTV involved a lump-sum appropriation whereas the DLGN appropriation is a more specific 'line item' appropriation. While we recognize the factual distinction drawn by Contractor, we nevertheless believe that the principles set forth in LTV are equally applicable and controlling here. . . . [I]mplicit in our holding in LTV and in the other authorities cited is the view that dollar amounts in appropriation acts are to be interpreted differently from statutory words in general. This view, in our opinion, pertains whether the dollar amount is a lump-sum appropriation available for a large number [94]Of course, all this meant was that there would be no Antideficiency Act violation at the time the option was exercised. The decision recognized that subsequent actions could still produce a violation. 55 Comp. Gen. at 826.

of items, as in LTV, or, as here, a more specific appropriation available for only two items." 55 Comp. Gen. at 821–22.

A precursor of LTV and Newport News provides another interesting illustration. In 1974, controversy and funding uncertainties surrounded the Navy's "Project Sanguine," a communications system for sending command and control messages to submerged submarines from a single transmitting location in the United States. The Navy had requested $16.6 million for Project Sanguine for FY 1974. The House deleted the request, the Senate restored it, the conference committee compromised and approved $8.3 million. The Sanguine funds were included in a $2.6 billion lump-sum Research and Development appropriation. Navy spent more than $11 million for Project Sanguine in FY 1974. The question was whether Navy violated the Antideficiency Act by spending more than the $8.3 million provided in the conference report. GAO found that it did not, because the conference committee's action was not specified in the appropriation act and was therefore not legally binding. Significantly, the appropriation act did include a proviso prohibiting use of the funds for "full scale development" of Project Sanguine (not involved in the $11 million expenditure), illustrating that Congress knows perfectly well how to impose a legally binding restriction when it desires to do so. GAO report, Legality of the Navy's Expenditures for Project Sanguine During Fiscal Year 1974, LCD-75-315 (January 20, 1975); B-168482-O.M., August 15, 1974.

Similarly, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare received a $12 billion lump-sum appropriation for public assistance in 1975. Committee reports indicated that $9.2 million of this amount was being provided for research and development activities of the Social and Rehabilitation Service. Since this earmarking of the $9.2 million was not carried into the appropriation act itself, it did not constitute a statutory limit on the amount available for the program. B-164031(3), April 16, 1975.

GAO has applied the rule of the LTV and Newport News decisions in a number of additional cases and reports, several of which involve variations on the basic theme.[95]

Gen. 228 (1980); B-247853.2, July 20, 1992; B-231711, March 28, 1989; B-222853, September 29, 1987; B-204449, November 18, 1981; B-204270, October 13, 1981; B-202992, May 15, 1981; B-157356, August 17, 1978; B-159993, September 1, 1977; B-163922, October 3, 1975; Internal Controls: Funding of International Defense Research and Development Projects, GAO/NSIAD-91-27 (October 1990).

line-item appropriation, the transfer authority would clearly apply. Id. at 170. Also, the transfer authority was remedial legislation designed to mitigate the impact of reduced appropriations. Somewhat similarly, in 36 Comp. Gen. 607 (1957), funds transferred to an operating appropriation from a civil defense appropriation could be used to exceed an administrative expense limitation in the former which had been calculated without including the increased administrative expenses the added civil defense functions would entail. However, in 33 Comp. Gen. 214 (1953), the Comptroller General held that general transfer authority could not be used to exceed a maximum earmark on an emergency assistance program where it was clear that Congress, aware of the emergency, intended that the program be funded only from the earmark. See also 18 Comp. Gen. 211 (1938).

Under a "not to exceed" earmark, the agency is not required to spend the entire amount on the object specified. See, e.g., Brown v. Ruckelshaus, 364 F. Supp. 258, 266 (C.D. Cal. 1973) ("the phrase 'not to exceed' connotes limitation, not disbursement"). If, in our hypothetical, the entire $100 is not used for Cuban cigars, unobligated balances may—within the time limits for obligation—be applied to other unrestricted objects of the appropriation. 31 Comp. Gen. 578, 579 (1952); 15 Comp. Dec. 660 (1909); B-4568, June 27, 1939.

If later in the fiscal year a supplemental appropriation is made for "smoking materials," the funds provided in the supplemental may not be used to increase the $100 maximum for Cuban cigars unless the supplemental appropriation act so specifies. See Section D of this chapter.

Words like "not to exceed" are not the only way to establish a maximum limitation. If the appropriation includes a specific amount for a particular object (such as "For Cuban cigars, $100"), then the appropriation is a maximum which may not be exceeded. 36 Comp. Gen. 526 (1957); 19 Comp. Gen. 892 (1940); 16 Comp. Gen. 282 (1936).

Another device Congress has used to designate earmarks as maximum limitations is the following general provision:

"Whenever in this Act, an amount is specified within an appropriation for particular purposes or objects of expenditure, such amount, unless otherwise specified, shall be

REV_00257162

The treatment of lump-sum appropriations as described above has been considered by the Department of Justice and the courts as well as GAO, and all have reached the same result. For example, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel concluded in one case that the Department could, in the Attorney General's discretion, reallocate funds within the same lump-sum appropriation in order to avoid an impending deficiency for the United States Marshals Service. 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 701 (1980). Another case applying these principles is 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 674 (1980).

The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has noted that lump-sum appropriations have a "well understood meaning" and stated the rule as follows:

"A lump-sum appropriation leaves it to the recipient agency (as a matter of law, at least) to distribute the funds among some or all of the permissible objects as it sees fit."

International Union v. Donovan, 746 F.2d 855, 861 (D.C. Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 825. The court in that case refused to impose a "reasonable distribution" requirement on the exercise of the agency's discretion, and found that discretion unreviewable. Id. at 862–63. See also McCarey v. McNamara, 390 F.2d 601 (3d Cir. 1968); Blackhawk Heating & Plumbing Co. v. United States, 622 F.2d 539, 547 n.6 (Ct. Cl. 1980).

One court, seemingly at odds with the weight of authority, has concluded that an agency was required by 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) (purpose statute) to spend money in accordance with an earmark appearing only in legislative history. Blue Ocean Preservation Society v. Watkins, 767 F. Supp. 1518 (D. Haw. 1991). An additional factor in that case was that the agency had unsuccessfully sought congressional approval to reprogram the funds in question.

c. "Zero Funding" Under a Lump-Sum Appropriation

Does discretion under a lump-sum appropriation extend so far as to permit an agency to "zero fund" a particular program? Although there are few cases, the answer would appear, for the most part, to be yes, as long as the program is not mandatory and the agency uses the funds for other authorized purposes to avoid impoundment complications. E.g., B-209680, February 24, 1983 (agency could properly decide not to fund a program where committee reports on appropriation stated that no funds were being provided for that program, although agency would have been equally free to fund the program under the lump-sum appropriation); B-167656, June 18, 1971 (agency has discretion to discontinue a function funded under a lump-sum appropriation to cope with a shortfall in appropriations); 4B Op. Off. Legal Counsel 701, 704 n.7 (1980) (same point).

The more difficult question is whether the answer is the same where there is no shortfall problem and where it is clear that Congress wants the program funded. In International Union v. Donovan, cited above, the court upheld an agency's decision to allocate no funds to a program funded by a lump-sum appropriation. Although there was in that case a "congressional realization, if not a congressional intent, that nothing would be expended" for the program in question, 746 F.2d at 859, it seems implicit from the court's discussion of applicable law that the answer would have been the same if legislative history had "directed" that the program be funded. The same result would seem to follow from 55 Comp. Gen. 812 (1976), discussed above, holding that the entire unobligated balance of a lump-sum appropriation should be considered available for one of the objects included in the appropriation, at least for purposes of assessing potential violations of the Antideficiency Act.

In B-114833, July 21, 1978, the Department of Agriculture wanted to use its 1978 lump-sum Resource Conservation and Development appropriation to fund existing projects rather than starting any new ones, even though Congress had expressly provided funds for certain new RC&D projects. Since the congressional action was stated in committee reports but not in the statute itself, the Department's proposed course of action was legally permissible.

An early decision reaching a different result is 1 Comp. Gen. 623 (1922). The appropriation in question provided for "rent of offices of the recorder of deeds, including services of cleaners as necessary, not to exceed 30 cents per hour, . . . $6,000." The Comptroller General held that the entire $6,000 could not be spent for rent. The decision stated:

"[S]ince [the appropriation act] provides that the amount appropriated shall cover both rent and cleaning services, it must be held that the entire amount can not be used for rent alone.

". . . The law leaves to the discretion of the commissioners the question as to what portion of the amount appropriated shall be paid for rent and what portion shall be paid for services of cleaners, but it does not vest in the commissioners the discretion to determine that the entire amount shall be paid for rent and that the cleaning services shall be left unprovided for, or be provided for from other funds."

Id. at 624. Although this result may at first glance seem inconsistent with the authorities previously cited, it would not have been possible as a practical matter to rent office space and totally eliminate cleaning services, and the use of any other appropriation would have been clearly improper. A factor which apparently influenced the decision was that the "regular office force" was somehow being coerced to do the cleaning, and these were employees paid from a separate appropriation. Id. Thus, 1 Comp. Gen. 623 should be viewed as an exception based on its own particular circumstances.

Obligation of Appropriations

A. Introduction: Nature of an Obligation

You, as an individual, use a variety of procedures to spend your money. Consider the following transactions:

(1) You walk into a store, make a purchase, and pay at the counter with cash or check.

(2) You move to another counter and make another purchase with a credit card. No money changes hands at the time, but you sign a credit form which states that you promise to pay upon being billed.

(3) You call the local tree surgeon to remove some ailing limbs from your favorite sycamore. He quotes an estimate and you arrange to have the work done. The tree doctor arrives while you are not at home, does the work, and slips his bill under your front door.

(4) You visit your family dentist to relieve a toothache. The work is done and you go home. No mention is made of money. Of course, you know that the work wasn't free and that the dentist will bill you.

(5) You now visit your family lawyer to sue the dentist and the tree surgeon. The lawyer takes your case and you sign a contingent fee contract in which you agree that the lawyer's fee will be one-third of any amounts recovered.

Numerous other variations could be added to the list but these are sufficient to make the point. Case (1) is a simple cash transaction. The legal liability to pay and the actual disbursement of money occur simultaneously. Cases (2) through (5) all have one essential thing in common: You first take some action which creates the legal liability to pay—that is, you "obligate" yourself to pay—and the actual disbursement of money follows at some later time. The obligation occurs in a variety of ways, such as placing an order or signing a contract.

The government spends money in much the same fashion except that it is subject to many more statutory restrictions. The simple "cash transaction" or "direct outlay" involves a simultaneous obligation and disbursement and represents a minor portion of government expenditures. The major portion of appropriated funds are first obligated and then expended. The subsequent disbursement "liquidates" the obligation. Thus, an agency "uses" appropriations in two basic ways—direct expenditures (disbursements) and obligations.

There is no legal requirement for you as an individual to keep track of your "obligations." For the government, there is.

The concept of "obligation" is central to appropriations law. This is because of the principle, one of the most fundamental, that an obligation must be charged against the relevant appropriation in accordance with the rules relating to purpose, time, and amount. The term "available for obligation" is used throughout this publication to refer to availability as to purpose, time, and amount. This chapter will explore exactly what an obligation is.

It would be nice to start with an all-inclusive and universally applicable definition of "obligation." Unfortunately, because of the immense variety of transactions in which the government is involved, such a definition does not exist. In fact, the Comptroller General has noted that formulating an all-inclusive definition would be impracticable, if not impossible. B-116795, June 18, 1954. As stated in B-192282, April 18, 1979, GAO—

> "has generally avoided a universally applicable legal definition of the term 'obligation,' and has instead analyzed the nature of the particular transaction at issue to determine whether an obligation has been incurred."

At first glance, this passage appears to beg the question. (How can you determine whether an obligation has been incurred if you don't first define what an obligation is?) It is perhaps more accurate to say that GAO has defined "obligation" only in the most general terms, and has applied the concept to individual transactions on a case-by-case basis.

The most one finds in the decisions are general statements referring to an obligation in such terms as "a definite commitment which creates a legal liability of the Government for the payment of appropriated funds for goods and services ordered or received." B-116795, June 18, 1954. See also 21 Comp. Gen. 1162, 1163 (1941) (circular letter); B-222048, February 10, 1987; B-82368, July 20, 1954; B-24827, April 3, 1942; B-190, June 12, 1939. From the earliest days, the Comptroller General has cautioned that the obligating of appropriations must be "definite and certain." A-5894, December 3, 1924.

Thus, in very general and simplified terms, an "obligation" is some action that creates a liability or definite commitment on the part of the government to make a disbursement at some later time.

An advance of funds to a working fund does not in itself serve to obligate the funds. See 23 Comp. Gen. 668 (1944); B-180578-O.M., September 26, 1978. The same result holds for funds transferred to a special "holding account" established for administrative convenience. B-118638, November 4, 1974 (appropriations for District of Columbia Public Defender Service under control of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts are not obligated by transfer to a "Judicial Trust Fund" established by the Administrative Office).

The typical question on obligations is framed in terms of when the obligation may or must be "recorded," that is, officially charged against the spending agency's appropriations. Restated, what action is necessary or sufficient to create an obligation? This is essential in determining what fiscal year to charge, with all the consequences that flow from that determination. It is also essential to the broader concern of congressional control over the public purse.

Before proceeding with the specifics, two general points should be noted:

- For appropriations law purposes, the term "obligation" includes both matured and unmatured commitments. A matured commitment is a legal liability that is currently payable. An unmatured commitment is a liability which is not yet payable but for which a definite commitment nevertheless exists. For example, a contractual liability to pay for goods which have been delivered and accepted has "matured." The liability for monthly rental payments under a lease is largely unmatured although the legal liability covers the entire rental period. Both types of liability are "obligations." The fact that an unmatured liability may be subject to a right of cancellation does not negate the obligation. A-97205, February 3, 1944, at 9–10. An "unmatured liability" as described in this paragraph is different from a "contingent liability" as discussed later in this chapter.
- The obligation takes place when the definite commitment is made, even though the actual payment may not take place until the following fiscal year. 56 Comp. Gen. 351 (1977); 23 Comp. Gen. 862 (1944).

B. Criteria for Recording Obligations (31 U.S.C. § 1501)

The overrecording and the underrecording of obligations are equally improper. Overrecording (recording as obligations items which are not) is usually done to prevent appropriations from expiring at the end of a fiscal year. Underrecording (failing to record legitimate obligations) makes it impossible to determine the precise status of the appropriation and may result in violating the Antideficiency Act. A 1953 decision put it this way:

"In order to determine the status of appropriations, both from the viewpoint of management and the Congress, it is essential that obligations be recorded in the accounting records on a factual and consistent basis throughout the Government. Only by the following of sound practices in this regard can data on existing obligations serve to indicate program accomplishments and be related to the amount of additional appropriations required." 32 Comp. Gen. 436, 437 (1953).

The standards for the proper recording of obligations are found in 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a), originally enacted as section 1311 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1955 (68 Stat. 830). A Senate committee has described the origin of the statute as follows:

"Section 1311 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1955 resulted from the difficulty encountered by the House Appropriations Committee in obtaining reliable figures on obligations from the executive agencies in connection with the budget review. It was not uncommon for the committees to receive two or three different sets of figures as of the same date. This situation, together with rather vague explanations of certain types of obligations particularly in the military department[s], caused the House Committee on Appropriations to institute studies of agency obligating practices.

. . . .

"The result of these examinations laid the foundation for the committee's conclusion that loose practices had grown up in various agencies, particularly in the recording of obligations in situations where no real obligation existed, and that by reason of these practices the Congress did not have reliable information in the form of accurate obligations on which to determine an agency's future requirements. To correct this situation, the committee, with the cooperation of the General Accounting Office and the Bureau of the Budget, developed what has become the statutory criterion by which the validity of an obligation is determined. . . ."[1]

Thus, the primary purpose of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 is to ensure that agencies record only those transactions which meet specified

[1]Senate Committee on Government Operations, Financial Management in the Federal Government, S. Doc. No. 11, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 85 (1961).

considered as the maximum amount that may be expended for said purpose or object rather than an amount set apart exclusively therefor."[3]

By virtue of the "unless otherwise specified" clause, the provision does not apply to amounts within an appropriation which have their own specific earmarking "words of limitation" such as "exclusively." 31 Comp. Gen. 578 (1952).

If a lump-sum appropriation includes several particular objects and provides further that the appropriation "is to be accounted for as one fund" or "shall constitute one fund," then the individual amounts are not limitations, the only limitation being that the total amount of the lump-sum appropriation cannot be exceeded. However, individual items within that lump-sum appropriation that include the "not to exceed" language will still constitute maximum limitations. 22 Comp. Dec. 461 (1916); 3 Comp. Dec. 604 (1897); A-79741, August 7, 1936. The "one fund" language is still occasionally encountered, but has become uncommon.

If Congress wishes to specify a minimum for the particular object but not a maximum, the appropriation act may provide "Smoking materials, $1,000, of which not less than $100 shall be available for Cuban cigars." B-137353, December 3, 1959. See also 64 Comp. Gen. 388 (1985); B-131935, March 17, 1986. If the phrase "not less than" is used, in contrast with the "not to exceed" language, portions of the $100 not obligated for Cuban cigars may not be applied to the other objects of the appropriation. 64 Comp. Gen. at 394–95; B-128943, September 27, 1956.

Another phrase Congress often uses to earmark a portion of a lump-sum appropriation is "shall be available." There are variations. For example, our hypothetical $1,000 "smoking materials" appropriation may provide that, out of the $1,000, $100 "shall be available" or "shall be available only" or "shall be available exclusively" for Cuban cigars. Still another variation is "$1,000, including $100 for Cuban cigars."

If the "shall be available" phrase is combined with the maximum or minimum language noted above ("not to exceed," "not less than," standards for legitimate obligations. 54 Comp. Gen. 962, 964 (1975); 51 Comp. Gen. 631, 633 (1972); B-192036, September 11, 1978.[2]

Subsection (a) of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 prescribes specific criteria for recording obligations. The subsection begins by stating that "[a]n amount shall be recorded as an obligation of the United States Government only when supported by documentary evidence of . . . ." Subsection (a) then goes on to list nine criteria for recording obligations. Note that the statute requires "documentary evidence" to support the recording in each instance. In one sense, these nine criteria taken together may be said to comprise the "definition" of an obligation.[3]

If a given transaction does not meet any of the criteria, then it is not a proper obligation and may not be recorded as one. Once one of the criteria is met, however, the agency not only may but must at that point record the transaction as an obligation. While 31 U.S.C. § 1501 does not explicitly state that obligations must be recorded as they arise or are incurred, it follows logically from an agency's responsibility to comply with the Antideficiency Act. GAO has made the point in reports and decisions in various contexts. E.g., Substantial Understatement of Obligations for Separation Allowances for Foreign National Employees, B-179343, October 21, 1974, at 6; FGMSD-75-20, February 13, 1975, at 3 (letter report); 65 Comp. Gen. 4, 6 (1985); B-226801, March 2, 1988; B-192036, September 11, 1978; A-97205, February 3, 1944, at 10.

It is important to emphasize the relationship between the existence of an obligation and the act of recording. Recording evidences the obligation but does not create it. If a given transaction is not sufficient to constitute a valid obligation, recording it will not make it one. E.g., B-197274, February 16, 1982 ("reservation and notification" letter held not to constitute an obligation, act of recording notwithstanding, where letter did not impose legal liability on government and subsequent formation of contract was within agency's control). Conversely, failing to record a valid obligation in no way diminishes its validity or affects the fiscal year to which it is properly chargeable. E.g., B-226782, October 20, 1987 (letter of intent, executed in FY 1985 and found to constitute a contract, obligated FY 1985 funds, notwithstanding agency's failure to treat it as an obligation); 63 Comp. Gen. 525 (1984); 38 Comp. Gen. 81, 82–83 (1958).

[2]Although 31 U.S.C. § 1501 does not expressly apply to the government of the District of Columbia, GAO has expressed the view that the same criteria should be followed. B-180578-O.M., September 26, 1978. This is because the proper recording of obligations is the only way to assure compliance with 31 U.S.C. § 1341, a portion of the Antideficiency Act, which does expressly apply to the government of the District of Columbia. District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act (so-called "Home Rule" Act), Pub. L. No. 93-198, § 603(e), 87 Stat. 774, 815 (1973).

[3]Financial Management in the Federal Government, supra note 1, at 86.

The precise amount of the government's liability should be recorded as the obligation where that amount is known. However, where the precise amount is not known at the time the obligation is incurred, the obligation should be recorded on the basis of the agency's best estimate. E.g., 56 Comp. Gen. 414, 418 (1977) and cases cited therein; 21 Comp. Gen. 574 (1941). See also OMB Circular No. A-34, §§ 22.1, 22.2. Where an estimate is used, the basis for the estimate must be shown on the obligating document. As more precise data on the liability becomes available, the obligation must be periodically adjusted. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 3.4.D (1990).

Retroactive adjustments to recorded obligations, like the initial recordings themselves, must be supported by documentary evidence. The use of statistical methods to make adjustments "lacks legal foundation if the underlying transactions cannot be identified and do not support the calculated totals." GAO report, Financial Management: Defense Accounting Adjustments for Stock Fund Obligations Are Illegal, GAO/AFMD-87-1 (March 11, 1987) at 6; B-236940, October 17, 1989.

A related concept is the allocation of obligations for administrative expenses (utility costs, computer services, etc.) between or among programs funded under separate appropriations. There is no rule or formula for this allocation apart from the general prescription that the agency must use a supportable methodology. Merely relying on the approved budget is not sufficient. See GAO report, Financial Management: Improvements Needed in OSMRE's Method of Allocating Obligations, GAO/AFMD-89-89 (July 1989). An agency may initially charge common-use items to a single appropriation as long as it makes the appropriate adjustments from other benefiting appropriations before or as of the end of the fiscal year. 31 U.S.C. § 1534. The allocation must be in proportion to the benefit. 70 Comp. Gen. 592 (1991).

Further procedural guidance may be found in OMB Circular No. A-34 (Instructions for Budget Execution); the Treasury Financial Manual; and GAO's Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies. For the most part, the statutory criteria in 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) reflect standards that had been developed in prior decisions of the Comptroller General over the years. See, e.g., 18 Comp. Gen. 363 (1938); 16 Comp. Gen. 37 (1936). The remainder of this section will explore the nine specific recording criteria.

1. Subsection (a)(1): Contracts

Subsection (a)(1) of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 establishes minimum requirements for recording obligations for contracts. Specifically, there must be documentary evidence of—

"(1) a binding agreement between an agency and another person (including an agency) that is—

"(A) in writing, in a way and form, and for a purpose authorized by law; and

"(B) executed before the end of the period of availability for obligation of the appropriation or fund used for specific goods to be delivered, real property to be bought or leased, or work or service to be provided."

As seen in Chapter 5, the general rule for obligating fiscal year appropriations by contract is that the contract imposing the obligation must be made within the fiscal year sought to be charged and must meet a bona fide need of that fiscal year. E.g., 37 Comp. Gen. 155 (1957). This discussion will center on the timing of the obligation from the perspective of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1).

Subsection (a)(1) actually imposes several different requirements: (1) a binding agreement; (2) in writing; (3) for a purpose authorized by law; (4) executed before the expiration of the period of obligational availability; and (5) a contract calling for specific goods, real property, work, or services.

a. Binding Agreement

While the agreement must be legally binding (offer, acceptance, consideration, made by authorized official), it does not have to be the final "definitized" contract. The legislative history of subsection (a)(1) makes this clear. The following excerpt is taken from the conference report:

REV_00257336

"Section 1311(a)(1) precludes the recording of an obligation unless it is supported by documentary evidence of a binding agreement between the parties as specified therein. It is not necessary, however, that the binding agreement be the final formal contract on any specified form. The primary purpose is to require that there be an offer and an acceptance imposing liability on both parties. For example, an authorized order by one agency on another agency of the Government, if accepted by the latter and meeting the requirement of specificity, etc., is sufficient. Likewise, a letter of intent accepted by a contractor, if sufficiently specific and definitive to show the purposes and scope of the contract finally to be executed, would constitute the binding agreement required."[4]

The following passage from 42 Comp. Gen. 733, 734 (1963) remains a useful general prescription:

"The question whether Government funds are obligated at any specific time is answerable only in terms of an analysis of written arrangements and conditions agreed to by the United States and the party with whom it is dealing. If such analysis discloses a legal duty on the part of the United States which constitutes a legal liability or which could mature into a legal liability by virtue of actions on the part of the other party beyond the control of the United States, an obligation of funds may generally be stated to exist."

In 35 Comp. Gen. 319 (1955) and more recently in 59 Comp. Gen. 431 (1980), the Comptroller General set forth the factors that must be present in order for a binding agreement to exist for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) with respect to contracts awarded under competitive procedures:

1. Each bid must have been in writing.

2. The acceptance of each bid must have been communicated to the bidder in the same manner as the bid was made. If the bid was mailed, the contract must have been placed in the mails before the close of the fiscal year. If the bid was delivered other than by mail, the contract must have been delivered in like manner before the end of the fiscal year.

3. Each contract must have incorporated the terms and conditions of the respective bid without qualification. Otherwise, it must be viewed as a counteroffer and there would be no binding agreement until accepted by the contractor.

[4]H.R. Rep. No. 2663, 83d Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1954), quoted in B-118654, August 10, 1965.

To illustrate, where the agency notified the successful bidder of the award by telephone near the end of FY 1979 but did not mail the contract document until FY 1980, there was no valid obligation of FY 1979 funds. 59 Comp. Gen. 431 (1980). See also 35 Comp. Gen. 319 (1955).[5] A document is considered "mailed" when it is placed in the custody of the Postal Service (given to postman or dropped in mailbox or letter chute in office building); merely delivering the document to an agency messenger with instructions to mail it is insufficient. 59 Comp. Gen. at 433.

Similarly, there was no recordable obligation of FY 1960 funds where the agency erroneously mailed the notice of award to the wrong bidder and did not notify the successful bidder until the first day of FY 1961. 40 Comp. Gen. 147 (1960).

It is important to note that, in the above cases, the obligation was invalid only with respect to the fiscal year the agency wanted to charge. The agency could still proceed to finalize the obligation but would have to charge funds current in the subsequent fiscal year. 59 Comp. Gen. at 433; 40 Comp. Gen. at 148.

A mere request for an additional allocation with no indication of acceptance does not create a recordable obligation. 39 Comp. Gen. 829 (1960). Similarly, a work order or purchase order may be recorded as an obligation only where it constitutes a binding agreement for specific work or services. 34 Comp. Gen. 459 (1955).

A "letter of intent" is a preliminary document that may or may not constitute an obligation. At one extreme, it may be nothing more than an "agreement to agree" with neither party bound until execution of the formal contract. E.g., B-201035, February 15, 1984, at 5. At the other extreme, it may contain all the elements of a contract, in which event it will create binding obligations. The crucial question is whether the parties intended to be bound, determinable primarily from the language actually used. Saul Bass & Associates v. United States, 505 F.2d 1386 (Ct. Cl. 1974). For a good example of a letter

[5]This is a relatively rare situation in which the early decisions were somewhat more "liberal." E.g., A-28429, August 27, 1929 (FY 1929 funds held obligated where bids were solicited and received and the lowest bid authorized to be accepted during FY 1929 although formal contract not executed until early FY 1930). The explicit language of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 would preclude this result today, although use of a preliminary letter contract, discussed later in the text, would at least partially solve the problem.

of intent creating contractual obligations, see B-226782, October 20, 1987.

A letter of intent which amounts to a contract is also called a "letter contract." In the context of government procurement, it is used most commonly when there is insufficient time to prepare and execute the full contract before the end of the fiscal year. As indicated in the legislative history quoted earlier, a "letter of intent" accepted by the contractor may form the basis of an obligation if it is sufficiently specific and definitive to show the purpose and scope of the contract. 21 Comp. Gen. 574 (1941); B-127518, May 10, 1956. Letters of intent should be used "only under conditions of the utmost urgency." 33 Comp. Gen. 291, 293 (1954). Under the Federal Acquisition Regulation, letter contracts may be used—

"when (1) the Government's interests demand that the contractor be given a binding commitment so that work can start immediately and (2) negotiating a definitive contract is not possible in sufficient time to meet the requirement."

FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 16.603-2(a).

The amount to be obligated under a letter contract is the government's maximum liability under the letter contract itself, without regard to additional obligations anticipated to be included in the definitive contract or, restated, the amount necessary to cover expenses to be incurred by the contractor prior to execution of the definitive contract. The obligation is recorded against funds available for obligation at the time the letter contract is issued. 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 421 (1955); B-197274, September 23, 1983; B-197274, February 16, 1982; B-127518, May 10, 1956. See also FAR, 48 C.F.R. §§ 16.603-2(d) and 16.603-3(a).

Once the definitive contract is executed, the government's liability under the letter contract is merged into it. If definitization does not occur until the following fiscal year, the definitive contract will obligate funds of the latter year, usually in the amount of the total contract price less an appropriate deduction for obligations under the letter contract. B-197274, September 23, 1983. In this regard, the cited decision states, at page 5:

"The definitized contract then supports obligating against the appropriation current at the time it is entered into since it is, in fact, a bona fide need of that year. The amount of the definitized contract would ordinarily be the total contract cost less either the actual costs incurred under the letter contract (when known) or the amount of the maximum legal liability permitted by the letter contract (when the actual costs cannot be determined)."[6]

Letter contracts should be definitized within 180 days. FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 16.603-2(c). Also, letter contracts should not be used to record excess obligations as this distorts the agency's funding picture. See GAO report, Contract Pricing: Obligations Exceed Definitized Prices on Unpriced Contracts, GAO/NSIAD-86-128 (May 1986).

b. Contract "in Writing"

Although the binding agreement under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) must be "in writing," the "writing" is not necessarily limited to words on a piece of paper. The traditional mode of contract execution is to affix original handwritten signatures to a document (paper) setting forth the contract terms, and this is likely to remain the norm for the foreseeable future. Change is in the winds, however, and traditional interpretations are being reassessed in light of advancing computer technologies. In 1983, GAO's legal staff, in an internal memorandum to one of GAO's audit divisions, took note of modern legal trends and advised that the "in writing" requirement could be satisfied by computer-related media which produce tangible recordings of information, such as punch cards, magnetic cards, tapes, or disks. B-208863(2)-O.M., May 23, 1983.

Eight years later, the Comptroller General issued his first formal decision on the topic, 71 Comp. Gen. 109 (1991). The National Institute of Standards and Technology asked whether federal agencies could use certain Electronic Data Interchange (EDI) technologies to create valid contractual obligations for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a). Yes, replied the Comptroller, as long as there are adequate safeguards and controls to provide no less certainty and protection of the government's interests as under a "paper and ink" method. The decision states:

"We conclude that EDI systems using message authentication codes which follow NIST's Computer Data Authentication Standard (Federal Information Processing

[6]In the opinion of the editors, it is questionable whether, for obligation purposes, limiting the deduction to actual costs where known should be viewed as a general rule. Where the obligation under the letter contract is not excessive and is otherwise proper (meets bona fide needs test, etc.), it is arguable that the full obligation under the letter contract, even if not fully performed prior to definitization, should nevertheless stand as an obligation against the prior year's appropriation.

Standard (FIPS) 113) [footnote omitted] or digital signatures following NIST's Digital Signature Standard, as currently proposed, can produce a form of evidence that is acceptable under section 1501."

While there may be some room for interpretation as to what constitutes a "writing," the writing, in some acceptable form, must exist. Under the plain terms of the statute, an oral agreement may not be recorded as an obligation. In United States v. American Renaissance Lines, Inc., 494 F.2d 1059 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1020, the court found that 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) "establishes virtually a statute of frauds" for the government[7] and held that neither party can judicially enforce an oral contract in violation of the statute.

However, the Court of Claims and its successor, the Claims Court, have taken the position that 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) does not bar recovery "outside of the contract" where sufficient additional facts exist for the court to infer the necessary "meeting of minds" (contract implied-in-fact). Narva Harris Construction Corp. v. United States, 574 F.2d 508 (Ct. Cl. 1978); Johns-Manville Corp. v. United States, 12 Cl. Ct. 1, 19–20 (1987). Cf. Kinzley v. United States, 661 F.2d 187 (Ct. Cl. 1981). In addition, according to the Claims Court, it is also possible to have an express oral contract if the required elements are present– "mutuality of intent to be bound, definite offer, unconditional acceptance, and consideration"–and if the government official involved had actual authority to bind the government. Edwards v. United States, 22 Cl. Ct. 411, 420 (1991).

These would be examples of subsequently imposed liability where the agency did not record–and lawfully could not have recorded–an obligation when the events giving rise to the liability took place. If a contractor received a judgment in this type of situation, the obligational impact on the "contracting agency" would depend on whether the case was subject to the Contract Disputes Act. If the Act applies, the judgment would be payable initially from the permanent judgment appropriation (31 U.S.C. § 1304), to be reimbursed by the agency from currently available appropriations. If the Act does not apply, the judgment would be paid from the judgment appropriation

[7]A "statute of frauds" is a law requiring contracts to be in writing in order to be enforceable. Most, if not all, states have some version of such a statute. Strictly speaking, as the Comptroller General has noted, there is no federal statute of frauds. 39 Comp. Gen. 829, 831 (1960). See also 55 Comp. Gen. 833 (1976).

without reimbursement, and there would thus be no obligational impact on the agency.

In B-118654, August 10, 1965, GAO concluded that a notice of award signed by the contracting officer and issued before the close of the fiscal year did not satisfy the requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) where it incorporated modifications of the offer as to price and other terms which had been agreed to orally during negotiations. The reason is that there was no evidence in writing that the contractor had agreed to the modifications. GAO conceded, however, that the agency's argument that there was documentary evidence of a binding agreement for purposes of section 1501(a)(1) did have some merit. A similar issue arose in a 1977 case. While the decision implies (without mention of B-118654) that an obligation based on an award letter which incorporated telephone conversations relating to pricing might not be defeated if otherwise sufficient to satisfy 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1), the potential defect in any event would not afford a basis for a third party (in this case a protesting unsuccessful offeror) to object to the contract's legality. 56 Comp. Gen. 768, 775 (1977).

c. Requirement of Specificity

The statute requires documentary evidence of a binding agreement for specific goods or services. An agreement that fails this test is not a valid obligation.

For example, a State Department contract under the Migration and Refugee Assistance Program establishing a contingency fund "to provide funds for refugee assistance by any means, organization or other voluntary agency as determined by the Supervising Officer" did not meet the requirement of specificity and therefore was not a valid obligation. B-147196, April 5, 1965.

Similarly, a purchase order which lacks a description of the products to be provided is not sufficient to create a recordable obligation. B-196109, October 23, 1979. In the cited decision, a purchase order for "regulatory, warning, and guide signs based on information supplied" on requisitions to be issued did not validly obligate FY 1978 funds where the requisitions were not sent to the supplier until after the close of FY 1978.

d. Invalid Award/Unauthorized Commitment

Where a contract award is determined to be invalid, the effect is that no binding agreement ever existed as required by 31 U.S.C.

REV_00257342

§ 1501(a)(1) and therefore there was no valid obligation of funds. 38 Comp. Gen. 190 (1958); B-157360, August 11, 1965. Under more recent authorities discussed in Chapter 5, however, the original obligation is not extinguished for all purposes, and the funds remain available post-expiration to fund a valid "replacement contract." 70 Comp. Gen. 230 (1991); 68 Comp. Gen. 158 (1988). Where the invalidity is determined under a bid protest, which will presumably cover most such instances, the extended availability described in the GAO decisions is statutorily defined as 90 working days after the final ruling on the protest. 31 U.S.C. § 1558. Thus, cases like 38 Comp. Gen. 190 must be regarded as modified to this extent. Of course, the obligation does not survive post-expiration for anything other than a valid replacement contract.

Where the Comptroller General awards bid preparation costs to a successful protester under authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3554(c), payment should be charged to the agency's procurement appropriations current at the time GAO issued its decision. If the amount must be verified prior to payment, the agency should record an estimated obligation, using GAO's decision as the obligating document. Upon verification, the obligation is adjusted up or down as necessary, on the basis of the documents substantiating the amount. B-199368.4, January 19, 1983 (non-decision letter).

Claims resulting from unauthorized commitments raise obligation questions in two general situations. If the circumstances surrounding the unauthorized commitment are sufficient to give rise to a contract implied-in-fact, it may be possible for the agency to ratify the unauthorized act. If the ratification occurs in a subsequent fiscal year, the obligation is chargeable to the prior year, i.e., the year in which the need presumably arose and the claimant performed. B-208730, January 6, 1983. If ratification is not available for whatever reason, the only remaining possibility for payment is a quantum meruit recovery under a theory of contract implied-in-law. The quantum meruit theory permits payment in limited circumstances even in cases where there was no valid obligation, for example, where the contractor has made partial delivery operating under what he believed to be a valid contract. B-118428, September 21, 1954. The obligational impact is the same as for ratification—payment is chargeable to the fiscal year in which the claimant performed. B-210808, May 24, 1984; B-207557, July 11, 1983.

etc.), then the above rules apply and the phrase "shall be available" adds little. See, e.g., B-137353, December 3, 1959. However, if the earmarking phrase "shall be available" is used without the "not to exceed" or "not less than" modifiers, the rules are not quite as firm.

Cases interpreting the "shall be available" and "shall be available only" earmarks are somewhat less than consistent. The earlier decisions proclaimed "shall be available" to constitute a maximum but not a minimum (B-5526, September 14, 1939), although it could be a minimum if Congress clearly expressed that intent (B-128943, September 27, 1956). Later cases held the earmark to constitute both a maximum and a minimum which could neither be augmented nor diverted to other objects within the appropriation. B-137353, December 3, 1959; B-137353-O.M., October 14, 1958. Another early decision held summarily that "shall be available only" results in a maximum which cannot be augmented. 18 Comp. Gen. 1013 (1939). More recent decisions, however, have expressed the view that the effect of "shall be available only"—whether it is a maximum or a minimum—depends on the underlying congressional intent. 53 Comp. Gen. 695 (1974); B-142190, March 23, 1960. Applying this test, the earmark in 53 Comp. Gen. 695 was found to be a maximum; similar language was found to be a minimum which could be exceeded in B-142190 and in B-70933, March 1, 1948.

Thus, if the phrase "shall be available" may be said to contain an element of ambiguity, addition of the word "only" does not produce a plain meaning. The Claims Court, reviewing an authorization earmark for a Navy project known as RACER, commented:

> "[I]t is not apparent from the language of the authorization ($45 million 'is available only for') that Congress necessarily mandated the Navy to spend all $45 million on the RACER system. Rather, Congress may have merely intended to preclude the Navy from spending that $45 million on any other activities, i.e., the money would be forfeited if not spent on the RACER system."
> Solar Turbines, Inc. v. United States, 23 Cl. Ct. 142, 158 (1991).

Use of the word "exclusively" is somewhat more precise. The earmark "shall be available exclusively" is both a maximum which cannot be augmented from the general appropriation, and a minimum which cannot be diverted to other objects within the appropriation. B-102971, August 24, 1951. Once again, however, clearly expressed congressional intent can produce a different result. B-113272-O.M.,

e. Variations in Quantity to Be Furnished

In some types of contracts, the quantity of goods to be furnished or services to be performed may vary. The quantity may be indefinite or it may be stated in terms of a definite minimum with permissible variation. Variations may be at the option of the government or the contractor. The obligational treatment of this type of contract depends on the exact nature of the contractual liability imposed on the government.

Before proceeding, it is important to define some terms. A requirements contract is one in which the government agrees to purchase all of its needs for the particular item or service during the contract period from the contractor, and the contractor agrees to fill all such needs. An indefinite-quantity contract is one in which the contractor agrees to supply whatever quantity the government may order, within limits, with the government under no obligation to use that contractor for all of its requirements. FAR, 48 C.F.R. §§ 16.503(a), 16.504(a); Mason v. United States, 615 F.2d 1343 (Ct. Cl. 1980); Hemet Valley Flying Service Co. v. United States, 7 Cl. Ct. 512, 515–16 (1985). Under either type of contract, the government orders specific quantities from time to time by issuing a document variously termed a work order, task order, delivery order, etc.

In a requirements contract, the government must state a realistic and good faith estimate of its total anticipated requirements, based on the best and most current information available. 48 C.F.R. § 16.503(a)(1); B-190855, March 31, 1978; B-188426, September 20, 1977. Maximum and minimum quantities may be specified but are not required. 48 C.F.R. § 16.503(a)(2); B-226992.2, July 13, 1987; Unlimited Enterprises, Export-Import, Inc., ASBCA No. 34825, 88-3 BCA ¶ 20,908 (1988). Needs must relate to the contract period. 21 Comp. Gen. 961, 964 (1942).

If, in the exercise of good faith, the anticipated requirements simply do not materialize, the government is not obligated to purchase the stated estimate or indeed, if no requirements arise, to place any orders with the contractor beyond any required minimum. AGS-Genesys Corp., ASBCA No. 35302, 89-2 BCA ¶ 21,702 (1989); World Contractors, Inc., ASBCA No. 20354, 75-2 BCA ¶ 11,536 (1975); 47 Comp. Gen. 365, 370 (1968). The contractor assumes the risk that non-guaranteed requirements may fall short of expectations, and has no claim for a price adjustment if they do. Medart, Inc. v. Austin, 967 F.2d 579 (Fed. Cir. 1992); 37 Comp. Gen. 688 (1958). If, however, the government attempts to meet its requirements elsewhere, including the development of in-house capability, or if failure to place orders with the contractor for valid needs is otherwise found to evidence lack of good faith, liability will result. E.g., Torncello v. United States, 681 F.2d 756 (Ct. Cl. 1982); Cleek Aviation v. United States, 19 Cl. Ct. 552 (1990); Viktoria Transport GmbH & Co., ASBCA No. 30371, 88-3 BCA ¶ 20,921 (1988); California Bus Lines, ASBCA No. 19732, 75-2 BCA ¶ 11,601 (1975); Henry Angelo & Sons, Inc., ASBCA No. 15082, 72-1 BCA ¶ 9356 (1972); B-182266, April 1, 1975.

An indefinite-quantity contract, under current regulations, must include a minimum purchase requirement which must be more than nominal. 48 C.F.R. § 16.504(a). An indefinite-quantity contract without a minimum purchase requirement is regarded as illusory and unenforceable. It is no contract at all. Mason v. United States, 615 F.2d at 1346 n.5; Torncello v. United States, 681 F.2d at 761; Modern Systems Technology Corp. v. United States, 24 Cl. Ct. 360 (1991). Apart from the specified minimum, the government is free to obtain its requirements from other contractors. Government Contract Services, Inc., GSBCA No. 8447, 88-1 BCA ¶ 20,255 (1987); Alta Construction Co., PSBCA No. 1395, 87-2 BCA ¶ 19,720 (1987).

What does all this signify from the perspective of obligating appropriations? As we noted at the outset, the obligational impact of a variable quantity contract depends on exactly what the government has bound itself to do. A fairly simple generalization can be deduced from the decisions: In a variable quantity contract (requirements or indefinite-quantity), any required minimum purchase must be obligated when the contract is executed; subsequent obligations occur as work orders or delivery orders are placed, and are chargeable to the fiscal year in which the order is placed.

Thus, in a variable quantity contract with no guaranteed minimum—or any analogous situation in which there is no liability unless and until an order is placed—there would be no recordable obligation at the time of award. 63 Comp. Gen. 129 (1983); 60 Comp. Gen. 219

(1981); 34 Comp. Gen. 459, 462 (1955); B-124901, October 26, 1955 ("call contract").[8] Obligations are recorded as orders are placed.

The same approach applies to a contract for a fixed quantity in which the government reserves an option to purchase an additional quantity. The contract price for the fixed quantity is an obligation at the time the contract is entered into; the reservation of the option ripens into an obligation only if and when the government exercises the option. 19 Comp. Gen. 980 (1940).

A more recent application of these concepts is B-192036, September 11, 1978. The National Park Service entered into a construction contract for the development of a national historic site. Part of the contract price was a "contingent sum" of $25,000 for "Force Account Work," described in the contract as miscellaneous items of a minor nature not included in the bid schedule. No "Force Account Work" was to be done except under written orders issued by the contracting officer. Since a written order was required for the performance of work, no part of the $25,000 could be recorded as an obligation unless and until such orders were issued and accepted by the contractor. That portion of the master contract itself which provided for the Force Account Work was not sufficiently specific to create an obligation.

In a 1955 case, the Army entered into a contract for the procurement of lumber. The contract contained a clause permitting a ten-percent overshipment or undershipment of the quantity ordered. This type of clause was standard in lumber procurement contracts. The Comptroller General held that the Army could obligate the amount necessary to pay for the maximum quantities deliverable under the contract. 34 Comp. Gen. 596 (1955). Here, the quantity was definite and the government was required to accept the permissible variation.

In another 1955 case, the General Services Administration had published in the Federal Register an offer to purchase chrome ore up to a stated maximum quantity. Formal agreements would not be executed until producers made actual tenders of the ore. The program

[8]As cases such as 63 Comp. Gen. 129 illustrate, there can be many variations on the basic indefinite-quantity theme. It should not be assumed that every variation will violate the current FAR minimum purchase requirement.

published in the Federal Register was a mere offer to purchase and GSA could not obligate funds to cover the total quantity authorized. Reason: there was no mutual assent and therefore no binding agreement in writing until a producer responded to the offer and a formal contract was executed. B-125644, November 21, 1955.

So-called "level of effort" contracts are conceptually related to the "variation in quantity" cases. In one case, the Environmental Protection Agency entered into a cost-plus-fixed-fee contract for various services at an EPA facility. The contractor's contractual obligation was expressed as a "level of effort" in terms of staff-hours. The contractor was to provide up to a stated maximum number of direct staff-hours, to be applied on the basis of work orders issued during the course of the contract. Since the government was obligated under the contract to order specific tasks, the contract was sufficiently definitive to justify recording the full estimated contract amount at the time of award. B-183184, May 30, 1975. See also 58 Comp. Gen. 471, 474 (1979); B-199422, June 22, 1981 (non-decision letter).

f. Amount to Be Recorded

In the simple firm fixed-price contract, the amount to be recorded presents no problem. The contract price is the recordable obligation. However, in many types of contracts, the final contract price cannot be known at the time of award and an estimate must be recorded. The basic principle—record your best estimate, adjusting the obligation up or down periodically as more precise information becomes available—has already been summarized in our preliminary discussion of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a).

Under a fixed-price contract with escalation, price redetermination, or incentive provisions, the amount to be obligated initially is the fixed price stated in the contract or the target price in the case, for example, of a contract with an incentive clause. 34 Comp. Gen. 418 (1955); B-133170, January 29, 1975; B-206283-O.M., February 17, 1983. Thus, in an incentive contract with a target price of $85 million and a ceiling price of $100 million, the proper amount to record initially as an obligation is the target price of $85 million. 55 Comp. Gen. 812, 824 (1976).

When obligations are recorded based on a target price, the agency should establish appropriate safeguards to guard against violations of the Antideficiency Act. This usually means the administrative reservation of sufficient funds to cover potential liability. 34 Comp. Gen. 418 at 420–21; B-206283-O.M., February 17, 1983.

g. Administrative Approval of Payment

In some cases, the contractual arrangement or related statutory or regulatory requirements may provide a process for administrative review and approval as a prerequisite to payment. This may or may not affect the obligational process, depending on the purpose of the review. (The review and approval here refers to a process in addition to the normal review and approval of the voucher by a certifying officer which is always required.)

To illustrate, in 46 Comp. Gen. 895 (1967), GAO approved a Veterans Administration procedure under which charges for fee-basis outpatient treatment of eligible veterans would be recorded as obligations at the time VA administratively approved the vouchers. Since the review and approval process was necessary to determine whether the government should accept liability, no contractual obligation arose until that time. See also B-133944, January 31, 1958, and B-92679, July 24, 1950.

A 1977 case, B-137762.32, July 11, 1977, will further illustrate the concept. The case concerned a contract between the Internal Revenue Service and an informant. Under IRS regulations, there is no liability to make payment until IRS has evaluated the worth of the information and has assessed and collected any underpaid taxes and penalties. It is at this point that an appropriate IRS official determines that a reward should be paid and its amount, and it is at this point that a recordable obligation arises.

By way of contrast, the obligation for a court-appointed attorney under the Criminal Justice Act occurs at the time of appointment and not when the court approves the payment voucher, even though the exact amount of the obligation is not determinable until the voucher is approved. This is because the government becomes contractually liable by the order of appointment, with subsequent court review of the voucher intended only to insure the reasonableness of the expenses incurred. Thus, payment must be charged to the fiscal year in which the appointment was made. 50 Comp. Gen. 589 (1971).

h. Miscellaneous Contractual Obligations

The core issue in many of the previously discussed cases has been when a given transaction ripens into a recordable obligation, that is, precisely when the "definite commitment" occurs. Many of the cases do not fit neatly into categories. Rather, the answer must be derived by analyzing the nature of the contractual or statutory commitments in the particular case.

A 1979 case dealt with a lease arrangement entered into by the Peace Corps in Korea. Under a particular type of lease recognized by Korean law, the lessee does not make installment rental payments. Instead, the lessee makes an initial payment of approximately 50 percent of the assessed valuation of the property. At the end of the lease, the lessor is required to return the entire initial payment. The lessor makes his profit by investing the initial payment at the local interest rate. Since the lease is a binding contractual commitment and since the entire amount of the initial payment may not be recoverable for a number of reasons, GAO found it improper to treat the initial payment as a mere advance or an account receivable (as in the case of travel advances) and thus not reflected as an obligation. Rather, the amount of the initial payment must be recorded as an obligation chargeable to the fiscal year in which the lease is entered into, with subsequent returns to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. B-192282, April 18, 1979.

Several cases deal with court-related obligations. For example, the obligation for fees of jurors—including retroactive increases authorized by 28 U.S.C. § 1871—occurs at the time the jury service is performed. 54 Comp. Gen. 472 (1974). See also 50 Comp. Gen. 589 (1971), dealing with obligations under the Criminal Justice Act, discussed above under "Administrative Approval of Payment."

The recording of obligations for land commissioners appointed to determine just compensation in land condemnation cases was discussed in B-184782, February 26, 1976, and 56 Comp. Gen. 414 (1977). The rules derived from these decisions are as follows:

- The obligation occurs at the time of appointment and is chargeable to the fiscal year of appointment if a specific case is referred to the commission in that fiscal year.
- Pendency of an action will satisfy the bona fide needs rule and will be sufficient to support the obligation even though services are not actually performed until the following fiscal year.
- Appointment of a "continuous" land commission creates no obligation until a particular action is referred to it.

REV_00257349

- An amended court order increasing the compensation of a particular commissioner amounts to a new obligation and the full compensation is chargeable to the appropriation current at the time of the amended order.
- A valid obligation occurs under the above principles even though the order of appointment does not expressly charge the costs to the United States because, under the Constitution, the costs cannot be assessed against the condemnee.

(Beginning with fiscal year 1978, the appropriation to compensate land commissioners was switched from the Justice Department to the Judiciary and since then has been a no-year appropriation. We retain the above summary here to illustrate the analysis and because it may have use by analogy in similar situations.)

i. Interagency Transactions

It is not uncommon for federal agencies to provide goods or services to other federal agencies. Subsection (a)(1) of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 expressly applies to interagency contracts. This, however, does not embrace all interagency transactions. When an agency obtains goods or services from another agency, the obligational treatment of the transaction depends on whether or not the order is "required by law" to be placed with the other agency. If it is "required by law," the transaction is governed by subsection (a)(3) of 31 U.S.C. § 1501, discussed later in this section. If it is not "required by law," subsection (a)(1) applies. Interagency orders not required by law are sometimes termed "voluntary orders." Thus, except for "required by law" situations, the recording criteria are the same whether the contract is with a private party or another federal agency.

(1) Economy Act vs. other authority

A major source of authority for voluntary interagency agreements is the Economy Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1535. An Economy Act agreement—assuming it meets the criteria of subsection (a)(1)—is recorded as an obligation the same as any other contract.[9] However, Economy Act agreements are subject to one additional requirement. Under 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d), the period of availability of funds transferred pursuant to an Economy Act agreement may not exceed the period of availability of the source appropriation. Thus, one-year appropriations obligated by an Economy Act agreement must be deobligated at the end of the fiscal year charged to the extent that the performing agency has not performed or incurred valid obligations under the agreement. 39 Comp. Gen. 317 (1959); 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 421–22 (1955). It was, for example, improper for the Library of Congress to use annual funds transferred to it under Economy Act agreements and unobligated by it prior to the end of the fiscal year to provide services in the following fiscal year. Financial Audit: First Audit of the Library of Congress Discloses Significant Problems, GAO/AFMD-91-13 (August 1991). The reason for this requirement is to prevent the Economy Act from being used to extend the obligational life of an appropriation beyond that provided by Congress in the appropriation act. 31 Comp. Gen. 83, 85 (1951). The deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) does not apply to obligations against no-year appropriations. 39 Comp. Gen. 317, 319 (1959).

Where the agreement is based on some statutory authority other than the Economy Act, the recording of the obligation is still governed by 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1). However, 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) does not apply. In this situation, the obligation will remain payable in full from the appropriation initially charged, regardless of when performance occurs, in the same manner as contractual obligations generally, subject, of course, to the bona fide needs rule and to any restrictions in the legislation authorizing the agreement. Thus, it is necessary to determine the correct statutory authority for any interagency agreement in order to apply the proper obligational principles.

[9]The determination of whether an interagency agreement is "binding" for purposes of recording under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) is made in the same manner as if the contract were with a private party—examining precisely what the parties have "committed" themselves to do under the terms of the agreement. However, an agreement between two government agencies cannot be legally "enforced" against a defaulting agency in the sense of compelling performance or obtaining damages. Enforcement against another agency is largely a matter of comity and good faith. Thus, the term "binding" in the context of interagency agreements reflects the undertakings expressed in the agreement without regard to the legal consequences (or lack thereof) of non-performance.

The following three cases, involving interagency provision of services, will illustrate these principles.

- Agreement under which funds were transferred from Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to Federal Aviation Administration to provide training for air traffic control trainees was found authorized by Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962 rather than Economy Act. Therefore, while initial recording of obligation was governed by 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1), funds remained available for further obligation by FAA subject to time limits of Manpower Act rather than deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d). 51 Comp. Gen. 766 (1972).
- Agreement entered into in FY 1976 between Administrative Office of U.S. Courts and General Services Administration for design and implementation of automated payroll system was authorized by Federal Property and Administrative Services Act rather than Economy Act. Since agreement met requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1), it was properly recordable as a valid obligation against FY 1976 funds and was not subject to 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d). 55 Comp. Gen. 1497 (1976).
- Army Corps of Engineers entered into agreement with Department of Housing and Urban Development to perform flood insurance studies pursuant to orders placed by HUD. Since the agreement presumably required the Corps to perform as HUD placed the orders, a recordable obligation would arise when HUD placed an order under the agreement. Since agreement was authorized by National Flood Insurance Act rather than Economy Act, funds obligated by order would remain obligated even though Corps did not complete performance (or contract out for it) until following fiscal year. B-167790, September 22, 1977.

A voluntary interagency order for goods is subject to the same basic rules as a voluntary interagency order for services. If the order is governed by the Economy Act and otherwise meets the criteria of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1), it is recordable as an obligation when the order is placed but is subject to the deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d). If the order is not governed by the Economy Act, it constitutes an obligation only to the extent that the performing agency has completed the work or has awarded contracts to fill the order. For example, Military Interdepartmental Procurement Requests (MIPR) are viewed as authorized by the Economy Act. Therefore, while a MIPR may be initially recorded as an obligation under 31 U.S.C.

§ 1501(a)(1), it is subject to the deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) and is thus ultimately chargeable to appropriations current when the performing component incurs valid obligations. 59 Comp. Gen. 563 (1980); 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 422 (1955).

Regardless of the statutory basis for the agreement, an obligation is recordable under subsection (a)(1) only if the criteria of that subsection—binding agreement, sufficiently specific, etc.—are met.

In B-193005, October 2, 1978, GAO considered the procurement of crude oil for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act, the General Services Administration may procure materials for other federal agencies and may delegate this authority. GSA had delegated the authority to procure fuel commodities to the Secretary of Defense. Thus, the Department of Energy could procure the oil through the Defense Fuel Supply Center in a non-Economy Act transaction. An order placed by the Department of Energy could be recorded as an obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) if it constituted a "binding agreement," and the funds would remain available for contracts awarded by Defense beyond the original period of obligational availability.[10] This result would have been precluded by 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) had the transaction been governed by the Economy Act. An order would constitute a binding agreement for recording purposes if accepted by the requisitioned agency, or if the requisitioned agency were required to perform under the terms of a "master" agreement.

In 59 Comp. Gen. 602 (1980), GAO considered the procedure by which the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms ordered "strip stamps" from the Bureau of Engraving. (These are the excise tax stamps one sees pasted across the caps of liquor bottles.) GAO reviewed pertinent legislation and concluded that ATF was not "required by law" to procure its strip stamps from the Bureau of Engraving. Since individual orders were not binding agreements, it was essentially immaterial in one important respect whether the order was governed by the Economy Act or some other law; in neither event could ATF's funds remain obligated beyond the last day of a fiscal [10]In a subsequent letter to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the Comptroller General pointed out that the 1978 decision would not affect the applicability of the Impoundment Control Act to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve program since the statutory definition of "deferral" applies to expenditures as well as obligations. B-200685, December 23, 1980.

May 21, 1953; B-111392-O.M., October 17, 1952 (earmark held to be a minimum only in both cases).

Similarly, the term "including" has been held to establish both a maximum and a minimum. A-99732, January 13, 1939. As such, it cannot be augmented from a more general appropriation (19 Comp. Gen. 892 (1940)), nor can it be diverted to other uses within the appropriation (67 Comp. Gen. 401 (1988)).

To sum up, the most effective way to establish a maximum (but not minimum) earmark is by the words "not to exceed" or "not more than." The words "not less than" most effectively establish a minimum (but not maximum). These are all phrases with well-settled plain meanings. The "shall be available" family of earmarking language presumptively "fences in" the earmarked sum (both maximum and minimum), but is more subject to variation based upon underlying congressional intent.

Our discussion thus far has centered on the use of earmarking language to prescribe the amount available for a particular object. Earmarking language may also be used to vary the period of availability for obligation. An illustrative case is B-231711, March 28, 1989 (appropriation provision earmarked portion of lump sum to remain available for an additional fiscal year, but was neither maximum nor minimum limitation on amount available for particular object).

Finally, earmarking language may be found in authorization acts as well as appropriation acts. The same meanings apply. Several of the cases cited above involve authorization acts, e.g., 64 Comp. Gen. 388 (1985) and B-131935, March 17, 1986.

year to the extent an order remained unfilled. Funds could be considered obligated at the end of a fiscal year only to the extent that stamps were printed or in process or that the Bureau of Engraving had entered into a contract with a third party to provide them.

Thus, a voluntary interagency order, whether authorized by the Economy Act or some other law, is recordable under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1) only if it constitutes a binding agreement and meets the other criteria of that subsection. If it does, the applicability or non-applicability of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) then becomes relevant. If it does not, the order constitutes an obligation only to the extent the performing agency has completed the work or has awarded contracts to have it done. In addition to 59 Comp. Gen. 602 and B-193005, see 39 Comp. Gen. 829 (1960); 34 Comp. Gen. 705, 708 (1955); 23 Comp. Gen. 88 (1943); B-180578-O.M., September 26, 1978.

Similarly, an order for an item not stocked by the requisitioned agency (or, if out of stock, not routinely on order) is not a recordable obligation until the requisitioned agency purchases the item or executes a contract for it. The reason is that the order is not a binding agreement. It is merely an offer which is accepted by the requisitioned agency's performance. The basic rules in this area were established by 34 Comp. Gen. 705 (1955).

(2) Orders from stock

The obligational treatment of orders for items to be delivered from stock of the requisitioned agency derives from 32 Comp. Gen. 436 (1953). An order for items to be delivered from stock is a recordable obligation if (1) it is intended to meet a bona fide need of the fiscal year in which the order is placed or to replace stock used in that fiscal year,[11] and (2) the order is firm and complete. To be firm and complete, the order must request prompt delivery of specific available stock items for a stated consideration and must be accepted by the supplying agency in writing. "Available" means on hand or routinely on order. However, acceptance is not required for common-use stock items which are on hand or on order and will be delivered promptly.

[11]The fact that the replacement stock will not be used until the following year will not defeat an otherwise valid obligation. See 44 Comp. Gen. 695 (1965).

Although these rules were developed prior to the enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1), they continue to govern the recording of obligations under that statute. 34 Comp. Gen. 705 (1955); 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 422 (1955). Materials which are specially created for a particular purpose are not "stock." 44 Comp. Gen. 695 (1965).

(3) Project orders

"Project orders" are authorized by 41 U.S.C. § 23, which provides:

> "All orders or contracts for work or material or for the manufacture of material pertaining to approved projects heretofore or hereafter placed with Government-owned establishments shall be considered as obligations in the same manner as provided for similar orders or contracts placed with commercial manufacturers or private contractors, and the appropriations shall remain available for the payment of the obligations so created as in the case of contracts or orders with commercial manufacturers or private contractors."[12]

This statute, derived from earlier appropriation act provisions appearing shortly after World War I, applies only to the military departments, although the orders may be placed with any "Government-owned establishment." B-95760, June 27, 1950.[13] Precisely why the statute was enacted is not clear. Some discussion of its origins may be found in 26 Comp. Dec. 1022 (1920). The Coast Guard has virtually identical authority in 14 U.S.C. § 151.

A project order is a valid and recordable obligation when the order is issued and accepted, regardless of the fact that performance may not be accomplished until after the expiration of the fiscal year. 1 Comp. Gen. 175 (1921); B-135037-O.M., June 19, 1958. The statute does not, however, authorize the use of the appropriations so obligated for the purpose of replenishing stock used in connection with the order. A-25603, May 15, 1929. The requirement of specificity applies to project orders the same as any other recordable obligations under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(1). B-126405, May 21, 1957.

[12]The term "approved projects," as used in 41 U.S.C. § 23, has no special meaning. It refers simply to "projects that have been approved by officials having legal authority to do so." B-171049-O.M., February 17, 1972. Cf. 26 Comp. Dec. 1022, 1023–24 (1920).

[13]The rationale of B-95760 is not clearly stated. The provision first appeared as permanent authority in the Army's FY 1921 appropriation (41 Stat. 975). Had it been intended to apply to all agencies, it would not have been necessary to repeat it for the Navy in 1922 (42 Stat. 812) and the Coast Guard in 1942 (56 Stat. 328).

Since a project order is not an Economy Act transaction, the deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) does not apply. 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 422 (1955). See also 16 Comp. Gen. 752 (1937). Also, unlike the Economy Act, 41 U.S.C. § 23 does not authorize advance payment. Thus, advance payment for project orders is not authorized unless permitted by some other statute. B-95760, June 27, 1950.

2. Subsection (a)(2): Loans

Under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(2), a recordable obligation exists when there is documentary evidence of "a loan agreement showing the amount and terms of repayment."

A loan agreement is essentially contractual in nature. Thus, to have a valid obligation, there must be a proposal by one party and an acceptance by another. Approval of the loan application must be communicated to the applicant within the fiscal year sought to be charged, and there must be documentary evidence of that communication. B-159999-O.M., March 16, 1967. Where a loan application is made in one fiscal year and approval is not communicated to the applicant until the following fiscal year, the obligation is chargeable to the later year. Id.; B-159999-O.M., December 14, 1966.

Telegraphic notification of approval of a loan application where the amount of the loan and terms of repayment are thereby agreed upon is legally acceptable. B-159999-O.M., December 14, 1966.

To support a recordable obligation under subsection (a)(2), the agreement must be sufficiently definite and specific, just as in the case of subsection (a)(1) obligations. To illustrate, the United States and the government of Brazil entered into a loan agreement in 1964. As a condition precedent to any disbursement under the agreement, Brazil was to furnish a statement covering utilization of the funds. The funds were to be used for various economic and social development projects "as may, from time to time, be agreed upon in writing" by the governments of the United States and Brazil. While the loan agreement constituted a valid binding contract, it was not sufficiently definite or specific to validly obligate FY 1964 funds. The basic agreement was little more than an "agreement to agree," and an obligation of funds could arise only when a particular "utilization statement" was submitted and approved. B-155708-O.M., April 26, 1965.

Prior to fiscal year 1992, the amount to be recorded in the case of a loan was quite simple—the face amount of the loan. From the budgetary perspective, this was undesirable because the obligation was indistinguishable from any other cash outlay. By disregarding at the obligational stage the fact that loans are supposed to be repaid, this treatment did not reflect the true cost to the government of direct loan programs. Congress addressed the situation in the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990, enacted as section 13201 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508, 104 Stat. 1388, 1388-609, and codified at 2 U.S.C. §§ 661—661f (Supp. III 1991). The general approach of the FCRA is to require the advance provision of budget authority to cover the subsidy portion of direct loans (in recognition of the fact that not all loans are repaid), with the non-subsidy portion (the portion expected to be repaid) financed through borrowings from the Treasury. The Office of Management and Budget has issued detailed implementing instructions in OMB Circular No. A-34, Part VI (1991). The FCRA applies to new direct loan obligations incurred on or after October 1, 1991.

FCRA defines "direct loan" as "a disbursement of funds by the Government to a non-Federal borrower under a contract that requires the repayment of such funds with or without interest." 2 U.S.C. § 661a(1). A direct loan obligation is "a binding agreement by a Federal agency to make a direct loan when specified conditions are fulfilled by the borrower." Id. § 661a(2). The "cost" of a direct loan is the estimated long-term cost to the government, taking into consideration disbursements and repayments, calculated on a net present value basis at the time of disbursement. Id. § 661a(5).

Unless otherwise provided by statute, new direct loan obligations may be incurred only to the extent that budget authority to cover their costs is provided in advance. Id. § 661c(b). Under this provision, the typical appropriation will include both an appropriation of budget authority for the subsidy costs and a program ceiling (total face amount of loans supportable by the cost appropriation). The appropriation is made to a "program account." When a direct loan obligation is incurred, its cost is obligated against the program account. The actual financing is done through a revolving, non-budget "financing account." Loan repayments are credited to the financing account. See generally OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.6. The overobligation or overexpenditure of either the loan subsidy or the credit level supportable by the enacted subsidy violates the Antideficiency Act. Id. § 63.2.

3. Subsection (a)(3): Interagency Orders Required by Law

The third standard for recording obligations, 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(3), is "an order required by law to be placed with [a federal] agency."

Subsection (a)(3) means exactly what it says. An order placed with another government agency is recordable under this subsection only if it is required by statute or statutory regulation to be placed with the other agency. The subsection does not apply to orders which are merely authorized rather than required. 34 Comp. Gen. 705 (1955).

An order required by law to be placed with another agency is not an Economy Act transaction. Therefore, the deobligation requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d) does not apply. 35 Comp. Gen. 3, 5 (1955).

The fact that the work will be performed in the next fiscal year does not defeat the obligation as long as the bona fide need test is met. 59 Comp. Gen. 386 (1980); 35 Comp. Gen. 3 (1955). Also, the fact that the work is to be accomplished and reimbursement made through use of a revolving fund is immaterial. 35 Comp. Gen. 3 (1955); 34 Comp. Gen. 705 (1955).

A common example of "orders required by law" is printing and binding to be done by the Government Printing Office. The rule is that a requisition for printing services may be recorded as an obligation when placed if (1) there is a present need for the printing, and (2) the requisition is accompanied by copy or specifications sufficient for GPO to proceed with the job.

Thus, a requisition by the Commission on Fine Arts for the printing of "Sixteenth Street Architecture, Volume I" placed with GPO in FY 1977 and accompanied by manuscript and specifications obligated FY 1977 funds and was chargeable in its entirety to FY 1977, notwithstanding that the printing would be done in the following fiscal year. 59 Comp. Gen. 386 (1980). However, a requisition for U.S. Travel Service sales promotional literature placed with GPO near the end of FY 1964 did not obligate FY 1964 funds where no copy or manuscript was furnished to GPO until FY 1965. 44 Comp. Gen. 695 (1965). For other printing cases illustrating these rules, see 29 Comp. Gen. 489 (1950); 23 Comp. Gen. 82 (1943); B-154277, June 5, 1964; B-123964, August 23, 1955; B-114619, April 17, 1953; B-50663, June 30, 1945; B-35807, August 10, 1943; B-35967, August 4, 1943; B-34888, June 21, 1943.

An agency may use a printing estimate furnished by GPO to establish the level of funds to be obligated pending receipt of a bill reflecting actual cost. However, the printing estimate alone, even if written, unaccompanied by the placement of an order, is not sufficient to create a valid and recordable obligation. B-182081, January 26, 1977, affirmed in B-182081, February 14, 1979. In the cited decision, there was no valid obligation before the ordering commission went out of existence and its appropriations ceased to be available for further obligation. Therefore, there was no appropriation available to reimburse GPO for work done under the invalid purported obligation.

GPO is required by law to print certain congressional materials such as the Congressional Record, and receives a "Printing and Binding" appropriation for this purpose. For such items where no further request or authorization is required, a copy of the basic law authorizing the printing plus a copy of the appropriation constitute the obligating documents. B-123964, August 23, 1955.

Another common "order required by law" situation is building alteration, management, and related services to be performed by the General Services Administration. For example, a job order by the Social Security Administration for building repairs validly obligated funds of the fiscal year in which the order was placed, by virtue of subsection (a)(3), notwithstanding that GSA was unable to perform the work until the following fiscal year. 35 Comp. Gen. 3 (1955). See also B-158374, February 21, 1966. However, this result assumes compliance with the bona fide need concept. Thus, an agreement for work incident to the relocation of Federal Power Commission employees placed in FY 1971 did not validly obligate FY 1971 funds where it was clear that the relocation was not required to, and would not, take place, nor would the space in question be made tenantable, until the following fiscal year. B-95136-O.M., August 11, 1972. Orders placed with GSA are further discussed in 34 Comp. Gen. 705 (1955).

As noted earlier, GAO has expressed the view that the recording criteria of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) should be followed in evaluating obligations of the government of the District of Columbia. Thus, orders by a department of the D.C. government for repairs and improvements which are required by statute or statutory regulation to be placed with the D.C. Department of General Services and performed through use of the Repairs and Improvements Working Fund create valid obligations when the orders are placed. B-180578-O.M., September 26, 1978.

4. Subsection (a)(4): Orders Without Advertising

The fourth recording standard in 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) is—

"an order issued under a law authorizing purchases without advertising (A) when necessary because of a public exigency; (B) for perishable subsistence supplies; or (C) within specific monetary limits."

Subsection (a)(4) is limited to statutorily authorized purchases without advertising in the three situations specified. The subsection must be self-explanatory as there appear to be no Comptroller General decisions under it.

5. Subsection (a)(5): Grants and Subsidies

In the case of federal assistance program funds, 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(5) requires that the obligation be supported by documentary evidence of a grant or subsidy payable:

"(A) from appropriations made for payment of, or contributions to, amounts required to be paid in specific amounts fixed by law or under formulas prescribed by law;

"(B) under an agreement authorized by law; or

"(C) under plans approved consistent with and authorized by law."

a. Grants

In order to properly obligate an appropriation for an assistance program, some action creating a definite liability against the appropriation must occur during the period of the obligational availability of the appropriation. In the case of grants, the obligating action will usually be the execution of a grant agreement. The particular document will vary and may be in the form of an agency's approval of a grant application or a letter of commitment. See 39 Comp. Gen. 317 (1959); 37 Comp. Gen. 861, 863 (1958); 31 Comp. Gen. 608 (1952); B-128190, June 2, 1958; B-114868.01-O.M., March 17, 1976.

REV_00257360

In this connection, GAO's Accounting Principles and Standards state:

"Accounting for a federal assistance award begins with the execution of an agreement or the approval of an application or similar document in which the amount and purposes of the grant, the performance periods, the obligations of the parties to the award, and other terms are set out. A legal obligation to disburse the assistance funds, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, generally occurs with an executed agreement or an approved application or similar document."[14]

As a general proposition, four requirements must be met to properly obligate assistance funds:

- There must be some action to establish a firm commitment on the part of the United States.
- The commitment must be unconditional on the part of the United States. See 50 Comp. Gen. 857, 862 (1971).
- There must be documentary evidence of the commitment. Champaign County v. Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, 611 F.2d 1200 (7th Cir. 1979) (court refused to regard documentation requirement as "form over substance"); B-126372, September 18, 1956.
- The award terms must be communicated to the official grantee, and where the grantee is required to comply with certain prerequisites, such as putting up matching funds, it must also be accepted by the grantee during the period of availability of the grant funds.

An illustration of this latter requirement is B-220527, December 16, 1985. The Economic Development Administration made an "offer of grant" to a Connecticut municipality which would have required a substantial outlay of funds by the municipality. The offer was accepted by a town official who had no authority to accept the grant. By its own municipal ordinance, only the town council could accept a grant offer. By the time the town marshalled the resources to fulfill its obligations under the grant and the unauthorized acceptance was ratified by the town council, the funds had expired for obligational purposes. GAO held that no valid grant obligation on the part of the government had ever been made. See also B-164990, January 10, 1969, finding an attempted obligation invalid where the program legislation required approval of a proposed grant by the state [14]GAO Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, Title 2, Appendix I, § G10, para. .03 (1984).

governor and he had not yet agreed, even though the award instruments had already been executed.

Once the appropriation has been properly obligated, performance and the actual disbursement of funds may carry over beyond the period of obligational availability. 31 Comp. Gen. 608, 610 (1952); 20 Comp. Gen. 370 (1941); B-37609, November 15, 1943; B-24827, April 3, 1942; B-124374-O.M., January 26, 1956.

Applying the above principles, the Comptroller General found that a document entitled "Approval and Award of Grant" used by the Economic Development Administration was sufficient for recording grant obligations under the local public works program because it "reflects the Administration's acceptance of a grant application; specifies the project approved and the amount of funding; and imposes a deadline for affirmation by the grantee." B-126652, August 30, 1977.

If the above requirements are not met, then the appropriation is not validly obligated. Thus, the Comptroller General found an attempted obligation invalid in B-164990, September 6, 1968, where the grantee corporation was not in existence when the obligation was recorded. Also, the relevant program legislation must be examined to see if there are any additional requirements.

The preceding cases mostly involve obligations evidenced by the issuance of an award instrument. Questions may also arise over exactly when an obligation "fixed by law" or under a required plan takes place. For example, under the Medicaid program, the obligation occurs under a state plan when an entitlement is created in favor of the state. This happens when a covered medical service is provided. See B-164031(3).150, September 5, 1979.

Also, where an agency is required to allocate funds to states on the basis of a statutory formula, the formula establishes the obligation to each recipient rather than the agency's allocation since, if the allocation is erroneous, the agency must adjust the amounts paid each recipient. See 41 Comp. Gen. 16 (1961); B-164031(3).150, September 5, 1979. In this type of situation, the obligation occurs by operation of law, even though there may have been no formal recording. A decision discussing this concept in the context of the Job Training Partnership Act is 63 Comp. Gen. 525 (1984). For a discussion of obligation and deobligation of funds under the now defunct Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (the predecessor of the Job Training Partnership Act) in the context of the Impoundment Control Act, see B-200685, April 27, 1981.

The rules for deobligation and reobligation of assistance funds are the same as for appropriated funds generally. Program legislation in a given case may, of course, provide for different treatment. For example, B-211323, January 3, 1984, considered a provision of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 under which funds apportioned to states remained available to the state until expended. Under that particular provision, funds deobligated as the result of a cost underrun could be reobligated by the state, without fiscal year limitation, for purposes within the scope of the program statute.

b. Subsidies

There have been relatively few cases dealing with the obligational treatment of subsidies, although the principles should parallel those for grants since they both derive from subsection (a)(5). In one case, GAO considered legislation authorizing the former Federal Home Loan Bank Board to make "interest adjustment" payments to member banks. The payments were designed to adjust the effective rates of interest charged by member banks on short- and long-term borrowing, the objective being to stimulate residential construction for low- and middle-income families. Funds were appropriated to the Board for this purpose on a fiscal year basis. GAO concluded that an obligation arose for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(5) when a Federal Home Loan Bank made a firm and unconditional commitment in writing to a member institution, provided that the commitment letter included a reasonable expiration date. The funds would have to be deobligated to the extent that a member institution failed to execute loans prior to the specified expiration date. 50 Comp. Gen. 857 (1971).

In 65 Comp. Gen. 4 (1985), GAO advised the Department of Education that mandatory interest subsidies under the Guaranteed Student Loan Program should be recorded as obligations on a "best estimate" basis as they arise, even if the recordings would exceed available budgetary resources. Since the subsidies are not discretionary obligations but are imposed by law, there would be no Antideficiency Act violation. The decision overruled an earlier case (B-126372, September 18, 1956) which had held that the recording of obligations for mail rate

C. The Antideficiency Act

1. Introduction and Overview

The so-called Antideficiency Act is one of the major laws in the statutory pattern by which Congress exercises its constitutional control of the public purse. It has been termed "the cornerstone of Congressional efforts to bind the Executive branch of government to the limits on expenditure of appropriated funds."[4]

As with the series of funding statutes as a whole, the Antideficiency Act did not hatch fully grown but evolved over a period of time in response to various abuses. As we noted in Chapter 1, as late as the post-Civil War period, it was not uncommon for agencies to incur obligations in excess of or in advance of appropriations. Perhaps most egregious of all, some agencies would spend their entire appropriations during the first few months of the fiscal year, continue to incur obligations, and then return to Congress for appropriations to fund these "coercive deficiencies."[5] These were obligations to others who had fulfilled their part of the bargain with the United States and who now had at least a moral—and in some cases also a legal—right to be paid. Congress felt it had no choice but to fulfill these commitments, but the frequency of deficiency appropriations played havoc with the United States budget.

The congressional response to abuses of this nature was the Antideficiency Act. Its history is summarized in the following paragraphs:[6]

"Control in the execution of the Government's budgetary and financial programs is based on the provisions of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, as amended . . ., commonly referred to as the Antideficiency Act. As the name . . . implies, one of the principal purposes of the legislation was to provide effective control over the use of appropriations so as to prevent the incurring of obligations at a rate which will lead to deficiency (or supplemental) appropriations and to fix responsibility on those subsidies to air carriers could be deferred until the time of payment. 65 Comp. Gen. at 8 n.3.

In 64 Comp. Gen. 410 (1985), GAO considered obligations by the Department of Housing and Urban Development for operating subsidies to state public housing authorities for low-income housing projects. Under the governing statute and regulations, the amount of the subsidy was determined upon HUD's approval of the state's annual operating budget, although the basic commitment stemmed from an annual contribution contract. HUD's practice, primarily for states whose fiscal year coincides with that of the federal government, was to record the obligation on the basis of an estimate, issued in a letter of intent. GAO found this to be legally permissible, but cautioned that HUD was required to adjust the obligation up or down once it approved the operating budget.

A 1983 decision, B-212145, September 27, 1983, discusses the use of estimates subject to subsequent adjustment for the recording of obligations under the Payments in Lieu of Taxes Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 6901–6906.

From the perspective of the recording of obligations, these two decisions—64 Comp. Gen. 410 and B-212145—are simply applications of the general principle, previously noted, that best estimates should be recorded when more precise information is not available, subject to later adjustment.

6. Subsection (a)(6): Pending Litigation

The sixth standard for recording obligations is "a liability that may result from pending litigation." 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(6).

Despite its seemingly broad language, subsection (a)(6) has very limited application. Most judgments against the United States are paid from a permanent indefinite appropriation, 31 U.S.C. § 1304, covered in detail in Chapter 14. Accordingly, since the expenditure of agency funds is not involved, judgments payable under 31 U.S.C. § 1304 have no obligational impact on the respondent agency.

Not all judgments against the United States are paid from the permanent judgment appropriation. Several types are payable from agency funds. However, the mere fact that a judgment is payable from agency funds does not make it subject to subsection (a)(6). Thus far, the Comptroller General has applied subsection (a)(6) in only two situations—land condemnation (35 Comp. Gen. 185 (1955)) and certain impoundment litigation (54 Comp. Gen. 962 (1975)).

In land condemnation proceedings, the appropriation is obligated when the request is made to the Attorney General to institute the proceedings. 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 423 (1955); 34 Comp. Gen. 67 (1954); 17 Comp. Gen. 664 (1938); 4 Comp. Gen. 206 (1924).

As stated in 35 Comp. Gen. 185, 187, subsection (a)(6) requires recording an obligation in cases where the government is definitely liable for the payment of money out of available appropriations and the pending litigation is for the purpose of determining the amount of the government's liability. Thus, for judgments payable from agency appropriations in other than land condemnation and impoundment cases, the standard of 35 Comp. Gen. 185 should be applied to determine whether an obligation must be recorded.

In cases where a judgment will be payable from agency funds but recording is not required, 35 Comp. Gen. 185 suggested that the agency should nevertheless administratively reserve sufficient funds to cover the contingent liability to avoid a possible violation of the Antideficiency Act. Id. at 187. While the administrative reservation may still be a good idea for other reasons, the majority of more recent cases (cited and summarized in Chapter 6 under the heading Intent/Factors Beyond Agency Control) have taken the position that overobligations resulting from court-ordered payments do not violate the Antideficiency Act.

It should be apparent that the preceding discussion applies to money judgments—judgments directing the payment of money. In some types of litigation, a court may order an agency to take some specific action. While compliance will result in the expenditure of agency funds, this type of judgment is not within the scope of 35 Comp. Gen. 185. While we have found no cases, it seems clear from the application of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a) in other contexts that no recordable obligation would arise while this type of litigation is still "pending."

7. Subsection (a)(7): Employment and Travel

Under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(7), obligations are recordable when supported by documentary evidence of "employment or services of persons or expenses of travel under law." This subsection covers a variety of loosely related obligations.

a. Wages, Salaries, Annual Leave

Salaries of government employees, as well as related items that flow from those salary entitlements such as retirement fund contributions, are obligations at the time the salaries are earned, that is, when the services are rendered. 24 Comp. Gen. 676, 678 (1945).[15] For example, in 38 Comp. Gen. 316 (1958), the Commerce Department wanted to treat the salaries of employees performing administrative and engineering services on highway construction projects as part of the construction contract costs. Under this procedure, the anticipated expenses of the employees, salaries included, would be recorded as an obligation at the time a contract was awarded. However, the Comptroller General held that this would not constitute a valid obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501. The employee expenses were not part of the contract costs and could not be obligated before the services were performed.

Subsection (a)(7) is not limited to permanent federal employees. It applies as well to persons employed in other capacities, such as temporary or intermittent employees or persons employed under a personal services contract. In Kinzley v. United States, 661 F.2d 187 (Ct. Cl. 1981), for example, the court found various agency correspondence sufficient compliance with subsection (a)(7) to permit a claim for compensation for services rendered as a project coordinator. Unlike subsection (a)(1), the court pointed out, subsection (a)(7) does not require a binding agreement in writing between the parties, but only documentary evidence of "employment or services of persons." Id. at 191.

For persons compensated on an actual expense basis, it may be necessary to record the obligation as an estimate, to be adjusted when the services are actually performed. Documentation requirements to support the obligation or subsequent claims are up to the agency. E.g., B-217475, December 24, 1986.

[15]The Federal Labor Relations Authority has also applied this principle in evaluating the negotiability of various union proposals. See Fort Knox Teachers Ass'n and Board of Education, 27 F.L.R.A. 203 (No. 34, 1987); Fort Knox Teachers Ass'n and Fort Knox Dependent Schools, 26 F.L.R.A. 934 (No. 108, 1987).

When a pay increase is granted to wage board employees, the effective date of the increase is governed by 5 U.S.C. § 5344. This effective date determines the government's liability to pay the additional compensation. Therefore, the increase is chargeable to appropriations currently available for payment of the wages for the period to which the increases apply. 39 Comp. Gen. 422 (1959). This is true regardless of the fact that appropriations may be insufficient to discharge the obligation and the agency may not yet have had time to obtain a supplemental appropriation. The obligation in this situation is considered "authorized by law" and therefore does not violate the Antideficiency Act. Id. at 426.

Annual leave status "is synonymous with a work or duty status." 25 Comp. Gen. 687 (1946). As such, annual leave obligates appropriations current at the time the leave is taken. Id.; 50 Comp. Gen. 863, 865 (1971); 17 Comp. Gen. 641 (1938). A separate obligation for annual leave is necessary only when it becomes due and payable as terminal leave. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 23.2. Except for employees paid from revolving funds (25 Comp. Gen. 687 (1946)), or where there is some statutory indication to the contrary (B-70247, January 9, 1948), the obligation for terminal leave is recorded against appropriations for the fiscal year covering the employee's last day of active service. 25 Comp. Gen. 687, 688 (1946); 24 Comp. Gen. 578, 583 (1945).

Bonuses such as performance awards or incentive awards obligate appropriations current at the time the awards are made. Thus, for example, where performance awards to Senior Executive Service officials under 5 U.S.C. § 5384 were made in FY 1982 but actual payment had to be split between FY 1982 and FY 1983 to stay within statutory compensation ceilings, the entire amount of the awards remained chargeable to FY 1982 funds. 64 Comp. Gen. 114, 115 n.2 (1984). The same principle would apply to other types of discretionary payments; the administrative determination creates the obligation. E.g., B-80060, September 30, 1948.

Employees terminated by a reduction in force (RIF) are entitled by statute to severance pay. Severance pay is obligated on a pay period by pay period basis. Thus, where a RIF occurs near the end of a fiscal year and severance payments will extend into the following fiscal year, it is improper to charge the entire amount of severance pay to the fiscal year in which the RIF occurs. B-200170, July 28, 1981; OMB Circular No. A-34, § 23.2.[16]

GAO reached a different result in B-200170, September 24, 1982. The United States Metric Board was scheduled to terminate its existence on September 30, 1982. Legislative history indicated that the Board's FY 1982 appropriation was intended to include severance pay, and no appropriations had been requested for FY 1983. Under these circumstances, severance payments to be made in FY 1983 were held chargeable to the FY 1982 appropriation. A contrary result would have meant that the FY 1982 funds would expire, and Congress would have had to appropriate the same funds again for FY 1983.

b. Compensation Plans in Foreign Countries

By statute, the State Department is required to establish compensation plans for foreign national employees of the Foreign Service in foreign countries. The plans are to be "based upon prevailing wage rates and compensation practices . . . for corresponding types of positions in the locality of employment," to the extent consistent with the public interest. 22 U.S.C. § 3968(a)(1).

Under subsection (b) of 22 U.S.C. § 3968, other government agencies are authorized to administer foreign national employee compensation programs in accordance with the applicable provisions of the Foreign Service Act. This provision, for example, authorized the Defense Department to establish a pension and life insurance program for foreign national employees in Bermuda, provided that it corresponded to prevailing local practice. 40 Comp. Gen. 650 (1961).

Subsection (c) of 22 U.S.C. § 3968 authorizes the Secretary of State to prescribe regulations for local compensation plans applicable to all federal agencies. To the extent this authority is not exercised, however, the statute does not otherwise require that a plan established by another agency conform to the State Department's plan. An agency establishing a local plan should, to the extent not regulated by State, coordinate with other agencies operating in the locality. 40 Comp. Gen. at 652. (As a practical matter, two agencies operating in the same locality should not develop substantially [16]GAO had previously equivocated on the issue of obligating for severance pay, preferring to coordinate with OMB's budget procedures, subsequently issued in OMB Circular No. A-34. See 45 Comp. Gen. 584 (1966).

different plans, assuming both legitimately reflect prevailing local practice.)

To the extent the authority of 22 U.S.C. § 3968 is exercised in a given country, the obligational treatment of various elements of compensation may vary from what would otherwise be required. For example, Colombian law provides for the advance payment of accrued severance pay to help the employee purchase or make improvements on a home. Thus, under a compensation plan for foreign national employees in Colombia, severance pay would be recorded as an obligation against the fiscal year appropriation current at the time of accrual. B-192511, February 5, 1979.

While 22 U.S.C. § 3968 authorizes compensation plans based on local practice, it does not permit automatic disregard of all other laws of the United States. Thus, under the Colombian severance pay program noted above, if the employee subsequently is terminated for cause or otherwise loses eligibility, the agency must proceed with collection action under the Federal Claims Collection Act, local practice to the contrary notwithstanding. B-192511, June 8, 1979. Similarly, accrued severance pay retains its status as United States funds up to actual disbursement and is therefore subject to applicable fiscal and fund control requirements. B-199722, September 15, 1981 (severance pay plan in Jordan).

In several foreign countries, foreign nationals employed by the United States are entitled to be paid a "separation allowance" when they resign, retire, or are otherwise separated through no fault of their own. The allowance is based on length of service, rate of pay at time of separation, and type of separation. Unlike severance pay for federal employees, these separation allowances represent binding commitments which accrue during the period of employment. As such, they should be recorded as obligations when they are earned rather than when they are paid. FGMSD-76-25, October 17, 1975; FGMSD-75-20, February 13, 1975; Substantial Understatements of Obligations for Separation Allowances for Foreign National Employees, B-179343, October 21, 1974. (These three items are GAO reports, the first two being untitled letter reports.)

c. Training

The obligation for training frequently stems from a services contract and to that extent is recordable under subsection (a)(1) rather than subsection (a)(7). The rules for training obligations are summarized in Chapter 5, Section B.5.

d. Uniform Allowance

The Federal Employees Uniform Act, 5 U.S.C. § 5901, authorizes a uniform allowance for each employee required by statute or regulation to wear a uniform. The agency may furnish the uniform or pay a cash allowance. Where an agency elects to pay an allowance, the obligation arises when the employee incurs the expense and becomes entitled to reimbursement. Thus, the appropriation chargeable is the one currently available at the time the employee makes the expenditure or incurs the debt. 38 Comp. Gen. 81 (1958).

e. Travel Expenses [17]

The obligation of appropriations for expenses relating to travel was an extremely fertile area and generated a large number of decisions before 31 U.S.C. § 1501 was enacted. The cases seem to involve every conceivable permutation of facts involving trips or transactions covering more than one fiscal year. The enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 logically prompted the question of how the new statute affected the prior decisions. It did not, replied the Comptroller General. Thus, the starting point is that subsection (a)(7) incorporates prior GAO decisions on obligations for travel. 35 Comp. Gen. 183 (1955); 34 Comp. Gen. 459 (1955).

The "leading case" in this area appears to have been 35 Comp. Gen. 183 (1955), which states the pertinent rules. The rules for travel may be summarized as follows: The issuance of a travel order in itself does not constitute a contractual obligation. The travel order is merely an authorization for the person specified to incur the obligation. The obligation is not incurred until the travel is actually performed or until a ticket is purchased, provided in the latter case the travel is to be performed in the same fiscal year the ticket is purchased. 35 Comp. Gen. at 185. A 1991 decision, 70 Comp. Gen. 469, reaffirmed the principle that the expenses of temporary duty travel are chargeable to the fiscal year or years in which they are actually incurred.

Some of the earlier cases in this evolutionary process are as follows:

[17]This section does not apply to travel incident to employee transfers. The rules for employee transfers are set forth separately later.

- Where tickets are purchased in one fiscal year and the travel is performed in the following fiscal year, the obligation is chargeable to the year in which the travel is performed, even though early purchase of the tickets may have been necessary to assure reservations. 27 Comp. Gen. 764 (1948); 26 Comp. Gen. 131 (1946).
- A "continuous journey" involving more than one segment obligates funds of the year in which the ticket was purchased, as long as the trip starts in that same fiscal year. However, procurement of transportation en route is a new obligation. Similarly, a round-trip ticket obligates funds at the time of purchase as long as the trip starts in the same fiscal year. However, if the return portion of the ticket cannot be used and a separate return ticket must be purchased, a new obligation is created. 26 Comp. Gen. 961 (1947); A-36450, May 27, 1931.
- Per diem incident to official travel accrues from day to day. Per diem allowances are chargeable to appropriations current when the allowances accrue (i.e., when the expenditures are made). Thus, where travel begins in one fiscal year and extends into the next fiscal year, the per diem obligation must be split along fiscal year lines, even though the cost of the travel itself may have been chargeable in its entirety to the prior fiscal year. 23 Comp. Gen. 197 (1943).
- Reimbursement on a mileage basis is chargeable to the fiscal year in which the major portion of the travel occurred. If travel is begun sufficiently prior to the end of a fiscal year to enable the employee to complete a continuous journey before the close of the fiscal year, the obligation is chargeable entirely to that year. However, if the travel is begun so late in the fiscal year that the major portion of it is performed in the succeeding fiscal year, it is chargeable to appropriations for the succeeding year. 9 Comp. Gen. 458, 460 (1930); 2 Comp. Dec. 14 (1895).
- Where (1) an employee is authorized to travel by privately owned vehicle at not to exceed the constructive cost of similar travel by rail, (2) the trip starts in one fiscal year and extends into the following fiscal year, and (3) the journey would have been completed in the prior year had rail travel been used, the travel expense is chargeable to the fiscal year in which the travel began. 30 Comp. Gen. 147 (1950).

f. State Department: Travel Outside Continental United States

By virtue of 22 U.S.C. § 2677, appropriations available to the State Department for travel and transportation outside the continental United States "shall be available for such expenses when any part of such travel or transportation begins in one fiscal year pursuant to travel orders issued in that year, notwithstanding the fact that such travel or transportation may not be completed during that same fiscal year." This provision appeared in appropriation acts starting in 1948 and was subsequently made permanent and codified. It has the effect of excluding State Department travel or transportation outside the continental United States from some of the earlier decisions. The authority is permissive rather than mandatory. 42 Comp. Gen. 699 (1963).

Section 2677 applies to temporary duty travel as well as travel incident to change of duty station. 71 Comp. Gen.___ (B-246702, August 6, 1992). In either case, expenses are chargeable to the year in which the travel is ordered as long as some travel-related expense is also incurred in that year, even though the physical travel may not begin until the following year. Id. Travel-related expenses in this context include miscellaneous incidental expenses such as inoculations and passports as long as they are not incurred at a time so far removed from the actual travel as to question their legitimacy as incident to the travel. 30 Comp. Gen. 25 (1950). The statute also permits charging the prior year for expenses incurred under amended travel orders issued in the subsequent fiscal year as long as some part of the travel or transportation began in the prior fiscal year. 29 Comp. Gen. 142 (1949).

The statute does not permit retroactive charging of an expired appropriation. Thus, the Comptroller General found it improper to issue a travel authorization in one fiscal year designating the succeeding fiscal year as the appropriation to be charged, and then, at the start of the succeeding fiscal year, cancel the authorization and replace it with a new authorization retroactively designating the prior year. 42 Comp. Gen. 699 (1963).

g. Employee Transfer/Relocation Costs

A government employee transferred to a new duty station is entitled to various allowances, primarily travel expenses of the employee and his or her immediate family, and transportation and temporary storage of household goods. 5 U.S.C. § 5724. In addition, legislation enacted in 1967, now found at 5 U.S.C. § 5724a, authorized several new types of relocation expenses for transferred employees. Specifically, they are: (1) per diem allowance for employee's immediate family en route between old and new duty station; (2) expenses of one house-hunting trip to new duty station; (3) temporary quarters allowance incident to relocation; (4) certain expenses of real estate transactions incurred as a result of the transfer; and (5) a miscellaneous expense allowance.

The leading case on the obligation of employee transfer expenses is 64 Comp. Gen. 45 (1984). The rule is that "for all [reimbursable] travel and transportation expenses of a transferred employee, the agency should record the obligation against the appropriation current when the employee is issued travel orders." Id. at 48. This treatment applies to expenses stemming from employee transfers; it does not apply to expenses stemming from temporary duty. 70 Comp. Gen. 469 (1991).

The rule of 64 Comp. Gen. 45 applies to obligations for extensions of temporary quarters subsistence expenses—the obligation is chargeable to the year in which the transfer order was issued. 64 Comp. Gen. 901 (1985). It also applies to dislocation allowances payable to members of the armed services incident to a permanent change of station move. 67 Comp. Gen. 474 (1988).

Agencies have discretionary authority under 5 U.S.C. § 5724c to contract with private firms for arranging the purchase of a transferred employee's old residence. Since this service is wholly discretionary and in no way an "entitlement," the agency's obligation to a relocation firm stems from its contract with the firm, not from the employee's transfer. Thus, the obligation under one of these arrangements occurs when a purchase order under the contract is awarded. 66 Comp. Gen. 554 (1987). (Since the obligation is evidenced by a written contract, it would be recorded under subsection (a)(1).)

The decision at 64 Comp. Gen. 45 overruled prior inconsistent decisions such as 28 Comp. Gen. 337 (1948) (storage) and B-122358, August 4, 1976 (relocation expenses under 5 U.S.C. § 5724a). In assessing the impact of 64 Comp. Gen. 45, however, care must be taken to determine precisely what has been overruled and what has not. For example, since 64 Comp. Gen. 45 dealt with reimbursable officials of Government who incur deficiencies or obligate appropriations without proper authorization or at an excessive rate.

"The original section 3679 . . . was derived from legislation enacted in 1870 [16 Stat. 251] and was designed solely to prevent expenditures in excess of amounts appropriated. In 1905 [33 Stat. 1257] and 1906 [34 Stat. 48], section 3679 . . . was amended to provide specific prohibitions regarding the obligation of appropriations and required that certain types of appropriations be so apportioned over a fiscal year as to 'prevent expenditures in one portion of the year which may necessitate deficiency or additional appropriations to complete the service of the fiscal year for which said appropriations are made.' Under the amended section, the authority to make, waive, or modify apportionments was vested in the head of the department or agency concerned. By Executive Order 6166 of June 10, 1933, this authority was transferred to the Director of the [Office of Management and Budget]. . . .

"During and following World War II, with the expansion of Government functions and the increase in size and complexities of budgetary and operational problems, situations arose highlighting the need for more effective control and conservation of funds. In order to effectively cope with these conditions it was necessary to seek legislation clarifying certain technical aspects of section 3679 of the Revised Statutes, and strengthening the apportionment procedures, particularly as regards to agency control systems. Section 1211 of the General Appropriation Act, 1951 [64 Stat. 765], amended section 3679 . . . to provide a basis for more effective control and economical use of appropriations. Following a recommendation of the second Hoover Commission that agency allotment systems should be simplified, Congress passed legislation in 1956 [70 Stat. 783] further amending section 3679 to provide that each agency work toward the objective of financing each operating unit, at the highest practical level, from not more than one administrative subdivision for each appropriation or fund affecting such unit. In 1957 [71 Stat. 440] section 3679 was further amended, adding a prohibition against the requesting of apportionments or reapportionments which indicate the necessity for a deficiency or supplemental estimate except on the determination of the agency head that such action is within the exceptions expressly set out in the law. The revised Antideficiency Act serves as the primary foundation for the Government's administrative control of funds systems."

In its current form, the law prohibits

1. Making or authorizing an expenditure from, or creating or authorizing an obligation under, any appropriation or fund in excess of the amount available in the appropriation or fund unless authorized by law;

2. Involving the government in any contract or other obligation for the payment of money for any purpose in advance of appropriations made for such purpose, unless the contract or obligation is authorized by law; expenses, prior decisions addressing the transportation of household goods shipped directly by the government presumably remain valid.[18]

Also, 35 Comp. Gen. 183 (1955) should not be regarded as "overruled," notwithstanding language to the contrary in 64 Comp. Gen. 45. There are two reasons for this. First, 35 Comp. Gen. 183 was not limited to employee transfers, but dealt with travel in other contexts as well, situations not involved in the 1984 decision. Second, 35 Comp. Gen. 183 states, at page 185:

"It may be stated, however, that we have no objection to recording tentatively as obligations the estimated cost of transportation to be purchased and reimbursements therefor to be earned, including reimbursements for transportation of household effects, within the current fiscal year at the time the travel orders are actually issued where it is administratively determined desirable in order to avoid certain additional accounting requirements; but all estimated amounts for travel and related expenses so recorded should be adjusted to actual obligations periodically . . . ."

This is not very different from the holding of 64 Comp. Gen. 45.

8. Subsection (a)(8): Public Utilities

Under 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(8), a recordable obligation arises when there is documentary evidence of "services provided by public utilities."[19]

Government agencies are not required to enter into contracts with public utilities when charges are based on rates that are fixed by regulatory bodies. However, contracts may be used if desired by the utility or the agency. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 6.2.C.5 (1990).

If there is a contract, monthly estimates of the cost of services to be performed, based on past experience, may be recorded as obligations. If there is no contract, obligations should be recorded only on the basis of services actually performed. 34 Comp. Gen. 459, 462 (1955).

[18]If the government ships the goods, the obligation occurs when a carrier picks up the goods pursuant to a government bill of lading. If separate bills of lading are issued covering different segments of the shipment, each bill of lading is a separate and distinct obligation. E.g., 31 Comp. Gen. 471 (1952).

[19]Prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, subsection (a)(7) included public utilities as well as employment and travel expenses. The recodification logically separated public utilities into a new subsection since it is unrelated to the other items. Thus, pre-1982 materials refer to eight subsections whereas there are now nine.

A statute relating to obligations for public utility services is 31 U.S.C. § 1308. Under this law, in making payments for telephone services and for services like gas or electricity where the quantity is based on metered readings, the entire payment for a billing period which begins in one fiscal year and ends in another is chargeable to appropriations current at the end of the billing period. If the charge covers several fiscal years, 31 U.S.C. § 1308 does not apply. A charge covering several fiscal years must be prorated so that the charge to any one fiscal year appropriation will not exceed the cost of service for a one-year period ending in that fiscal year. 19 Comp. Gen. 365 (1939). GAO has construed this statute as applicable to teletypewriter services as well. 34 Comp. Gen. 414 (1955).

The General Services Administration is authorized to enter into contracts for public utility services for periods not exceeding 10 years. 40 U.S.C. § 481(a)(3). A contract for the procurement of telephone equipment and related services has been held subject to this provision even where the provider was not a "traditional" form of public utility. 62 Comp. Gen. 569 (1983). Noting that the concept of what constitutes "public utility service" is flexible, the decision emphasized that the nature of the product or service provided rather than the nature of the provider should govern for purposes of 40 U.S.C. § 481(a)(3). 62 Comp. Gen. at 575. The decision also concluded that GSA is not required to obligate the total estimated cost of a multi-year contract under 40 U.S.C. § 481(a)(3), but is required to obligate only its annual costs. Id. at 572, 576.

9. Subsection (a)(9): Other Legal Liabilities

The final standard for recording obligations, 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(9), is documentary evidence of any "other legal liability of the Government against an available appropriation or fund."

This is sort of a catch-all category designed to pick up valid obligations which are not covered by subsections (a)(1) through (a)(8). 34 Comp. Gen. 418, 424 (1955).

Thus far, the decisions provide very little guidance on the types of situations that might be covered by subsection (a)(9). The few decisions that mention subsection (a)(9) generally cite it in conjunction with one of the other subsections and stop short of a definitive statement as to its independent applicability. See, e.g., 54

Comp. Gen. 962 (1975) (impoundment litigation); B-192511, February 5, 1979 (severance pay plan under 22 U.S.C. § 3968).

Another case, although not specifically citing subsection (a)(9), pointed out a situation that would seemingly qualify under that subsection: estimates of municipal tax liabilities on United States property located in foreign countries, based on tax bills received in prior years. 35 Comp. Gen. 319 (1955).

Thus, subsection (a)(9) must be applied on a case-by-case basis. If a given item is a legal liability of the United States, if appropriations are legally available for the item in terms of purpose and time, and if the item does not fit under any of the other eight subsections, then subsection (a)(9) should be considered.

C. Contingent Liabilities

A "contingent liability" is a potential liability which may become an actual liability if some particular event happens or does not happen. A more formal definition is:

"An existing condition, situation, or set of circumstances involving uncertainty as to a possible loss to an agency that will ultimately be resolved when one or more future events occur or fail to occur."[20]

If and when the contingency materializes, the liability ripens into a recordable obligation. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 3.4.C. See also, e.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 143, 145 (1983).

The contingent liability poses somewhat of a fiscal dilemma. On the one hand, it is by definition not sufficiently definite or certain to support the formal recording of an obligation. Yet on the other hand, sound financial management, as well as Antideficiency Act considerations, dictates that it somehow be recognized. The middle ground between recording an obligation and doing nothing is the "administrative reservation" or "commitment" of funds.[21] Reserves for contingencies are recognized in both the Antideficiency Act (31 U.S.C. § 1512(c)) and the Impoundment Control Act (2 U.S.C. § 684(b)). Also, a contingent liability which is less than an obligation but nevertheless sufficiently important to warrant recognition should be reflected in a footnote to pertinent financial statements. See 37 Comp. Gen. 691, 692 (1958); see also 62 Comp. Gen. 143, 146 (1983).

The treatment of contingent liabilities is largely a matter of sound judgment. "No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the circumstances that would require disclosure. Judgment would have to be exercised with respect to the possible financial implications." 37 Comp. Gen. at 694. The general question to ask in this context is whether a given situation is sufficiently probable to justify recognition or is little more than a mere possibility. Some guidance may be found in GAO's Accounting Principles and Standards,[22] and in 37 Comp. Gen. 691.

One example of a contingent liability which should be recognized is a pending claim under the "changed conditions" clause of a contract. 37 Comp. Gen. 691 (1958). It is not a recordable obligation until adjudicated and allowed. Another is an authorized indemnification provision limited to appropriations available at the time of a loss. 54 Comp. Gen. 824, 826–27 (1975), overruling in part 42 Comp. Gen. 708 (1963) to the extent the latter decision held establishment of a reserve unnecessary.

Termination liability under a renewal option or similar contract is another type of contingent liability. As a general proposition, "an amount equal to the maximum contingent liability of the Government [must be] always available for obligation from appropriations current at the time the contract is made and at the time renewals thereof are made." 37 Comp. Gen. 155, 160 (1957). See also 43 Comp. Gen. 657 (1964); 8 Comp. Gen. 654 (1929). In some circumstances, GAO has held that termination liability amounts to an actual obligation. 62 Comp. Gen. 143 (1983); B-238581, October 31, 1990.

Obligating funds for potential termination liability can tie up large sums for a long period of time. Administrative reservation is also an imperfect solution because the reserved funds may have to give way to higher priority items as the fiscal year progresses. Also, reservation does not preserve the funds beyond their period of availability and has to be repeated each fiscal year. Congress in several instances has provided for varying forms of alternative treatment of termination liability. See 51 Comp. Gen. 598, 604 (1972); B-174839, March 20, 1984; B-159141, August 18, 1967; B-112131, July 27, 1953.

[22]GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 2, Appendix I, § C50 (1984).

D. Reporting Requirements

When 31 U.S.C. § 1501 was originally enacted in 1954, it required each agency to prepare a report each year on the unliquidated obligations and unobligated balance for each appropriation or fund under the agency's control. The reports were to be submitted to the Senate and House Appropriations Committees, the (then) Bureau of the Budget, and GAO. GAO was often asked by the appropriations committees to review these reports.

After several years of reviewing reports, the appropriations committees determined that the requirement had served its purpose, and Congress amended the law in 1959 to revise and relax the reporting procedures. The current reporting requirements are found at 31 U.S.C. §§ 1108(c) and 1501(b).

Under 31 U.S.C. § 1108(c), each agency, when submitting requests for appropriations to the Office of Management and Budget, must report that "the statement of obligations submitted with the request contains obligations consistent with section 1501 of this title." See 39 Comp. Gen. 422, 425 (1959). Implementing instructions are contained in OMB Circular No. A-11 (Preparation and Submission of Budget Estimates), § 11.7. The reports must be certified by officials designated by the agency head. The certification must be supported by adequate records, and the agency must retain the records and certifications in such form as to facilitate audit and reconciliation. Officials designated to make the certifications may not redelegate the responsibility.[23]

The conference report on the original enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 1501 specified that the officials designated to make the certifications should be persons with overall responsibility for the recording of obligations, and "in no event should the designation be below the level of the chief accounting officer of a major bureau, service, or constituent organizational unit."[24]

[23]Sample certification statements may be found in OMB Circular No. A-11, § 11.7, and GAO's Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 3.8.A.

The person who makes certifications under 31 U.S.C. § 1108(c) is not a "certifying officer" for purposes of personal accountability for the funds in question. Although he or she may be coincidentally an "authorized certifying officer," the two functions are legally separate and distinct. B-197559-O.M., May 13, 1980.

The statute does not require 100 percent verification of unliquidated obligations prior to certification. Agencies may use statistical sampling. B-199967-O.M., December 3, 1980.

In the case of transfer appropriation accounts under interagency agreements, the certification official of the spending agency must make the certifications to the head of the advancing agency and not to the head of the spending agency. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 3.8.A.

Finally, 31 U.S.C. § 1501(b) provides that any statement of obligations furnished by any agency to the Congress or to any congressional committee "shall include only those amounts that are obligations consistent with subsection (a) of this section."

E. Deobligation

The definition of the term "deobligation" is a "downward adjustment of previously recorded obligations."[25] Deobligations occur for a variety of reasons. Examples are:

- Liquidation in amount less than amount of original obligation. E.g., B-207433, September 16, 1983 (cost underrun); B-183184, May 30, 1975 (agency called for less work than maximum provided under level-of-effort contract).
- Cancellation of project or contract.
- Initial obligation determined to be invalid.

[24]H.R. Rep. No. 2663, 83d Cong., 2d Sess. 18 (1954), quoted in Financial Management in the Federal Government, S. Doc. No. 11, 87th Cong., 1st Sess. 88 (1961), and in 50 Comp. Gen. 857, 862 (1971).

[25]GAO, Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27, at 56.

REV_00257379

- Reduction of previously recorded estimate.
- Correction of bookkeeping errors or duplicate obligations.

In addition, deobligation may be statutorily required in some instances. An example is 31 U.S.C. § 1535(d), requiring deobligation of appropriations obligated under an Economy Act agreement to the extent the performing agency has not incurred valid obligations under the agreement by the end of the fiscal year.

For the most part, there are no special rules relating to deobligation. Rather, the treatment of deobligations follows logically from the principles previously discussed in this and preceding chapters. Thus—

- Funds deobligated within the original period of obligational availability are once again available for new obligations just as if they had never been obligated in the first place. Naturally, any new obligations are subject to the purpose, time, and amount restrictions governing the source appropriation.
- Funds deobligated after the expiration of the original period of obligational availability are not available for new obligations. 64 Comp. Gen. 410 (1985); 52 Comp. Gen. 179 (1972). They may be retained as unobligated balances in the expired account until the account is closed, however, and are available for adjustments in accordance with 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a), as amended by Pub. L. No. 101-510, § 1404 (1990).

A proper and unliquidated obligation should not be deobligated unless there is some valid reason for doing so. Absent a valid reason, it is improper to deobligate funds solely to "free them up" for new obligations. To do so risks violating the Antideficiency Act. For example, where a government check issued in payment of some valid obligation cannot be promptly negotiated (if, for example, it is returned as undeliverable), it is improper to deobligate the funds and use them for new obligations. 15 Comp. Gen. 489 (1935); A-44024, September 21, 1942. (The two cited decisions deal with provisions of law which have since changed, but the thrust of the decisions remains the same.) The Antideficiency Act violation would occur if the payee of the original check subsequently shows up and demands payment but the funds are no longer available because they have been reobligated and the account contains insufficient funds.

Under some programs, an agency provides funds to an intermediary which in turn distributes the funds to members of a class of beneficiaries. The agency records the obligation when it provides, or legally commits itself to provide, the funds to the intermediary. It is undesirable for many reasons to permit the intermediary to hold the funds indefinitely prior to reallocation. Unless the program legislation provides otherwise, the agency may establish a reasonable cutoff date at which time unused funds in the hands of the intermediary are "recaptured" by the agency and deobligated. GAO recommended such a course of action in 50 Comp. Gen. 857 (1971). If recapture occurs during the period of availability, the funds may be reobligated for program purposes; if it occurs after the period of availability has ended, the funds expire absent some contrary direction in the governing legislation. Id.; Dabney v. Reagan, No. 82 Civ. 2231-CSH (S.D.N.Y. March 21, 1985).

Congress may occasionally by statute authorize an agency to reobligate deobligated funds after expiration of the original period of availability. This is called "deobligation-reobligation" (or "deob-reob") authority. Such authority exists only when expressly granted by statute. Deobligation-reobligation authority generally contemplates that funds will be deobligated only when the original obligation ceases to exist and not as a device to effectively augment the appropriation. See B-173240-O.M., January 23, 1973. Also, absent statutory authority to the contrary, "deob-reob" authority applies only to obligations and not to expenditures. Thus, repayments to an appropriation after expiration of the original period of obligational availability are not available for reobligation. B-121836, April 22, 1955.

3. Accepting voluntary services for the United States, or employing personal services in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of emergency involving the safety of human life or the protection of property; and

4. Making obligations or expenditures in excess of an apportionment or reapportionment, or in excess of the amount permitted by agency regulations.[7]

Subsequent sections of this chapter will explore these concepts in detail. However, the fiscal principles inherent in the Antideficiency Act are really quite simple. The idea is to "pay as you go." Government officials are warned not to make payments—or to commit the United States to make payments at some future time—for goods or services unless there is enough money in the "bank" to cover the cost in full. The "bank," of course, is the available appropriation.

The combined effect of the Antideficiency Act, in conjunction with the other funding statutes discussed throughout this publication, was summarized in a 1962 decision. The summary has been quoted in numerous later Antideficiency Act cases and bears repeating here:

"These statutes evidence a plain intent on the part of the Congress to prohibit executive officers, unless otherwise authorized by law, from making contracts involving the Government in obligations for expenditures or liabilities beyond those contemplated and authorized for the period of availability of and within the amount of the appropriation under which they are made; to keep all the departments of the Government, in the matter of incurring obligations for expenditures, within the limits and purposes of appropriations annually provided for conducting their lawful functions, and to prohibit any officer or employee of the Government from involving the Government in any contract or other obligation for the payment of money for any purpose, in advance of appropriations made for such purpose; and to restrict the use of annual appropriations to expenditures required for the service of the particular fiscal year for which they are made." 42 Comp. Gen. 272, 275 (1962).

Continuing Resolutions

A. Introduction

1. Definition and General Description

The term "continuing resolution" may be defined as follows:

"Legislation enacted by Congress to provide budget authority for Federal agencies and/or specific activities to continue in operation until the regular appropriations are enacted. Continuing resolutions are enacted when action on appropriations is not completed by the beginning of a fiscal year."[1]

For the most part, continuing resolutions are temporary appropriation acts. With a few exceptions to be noted later, they are intended by Congress to be stop-gap measures enacted to keep existing federal programs functioning after the expiration of previous budget authority and until regular appropriation acts can be enacted. Congress resorts to the continuing resolution when there is no regular appropriation for a program or agency, perhaps because the two Houses have not yet agreed on common language, because authorizing legislation has not yet been enacted, or because the President has vetoed an appropriation act passed by Congress. 58 Comp. Gen. 530, 532 (1979). Also, given the size and complexity of today's government, the consequent complexity of the budget and appropriations process, and the occasionally differing policy objectives of the executive and legislative branches, it has become increasingly difficult for Congress to enact all of the regular appropriation acts before the fiscal year ends.

Continuing resolutions are nothing new. We have found administrative decisions discussing them as far back as the 1880s.[2] At one time, they were called "temporary resolutions." The term "continuing resolution" came into widespread use in the early 1960s.[3]

In the 20 years from FY 1962 to FY 1981, 85 percent of the appropriation bills for federal agencies were enacted after the start of the fiscal year and thus necessitated continuing resolutions. GAO has discussed the problems inherent in this situation in several reports: Funding Gaps Jeopardize Federal Government Operations, PAD-81-31 (March 3, 1981), Continuing Resolutions and an Assessment of Automatic Funding Approaches, GAO/AFMD-86-16 (January 1986), and Government Shutdown: Permanent Funding Lapse Legislation Needed, GAO/GGD-91-76 (June 1991). Funding gaps and the legal problems they present are discussed separately in Chapter 6.

Continuing resolutions are enacted as joint resolutions making continuing appropriations for a certain fiscal year. Although enacted in this form rather than as an "act," once passed by both Houses of Congress and approved by the President, a continuing resolution becomes a public law and has the same force and effect as any other statute. B-152554, December 15, 1970; Oklahoma v. Weinberger, 360 F. Supp. 724, 726 (W.D. Okla. 1973). Since a continuing resolution is a form of appropriation act, it often will include the same types of restrictions and conditions that are commonly found in regular appropriation acts. E.g., B-210603, February 25, 1983 (ship construction appropriation in continuing resolution making funds available "only under a firm, fixed price type contract"). Having said this, however, it is necessary to note that continuing resolutions, at least those in what we will call the "traditional form," differ considerably from regular appropriation acts.

Continuing resolutions may take different forms. The "traditional" form, used consistently (with some variation) into the 1980s, employed essentially standard language and was clearly a temporary measure. An example of this form is the 1982 continuing resolution, Pub. L. No. 97-92, 95 Stat. 1183 (1981). When enacting continuing resolutions in this form, there is clear indication that Congress intends and expects that the normal authorization and appropriation process will eventually produce appropriation acts which will replace or terminate the budget authority contained in the resolution. Thus, a continuing resolution of this type generally provides that funds appropriated for an activity by the resolution will no longer be available for obligation if the activity is later funded by a regular appropriation act, or Congress indicates its intent to end the activity by enacting an applicable appropriation act without providing for the activity. 58 Comp. Gen. 530, 532 (1979). Obligations already incurred under the resolution, however, may be liquidated.

Unlike regular appropriation acts, continuing resolutions in their traditional form do not usually appropriate specified sums of money. Rather, they usually appropriate "such amounts as may be necessary" for continuing projects or activities at a certain "rate for operations." The rate for operations may be the amount provided for the activity in an appropriation act that has passed both Houses but has not become law; the lower of the amounts provided when each House has passed a different act; the lower of the amounts provided either in an act which has passed only one House or in the administration's budget estimate; the amount specified in a particular conference report; the lower of either the amount provided in the budget estimate or the "current rate"; or simply the current rate. Therefore, in order to determine the sum of money appropriated for any given activity by this type of continuing resolution, it is necessary to examine documents other than the resolution itself. Some continuing resolutions have used a combination of "formula appropriations" of the types described in this paragraph and appropriations of specific dollar amounts. An example is the 1984 continuing resolution, Pub. L. No. 98-107, 97 Stat. 733 (1983).

There are times when Congress acknowledges at the outset that it is not likely to enact one or more regular appropriation acts during the current fiscal year. See, for example, the 1980 continuing resolution, Pub. L. No. 96-86, 93 Stat. 656 (1979), which provided budget authority for the legislative branch for the entire fiscal year.

For a few years in the 1980s, Congress used a very different form of continuing resolution, simply stringing together the complete texts of appropriation bills not yet enacted and enacting them together in a single "omnibus" package. This approach reached its extreme in the 1988 continuing resolution, Pub. L. No. 100-202, 101 Stat. 1329 (1987), which included the complete texts of all 13 of the regular appropriation bills. This form of continuing resolution differs from the traditional form in two key respects:

- Unlike the traditional continuing resolution, the "full text" version amounts to an acknowledgement that no further action on the unenacted bills will be forthcoming, and consequently provides funding for the remainder of the fiscal year.
- When the entire text of an appropriation bill is incorporated into a continuing resolution, the appropriations are in the form of specified dollar amounts, the same as if the individual bill had been enacted.

The "full text" format generally does not raise the same issues of statutory interpretation that arise under the traditional format. However, it produces new ones. For example, in a continuing resolution which consolidates the full texts of what would otherwise have been several separate appropriation acts, GAO has construed the term "this act" as referring only to the individual "appropriation act" in which it appears rather than to the entire continuing resolution. B-230110, April 11, 1988.

While the omnibus approach of the 1988 resolution may appear convenient, it generated considerable controversy because, among other reasons, it is virtually "veto-proof"—the President has little choice but to sign the bill or bring the entire government to an abrupt halt.

There was no continuing resolution for fiscal year 1989. All 13 of the appropriation bills were enacted on time, for what was reported to be the first time in 12 years.[4] For fiscal year 1990, Congress reverted to the traditional type of continuing resolution. See Pub. L. No. 101-100, 103 Stat. 638 (1989).

Questions arising under continuing resolutions can be grouped loosely into two broad categories. First are questions in which the fact that a continuing resolution is involved is purely incidental, in other words, questions which could have arisen just as easily under a regular appropriation act. For example, one of the issues considered in B-230110, April 11, 1988, was whether certain provisions in the 1988 resolution constituted permanent legislation. Cases in this category are included with their respective topics throughout this publication and are not repeated in this chapter.

Second are issues that are unique to continuing resolutions, and these are the focus of the remainder of this chapter. For the most part, the material deals with the traditional form of continuing resolution as it is this form that uses concepts and language found only in continuing resolutions.

One point that should emerge from the GAO decisions and opinions is the central role of legislative intent. To be sure, legislative intent cannot change the plain meaning of a statute; Congress must enact [4]All Spending Bills Completed on Time, New York Times, October 2, 1988, at 27.

what it intends in order to make it law. However, there are many cases in which the statutory language alone does not provide a clear answer, and indications of congressional intent expressed in well-established methods, viewed in light of the purpose of the continuing resolution, will tip the balance.

In one case, for example, a continuing resolution provided a lump-sum appropriation for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's research and facilities account, and provided further for the transfer of $1.8 million from the Fisheries Loan Fund. The first continuing resolution for 1987 included the transfer provision and was signed into law on October 1, 1986. The Fisheries Loan Fund was scheduled to expire at "the close of September 30, 1986." Under a strictly technical reading, the $1.8 million ceased to be available once the clock struck midnight on September 30. However, the Comptroller General found the transfer provision effective, noting that a contrary result would "frustrate the obvious intent of Congress." B-227658, August 7, 1987.

While many of the continuing resolution provisions to be discussed will appear highly technical (because they are highly technical), there is an essential logic to them, evolved over many years, which is more readily seen from the perspective not of a specific case or problem, but of the overall goals and objectives of continuing resolutions and their relationship to the rest of the budget and appropriations process.

2. Use of Appropriation Warrants

Funds, including funds appropriated under a continuing resolution, are drawn from the Treasury by means of an appropriation warrant (TFS Form 6200).[5] A warrant is the official document issued pursuant to law by the Secretary of the Treasury that establishes the amount of money authorized to be withdrawn from the Treasury.[6] Under 31 U.S.C. § 3323(a), warrants authorized by law are to be signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and countersigned by the Comptroller General.

[5]Treasury Financial Manual, Vol. I, § 2-2040.

[6]Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, supra note 1, at 81.

REV_00257389

Requirements relating to Treasury warrants may be waived. Section 115(a) of the Budget and Accounting Procedures Act of 1950, 31 U.S.C. § 3326(a), states:

"(a) When the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller General decide that, with sufficient safeguards, existing procedures may be changed to simplify, improve, and economize the control and accounting of public money, they may prescribe joint regulations for waiving any part of the requirements in effect on September 12, 1950, that—

"(1) warrants be issued and countersigned for the receipt, retention, and disbursement of public money and trust funds . . . ."

Under the authority of this section, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller General have issued several joint regulations.[7]

In the specific context of appropriation warrants, the joint regulations have been used to phase out the countersignature requirement. First, Department of the Treasury-General Accounting Office Joint Regulation No. 5 (October 18, 1974) waived the requirement for all appropriations except continuing resolutions. Next, Treasury-GAO Joint Regulation No. 6 (October 1, 1983) further simplified the process by requiring issuance of a warrant and countersignature under a continuing resolution only once, for the total amount appropriated, unless a subsequent resolution changed the annual amount. Finally, Treasury-GAO Joint Regulation No. 7, effective January 1, 1991, eliminated the countersignature requirement completely.

[7]Treasury-GAO Joint Regulations are included as an appendix to Title 7 of the GAO Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies. Because of their nature, they are not published in the Federal Register. Some of the earlier ones, but not those noted in the text, were published in the annual "Comp. Gen." volumes. Title 7 of the Policy and Procedures Manual is the only GAO reference in which the regulations and amendments can be found together in a single location.

B. Rate for Operations

1. Current Rate

The current rate, as that term is used in continuing resolutions, is equivalent to the total amount of money which was available for obligation for an activity during the fiscal year immediately prior to the one for which the continuing resolution is enacted.

The term "current rate" is used in continuing resolutions to indicate the level of spending which Congress desires for a program. For example, a resolution may appropriate sufficient funds to enable a program to operate at a rate for operations "not in excess of the current rate," or at a rate "not in excess of the lower of the current rate" or the rate provided in a certain bill. It is possible to read the term "current rate" as referring to either the amount of money available for the program in the preceding year, or an amount of money sufficient to enable continuation of the program at the level of the preceding year. The two can be very different.

As a general proposition, GAO regards the term "current rate" as referring to a sum of money rather than a program level. E.g., 58 Comp. Gen. 530, 533 (1979); B-194362, May 1, 1979. Thus, when a continuing resolution appropriates in terms of the current rate, the amount of money available under the resolution will be limited by that rate, even though an increase in the minimum wage may force a reduction in the number of people participating in an employment program (B-194063, May 4, 1979), or an increase in the mandatory level of assistance will reduce the number of meals provided under a meals for the elderly program (B-194362, May 1, 1979).

The term "current rate" refers to the rate of operations carried on within the appropriation for the prior fiscal year. B-152554, December 6, 1963. The current rate is equivalent to the total appropriation, or the total funds which were available for obligation, for an activity during the previous fiscal year. Edwards v. Bowen, 785 F.2d 1440 (9th Cir. 1986); 64 Comp. Gen. 21 (1984); 58 Comp. Gen. 530, 533 (1979); B-194063, May 4, 1979; B-194362, May 1, 1979; B-164031(1), December 13, 1972. Funds administratively transferred from the account during the fiscal year, under authority contained in substantive legislation, should not be deducted in determining the current rate. B-197881, April 8, 1980; B-152554, November 4, 1974.

It follows that funds transferred into the account during the fiscal year pursuant to statutory authority should be excluded. B-197881, April 8, 1980.

In those instances in which the program in question has been funded by one-year appropriations in prior years, the current rate is equal to the total funds appropriated for the program for the previous fiscal year. E.g., 64 Comp. Gen. 21, 22 (1984); 58 Comp. Gen. 530 (1979); B-194362, May 1, 1979. In those instances in which the program has been funded by multiple-year or no-year appropriations in prior years, the current rate is equal to the total funds appropriated for the previous fiscal year plus the total of unobligated budget authority carried over into that year from prior years. 58 Comp. Gen. 530 (1979); B-152554, October 9, 1970.

One apparent deviation from this calculation of current rate occurred in 58 Comp. Gen. 530 (1979), a case involving the now obsolete CETA (Comprehensive Employment and Training Act) program. In that decision, the Comptroller General, in calculating the current rate under the 1979 continuing resolution, included funds appropriated in a 1977 appropriation act and obligated during 1977. Ordinarily, only funds appropriated by the fiscal year 1978 appropriation act, and carryover funds unobligated at the beginning of fiscal year 1979, would have been included in the current rate. However, in this instance the funds appropriated in 1977 were included because it was clear from the legislative history of the appropriation act that Congress intended these funds to be an advance of appropriations for fiscal year 1978. Accordingly, Congress did not appropriate funds for this activity in the fiscal year 1978 appropriation act. Thus, in order to ascertain the actual amount available for the activity for fiscal year 1978, it was necessary to include the advance funding provided by the 1977 appropriation act. The rationale used in this decision would apply only when it is clear that Congress was providing advance funding for the reference fiscal year in an earlier year's appropriation act.

Where funding for the preceding fiscal year covered only a part of that year, it may be appropriate to "annualize" the previous year's appropriation in order to determine the current rate. This was the result in 61 Comp. Gen. 473 (1982), in which the FY 1981 appropriation for a particular program had been contained in a supplemental appropriation act and was intended to cover only the last quarter of the fiscal year. The current rate for purposes of the FY 1982 continuing resolution was four times the FY 1981 figure.

There are exceptions to the rule that "current rate" means a sum of money rather than a program level. For example, GAO construed the FY 1980 continuing resolution as appropriating sufficient funds to support an increased number of Indochinese refugees in view of explicit statements by both the Appropriations and the Budget Committees that the resolution was intended to fund the higher program level. B-197636, February 25, 1980. Also, the legislative history of the FY 1981 continuing resolution (Pub. L. No. 96-369, 94 Stat. 1351) indicated that in some instances "current rate" must be interpreted so as to avoid reducing existing program levels.

It is always preferable for the exception to be specified in the resolution itself. Starting with the first continuing resolution for fiscal year 1983 (Pub. L. No. 97-276, 96 Stat. 1186 (1982)), Congress began appropriating for the continuation of certain programs "at a rate to maintain current operating levels." GAO has construed this language as meaning sufficient funds to maintain the program in question at the same operating level as at the end of the immediately preceding fiscal year. B-209676, April 14, 1983; B-200923, November 16, 1982 (non-decision letter) (including some discussion of legislative history).

2. Rate Not Exceeding Current Rate

When a resolution appropriates funds to continue an activity at a rate for operations "not in excess of the current rate," the amount of funds appropriated by the resolution is equal to the current rate less any unobligated balance carried over into the present year.

As discussed in the preceding section, the current rate is equivalent to the total amount of funds that was available for obligation for a project or activity in the preceding fiscal year. When the continuing resolution appropriates funds to continue an activity at a rate for operations "not in excess of the current rate," it is the intent of Congress that the activity have available for obligation in the present fiscal year no more funds than it had available for obligation in the preceding fiscal year. Therefore, if there is a balance of unobligated funds which can be carried over into the present fiscal year, this balance must be deducted from the current rate in determining the amount of funds appropriated by the continuing resolution. If this

To the extent it is possible to summarize appropriations law in a single paragraph, this is it. Viewed in the aggregate, the Antideficiency Act and related funding statutes "[restrict] in every possible way the expenditures and expenses and liabilities of the government, so far as executive offices are concerned, to the specific appropriations for each fiscal year." Wilder's Case, 16 Ct. Cl. 528, 543 (1880).

2. Obligation/Expenditure in Excess or Advance of Appropriations

The key provision of the Antideficiency Act is 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a)(1):[8]

"(a)(1) An officer or employee of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia government may not—

"(A) make or authorize an expenditure or obligation exceeding an amount available in an appropriation or fund for the expenditure or obligation; or

"(B) involve either government in a contract or obligation for the payment of money before an appropriation is made unless authorized by law."

Not only is section 1341(a)(1) the key provision of the Act, it was originally the only provision, the others being added to ensure enforcement of the basic prohibitions of section 1341.

The law is not limited to the executive branch, but applies to any "officer or employee of the United States Government" and thus extends to all branches. Examples of legislative branch applications are B-107279, January 9, 1952 (Office of Legislative Counsel, House of Representatives); B-78217, July 21, 1948 (appropriations to Senate for expenses of Office of Vice President); 27 Op. Att'y Gen. 584 (1909) (Government Printing Office). Within the judicial branch, it applies to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. E.g., 50 Comp. Gen. 589 (1971). However, whether a federal judge is an officer or employee for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a)(1) appears to remain an open question, at least in some contexts. See Armster v. United States District Court, 792 F.2d 1423, 1427 n.7 (9th Cir. 1986).

Some government corporations are also classified as agencies of the United States Government, and their officials are therefore "officers

[8]Prior to the 1982 recodification of title 31 of the United States Code, the Antideficiency Act consisted of 9 lettered subsections of what was then 31 U.S.C. § 665. The recodification scattered the law among several new sections. To better show the relationship of the material, our organization in this chapter retains the sequence of the former subsections.

were not done, the program would be funded at a higher level in the present year than it was in the preceding year, which is not permitted by the language of the resolution. E.g., 58 Comp. Gen. 530, 535 (1979).

For example, suppose the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1992 appropriates sufficient funds to continue an activity at a rate not exceeding the current rate. The current rate, or the total amount which was available for obligation in fiscal year 1991, is $1,000,000. Of this amount, $100,000 remains unobligated at the end of 1991, and is available for obligation in 1992. If the activity is to operate at a rate not to exceed the current rate, $1,000,000, then the resolution can appropriate no more than the difference between the current rate and the carryover from 1991 to 1992, or $900,000. If the resolution were interpreted as appropriating the full current rate, then a total of $1,100,000 would be available for fiscal year 1992, and the activity would be able to operate at a rate in excess of the current rate, a result prohibited by the language of the resolution.

An unobligated balance which does not carry over into the present fiscal year (the more common situation) does not have to be deducted. B-152554, November 4, 1974.

A commonly encountered form of continuing resolution formula appropriation is an amount not in excess of the current rate or the rate provided in some reference item, whichever is lower. The reference item may be an unenacted bill, a conference report, the President's budget estimate, etc. When the current rate produces the lower figure—the situation encountered in 58 Comp. Gen. 530—the above rule applies and an unobligated carryover balance must be deducted to determine the amount appropriated by the continuing resolution. However, when the current rate is not the lower of the two referenced items, the rule does not necessarily apply.

To illustrate, a continuing resolution appropriated funds for the Office of Refugee Resettlement at a rate for operations not in excess of the lower of the current rate or the rate authorized by a bill as passed by the House of Representatives. The rate under the House-passed bill was $50 million. The current rate was $77.5 million, of which $39 million remained unobligated at the end of the preceding fiscal year and was authorized to be carried over into the current fiscal year. If the continuing resolution had simply specified a rate not in excess of the current rate, or if the rate in the House-passed bill had been greater than the current rate, it would have been necessary to deduct the $39 million carryover balance from the $77.5 million current rate to determine the maximum funding level for the current year. Here, however, the rate in the House-passed bill was the lower of the two.

Reasoning that the "current rate" already includes an unobligated carryover balance, if any, whereas the rate in the House-passed bill did not include a prior year's balance, and supported by the legislative history of the continuing resolution, the Comptroller General concluded that the amount available for the current year was the amount appropriated by the resolution, $50 million, plus the unobligated carryover balance of $39 million, for a total of $89 million. 64 Comp. Gen. 649 (1985). The decision distinguished 58 Comp. Gen. 530, stating that "the rule with respect to deduction of unobligated balances in 58 Comp. Gen. 530 is not applicable where the lower of two referenced rates is not the current rate." Id. at 652–53. The case went to court, and the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reached the same result. Edwards v. Bowen, 785 F.2d 1440 (9th Cir. 1986).

In sum, if a continuing resolution appropriates the lower of the current rate or the rate in some reference item, you compare the two numbers to determine which is lower before taking any unobligated carryover balance into account. If the current rate is lower, you then deduct the carryover balance to determine the funding level under the continuing resolution. If the rate in the reference item is lower, the funding level is the reference rate plus the carryover balance unless it is clear that this is not what was intended.

3. Spending Pattern Under Continuing Resolution

a. Pattern of Obligations

An agency may determine the pattern of its obligations under a continuing resolution so long as it operates under a plan which will keep it within the rate for operations limit set by the resolution. If an agency usually obligates most of its annual budget in the first month or first quarter of the fiscal year, it may continue that pattern under the resolution. If an agency usually obligates funds uniformly over the entire year, it will be limited to that pattern under the resolution, unless it presents convincing reasons why its pattern must be changed in the current fiscal year.

Continuing resolutions are often enacted to cover a limited period of time, such as a month or a calendar quarter. The time limit stated in the resolution is the maximum period of time during which funds appropriated by the resolution are available for obligation.

However, this limited period of availability does not affect the amount of money appropriated by the resolution. The rate for operations specified in the resolution, whether in terms of an appropriation act which has not yet become law, a budget estimate, or the current rate, is an annual amount. The continuing resolution, in general, regardless of its period of duration, appropriates this full annual amount. See B-152554, November 4, 1974.

Because the appropriation under a continuing resolution is the full annual amount, an agency may generally follow any pattern of obligating funds, so long as it is operating under a plan which will enable continuation of activities throughout the fiscal year within the limits of the annual amount appropriated. Thus, under a resolution with a duration of one month, and which appropriates funds at a rate for operations not in excess of the current rate, the agency is not necessarily limited to incurring obligations at the same rate it incurred them in the corresponding month of the preceding year. B-152554, December 6, 1963. The same principle applies when the resolution appropriates funds at a rate to maintain current operating levels. B-209676, April 14, 1983.

However, the pattern of obligations in prior years does provide a framework for determining the proper pattern of obligations under the continuing resolution. For example, if the activity is a formula grant program in which nearly all appropriated funds are normally obligated at the beginning of the fiscal year, then the full annual amount should be made available to the agency under the resolution, even though the resolution may be in effect for only one month. However, if the activity is salaries and expenses, in which funds are normally obligated uniformly throughout the year, then the amount made available to the agency should be only one-twelfth of the annual amount under a one-month resolution or one-fourth of the annual amount under a calendar quarter resolution. B-152554, February 17, 1972.

Congress can, of course, alter the pattern of obligations by the language of the resolution. For example, if the resolution limits obligations in any calendar quarter to one-fourth of the annual rate, the agency is limited to that one-fourth rate regardless of its normal pattern of obligations. B-152554, October 16, 1973. Further, even if the resolution itself does not have such limitations, but the legislative history clearly shows the intent of Congress that only one-fourth of the annual rate be obligated each calendar quarter, only this amount should be made available unless the agency can demonstrate a real need to exceed that rate. B-152554, November 4, 1974.

b. Apportionment

The requirement that appropriations be apportioned by the Office of Management and Budget, imposed by the Antideficiency Act, applies to funds appropriated by continuing resolution as well as regular appropriations. See generally OMB Circular No. A-34, Part IV (1985).

Typically, OMB has permitted some continuing resolution funds to be apportioned automatically. For example, if a given continuing resolution covers 10 percent of a fiscal year, OMB may permit 10 percent of the appropriation to be apportioned automatically, meaning that the agency can obligate this amount without seeking a specific apportionment. Under such an arrangement, if program requirements produced a need for additional funds, the agency would have to seek an apportionment from OMB for the larger amount.

Apportionment requirements may vary from year to year because of differences in duration and other aspects of applicable continuing resolutions. A device OMB has commonly used to announce its apportionment requirements for a given fiscal year is an OMB Bulletin reflecting the particular continuing resolution for that year.

With the change in warrant procedures brought about by the Treasury-GAO Joint Regulations discussed earlier, the apportionment process plays an even more vital role in controlling an agency's pattern of obligations under a continuing resolution.

4. Liquidation of Contract Authority

When in the preceding fiscal year Congress has provided an agency with contract authority, the continuing resolution must be interpreted as appropriating sufficient funds to liquidate that authority to the extent it becomes due during the period covered by the continuing resolution.

When an activity operates on the basis that in one year Congress provides contract authority to the agency and in the next year appropriates funds to liquidate that authority, then a continuing resolution in the second year must be interpreted as appropriating sufficient funds to liquidate the outstanding contract authority. The term "contract authority" means express statutory authority to incur contractual obligations in advance of appropriations. Thus, there is no "rate for operations" limitation in connection with the liquidation of due debts based on validly executed contracts entered into under statutory contract authority. In this context, rate for operations limitations apply only to new contract authority for the current fiscal year. B-114833, November 12, 1974.

5. Rate for Operations Exceeds Final Appropriation

If an agency operating under a continuing resolution incurs obligations within the rate for operations limit, but Congress subsequently appropriates a total annual amount less than the amount of these obligations, the obligations remain valid. B-152554, February 17, 1972.

For example, a continuing resolution for a period of one month may have a rate for operations limitation of the current rate. The activity being funded is a grant program and the agency obligates the full annual amount during the period of the resolution. Congress then enacts a regular appropriation act which appropriates for the activity an amount less than the obligations already incurred by the agency. Under these circumstances, the obligations incurred by the agency remain valid obligations of the United States.

Having established that the "excess" obligations remain valid, the next question is how they are to be paid. At one time, GAO took the position that an agency finding itself in this situation must not incur any further obligations and must attempt to negotiate its obligations downward to come within the amount of the final appropriation. B-152554, February 17, 1972. If this is not possible, the agency would have to seek a supplemental or deficiency appropriation. This position was based on a provision commonly appearing in continuing resolutions along the following lines:

"Expenditures made pursuant to this joint resolution shall be charged to the applicable appropriation, fund, or authorization whenever a bill in which such applicable appropriation, fund, or authorization is contained is enacted into law."[8]

However, the 1972 opinion failed to take into consideration another provision commonly included in continuing resolutions:

"Appropriations made and authority granted pursuant to this joint resolution shall cover all obligations or expenditures incurred for any program, project, or activity during the period for which funds or authority for such project or activity are available under this joint resolution."[9]

When these two provisions are considered together, it becomes apparent that the purpose of the first provision is merely to emphasize that the funds appropriated by the continuing resolution are not in addition to the funds later provided when the applicable regular appropriation act is enacted. Accordingly, GAO modified the 1972 opinion and held that funds made available by a continuing resolution remain available to pay validly incurred obligations which exceed the amount of the final appropriation. 62 Comp. Gen. 9 (1982). See also 67 Comp. Gen. 474 (1988); B-207281, October 19, 1982.

Thus, obligations under a continuing resolution are treated as follows:

"When an annual appropriation act provides sufficient funding for an appropriation account to cover obligations previously incurred under the authority of a continuing resolution, any unpaid obligations are to be charged to and paid from the applicable account established under the annual appropriation act. Similarly, to the extent the annual act provides sufficient funding, those obligations which were incurred and paid during the period of the continuing resolution must be charged to the account created by the annual appropriation act. On the other hand, to the extent the annual appropriation act does not provide sufficient funding for the appropriation account to cover obligations validly incurred under a continuing resolution, the obligations in excess of the amount provided by the annual act should be charged to and paid from the appropriation account established under authority of the continuing resolution.

[8]E.g., Pub. L. No. 101-100, § 104, 103 Stat. 638, 640 (1989) (1990 continuing resolution). Comparable provisions have been included in continuing resolutions for over a century. See, for example, the FY 1883 continuing resolution (22 Stat. 384) discussed in 3 Lawrence, First Comp. Dec. 213 (1882).

[9]E.g., Pub. L. No. 101-100, supra note 8, § 103.

[Footnote omitted.] Thus the funds made available by the resolution must remain available to pay these obligations."

62 Comp. Gen. 9, 11—12 (1982). However, to comply with the intent of the lower appropriation, OMB requires that agencies "reduce obligations in the most cost-effective way and to the maximum extent possible." OMB Circular No. A-34, § 22.1. Thus, as GAO had advised in 1972, agencies are still required to make their best efforts to remain within the amount of the final appropriation. The change recognized in 62 Comp. Gen. 9 is that, to the extent an agency is unable to do so, the appropriation made by the continuing resolution remains available to liquidate the "excess" obligations.

C. Projects or Activities

"Projects or activities" as used in continuing resolutions may have two meanings. When determining which government programs are covered by the resolution, and the rate for operations limit, the term "project or activity" refers to the total appropriation rather than to specific activities. When determining whether an activity was authorized or carried out in the preceding year, the term "project or activity" may refer to the specific activity. The following paragraphs will elaborate.

The term "projects or activities" is used in two contexts in continuing resolutions. First, it is used in the appropriating language to indicate which government programs are to be funded and at what rate. Thus a resolution might appropriate sufficient funds to continue "projects or activities provided for" in a certain appropriation bill "to the extent and in the manner" provided in the bill. Occasionally Congress will use only the term "activities" by appropriating sufficient funds "for continuing the following activities, but at a rate for operations not in excess of the current rate."

When used in this context, "projects or activities" or simply "activities" does not refer to specific items contained as activities in the administration's budget submission or in a committee report.

Rather, the term refers to the appropriation for the preceding fiscal year. B-204449, November 18, 1981.[10] Thus, if a resolution appropriates funds to continue "projects or activities" under a certain authorizing act at a rate for operations not exceeding the current rate, the agency is operating within the limits of the resolution so long as the total of obligations under the appropriation does not exceed the current rate. Within the appropriation, an agency may fund a particular activity at a higher rate than that activity was funded in the previous year and still not violate the current rate limitation, assuming of course that the resolution itself does not provide to the contrary.

An exception to the interpretation that "projects or activities" refers to the appropriation in existence in the preceding fiscal year occurred in 58 Comp. Gen. 530 (1979). In prior years, Comprehensive Employment and Training Act programs had been funded in two separate appropriations, Employment and Training Assistance and Temporary Employment Assistance. The individual programs under the two appropriations differed only in that the number of jobs provided under Temporary Employment Assistance depended on the condition of the national economy.

Concurrently with the enactment of the 1979 continuing resolution, Congress amended the CETA authorizing legislation so that certain programs previously operating under the Temporary Employment Assistance appropriation were to operate in fiscal year 1980 under the Employment and Training Assistance appropriation. Under these circumstances, if the phrase "activities under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act" in the continuing resolution had been interpreted as referring to the two separate appropriations made in the preceding year, and the current rates calculated accordingly, there would have been insufficient funds available for the now increased programs under the Employment and Training Assistance appropriation, and a surplus of funds available for the decreased programs under the Temporary Employment Assistance appropriation. To avoid this result, the Comptroller General

[10]This position also follows from decisions such as B-162447, March 8, 1971, read in conjunction with decisions on the availability of lump-sum appropriations. Of course, if the appropriation for the preceding fiscal year was a line-item appropriation, then the scope of "project or activity" will be limited accordingly. See 66 Comp. Gen. 484 (1987) (Special Defense Acquisition Fund, a revolving fund made available by annual "limitation on obligations" provisions, held a "project or activity" for purposes of appropriating language in a continuing resolution).

interpreted the 1979 continuing resolution as appropriating a single lump-sum amount for all CETA programs, based on the combined current rates of the two appropriation accounts for the previous year. See 58 Comp. Gen. at 535–36.

The term "projects or activities" has also been used in continuing resolutions to prohibit the use of funds to start new programs. Thus, many resolutions have contained a section stating that no funds made available under the resolution shall be available to initiate or resume any project or activity which was not conducted during the preceding fiscal year. When used in this context, the term "projects or activities" refers to the individual program rather than the total appropriation. See 52 Comp. Gen. 270 (1972); 35 Comp. Gen. 156 (1955).

One exception to this interpretation occurred in B-178131, March 8, 1973. In that instance, in the previous fiscal year funds were available generally for construction of buildings, including plans and specifications. However, a specific construction project was not actually under way during the previous year. Nonetheless it was decided that, because funds were available generally for construction in the previous year, this specific project was not a new project or activity and thus could be funded under the continuing resolution.[11]

In more recent years, Congress has resolved the differing interpretations of "project or activity" by altering the language of the new program limitation. Rather than limiting funds to programs which were actually conducted in the preceding year, the more recent resolutions prohibit use of funds appropriated by the resolution for "any project or activity for which appropriations, funds, or other authority were not available" during the preceding fiscal year.[12] Thus, if an agency had authority and sufficient funds to carry out a particular program in the preceding year, that program is not a new project or activity regardless of whether it was actually operating in the preceding year.

A variation occurred in 60 Comp. Gen. 263 (1981). A provision of the Higher Education Act authorized loans to institutions of higher education from a revolving fund, not to exceed limitations specified in appropriation acts. Congress had not released money from the loan fund since 1978. The FY 1981 continuing resolution provided funds to the Department of Education based on its regular FY 1981 appropriation bill as passed by the House of Representatives. The House-passed version included $25 million for the higher education loans. Since the continuing resolution did not include a general prohibition against using funds for projects not funded during the preceding fiscal year, the $25 million from the loan fund was available under the continuing resolution, notwithstanding that the program had not been funded in the preceding year.

[11]Cf. 4 Lawrence, First Comp. Dec. 116 (1883), which concluded that obligations made under a continuing resolution for certain building repairs not then authorized violated the Antideficiency Act.

[12]See, for example, Pub. L. No. 101-100, § 101(c), 103 Stat. 638 (1989) (1990 continuing resolution).

D. Relationship to Other Legislation

1. Not Otherwise Provided For

Continuing resolutions often appropriate funds to continue projects "not otherwise provided for." This language limits funding to those programs which are not funded by any other appropriation act. Programs which received funds under another appropriation act are not covered by the resolution even though the authorizing legislation which created the program is mentioned specifically in the continuing resolution. See B-183433, March 28, 1979. For example, if a resolution appropriates funds to continue activities under the Social Security Act, and a specific program under the Social Security Act has already been funded in a regular appropriation act, the resolution does not appropriate any additional funds for that program.

2. Status of Bill or Budget Estimate Used as Reference

When a continuing resolution appropriates funds at a rate for operations specified in a certain bill or in the administration's budget estimate, the status of the bill or estimate on the date the resolution passes is controlling, unless the resolution specifies some other reference date.

A continuing resolution will often provide funds to continue activities at a rate provided in a certain bill that has passed one or both Houses of Congress, or at the rate provided in the administration's budget estimate. In such instances, the resolution is referring to the status of and employees of the United States." To the extent they operate with funds which are regarded as appropriated funds, they too are subject to 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a)(1). E.g., B-223857, February 27, 1987 (Commodity Credit Corporation); B-135075-O.M., February 14, 1975 (Inter-American Foundation). It follows that section 1341(a)(1) does not apply to a government corporation which is not an agency of the United States Government. E.g., B-175155, July 26, 1976 (Amtrak). These principles are, of course, subject to variation if and to the extent provided in the relevant organic legislation.

There are two distinct prohibitions in section 1341(a)(1). Unless otherwise authorized by law, no officer or employee of the United States may make (or authorize the making of) an expenditure, or create or involve (or authorize the creation or involvement of) the United States in any contract or obligation to make future expenditures, in the absence of sufficient funds in the account to cover the payment or the obligation at the time it is made or incurred. Put another way, the two sets of prohibitions are concerned with

- Making expenditures or incurring obligations in excess of available appropriations; and
- Making expenditures or incurring obligations in advance of appropriations.

The distinction between obligating in excess of an appropriation and obligating in advance of an appropriation is clear in the majority of cases, but can occasionally become blurred. For example, an agency which tries to meet a current shortfall by "borrowing" from (i.e., obligating against) the unenacted appropriation for the next fiscal year is clearly obligating in advance of an appropriation. E.g., B-236667, January 26, 1990. However, it is also obligating in excess of the currently available appropriation. Since both are equally illegal, determining precisely which subsection of 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a) has been violated is of secondary importance. In any event, the point to be stressed here is that the law is violated not only if there are insufficient funds in an account when a payment becomes due. The very act of obligating the United States to make a payment when the necessary funds are not already in the account is also a violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a).

Note that the statute refers to overspending the amount available in an "appropriation or fund." OMB Circular No. A-34 specifies:

the bill or budget estimate on the date the resolution became law. B-164031(2).17, December 5, 1975; B-152098, January 30, 1970.

For example, the resolution may provide that activities are to be continued at the current rate or at the rate provided in the budget estimate, whichever is lower. The budget estimate referred to is the one in existence at the time the resolution is enacted, and the rate for operations cannot be increased by a subsequent upward revision of the budget estimate. B-164031(2).17, December 5, 1975.

Similarly, if a resolution provides that activities are to continue at the rate provided in a certain appropriation bill, the resolution is referring to the status of the bill on the date the resolution is enacted. A later veto of the bill by the President would not affect the continuation of programs under the resolution. B-152098, January 15, 1973.

Where a continuing resolution provides funds based on a reference bill, this includes restrictions or limitations contained in the reference bill, as well as the amounts appropriated, unless the continuing resolution provides otherwise. 33 Comp. Gen. 20 (B-116069, July 10, 1953);[13] B-199966, September 10, 1980. In National Treasury Employees Union v. Devine, 733 F.2d 114 (D.C. Cir. 1984), the court construed a provision in a reference bill prohibiting the implementation of certain regulations, accepting without question the restriction as having been "enacted into law" by a continuing resolution which provided funds "to the extent and in the manner provided for" in the reference bill. See also Connecticut v. Schweiker, 684 F.2d 979 (D.C. Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1207. Obviously, the same result applies under a "full text" continuing resolution. B-221694, April 8, 1986.

A provision in a continuing resolution using a reference bill may incorporate legislative history, in which event the specified item of legislative history will determine the controlling version of the reference bill. For example, an issue in American Federation of Government Employees v. Devine, 525 F. Supp. 250 (D.D.C. 1981), was whether the 1982 continuing resolution prohibited the Office of Personnel Management from funding coverage of therapeutic abortions in government health plans. The resolution funded employee health benefits "under the authority and conditions set forth in H.R. 4121 as reported to the Senate on September 22, 1981." An earlier version of H.R. 4121 had included a provision barring the funding of therapeutic abortions. However, the bill as reported to the full Senate by the Appropriations Committee on September 22, 1981, dropped the provision. Accordingly, the continuing resolution could not form the basis for refusing to fund therapeutic abortions in the plaintiff's 1982 health plan.

[13]Two decisions begin on the same page, hence the variation in citation format.

It is also not uncommon for a continuing resolution to appropriate funds as provided in a particular reference bill at a rate for operations provided for in the conference report on the reference bill. At a minimum, this will include items on which the House and Senate conferees agreed, as reflected in the conference report. If the resolution also incorporates the "joint explanatory statement" portion of the conference report, then it will enact those amendments reported in "technical disagreement" as well. See B-221694, April 8, 1986; B-205523, November 18, 1981; B-204449, November 18, 1981.

3. More Restrictive Authority

The "more restrictive authority," as that term is used in continuing resolutions, is the version of a bill which gives an agency less discretion in obligating and disbursing funds under a certain program.

Continuing resolutions will often appropriate funds to continue projects or activities at the rate provided in either the version of an appropriation act that has passed the House or the version that has passed the Senate, whichever is lower "or under the more restrictive authority." Under this language, the version of the bill which appropriates the lesser amount of money for an activity will be controlling. If both versions of the bill appropriate the same amount, the version which gives the agency less discretion in obligating and disbursing funds under a program is the "more restrictive authority" and will be the reference for continuing the program under the resolution. B-210922, March 30, 1984; B-152098, March 26, 1973; B-152554, December 15, 1970.

However, this provision may not be used to amend or nullify a mandatory provision of prior permanent law. To illustrate, the Federal Housing Administration was required by a provision of permanent law to appoint an Assistant Commissioner to perform certain functions. The position subsequently became controversial. For the first month of fiscal year 1954, the agency operated under a continuing resolution which included the "more restrictive authority" provision. Language abolishing the position had been contained in one version of the reference bill, but not both. The bill, when subsequently enacted, abolished the position.

Under a strict application of the "more restrictive authority" provision, it could be argued that there was no authority to continue the employment of the Assistant Commissioner during the month covered by the continuing resolution. Noting that "laws are to be given a sensible construction where a literal application thereof would lead to unjust or absurd consequences, which should be avoided if a reasonable application is consistent with the legislative purpose," the Comptroller General held that the Assistant Commissioner could be paid his salary for the month in question. B-116566, September 14, 1953. The decision concluded:

"[M]anifestly the [more restrictive authority] language . . . was not designed to amend or nullify prior permanent law which theretofore required, or might thereafter require, the continuance of a specific project or activity during July 1953. . . .

". . . Accordingly, it is concluded that the words 'the lesser amount or the more restrictive authority' as used in [the continuing resolution] had reference to such funds and authority as theretofore were provided in appropriations for [the preceding fiscal year], and which might be changed, enlarged or restricted from year to year."

In addition, continuing resolutions frequently provide that a provision "which by its terms is applicable to more than one appropriation" and which was not included in the applicable appropriation act for the preceding fiscal year, will not be applicable to funds or authority under the resolution unless it was included in identical form in the relevant appropriation bill as passed by both the House and the Senate. Thus, in 52 Comp. Gen. 71 (1972), a provision in the House version of the 1973 Labor Department appropriation act prohibited the use of "funds appropriated by this Act" for Occupational Safety and Health Act inspections of firms employing 25 persons or less. The Senate version contained the identical version except that "15" was substituted for "25." The continuing resolution for that year contained both the "more restrictive authority" and the "applicable to more than one appropriation" provisions. The Comptroller General concluded that, even though the House provision was more restrictive, the OSHA provision did not apply to funds under the continuing resolution since it had not been contained in the 1972 appropriation act and by its terms it was applicable to more than one appropriation (i.e., it applied to the entire appropriation act). See also B-142011, August 6, 1969.

For purposes of the "applicable to more than one appropriation" provision, GAO has construed the "applicable appropriation act for the preceding fiscal year" as meaning the regular appropriation act for the preceding year and not a supplemental. B-210922, March 30, 1984. (The cited decision also illustrates some of the complexities encountered when the appropriation act for the preceding year was itself a continuing resolution.)

4. Lack of Authorizing Legislation

In order for a government agency to carry out a program, the program must first be authorized by law and then funded, usually by means of regular appropriations. This section deals with the relationship of continuing resolutions to programs whose authorization has expired or is about to expire. The common issue is the extent to which a continuing resolution provides authority to continue the program after expiration of the underlying authorization.

As the following discussion will reveal, there are no easy answers. The cases frequently involve a complex interrelationship of various legislative actions (or inactions), and are not susceptible to any meaningful formulation of simple rules. For the most part, the answer is primarily a question of intent, circumscribed of course by statutory language and aided by various rules of statutory construction.

We start with a fairly straightforward case. Toward the end of FY 1984, Congress was considering legislation (S.2456) to establish a commission to study the Ukrainian famine of 1932–33. The bill passed the Senate but was not enacted into law before the end of the fiscal year. The FY 1985 continuing resolution provided that "[t]here are hereby appropriated $400,000 to carry out the provisions of S.2456, as passed by the Senate on September 21, 1984."[14] If this provision were not construed as authorizing the establishment and operation of the commission as well as the appropriation of funds, it would have been absolutely meaningless. Accordingly, GAO concluded that the appropriation incorporated the substantive authority of S.2456. B-219727, July 30, 1985. The result was supported by clear and explicit legislative history.

[14]Pub. L. No. 98-473, § 136, 98 Stat. 1837, 1973 (1984).

In a 1975 case, GAO held that the specific inclusion of a program in a continuing resolution will provide both authorization and funding to continue the program despite the expiration of the appropriation authorization legislation. Thus, for example, if the continuing resolution specifically states that the School Breakfast Program is to be continued under the resolution, the program may be continued although funding authorization legislation for the program expires prior to or during the period the resolution is in effect. 55 Comp. Gen. 289 (1975). The same result would follow if the intent to continue the program was made particularly clear in legislative history. 65 Comp. Gen. 318, 320–21 (1986).

The result in 55 Comp. Gen. 289 flows from two concepts. First, the continuing resolution, as the later enactment, is the more recent expression of congressional intent. Second, if Congress can appropriate funds in excess of a specific ceiling in authorizing legislation, which it can, then it should be able to appropriate funds to continue a program whose funding authorization is about to expire, at least where the authorization of appropriations is not a legal prerequisite to the appropriation itself.

However, the "rule" of 55 Comp. Gen. 289 is not an absolute and the result in any given case will depend on several variables. Although not spelled out as such in any of the decisions, the variables may include: the degree of specificity in the continuing resolution; the apparent intent of Congress with respect to the expired program; whether what has expired is an authorization of appropriations or the underlying program authority itself; and the duration of the continuing resolution (short-term vs. full fiscal year).

In one case, for example, "all authority" under the Manpower Development and Training Act terminated on June 30, 1973. The program was not specifically provided for in the 1974 continuing resolution, and the authority in fact was not reestablished until enactment of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act six months later. Under these circumstances, the Claims Court held that, in the absence of express language in the continuing resolution or elsewhere, contracts entered into during the gap between expiration of the MDTA and enactment of CETA were without legal authority and did not bind the government. Consortium Venture Corp. v. United States, 5 Cl. Ct. 47 (1984), aff'd mem., 765 F.2d 163 (Fed. Cir. 1985).

In another case, recent Defense Department authorization acts, including the one for FY 1985, had authorized a test program involving payment of a price differential to "labor surplus area" contractors. The test program amounted to an exemption from permanent legislation prohibiting the payment of such differentials. The 1985 provision expired, of course, at the end of FY 1985. The 1986 continuing resolution made no specific provision for the test program nor was there any evidence of congressional intent to continue the test program under the resolution. (This lack of intent was confirmed when the 1986 authorization act was subsequently enacted without the test program provision.) GAO found that the Defense Logistics Agency's failure to apply the price differential in evaluating bids on a contract awarded under the continuing resolution (even though the differential had been included in the solicitation issued prior to the close of FY 1985) was not legally objectionable. 65 Comp. Gen. 318 (1986).

A more difficult case was presented in B-207186, February 10, 1989. Congress enacted two pieces of legislation on December 22, 1987. One was a temporary extension of the Solar Bank, which had been scheduled to go out of existence on September 30, 1987. Congress had enacted several temporary extensions while it was considering reauthorization, the one in question extending the Bank's life to March 15, 1988. The second piece of legislation was the final continuing resolution for 1988 which funded the government for the remainder of the fiscal year. The resolution included a specific appropriation of $1.5 million for the Solar Bank, with a two-year period of availability.

If the concept of 55 Comp. Gen. 289 were applied, the result would have been that the specific appropriation in the continuing resolution, in effect, reauthorized the Solar Bank as well. However, the "later enactment of Congress" concept has little relevance when both laws are enacted on the same day. In addition, in contrast to 55 Comp. Gen. 289, there was no indication of congressional intent to continue the Solar Bank beyond the March 1988 expiration date. Therefore, GAO distinguished prior cases, [15] found that the two pieces of legislation could be reconciled, and concluded that the resolution merely appropriated funds for the Bank to use during the remainder of its existence.

Another case involving a sunset provision is 71 Comp. Gen. 378 (1992). The legislation establishing the United States Commission on Civil Rights provided for the Commission to terminate on September 30, 1991. During fiscal year 1991, Congress was working on the Commission's reauthorization and its regular FY 1992 appropriation. Although both bills passed both Houses of Congress, neither was enacted into law by September 30. The first continuing resolution for FY 1992, with a cutoff date of October 29, 1991, expressly provided funds for activities included in the Commission's yet-unenacted 1992 appropriations bill. It was clear from all of this that Congress intended the Commission to continue operating beyond September 30. Thus, the continuing resolution effectively suspended the sunset date and authorized the Commission to operate until October 28, 1991, when the regular 1992 appropriation act was enacted, at which time the regular appropriation provided similar authority until November 26, when the reauthorization was enacted.

Appropriation bills sometimes contain provisions making the availability of the appropriations contingent upon the enactment of additional authorizing legislation. If a continuing resolution used a bill with such a provision as a reference, and if the authorizing legislation was not enacted, the amount contained in the appropriation bill, and therefore the amount appropriated by the continuing resolution, would be zero. To avoid this possibility, a continuing resolution may contain a provision suspending the effectiveness of such "contingency" provisions for the life of the resolution.[16] Such a suspension provision will be applicable only until the referenced appropriation bill is enacted into law. 55 Comp. Gen. 289, 294 (1975).

[15]GAO had also applied the concept of 55 Comp. Gen. 289 in 65 Comp. Gen. 524 (1986), holding that a specific provision in a regular appropriation act permitted the continuation of an activity whose organic authority had expired at the end of the preceding fiscal year. See also B-164031(3), January 3, 1973.

[16]E.g., Pub. L. No. 102-109, § 109, 105 Stat. 551, 553 (1992 continuing resolution).

REV_00257410

E. Duration

1. Duration of Continuing Resolution

Continuing resolutions generally provide that the budget authority provided for an activity by the resolution shall remain available until (a) enactment into law of a regular appropriation for the activity, (b) enactment of the applicable appropriation by both Houses of Congress without provision for the activity, or (c) a fixed cutoff date, whichever occurs first.[17] Once either of the first two conditions occurs, or the cutoff date passes, funds appropriated by the resolution are no longer available for obligation and new obligations may be incurred only if a regular appropriation is made or if the termination date of the resolution is extended.

The period of availability of funds under a continuing resolution can be extended by Congress by amending the fixed cutoff date stated in the resolution. B-165731(1), November 10, 1971; B-152098, January 30, 1970. The extension may run beyond the session of Congress in which it is enacted. B-152554, December 15, 1970.

Thus, some fiscal years have seen a series of continuing resolutions, informally designated "first," "second," etc., up to "final." This happens as Congress extends the fixed cutoff date for short time periods until either all the regular appropriation acts are enacted or Congress determines that some or all of the remaining bills will not be enacted individually, in which event relevant portions of the resolution will continue in effect for the remainder of the fiscal year.

The second condition of the standard duration provision—enactment of the appropriation by both Houses without provision for the activity—will be considered to have occurred only when it is clear that Congress intended to terminate the activity. Thus, in B-164031(1), March 14, 1974, although regular and supplemental appropriation acts had been enacted without provision for a program, the Comptroller General decided that funds for the program were still available under the continuing resolution. In this case, the legislative history indicated that in enacting the regular appropriation act, Congress was providing funding for only some of the programs normally funded by this act and was deferring consideration of other programs, including the one in question. Therefore, the second condition was not applicable. Moreover, because supplemental appropriations are intended to provide funding only for new or additional needs, omission of the program from the supplemental did not trigger the second cutoff provision.

[17] E.g., Pub. L. No. 102-109, § 106, 105 Stat. at 553.

As discussed previously, once the applicable appropriation is enacted into law, expenditures made under the continuing resolution are charged to that appropriation, except that valid obligations incurred under the continuing resolution in excess of the amount finally appropriated are charged to the account established under the continuing resolution.

2. Duration of Appropriations

For the most part, the duration (period of obligational availability) of an appropriation under a short-term continuing resolution does not present problems. If you have, say, only one month to incur obligations under a continuing resolution, it matters little that the corresponding appropriation in a regular appropriation act might be a multiple-year or no-year appropriation. Also, once the regular appropriation is enacted, it supersedes the continuing resolution and governs the period of availability. Questions may arise, however, under continuing resolutions whose duration is the balance of the fiscal year.

For example, the continuing resolution for fiscal year 1979 included the standard duration provision described above, with a cutoff date of September 30, 1979, the last day of the fiscal year. However, a provision in the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act stated that "notwithstanding any other provision of law, unless enacted in specific limitation of the provisions of this subsection," appropriations to carry out the CETA program shall remain available for two years. Applying the principle that a specific provision governs over a more general one, it was held that funds appropriated for CETA under the continuing resolution were available for obligation for two years in accordance with the CETA provision. B-194063, May 4, 1979; B-115398.33, March 20, 1979.

A few years earlier, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia had reached the same result in a case involving grants to states under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. Pennsylvania v. Weinberger, 367 F. Supp. 1378, 1384–85 (D.D.C.

1973). The court stated, "[i]t is a basic premise of statutory construction that in such circumstances the more specific measure . . . is to be held controlling over the general measure where inconsistencies arise in their application." Id. at 1385.

Application of the same principle produced a similar result in B-199966, September 10, 1980. The 1980 continuing resolution appropriated funds for foreign economic assistance loans by referencing the regular 1980 appropriation bill which had passed the House but not the Senate. For that type of situation, the resolution provided for continuation of projects or activities "under the appropriation, fund, or authority granted by the one House [which had passed the bill]." The House-passed bill gave the economic assistance loan funds a two-year period of availability. The continuing resolution also included the standard duration provision with a cutoff date of September 30, 1980. Since the duration provision applied to the entire resolution whereas the provision applicable to the loan funds had a narrower scope, the latter provision was the more specific one and the loan funds were therefore held to be available for two years. See also 60 Comp. Gen. 263 (1981) for further discussion of similar continuing resolution language.

In some instances, an extended period of availability is produced by a specific exemption from the standard duration provision. For example, the 1983 continuing resolution provided foreign assistance funds "under the terms and conditions" set forth in the Foreign Assistance Appropriation Act of 1982, and further exempted that appropriation from the duration provision. Since under the 1982 act, appropriations for the African Development Fund were to remain available until expended, appropriations to the Fund under the continuing resolution were also no-year funds. B-212876, September 21, 1983. In view of the express exemption from the duration provision, there was no need to apply the "specific vs. general" rule because there was no conflict. See also B-210922, March 30, 1984.

3. Impoundment

The duration of a continuing resolution is relevant in determining the application of the Impoundment Control Act. Impoundment in the context of continuing resolutions was discussed in a letter to the Chairman of the House Budget Committee, B-205053, December 31, 1981. Generally, a withholding from obligation of funds provided

"As used in this Circular, the phrase 'appropriation or fund accounts' refers to general fund expenditure accounts, special fund expenditure accounts, public enterprise revolving funds, intragovernmental revolving funds, management funds, trust fund expenditure accounts, and trust revolving fund accounts . . . ."[9]

Thus, for example, the Antideficiency Act applies to Indian trust funds managed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. However, the investment of these funds in certificates of deposit with federally insured banks under authority of 25 U.S.C. § 162a does not, in GAO's opinion, constitute an obligation or expenditure for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1341. Accordingly, overinvested trust funds do not violate the Antideficiency Act unless the overinvested funds, or any attributable interest income, are obligated or expended by the Bureau. B-207047-O.M., June 17, 1983. GAO also views the Act as applicable to presidential and vice-presidential "unvouchered expenditure" accounts. B-239854, June 21, 1990 (internal memorandum).

a. Exhaustion of an Appropriation

When we talk about an appropriation being "exhausted," we are really alluding to any of several different but related situations:

- Depletion of appropriation account (i.e., fully obligated and/or expended).
- Similar depletion of a maximum amount specifically earmarked in a more general lump-sum appropriation.
- Depletion of an amount subject to a monetary ceiling imposed by some other statute (usually, but not always, the relevant program legislation).

(1) Making further payments

In simple terms, once an appropriation is exhausted, the making of any further payments, apart from using unexpended balances to liquidate valid obligations recorded against that appropriation, violates 31 U.S.C. § 1341. When the appropriation is fully expended, no further payments may be made in any case. If an agency finds itself in this position, unless it has transfer authority or other clear statutory basis for making further payments, it has little choice but to seek deficiency or supplemental appropriations from Congress, and to adjust or curtail operations as may be necessary. E.g., 61 Comp. Gen.

[9]OMB Circular No. A-34, Instructions on Budget Execution, Part II, § 21.1 (August 1985).

under a continuing resolution would constitute an impoundment. Where the continuing resolution runs for only part of the fiscal year, the withholding, even if proposed for the duration of the continuing resolution, should be classified as a deferral rather than a rescission. Withholding funds during a temporary continuing resolution is different from withholding them for the life of a regular annual appropriation in that, in the former situation, Congress is still deliberating over the regular funding levels. Also, deferred funds are not permanently lost when a continuing resolution expires if a subsequent funding measure is passed.

Under this interpretation, classification as a rescission would presumably still be appropriate where a regular appropriation is never passed, the agency is operating under continuing resolution authority for the entire fiscal year, and the timing of a withholding is such that insufficient opportunity would remain to utilize the funds. See B-115398, May 9, 1975.

The concepts in the two preceding paragraphs are reflected in OMB Circular No. A-34, § 71.6 (1985).

Impoundment issues under continuing resolutions may arise in other contexts as well. See, e.g., 64 Comp. Gen. 649 (1985) (failure to make funds available based on good faith disagreement over treatment of carryover balances in calculating rate for operations held not to constitute an illegal rescission); B-209676, April 14, 1983 (no improper impoundment where funds were apportioned on basis of budget request although continuing resolution appropriated funds at rate to maintain program level, as long as apportionment was sufficient to maintain requisite program level).

661 (1982); 38 Comp. Gen. 501 (1959). If the appropriation account has expired but has not yet been closed, the agency has the alternative of asking Congress for authority to use current appropriations to liquidate the obligations, an option which may enable more prompt liquidation. B-123964, November 27, 1956.

In many ways, the prohibitions in the Adequacy of Appropriations Act, 41 U.S.C. § 11, parallel those of 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a). For example, a contract in excess of the available appropriation violates both statutes. E.g., 9 Comp. Dec. 423 (1903). However, a contract in compliance with 41 U.S.C. § 11 can still result in a violation of the Antideficiency Act. Presumably, if a contract is entered into and there are sufficient funds available when the contract is signed, there is no violation of 41 U.S.C. § 11. The Antideficiency Act, however, anticipates a further development. Suppose there are sufficient funds available when a particular contract is signed, but during the period before payment becomes due, the agency makes a number of payments to other contractors or incurs a number of other obligations, all charged to the same appropriation account, and finds it has nothing left to pay the contract in question. The Antideficiency Act is violated when the contract payment becomes due even though there was no violation when the contract was signed.

To restate the point, the fact that the incurring of an obligation passes Antideficiency Act muster is no guarantee against future violations with respect to that obligation. Assessment of Antideficiency Act violations is not frozen at the point when the obligation is incurred. Certainly the Act is violated if there are insufficient unobligated balances to support the obligation at the time it is incurred. However, even if the initial obligation was well within available funds, the Act can still be violated if insufficient funds remain to liquidate the obligation when actual payment is due or if upward adjustments cause the obligation to exceed available funds. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 812, 826 (1976).

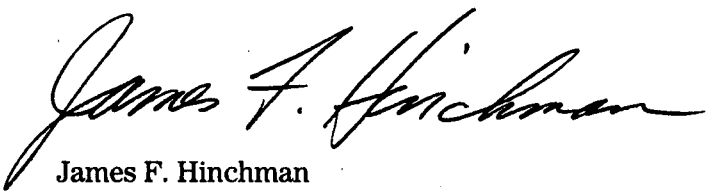
What one authority termed the "granddaddy of all violations" [10] occurred when the Navy overobligated and overspent nearly $110 million from its "Military Personnel, Navy" appropriation during the years 1969-1972, initially discovered in an internal audit. GAO summarized the violation in a letter report, B-177631, June 7, 1973. While there may have been some concealment, GAO concluded that the violation was not the result of some evil scheme; rather, the "basic cause of the violation was the separation of the authority to create obligations from the responsibility to control them." The authority to create obligations had been decentralized while control was centralized in the Bureau of Naval Personnel.

Granddaddy was soon to lose his place of honor on the totem pole. Around November of 1975, the Department of the Army discovered that, for a variety of reasons, it had overobligated four procurement appropriations in the aggregate amount of more than $160 million and consequently had to halt payments to some 900 contractors. The Army asked and received the Comptroller General's advice on a number of potential courses of action it was considering. The resulting decision was 55 Comp. Gen. 768 (1976). The Army acknowledged that there were adequate funds available when all the contracts were signed and therefore the contractors generally had valid, enforceable obligations. However, the Army also recognized its duty to mitigate the Antideficiency Act violation. [11] It was clear that without a deficiency appropriation, all the contractors could not be paid. One option—to use current appropriations to pay the deficiencies—had to be rejected because there is no authority to apply current funds to pay off debts incurred in a previous year.[12] An option GAO sanctioned was to reduce the amount of the deficiencies by terminating some of the contracts for convenience, although the termination costs would still have to come from a deficiency appropriation unless there was enough left in the appropriation accounts to cover them.

[10]Fisher, Presidential Spending Power 236 (1975).

[11]"We believe it is obvious that, once an Antideficiency Act violation has been discovered, the agency concerned must take all reasonable steps to mitigate the effects of the violation insofar as it remains executory." 55 Comp. Gen. at 772.



[12]This statement applies to appropriation accounts which have expired but have not yet been closed. 71 Comp. Gen. ___ (B-245856.7, August 11, 1992). Once an account has been closed, typically 5 fiscal years after expiration, obligations chargeable to that account must, within certain limits, be charged to current appropriations. 31 U.S.C. § 1553(b).

Foreword

This is Volume II of Principles of Federal Appropriations Law, second edition. Publication of this volume continues our process of revising and updating the first (1982) edition of the "Red Book" and reissuing it in what will ultimately be a 4-volume looseleaf set. Volumes I and II supersede all of the completed chapters of the first edition except Chapters 11 and 12, which will be renumbered and covered in Volume III. The fourth and final volume will cover material not included in the first edition.

As we noted in our first volume, our objective in Principles is to present a basic reference work covering those areas of law in which the Comptroller General renders decisions and which are not covered in other GAO publications. We measure our success in this endeavor by Principles' day-to-day utility to its federal and nonfederal audience. In this regard, we appreciate the many comments and suggestions we have received to date, and hope that our publication will continue to serve as a useful reference.

(2) Status of contracts

If the Antideficiency Act prohibits any further payments when the appropriation is exhausted, where does this leave the contractor? Is the contractor expected to know how and at what rate the agency is spending its money? There is a small body of judicial case law which discusses the effect of the exhaustion of appropriations on government obligations. The fate of the contractor seems to depend on the type of appropriation involved and the presence or absence of notice, actual or constructive, to the contractor on the limitations of the appropriation.

Where a contractor is but one party out of several to be paid from a general appropriation, the contractor is under no obligation to know the status or condition of the appropriation account on the government's books. If the appropriation becomes exhausted, the Antideficiency Act may prevent the agency from making any further payments, but valid obligations will remain enforceable in the courts. For example, in Ferris v. United States, 27 Ct. Cl. 542 (1892), the plaintiff had a contract with the government to dredge a channel in the Delaware River. The Corps of Engineers made him stop work halfway through the job because it had run out of money. In discussing the contractor's rights in a breach of contract suit, the court said:

"A contractor who is one of several persons to be paid out of an appropriation is not chargeable with knowledge of its administration, nor can his legal rights be affected or impaired by its maladministration or by its diversion, whether legal or illegal, to other objects. An appropriation per se merely imposes limitations upon the Government's own agents; it is a definite amount of money intrusted to them for distribution; but its insufficiency does not pay the Government's debts, nor cancel its obligations, nor defeat the rights of other parties." Id. at 546.

The rationale for this rule is that "a contractor cannot justly be expected to keep track of appropriations where he is but one of several being paid from the fund." Ross Construction Corp. v. United States, 392 F.2d 984, 987 (Ct. Cl. 1968). Other illustrative cases are Dougherty ex rel. Slavens v. United States, 18 Ct. Cl. 496 (1883), and

Joplin v. United States, 89 Ct. Cl. 345 (1939). The Antideficiency Act may "apply to the official, but [does] not affect the rights in this court of the citizen honestly contracting with the Government." Dougherty, 18 Ct. Cl. at 503. Thus, it is settled that contractors paid from a general appropriation are not barred from recovering for breach of contract even though the appropriation is exhausted.

However, under a specific line-item appropriation, the answer is different. The contractor in this situation is deemed to have notice of the limits on the spending power of the government official with whom he contracts. A contract under these circumstances is valid only up to the amount of the available appropriation. Exhaustion of the appropriation will generally bar any further recovery beyond that limit. E.g., Sutton v. United States, 256 U.S. 575 (1921); Hooe v. United States, 218 U.S. 322 (1910); Shipman v. United States, 18 Ct. Cl. 138 (1883); Dougherty, 18 Ct. Cl. at 503.

The distinction between the Ferris and Sutton lines of cases follows logically from the old maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse. If Congress appropriates a specific dollar amount for a particular contract, that amount is specified in the appropriation act and the contractor is deemed to know it. It is certainly not difficult to locate. If, on the other hand, a contract is but one activity under a larger appropriation, it is not reasonable to expect the contractor to know how much of that appropriation remains available for it at any given time. A requirement to obtain this information would place an unreasonable burden on the contractor, not to mention a nuisance for the government as well.

In two cases in the 1960s, the Court of Claims permitted recovery on contractor claims in excess of a specific monetary ceiling. See Anthony P. Miller, Inc. v. United States, 348 F.2d 475 (Ct. Cl. 1965) (claim by Capehart Housing Act contractor), and Ross Construction Corp. v. United States, 392 F.2d 984 (Ct. Cl. 1968) (claim by contractor for "off-site" construction ancillary to Capehart Act housing). The court distinguished between matters not the fault or responsibility of the contractor (for example, defective plans or specifications or changed conditions under the "changed conditions" clause), in which case above-ceiling claims are allowable, and excess costs resulting from what it termed "simple extras," in which case they are not. Without attempting to detail the fairly complex Capehart legislation here, we note merely that Ross is more closely analogous to the Ferris situation (392 F.2d at 986), while Anthony P. Miller is more closely analogous to the Sutton situation (392 F.2d at 987). The extent to which the approach reflected in these cases will be applied to the more traditional form of exhaustion of appropriations remains to be developed, although the Ross court intimated that it saw no real distinction for these purposes between a specific appropriation and a specific monetary ceiling imposed by other legislation (id.).

b. Contracts or Other Obligations in Excess or Advance of Appropriations

It is easy enough to say that the Antideficiency Act prohibits you from obligating a million dollars when you have only half a million left in the account, or that it prohibits you from entering into a contract in September purporting to obligate funds for the next fiscal year that have not yet been appropriated. Many of the situations that actually arise from day to day, however, are not quite that simple. A useful starting point is the relationship of the Antideficiency Act to the recording of obligations under 31 U.S.C. § 1501.

(1) Recording obligations

Proper recording practices are essential to sound fund control. However, it should be apparent that, if the Antideficiency Act is to mean anything, the actual recording of obligations cannot by itself provide a sufficient basis on which to assess potential violations. Reliance solely on the recording of obligations can produce error in two directions. It can suggest violations which in fact do not exist, and it can overlook violations which do exist.

If it appears that the total amount of recorded obligations exceeds the available appropriation, there may be several reasons for this other than an Antideficiency Act violation. Excessively high estimates may have been recorded, through either error or an excess of caution, which subsequent liquidation reveals can be reduced. Items may have been incorrectly posted or improperly recorded as obligations. Or, accounts receivable that should be credited to the appropriation may not have been properly identified and taken into consideration.

For these reasons, an amount of recorded obligations in excess of the available appropriation is prima facie evidence of a violation of the Antideficiency Act, but is not conclusive. B-134474-O.M., December 18, 1957. Similarly, GAO has cautioned that an Antideficiency Act violation should not be determined solely on the basis of year-end reports prior to reconciliation and adjustment. B-114841.2-O.M., January 23, 1986.

If an examination of recorded obligations can be misleading in the sense of indicating violations which in fact do not exist, the converse is also true. Violations may exist which recorded obligations alone will not disclose. Again, there are several reasons. One important principle is stated in the following passage:

> "[T]he recording of obligations under 31 U.S.C. § [1501] is not the sole consideration in determining violations of 31 U.S.C. § [1341] . . . . We believe that the words 'any contract or other obligation' as used in [the predecessor of 31 U.S.C. § 1341] encompass not merely recorded obligations but other actions which give rise to Government liability and will ultimately require the expenditure of appropriated funds."

55 Comp. Gen. 812, 824 (1976). See also 42 Comp. Gen. 272, 277 (1962) (Act forbids not only the incurring of obligations beyond the period of availability but also "any other obligation or liability which may arise thereunder and ultimately require the expenditure of funds"); B-163058, March 17, 1975; B-133170, January 29, 1975. An example of action of this type might be conduct by an agency which, under a clear line of administrative or judicial precedent, would result in government liability to a contractor through claims proceedings. 55 Comp. Gen. at 824; B-163058, March 17, 1975.

Also, in many situations, the amount of the government's liability is not definitely fixed at the time the obligation is incurred. An example is a contract with price escalation provisions. In other situations, such as certain contingent liability cases, the government is not required to record any obligation unless and until the contingency materializes. Thus, while examining the actual recording of obligations is a necessary first step, it is also essential to look at what happens as the contract is performed.

Finally, the possibility exists that there are valid obligations which the agency has failed or neglected to record. The incurring of an obligation in excess or advance of appropriations violates the Act, and this is not affected by the agency's failure to record the obligation. E.g., 65 Comp. Gen. 4, 9 (1985); 62 Comp. Gen. 692, 700 (1983); 55 Comp. Gen. 812, 824 (1976).

In sum, for purposes of assessing violations of the Antideficiency Act, you must start by looking at the actual recording of obligations, but you cannot end there.

(2) Obligation in excess of appropriation

Incurring an obligation in excess of the available appropriation violates 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a)(1).[13] As the Comptroller of the Treasury advised an agency head many years ago, "your authority in the matter was strictly limited by the amount of the appropriation . . .; otherwise there would be no limit to your power to incur expenses for the service of a particular fiscal year . . . ." 9 Comp. Dec. 423, 425 (1903). If you want higher authority, the Supreme Court has stated that, absent statutory authorization, "it is clear that the head of the department cannot involve the government in an obligation to pay any thing in excess of the appropriation." Bradley v. United States, 98 U.S. 104, 114 (1878).

To take a fairly simple illustration, the statute was violated by an agency's acceptance of an offer to install automatic telephone equipment for $40,000 when the unobligated balance in the relevant appropriation was only $20,000. 35 Comp. Gen. 356 (1955).

In a 1969 case, the Air Force wanted to purchase computer equipment but did not have sufficient funds available. It attempted an arrangement whereby it made an initial down payment, with the balance of the purchase price to be paid in installments over a period of years, the contract to continue unless the government took affirmative action to terminate. This was nothing more than a sale on credit, and since the contract constituted an obligation in excess of available funds, it violated the Antideficiency Act. 48 Comp. Gen. 494 (1969).

[13]Determining the amount of available budgetary resources against which obligations may be incurred is covered later in this chapter under the heading "Amount of Available Appropriation or Fund."

(3) Variable quantity contracts

A leading case discussing the Antideficiency Act ramifications of "variable quantity" contracts (requirements contracts, indefinite quantity contracts, and similar arrangements)[14] is 42 Comp. Gen. 272 (1962). That decision considered a three-year contract the Air Force had awarded to a firm to provide any service or maintenance work necessary for government aircraft landing on Wake Island. GAO questioned the legality of entering into the contract for more than one year, since the Air Force had only a one-year appropriation available. The Air Force argued that it was a "requirements" contract. No obligation would arise unless or until some maintenance work was ordered. The only obligation was a negative one—not to buy service from anyone else but the contractor should the services be needed. GAO disagreed. The services covered were "automatic incidents of the use of the air field." There was no place for a true administrative determination that the services were or were not needed. There was no true "contingency" as the services would almost certainly be needed if the base were to remain operational. Accordingly, the contract was not a true requirements contract but amounted to a firm obligation for the needs of future years, and was therefore an unauthorized multi-year contract. As such, it violated the Antideficiency Act. GAO recognized that the rules in this area could create difficult problems, especially in remote spots like Wake Island, but felt that the only solution was to ask Congress for multi-year procurement authority.[15]

The Wake Island decision noted that the contract contained no provision permitting the Air Force to reduce or eliminate requirements short of a termination for convenience. Id. at 277. If the contract had included such a provision—and in the unlikely event that, given the nature of the contract, such a provision could have been meaningful—a somewhat different analysis might have resulted. Compare, for example, the situation in 55 Comp. Gen. 812 (1976). The exercise of a contract option required the Navy to furnish various items of government-furnished property (GFP), but another contract clause authorized the Navy to unilaterally delete items of GFP. If the entire quantity of GFP had to be treated as a firm obligation at the time the option was exercised, the obligation would have exceeded available appropriations, resulting in an Antideficiency Act violation. However, since the Navy was not absolutely obligated to furnish all the GFP items at the time the option was exercised, it was inappropriate to use the full value of all GFP items under the contract to assess a violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1341 at that time. The Navy could avert a violation if it were able to delete enough GFP to stay within the available appropriation; if it found that it could not do so, the violation would then exist.[16] See also B-134474-O.M., December 18, 1957.

[14]We cover the obligational treatment of contracts of this type in Chapter 7, Section B.1.e, which should be read in conjunction with this section.

[15]The authority was subsequently sought and granted, and is found at 10 U.S.C. § 2306(g).

In 47 Comp. Gen. 155 (1967), GAO considered an Air Force contract for mobile generator sets which specified minimum and maximum quantities to be purchased over a 12-month period. Since the contract committed the Air Force to purchase only the minimum quantity, it was necessary to obligate only sufficient funds to cover that minimum. Subsequent orders for additional quantities up to the maximum were not legally objectionable as long as the Air Force had sufficient funds to cover the cost when it placed those orders. See also 19 Comp. Gen. 980 (1940). The fact that the Air Force did not, at the time it entered into the contract, have sufficient funds available to cover the maximum quantity was, for Antideficiency Act purposes, irrelevant. The decision distinguished the Wake Island case on the basis that nothing in the mobile generator contract purported to commit the Air Force to obtain any requirements over and above the specified minimum from the contractor.

In a more recent case, GAO found no Antideficiency Act problems with a General Services Administration "Multiple Award Schedule" contract under which no minimum purchases were guaranteed and no binding obligation would arise unless and until a using agency made an administrative determination that it had a requirement for a scheduled item. 63 Comp. Gen. 129 (1983).

[16]The rationale worked in that case because the Navy could stay within the appropriation by deleting a relatively small percentage of GFP. If the numbers had been different, such that the amount of GFP to be deleted were so large as to effectively preclude contractor performance, the analysis might well have been different. In a 1964 report, for example, GAO found the Antideficiency Act violated where the Air Force, to keep within a "minor military construction" ceiling, deleted needed plumbing, heating, and lighting from a building alteration contract, resulting in an incomplete facility, and subsequently charged the deleted items to Operation and Maintenance appropriations. Continuing Inadequate Control Over Programing [sic] and Financing of Construction, B-133316, July 23, 1964, at 12–15.

Regardless of whether we are dealing with a requirements contract, indefinite quantity contract, or some variation, two points apply as far as the Antideficiency Act is concerned:

- Whether or not there is a violation at the time the contract is entered into depends on exactly what the government is obligated to do under the contract.
- Even if there is no violation at the time the contract is entered into, a violation may occur later if the government subsequently incurs an obligation under the contract in excess of available funds, for example, by electing to order a maximum quantity without sufficient funds to cover the quantity ordered.

A conceptually related situation is a contract which gives the government the option of two performances at different prices. The government can enter into such a contract without violating the Antideficiency Act as long as it has sufficient appropriations available at the time the contract is entered into to pay the lesser amount. For example, the Defense Production Act of 1950 authorizes the President to contract for synthetic fuels, but the contract must give the President the option to refuse delivery and instead pay the contractor the amount by which the contract price exceeds the prevalent market price at the time the delivery is made. Such a contract would not violate the Antideficiency Act at the time it is entered into as long as sufficient appropriations are available to pay any anticipated difference between the contract price and the estimated market price at the time of performance. 60 Comp. Gen. 86 (1980). Of course, the government could not choose to accept delivery unless there were sufficient appropriations available at that time to cover the full cost of the fuel under the contract.

(4) Multi-year or "continuing" contracts

A multi-year contract is a contract covering the needs or requirements of more than one fiscal year. Our discussion here presupposes a general familiarity with relevant portions of Chapter 5, primarily the nature of a fixed-term appropriation and the bona fide needs rule as it relates to multi-year contracts.

We start with some very basic propositions:

REV_00257181

- A fixed-term appropriation (fiscal year or multiple-year) may be obligated only during its period of availability.
- A fixed-term appropriation may be validly obligated only for the bona fide needs of that fixed term.
- The Antideficiency Act prohibits the making of contracts which exceed currently available appropriations or which purport to obligate appropriations not yet made.

As we have seen in Chapter 5, performance may extend into a subsequent fiscal year in certain situations. Also, as long as a contract is properly obligated against funds for the year in which it was made, actual payment can extend into subsequent years. Apart from these situations, and unless the agency either has specific multi-year contracting authority (e.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 569 (1983)) or is operating under a no-year appropriation (e.g., 43 Comp. Gen. 657 (1964)), the Antideficiency Act, together with the bona fide needs rule, prohibits contracts purporting to bind the government beyond the obligational duration of the appropriation.[17] This is because the current appropriation is not available for future needs, and appropriations for those future needs have not yet been made. Citations to support this proposition are numerous.[18] The rule applies to any attempt to obligate the government beyond the end of the fiscal year, even where the contract covers a period of only a few months. 24 Comp. Gen. 195 (1944).

The guiding principle still followed today stems from a 1925 decision of the United States Supreme Court. An agency had entered into a long-term lease for office space with one-year money, but its contract specifically provided that payment for periods after the first year was subject to the availability of future appropriations. In Leiter v. United States, 271 U.S. 204 (1925), the Supreme Court specifically rejected that theory. The Court held that the lease was binding on the government only for one fiscal year, and it ceased to exist at the end of the fiscal year in which the obligation was incurred. It takes affirmative action to bring the obligation back to life. The Court stated its position as follows:

"It is not alleged or claimed that these leases were made under any specific authority of law. And since at the time they were made there was no appropriation available for the payment of rent after the first fiscal year, it is clear that in so far as their terms extended beyond that year they were in violation of the express provisions of the [Antideficiency Act]; and, being to that extent executed without authority of law, they created no binding obligation against the United States after the first year. [Citations omitted.] A lease to the Government for a term of years, when entered into under an appropriation available for but one fiscal year, is binding on the Government only for that year. [Citations omitted.] And it is plain that, to make it binding for any subsequent year, it is necessary, not only that an appropriation be made available for the payment of the rent, but that the Government, by its duly authorized officers, affirmatively continue the lease for such subsequent year; thereby, in effect, by the adoption of the original lease, making a new lease under the authority of such appropriation for the subsequent year." Id. at 206–07.

GAO has relied heavily on Leiter in subsequent decisions. For example, GAO refused to approve an automatic, annual renewal of a contract for repair and storage of automotive equipment, even though the contract provided that the government had a right to terminate. The reservation of a right to terminate does not save the contract from the prohibition against binding the government in advance of appropriations. 28 Comp. Gen. 553 (1949).

The Post Office wanted to enter into a contract for services and storage of government-owned highway vehicles for periods up to four years because it could obtain a more favorable flat rate per mile of operations instead of an item by item charge required if the contract was for one year only. GAO held that any contract for continuous maintenance and storage of the vehicles would be prohibited by 31 U.S.C. § 1341 because it would obligate the government beyond the extent of the existing appropriation. However, there would be no legal objection to including a provision which gave the government an affirmative option to renew the contract from year to year, not to exceed four years. 29 Comp. Gen. 451 (1950).[19]

actually become available. 61 Comp. Gen. 184, 187 (1981). Under a one-year contract with renewal options, the fact that funds become available in subsequent years does not place the government under an obligation to exercise the renewal option. Government Systems Advisors, Inc. v. United States, 13 Cl. Ct. 470 (1987), aff'd, 847 F.2d 811 (Fed. Cir. 1988).[20]

Note that, in Leiter, the inclusion of a contract provision conditioning the government's obligation on the subsequent availability of funds was to no avail. In this connection, see also 67 Comp. Gen. 190, 194 (1988); 42 Comp. Gen. 272, 276 (1962); 36 Comp. Gen. 683 (1957). If a "subject to availability" clause were sufficient to permit multi-year contracting, the effect would be automatic continuation from year to year unless the government terminated. If funds were not available and the government nevertheless permitted or acquiesced in the continuation of performance, the contractor would obviously be performing in the expectation of being paid.[21] Apart from questions of legal liability, the failure by Congress to appropriate the money would be a serious breach of faith. Congress would, as a practical, if not a legal matter, have little real choice. This is another example of a type of "coercive deficiency" the Antideficiency Act was intended to prohibit. Thus, it is not enough for the government to retain the option to terminate at any time if sufficient funds are not available. Under Leiter and its progeny, the contract "dies" at the end of the fiscal year, and may be revived only by affirmative action by the government. This "new" contract is then chargeable to appropriations for the subsequent year.

This is not to say that "subject to availability" clauses are not important. They are, and are in fact required by the Federal Acquisition Regulation in several situations: (1) contract actions initiated prior to the availability of funds;[22] (2) certain requirements and indefinite-quantity contracts;[23] (3) fully funded cost-reimbursement contracts;[24] (4) facilities acquisition and use;[25] and (5) incrementally funded cost-reimbursement contracts.[26] FAR, 48 C.F.R. Subpart 32.7. While the prescribed contract clauses vary in complexity, they all have one thing in common—each requires the contracting officer to specifically notify the contractor of the availability of funds and to confirm the notification in writing. The objective of these clauses is compliance with the Antideficiency Act and other funding statutes. See ITT Federal Laboratories, ASBCA No. 12987, 69-2 BCA ¶ 7,849 (1969). What is not sufficient is a simple "subject to availability" clause which would permit automatic continuation subject to the government's right to terminate.

[20]The Claims Court based its conclusion in part on Leiter and the Antideficiency Act; the Federal Circuit relied on the language of the contract.

[21]The Federal Acquisition Regulation states that encouraging a contractor to continue performance in the absence of funds violates the Antideficiency Act. 48 C.F.R. § 32.704(c).

It may be useful at this point to reiterate the basic principle that compliance with the Antideficiency Act is determined on the basis of when an obligation occurs, not when actual payment is scheduled to be made. In the renewal option situation, for example, as long as sufficient funds are available to cover the first year's obligations, there is no violation at the time the contract is made, and this is not affected by the fact that payment may not be made until the following year or later. Of course, a violation would occur when payment becomes due if the appropriation has become exhausted by that time.

Termination charges under renewal option contracts may also present Antideficiency Act complications. As a general proposition, the government has the right to terminate a contract "for the convenience of the government" if that action is determined to be in the government's best interests. The Federal Acquisition Regulation prescribes the required contract clauses. 48 C.F.R. Subpart 49.5 (1991).[27] Under a termination for convenience, the contractor is entitled to be compensated, including a reasonable profit, for the performed portion of the contract, but may not recover anticipatory profits on the terminated portion. E.g., 48 C.F.R. §§ 49.201, 49.202. Total recovery may not exceed the contract price. Id. § 49.207. In a renewal option situation, the government may also simply decline to exercise the option.

In the typical fiscal-year contract, termination does not pose a problem because the basic contract obligation will be sufficient to cover potential termination costs. Under a renewal option contract, however, the situation may differ. A contractor who must incur substantial capital costs at the outset has a legitimate concern over recovering these costs if the government does not renew. A device used to address this problem is a clause requiring the government to pay termination charges or "separate charges" upon early termination. As discussed in Chapter 5, separate charges have been found to violate the bona fide needs rule to the extent they do not reasonably relate to the value of current fiscal year requirements. E.g., 36 Comp. Gen. 683 (1957), aff'd, 37 Comp. Gen. 155 (1957). As such, whether we regard them as obligations against funds not yet appropriated or obligations against current funds for the needs of future years, they also violate the Antideficiency Act.

The leading case in this area is 56 Comp. Gen. 142 (1976), aff'd, 56 Comp. Gen. 505 (1977). The Burroughs Corporation protested the award of a contract to the Honeywell Corporation to provide automatic data processing (ADP) equipment to the Mine Enforcement and Safety Administration. If all renewal options were exercised, the contract would run for 60 months after equipment installation. The contract included a "separate charges" provision under which, if the government failed to exercise any renewal option or otherwise terminated prior to the end of the 60-month systems life, the government would pay a percentage of all future years' rentals based on Honeywell's "list prices" at the time of discontinuance or termination. This provision violated the Antideficiency Act for two reasons. First, it would amount to an obligation of fiscal-year funds for the requirements of future years. And second, it would commit the [27]Where a Termination for Convenience clause is required by regulation, it will be read into the contract whether expressly included or not. G.L. Christian and Associates v. United States, 312 F.2d 418 and 320 F.2d 345 (Ct. Cl. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 954.

government to indeterminate liability because the contractor could raise its list or catalog prices at any time. The government had no way of knowing the amount of its commitment. Similar cases involving separate charges are 56 Comp. Gen. 167 (1976), B-216718.2, November 14, 1984, and B-190659, October 23, 1978.

The Burroughs decision also offers guidance on when separate charges may be acceptable. One instance is where it is the only way the government can obtain its needs. Cited in this regard was 8 Comp. Gen. 654 (1929), a case involving the installation of equipment and the procurement of a water supply from a town. There, however, the town was the only source of a water supply, a situation clearly inapplicable to a competitive industry like ADP. 56 Comp. Gen. at 157. In addition, separate charges are permissible if they, together with payments already made, reasonably represent the value of requirements actually performed. Thus, where the contractor has discounted its price based on the government's stated intent to exercise all renewal options, separate charges may be based on the "reasonable value (e.g., ADP schedule price) of the actually performed work at termination based upon the shortened term." Id. at 158. However, termination charges may not be inconsistent with the Termination for Convenience clause remedy; for example, they may not exceed the value of the contract or include costs not cognizable under a "T for C." Id. at 157.

Where termination charges are otherwise proper, the Antideficiency Act also requires that the agency have sufficient funds available to pay them if and when the contingency materializes. E.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 143 (1983). See also 8 Comp. Gen. 654, 657 (1929) (same point but Antideficiency Act not cited). This requirement is sometimes specified in multi-year contracting legislation. An example is 40 U.S.C. § 757(c)(1), the Information Technology Fund. Congress may also, of course, provide exceptions. E.g., B-174839, March 20, 1984.

c. Indemnification

(1) Prohibition against unlimited liability

Under an indemnification agreement, one party promises, in effect, to cover another party's losses. It is no surprise that the government is often asked to enter into indemnification agreements. The rule is that, absent express statutory authority, the government may not enter into an agreement to indemnify where the amount of the government's liability is indefinite, indeterminate, or potentially unlimited. Such an agreement would violate both the Antideficiency Act, 31 U.S.C. § 1341, and the Adequacy of Appropriations Act, 41 U.S.C. § 11, since it can never be said that sufficient funds have been appropriated to cover the contingency. In plain English, you cannot purport to bind the government to unlimited liability. The rule is not some arcane GAO concoction. The Court of Claims stated in California-Pacific Utilities Co. v. United States, 194 Ct. Cl. 703, 715 (1971):

"The United States Supreme Court, the Court of Claims, and the Comptroller General have consistently held that absent an express provision in an appropriation for reimbursement adequate to make such payment, [the Antideficiency Act] proscribes indemnification on the grounds that it would constitute the obligation of funds not yet appropriated. [Citations omitted.]"

For example, in an early case, the Interior Department, as licensee, entered into an agreement with the Southern Pacific Company under which the Department was to lay telephone and telegraph wires on property owned by the licensor in New Mexico. The agreement included a provision that the Department was to indemnify the Company against any liability resulting from the operation. Upon reviewing the indemnity provision, the Comptroller General found that it purported to impose indeterminate contingent liability on the government. By including the indemnity provision, the contracting officer had exceeded his authority, and the provision was held void. 16 Comp. Gen. 803 (1937).

Similarly, an indefinite and unlimited indemnification provision in a lease entered into by the General Services Administration without statutory authority was held to impose no legal liability on the government. 35 Comp. Gen. 85 (1955).

More recently, in 59 Comp. Gen. 369 (1980), the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration desired to undertake a series of hurricane seeding experiments off the coast of Australia in cooperation with its Australian counterpart. The State Department, as negotiator, sought GAO's opinion on an Australian proposal under which the United States would agree to indemnify Australia against all damages arising from the activities. State recognized that an unlimited agreement would violate the Antideficiency Act and asked whether the proposal would be acceptable if it specified that the government's liability would be subject to the appropriation of funds by Congress for that purpose. GAO conceded that an agreement expressly providing that the United States would not be obligated unless Congress chooses to appropriate the funds would not violate the letter of the law. However, it would violate the spirit of the law because, even though it would impose no legal obligation, it would impose a moral obligation on the United States to make good on its promise. This is still another example of the so-called "coercive deficiency." There was a way out, however. GAO concluded that the government's policy of self-insurance did not apply here. NOAA could therefore purchase private insurance, with the premiums hopefully to be shared by the government of Australia. NOAA's share of the insurance premium would simply be a necessary expense of the project.

Another decision applying the general rule held that the Federal Emergency Management Agency could not agree to provide indeterminate indemnification to agents and brokers under the National Flood Insurance Act. B-201394, April 23, 1981. If FEMA considered indemnification necessary to the success of its program, it could either insert a provision limiting the government's liability to available appropriations or seek broader authority from Congress.

In B-201072, May 3, 1982, the Department of Health and Human Services questioned the use of a contract clause entitled "Insurance—Liability to Third Persons," found in the Federal Procurement Regulations (predecessor to the Federal Acquisition Regulation). The clause purported to permit federal agencies to agree to reimburse contractors, without limit, for liabilities to third persons for death, personal injury, or property damage, arising out of performance of the contract and not compensated by insurance, whether or not caused by the contractor's negligence. Since the clause purported to commit the government to an indefinite liability which could exceed available appropriations, the Comptroller General found it in violation of the Antideficiency Act and the Adequacy of Appropriations Act. This decision was affirmed upon reconsideration in 62 Comp. Gen. 361 (1983), one of GAO's more comprehensive discussions of the indemnification problem.

For other cases applying or discussing the general rule, see 20 Comp. Gen. 95, 100 (1940); 7 Comp. Gen. 507 (1928); 15 Comp. Dec. 405 (1909); B-117057, December 27, 1957; A-95749, October 14, 1938; 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 219, 223–24 (1978). Some court cases are Frank v. United States, 797 F.2d 724, 727 (9th Cir. 1986); Lopez v. Johns Manville, 649 F. Supp. 149 (W.D. Wash. 1986), aff'd on other grounds, 858 F.2d 712 (Fed. Cir. 1988); In re All Asbestos Cases, 603 F. Supp. 599 (D. Hawaii 1984); Wm. T. Thompson Co. v. United States, 26 Cl. Ct. 17, 29 (1992); Hercules Inc. v. United States, 25 Cl. Ct. 616 (1992); Johns-Manville Corp. v. United States, 12 Cl. Ct. 1 (1987). (Several of these are asbestos cases in which the courts rejected claims of an implied agreement to indemnify.) In Johns-Manville Corp. v. United States, the court stated:

> "Contractual agreements that create contingent liabilities for the Government serve to create obligations of funds just as much as do agreements creating definite or certain liabilities. The contingent nature of the liability created by an indemnity agreement does not so lessen its effect on appropriations as to make it immune to the limitations of [the Antideficiency Act]." 12 Cl. Ct. at 25.

The Federal Labor Relations Authority has also applied the anti-indemnity rule. National Federation of Federal Employees and U.S. Department of the Interior, 35 F.L.R.A. 1034 (No. 113, 1990) (proposal to indemnify union against judgments and litigation expenses resulting from drug testing program held contrary to law and therefore nonnegotiable); American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and U.S. Department of Justice, 42 F.L.R.A. 412, 515–17 (No. 33, 1991) (same).

In some of the earlier cases—for example, 7 Comp. Gen. 507 (1928) and 16 Comp. Gen. 803 (1937)—GAO noted as further support for the prohibition the then-existing principle that the United States was not liable for the tortious conduct of its employees. Of course, since the enactment of the Federal Tort Claims Act in 1946, this is no longer true. Thus, the reader should disregard any discussion of the government's lack of tort liability appearing in the earlier cases. The thrust of those cases, namely, the prohibition against open-ended liability, remains valid.

A limited exception to the rule was recognized in 59 Comp. Gen. 705 (1980). In that case, the Comptroller General held that the General Services Administration could agree to certain indemnity provisions in procuring public utility services for government agencies under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act.

The extent of the exception carved out by 59 Comp. Gen. 705 was discussed in a later decision, B-197583, January 19, 1981. There, GAO once again applied the general rule and held that the Architect of the Capitol could not agree to indemnify the Potomac Electric Power Company for loss or damages resulting from PEPCO's performance of tests on equipment installed in government buildings or from certain other equipment owned by PEPCO which could be installed in government buildings to monitor electricity use for conservation purposes. GAO pointed to two distinguishing factors that justified—and limited—the exception in 59 Comp. Gen. 705. First, in 59 Comp. Gen. 705, there was no other source from which the government could obtain the needed utility services. Here, the testing and monitoring could be performed by government employees. The second factor is summarized in the following excerpt from B-197583:

"An even more important distinction, though, is that unlike the situation in the GSA case [59 Comp. Gen. 705], the Architect has not previously been accepting the testing services or using the impulse device from PEPCO and has therefore not previously agreed to the liability represented by the proposed indemnity agreements. In the GSA case, GSA merely sought to enter a contract accepting the same service and attendant liability, previously secured under a non-negotiable tariff, at a rate more advantageous to the Government. Here, however, the Government has other means available to provide the testing and monitoring desired."

Thus, the case did not fall within the "narrow exception created by the GSA decision," and the proposed indemnity agreement was improper. Citing 59 Comp. Gen. 369 (the hurricane seeding case previously discussed), however, GAO suggested that the Architect consider the possibility of obtaining private insurance.

The prohibition against incurring indefinite contingent liabilities is not limited to indemnification agreements. It applies as well to other types of contingent liabilities such as contract termination charges. The cases are included in our preceding discussion of multi-year contracting.

(2) When indemnification may be authorized

Indemnification agreements may be proper if they are limited to available appropriations and are otherwise authorized. Before ever getting to the question of amount, for an indemnity agreement to be permissible in the first place, it must be authorized either expressly or under a necessary expense theory. For example, in 1958, the National Gallery of Art asked if it could enter into an agreement to indemnify a corporation which was providing air conditioning equipment maintenance training to members of the Gallery's engineering staff.

Under the proposal, the Gallery would indemnify the corporation for losses resulting from death or injury to Gallery employees caused by the negligence of the corporation or its employees. In reviewing the proposal, GAO did not find it necessary to address the definite vs. indefinite issue. There was simply no authority for the Gallery to use appropriated funds to pay claims of this type, nor could they be considered authorized training expenses under the Government Employees Training Act. B-137976, December 4, 1958. See also 63 Comp. Gen. 145, 150 (1984); 59 Comp. Gen. 369 (1980); B-201394, April 23, 1981.

Once you cross the purpose hurdle—that is, once you determine that the indemnification proposal you are considering is a legitimate object on which to spend your appropriations—you are ready to grapple with the unlimited liability issue.

One way to deal with this issue is, of course, to specifically limit the amount of the liability assumed to available appropriations. Such a limitation of an indemnity agreement may come about in either of two ways: it may follow necessarily from the nature of the agreement itself, coupled with an appropriate obligation or administrative reservation of funds, or it may be expressly written into the agreement. The latter alternative is the only acceptable one where the government's liability would otherwise be potentially unlimited.

For example, where the government rented buses to transport Selective Service registrants for physical examination or induction, there was no objection to the inclusion of an indemnity provision which was a standard provision in the applicable motor carrier charter coach tariff. 48 Comp. Gen. 361 (1968). Potential liability was not indefinite since it was necessarily limited to the value of the motor carrier's equipment.

Similarly, under a contract for the lease of aircraft, the Federal Aviation Administration could agree to indemnify the owner for loss or damage to the aircraft in order to eliminate the need to reimburse the owner for the cost of "hull insurance" and thereby secure a lower rental rate. The liability could properly be viewed as a necessary expense incident to hiring the aircraft, FAA had no-year appropriations available to pay for any such liability, and, as in the Selective Service case, the agreement was not indefinite because maximum liability was measurable by the fair market value of the aircraft. 42 Comp. Gen. 708 (1963). See also 22 Comp. Gen. 892 (1943) (Maritime Commission could amend contract to agree to indemnify contractor against liability to third parties, in lieu of reimbursing contractor for cost of liability insurance premiums, to the extent of available appropriations and provided liability was limited to coverage of existing insurance policies).[28]

In B-114860, December 19, 1979, the Farmers Home Administration asked whether it could purchase surety bonds or enter into an indemnity agreement in order to obtain the release of deeds of trust for borrowers in Colorado where the original promissory notes had been lost while in FmHA's custody. Colorado law required one or the other where the canceled original note could not be delivered to the Colorado public trustee. GAO concluded that the indemnity agreement was permissible as long as it was limited to an amount not to exceed the original principal amount of the trust deed. The decision further advised that FmHA should administratively reserve sufficient funds to cover its potential liability. This aspect of the decision was reconsidered in B-198161, November 25, 1980. Reviewing the particular circumstances involved, GAO was unable to foresee situations in which the government might be required to indemnify the public trustee, and accordingly advised FmHA that the administrative reservation of funds would not be necessary.

In 63 Comp. Gen. 145 (1984), certain indemnification provisions in a ship-chartering agreement were found not to impose indefinite or potentially unlimited contingent liability because liability could be avoided by certain separate actions solely under the government's control.

In cases like the Selective Service bus case (48 Comp. Gen. 361) and the FAA aircraft case (42 Comp. Gen. 708), even though the government's potential liability is limited and determinable, this fact alone does not guarantee that the agency will have sufficient funds available should the contingency ripen into an obligation. This concern is met in one of two ways. The first is the obligation or administrative reservation of sufficient funds to cover the potential liability. In particular cases, reservation may be determined [28]22 Comp. Gen. 892 is discussed in 62 Comp. Gen. 361, 362–63 (1983), and Johns-Manville Corp. v. United States, 12 Cl. Ct. 1, 23 (1987). The Claims Court noted the "significant deficiency" of 22 Comp. Gen. 892 in that it nowhere mentions the Antideficiency Act.

unnecessary, as in B-198161, above. Also, naturally, a specific directive from Congress will render reservation of funds unnecessary. See B-159141, August 18, 1967. The second way is for the agreement to expressly limit the government's liability to appropriations available at the time of the loss with no implication that Congress will appropriate funds to make up any deficiency.

This second device—the express limitation of the government's liability to available appropriations—is sufficient to cure an otherwise fatally defective (i.e., unlimited) indemnity proposal. GAO has considered this type of provision in several contexts.

For example, the government may in limited circumstances assume the risk of loss to contractor-owned property. While the maximum potential liability would be determinable, it could be very large and the "administrative reservation" of funds is not feasible. Thus, without some form of limitation, such an agreement could result in obligations in excess of available appropriations. The rules concerning the government's assumption of risk on property owned by contractors and used in the performance of their contracts are set forth in 54 Comp. Gen. 824 (1975), modifying B-168106, July 3, 1974. The rules are summarized below:[29]

- If administratively determined to be in the best interest of the government, the government may assume the risk for contractor-owned property which is used solely in the performance of government contracts.
- The government may not assume the risk for contractor-owned property which is used solely for nongovernment work. If the property is used for both government and nongovernment work and the nongovernment portion is separable, the government may not assume the risk relating to the nongovernment work.
- Where the amount of a contractor's commercial work is so insignificant when compared to the amount of the contractor's government work that the government is effectively bearing the entire risk of loss by in essence paying the full insurance premiums, the government may assume the risk if administratively determined to be in the best interest of the government.

[29]54 Comp. Gen. 824 overruled a portion of 42 Comp. Gen. 708, discussed in the text, to the extent it held that there was no need to either obligate or reserve funds. Thus, in a situation like 42 Comp. Gen. 708, the agency would presumably have to either obligate or administratively reserve funds or include a provision like the one described in 54 Comp. Gen. 824.

- Any agreement for the assumption of risk by the government under the above rules must clearly provide that, in the event the government has to pay for losses, payments may not exceed appropriations available at the time of the losses, and that nothing in the contract may be considered as implying that Congress will at a later date appropriate funds sufficient to meet deficiencies.

A somewhat different situation was discussed in 60 Comp. Gen. 584 (1981), involving an "installment purchase plan" for automatic data processing equipment. Under the plan, the General Services Administration would make monthly payments until the entire purchase price was paid, at which time GSA would acquire unencumbered ownership of the equipment. GSA's obligation was conditioned on its exercising an option at the end of each fiscal year to continue payments for the next year. The contract contained a risk of loss provision under which GSA would be required to pay the full price for any equipment lost or damaged during the term. GAO concluded that the equipment should be treated as contractor-owned property for purposes of the risk of loss provision, and that the provision would be improper unless one of the following conditions were met:

1. The contract must include the provisions specified in 54 Comp. Gen. 824 limiting GSA's liability to appropriations available at the time of the loss and expressly precluding any inference that Congress would appropriate sufficient funds to meet any deficiency; or

2. If the contract does not include these provisions, then GSA must obligate sufficient funds to cover its possible liability under the risk of loss provision.

If neither of these conditions are met, the assumption of risk clause could potentially violate the Antideficiency Act by creating an obligation in excess of available appropriations if the contingency occurs.

In a 1982 case, the Defense Department and the state of New York entered into a contract for New York to provide certain support functions for the 1980 Winter Olympic Games at Lake Placid, New York. The contract provided for federal reimbursement of any disability benefits which New York might be required to pay in case of death or injury of persons participating in the operation. The contract specified that the government's liability could not exceed appropriations for assistance to the Games available at the time of a disabling event, and that the contract did not imply that Congress would appropriate funds sufficient to meet any deficiencies. Since these provisions satisfied the test of 54 Comp. Gen. 824, the indemnity agreement was not legally objectionable. B-202518, January 8, 1982. Under this type of arrangement, the time to record an obligation would be when the agency is notified that a disabling event has occurred. The initial recording of course would have to be based on an estimate.

Also, the decision in the National Flood Insurance Act case mentioned above (B-201394, April 23, 1981) noted that the defect could have been cured by inserting a clause along the lines of 54 Comp. Gen. 824. The same point was made in B-201072, May 3, 1982, also discussed earlier. See also National Railroad Passenger Corp. v. United States, 3 Cl. Ct. 516, 521 (1983) (indemnification agreement between Federal Railroad Administration and Amtrak did not violate Antideficiency Act where liability was limited to amount of appropriation).

When we first stated the anti-indemnity rule at the outset of this discussion, we noted that the rule applies in the absence of express statutory authority to the contrary. Naturally, an indemnification agreement, however open-ended it may be, will be "legal" if it is authorized by some express provision of law.

One statutory exception to the indemnification rules exists for certain defense-related contracts by virtue of 50 U.S.C. § 1431, often referred to by its Public Law designation, Public Law 85-804. The statute evolved from a temporary wartime measure, section 201 of the First War Powers Act, 1941, 55 Stat. 838, 839. The implementing details on indemnification are found in Executive Order No. 10789, as amended.[30]

Another statutory exception is 42 U.S.C. § 2210, the Price-Anderson Act, which authorizes indemnification agreements with Nuclear [30]A decision approving an indemnity agreement under authority of the First War Powers Act is B-33801, April 19, 1943. A later related decision is B-33801, October 27, 1943. Both of these decisions involved the famed "Manhattan Project," although that fact is well-concealed. The decisions had been classified, but were declassified in 1986.

REV_00257196

Regulatory Commission licensees and Department of Energy contractors to pay claims resulting from nuclear accidents.

Some of the more recent cases have expressed the view that indemnity agreements, even with limiting language, should not be entered into without congressional approval in view of their potentially disruptive fiscal consequences to the agency.[31] 63 Comp. Gen. 145, 147 (1984); 62 Comp. Gen. 361, 368 (1983); B-242146, August 16, 1991. Precisely what form this approval should take in cases where the contractual language is sufficient to minimally satisfy the Antideficiency Act is not entirely clear.

In 1986, the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation, Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works, in connection with proposed Price-Anderson amendments the committee was considering, asked GAO to identify possible funding options for a statutory indemnification provision. GAO's response, B-197742, August 1, 1986, lists several options and notes the benefits and drawbacks of each from the perspective of congressional flexibility. The options range from creating a statutory entitlement with a permanent indefinite appropriation for payment (indemnity guaranteed but no congressional flexibility), to making payment fully dependent on the appropriations process (full congressional flexibility but no guarantee of payment). In between are various other devices such as contract authority, use of contract provisions such as those in 54 Comp. Gen. 824, and various forms of limited funding authority.

The discussion in B-197742 highlights the essence of the indemnification funding problem:

"An indemnity statute should generally include two features—the indemnification provisions and a funding mechanism. Indemnification provisions can range from a legally binding guarantee to a mere authorization. Funding mechanisms can similarly vary in terms of the degree of congressional control and flexibility retained. It is impossible to maximize both the assurance of payment and congressional flexibility. Either objective is enhanced only at the expense of the other. . . .

. . . .

[31]To illustrate the potential fiscal consequences, an authorized indemnity agreement entered into in 1950 produced liability of over $64 million plus interest more than four decades later. See E.I. Du Pont De Nemours & Co. v. United States, 24 Cl. Ct. 635 (1991).

REV_00257197

"If payment is to be assured, Congress must yield control over funding, either in whole or up to specified ceilings . . . . Conversely, if Congress is to retain funding control, payment cannot be assured in any legally binding form and the indemnification becomes less than an entitlement."

GAO's bottom line: Whatever funding approach Congress may deem desirable in a particular situation should be spelled out in the legislation. Funding should never occur by default.

(3) Summary

Absent specific statutory authority, the government may generally not enter into an indemnification agreement which would impose an indefinite or potentially unlimited liability on the government. Since the obligation or administrative reservation of funds is not a feasible option in the indefinite liability situation, the only cure is for the agreement to expressly limit the government's liability to available appropriations with no implication that Congress will appropriate the money to meet any deficiencies. If the government's potential liability is limited and determinable, an agreement to indemnify will be acceptable if it is otherwise authorized and if appropriate safeguards are taken to protect against violation of the Antideficiency Act. These safeguards may be either the obligation or administrative reservation of sufficient funds to cover the potential liability, or the inclusion in the agreement of a clause expressly limiting the government's liability to available appropriations.

While the preceding discussion reflects the relevant case law as of the date of this publication, GAO is aware that the guidance provided does not solve all problems. For example, limiting an indemnification agreement to appropriations available at the time of the loss, as in B-202518 (the New York Winter Olympics case), may remove the "unlimited liability" objection, but it remains entirely possible that liabilities incurred under such an agreement could exhaust the agency's appropriation and produce further Antideficiency Act complications. Also, from the standpoint of the contractor or other "beneficiary," indemnification under these circumstances can prove largely illusory, as it will obviously make a big difference whether the incident giving rise to the claim occurs at the beginning or the end of a fiscal year.

The indemnification area is concededly a troublesome one. While there are devices that may be employed to structure indemnification agreements in such a way as to make them legally acceptable, they are no substitute for clear legislative authority. If an agency thinks that indemnification agreements in a particular context are sufficiently in the government's interests, the preferable approach is for the agency to go to Congress and seek specific statutory authority.

d. Specific Appropriation Limitations/Purpose Violations

In Chapter 4 we covered in some detail 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a), which prohibits the use of appropriations for purposes other than those for which they were appropriated. As seen in that chapter, violations of purpose availability can arise in a wide variety of contexts—charging an obligation or expenditure to the wrong appropriation, making an obligation or expenditure for an unauthorized purpose, violating a statutory prohibition or restriction, etc. The question we explore in this section is the relationship of purpose availability to the Antideficiency Act. In other words, when and to what extent does a purpose violation also violate the Antideficiency Act?

Why does it matter whether you have violated one statute or two statutes? To our knowledge, nobody is keeping score. The reason here is that, if the second statute is the Antideficiency Act, there are reporting requirements and potential penalties to consider.

A useful starting point is the following excerpt from 63 Comp. Gen. 422, 424 (1984):

> "Not every violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) also constitutes a violation of the Antideficiency Act. . . . Even though an expenditure may have been charged to an improper source, the Antideficiency Act's prohibition against incurring obligations in excess or in advance of available appropriations is not also violated unless no other funds were available for that expenditure. Where, however, no other funds were authorized to be used for the purpose in question (or where those authorized were already obligated), both 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) and § 1341(a) have been violated. In addition, we would consider an Antideficiency Act violation to have occurred where an expenditure was improperly charged and the appropriate fund source, although available at the time, was subsequently obligated, making readjustment of accounts impossible."

First, suppose an agency charges an obligation or expenditure to the wrong appropriation account. This can involve either charging the wrong appropriation for the same time period, or charging the wrong fiscal year. The answer is found in the above passage from 63 Comp. Gen. 422. If the appropriation that should have been charged in the first place has sufficient available funds to enable the adjustment of accounts, there is no Antideficiency Act violation. A violation exists if the proper account does not have enough money to permit the adjustment, and this includes cases where sufficient funds existed at the time of the error but have since been obligated or expended. See also 70 Comp. Gen. 592 (1991); B-222048, February 10, 1987; B-95136, August 8, 1979.

Other cases illustrating or applying this principle are 57 Comp. Gen. 459 (1978) (grant funds charged to wrong fiscal year); B-224702, August 5, 1987 (contract modifications charged to expired accounts rather than current appropriations); B-208697, September 28, 1983 (items charged to General Services Administration Working Capital Fund which should have been charged to other operating appropriations). Actually, the concept of "curing" a violation by making an appropriate adjustment of accounts is not new. See, e.g., 16 Comp. Dec. 750 (1910); 4 Comp. Dec. 314, 317 (1897). The Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals has also followed this principle. New England Tank Industries of New Hampshire, Inc., ASBCA No. 26474, 88-1 BCA ¶ 20,395 (1987).[32]

The next situation to consider is an obligation or expenditure in excess of a statutory ceiling. This may be an earmarked maximum in a more general appropriation or a monetary ceiling imposed by some other legislation. An obligation or expenditure in excess of the ceiling violates 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a). See, for example, the following:

- Monetary ceilings on minor military construction (10 U.S.C. § 2805): 63 Comp. Gen. 422 (1984); Continuing Inadequate Control Over Programing [sic] and Financing of Construction, B-133316, July 23, 1964; Review of Programing [sic] and Financing of Selected Facilities Constructed at Army, Navy, and Air Force Installations, B-133316, January 24, 1961. (The latter two items are audit reports.)[33]

[32]Although the Board's decision was vacated and remanded on other grounds by the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, New England Tank Industries of New Hampshire v. United States, 861 F.2d 685 (Fed. Cir. 1988), the court noted its agreement with the Board's Antideficiency Act conclusions. Id. at 692 n.15.

[33]Another report in this series, making similar findings under a different statutory ceiling, is Illegal Use of Operation and Maintenance Funds for Rehabilitation and Construction of Family Housing and Construction of a Related Facility, B-133102, August 30, 1963.

REV_00257200

- Monetary ceiling on lease payments for family housing units in foreign countries (10 U.S.C. § 2828(e)): report entitled Leased Military Housing Costs in Europe Can Be Reduced by Improving Acquisition Practices and Using Purchase Contracts, GAO/NSIAD-85-113 (July 24, 1985), at 7–8; 66 Comp. Gen. 176 (1986); B-227527/B-227325, October 21, 1987 (non-decision) letter.
- Ceiling in supplemental appropriation: B-204270, October 13, 1981 (dollar limit on Standard Level User Charge payable by agency to General Services Administration). [34]
- Ceiling in authorizing legislation: 64 Comp. Gen. 282 (1985) (dollar limit on two Small Business Administration direct loan programs).

In a statutory ceiling case, the account adjustment concept described above may or may not come into play. If the ceiling represents a limit on the amount available for a particular object, then there generally will be no other funds available for that object and hence no "correct" funding source from which to reimburse the account charged. If, however, the ceiling represents only a limit on the amount available from a particular appropriation and not an absolute limit on expenditures for the object, as in the minor military construction cases, for example, then it may be possible to cure violations by an appropriate adjustment. 63 Comp. Gen. at 424.

The final situation—and from this point on, the law gets a bit murky—is an obligation or expenditure for an object which is prohibited or simply unauthorized. In 60 Comp. Gen. 440 (1981), a proviso in the Customs Service's 1980 appropriation expressly prohibited the use of the appropriation for administrative expenses to pay any employee overtime pay in an amount in excess of $20,000. By allowing employees to earn overtime pay in excess of that amount, the Customs Service violated 31 U.S.C. § 1341. The Comptroller General explained the violation as follows:

"When an appropriation act specifies that an agency's appropriation is not available for a designated purpose, and the agency has no other funds for that purpose, any officer of the agency who authorizes an obligation or expenditure of agency funds for that purpose violates the Antideficiency Act. Since the Congress has not appropriated funds for the designated purpose, the obligation may be viewed either as being in excess of the amount (zero) available for that purpose or as in advance of [34]This case also illustrates that the Antideficiency Act applies to interagency transactions the same as any other obligations or expenditures.

appropriations made for that purpose. In either case the Antideficiency Act is violated." Id. at 441.

In B-201260, September 11, 1984, the Comptroller General advised that expenditures in contravention of the Boland Amendment would violate the Antideficiency Act (although none were found in that case). The Boland Amendment, an appropriation rider, provided that "[n]one of the funds provided in this Act may be used" for certain activities in Central America. In B-229732, December 22, 1988, GAO found the Antideficiency Act violated when the Department of Housing and Urban Development used its funds for commercial trade promotion activities in the Soviet Union, an activity beyond its statutory authority. Similarly, a nonreimbursable interagency detail of an employee, contrary to a specific statutory prohibition, produced a violation in B-247348, June 22, 1992 (letter to Public Printer). All three cases also involved purpose violations and are consistent with 60 Comp. Gen. 440, the rationale being that expenditures would be in excess of available appropriations, which were zero.[35]

However, one court has reached a result which may interpret the Antideficiency Act somewhat differently. In Southern Packaging and Storage Co. v. United States, 588 F. Supp. 532 (D.S.C. 1984), the court found that the Defense Department had purchased certain combat meal products ("MRE") in violation of a "Buy American" appropriation rider, which provided that "[n]o part of any appropriation contained in this Act . . . shall be available" to procure items not grown or produced in the United States. The court rejected the contention that the violation also contravened the Antideficiency Act, stating:

"There is no evidence in this case to show that [the Defense Personnel Supply Center] authorized expenditures beyond the amount appropriated by Congress for the procurement of the MRE rations and the component foods thereof." Id. at 550.

Given the sparse discussion in the decision and the fact that Congress does not make specific appropriations for MRE rations, it is difficult to discern precisely how the Southern Packaging court would apply the Antideficiency Act. While it is possible to reconcile Southern [35]There are also a few older cases finding violations of both statutes, but they are of little help in attempting to formulate a reasoned approach. Examples are 39 Comp. Gen. 388 (1959), which does not discuss the relationship, and 22 Comp. Gen. 772 (1943), which includes a rationale, now obsolete, based on the then-existing lack of authority to include interest stipulations in contracts.

REV_00257202

Packaging with the GAO cases, it is also possible to find an element of inconsistency. In the opinion of the editors, this area requires further careful thought. On the one hand, every expenditure for an unauthorized purpose should not also violate the Antideficiency Act. It does not seem to have been the intent of Congress that every unauthorized entertainment expenditure or every payment for an unauthorized long-distance telephone call be reported to Congress and the President as an Antideficiency Act violation, a result that could be reached by a broad application of the language of 60 Comp. Gen. 440. Yet on the other hand, where Congress has expressly prohibited the use of appropriated funds for some particular expenditure, it seems clear that the "available appropriation" for that item is zero. Further refinement in this area appears necessary.

e. Amount of Available Appropriation or Fund

Questions occasionally arise over precisely what assets an agency may count for purposes of determining the amount of available resources against which it may incur obligations.

The starting point, of course, is the unobligated balance of the relevant appropriation. In Section F of this chapter, we discuss the rule that subdivisions of a lump-sum appropriation appearing in legislative history are not legally binding on the agency. They are binding only if carried into the appropriation act itself, or are made binding by some other statute. Thus, the entire unobligated balance of an unrestricted lump-sum appropriation is theoretically available for Antideficiency Act purposes. 55 Comp. Gen. 812 (1976).[36]

Where an agency is authorized to retain certain receipts or collections for credit to an appropriation or fund under that agency's control, those receipts are treated the same as direct appropriations for purposes of obligation and the Antideficiency Act, subject to any applicable statutory restrictions. E.g., 71 Comp. Gen. 224 (1992) (National Technical Information Service may use subscription payments to defray its operating expenses but, under governing legislation, may use customer advances only for costs directly related to firm orders).

[36]We say "theoretically available" because matching an obligation against the entire unobligated balance will in many cases do little more than postpone the violation until later in the fiscal year.

In addition, certain other assets may be "counted," that is, obligated against. For example, OMB Circular No. A-34 includes certain accounts receivable (also referred to as a form of "offsetting collection") as a "budgetary resource."[37] See also B-134474-O.M., December 18, 1957. This does not mean anticipated receipts from transactions that have not yet occurred or orders that have not yet been placed. Obligations cannot be charged against anticipated proceeds from an anticipated sale of property. 35 Comp. Gen. 356 (1955) (sale of old telephone equipment to be replaced with new equipment); B-209758-O.M., September 29, 1983 (sale of assets seized from embezzler). Thus, the Customs Service violated the Antideficiency Act by obligating against anticipated receipts from future sales of seized property unless it had sufficient funds available from other sources to cover the obligation. B-237135, December 21, 1989. Similarly, the Comptroller General found that the Air Force violated the Antideficiency Act by overobligating its Industrial Fund based on estimated or anticipated customer orders. See report entitled The Air Force Has Incurred Numerous Overobligations in its Industrial Fund, AFMD-81-53 (August 14, 1981); 62 Comp. Gen. 143, 147 (1983). Even where receivables are properly included as budgetary resources, an agency may not incur obligations against receipts expected to be received after the end of the current fiscal year without specific statutory authority. 51 Comp. Gen. 598, 605 (1972).

GAO considered another aspect of the question in 60 Comp. Gen. 520 (1981). The General Services Administration buys furniture and other equipment for other agencies through the General Supply Fund, a revolving fund established by statute. Agencies pay GSA either in advance or by reimbursement. For reasons of economy, GSA normally makes consolidated and bulk purchases of commonly used items. Concern over the application of the Antideficiency Act arose when, for several reasons, the Fund began experiencing cash flow problems. GSA wanted to obligate against the value of inventory in the Fund. In other words, GSA wanted to consider the amount of the available appropriation as the cash assets, including advances, in the Fund, plus inventory.

[37]Budgetary resources include (a) orders from other government accounts that represent valid obligations of the ordering account, and (b) orders from the public, including state and local governments, but only to the extent accompanied by an advance. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 31.4.

The Comptroller General held that inventory in the General Supply Fund did not constitute a "budgetary resource" against which obligations could be incurred. The items in the inventory had already been purchased with appropriated funds and could not be counted again as a new budgetary resource. This was in accord with OMB Circular No. A-34, which does not include inventory as a "budgetary resource" for budget execution purposes. Thus, a violation of the Antideficiency Act would occur at the moment GSA incurs obligations in excess of available "budgetary resources."

Supplemental appropriations, requested but not yet enacted, may not be counted as a budgetary resource. B-230117-O.M., February 8, 1989. See also OMB Circular No. A-34, § 31.4.

f. Intent/Factors Beyond Agency Control

A violation of the Antideficiency Act does not depend on intent or lack of good faith on the part of contracting or other officials who obligate or pay in advance or in excess of appropriations. Although these factors may influence the applicable penalty, they do not affect the basic determination of whether a violation has occurred. 64 Comp. Gen. 282, 289 (1985). The Comptroller General once expressed the principle in the following passage which, although stated in a slightly different context, is equally applicable here:

> "Where a payment is prohibited by law, the utmost good faith on the part of the officer, either in ignorance of the facts or in disregard of the facts, in purporting to authorize the incurring of an obligation the payment of which is so prohibited, cannot take the case out of the statute, otherwise the purported good faith of an officer could be used to nullify the law." A-86742, June 17, 1937.

To illustrate, a contracting officer at the United States Mission to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization accepted an offer for installation of automatic telephone equipment at twice the amount of the unobligated balance remaining in the applicable account. The Department of State explained that the contracting officer had misinterpreted General Accounting Office regulations and implementing State Department procedures. But for this misinterpretation, additional funds could have been placed in the account. State therefore felt that the transaction should not be considered in violation of the Act. GAO did not agree and held that the overobligation must be immediately reported as required by 31 U.S.C. § 1517(b). The official's state of mind was not relevant in deciding whether a violation had occurred. 35 Comp. Gen. 356 (1955).

An overobligation may result from external factors beyond the agency's control. Whether this will produce an Antideficiency Act violation depends on the particular circumstances.

In 58 Comp. Gen. 46 (1978), the Army asked whether it could make payments to a contractor under a contract requiring payment in local (foreign) currency where the original dollar obligation was well within applicable funding limitations but, due to subsequent exchange rate fluctuations, payment would exceed those limitations. The Army argued that a payment under these circumstances should not be considered a violation of the Act because currency fluctuations are totally beyond the control of the contracting officer or any other agency official. GAO disagreed. The fact that the contracting officer was a victim of circumstances does not make a payment in excess of available appropriations any less illegal. (It is, of course, as with state of mind, relevant in assessing penalties for the violation.) See also 38 Comp. Gen. 501 (1959) (severe adverse weather conditions or prolonged employee strikes generally not sufficient to justify overobligation by former Post Office Department, but facts in particular case could justify deficiency apportionment).

In apparent contrast, the Comptroller General stated in 62 Comp. Gen. 692, 700 (1983) that an overobligation resulting from a judicial award of attorney's fees under 28 U.S.C. § 2412(d), the Equal Access to Justice Act, would not violate the Antideficiency Act. See also 63 Comp. Gen. 308, 312 (1984) (judgments or board of contract appeals awards under Contract Disputes Act, same answer); B-227527/B-227325, October 21, 1987 (non-decision letter) (amounts awarded by court judgment need not be counted in determining whether statutory ceiling on lease payments has been exceeded and Antideficiency Act thereby violated); A-37316, July 11, 1931 (land condemnation under Declaration of Taking Act which results in deficiency judgment would not violate Antideficiency Act).[38]

The distinction appears to be based on the extent to which the agency can act to avoid the overobligation even though it is imposed by some external force beyond its control. Thus, the currency fluctuation decision stated:

[38]In apparent contradiction to A-37316 is 54 Comp. Gen. 799 (1975).

"[W]hen a contracting officer finds that the dollars required to continue or make final payment on a contract will exceed a statutory limitation he may terminate the contract, provided the termination costs will not exceed the statutory limitations. Alternatively, the contracting officer may issue a stop work order and the agency may ask Congress for a deficiency appropriation citing the currency fluctuation as the reason for its request."

58 Comp. Gen. at 48. Similarly, the Postmaster General could curtail operations if necessary. 38 Comp. Gen. at 504. See also 66 Comp. Gen. 176 (1986) (Antideficiency Act would not preclude Air Force from entering into lease for overseas family housing without provision limiting annual payments to statutory ceiling, even though certain costs could conceivably escalate above ceiling, where good faith cost estimates were well below ceiling and lease included termination for convenience clause). Where the agency could have acted to avert the overobligation but did not, the violation will not be excused. In contrast, in the case of a payment ordered by a court, comparable options (apart from seeking a deficiency appropriation) are not available. (Curtailing activities after the overobligation has occurred to avoid compounding the violation is a separate question.)

g. Exceptions

An exception to the Antideficiency Act is built right into 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a). The statute prohibits contracts or other obligations in advance or excess of available appropriations, "unless authorized by law." This is nothing more than the recognition that Congress can authorize exceptions to the statutes it enacts.

(1) Contract authority

At the outset, it is necessary to distinguish between "contract authority" and the "authority to enter into contracts." A contract is simply a legal device employed by two or more parties to create binding and legally enforceable obligations in furtherance of some objective. The federal government uses contracts every day to procure a wide variety of goods and services. An agency does not need specific statutory authority to enter into contracts. It has long been established that a government agency has the inherent authority to enter into binding contracts in the execution of its duties. Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U.S. 151, 154 (1886); United States v. Maurice, 26 F. Cas. 1211, 1216–17 (C.C.D. Va. 1823) (No. 15,747). It should be apparent that these contracts, "authorized by law" though they may be, cannot be sufficient to constitute exceptions to the Antideficiency Act, else the Act would be meaningless.

For purposes of the Antideficiency Act exception, a "contract authorized by law" requires not only authority to enter into a contract, but authority to do so without regard to the availability of appropriations. While the former may be inherent, the latter must be conferred by statute. The most common example of this is "contract authority" as that term is defined and described in Chapter 2—statutory authority which specifically authorizes an agency to enter into a contract in excess of, or prior to enactment of, the applicable appropriation.

In some cases, the "exception" language will be unmistakably explicit. An example is the Price-Anderson Act, which provides authority to "make contracts in advance of appropriations and incur obligations without regard to" the Antideficiency Act. 42 U.S.C. § 2210(j). Other examples of clear authority, although perhaps not as explicit as the Price-Anderson Act, may be found in 27 Comp. Gen. 452 (1948) (long-term operating-differential subsidy agreements under the Merchant Marine Act); B-211190, April 5, 1983 (contracts with states under the Federal Boat Safety Act); B-164497(3), June 6, 1979 (certain provisions of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1973); B-168313, November 21, 1969 (interest subsidy agreements with educational institutions under the Housing Act of 1950).

In an earlier case involving contract authority, GAO insisted that the Corps of Engineers had to include a "no liability unless funds are later made available" clause for any work done in excess of available funds. 2 Comp. Gen. 477 (1923). The Corps had trouble with this clause because a Court of Claims decision, C.H. Leavell and Co. v. United States, 530 F.2d 878 (Ct. Cl. 1976), allowed the contractor an equitable adjustment for suspension of work due to a delay in enacting an appropriation to pay him, notwithstanding the "availability of funds" clause. In 56 Comp. Gen. 437 (1977), GAO overruled 2 Comp. Gen. 477, deciding that section 10 of the River and Harbor Act of 1922, by expressly authorizing the Corps to enter into large multi-year civil works projects without seeking a full appropriation in the first year, constituted the necessary exception to the Antideficiency Act and a "funds available" clause was not necessary. This applies as well to contracts financed from the Corps'

Civil Works Revolving Fund. B-242974.6, November 26, 1991 (internal memorandum).

The rationale of 56 Comp. Gen. 437 has also been applied to long-term fuel storage facilities contracts authorized by 10 U.S.C. § 2388. New England Tank Industries of New Hampshire, Inc., ASBCA No. 26474, 88-1 BCA ¶ 20,395 (1987), vacated on other grounds, New England Tank Industries of New Hampshire v. United States, 861 F.2d 685 (Fed. Cir. 1988).

In 28 Comp. Gen. 163 (1948), the Commissioner of Reclamation was authorized in an appropriation act to enter into certain contracts in advance of appropriations but subject to a monetary ceiling. Since the contract authority was explicit, with no language making it contingent on appropriations being made at some later date, the statute authorized the Commissioner to enter into a firm and binding contract.

Contract authority may be "transferred" from one agency to another in certain circumstances. The Bureau of Mines was authorized to enter into a contract (in advance of the appropriation) to construct and equip an anthracite research laboratory. The Bureau asked the General Services Administration to enter into the contract on its behalf pursuant to section 103 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, which provided that "funds appropriated to . . . other Federal agencies for the foregoing purposes [execution of contracts and supervision of construction] shall be available for transfer to and expenditure by the [General Services Administration]." GAO held that the transfer language merely authorized the transfer of funds appropriated to the various agencies to GSA. It did not, however, preclude GSA from entering into contracts before the funds were appropriated, in this instance, because GSA was acting for the Bureau of Mines which clearly did have the necessary authority. 29 Comp. Gen. 504 (1950).[39]

A somewhat different kind of contract authority is found in 41 U.S.C. § 11, the so-called Adequacy of Appropriations Act. An exception to the requirement to have adequate appropriations—or any appropriation at all—is made for procurements by the military [39]The provisions of the 1949 legislation discussed in 29 Comp. Gen. 504 have been superseded by the Public Buildings Act of 1959. The case is included here merely to illustrate the concept.

departments for "clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, transportation, or medical and hospital supplies, which, however, shall not exceed the necessities of the current year." By administrative interpretation, the Defense Department has limited this authority to emergency circumstances where immediate action is necessary. Department of Defense Directive No. 7220.8.

It should again be emphasized that to constitute an exception to 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a), the "contract authority" must be specific authority to incur the obligation in excess or advance of appropriations, not merely the general authority any agency has to enter into contracts to carry out its functions.

Congress may grant authority to contract beyond the fiscal year in terms which amount to considerably less than the type of "contract authority" described above. An example is 43 U.S.C. § 388, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to enter into certain contracts relating to reclamation projects "which may cover such periods of time as the Secretary may consider necessary but in which the liability of the United States shall be contingent upon appropriations being made therefor." While this provision has been referred to as an exception to the Antideficiency Act (B-72020, January 9, 1948), it authorizes only "contingent contracts" under which there is no legal obligation to pay unless and until appropriations are provided. 28 Comp. Gen. 163 (1948). A similar example, discussed in B-239435, August 24, 1990, is 38 U.S.C. § 230(c) (Supp. II 1990), which authorizes the Department of Veterans Affairs to enter into certain leases for periods of up to 35 years but further provides that the government's obligation to make payments is "subject to the availability of appropriations for that purpose."

(2) Other obligations "authorized by law"

The "authorized by law" exception in 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a) applies to non-contractual obligations as well as to contracts. The basic approach is the same. The authority must be more than just authority to undertake the particular activity. In the broader sense, everything government officials do should be authorized by law, otherwise they shouldn't be doing it. To constitute an Antideficiency Act exception, the authority must be authority to incur the obligation in excess or advance of appropriations.

REV_00257210

For example, statutory authority to acquire land and to pay for it from a specified fund is not an exception to the Antideficiency Act. It merely authorizes acquisitions to the extent of funds available in the specified source at the time of purchase. 27 Comp. Dec. 662 (1921). Similarly, the authority to conduct hearings does not, without more, confer authority to do so without regard to available appropriations. 16 Comp. Dec. 750 (1910). Provisions in the District of Columbia Code requiring Saint Elizabeth's Hospital to treat all patients who meet admission eligibility requirements were held not to authorize the Hospital to operate beyond the level of its appropriations. If mandatory expenditures would cause a deficiency, the Hospital would have to reduce nonmandatory expenditures. 61 Comp. Gen. 661 (1982).

Several cases have considered the effect of various statutory salary or compensation increases. If a statutory increase is mandatory and does not give anyone discretion to determine the amount, or if it gives some administrative body discretion to determine the amount, payment of which then becomes mandatory, the obligation is deemed "authorized by law" for Antideficiency Act purposes. 39 Comp. Gen. 422 (1959) (salary increases for Wage Board employees); 22 Comp. Gen. 570 (1942); 21 Comp. Gen. 335 (1941); B-168796, February 2, 1970 (mandatory statutory increase in retired pay for Tax Court judges); B-107279, January 9, 1952 (mandatory increases for certain legislative personnel). GAO has not treated the granting of increases retroactively to correct past administrative errors as creating the same type of exception. See 24 Comp. Gen. 676 (1945). Increases which are discretionary do not permit the incurring of obligations in excess or advance of appropriations. 31 Comp. Gen. 238 (1951) (discretionary pension increases); 28 Comp. Gen. 300 (1948).[40]

Some other examples of obligations "authorized by law" for Antideficiency Act purposes are:

- Mandatory pilot program in Vermont under Farms for the Future Act of 1990 (loan guarantees and interest assistance). B-244093, July 19, 1991.

[40]28 Comp. Gen. 300 concerned increases to Wage Board employees under legislation which is now obsolete (see 39 Comp. Gen. 422, cited in the text). However, it is still useful for the basic proposition, stated on page 302, that nonmandatory increases are not obligations "authorized by law" as that term is used in 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a).

REV_00257211

- Mandatory entitlement programs administered by Department of Veterans Affairs. B-226801, March 2, 1988.
- Mandatory transfer from one appropriation account to another where "donor" account contained insufficient unobligated funds. 38 Comp. Gen. 93 (1958).
- Statute authorizing Interstate Commerce Commission to order a substitute rail carrier to service shippers abandoned by their primary carrier in emergency situations, and to reimburse certain costs of the substitute carrier. B-196132, October 11, 1979.
- Provision in Criminal Justice Act of 1964 imposing mandatory deadline on commencement of certain programs which would necessarily involve creation of financial obligations. B-156932, August 17, 1965.

What are perhaps the outer limits of the "authorized by law" exception are illustrated in B-159141, August 18, 1967. The Federal Aviation Administration had entered into long-term, incrementally funded contracts for the development of a civil supersonic aircraft (SST). To ensure compliance with the Antideficiency Act, the FAA each year budgeted for, and obligated, sufficient funds to cover potential termination liability. The appropriations committees became concerned that unnecessarily large amounts were being tied up this way, especially in light of the highly remote possibility that the SST contracts would be terminated. In considering the FAA's 1968 appropriation, the House Appropriations Committee reduced the FAA's request by the amount of the termination reserve, and in its report directed the FAA not to obligate for potential termination costs. The Comptroller General advised that if the Senate Appropriations Committee did the same thing—a specific reduction tied to the amount requested for the reserve, coupled with clear direction in the legislative history—then an overobligation resulting from a termination would be regarded as "authorized by law" and not in violation of the Antideficiency Act.

3. Voluntary Services Prohibition

a. Introduction

The next portion of the Antideficiency Act is 31 U.S.C. § 1342:

"An officer or employee of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia government may not accept voluntary services for either government or employ personal services exceeding that authorized by law except for emergencies involving the safety of human life or the protection of property. . . ."

This provision first appeared, in almost identical form, in a deficiency appropriation act enacted in 1884 (23 Stat. 17). Although the original prohibition read "hereafter, no department or officer of the United States shall accept . . .," it was included in an appropriation for the (then) Indian Office of the Interior Department, and the Court of Claims held that it was applicable only to the Indian Office. Glavey v. United States, 35 Ct. Cl. 242, 256 (1900), reversed on other grounds, 182 U.S. 595 (1901). The Comptroller of the Treasury continued to apply it across the board. See, e.g., 9 Comp. Dec. 181 (1902). In any event, the applicability of the 1884 statute soon became moot because Congress reenacted it as part of the Antideficiency Act in 1905 (33 Stat. 1257) and again in 1906 (34 Stat. 48).

Prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, section 1342 was subsection (b) of the Antideficiency Act, while the basic prohibitions of section 1341, previously discussed, constituted subsection (a). The proximity of the two provisions in the Code reflects their relationship, as section 1342 supplements and is a logical extension of section 1341. If an agency cannot directly obligate in excess or advance of its appropriations, it should not be able to accomplish the same thing indirectly by accepting ostensibly "voluntary" services and then presenting Congress with the bill, in the hope that Congress will recognize a "moral obligation" to pay for the benefits conferred—another example of the so-called "coercive deficiency." In this connection, the chairman of the House committee responsible for what became the 1906 reenactment of the voluntary services prohibition stated:

"It is a hard matter to deal with. We give to Departments what we think is ample, but they come back with a deficiency. Under the law they can [not] make these deficiencies, and Congress can refuse to allow them; but after they are made it is very hard to refuse to allow them . . . ."[41]

In addition, as we have noted previously, the Antideficiency Act was intended to keep an agency's level of operations within the amounts Congress appropriates for that purpose. The unrestricted ability to use voluntary services would permit circumvention of that objective. Thus, without section 1342, section 1341 could not be fully effective.

Note that 31 U.S.C. § 1342 contains two distinct although closely related prohibitions: It bans, first, the acceptance of any type of voluntary services for the United States, and second, the employment of personal services "exceeding that authorized by law."

b. Appointment Without Compensation and Waiver of Salary

(1) The rules—general discussion

One of the evils which the "personal services" prohibition was designed to correct was a practice which was controversial in 1884 but is much less so today. Lower-grade government employees were being asked to "volunteer" their services for overtime periods in excess of the periods allowed by law, thus enabling the agency to economize at the employees' expense but nevertheless generating claims by the employees.[42] Although this practice appears to have receded, the applicability of 31 U.S.C. § 1342 remains relevant in a number of contexts involving services by government employees or services which would otherwise have to be performed by government employees.

One of the earliest questions to arise under 31 U.S.C. § 1342—and the issue that seems to have generated the greatest number of cases—was whether a government officer or employee, or an individual about to be appointed to a government position, could voluntarily work for nothing or for a reduced salary. Initially, the Comptroller of the Treasury ducked the question on the grounds that it did not involve a payment from the Treasury, and suggested that the question was appropriate to take to the Attorney General. 19 Comp. Dec. 160, 163 (1912).

The very next year, the Attorney General tackled the question when asked whether a retired Army officer could be employed as superintendent of an Indian school without additional compensation. In what has become the leading case construing 31 U.S.C. § 1342, the Attorney General replied that the appointment would not violate the voluntary services prohibition. 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51 (1913). In reaching this conclusion, the Attorney General drew a distinction which the Comptroller of the Treasury thereafter adopted, and which GAO and the Justice Department continue to follow to this day—the distinction between "voluntary services" and "gratuitous services."

[42] 15 Cong. Rec. 3410–11 (1884), quoted in 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51, 54-55 (1913).

The key passages from the Attorney General's opinion are set forth below:

"[I]t seems plain that the words 'voluntary service' were not intended to be synonymous with 'gratuitous service' and were not intended to cover services rendered in an official capacity under regular appointment to an office otherwise permitted by law to be nonsalaried. In their ordinary and normal meaning these words refer to service intruded by a private person as a 'volunteer' and not rendered pursuant to any prior contract or obligation . . . . It would be stretching the language a good deal to extend it so far as to prohibit official services without compensation in those instances in which Congress has not required even a minimum salary for the office.

"The context corroborates the view that the ordinary meaning of 'voluntary services' was intended. The very next words 'or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law' deal with contractual services, thus making a balance between 'acceptance' of 'voluntary service' (i.e., the cases where there is no prior contract) and 'employment' of 'personal service' (i.e., the cases where there is such prior contract, though unauthorized by law).

. . . .

"Thus it is evident that the evil at which Congress was aiming was not appointment or employment for authorized services without compensation, but the acceptance of unauthorized services not intended or agreed to be gratuitous and therefore likely to afford a basis for a future claim upon Congress. . . ." Id. at 52–53, 55.

The Comptroller of the Treasury agreed with this interpretation:

"[The statute] was intended to guard against claims for compensation. A service offered clearly and distinctly as gratuitous with a proper record made of that fact does not violate this statute against acceptance of voluntary service. An appointment to serve without compensation which is accepted and properly recorded is not a violation of [31 U.S.C. § 1342], and is valid if otherwise lawful." 27 Comp. Dec. 131, 132–33 (1920).

Two main rules emerge from 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51 and its progeny. First, if compensation for a position is fixed by law, an appointee may not agree to serve without compensation or to waive that compensation in whole or in part (these are two different ways of saying the same thing). Id. at 56. This portion of the opinion did not break any new ground. The courts had already held, based on public policy, that compensation fixed by law could not be waived.[43] Second, and this is really just a corollary to the rule just stated, if the level of compensation is discretionary, or if the relevant statute prescribes only a maximum (but not a minimum), the compensation can be set at zero, and an appointment without compensation or a waiver, entire or partial, is permissible. Id.; 27 Comp. Dec. at 133.

Both GAO and the Justice Department have had frequent occasion to address these issues, and there are numerous decisions illustrating and applying the rules.[44]

In a 1988 opinion, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel considered whether the Iran-Contra Independent Counsel could appoint Professor Laurence Tribe as Special Counsel under an agreement to serve without compensation. Applying the rules set forth in 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51, the OLC concluded that the appointment would not contravene the Antideficiency Act since the statute governing the appointment set a maximum salary but no minimum. Independent Counsel's Authority to Accept Voluntary Services – Appointment of Laurence H. Tribe, Op. Off. Legal Counsel, May 19, 1988.

Similarly, the Comptroller General held in 58 Comp. Gen. 383 (1979) that members of the United States Metric Board could waive their salaries since the relevant statute merely prescribed a maximum rate of pay. In addition, since the Board had statutory authority to accept gifts, a member who chose to do so could accept compensation and then return it to the Board as a gift. Both cases make the point that compensation is not "fixed by law" for purposes of the "no waiver" rule where the statute merely sets a maximum limit for the salary.

[43]Glavey v. United States, 182 U.S. 595 (1901); Miller v. United States, 103 F. 413 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1900). See also 9 Comp. Dec. 101 (1902). Later cases following Glavey are MacMath v. United States, 248 U.S. 151 (1918), and United States v. Andrews, 240 U.S. 90 (1916). The policy rationale is that to permit agencies to disregard compensation prescribed by statute could work to the disadvantage of those who cannot, or are not willing to, accept the position for less than the prescribed salary. See Miller, 103 F. at 415–16.

[44]Some cases in addition to those cited in the text are 32 Comp. Gen. 236 (1952); 23 Comp. Gen. 109, 112 (1943); 14 Comp. Gen. 193 (1934); 34 Op. Att'y Gen. 490 (1925); 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 129 (1913); 3 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 78 (1979).

A good illustration of the kind of situation 31 U.S.C. § 1342 is designed to prevent is 54 Comp. Gen. 393 (1974). Members of the Commission on Marihuana and Drug Abuse had, apparently at the chairman's urging, agreed to waive their statutory entitlement to $100 per day while involved on Commission business. The year after the Commission ceased to exist, one of the former members changed his mind and filed a claim for a portion of the compensation he would have received but for the waiver. Since the $100 per day had been a statutory entitlement, the purported waiver was invalid and the former commissioner was entitled to be paid. Similar claims by any or all of the other former members would also have to be allowed. If insufficient funds remained in the Commission's now-expired appropriation, a deficiency appropriation would be necessary.

A few earlier cases deal with fact situations similar to that considered in 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51—the acceptance by someone already on the federal payroll of additional duties without additional compensation. In 23 Comp. Gen. 272 (1943), for example, GAO concluded that a retired Army officer could serve, without additional compensation, as a courier for the State Department. The voluntary services prohibition, said the decision, does not preclude "the assignment of persons holding office under the Government to the performance of additional duties or the duties of another position without additional compensation." Id. at 274. Another World War II decision held that American Red Cross Volunteer Nurses' Aides who also happened to be full-time federal employees could perform volunteer nursing services at Veterans Administration hospitals. 23 Comp. Gen. 900 (1944).

One thing the various cases discussed above have in common is that they involve the appointment of an individual to an official government position, permanent or temporary. Services rendered prior to appointment are considered purely voluntary and, by virtue of 31 U.S.C. § 1342, cannot be compensated. Lee v. United States, 45 Ct. Cl. 57, 62 (1910); B-181934, October 7, 1974.[45] It also follows that post-retirement services, apart from appointment as a reemployed annuitant, are not compensable. 65 Comp. Gen. 21 (1985). In that case, an alleged agreement to the contrary by the individual's supervisor was held unauthorized and therefore invalid.

[45]B-181934 was overruled by 55 Comp. Gen. 109 (1975) because additional information showed that the individual was a "de facto employee" performing under color of appointment and with a claim of right to the position. A "voluntary" employee has no such "color of appointment" or indicia of lawful employment.

It has also been held that experts and consultants employed under authority of 5 U.S.C. § 3109 may serve without compensation without violating the Antideficiency Act as long as it is clearly understood and agreed that no compensation is to be expected. 27 Comp. Gen. 194 (1947); 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 160 (1982). Cf. B-185952, August 18, 1976 (uncompensated participation in pre-bid conference, on-site inspection, and bid opening by contractor engineer who had prepared specifications regarded as "technical violation" of 31 U.S.C. § 1342).

Several of the decisions note the requirement for a written record of the agreement to serve without compensation. Proper documentation is important for evidentiary purposes should a claim subsequently be attempted. E.g., 27 Comp. Gen. 194, 195 (1947); 26 Comp. Gen. 956, 958 (1947); 27 Comp. Dec. 131, 132–33 (1920); 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 322, 323 (1977).

The rule that compensation fixed by statute may not be waived does not apply if the waiver or appointment without compensation is itself authorized by statute. The Comptroller General stated the principle as follows in 27 Comp. Gen. 194, 195 (1947):

> "[E]ven where the compensation for a particular position is fixed by or pursuant to law, the occupant of the position may waive his ordinary right to the compensation fixed for the position and thereafter forever be estopped from claiming and receiving the salary previously waived, if there be some applicable provision of law authorizing the acceptance of services without compensation." (Emphasis in original.)

In B-139261, June 26, 1959, GAO reiterated the above principle, and gave several examples of statutes sufficient for this purpose. Another example may be found in 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 322 (1977).

At this point a 1978 case, 57 Comp. Gen. 423, must be noted although its effect is not entirely clear. The decision held that a statute authorizing the Agency for International Development to accept gifts of "services of any kind" did not meet the test of 27 Comp. Gen. 194, and therefore did not permit waiver of salary by employees whose compensation is fixed by statute. While 57 Comp. Gen. 423 did not purport to overrule or modify any prior cases, it seems to say that statutory authority to accept gifts of personal service is no longer adequate to permit waiver of compensation fixed by statute. However, in B-139261, June 26, 1959, not cited in 57 Comp. Gen. 423, one of the examples given of statutes that would authorize waiver of compensation fixed by law was a gift statute very similar to the AID statute involved in 57 Comp. Gen. 423. If 57 Comp. Gen. 423 is in fact a modification of the prior case law, then an agency would need explicit authority to employ persons without compensation. For an example of such authority, see 32 Comp. Gen. 236 (1952).

The rules for waiver of salary or appointment without compensation may be summarized as follows:

- If compensation is not fixed by statute, i.e., if it is fixed administratively or if the statute merely prescribes a maximum but no minimum, it may be waived as long as the waiver qualifies as "gratuitous." There should be an advance written agreement waiving all claims.
- If compensation is fixed by statute, it may not be waived, the voluntary vs. gratuitous distinction notwithstanding, without specific statutory authority. Unfortunately, the decisions are not consistent as to what form this authority must take, and the extent to which authority to accept donations of services (as opposed to explicit authority to employ persons without compensation) will suffice is not entirely clear.
- If the employing agency has statutory authority to accept gifts, the employee can accept the compensation and return it to the agency as a gift. Even if the agency has no such authority, the employee can still accept the compensation and donate it to the United States Treasury.

(2) Student interns

In 26 Comp. Gen. 956 (1947), the (then) Civil Service Commission asked whether an agency could accept the uncompensated services of college students as part of a college's internship program. The students "would be assigned to productive work, i.e., to the regular work of the agency in a position which would ordinarily fall in the competitive civil service." The answer was no. Since the students would be used in positions the compensation for which was fixed by law, and since compensation fixed by law cannot be waived, the proposal would require legislative authority.

Thirty years later, the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel considered another internship program and provided similar advice. Without statutory authority, uncompensated student services that furthered the agency's mission, i.e., "productive work," could not be accepted. 2 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 185 (1978).

In view of the long-standing rule, supported as we have seen by decisions of the Supreme Court, prohibiting the waiver of compensation for positions required by law to be salaried, GAO and Justice had little choice but to respond as they did. Clearly, however, this was not a very useful answer. It meant that uncompensated student interns could be used only for essentially "make-work" tasks, a result of benefit to neither the students nor the agencies.

The solution, apparent from both cases, was legislative authority, which Congress provided later in 1978 by the enactment of 5 U.S.C. § 3111. The statute authorizes agencies, subject to regulations of the Office of Personnel Management, to accept the uncompensated services of high school and college students, "[n]otwithstanding section 1342 of Title 31," if the services are part of an agency program designed to provide educational experience for the student and will not be used to displace any employee.

In a 1981 decision, GAO held that 5 U.S.C. § 3111 does not authorize the payment of travel or subsistence expenses for the students. 60 Comp. Gen. 456 (1981).

A paper entitled A Part-Time Clerkship Program in Federal Courts for Law Students by the Honorable Jack B. Weinstein and William B. Bonvillian, written in 1975 and printed at 68 F.R.D. 265, considered the use of law students as part-time law clerks, without pay, to mostly supplement the work of the regular law clerks in furtherance of the official duties of the courts. Based on the statute's legislative history and 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51, previously discussed, Judge Weinstein concluded that the program did not violate the Antideficiency Act. Although this aspect of the issue is not explicitly discussed in the paper, it appears that the compensation of regular law clerks is fixed administratively. See 28 U.S.C. § 604(a)(5). In any event, the Administrative Office of the United States Courts was given authority in 1978 to "accept and utilize voluntary and uncompensated (gratuitous) services." 28 U.S.C. § 604(a)(17).

(3) Program beneficiaries

Programs are enacted from time to time to provide job training assistance to various classes of individuals. The training is intended to enable participants to enter the labor market at a higher level of skill and thereby avoid the need for public assistance. Also, in more recent years, the concept of "workfare" (work as a requirement for the receipt of public assistance) has begun to evolve. Questions have arisen under programs of this nature as to the authority of federal agencies to serve as employers.

A 1944 case, 24 Comp. Gen. 314, considered a vocational rehabilitation program for disabled war veterans. GAO concluded that 31 U.S.C. § 1342 did not preclude federal agencies from providing on-the-job training, without payment of salary, to program participants. The decision is further discussed in 26 Comp. Gen. 956, 959 (1947).

In 51 Comp. Gen. 152 (1971), GAO concluded that 31 U.S.C. § 1342 precluded federal agencies from accepting work by persons hired by local governments for public service employment under the Emergency Employment Act of 1971. Four years later, GAO modified the 1971 decision, holding that a federal agency could provide work without payment of compensation to (i.e., accept the free services of) trainees sponsored and paid by nonfederal organizations from federal grant funds under the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973. 54 Comp. Gen. 560 (1975). The decision stated:

"[C]onsidering that the services in question will arise out of a program initiated by the Federal Government, it would be anomalous to conclude that such services are proscribed as being voluntary within the meaning of 31 U.S.C. § [1342]. That is to say, it is our opinion that the utilization of enrollees or trainees by a Federal agency under the circumstances here involved need not be considered the acceptance of 'voluntary services' within the meaning of that phrase as used in 31 U.S.C. § [1342]." Id. at 561.

Several issues under a workfare program (Community Work Experience Program) are discussed in B-211079.2, January 2, 1987. The relevant program legislation expressly authorizes program participants to perform work for federal agencies "notwithstanding section 1342 of title 31." 42 U.S.C. § 609(a)(4)(A). The decision seems to say that the statutory authority was necessary not because of the Antideficiency Act but to avoid an impermissible augmentation of appropriations. It is in any event consistent in result with 24 Comp. Gen. 314 and 54 Comp. Gen. 560. The relationship between voluntary service and the augmentation concept is explored later in this chapter in our discussion of augmentation of appropriations.

(4) Applicability to legislative and judicial branches

The applicability of 31 U.S.C. § 1342 to the legislative and judicial branches of the federal government does not appear to have been seriously questioned.

The salary of a Member of Congress is fixed by statute and therefore cannot be waived without specific statutory authority. B-159835, April 22, 1975; B-123424, March 7, 1975; B-123424, April 15, 1955; A-8427, March 19, 1925; B-206396.2, November 15, 1988 (non-decision letter). However, as each of these cases points out, nothing prevents a Senator or Representative from accepting the salary and then, as several have done, donate part or all of it back to the United States Treasury.

In 1977, GAO was asked by a congressional committee chairman whether section 1342 applies to Members of Congress who use volunteers to perform official office functions. GAO responded first that section 1342 seems clearly to apply to the legislative branch. GAO then summarized the rules for appointment without compensation and advised that, to the extent that a particular employee's salary could be fixed administratively by the Member in any amount he or she chooses to set, that employee's salary can be fixed at zero. (This once again was essentially an application of the rules set down decades earlier in 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51 and 27 Comp. Dec. 131.) B-69907, February 11, 1977.

The salary of a federal judge is also "fixed by law"—even more so because of the constitutional prohibition against diminishing the compensation of a federal judge while in office. A case applying the standard "no waiver" rules to a federal judge is B-157469, July 24, 1974.

c. Other Voluntary Services

Before entering the mainstream of the modern case law, two very early decisions should be noted. In 12 Comp. Dec. 244 (1905), the Comptroller of the Treasury held that an offer by a meat-packing firm to pay the salaries of Department of Agriculture employees to conduct a pre-export pork inspection could not be accepted because of the voluntary services prohibition.[46] Similar cases have since come up, but they have been decided under the augmentation theory without reference to 31 U.S.C. § 1342. See 59 Comp. Gen. 294 (1980) and 2 Comp. Gen. 775 (1923), discussed later in Section E of this chapter. To restate, apart from the 1905 decision, which has not been followed since, the voluntary services prohibition has not been applied to donations of money.

In another 1905 decision, a vendor asked permission to install an appliance on Navy property for trial purposes at no expense to the government. Presumably, if the Navy liked the appliance, it would then buy it. The Comptroller pointed out an easily overlooked phrase in the voluntary service prohibition—the services that are prohibited are voluntary services "for the United States." Here, temporary installation by the vendor for trial purposes amounted to service for his own benefit and on his own behalf, "as an incident to or necessary concomitant of a proper exhibition of his appliance for sale." Therefore, the Navy could grant permission without violating the Antideficiency Act as long as the vendor agreed to remove the appliance at his own expense if the Navy chose not to buy it. 11 Comp. Dec. 622 (1905). This case, although it has not been cited since, would appear to be still valid.

For the most part, the cases have been resolved by applying the "voluntary vs. gratuitous" distinction first enunciated by the Attorney General in 30 Op. Att'y Gen. 51, discussed above. The underlying philosophy is perhaps best conveyed in the following statement by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel:

"Although the interpretation of § [1342] has not been entirely consistent over the years, the weight of authority does support the view that the section was intended to eliminate subsequent claims against the United States for compensation of the 'volunteer,' rather than to deprive the government of the benefit of truly gratuitous services." 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 160, 162 (1982).

In an early formulation that has often been quoted since, the Comptroller General noted that:

[46]It would also contravene 18 U.S.C. § 209, which prohibits payment of salaries of government employees from nongovernment sources. This statute did not exist at the time of the 1905 decision.

REV_00257152

"The voluntary service referred to in [31 U.S.C. § 1342] is not necessarily synonymous with gratuitous service, but contemplates service furnished on the initiative of the party rendering the same without request from, or agreement with, the United States therefor. Services furnished pursuant to a formal contract are not voluntary within the meaning of said section." 7 Comp. Gen. 810, 811 (1928).

In 7 Comp. Gen. 810, a contractor had agreed to prepare stenographic transcripts of Federal Trade Commission public proceedings and to furnish copies to the FTC without cost, in exchange for the exclusive right to report the proceedings and to sell transcripts to the public. The decision noted that consideration under a contract does not have to be monetary consideration, and held that the contract in question was supported by sufficient legal consideration. While the case is thus arguably not a true "voluntary services" case, it has often been cited since, not so much for the actual holding but for the above-quoted statement of the rule.

For example, in B-13378, November 20, 1940, the Comptroller General held that the Secretary of Commerce could accept gratuitous services from a private agency, created by various social science associations, which had offered to assist in the preparation of official monographs analyzing census data. The services were to be rendered under a cooperative agreement which specified that they would be free of cost to the government. The Commerce Department agreed to furnish space and equipment, but the monographs would not otherwise have been prepared.

Applying the same approach, GAO found no violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1342 for the Commerce Department to accept services by the Business Advisory Council, agreed in advance to be gratuitous. B-125406, November 4, 1955. Likewise, the Commission on Federal Paperwork could accept free services from the private sector as long as they were agreed in advance to be gratuitous. B-182087-O.M., November 26, 1975.

In a 1982 decision, the American Association of Retired Persons wanted to volunteer services to assist in crime prevention activities (distribute literature, give lectures, etc.) on Army installations. GAO found no Antideficiency Act problem as long as the services were agreed in advance, and so documented, as gratuitous. B-204326, July 26, 1982.

In B-177836, April 24, 1973, the Army had entered into a contract with a landowner under which it acquired the right to remove trees and other shrubs from portions of the landowner's property incident to an easement. A subsequent purchaser of the property complained that some tree stumps had not been removed, and the Army proceeded to contract to have the work done. The landowner then submitted a claim for certain costs he had incurred incident to some preliminary work he had done prior to the Army's contract. Since the landowner's actions had been purely voluntary and had been taken without the knowledge or consent of the government, 31 U.S.C. § 1342 prohibited payment.

In 7 Comp. Gen. 167 (1927), a customs official had stored, in his own private boathouse, a boat which had been seized for smuggling whiskey. The customs official later filed a claim for storage charges. Noting that "the United States did not expressly or impliedly request the use of the premises and therefore did not by implication promise to pay therefor," GAO concluded that the storage had been purely a voluntary service, payment for which would violate 31 U.S.C. § 1342.

As if to prove the proverb that there is nothing new under the sun (Ecclesiastes 1:9), GAO considered another storage case over 50 years later, B-194294, July 12, 1979. There, an Agriculture Department employee had an accident while driving a government-owned vehicle assigned to him for his work. A Department official ordered the damaged vehicle towed to the employee's driveway, to be held there until it could be sold. Since the government did have a role in the employee's assumption of responsibility for the wreck, GAO found no violation of 31 U.S.C. § 1342 and allowed the employee's claim for reasonable storage charges on a quantum meruit basis.

Section 1342 covers any type of service which has the effect of creating a legal or moral obligation to pay the person rendering the service. Naturally, this includes government contractors. The prohibition includes arrangements in which government contracting officers solicit or permit—tacitly or otherwise—a contractor to continue performance on a "temporarily unfunded" basis while the agency, which has exhausted its appropriations and can't pay the contractor immediately, seeks additional appropriations. This was one of the options considered in 55 Comp. Gen. 768 (1976), discussed previously in connection with 31 U.S.C. § 1341(a). The Army proposed a contract modification which would explicitly recognize the government's obligation to pay for any work performed under the contract, possibly including reasonable interest, subject to subsequent availability of funds. The government would use its best efforts to obtain a deficiency appropriation. Certificates to this effect would be issued to the contractor, including a statement that any additional work performed would be done at the contractor's own risk. In return, the contractor would be asked to defer any action for breach of contract.

GAO found this proposal "of dubious validity at best." Although the certificate given to the contractor would say that continued performance was at the contractor's own risk, it was clear that both parties expected the contract to continue. The government expected to accept the benefits of the contractor's performance and the contractor expected to be paid—eventually—for it. This is certainly not an example of a clear written understanding that work for the government is to be performed gratuitously. Also, the proposal to pay interest was improper as it would compound the Antideficiency Act violation. Although 55 Comp. Gen. 768 does not specifically discuss 31 U.S.C. § 1342, the relationship should be apparent.

d. Exceptions

Two kinds of exceptions to 31 U.S.C. § 1342 have already been discussed—where acceptance of services without compensation is specifically authorized by law, and where the government and the volunteer have a written agreement that the services are to be rendered gratuitously with no expectation of future payment.

There is a third exception, written into the statute itself: "emergencies involving the safety of human life or the protection of property." As can be seen from the cases discussed, with very few exceptions, GAO has not been called upon to construe the scope of the safety of human life or protection of property exceptions in recent decades. However, the Attorney General in 1981 considered the exceptions in the context of funding gaps, and articulated a somewhat broader standard than that applied in the early GAO decisions. The opinion, published at 5 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 1 (1981), and a 1990 amendment to 31 U.S.C. § 1342 designed to retrench somewhat from that broader view, are discussed in more detail later under the Funding Gaps heading.

(1) Safety of human life

The services provided to protect human life must have been rendered in a true emergency situation. What constitutes an emergency is discussed in several decisions.

In 12 Comp. Dec. 155 (1905), a municipal health officer disinfected several government buildings to prevent the further spread of diphtheria. Several cases of diphtheria had already occurred at the government compound, including four deaths. The Comptroller of the Treasury found that the services had been rendered in an emergency involving the loss of human life, and held accordingly that the doctor could be reimbursed for the cost of materials used and the fair value of his services.

In another case, the S.S. Rexmore, a British vessel, deviated from its course to London to answer a call for help from an Army transport ship carrying over 1,000 troops. The ship had sprung a leak and appeared to be in danger of sinking. The Comptroller General allowed a claim for the vessel's actual operating costs plus lost profits attributable to the services performed. The Rexmore had rendered a tangible service to save the lives of the people aboard the Army transport, as well as the transport vessel itself. 2 Comp. Gen. 799 (1923).

On the other hand, GAO denied payment to a man who was boating in the Florida Keys and saw a Navy seaplane make a forced landing. He offered to tow the aircraft over two miles to the nearest island, and did so. His claim for expenses was denied. The aircraft had landed intact and the pilot was in no immediate danger. Rendering service to overcome mere inconvenience or even a potential future emergency is not enough to overcome the statutory prohibition. 10 Comp. Gen. 248 (1930).

(2) Protection of property

The main thing to remember here is that the property must be either government-owned property or property for which the government has some responsibility. The standard was established by the Comptroller of the Treasury in 9 Comp. Dec. 182, 185 (1902) as follows:

REV_00257227

"I think it is clear that the statute does not contemplate property in which the Government has no immediate interest or concern; but I do not think it was intended to apply exclusively to property owned by the Government. The term 'property' is used in the statute without any qualifying words, but it is used in connection with the rendition of services for the Government. The implication is, therefore, clear that the property in contemplation is property in which the Government has an immediate interest or in connection with which it has some duty to perform."

In the cited decision, an individual had gathered up mail scattered in a train wreck and delivered it to a nearby town. The government did not "own" the mail but had a responsibility to deliver it. Therefore, the services came within the statutory exception and the individual could be paid for the value of his services.

Applying the approach of 9 Comp. Dec. 182, the Comptroller General held in B-152554, February 24, 1975, that section 1342 did not permit the Agency for International Development to make expenditures in excess of available funds for disaster relief in foreign countries.

A case clearly within the exception is 3 Comp. Gen. 979 (1924), allowing reimbursement to a municipality which had rendered firefighting assistance to prevent the destruction of federal property where the federal property was not within the territory for which the municipal fire department was responsible.

An exception was also recognized in 53 Comp. Gen. 71 (1973), where a government employee brought in food for other government employees in circumstances which would justify a determination that the expenditure was incidental to the protection of government property in an extreme emergency.

e. Voluntary Creditors

A related line of decisions are the so-called "voluntary creditor" cases. A voluntary creditor is an individual, government or nongovernment, who pays what he or she perceives to be a government obligation from personal funds. The rule is that the voluntary creditor cannot be reimbursed, although there are significant exceptions. For the most part, the decisions have not related the voluntary creditor prohibition to the Antideficiency Act, with the exception of one very early case (17 Comp. Dec. 353 (1910)) and two more recent ones (53 Comp. Gen. 71 (1973) and 42 Comp. Gen. 149 (1962)). The voluntary creditor cases are discussed in detail in Chapter 12.

REV_00257228

4. Apportionment of Appropriations

a. Statutory Requirement for Apportionment

As a general proposition, an agency does not have the full amount of its appropriations available to it at the beginning of the fiscal year. This is because of what, prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, was subsection (c) of the Antideficiency Act and is now 31 U.S.C. § 1512. Subsection (a) of section 1512 establishes the basic requirement:

"(a) Except as provided in this subchapter, an appropriation available for obligation for a definite period shall be apportioned to prevent obligation or expenditure at a rate that would indicate a necessity for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation for the period. An appropriation for an indefinite period and authority to make obligations by contract before appropriations shall be apportioned to achieve the most effective and economical use. An apportionment may be reapportioned under this section."

Although apportionment was first required legislatively in 1905 (33 Stat. 1257), the current form of the statute derives from a revision enacted in 1950 as section 1211 of the General Appropriation Act, 1951. The 1950 revision was part of an overall effort by Congress to amplify and enforce the basic restrictions against incurring deficiencies in 31 U.S.C. § 1341.

Section 1512(a) requires that all appropriations be administratively apportioned so as to ensure their obligation and expenditure at a controlled rate which will prevent deficiencies from arising before the end of a fiscal year. Although section 1512 does not tell you who is to make the apportionment, section 1513, discussed later, specifies the President as the apportioning official for most executive branch agencies. The function was delegated to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget in 1933,[47] and now reposes in the successor to that office, the Director, Office of Management and Budget (OMB).

The term "apportionment" may be defined as—

"A distribution made by the Office of Management and Budget of amounts available for obligation . . . in an appropriation or fund account. Apportionments divide amounts available for obligation by specific time periods (usually quarters), activities, [47]Executive Order No. 6166, § 16 (June 10, 1933).

projects, objects, or a combination thereof. The amounts so apportioned limit the amount of obligations that may be incurred."[48]

Apportionment is required not only to prevent the need for deficiency or supplemental appropriations, but also to insure that there is no drastic curtailment of the activity for which the appropriation is made. 36 Comp. Gen. 699 (1957). See also 38 Comp. Gen. 501 (1959). In other words, the apportionment requirement is designed to prevent an agency from spending its entire appropriation before the end of the fiscal year and then putting the Congress in a position in which it must either grant an additional appropriation or allow the entire activity to come to a halt.

In 36 Comp. Gen. 699 (1957), the Director of OMB reapportioned Post Office funds in such a way that the fourth quarter funds were substantially less than those for the third quarter. The Comptroller General stated:

"A drastic curtailment toward the close of a fiscal year of operations carried on under a fiscal year appropriation is a prima facie indication of a failure to so apportion an appropriation 'as to prevent obligation or expenditure thereof in a manner which would indicate a necessity for deficiency or supplemental appropriations for such period.' In our view, this is the very situation the amendment of the law in 1950 was intended to remedy." 36 Comp. Gen. at 703.

Therefore, the very fact that a deficiency or supplemental appropriation is necessary or that services in the last quarter must be drastically cut suggests that the apportioning authority has violated 31 U.S.C. § 1512(a).

A more recent case involved the Department of Agriculture's Food Stamp Program. The program was subject to certain spending ceilings which, it seemed certain, the Department was going to exceed if it continued its present rate of expenditures. The Department feared that, if it was bound by a formula in a different section of its authorizing act to pay the mandated amount to each eligible recipient, it would have to stop the whole program when the funds were exhausted. Based on both the Antideficiency Act and the program legislation, GAO concluded that there had to be an immediate pro rata reduction for all participants. Discontinuance of the program when [48]GAO, A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27, at 34 (1981). See also OMB Circular No. A-34, § 21.1; B-167034, September 1, 1976.

the funds ran out would violate the purpose of the apportionment requirement. A-51604, March 28, 1979.

This is not to say that every sub-activity or project must be carried out for the full fiscal year, on a reduced basis, if necessary. Section 1512(a) applies to amounts made available in an appropriation or fund. Where, for example, the Veterans Administration nursing home program was funded from moneys made available in a general, lump-sum VA medical care appropriation, the agency was free to discontinue the nursing home program and reprogram the balance of its funds to other programs also funded under that heading. B-167656, June 18, 1971. (It would be different if the nursing home program had received a line-item appropriation.)

The requirement to apportion applies not only to "one year" appropriations and other appropriations limited to a fixed period of time, but also to "no-year" money and even to contract authority (authority to contract in advance of appropriations). 31 U.S.C. §§ 1511(a), 1512(a). In the case of indefinite appropriations and contract authority, the requirement states only that the apportionment is to be made in such a way as "to achieve the most effective and economical use" of the budget authority. Id. § 1512(a).

Prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, the apportionment requirement applied explicitly to government corporations which are instrumentalities of the United States.[49] While the applicability of the requirement has not changed, the recodification dropped the explicit language, viewing it as covered by the broad definition of "executive agency" in 31 U.S.C. § 102.[50] The authority of some government corporations to determine the necessity of their expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred is not sufficient to exempt a corporation from the apportionment requirement. 43 Comp. Gen. 759 (1964).

b. Establishing Reserves

Section 1512(c) of 31 U.S.C. provides as follows:

"(c)(1) In apportioning or reapportioning an appropriation, a reserve may be established only–

[49]31 U.S.C. § 665(d)(2) (1976 ed.).

[50]See codification note following 31 U.S.C. § 1511.

REV_00257231

"(A) to provide for contingencies;

"(B) to achieve savings made possible by or through changes in requirements or greater efficiency of operations; or

"(C) as specifically provided by law.

"(2) A reserve established under this subsection may be changed as necessary to carry out the scope and objectives of the appropriation concerned. When an official designated in section 1513 of this title to make apportionments decides that an amount reserved will not be required to carry out the objectives and scope of the appropriation concerned, the official shall recommend the rescission of the amount in the way provided in chapter 11 of this title for appropriation requests. Reserves established under this section shall be reported to Congress as provided in the Impoundment Control Act of 1974 (2 U.S.C. 681 et seq.)."

Section 1512(c) seeks to limit the circumstances in which the full appropriation is not apportioned or utilized and a reserve fund is established. Under this provision, the apportioning official is authorized to establish reserves only to provide for contingencies or to effect savings, unless the reserve is specifically authorized by statute.

At one time, this section was a battleground between the executive and legislative branches over which had ultimate control over government program and fiscal spending policy. The executive branch had relied on this portion of the Antideficiency Act to impound funds for general fiscal or economic policy reasons such as containment of federal spending and executive judgment of the relative merits, effectiveness, and desirability of competing federal programs. See 54 Comp. Gen. 453, 458 (1974); B-135564, July 26, 1973.

The reason for this was that prior to 1974, the predecessor of 31 U.S.C. § 1512(c) contained rather expansive language to the effect that a reserve fund could be established pursuant to "other developments subsequent to the date on which [the] appropriation was made available." 31 U.S.C. § 665(c)(2) (1970 ed.). Despite this expansive language, the Comptroller General's position had been that the authority to establish reserves under the Antideficiency Act was limited to providing for contingencies or effecting savings which are in furtherance of, or at least consistent with, the purposes of an appropriation. B-130515, July 10, 1973. The law was not regarded as authorizing reserve funds (i.e., impoundments) based upon general economic, fiscal, or policy considerations which are extraneous to the individual appropriation or are in derogation of the appropriation's purpose. B-125187, September 11, 1973; B-130515, July 10, 1973. See also State Highway Commission of Missouri v. Volpe, 479 F.2d 1099 (8th Cir. 1973), which held that the right to reserve funds in order to "effect savings" or due to "subsequent events," etc., must be considered in the context of the applicable appropriation statute. Id. at 1118. If the apportioning authority goes beyond the authority delegated, section 1512(c) is violated.

The Impoundment Control Act of 1974 amended section 1512(c) by eliminating the "other developments" clause and by prohibiting the establishment of appropriation reserves except as provided under the Antideficiency Act for contingencies or savings, or as provided in other specific statutory authority. The intent was to preclude reliance on section 1512(c) as authority for "policy impoundments." City of New Haven v. United States, 809 F.2d 900, 906 (D.C. Cir. 1987); 54 Comp. Gen. 453 (1974); B-148898, August 28, 1974.

Examples of permissible reserves were discussed in 51 Comp. Gen. 598 (1972) and 51 Comp. Gen. 251 (1971). The first case concerned the provisions of a long-term charter of several tankers for the Navy. The contract contained options to renew the charter for periods of 15 years. In the event that the Navy declined to renew the charter short of a full 15-year period, the vessels were to be sold by a Board of Trustees, acting for the owners and bondholders. Any shortfall in the proceeds over the termination value was to be unconditionally guaranteed by the Navy. GAO held that it would not violate the Antideficiency Act to cover this contingent liability by setting up a reserve. 51 Comp. Gen. 598 (1972). In 51 Comp. Gen. 251 (1971), GAO said that it was permissible to provide in regulations for a clause to be inserted in future contracts for payment of interest on delayed payments of a contractor's claim. Reserving sufficient funds from the appropriation used to support the contract to cover these potential interest costs would protect against potential Antideficiency Act violations.

In 1981, the Community Services Administration established a reserve as a cushion against Antideficiency Act violations while the agency was terminating its operations. Grantees argued that the reserve improperly reduced amounts available for discretionary grants. In Rogers v. United States, 14 Cl. Ct. 39, 46–47 (1987), the court held

c. Method of Apportionment

The remaining portions of 31 U.S.C. § 1512 are subsections (b) and (d), set forth below:

"(b)(1) An appropriation subject to apportionment is apportioned by—

"(A) months, calendar quarters, operating seasons, or other time periods;

"(B) activities, functions, projects, or objects; or

"(C) a combination of the ways referred to in clauses (A) and (B) of this paragraph."

"(d) An apportionment or reapportionment shall be reviewed at least 4 times a year by the official designated in section 1513 of this title to make apportionments."

These two provisions are largely technical, implementing the basic apportionment requirement of 31 U.S.C. § 1512(a).

Section 1512(b) makes it clear that apportionments need not be made strictly on a monthly, quarterly, or other fixed time basis, nor must they be for equal amounts in each time period. The apportioning officer is free to take into account the "activities, functions, projects, or objects" of the program being funded and the usual pattern of spending for such programs in deciding how to apportion the funds. Absent some statutory provision to the contrary, OMB's determination is controlling. Thus, for example, in Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 854 F.2d 40 (4th Cir. 1988), the court upheld OMB's quarterly apportionment of social services block grant funds, rejecting the state's contention that it should receive its entire annual allotment at the beginning of the fiscal year.

Section 1512(d) requires a minimum of four reviews each year to enable the apportioning officer to make reapportionments or other adjustments as necessary.

d. Control of Apportionments

The former subsection (d) of the Antideficiency Act, now 31 U.S.C. § 1513, deals with the mechanisms for making the apportionments or reapportionments of appropriations which are required by section 1512.

Section 1513(a) applies to appropriations of the legislative and judicial branches of the federal government, as well as appropriations of the International Trade Commission and the District of Columbia government.[51] The authority to apportion is given to the "official having administrative control" of the appropriation. Apportionment must be made no later than 30 days before the start of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made, or within 30 days after the enactment of the appropriation, whichever is later. The apportionment must be in writing.

Section 1513(b) deals with apportionments for the executive branch. The President is designated as the apportioning authority. As we have seen, the function has been delegated to the Director, OMB. Time limits are established, first for submission of information by the various agency heads to OMB to enable it to make reasonable apportionments. Although primary responsibility for a violation of section 1512 lies with the Director of OMB, the head of the agency concerned may also be found responsible if he or she fails to send the Director accurate information on which to base an apportionment. Secondly, the Director of OMB has up to 20 days before the start of the fiscal year or 30 days after enactment of the appropriation act, whichever is later, to make the actual apportionment and notify the agency of the action taken. Again, the apportionments must be in writing.

In B-163628, January 4, 1974, GAO responded to a question from the chairman of a congressional committee about the power of OMB to apportion the funds of independent regulatory agencies, such as the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Comptroller General agreed with the chairman that independent agencies should generally be free from executive control or interference. The response then stated:

[51]A permanent provision of law included in the 1988 District of Columbia appropriation act states that appropriations for the D.C. government "shall not be subject to apportionment except to the extent specifically provided by statute." Pub. L. No. 100-202, § 135, 101 Stat. 1329, 1329-102 (1987). Thus, the applicability of 31 U.S.C. § 1513(a) to the D.C. government will be extremely limited.

"[T]he apportionment power may not lawfully be used as a form of executive control or influence over agency functions. Rather, it may only be exercised by OMB in the manner and for the purposes prescribed in 31 U.S.C. § [1512]—i.e., to prevent obligation or expenditure in a manner which would give rise to a need for deficiency or supplemental appropriations, to achieve the most effective and economical use of appropriations and to establish reserves either to provide for contingencies or to effect savings which are in furtherance of or at least consistent with, the purposes of an appropriation.

"As thus limited, the apportionment process serves a necessary purpose—the promotion of economy and efficiency in the use of appropriations. . . .

. . . .

"[S]ince a useful purpose is served by OMB's proper exercise of the apportionment power, we do not believe that the potential for abuse of the power is sufficient to justify removing it from OMB."

Thus, the appropriations of independent regulatory agencies like SEC are subject to apportionment by OMB, but OMB may not lawfully use its apportionment power to compromise the independence of those agencies. To use the example given in B-163628, if OMB tried to use apportionment to prevent the SEC from hiring personnel authorized by Congress, that would be an abuse of its apportionment powers. But this possibility does not justify denying OMB's basic apportionment authority altogether.

The Impoundment Control Act may permit OMB, in effect, to delay the apportionment deadlines prescribed in 31 U.S.C. § 1513(b). For example, when the President sends a rescission message to Congress, the budget authority proposed to be rescinded may be withheld for up to 45 days pending congressional action on a rescission bill. 2 U.S.C. §§ 682(3), 683(b). In B-115398.33, August 12, 1976, GAO responded to a congressional request to review a situation in which an apportionment had been withheld for more than 30 days after enactment of the appropriation act. The President had planned to submit a rescission message for some of the funds but was late in drafting and transmitting his message. If the full amount contained in the rescission message could be withheld for the entire 45-day period, and Congress ultimately disallowed the full rescission, release of the funds for obligation would occur only a few days before the budget authority expired. The Comptroller General suggested that, where Congress has completed action on a rescission bill rescinding only a part of the amount proposed, OMB should immediately apportion the amounts not included in the rescission bill without awaiting the expiration of the 45-day period. See also B-115398.33, March 5, 1976.

e. Apportionments Requiring Deficiency Estimate

In our discussion of the basic requirement for apportionment, we quoted 31 U.S.C. § 1512(a) to the effect that appropriations must be apportioned "to prevent obligation or expenditure at a rate that would indicate a necessity for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation." Thus, GAO has held that the Antideficiency Act requires that fixed-term appropriations be obligated and expended in such a way as to avoid situations in which Congress must either make a deficiency or supplemental appropriation or face exhaustion of the appropriation and the consequent drastic curtailment of the activity the appropriation was intended to fund. 64 Comp. Gen. 728, 735 (1985); 36 Comp. Gen. 699, 703 (1957).

The requirement that appropriations be apportioned so as to avoid the need for deficiency or supplemental appropriations is fleshed out in 31 U.S.C. § 1515 (formerly subsection (e) of the Antideficiency Act):

"(a) An appropriation required to be apportioned under section 1512 of this title may be apportioned on a basis that indicates the need for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation to the extent necessary to permit payment of such pay increases as may be granted pursuant to law to civilian officers and employees (including prevailing rate employees whose pay is fixed and adjusted under subchapter IV of chapter 53 of title 5) and to retired and active military personnel.

"(b)(1) Except as provided in subsection (a) of this section, an official may make, and the head of an executive agency may request, an apportionment under section 1512 of this title that would indicate a necessity for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation only when the official or agency head decides that the action is required because of—

"(A) a law enacted after submission to Congress of the estimates for an appropriation that requires an expenditure beyond administrative control; or

"(B) an emergency involving the safety of human life, the protection of property, or the immediate welfare of individuals when an appropriation that would allow the United States Government to pay, or contribute to, amounts required to be paid to individuals in specific amounts fixed by law or under formulas prescribed by law, is insufficient.

"(2) If an official making an apportionment decides that an apportionment would indicate a necessity for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation, the official shall submit immediately a detailed report of the facts to Congress. The report shall be referred to in submitting a proposed deficiency or supplemental appropriation."

Section 1515 provides certain exceptions to the requirement of section 1512(a) that apportionments be made in such manner as to assure that the funds will last throughout the fiscal year and there will be no necessity for a deficiency appropriation. Under subsection 1515(a), deficiency apportionments are permissible if necessary to pay salary increases granted pursuant to law to federal civilian and military personnel. Under subsection 1515(b), apportionments can be made in an unbalanced manner (e.g., an entire appropriation could be obligated by the end of the second quarter) if the apportioning officer determines that (1) a law enacted subsequent to the transmission of budget estimates for the appropriation requires expenditures beyond administrative control, or (2) there is an emergency involving safety of human life, protection of property, or immediate welfare of individuals in cases where an appropriation for mandatory payments to those individuals is insufficient.

Prior to 1957, what is now subsection 1515(b) prohibited only the making of an apportionment indicating the need for a deficiency or supplemental appropriation, so the only person who could violate this subsection was the Director of OMB. An amendment in 1957 made it equally a violation for an agency to request such an apportionment. See 38 Comp. Gen. 501 (1959).

The exception for expenditures "beyond administrative control" required by a statute enacted after submission of the budget estimate may be illustrated by statutory increases in compensation, although many of the cases would now be covered by subsection (a). We noted several of the cases in our consideration of when an obligation or expenditure is "authorized by law" for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1341. Those cases established the rule that a mandatory increase is regarded as "authorized by law" so as to permit overobligation, whereas a discretionary increase is not. The same rule applies in determining when an expenditure is "beyond administrative control" for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1515(b). Thus, statutory pay increases for Wage Board employees granted pursuant to a wage survey meet the test. 39 Comp.

Gen. 422 (1959); 38 Comp. Gen. 538, 542 (1959). See also 45 Comp. Gen. 584, 587 (1966) (severance pay in fiscal year 1966).[52] Discretionary increases, just as they are not "authorized by law" for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1341, are not "beyond administrative control" for purposes of section 1515(b). 44 Comp. Gen. 89 (1964) (salary increases to Central Intelligence Agency employees); 31 Comp. Gen. 238 (1951) (pension increases to retired District of Columbia police and firefighters).

The Wage Board exception was separately codified in 1957 and now appears at 31 U.S.C. § 1515(a), quoted above. Subsection 1515(a) reached its present form in 1987 when Congress expanded it to include pay increases granted pursuant to law to non-Wage Board civilian officers and employees and to retired and active military personnel.[53]

The exceptions in subsection 1515(b)(1)(B) do not appear to have been discussed in any GAO decisions as of the date of this publication, although a 1989 internal memorandum suggested that the exception would apply to Forest Service appropriations for fighting forest fires. B-230117-O.M., February 8, 1989. The exceptions for safety of human life and protection of property appear to be patterned after the identical exceptions under 31 U.S.C. § 1342, so the case law under that section should be equally relevant for construing the scope of the exceptions under section 1515(b).

It is important to note that the exceptions in 31 U.S.C. § 1515(b) are exceptions only to the prohibition against making or requesting apportionments requiring deficiency estimates; they are not exceptions to the basic prohibitions in 31 U.S.C. § 1341 against obligating or spending in excess or advance of appropriations. The point was discussed at some length in B-167034, September 1, 1976. Legislation had been proposed in the Senate to repeal 41 U.S.C. § 11, which prohibits the making of a contract, not otherwise authorized by law, unless there is an appropriation "adequate to its fulfillment," except in the case of contracts made by a military department for "clothing, subsistence, forage, fuel, quarters, transportation, or [52]The law mandating payment of severance pay was enacted after the start of FY 1966, which is why the expenditures in that case would qualify under 31 U.S.C. § 1515(b).

medical and hospital supplies." It had been suggested that 41 U.S.C. § 11 was unnecessary in light of 31 U.S.C. § 1515(b). The question was whether, if 41 U.S.C. § 11 were repealed, the military departments would have essentially the same authority under section 1515(b).

The Defense Department expressed the view that section 1515(b) would not be an adequate substitute for the 41 U.S.C. § 11 exception which allows the incurring of obligations for limited purposes even though the applicable appropriation is insufficient to cover the expenses at the time the commitment is made. Defense commented as follows:

"The authority to apportion funds on a deficiency basis in [31 U.S.C. § 1515(b)] does not, as alleged, provide authority to incur a deficiency. It merely authorizes obligating funds at a deficiency rate under certain circumstances, e.g., a $2,000,000 appropriation can be obligated in its entirety at the end of the third quarter, but it does not provide authority to obligate one dollar more than $2,000,000." Letter from the Deputy Secretary of Defense to the Chairman, House Armed Services Committee, April 2, 1976 (quoted in B-167034, September 1, 1976).

The Comptroller General agreed with the Deputy Secretary, stating:

"[Section 1515(b)] in no way authorizes an agency of the Government actually to incur obligations in excess of the total amount of money appropriated for a period. It only provides an exception to the general apportionment rule set out in [31 U.S.C. § 1512(a)] that an appropriation be allocated so as to insure that it is not exhausted prematurely. [Section 1515(b)] says nothing about increasing the total amount of the appropriation itself or authorizing the incurring of obligations in excess of the total amount appropriated. On the contrary, as noted above, apportionment only involves the subdivision of appropriations already enacted by Congress. It necessarily follows that the sum of the parts, as apportioned, could not exceed the total amount of the appropriations being apportioned.

"Any deficiency that an agency incurs where obligations exceed total amounts appropriated, including a deficiency that arises in a situation where it was determined that one of the exceptions set forth in [section 1515(b)] was applicable, would constitute a violation of 31 U.S.C. § [1341(a)] . . . ." B-167034, September 1, 1976.

f. Exemptions From Apportionment Requirement

A number of exemptions from the apportionment requirement, formerly found in subsection (f) of the Antideficiency Act, are now gathered in 31 U.S.C. § 1516:

"An official designated in section 1513 of this title to make apportionments may exempt from apportionment—

REV_00257240

"(1) a trust fund or working fund if an expenditure from the fund has no significant effect on the financial operations of the United States Government;

"(2) a working capital fund or a revolving fund established for intragovernmental operations;

"(3) receipts from industrial and power operations available under law; and

"(4) appropriations made specifically for–

"(A) interest on, or retirement of, the public debt;

"(B) payment of claims, judgments, refunds, and drawbacks;

"(C) items the President decides are of a confidential nature;

"(D) payment under a law requiring payment of the total amount of the appropriation to a designated payee; and

"(E) grants to the States under the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 301 et seq.)."

Section 1516 is largely self-explanatory and the various enumerated exceptions appear to be readily understood. Note that the statute does not make the exemptions mandatory. It merely authorizes them, within the discretion of the apportioning authority (OMB). OMB's implementing instructions, OMB Circular No. A-34, § 41.1, have not adopted all of the exemptions permitted under the statute. In several cases—for example, trust funds and intragovernmental revolving funds—the funds are subject to apportionment unless OMB grants an exemption for a particular account. Id.

In addition, 10 U.S.C. § 2201(a) authorizes the President to exempt appropriations for military functions of the Defense Department from apportionment upon determining "such action to be necessary in the interest of national defense."

Another exemption, this one mandatory, is contained in 31 U.S.C. § 1511(b)(3), for "the Senate, the House of Representatives, a committee of Congress, a member, officer, employee, or office of either House of Congress, or the Office of the Architect of the Capitol or an officer or employee of that Office." Apart from this specific exemption, the remainder of the legislative branch, and the judicial branch, are subject to apportionment. 31 U.S.C. § 1513(a).

g. Administrative Division of Apportionments

Thus far, we have reviewed the provisions of the Antideficiency Act directed at the appropriation level and the apportionment level. The law also addresses agency subdivisions.

The first provision to note is 31 U.S.C. § 1513(d):

"An appropriation apportioned under this subchapter may be divided and subdivided administratively within the limits of the apportionment."

Thus, administrative subdivisions are expressly authorized. The precise pattern of subdivisions will vary based on the nature and scope of activities funded under the apportionment and, to some extent, agency preference. The levels of subdivision below the apportionment level are, in descending order, allotment, suballotment, and allocation. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 21.1. Additional subdivisions may exist with varying designations such as allowance, operating budget, etc. Id. § 32.2(7). As we will see later in our discussion of 31 U.S.C. § 1517(a), there are definite Antideficiency Act implications flowing from how an agency structures its fund control system.

The next relevant statute is 31 U.S.C. § 1514:[54]

"(a) The official having administrative control of an appropriation available to the legislative branch, the judicial branch, the United States International Trade Commission, or the District of Columbia government, and, subject to the approval of the President, the head of each executive agency (except the Commission) shall prescribe by regulation a system of administrative control not inconsistent with accounting procedures prescribed under law. The system shall be designed to—

"(1) restrict obligations or expenditures from each appropriation to the amount of apportionments or reapportionments of the appropriation; and

"(2) enable the official or the head of the executive agency to fix responsibility for an obligation or expenditure exceeding an apportionment or reapportionment.

"(b) To have a simplified system for administratively dividing appropriations, the head of each executive agency (except the Commission) shall work toward the objective of financing each operating unit, at the highest practical level, from not more than one administrative division for each appropriation affecting the unit."

[54]Prior to the 1982 recodification of Title 31, sections 1513(d) and 1514 had been combined as subsection (g) of the Antideficiency Act.

Section 1514 is designed to ensure that the agencies in each branch of the government keep their obligations and expenditures within the bounds of each apportionment or reapportionment. The official in each agency who has administrative control of the apportioned funds is required to set up, by regulation, a system of administrative controls to implement this objective. The system must be consistent with any accounting procedures prescribed by or pursuant to law, and must be designed to (1) prevent obligations and expenditures in excess of apportionments or reapportionments, and (2) fix responsibility for any obligation or expenditure in excess of an apportionment or reapportionment. Agency fund control regulations in the executive branch must be approved by OMB. See OMB Circular No. A-34, §§ 31.3 and 31.5.

Subsection (b) of 31 U.S.C. § 1514 was added in 1956 (70 Stat. 783) and was intended to simplify agency allotment systems. Prior to 1956, it was not uncommon for agencies to divide and subdivide their apportionments into numerous "pockets" of obligational authority called "allowances." Obligating or spending more than the amount of each allowance was a violation of the Antideficiency Act as it then existed. The Second Hoover Commission (Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government) had recommended simplification in 1955. The Senate and House Committees on Government Operations agreed. Both committees reported as follows:

"The making of numerous allotments which are further divided and suballotted to lower levels leads to much confusion and inflexibility in the financial control of appropriations or funds as well as numerous minor violations of [the Antideficiency Act]."

S. Rep. No. 2265, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. 9 (1956), reprinted in 1956 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3794, 3802; H.R. Rep. No. 2734, 84th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1956). The result was what is now 31 U.S.C. § 1514(b).[55]

As noted, one of the objectives of 31 U.S.C. § 1514 is to enable the agency head to fix responsibility for obligations or expenditures in excess of apportionments. The statute encourages agencies to fix responsibility at the highest practical level, but does not otherwise legality of proposed payments, and are liable for the amount of illegal or improper payments resulting from their certifications.

A great many government officials make official "certifications" of one type or another, but this does not make them "certifying officers" for purposes of accountability and liability. The concepts of accountability and relief discussed in this chapter apply only to "authorized certifying officers" who certify vouchers upon which moneys are to be paid out by disbursing officers in discharging a debt or obligation of the government. 23 Comp. Gen. 953 (1944). This may in appropriate circumstances include the head of a department or agency. 31 U.S.C. § 3325(a)(1); 21 Comp. Gen. 976, 979 (1942); 40 Op. Att'y Gen. 284 (1943). An authorized certifying officer must be so designated in writing. 31 U.S.C. § 3325(a)(1).

Thus, an employee who "certified" overtime assignments in the sense of a timekeeper verifying that employees worked the hours of overtime claimed could not be held liable for resulting overpayments under an accountable officer theory. B-197109, March 24, 1980. Similarly, an official who certifies that long-distance telephone calls are necessary for official business as required by 31 U.S.C. § 1348(b) is not an accountable officer. 65 Comp. Gen. 19, 20–21 (1985). The same approach applies to various post-certification administrative actions, the rule being that once a voucher has been duly certified by an authorized official, subsequent administrative processing does not constitute certification for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 3528. 55 Comp. Gen. 388, 390 (1975). For example, the Comptroller General has held that 31 U.S.C. § 3528 does not apply to an "approving officer" who approves vouchers after they have been duly certified. 21 Comp. Gen. 841 (1942).

b. Disbursing Officers

A disbursing officer is an officer or employee of a federal department or agency, civilian or military, designated to disburse moneys and render accounts in accordance with laws and regulations governing the disbursement of public funds. The term is essentially self-defining. As one court has stated:

"We do not find the term 'disbursing officer' statutorily defined, probably because it is self-definitive. It can mean nothing except an officer who is authorized to disburse funds of the United States."

statute applies to legislative branch (and presumably judicial branch) agencies as well as executive branch agencies. 64 Comp. Gen. 152 (1984). The Treasury Department is authorized to issue implementing regulations and may delegate that authority to other agencies. 31 U.S.C. § 3342(d).

Of particular relevance here are 31 U.S.C. §§ 3342(c)(2) and (c)(3):

"(2) The head of an agency having jurisdiction over a disbursing official may offset, within the same fiscal year, a deficiency resulting from a transaction under subsection (a) of this section with a gain from a transaction under subsection (a). A gain in the account of a disbursing official not used to offset deficiencies under subsection (a) shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"(3) Amounts necessary to adjust for deficiencies in the account of a disbursing official because of transactions under subsection (a) of this section are authorized to be appropriated."

One important application of the offsetting authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c)(2) is losses resulting from certain foreign currency exchange transactions, and cases involving this application are noted later in this chapter. However, nothing in the statute limits it to foreign exchange transactions. The offsetting authority applies by its terms to "a deficiency resulting from a transaction under subsection (a)," and this includes check cashing operations as authorized by subsections (a)(1) and (b).

Decisions rendered shortly after the statute was enacted applied it to uncollectible checks cashed over forged endorsements and explicitly recognized the statute as a form of relief. The first such case was 27 Comp. Gen. 211 (1947), stating at 213:

"Since the cashing of a check is an operation authorized under the act, any loss arising out of such transaction properly may be considered as coming within the purview of the term 'any deficiencies' for which relief is contemplated under the act."

This holding was followed in 27 Comp. Gen. 663 (1948). The original version of 31 U.S.C. § 3342, enacted in 1944 (58 Stat. 921), did not include the offsetting authority. See B-39771, September 26, 1950. It was added in 1953 (67 Stat. 62). Thus, the "relief" referred to in 27 Comp. Gen. 211 and 27 Comp. Gen. 663 was simply the authority to use agency appropriations to adjust the deficiencies. Both cases involved the Army, which at the time received annual appropriations for this purpose. The Army was thus in a position to invoke the statute, and the adjustments had the effect of relieving the disbursing officers.

For the next four decades, the principles established by 27 Comp. Gen. 211 saw little use, and check cashing losses during that period were mostly treated as improper payments requiring relief under whatever authorities were available (31 U.S.C. § 3527(c) since 1955). A 1991 decision to the Air Force, 70 Comp. Gen. 616, changed this and, in effect, reverted to the approach of 27 Comp. Gen. 211, now augmented by the offsetting authority. After reviewing precedent and legislative history, the decision concluded that—

"section 3342 may be applied to check cashing losses. Thus, an agency may use section 3342 to offset losses from cashing uncollectible checks with gains from other section 3342(a) activities."

Offsetting under section 3342(c)(2) is done on a fiscal-year basis. An uncollectible check becomes a deficiency not when it is cashed by the disbursing officer, but when it is dishonored and returned to be charged to the disbursing officer's account. If these events occur in different fiscal years, the deficiency is chargeable to the latter year. B-120737, December 27, 1954. If an item is charged as a deficiency in one year and collected in a subsequent year, the collection should be charged to the fiscal year account in which the collection is made regardless of the fiscal year in which the deficiency was charged. Id.

For checks cashed within the authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3342, following the procedures of that statute eliminates the need to pursue relief under 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c). If there is a net gain in an account for a given fiscal year, the net gain is deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and that ends the matter. If there is a net loss, and the agency is able to make an adjustment from an available appropriation, the adjustment clears the disbursing officer's account and similarly ends the matter. A net loss resulting from the application of 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c) is not an Antideficiency Act violation. 61 Comp. Gen. 649 (1982).

It must be emphasized that 31 U.S.C. § 3342 does not make an agency's appropriations available for these adjustments. It merely authorizes appropriations for that purpose. For disbursing officers within the Department of Defense, permanent authority exists to use appropriated funds for "losses in the accounts of disbursing officials and agents in accordance with law." 10 U.S.C. § 2781(2). Civilian agencies will need comparable authority which may be in the form of permanent legislation, specific appropriations, or specific language in a lump-sum appropriation (for example, "including adjustments as authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 3342").

The July 1991 decision made two other very important points. First, the offsetting authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3342 is discretionary. An agency is not required to use it, but retains the option of refusing to adjust a disbursing officer's account, in which event the relief avenue of 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c) remains available.

Second, while good faith and due care are prerequisites to relief under 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c), section 3342 contains no comparable requirement. Thus, the use of section 3342 does not require findings of good faith and due care. Decisions stating or implying the contrary, such as 27 Comp. Gen. 211, were modified to that extent. Be that as it may, it is undesirable as a matter of policy to use 31 U.S.C. § 3342 to relieve a disbursing officer for losses attributable to bad faith or lack of due care, and an agency is well within its discretion to decline use of those procedures in such cases.

The discretion to use 31 U.S.C. § 3342 applies only to checks cashed within the scope of the statute. Losses resulting from checks cashed beyond the scope of that authority (i.e., not for an official purpose or for a person not within one of the classes specified in subsection 3342(b)) may not be offset or adjusted under the authority of section 3342, but are improper payments for which administrative relief is available only under 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c). 70 Comp. Gen. 420 (1991); B-127608-O.M., May 28, 1956.

The losses under consideration—uncollectible check losses resulting from check cashing operations—fall into several distinct but related fact patterns. Cases cited below which predate GAO's July 1991 decision are all section 3527(c) relief cases resolved under the principles and standards previously discussed; all could now be resolved under the offset and adjustment authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3342.

1. Uncollectible personal check. Cases in this category tend to involve either of two general situations:

- Thief steals someone else's personal checks and cashes them in conjunction with stolen or fraudulent identification. B-246418, February 3, 1992; B-240440, March 27, 1991; B-212588, August 14, 1984.
- Thief cashes checks from a fraudulently established checking account in the name of some other real or fictitious person. B-229827, January 14, 1988; B-221415, March 26, 1986; B-220737/B-220981, December 10, 1985.

2. Fraudulent endorsement of government check. In this situation, a thief steals a legitimately issued government check (paycheck, tax refund check, etc.) and cashes it with the aid of stolen or fraudulent identification. E.g., B-227436, July 2, 1987; B-216726, January 9, 1985; and B-214436, April 6, 1984.

3. Fraudulent alteration of amount on government check. If the amount is fraudulently raised by the payee, the liability of the disbursing officer is the difference between the original amount and the fraudulent amount. B-228859, September 11, 1987. If the amount is altered and the check cashed by someone other than the payee, the disbursing officer's liability is the full amount of the payment. B-221144, April 22, 1986.

The opportunity for fraudulent alteration of amounts naturally decreases when the amount is also spelled out in words on the face of the check. 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 481 (1983). However, spelling the amount out in words is not required on government checks, and Treasury checks generally do not do so. See I Treasury Financial Manual § 4-5050.45c (T/L 496). If a disbursing officer is in compliance with the TFM and applicable agency regulations, relief will not be denied solely because the amount is not written out in words. 65 Comp. Gen. 299 (1986); B-209697, November 21, 1983.

4. Postal money order. The authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3342(a)(1) is not limited to checks but applies to "negotiable instruments" generally, which includes postal money orders. E.g., B-217663, July 16, 1985 (fraudulent alteration of amount); B-213874, September 6, 1984 (forged endorsement).

b. Duplicate Check Losses

A duplicate check loss, as we use the term here, is a loss resulting when (1) a payee claims nonreceipt of an original check, (2) the government issues a replacement check, and (3) both checks are negotiated.

Replacement checks are issued under the authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3331. If an original check "is lost, stolen, destroyed in any part, or is so defaced that the value to the owner or holder is impaired," the Secretary of the Treasury may issue a replacement check, and may delegate that authority to other agencies. 31 U.S.C. §§ 3331(b), (f). The Secretary has discretionary authority to require an indemnification agreement from the owner or holder prior to issuing the replacement check. Id. § 3331(e).

The current system for issuing replacement checks, developed by the Treasury Department in the mid-1980s, is reflected in 31 C.F.R. Parts 245 and 248, I Treasury Financial Manual Chapter 4-7000, and TFM Bulletin No. 83-28 (August 2, 1983).[33] In brief, upon receipt of a claim for loss or nonreceipt of an original check, the spending agency may certify a new payment. 31 C.F.R. § 245.5. In agencies for which Treasury disburses, an agency certifying officer certifies the replacement check to a Treasury disbursing officer. For agencies which do their own disbursing, most notably the military departments, the "recertification" is an internal procedure based on agency as well as Treasury regulations. The replacement check, which has a different serial number from the original check, is called a "recertified check." Formerly, most replacement checks were "substitute checks" with the same serial number as the original check. With the implementation of the recertification procedure, Treasury announced that substitute checks would generally no longer be available. TFM Bulletin No. 83-28, para. 2.[34]

The Treasury regulations specify the responsibilities of the payee. If the original check shows up before the claimant receives the replacement check, the claimant should notify the agency and follow the agency's instructions. 31 C.F.R. § 245.8(a). If the original check shows up after receipt of the replacement check, the claimant is to return the original to the issuing agency. "Under no circumstances should both the original and replacement checks be cashed." Id. § 245.8(b).

[33]Prior approaches had produced complex problems and were unsatisfactory. See 62 Comp. Gen. 91 (1982) and GAO report Millions Paid Out in Duplicate and Forged Government Checks, AFMD-81-68 (October 1, 1981).

[34]The regulations now use the term "substitute check" only in 31 C.F.R. Part 248 in the context of "depositary checks," checks drawn on accounts maintained in depositary banks in U.S. territories or foreign countries.

Payees do not always read Treasury regulations, however, and sometimes cash both checks. Since the agency's obligation is to make payment once, cashing both checks results in an erroneous payment for which some accountable officer is liable unless relieved. In the most common situation, the payee cashes both checks. The first check satisfies the government's original obligation, and issuing the replacement check is an authorized transaction. Thus, the loss occurs "when the second check is wrongfully presented and paid. (The actual sequence in which the payee negotiates the original check and the replacement check is immaterial.)" 62 Comp. Gen. 91, 94 (1982). Depending on the agency and the nature of the error, the proper relief statute will be either 31 U.S.C. § 3528 (certifying officer) or 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c) (disbursing officer). For the military departments, even though they may employ a "recertification" procedure, the proper statute is section 3527(c). 66 Comp. Gen. 192, 194 (1987).

GAO's first relief decision under the recertification procedure was 65 Comp. Gen. 811 (1986). Relief for a duplicate check loss is granted if (1) the accountable officer followed applicable regulations and procedures, (2) there is no indication of bad faith, and (3) the agency has pursued or is pursuing adequate collection action to recover the overpayment. Id. at 812. This is essentially the same standard that had been applied under the former "substitute check" system. E.g., 65 Comp. Gen. 812, 813 (1986); 62 Comp. Gen. 91, 97 (1982). A few more recent cases applying this standard are 70 Comp. Gen. 298 (1991) (Navy); B-237343, January 23, 1991 (Army); and B-232773, January 12, 1989 (Defense Logistics Agency). Of course, relief cannot be granted until a loss actually occurs. 70 Comp. Gen. 9, 12 (1990); 66 Comp. Gen. 192, 194 (1987). The documentation required to support a relief request in a duplicate check case is spelled out in B-221720, May 8, 1986, and includes such things as copies of both checks, the claim of nonreceipt, the agency's stop payment request, Treasury's debit voucher, and documentation of collection efforts.

If the disbursing officer is a supervisor and the duplicate check is actually issued by a subordinate, both are accountable officers for purposes of liability and relief. 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 479–80 (1983); B-213471 et al., January 24, 1984; B-212576 et al., December 2, 1983. The relief standards are those set forth in Section D.3.a of this chapter for improper payments generally. As with other relief situations, lack of due care, failure to follow established procedures for example, will not preclude relief if it was not the proximate cause of the loss. 70 Comp. Gen. 298 (1991); B-225932, March 27, 1987.

Treasury regulations encourage, but do not require, the agency to obtain a signed statement from the claimant before issuing or certifying a replacement check. I TFM § 4-7060.20a. If the agency's own regulations require the statement, failure to obtain it will generally be regarded as lack of due care. Relief is granted or denied based on application of the proximate cause concept. 70 Comp. Gen. 298 (1991); B-225932, March 27, 1987. If the statement is obtained but turns out to be a misrepresentation, it is not the accountable officer's fault. B-247062, June 9, 1992. In 70 Comp. Gen. 9 (1990), GAO advised the Navy that it could waive its own requirement for claimant statements where a box containing over 4,600 checks was lost en route to the Philippines, and obtaining individual statements prior to issuing replacement checks would have caused undue delay and hardship.

GAO has expressed concern over issuing replacement checks prematurely, that is, without giving the original check a reasonable time to arrive. While the timing is essentially a matter of agency discretion, it is also a factor which may bear upon the issue of due care. 63 Comp. Gen. 337 (1984). Timing should include risk assessment. Thus, a shorter waiting period may be appropriate where the payee has a continuing relationship with the agency and recoupment by offset is therefore presumably easier. I TFM § 4-7060.20e; B-226116, February 20, 1987. As a general proposition, GAO will not question a waiting period of at least 3 working days. 63 Comp. Gen. 337; I TFM § 4-7060.20a. For checks mailed prior to the actual payment date, the 3-day period may include mailing days. B-230658, June 14, 1988. A waiting period of less than 3 days needs to be specifically justified. See B-215433/B-215515, July 2, 1984. A good example is B-246369, February 3, 1992 (payee who was in Virginia could not have received original check inadvertently mailed to Florida).

It is possible, although the cases are (and should be) rare, for duplicate check losses to occur with checks issued to a bank under direct deposit procedures. Recoupment efforts should be directed against the bank which made the error, leaving it to the bank to then recover from the individual depositor as an independent transaction. B-215431/B-215432, January 2, 1985. Related decisions arising from the same set of losses are B-215432.3, August 22, 1991 (finally granting relief upon documentation of collection efforts), and B-215432 et al., July 6, 1984.

An agency's internal controls and procedures form an important line of defense against duplicate check losses. One agency, for example, will issue a recertified check prior to obtaining the status of the original check only if the employee has sufficient funds in his or her retirement account to cover a potential loss, and requires specific clearances upon termination of employment. These procedures, GAO commented, "will better safeguard federal funds." B-232615, September 28, 1988. Agencies should also develop guidelines for dealing with persons requesting several replacement checks within a relatively short time period. Three replacement check requests within an 11-month period, for example, should trigger some concern. B-221398, September 19, 1986. Guidelines may include such things as counselling employees to take advantage of direct deposit procedures and delaying recertification until the status of the original check has been determined. The exact content of any such guidelines is up to the agency. B-217947/B-226384, March 27, 1987; B-220500, September 12, 1986. Indemnification agreements may be desirable in some circumstances, even where not required. See 66 Comp. Gen. 192, 194–95 (1987). Chargeback data received from Treasury should be processed and forwarded to the pertinent finance office as promptly as possible. B-226316 et al., April 9, 1987.

Cases occasionally present variations on the factual theme, but the basic relief approach is the same. E.g., B-226769, July 29, 1987 (agency issued replacement for wrong check); B-195396, October 1, 1979 (agency inadvertently issued two replacement checks).

In our coverage of physical losses, we discussed the dollar amount GAO has established, currently $3,000, below which agencies may grant relief without the need for GAO involvement. In October 1991, GAO started extending the limit selectively to certain categories of improper payments, one of which is duplicate check losses. For duplicate check losses not exceeding $3,000, agencies may grant or deny relief administratively, without the need for GAO concurrence, in accordance with applicable statutes, regulations, and GAO decisions. B-243749, October 22, 1991 (civilian); B-244972, October 22, 1991

(military).[35] Section C.2 of this chapter contains more detail on how the $3,000 limit operates.

In the cases cited and discussed thus far, it was the payee who negotiated both checks. Where the original check is fraudulently negotiated by someone else, the situation is a bit different. Here, the replacement check rather than the original check satisfies the government's obligation to the payee, and the loss results from negotiating the original check. 66 Comp. Gen. 192, 194 (1987). More precisely, the loss results from payment on the original check since there is nothing improper or incorrect in issuing it. Id. If forgery is established, Treasury will seek to recover from the bank which negotiated the check. See B-232772, October 17, 1989.

c. Errors in Check Issuance Process

The October 1991 decisions just cited authorizing administrative resolution of duplicate check losses not exceeding $3,000 extended the authorization to another category of erroneous payments—those resulting from "mechanical and/or clerical errors during the check issuance process." Thus, agencies may grant or deny relief for losses in this category within the monetary ceiling, as with duplicate check losses, in accordance with applicable statutes, regulations, and GAO decisions. B-243749, October 22, 1991 (civilian); B-244972, October 22, 1991 (military). The relief standards are the same as those previously discussed for other types of improper or erroneous payments.

Cases under this heading may result from any type of check payment—salary payments, payments to contractors, benefit payments, etc.—and include a variety of fact patterns. A few cases involving erroneous tax refund checks will illustrate. In each case, the disbursing officer was a director of one of Treasury's regional financial centers (formerly called disbursing centers), a supervisory official. In B-241098/B-241137, December 27, 1990, the printing system rejected two checks and automatically produced substitutes; the printing operator failed to remove and void the original checks; the originals and substitutes were issued and cashed by the payees. In B-187180, September 21, 1976, a keypunching error transposed two numerals, resulting in issuance of a check for $718 instead of the [35]The process actually started with a limited authorization for the Army, B-214372, October 9, 1987, revoked by the more inclusive B-244972.

correct amount of $178. In B-235037, September 18, 1989, an overpayment was made due to an error during the "typing operation and proof reading process." Relief was granted in the first two cases by applying the standards for relieving a supervisor; in the third, it was denied because the request contained neither a description of relevant controls and procedures nor statements by the individuals concerned.

One more tax refund case illustrates the immutable law that anything that can happen will happen. A tax refund check intended for John and Ruth Puncsak of San Francisco was drawn payable to "J. and R. Puncsak," and erroneously sent to Joe and Rose Puncsak, also of San Francisco, who were not entitled to a refund but instead owed money to the Internal Revenue Service. The check was cashed, Joe and Rose claiming that they endorsed the check but then lost it. GAO advised the IRS to raise a charge against the account of the responsible accountable officer. B-112491, April 17, 1953. (Since this case predated the enactment of 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c), there was no way to consider administrative relief.)

As B-241098/B-241137 demonstrates, most mechanical errors are not purely mechanical, but involve human error as well, such as failure to spot the error during a verification process. Also, many of these cases involve the issuance of duplicate checks, the difference between these and the previously discussed duplicate check losses being that these losses do not result from a claim of nonreceipt but from the simultaneous issuance of duplicate checks attributable to government error. Similar cases involving other types of payments are B-239371, June 13, 1990; B-239094, June 13, 1990; B-237082 et al., May 8, 1990; B-235044 et al., March 20, 1990; and B-235036, October 17, 1989. Some factual variations follow:

- Machine that stuffs checks into envelopes was misaligned, obscuring the names and addresses. Treasury decided to shred the original checks and reissue them. One of the originals was inadvertently delivered rather than shredded, causing a duplicate payment. B-245586, November 12, 1991.
- Due to mechanical failure, a check printing machine failed to advance a voucher schedule and a second check was issued to a person with the same name but different middle initial than the correct payee. A clerk failed to notice the error during verification. In view of the volume of work at the disbursing center, the error was viewed as the Romney v. United States, 167 F.2d 521, 526 (D.C. Cir. 1948), cert. denied, 334 U.S. 847.

Whether an employee is a "disbursing officer" depends more on the nature of the person's duties than on the title of his or her position. In some cases, the job title will be "disbursing officer." This is the title for the disbursing officers of the Treasury Department who disburse for most civilian agencies under 31 U.S.C. § 3321. For the military departments, which generally do their own disbursing, the title may be "finance and accounting officer." As a general proposition, any employee to whom public funds are entrusted for the purpose of making payments from those funds will be regarded as a disbursing officer. See B-151156, December 30, 1963.

There may be more than one disbursing officer for a given transaction. Military disbursing operations provide an example. The account is often held in the name of a supervisory official such as a Finance and Accounting Officer, with the actual payment made by some subordinate (agent, cashier, deputy, etc.). Both are regarded as disbursing officers for purposes of liability and relief although, as we will discuss later, the standards for relief differ. E.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 479–80 (1983); B-245127, September 18, 1991.

c. Cashiers

A cashier is an officer or employee of a federal department, agency, or corporation who, having been recommended by the head of the activity, has been designated as a cashier by the officer responsible for making disbursements and is thereby authorized to perform limited cash disbursing functions or other cash operations. Treasury Financial Manual (TFM), Vol. I, § 4-3020. Cashiers must be designated in writing. Id. § 4-3025.

With respect to disbursing functions under 31 U.S.C. § 3321, cashiers are divided into five categories: (1) Class A Cashier (may not advance imprest funds to another cashier except an alternate); (2) Class B Cashier (may advance imprest funds to alternate or subcashier); (3) Class D Cashier (receives funds solely for change-making purposes); (4) Subcashier (may receive imprest funds from a Class B or D cashier and is under supervision of same local office); and (5) Alternate to a Cashier or Subcashier (functions during absence of principal cashier but may act simultaneously if required by work load). Fuller descriptions may be found in the Treasury Department's type that will occasionally escape even in a well-established and carefully supervised system. B-195106, July 12, 1979.

- Malfunction of feed mechanism on printing machine caused one check to skip, printing the inscription on the next check. The first check was replaced without noticing the duplicate; both checks were issued. Relief was granted on the same basis as in B-195106. B-212431, November 21, 1983.

"Clerical error" means human error without contributing mechanical malfunction. Relief standards remain the same. The cases noted in the following groupings, as with the last three tax refund cases cited above, are intended to illustrate factual variations.

1. Payment of wrong amount. The person preparing a check for a military separation voucher misread a dollar sign as the number "8," and printed a check for $899 instead of the correct amount of $99. B-238863, July 11, 1991. A voucher examiner preparing a partial payment to a contractor erroneously used the total amount due on the contract instead of the amount of the partial payment. B-227410, August 18, 1987.

2. Payment to wrong person. A clerk consolidating two contract payment vouchers in a single check payable to a credit union erroneously listed only one account number, causing an overpayment to one contractor and necessitating a replacement check to the other. B-238802, December 31, 1990. Further examples are B-234197, March 15, 1989 (misreading of documents resulted in payment to subcontractor instead of prime contractor); B-229126, November 3, 1987 (keypunch error generated payment to wrong contractor); B-212336, August 8, 1983 (voluntary child support allotment paid to wrong person due to error in assignment of organization code); B-192109, June 3, 1981 (check issued to wrong person with slightly different name than correct payee); B-194877, July 12, 1979 (amounts of two checks inadvertently switched).

3. Duplicate payment. Treasury Financial Center was issuing replacements for a batch of mutilated checks. One mutilated check became separated from the rest and was erroneously released along with its replacement. A computer operator had failed to verify each replacement check against the corresponding mutilated check. Because controls were in place which would have prevented the error had they been followed, and considering the large volume of work at the disbursing center, relief was granted to the disbursing officer, the center's director. (The computer operator is not an accountable officer.) B-231551, September 12, 1988.

Most duplicate payments are recovered, but many either are not or involve the expense of collection action or litigation. Especially in the area of payments to contractors, duplicate payment losses can involve large amounts. GAO surveyed a number of agencies in the mid-1980s, and emphasized the importance of adequate internal controls. E.g., General Services Administration Needs to Improve its Internal Controls to Prevent Duplicate Payments, GAO/AFMD-85-70 (August 20, 1985); Strengthening Internal Controls Would Help the Department of Justice Reduce Duplicate Payments, GAO/AFMD-85-72 (August 20, 1985). A case involving a duplicate payment to a contractor in which relief was granted on the basis of adequate controls is B-241019.2, February 7, 1992.

5. Statute of Limitations

The accounts of accountable officers must be settled by GAO within three years "after the date the Comptroller General receives the account." 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c)(1). Once this 3-year period has expired, no charges may be raised against the account except for losses due to fraud or criminal action on the part of the accountable officer. Id. § 3526(c)(2). Enacted in 1947 (61 Stat. 101), this legislation effectively operates as a limitation on establishing an accountable officer's liability for improper expenditures. As the Defense Department pointed out in recommending the legislation, a time limitation is desirable because passage of time diminishes the chances of recovering from the payee or recipient, leaving the liability solely with the accountable officer. S. Rep. No. 99, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. (1947), reprinted in 1947 U.S. Code Cong. Serv. 1075, 1077–78.

Unlike other statutes of limitations which merely affect the remedy (for example, by barring the commencement of legal proceedings), 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c) completely eliminates the debt. B-181466, November 19, 1974 (non-decision letter). Once an account has been settled, it cannot be reopened (except for fraud or criminality, as noted above), and the authority to grant or deny relief no longer exists. Thus, an accountable officer can escape liability for an improper expenditure if the government does not raise a charge against the account within the 3-year period. E.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 498 (1983); B-223372, December 4, 1989; B-198451.2,

September 15, 1982. Once an accountable officer's liability has been timely established, section 3526(c) does not limit the government's recovery from that officer. 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c)(4)(B).

The statute of limitations of 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c) applies only to improper payments and not to physical losses or deficiencies. 60 Comp. Gen. 674 (1981). An accountable officer's liability for a physical loss or deficiency is wholly independent of anyone's "raising a charge" against that officer's account.

The original version of 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c) was enacted at a time when all accounts were physically transmitted to GAO for settlement, GAO reviewed every piece of paper, and then issued a certificate of settlement to the accountable officer, "disallowing" credit for questionable items. As a result of changes in audit methods, this is no longer done. Rather, accounts are now retained by the various agencies, and an account is regarded as settled by operation of law at the end of the 3-year period except for unresolved items. GAO Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 8.7.

To reflect these changes in audit procedures, the date a "substantially complete" account is in the hands of the agency and available for audit is now generally considered as the point from which the 3-year period begins to run. E.g., B-181466, July 10, 1974 (non-decision letter). Assuming that supporting documents are available at the end of the time period covered by an accountable officer's statement of accountability, this will usually mean the date on which that statement of accountability is certified. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.7. There are situations, however, in which the 3-year period does not begin to run until some later date. Where a loss is due to fraud, the period begins when the loss is discovered and reported to appropriate agency officials. B-239802, April 3, 1991; B-239122, February 21, 1991. Where an agency has no way of knowing that an improper payment has occurred until it receives a debit voucher from the Treasury Department (duplicate check losses, for example), the 3-year period begins to run when the agency receives the debit voucher. B-226393,

April 29, 1988. If the date of receipt cannot be determined, the date of the debit voucher is used. Id.[36]

If an irregularity has not been resolved by the agency within two years from the time the statute of limitations begins to run, the irregularity should at that time be reported to GAO. This may be in the form of a relief request or a copy of the agency's irregularity report. This is designed to provide adequate time to consider a relief request or to otherwise prevent expiration of the statute of limitations where necessary. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.4.C. See also, e.g., 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 480 (1983); B-227538, July 8, 1987; B-217741, October 15, 1985. Of course, nothing prevents an agency from seeking relief sooner if appropriate.

As noted above, the 3-year limitation does not apply to losses attributable to fraud or other criminal action by the accountable officer. 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c)(2). It is automatically suspended during war. Id. § 3526(c)(3). And it may be suspended by the Comptroller General with respect to a specific item to get additional evidence or explanation necessary to settle an account. Id. § 3526(g). This may be in the form of a timely Notice of Exception (B-226176, May 26, 1987), or other written notification (B-239592, August 23, 1991; B-239140, July 12, 1991). The mere submission of a relief request within the 3-year period, however, is not enough. 62 Comp. Gen. 91, 98 (1982); B-220689, September 24, 1986.

Finally, 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c) deals solely with the liability of an accountable officer. It has no effect on the liability of the payee or recipient of an improper payment. It does not establish a limitation on recoveries against the improper payee or recipient, nor does it affect the agency's obligation to pursue collection action against the payee or recipient. 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c)(4)(A); Arnold v. United States, 404 F.2d 953 (Ct. Cl. 1968); B-205587, June 1, 1982.

[36]Prior decisions had not been entirely clear on precisely which date to use. E.g., B-220689, September 24, 1986 (date of debit voucher); B-213874, September 6, 1984 (inclusion in statement of accountability). B-226393 established the propositions stated in the text and modified prior decisions accordingly.

E. Other Relief Statutes

The relief statutes discussed thus far—31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(a), (b), (c), and 3528—are the ones most commonly encountered and will cover the vast majority of cases. Several others exist, however. Our listing here is not intended to be complete.

1. Statutes Requiring Affirmative Action

The statutes in this group are similar to 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527 and 3528 in that they require someone to actually make a relief decision.

a. United States Claims Court

The relief authority of the Claims Court is found in two provisions of law:

"The United States Claims Court shall have jurisdiction to render judgment upon any claim by a disbursing officer of the United States or by his administrator or executor for relief from responsibility for loss, in line of duty, of Government funds, vouchers, records, or other papers in his charge." 28 U.S.C. § 1496.

"Whenever the United States Claims Court finds that any loss by a disbursing officer of the United States was without his fault or negligence, it shall render a judgment setting forth the amount thereof, and the General Accounting Office shall allow the officer such amount as a credit in the settlement of his accounts." 28 U.S.C. § 2512.

These provisions, which originated together in legislation enacted in 1866 (14 Stat. 44), predate all of the other relief statutes and were once the only relief mechanism available apart from private relief legislation. The Supreme Court has termed the Claims Court legislation "a very curious provision" in that it permits a disbursing officer to establish a defense to a claim which "the government can only establish judicially in some other court." United States v. Clark, 96 U.S. (6 Otto) 37, 43 (1877). In effect, it authorizes the Claims Court to render a declaratory (as opposed to money) judgment. Ralcon, Inc. v. United States, 13 Cl. Ct. 294, 300 (1987). Now, in view of the comprehensive scheme of administrative relief Congress has enacted, the Claims Court statute is rarely used.

b. Legislative Branch Agencies

Since 31 U.S.C. § 3728, the primary certifying officer relief statute, does not apply to the legislative branch, Congress has enacted specific statutes for several legislative branch agencies authorizing or requiring the designation of certifying officers, establishing their accountability, and authorizing the Comptroller General to grant relief. Patterned after 31 U.S.C. § 3728, they are: 2 U.S.C. § 142b (Library of Congress); 2 U.S.C. § 142e (Congressional Budget Office);

REV_00257530

2 U.S.C. § 142f (Office of Technology Assessment); and 44 U.S.C. § 308 (Government Printing Office).

c. Savings Bond Redemption Losses

Losses resulting from the redemption of savings bonds are replaced from the fund used to pay claims under the Government Losses in Shipment Act. 31 U.S.C. § 3126(a). The statute further provides that "an officer or employee of the Department of the Treasury is relieved from liability to the United States Government for the loss when the Secretary [of the Treasury] decides that the loss did not result from the fault or negligence of the . . . officer, or employee." Relief is mandatory if the government does not give the officer or employee written notice of his or her liability or potential liability within 10 years from the date of the erroneous payment. Id.

2. Statutes Providing "Automatic" Relief

The statutes in this group either (1) provide that taking a certain authorized action which might otherwise be regarded as creating a loss will not result in accountable officer liability, or (2) authorize the resolution of certain losses in such a manner as not to produce liability.

a. Waiver of Indebtedness

Many statutes authorize the government to waive the recovery of indebtedness resulting from various overpayments or erroneous payments if certain conditions are met. Waiver statutes commonly include a provision to the effect that accountable officers will not be held liable for any amounts waived. For example, the statutes authorizing waiver of overpayments of pay and allowances require that full credit be given in the accounts of accountable officers for any amounts waived under the statute. 5 U.S.C. § 5584(d) (civilian employees); 10 U.S.C. § 2774(d) (military personnel); 32 U.S.C. § 716(d) (National Guard). Once waiver is granted, the payment is deemed valid and there is no need to consider the question of relief. E.g., B-184947, March 21, 1978. This result applies even where relief has been denied under the applicable relief statute. B-177841-O.M., October 23, 1973.

Examples of comparable provisions in other waiver statutes are 5 U.S.C. § 8129(c) (overpayments under Federal Employees Compensation Act), 38 U.S.C. § 5302(d) (overpayment of veterans' benefits) and 42 U.S.C. § 404(c) (Social Security Act).

b. Compromise of Indebtedness

Under the Federal Claims Collection Act, if a debt claim is compromised in accordance with the statute and implementing regulations, no accountable officer will be held liable for the portion unrecovered by virtue of the compromise. 31 U.S.C. § 3711(d).

c. Foreign Exchange Transactions

Earlier in this chapter we discussed 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c), which authorizes, with respect to activities authorized under section 3342(a), losses to be offset against gains on a fiscal-year basis, and also authorizes appropriations to make adjustments for net losses. Our prior discussion was in the context of check cashing operations. Another important use of 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c) is accounting for certain foreign exchange losses. To implement this authority in the foreign exchange area, the Treasury Department has issued regulations (Treasury Department Circular No. 830 and I Treasury Financial Manual Chapter 4-9000), and has established an account entitled "Gains and Deficiencies on Exchange Transactions" (I TFM § 4-9090.10). As with the check cashing context, the relevant point here is that the use of 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c) accomplishes the necessary account adjustment and obviates the need to seek relief for any accountable officer.

One use of the Gains and Deficiencies account is the adjustment of losses due to exchange rate fluctuations. E.g., 64 Comp. Gen. 152 (1984) (restoration of losses in Library of Congress foreign currency accounts attributable to currency devaluations); 61 Comp. Gen. 649 (1982) (determination of proper exchange rate); B-245760, January 16, 1992 (devaluation of Laotian currency). However, in order to use the Gains and Deficiencies account, losses must result from "disbursing officer transactions" of the type authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 3342(a). 45 Comp. Gen. 493 (1966). In that case, the American Embassy in Cairo had made a payment for certain property in Egyptian pounds. The sales agreement was not executed and the money was refunded. At the time of the refund, the exchange rate had changed and the same amount of Egyptian pounds was worth less in U.S. dollars, resulting in a loss to the account. GAO agreed with the Treasury Department that the loss resulted from an administrative collection and not from a disbursing officer transaction, and should therefore be borne by the relevant program appropriation rather than the Gains and Deficiencies account.

GAO has also considered the use of the Gains and Deficiencies account in a number of cases involving Vietnamese and Cambodian currency

after the American evacuation from those countries in the mid-1970s. 56 Comp. Gen. 791 (1977), overruled in part by 61 Comp. Gen. 132 (1981) (piaster currency physically abandoned or left in accounts in Vietnam chargeable to Gains and Deficiencies); B-197708, April 8, 1980 (Vietnamese and Cambodian currency received by Treasury from U.S. disbursing officers at exchange rate in effect at time of evacuation subsequently became valueless; loss held to be of the type contemplated by 31 U.S.C. § 3342(c)). However, U.S. currency which was thought to have been burned but which subsequently turned up in the United States had to be treated as a physical loss. 56 Comp. Gen. at 793–96. (Relief was granted for this loss under 31 U.S.C. § 3527(a) in B-209978, July 18, 1983.)

d. Check Forgery Insurance Fund

The Check Forgery Insurance Fund is a revolving fund the purpose of which is to make replacement payments to payees whose Treasury checks have been lost or stolen and cashed over a forged endorsement in limited situations. 31 U.S.C. § 3343. Before the Fund may be used, four conditions must be satisfied: (1) the check is lost or stolen without fault of the payee; (2) the check is subsequently negotiated over the payee's forged endorsement; (3) the payee did not participate in any part of the proceeds of the check; and (4) recovery from the forger or other liable party has been or will be delayed or unsuccessful.[37] Id. § 3343(b). Any recoveries are restored to the Fund. Id. § 3343(d).

A forged endorsement for purposes of the statute has been held to include an unauthorized endorsement purported to be made in a representative capacity. Strann v. United States, 2 Cl. Ct. 782 (1983) (plaintiff's attorney endorsed tax refund check without authority). The third condition, participation in the proceeds, does not require a knowing participation. Koch v. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, 590 F.2d 260 (8th Cir. 1978); Duden v. United States, 467 F.2d 924 (Ct. Cl. 1972). In Duden, for example, the plaintiff's former husband endorsed her name on a tax refund check and subsequently paid her part of the proceeds for support. She had no way of knowing that the payment came from those proceeds. While the endorsement was held not to be a forgery under the facts involved, the court also [37]To facilitate prosecution, GAO has advocated the enactment of a federal misdemeanor law for forged Treasury checks. Forgery of U.S. Treasury Checks—Federal Misdemeanor Law Needed, GAO/GGD-84-6 (November 17, 1983).

noted that the plaintiff's participation in the proceeds would preclude recovery from the Check Forgery Insurance Fund. 467 F.2d at 930.

The bank presenting a check to the Treasury for payment guarantees the genuineness of prior endorsements. 31 C.F.R. § 240.5. Thus, in many cases, the government will be able to recover from the presenting bank. E.g., Olson v. United States, 437 F.2d 981, 986–87 (Ct. Cl. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 939.

There is no mention of accountable officers in 31 U.S.C. § 3343. However, a payment from the Check Forgery Insurance Fund means that only one payment is charged to the appropriations of the agency incurring the original obligation, with the effect that no accountable officer of that agency incurs any liability. See B-10929, February 1, 1972.

e. Secretary of the Treasury

Enacted in 1947 (61 Stat. 730), 31 U.S.C. § 3333 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury will not be liable for payments made "in due course and without negligence" of checks drawn on the Treasury or a depositary, or other obligations guaranteed or assumed by the United States, and that the Comptroller General "shall credit" the appropriate accounts for such payments. At one time, many duplicate check losses were handled under 31 U.S.C. § 3333. See 62 Comp. Gen. 91 (1982). It was Treasury's practice to accumulate the cases and submit them in groups, e.g., B-115388, October 12, 1976, and B-71585, February 24, 1948, with credit being allowed as a matter of routine. With the development of Treasury's previously discussed recertification procedure, much of the need to invoke 31 U.S.C. § 3333 evaporated. While many of the earlier cases involved an exchange of correspondence between Treasury and GAO, nothing in the statute requires it, especially since GAO no longer maintains accounts and "relief" is mandatory anyway.

f. Other Statutes

There are several other statutes affecting the liability of accountable officers in a variety of contexts. A few of them are:

- 5 U.S.C. § 8321. Accountable officers are not liable for payments in violation of statutes prescribing forfeiture of retirement annuities or retired pay as long as the payments are made "in due course and without fraud, collusion, or gross negligence." The reason for this statute was to avoid having to deny relief under 31 U.S.C. § 3528(b) for payments made in good faith solely because the payments are specifically prohibited by law. B-122068, March 18, 1955.

- 31 U.S.C. § 3521(c). Previously noted, this statute protects accountable officers from liability for losses under an authorized statistical sampling procedure.
- 42 U.S.C. § 659(f). Disbursing officers are not liable for payments under garnishment process which is "regular on its face" and in compliance with 42 U.S.C. § 659. See 61 Comp. Gen. 229 (1982).

F. Procedures

1. Reporting of Irregularities

Agencies are required to document each fiscal irregularity that affects the account of an accountable officer, regardless of how it is discovered. The report is retained as part of the account records and a copy provided to the accountable officer and, in certain situations, to GAO. GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 8.4.B. The contents of the report are set forth in 7 GAO-PPM § 8.12.A, and include such things as a description of how the irregularity occurred and a description of any known procedural deficiencies and corrective action.

The agency's next job is to attempt to resolve the irregularity, most importantly by pursuing collection action against the improper payee or recipient where possible. Recovery of the funds of course ends the matter. If the funds cannot be recovered and the case is one in which the agency may grant relief without GAO involvement, consideration of relief is the next step. If the matter is resolved administratively in either of these ways, the record should be further documented as specified in 7 GAO-PPM § 8.12.B (required administrative determinations, etc.). There is no need to report resolved irregularities to GAO.

If the irregularity cannot be resolved administratively within two years after the date the account is available for audit, and if the loss exceeds the monetary limit established for administrative resolution, the agency should then submit to GAO either a copy of the updated irregularity report or a relief request if appropriate. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.4.C. This 2-year guideline is especially important for improper payments in view of the 3-year statute of limitations of 31 U.S.C. § 3526(c). Thus, below-ceiling losses need not be reported to GAO at supplement to the TFM entitled Manual of Procedures and Instructions for Cashiers Operating Under 31 U.S.C. 3321 (July 1985).

Cashiers who are authorized to make payments from funds advanced to them are regarded as a category of disbursing officer. They are personally liable for any loss or shortage of funds in their custody unless relieved by proper authority. Further discussion of the role and responsibilities of cashiers may be found in I TFM Chapter 4-3000 and in the Cashiers Manual.

For the most part, a cashier will be operating with funds advanced by his or her own employing agency. In some situations, however, such as an authorized interagency agreement, the funds may be advanced by another agency. Liability and relief are the same in either case. 65 Comp. Gen. 666, 675–77 (1986).

d. Collecting Officers

Collecting officers are those who receive or collect money for the government, such as Internal Revenue collectors or Customs collectors. Collecting officers are accountable for all money collected. E.g., 59 Comp. Gen. 113, 114 (1979); 3 Comp. Gen. 403 (1924); 1 Comp. Dec. 191 (1895); B-201673 et al., September 23, 1982. For example, an Internal Revenue collector is responsible for the physical safety of taxes collected, must pay over to the government all taxes collected, and must make good any money lost or stolen while in his or her custody unless relieved. E.g., 60 Comp. Gen. 674 (1981). However, under a lockbox arrangement whereby tax payments are mailed to a financial institution at a post office box and then wired to a Treasury account, Internal Revenue Service officials are not accountable for funds in the possession of the financial institution since they do not gain custody or control over those funds. B-223911, February 24, 1987.

The clerk of a bankruptcy court, if one has been appointed under 28 U.S.C. § 156(b), is the accountable officer with respect to fees paid to the court, as prescribed by 28 U.S.C. § 1930, by parties commencing a case under the Bankruptcy Code. 28 U.S.C. § 156(f). This provision, added in 1986, essentially codified the result of two GAO decisions issued the previous year, 64 Comp. Gen. 535 (1985) and B-217236, May 22, 1985.

In some situations, certain types of receipts may be collected by a contractor. Since the contractor is not a government officer or all; above-ceiling losses should be reported only if unresolved at the end of the 2-year period. Of course, the agency may request relief sooner if desired.

2. Obtaining Relief

The GAO official designated to exercise the Comptroller General's authority under the various relief statutes is the Associate General Counsel, Accounting and Financial Management Division, Office of General Counsel. Relief requests where GAO action is necessary should be addressed to GAO's Office of General Counsel. The request may be in simple letter format and should include all items specified in 7 GAO-PPM § 8.12.C. These include a copy of the irregularity report, a description of collection actions taken, and any required administrative determinations. Of particular importance is a written statement by the accountable officer or a notation that the accountable officer chooses not to submit a separate statement. Relief will be granted or denied in the form of a letter addressed to the official who submitted the request.

In any case in which GAO has denied relief, the agency, or the accountable officer through appropriate administrative channels, may ask GAO to reconsider. GAO will not hesitate to reverse a decision shown to be wrong. Any request for reconsideration should set forth the errors which the applicant believes have been made, and should include evidence (not mere unsupported allegations) to support the basis for relief, for example, that the original denial failed to consider certain evidence or to give it appropriate weight or relied too heavily on other evidence in the record. Denials of relief are often based not so much on the merits of the case but simply on the failure of the original request to include sufficient information to enable an independent evaluation. Of course, if the agency cannot or is unwilling to make a required statutory determination, there is nothing GAO can do and a request for reconsideration is pointless.

3. Payments of $100 or Less

In B-161457, July 14, 1976, a circular letter to all department and agency heads, disbursing and certifying officers, the Comptroller General advised as follows:

"[I]n lieu of requesting a decision by the Comptroller General for items of $25 or less, disbursing and certifying officers may hereafter rely upon written advice from an agency official designated by the head of each department or agency. A copy of the document containing such advice should be attached to the voucher and the propriety of any such payment will be considered conclusive on the General Accounting Office in its settlement of the accounts involved."

The amount has since been raised to $100. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.3. This does not preclude a certifying or disbursing officer from seeking a decision if deemed necessary since the entitlement to advance decisions is statutory, but it does provide a means for simplifying the payment of very small amounts. An accountable officer is not liable for a payment made under this authority even if the payment is subsequently found to be improper or erroneous. The $100 threshold applies equally to questions arising after payment has been made. 61 Comp. Gen. 646, 648 (1982).

4. Relief vs. Grievance Procedures

Federal employees have the right to organize and to bargain collectively with respect to conditions of employment. 5 U.S.C. § 7102. Collective bargaining agreements may include negotiated grievance procedures, which may in turn provide for dispute resolution by binding arbitration. Id. § 7122. The Federal Labor Relations Authority decides questions over an agency's duty to bargain in good faith under 5 U.S.C. § 7105(a)(2)(E). Agencies have a duty to bargain in good faith to the extent not inconsistent with federal law. Id. § 7117. The FLRA also decides appeals alleging that an arbitration award is contrary to federal law. Id. § 7122.

Since the authority to relieve accountable officers is provided by statute, both GAO and the FLRA have determined that negotiated grievance procedures may not be used as a substitute for making the relief decision. B-213804, August 13, 1985; National Treasury Employees Union and Internal Revenue Service, 14 F.L.R.A. 65 (No. 15, 1984). The same result applies to the State Department's separate statutory grievance procedures. 67 Comp. Gen. 457 (1988).

However, a grievance procedure may encompass an agency head's determination that an accountable officer is negligent, as distinguished from the actual relief decision. National Treasury Employees Union and Internal Revenue Service, 33 F.L.R.A. 229 (No. 26, 1988), citing 59 Comp. Gen. 113 (1979) for the proposition that GAO's statutory role does not arise until after the agency head has made the requisite determination.

G. Collection Action

1. Against Recipient

A person who receives money from the government to which he or she is not entitled, however innocently, has no right to keep it. The recipient is indebted to the government, and the agency making the improper or erroneous payment has a duty to attempt to recover the funds, wholly independent of any question of liability or relief of an accountable officer. The duty to aggressively pursue collection action and the means of doing so are found primarily in the Federal Claims Collection Act, 31 U.S.C. ch. 37, subch. II, and the Federal Claims Collection Standards, 4 C.F.R. Parts 101–105, the details of which are covered elsewhere in this publication. Indeed, many of the statutes we have previously discussed emphasize that the relief process does not diminish this duty. E.g., 31 U.S.C. §§ 3333(b), 3343(e), 3526(c)(4), 3527(d)(2).

Recovery from the improper payee or recipient removes the accountable officer's liability regardless of whether relief has or has not been sought because there is no longer any loss. However, merely "flagging" the retirement account of an employee who has received an overpayment, for possible collection at some unpredictable future time, is not enough as it would delay indefinitely the final settlement of the account. 31 Comp. Gen. 17 (1951).

In a sense, the recipient and the unrelieved accountable officer share an element of joint liability. The occasional decision has referred to this as "joint and several" liability, but it has been pointed out that this is incorrect. E.g., B-228946, January 15, 1988. If two debtors are "jointly and severally" liable, the creditor has the option of collecting the full amount from either, with the debtor who pays then having a right of contribution against the remaining debtor(s). Certainly no one would suggest that someone who has defrauded the government and repays the debt has any right of contribution against the accountable officer. Also, under joint and several liability, the creditor may seek to collect a portion from each debtor. The agency in an accountable officer loss has no such option. B-212602, April 5, 1984. The agency's first obligation is to seek recovery from the recipient. The recipient of an improper payment is liable for the full amount, with any amounts collected used to reduce the accountable officer's liability. Id.; 30 Comp. Gen. 298, 300 (1951). See also 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 478–79 (1983); 54 Comp. Gen. 112, 114 (1974).

So strong is this duty to seek recovery from the improper payee or recipient that the two primary relief statutes for improper payments explicitly authorize GAO to deny relief if the agency has failed to diligently pursue collection action against the recipient. 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(c) (disbursing officers), 3528(b)(2) (certifying officers). GAO is extremely reluctant to deny relief solely on the basis of inadequate collection action because often the failure is attributable to the agency rather than the accountable officer. However, it has been done. E.g., B-234815, October 3, 1989 (disbursing officer failed to initiate collection action despite repeated advice from agency counsel).

Adequate collection action means compliance with the Federal Claims Collection Act and Standards. 62 Comp. Gen. 476, 478—79 (1983); B-233870, May 30, 1989. A single demand letter is not enough. 62 Comp. Gen. 91, 98 (1982). Resort to the Federal Claims Collection Act and Standards includes those collection measures, as and to the extent authorized, which result in collection of less than the full amount, for example, compromise. A compromise, including one by the Justice Department, not only resolves the claim against the recipient but operates as well to relieve the accountable officer for any amounts unrecovered because of the compromise. 31 U.S.C. § 3711(d); 65 Comp. Gen. 371 (1986). Whether or not the accountable officer is entitled to relief does not affect the compromise authority. B-154400-O.M., January 29, 1968; B-156846-O.M., October 25, 1967. However, 31 U.S.C. § 3711(d) does not apply to any liability which may fall upon one who is not an accountable officer. B-235048, April 4, 1991. The authority to suspend or terminate collection action is also available, but only in accordance with the claims collection act and regulations. 67 Comp. Gen. 457, 464 (1988); B-212337, February 17, 1984; B-211660, December 15, 1983. Unlike compromise, the termination of collection action against the recipient does not eliminate the accountable officer's liability for any unrecovered balance. 67 Comp. Gen. at 464.

Adequate collection action also requires referral of the claim to the appropriate collection office within the agency without undue delay. GAO has advised the Army, for example, that a delay of more than three months will generally not be regarded as diligent. 65 Comp. Gen. 812 (1986).

While diligent collection action is a necessary element of the relief equation, the fact that collection efforts have been unsuccessful, however diligent, does not by itself provide the basis for relieving the accountable officer. B-141838, February 8, 1960; B-114042, October 31, 1956.

2. Against Accountable Officer

If a loss cannot be recovered from the thief or other improper payee or recipient, and relief cannot be granted to the accountable officer, the accountable officer becomes indebted to the government for the amount involved. At that point, it is the agency's responsibility to initiate collection action against the accountable officer in accordance with the Federal Claims Collection Act and Standards. E.g., B-177430, October 30, 1973.

If the accountable officer is still employed by the government, additional statutes come into play. Offset against salary is prescribed by 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a):

"The pay of an individual in arrears to the United States shall be withheld until he has accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States all sums for which he is liable."

This statute does not apply to ordinary debtors but only to accountable officers. 37 Comp. Gen. 344 (1957); 23 Comp. Gen. 555 (1944); 26 Op. Att'y Gen. 77 (1906). It has also been held that the provisions of 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a) are mandatory and cannot be waived. 64 Comp. Gen. 606 (1985); 39 Comp. Gen. 203 (1959); 19 Comp. Gen. 312 (1939).

The application of 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a) to certain military accountable officers is limited by 37 U.S.C. § 1007(a), which prohibits withholding the pay "of an officer" under section 5512 unless the indebtedness is "admitted by the officer or shown by the judgment of a court, or upon a special order issued in the discretion of the Secretary concerned." Subsection 1007(a) applies to "officers," meaning commissioned or warrant officers, and not to enlisted personnel or civilian accountable officers. 37 Comp. Gen. 344, 348 (1957). The admission may be oral or written but, if oral, should be clear and unequivocal and preferably witnessed. 42 Comp. Gen. 83 (1962). The discretion to apply 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a) exists only in the absence of an admission or court judgment. Id.

The original version of 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a), enacted in 1828 (4 Stat. 246), provided that "no money shall be paid" to the person in arrears until the debt is repaid. Thus, several early decisions exist for the somewhat barbaric proposition that the statute requires complete stoppage of pay. E.g., 9 Comp. Gen. 272 (1930); 7 Comp. Gen. 4 (1927). While these and similar early decisions have not been explicitly overruled, the current view is that the statute will be satisfied by withholding in reasonable installments. 64 Comp. Gen. 606 (1985); B-180957-O.M., September 25, 1979. Collection in installments is also authorized when operating under 37 U.S.C. § 1007(a). 42 Comp. Gen. 83, 85 (1962). For employees no longer on the payroll, offset under 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a) has been held to embrace collection from retirement funds to the extent authorized. Parker v. United States, 187 Ct. Cl. 553, 559 (1969); 39 Comp. Gen. 203, 206 (1959). GAO has also approved "flagging" the retirement account of an accountable officer still on the payroll. B-217114, February 29, 1988.

When applying 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a) or 37 U.S.C. § 1007(a), the procedures to be followed are those prescribed by 4 C.F.R. §§ 102.3 and 102.4 for administrative offsets under 31 U.S.C. § 3716. 64 Comp. Gen. 142 (1984).

If pay is withheld under 5 U.S.C. § 5512(a), the statute provides a means to obtain judicial review of the indebtedness. Under 5 U.S.C. § 5512(b), GAO is required, upon the request of the individual or his or her agent or attorney to immediately report the balance due to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General is required within 60 days to order suit to be commenced against the individual. This provision was part of the original 1828 legislation, several decades prior to either the Tucker Act or the establishment of the Court of Claims, at a time when there was no other means available for the accountable officer to initiate judicial proceedings. It now exists as one way among several. Installment deductions are not required to stop during the litigation; if the accountable officer prevails, amounts collected are refunded. 64 Comp. Gen. 606, 608 (1985). Sample referrals under 5 U.S.C. § 5512(b) are 64 Comp. Gen. 605 (1985); B-217114.7, May 6, 1991; and B-220492, December 10, 1985.

H. Restitution, Reimbursement, and Restoration

1. Restitution and Reimbursement

In the present context, restitution means the repayment of a loss by an accountable officer from personal funds; reimbursement means the refunding to an accountable officer of amounts previously paid in restitution. Prior to 1955, there was no statutory authority to permit the reimbursement of an accountable officer who had made restitution to the government for a physical loss. Once an accountable officer made restitution (if, for example, the agency required it), the decisions held that there was no longer a deficiency in the account for which relief could be considered. 27 Comp. Gen. 404 (1948); B-101301, July 19, 1951.

Legislation in 1955 (69 Stat. 626) amended what is now 31 U.S.C. § 3527(a) and 31 U.S.C. § 3527(b) to expressly authorize reimbursement of the accountable officer for any amounts paid in restitution, if relief is granted. Accordingly, restitution by the accountable officer in physical loss cases is no longer an impediment to the granting of relief. E.g., B-155149, October 21, 1964; B-126362, February 21, 1956. The 1955 legislation amended only the physical loss relief statutes. There is no comparable reimbursement authority in the improper payment relief statutes, 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(c) and 3528. B-226393, April 29, 1988; B-223840, November 5, 1986; B-128557, September 21, 1956.

An obvious limitation on the reimbursement authority was illustrated in B-187021, January 19, 1978. An imprest fund cashier sought reimbursement, claiming that she had discovered money missing from her cash box and replaced it from personal funds. However, by virtue of her actions in initially concealing the loss, she was unable to show that the loss had in fact ever occurred. Since the loss could not be established, reimbursement was denied. Thus, an accountable officer should always report a loss before making restitution.

2. Restoration

Restoration of an account suffering a loss or deficiency—an accounting adjustment to restore the shortage with funds from some other source—is authorized under two provisions of law, 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(d) and 3530. The Comptroller General is required by 31 U.S.C. § 3530(c) to prescribe implementing regulations. These are found in title 7 of GAO's Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, § 8.14.

a. Adjustment Incident to Granting of Relief

If relief is granted under either 31 U.S.C. § 3527(a) or 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c), GAO may authorize restoration of the account. Restoration is accomplished by charging either an appropriation specifically available for that purpose or, if there is no such appropriation, the appropriation or fund available for the accountable function. The charge is made to the fiscal year in which the adjustment is made, and not the fiscal year in which the loss occurred. 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d). Subsection (d) applies only to subsections (a) and (c), and not to subsection (b) (military disbursing officers). However, the military departments have separate authority in 10 U.S.C. §§ 2777(b) and 2781. There is no restoration provision in 31 U.S.C. § 3528.

Whenever account adjustment is deemed necessary, the agency should include in its relief request a citation (account symbol) to the appropriation it proposes to charge. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.14.A. In cases where agencies are authorized to grant relief without GAO involvement, they may also exercise the restoration authority of 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d) without GAO involvement. Id. § 8.14.C.

A 1957 decision, 37 Comp. Gen. 224, considered the application of 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d) where one agency is disbursing funds on behalf of other agencies. State Department disbursing officers overseas, acting under delegations from the Treasury Department, were authorized to receive and disburse funds on behalf of other government agencies as well as the State Department. If the services were sufficiently extensive to warrant reimbursement, State charged the "user" agencies. Construing 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d), the Comptroller General held that losses in such a situation for which relief was granted but which could not be related to the functions of any particular agency or agencies should be charged to State Department appropriations because they were the appropriations available for the accountable function. "This phraseology clearly is intended to mean the appropriation of the department or agency to which the expenses of carrying on the particular disbursing function are chargeable." Id. at 226. Such adjustments could then be considered as part of the costs of the disbursing function for purposes of determining charges assessed against the user agencies and thus distributed to all user agencies in the same manner as other costs. Id. Twenty years later, GAO reached the same result with respect to losses of United States currency incident to the 1975 evacuation from Vietnam. 56 Comp. Gen. 791, 796–97 (1977).

b. Other Situations

If a loss is due to fault or negligence by an accountable officer, and the agency head determines that the loss is uncollectible, the amount of the loss may be restored by a charge to the appropriation or fund available for the expenses of the accountable function. 31 U.S.C. § 3530(a). Uncollectible includes uncollectible from the accountable officer. E.g., B-177910, February 20, 1973. As with adjustments under 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d), section 3530(a) requires the loss to be charged to the appropriation available for the fiscal year in which the adjustment is made (appropriation "currently available"). This authority applies (1) where relief is denied, or (2) where the agency does not seek relief, the uncollectibility determination being required in either event. Representative cases are B-235405, March 19, 1990; B-219246, September 9, 1985; B-188715, January 31, 1978; and B-167827, February 4, 1975.

Assuming the statutory conditions are met, adjustments under 31 U.S.C. § 3530 are made directly by the agency with no need for specific authorization or concurrence from GAO. 7 GAO-PPM § 8.14.D. Restoration under section 3530 is merely an accounting adjustment and does not affect the accountable officer's personal liability. 31 U.S.C. § 3530(b). Thus, although the adjustment is premised on a determination of uncollectibility, collection efforts should resume if warranted by future developments.

The statutes described above, 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(d) and 3530, will cover most situations in which restoration is needed in that relief is mostly either granted or denied or not sought. There are, however, situations in which neither statute applies. For example, a thief fraudulently obtained over $10,000 from the patients trust account at a VA hospital. He was convicted and ordered to make restitution. The restitution order was lifted 3 years later, but the VA had by then recovered only a small portion of the loss. The VA decided that pursuing the thief any further would be fruitless, and it had previously determined that there had been no fault or negligence by the accountable officer.

The VA was faced with a dilemma. Clearly the loss had to be restored since the trust account consisted of money belonging to patients, and just as clearly VA's operating appropriations were the only available source. The problem was how to get there. Since the 3-year statute of limitations on account settlement (31 U.S.C. § 3526(c)) had expired, relief could no longer be considered, so 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d) could not be used. Equally unavailing was 31 U.S.C. § 3530 since the loss did not result from the accountable officer's fault or negligence. However, since the VA had an undisputed obligation as trustee to return the trust funds to their rightful owners upon demand, the loss could be viewed as an expense of managing the trust fund. The solution therefore was to restore funds from the unobligated balance of VA's operating appropriation for the fiscal year in which the loss occurred. 68 Comp. Gen. 600 (1989). The authority to make adjustments from the unexpended balances of prior years' appropriations is now found in 31 U.S.C. § 1553(a). Once an account has been closed, generally 5 fiscal years after expiration, 31 U.S.C. § 1553(b) requires that the adjustment be charged, within certain limits, to current appropriations. Thus, the authority now found in 31 U.S.C. § 1553 may provide an alternative if neither 31 U.S.C. § 3527(d) nor 31 U.S.C. § 3530 is available. Of course, if the account to be restored has itself been closed pursuant to 31 U.S.C. §§ 1552(a) or 1555, restoration is no longer possible.

employee, the various accountable officer statutes discussed throughout this chapter do not apply, and the contractor's liability is governed by the terms of the contract. For example, a parking service contract with the General Services Administration required the contractor to collect parking fees at certain government buildings and to remit those fees to GSA on a daily basis. One day, instead of remitting the receipts, an official of the contractor took the money home in a paper bag and claimed to have been robbed in a parking lot near her residence. When GSA withheld the amount of the loss from contract payments, the contractor tried to argue that the risk of loss should fall upon the government. The Claims Court disagreed. Since the contract terms were clear and the contractor failed to comply, the contractor was held responsible for the loss. Miracle Contractors, Inc. v. United States, 5 Cl. Ct. 466 (1984).

The Department of Agriculture has statutory authority to use volunteers to collect user fees in national forests. The volunteers, private individuals, are to be bonded, with the cost of the bonds paid by the Department. 16 U.S.C. § 460l-6a(k). In 68 Comp. Gen. 470 (1989), GAO concurred with the Department that the volunteers could be regarded as agents of the Forest Service and, as such, eligible for relief for non-negligent losses. The practical significance of this decision is that it would be difficult to recruit volunteers if they faced potential liability for non-negligent losses, a possibility that would exist even under a surety bond. Id. at 471.

e. Other Agents and Custodians

Occasionally, officers and employees who do not fit into any of the preceding categories, and who may not even be directly involved in government fiscal operations, are given custody of federal funds and thereby become accountable officers for the funds placed in their charge. Note in this connection that the "safekeeping" mandate of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(a) (made unmistakably clear by reference to the original 1846 language quoted earlier), applies to any government employee, regardless of job description, to whom public funds are entrusted in connection with the performance of government business. See, e.g., B-170012, February 3, 1972.

Examples of employees in this general custodial category include: a special messenger delivering cash to another location, B-188413, June 30, 1977; a messenger sent to the bank to cash checks, B-226695, May 26, 1987; State Department employees responsible for packaging and shipping funds to an overseas embassy, B-193830,

Federal Assistance: Grants and Cooperative Agreements

A. Introduction

The federal government provides assistance in many forms, financial and otherwise. Assistance programs are designed to serve a variety of purposes. Objectives may include fostering some element of national policy, stimulating private sector involvement, or furnishing aid of a type or to a class of beneficiaries the private market cannot or is unwilling to otherwise accommodate. A broad definition of "assistance" in this context is found in 31 U.S.C. § 6101(3) (Federal Program Information Act)– "the transfer of anything of value for a public purpose of support or stimulation authorized by [law]." A similar definition occurs in 31 U.S.C. § 6501(1) (Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968).

A federal grant may be defined as a form of assistance authorized by statute in which a federal agency (the grantor) transfers something of value to a party (the grantee) usually, but not always, outside of the federal government, for a purpose, undertaking, or activity of the grantee which the government has chosen to assist, to be carried out without substantial involvement on the part of the federal government. The "thing of value" is usually money, but may, depending on the program legislation, also include property or services.[1] The grantee, again depending on the program legislation, may be a state or local government, a nonprofit organization, or a private individual or business entity. Programs administered by state governments comprise the largest category, involving federal outlays of over $100 billion a year.[2]

The 1990 edition (24th ed.) of the Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance, updated as of December 1990,[3] lists 1,183 assistance programs administered by 52 federal agencies. To be sure, a large number of these are not grant programs since the catalog includes loan and loan guarantee programs plus certain types of non-financial assistance. Nevertheless, it is a safe statement that there are hundreds of federal grant programs administered by dozens of agencies. Many of the programs are governed by detailed legislation and even more detailed regulations, and many of the cases, since they hinge on specific statutory or regulatory provisions, are not amenable to treatment in this chapter. Nevertheless, it is still possible to extract a number of principles of "grant law" from the perspective of the availability and use of appropriated funds.

[1]The earliest grant programs were land grants. Monetary grants appear to have entered the stage in 1879 although they are largely a 20th century development. Madden, The Constitutional and Legal Foundations of Federal Grants, in Federal Grant Law 9 (M. Mason ed. 1982).

B. Grants vs. Procurement Contracts

1. Nature of a Grant

From the perspective of legal analysis, what precisely is a grant? Not too long ago, it was commonplace to discuss the grant relationship in contract terms with little further analysis. Under this approach, the acceptance of a grant of federal funds subject to conditions which must be met by the grantee creates a contract between the United States and the grantee. The need to clearly distinguish grants from procurement contracts, however, has given rise to an emerging body of opinion which attempts to reject the analogy.[4] Thus far, although the contract analogy has not been abandoned, the courts have become increasingly cautious in their characterizations, and elements of both approaches will be found, depending on the precise issue involved.

The "grant as a type of contract" approach evolved from early Supreme Court decisions. In what may be the earliest case on the issue, the government had made a grant of land to a state on the condition that the state would use the land, or the proceeds from its sale, for certain reclamation purposes. The Court stated:

"It is not doubted that the grant by the United States to the State upon conditions, and the acceptance of the grant by the State, constituted a contract. All the elements of a contract met in the transaction,—competent parties, proper subject-matter, sufficient consideration, and consent of minds."

McGee v. Mathis, 71 U.S. (4 Wall.) 143, 155 (1866). See also United States v. Northern Pacific Railway Co., 256 U.S. 51, 63–64 (1921).

Lower courts applied the contract theory in various contexts, often to enforce grantee compliance with grant conditions,[5] to determine jurisdiction under the Tucker Act,[6] or to analyze the nature of the government's obligations under a particular grant statute or agreement.[7]

GAO followed suit. E.g., 68 Comp. Gen. 609 (1989); 50 Comp. Gen. 470 (1970); 42 Comp. Gen. 289, 294 (1962); 41 Comp. Gen. 134, 137 (1961); B-232010, March 23, 1989; B-167790, January 15, 1973. In 50 Comp. Gen. 470, for example, a medical teaching facility, recipient of a reimbursement-type construction grant under the Public Health Service Act, was caught in a cash flow crisis because disbursement of grant funds was much less frequent than its contractor's need for progress payments. The question was whether the grant could be regarded as a "contract or claim" so the recipient could assign future grant proceeds to a bank in return for an interim loan, pursuant to the Assignment of Claims Act. Noting that the accepted grant constituted a "valid contract," and that assignment was not prohibited by the program legislation, regulations of the grantor agency, or the terms of the grant agreement, GAO concluded that assignment under the Assignment of Claims Act was permissible.

Thus, the researcher will find a body of case law standing for the proposition that there are certain contractual aspects to a grant relationship. What this does is provide a known body of law which, together with the relevant program legislation and regulations, is [5]E.g., United States v. Frazer, 297 F. Supp. 319, 322–23 (M.D. Ala. 1968); United States v. Sumter County School Dist. No. 2, 232 F. Supp. 945, 950 (E.D.S.C. 1964); United States v. County School Bd., 221 F. Supp. 93, 99–100 (E.D. Va. 1963).

[6]E.g., Missouri Health and Medical Org., Inc. v. United States, 641 F.2d 870 (Ct. Cl. 1981); Texas v. United States, 537 F.2d 466 (Ct. Cl. 1976); County of Suffolk v. United States, 19 Cl. Ct. 295 (1990); Kentucky ex rel. Cabinet for Human Resources v. United States, 16 Cl. Ct. 755, 762 (1989); Rogers v. United States, 14 Cl. Ct. 39, 44 (1987); Idaho Migrant Council, Inc. v. United States, 9 Cl. Ct. 85, 88–89 (1985). While most of these cases, Missouri Health for example, use language carefully crafted to avoid confusion between a grant agreement and a "traditional," i.e., procurement, contract, the essence of the jurisdictional finding is that the claim is based on some form of "contract."

[7]E.g., City of Manassas Park v. United States, 633 F.2d 181 (Ct. Cl. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1035 (claim found to be noncontractual, but agreement referred to as "grant contract" and grantor-grantee relationship as "privity of contract"); Arizona v. United States, 494 F.2d 1285 (Ct. Cl. 1974).

available to be applied in determining basic rights and obligations. It does not have to follow, nor has GAO or, to our knowledge, any court suggested, that all of the trappings of a procurement contract somehow attach.

The problem, perhaps, is not so much whether a grant relationship can or cannot be said to contain certain "contractual" elements, but in failing to recognize that the analogy is a limited one. Clearly, proponents of the "grant contract" theory must tread cautiously to avoid untenable positions. As we will see in our discussion of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act, going too far with the analogy bred confusion which led the Commission on Government Procurement to recommend, and the Congress to enact, legislation to attempt to distinguish between the two types of relationship.

Where all of this will go will be determined in future litigation. For now, in any event, it must be emphasized that whatever one's views on the contractual nature of a grant relationship, a grant and a procurement contract are two very different things.

Take, for example, the issue of consideration. While the typical grant agreement may well include sufficient legal consideration from the standpoint of supporting a legal obligation, it may be quite different from the consideration found in procurement contracts. As we noted in our introduction to this chapter, a grant is a form of assistance to a designated class of recipients authorized by statute to meet recognized needs. Grant needs, by definition, are not needs for goods or services required by the federal government itself. The needs are those of a nonfederal entity, whether public or private, which the Congress has decided to assist as being in the public interest.

An illustration of where this distinction can lead is 41 Comp. Gen. 134 (1961). A provision of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act authorized grants to states for the construction of sewage treatment works, up to a stated percentage of estimated costs, with the grantee to pay all remaining costs. Strong demand for limited funds meant that grants were frequently awarded for amounts less than the permissible ceiling. The question was whether these grants could be amended in a subsequent fiscal year to increase the amount to, or at least closer to, the statutory ceiling. If a straight "grant equals contract" approach had been applied, the answer would have been no, unless the government received additional consideration. However,

GAO concluded that the amendments were authorized, noting that the "consideration" flowing to the government under these grants—in sharp contrast with procurement contracts—consisted only of "the benefits to accrue to the public and the United States" through use of the funds to construct the desired facilities. Id. at 137.

In recognition of the essential distinctions between a "grant contract" and a "procurement contract," the Supreme Court has stated:

> "Although we agree . . . that . . . grant agreements had a contractual aspect, . . . the program cannot be viewed in the same manner as a bilateral contract governing a discrete transaction. . . . Unlike normal contractual undertakings, federal grant programs originate in and remain governed by statutory provisions expressing the judgment of Congress concerning desirable public policy."[8]

Bennett v. Kentucky Department of Education, 470 U.S. 656, 669 (1985). The state in that case had argued that, since the grant was "in the nature of a contract,"[9] the Court should apply the principle, drawn from contract law, that ambiguities in the grant agreement should be resolved against the government as the drafting party. Based on the analysis summarized in the quoted passage, the Court declined to do so, at least in that case.

Similarly, the contractual doctrine of "impossibility of performance" has been held inapplicable to a grant. Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 762 F.2d 406 (4th Cir. 1985). In that case, the government had imposed a zero error standard on states under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program. The state argued that error-free administration was impossible. While agreeing with that factual proposition, the court nevertheless held that the zero tolerance level was permissible under the governing statute and regulations. The impossibility of performance doctrine "relates to commercial contracts and not to grant in aid programs." Id. at 409.

[8]This passage is a good illustration of the difficulties one can encounter trying to resolve the "grant vs. contract" debate, at least pending further evolution of the case law. On the basis of this passage, which side does the Supreme Court now support? Both to some extent, it would seem.

[9]Bennett v. New Jersey, 470 U.S. 632, 638 (1985), quoting Pennhurst State School and Hosp. v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 17 (1981).

A 1971 decision, 51 Comp. Gen. 162, illustrates another distinction. In that case, the Comptroller General concluded that an ineligible grantee could not be reimbursed for expenditures under quantum meruit principles. In the typical grant situation, the grantee's activities are not performed solely for the direct benefit of the government and the government does not receive any measurable, tangible benefit in the traditional contract sense.

Still another distinction is the reluctance of the courts to apply the "contract implied in fact" concept in the grant context. E.g., Somerville Technical Services v. United States, 640 F.2d 1276 (Ct. Cl. 1981). The reasoning in part is that a grant is a sovereign act binding the government only to the extent of its express undertakings.

In American Hospital Association v. Schweiker, 721 F.2d 170 (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 466 U.S. 958, the court rejected the contention that otherwise valid regulations of the Department of Health and Human Services impaired contractual rights of grantees under the Hill-Burton hospital assistance program.

"[T]he relationship between the government and the hospitals here cannot be wholly captured by the term 'contract' and the analysis traditionally associated with that term. . . . The contract analogy thus has only limited application."

Id. at 182–83. Finally, the court in United States v. Kensington Hospital, 760 F. Supp. 1120 (E.D. Pa. 1991), refused to apply the Anti-Kickback Act to government claims for fraud under the Medicare and Medicaid programs, finding that the government's relationship with its grantees under these programs could not be characterized as "prime contracts" for purposes of the Act.

In sum, it seems clear that many of the rules and principles of contract law will not be automatically applied to grants. Nevertheless, whether one prefers to regard a grant as a type of contract, or "in the nature of" a contract, or as a generically different creature, it is equally clear that the creation of a grant relationship results in certain legal obligations flowing in both directions, enforceable by the application of basic contract rules. As the Claims Court has stated:

"[A] notice of a federal grant award in return for the grantee's performance of services can create cognizable obligations to the extent of the government's undertakings therein."

REV_00257554

Community Relations-Social Development Commission v. United States, 8 Cl. Ct. 723, 725 (1985). Thus, if a grantee does what it has committed itself to do and incurs allowable costs, the government is obligated to pay. E.g., B-181332, December 28, 1976.

Conversely, the government has a right to expect that the grantee will use the grant funds only for authorized grant purposes and only in accordance with the terms and conditions of the grant. 42 Comp. Gen. 289, 294 (1962); 41 Comp. Gen. 134, 137 (1961). The right of a grantor agency to oversee the expenditure of funds by the grantee to ensure that the money is used only for authorized purposes, and the grantee's corresponding duty to account to the grantor for its use of the funds, are implicit in the grant relationship and are not dependent upon specific language in the authorizing legislation. 64 Comp. Gen. 582 (1985).

2. The Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act

A long-standing confusion between grant relationships and procurement relationships led the Commission on Government Procurement, in its 1972 report, to recommend the enactment of legislation to distinguish assistance from procurement, and to further refine the concept of assistance by clearly distinguishing grants from cooperative agreements.[10] While Congress did not enact all of the Commission's recommendations in this area, it did enact these two, in the form of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act of 1977, 31 U.S.C. §§ 6301–6308.

Prior to the enactment of this statute, most relationships between the federal government and organizations that received direct federal assistance funding were characterized simply as "grants" or "grants-in-aid."[11] As is still the case, it had always been understood that an agency could make grants only if it was authorized by statute to do so. Prior to the Act, however, it was generally felt that the [10]Report of the Commission on Government Procurement, Volume 3, Chapters 1–3 generally (December 1972).

[11]Although the terms are often used interchangeably, there is a technical distinction. A "grant-in-aid" is a grant to a state or local government. The term "grant" is broader and includes nongovernmental recipients. See GAO, A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27 (March 1981), at 61–62. The Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act was intended to eliminate the term "grant-in-aid" in favor of the simpler "grant," regardless of the identity of the recipient. S. Rep. No. 449, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 9 (1977), reprinted in 1978 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 11, 18.

October 1, 1979; an officer in charge of a laundry operation on an Army base who had been advanced public funds to be held as a change fund, B-155149, October 21, 1964; and a Department of Energy special counsel with control over petroleum overcharge refunds, B-200170, April 1, 1981.

As with disbursing officers, there may be more than one accountable officer in a given case, and the concept of accountability is not limited to the person in whose name the account is officially held nor is it limited to the person or persons for whom relief is officially requested. For example, accounts in the regional offices of the U.S. Customs Service are typically held in the name of the Regional Commissioner. While the Regional Commissioner is therefore an accountable officer with respect to that account, subordinate employees who actually handle the funds are also accountable officers. B-197324, March 7, 1980; B-193673, May 25, 1979. The same principle applies to the various service centers of the Internal Revenue Service. E.g., 60 Comp. Gen. 674 (1981).

As demonstrated by the Customs and IRS situations, as well as the many cases involving military finance and accounting officers, a supervisory official will be an accountable officer if that official has actual custody of public funds, or if the account is held in the official's name, regardless of who has physical custody. Absent these factors, however, a supervisor is not an accountable officer and does not become one merely because he or she supervises one. E.g., B-214286, July 20, 1984; B-194782, August 13, 1979.

In each case, it is necessary to examine the particular facts and circumstances to determine who had responsibility for or custody of the funds during the relevant stages of the occurrence or transaction. Thus, in B-193830, October 1, 1979, money shipped from the State Department to the American Embassy in Paraguay never reached its destination. While the funds were chargeable to the account of the Class B cashier at the Embassy, the State Department employees responsible for packaging and shipping the funds were also accountable officers with respect to that transaction. In another case, a new Class B cashier had been recommended at a Peace Corps office in Western Samoa, and had in fact been doing the job, but his official designation was not made until after the loss in question. Since the new cashier, even though not yet formally designated, had possession of the funds at the time of the loss, he was an accountable officer.

legislation pretty much had to mention "grants" explicitly in order to confer that authority.

The Act established standards that agencies are to use in selecting the most appropriate funding vehicle—a procurement contract, a grant, or a cooperative agreement. The standards are contained in sections 4, 5, and 6 of the Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 6303–6305, summarized below:

- Procurement contracts. An agency is to use a procurement contract when "the principal purpose of the instrument is to acquire (by purchase, lease, or barter) property or services for the direct benefit or use of the United States Government." 31 U.S.C. § 6303.
- Grant agreements. An agency is to use a grant agreement when "the principal purpose of the relationship is to transfer a thing of value [money, property, services, etc.] to the . . . recipient to carry out a public purpose of support or stimulation authorized by a law of the United States instead of acquiring (by purchase, lease, or barter) property or services for the direct benefit or use of the United States Government," and "substantial involvement is not expected" between the agency and the recipient when carrying out the contemplated activity. 31 U.S.C. § 6304.
- Cooperative agreements. An agency is to use a cooperative agreement when "the principal purpose of the relationship is to transfer a thing of value to the . . . recipient to carry out a public purpose of support or stimulation authorized by a law of the United States instead of acquiring (by purchase, lease, or barter) property or services for the direct benefit or use of the United States Government," and "substantial involvement is expected" between the agency and the recipient when carrying out the contemplated activity. 31 U.S.C. § 6305.

Under the Act, grants and cooperative agreements are more closely related to one another than either is to a procurement contract. The essential distinction between a grant and a cooperative agreement is the degree of federal involvement.

Each agency's program authority must be analyzed to identify the type of relationships authorized, and the circumstances under which each authorized relationship can be entered into without regard to the presence of specific words such as "grant" in the program legislation. Once authority is found, the legal instrument (contract, grant, or cooperative agreement) that fits the arrangement as contemplated must be used, using the statutory definitions for guidance as to which instrument is appropriate. The Office of Management and Budget is authorized to provide guidance on the implementation of the Act. 31 U.S.C. § 6307. OMB published "final guidance" on August 18, 1978 (43 Fed. Reg. 36860).

It is important to note that the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act does not expand an agency's substantive authority. While the Act provides the basis for examining whether an arrangement should be a contract, grant, or cooperative agreement, determinations of whether an agency has authority to enter into the relationship as spelled out in the instrument, whatever its label, must be based on the agency's authorizing or program legislation, not the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act. Unless legislatively prohibited, every agency has inherent authority to enter into contracts to procure goods or services for its own use, as long as the purpose of the procurement is reasonably related to the agency's mission. However, there is no comparable inherent authority to give away the government's money or property, either directly or by the release of vested rights, to benefit someone other than the government; this must be authorized by Congress. E.g., 51 Comp. Gen. 162, 165 (1971). Therefore, the agency's basic legislation must be studied to determine whether an assistance relationship is authorized at all, and if so, under what circumstances and conditions.

Where an agency has authority to enter into both a procurement and an assistance relationship to carry out the particular program, it has authority to exercise discretion in choosing which relationship to form in each particular case, but must use the instrument which suits the relationship, as provided in the Act. In this sense, the analysis of an agency's program authority is not really a matter of discretion—the statutory authority either is there or is not there, regardless of agency preference. The significance of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act is that it emphasizes the substance of an agency's program authority rather than the particular labels used or not used.

In this connection, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs has stated:

"[The Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act] was never intended to be an independent grant of authority to agencies to enter into assistance or contractual relationships where no such authority can be found in authorizing legislation. Rather, it was and is intended to force agencies to use a legal instrument that, according to the criteria established by the Act, matches the intended and authorized relationship—regardless of the terminology used in existing legislation to characterize the instrument to be used in the transaction."[12]

Further discussion may be found in B-196872-O.M., March 12, 1980 and a GAO report entitled Agencies Need Better Guidance for Choosing Among Contracts, Grants, and Cooperative Agreements, GGD-81-88, September 4, 1981.[13]

The approach used in the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act is illustrated in several decisions. In one case, the Interior Department asked whether it could use its appropriation for expenses of the American Samoan Judiciary for certain expenses, including entertainment and the purchase of motor vehicles. Using the guidelines of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act, the Comptroller General reviewed the relationship between the Interior Department and the American Samoan Judiciary and concluded that it was essentially a grant relationship. (Congress confirmed this interpretation by inserting the word "grant" in the next year's appropriation.) Therefore, restrictions such as those relating to entertainment and motor vehicles, which would apply to the direct expenditure of appropriations by the federal government or through a contractor did not apply to expenditures by the grant recipient, absent some provision to the contrary in the appropriation, agency regulations, or grant agreement. B-196690, March 14, 1980.

In 59 Comp. Gen. 424 (1980), the Environmental Protection Agency's public participation program of providing financial assistance to certain intervenors was viewed as essentially a grant relationship rather than a contractual one. Accordingly, 31 U.S.C. § 3324 was held not to preclude participants from receiving funds in advance of the completion of participation, subject to the provision of adequate fiscal controls.

[12]S. Rep. No. 180, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 4 (1981), reprinted in 1982 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3, 6. While this is not direct legislative history with respect to the 1977 statute, it is nevertheless important as a clear statement from one of the relevant jurisdictional committees.

[13]Controversy over whether the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act constituted an independent source of authority stemmed from an ambiguous provision in the original enactment. See Pub. L. No. 95-224, § 7(a), 92 Stat. 5. When the statute was moved to Title 31 as part of the 1982 recodification of that title, section 7(a) was omitted as duplicative. Thus, while the proposition discussed in the text remains valid, many of the authorities cite to a provision which is no longer found in the U.S. Code.

In several more recent cases, GAO's analysis of the relationship and of relevant legislation and legislative history led it to conclude that a contract, rather than a grant or cooperative agreement, was the proper instrument. 67 Comp. Gen. 13 (1987), affirmed upon reconsideration, B-227084.6, December 19, 1988 (operation of research and training programs at government facility funded by Maritime Administration); 65 Comp. Gen. 605 (1986) (proposed study, sponsored by Council on Environmental Quality, of risks and benefits of certain pesticides, intended for use by federal regulatory agencies); B-222665, July 2, 1986 (awards to Indian tribes by Interior Department under Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, which contained an express exemption from the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act); B-210655, April 14, 1983 (funding by Department of Energy of college campus forums on nuclear energy). In 61 Comp. Gen. 428 (1982), however, GAO agreed with the Department of Energy's use of a cooperative agreement to design and construct a "prototype solar parabolic dish/sterling engine system module," finding that the proposal's primary purpose was to encourage development and early market entry rather than to acquire the particular item for its own use, although it would eventually have governmental applications.

These questions are important because procurement contracts are subject to a variety of statutory and regulatory requirements which may not be generally applicable to assistance transactions. If the type of relationship is not determined properly, assistance arrangements could be used to evade otherwise applicable legal requirements. Conversely, legitimate assistance awards should not be burdened by all of the formalities of procurement contracts.

The analysis required by the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act may also be relevant in determining the applicability of other laws. See, e.g., Hammond v. Donovan, 538 F. Supp. 1106 (W.D. Mo. 1982) holding that the relationship between the Labor Department and a state employment office was a grant, and therefore not subject to a statute which required that certain procurement contracts contain an affirmative action for veterans provision.

Another situation that has generated some controversy is the so-called "third party" or "intermediary" situation—where a federal agency provides assistance to specified recipients by using an intermediary. Again, it is necessary to examine the agency's program authority to determine the authorized forms of assistance. The agency's relationship with the intermediary should normally be a procurement contract if the intermediary is not itself a member of a class eligible to receive assistance from the government. In other words, if an agency program contemplates provision of technical advice or services to a specified group of recipients, the agency may provide the advice or services itself or hire an intermediary to do it for the agency. In that case, the proper vehicle to fund the intermediary is a procurement contract. The agency is "buying" the services of the intermediary for its own purposes, to relieve the agency of the need to provide the advice or services with its own staff.

On the other hand, if the program purpose contemplates support to certain types of intermediaries to provide consultation or other specified services to third parties, GAO has approved the agency's choice of a grant rather than a contract as the preferred funding vehicle. Thus, in 58 Comp. Gen. 785 (1979), GAO found that the Department of Commerce's Office of Minority Business Enterprise (now the Minority Business Development Agency) could properly award a noncompetitive grant to an intermediary organization to provide management and technical assistance to minority business firms. Although the point was not detailed in the decision, the agency clearly had the requisite program authority to provide grant assistance to the intermediary.

Sometimes the program legislation is much less clear about the status of an intermediary as a grantee. GAO applied 58 Comp. Gen. 785 in another 1979 case, B-194229, September 20, 1979, upholding the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare's authority to provide grant assistance to an intermediary to in turn provide technical assistance to public schools. There, however, it was doubtful that HEW had the requisite program authority to deal with the intermediary by grant rather than procurement contract. The decision appears to have interpreted the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act as independently enlarging HEW's program authority.

While GAO has not explicitly stated that B-194229 was wrongly decided, subsequent items, starting with GAO's analysis in GGD-81-88 and B-196872-O.M., previously cited, have cast considerable doubt on that decision's validity. In a 1982 decision, 61 Comp. Gen. 637, the Department of Housing and Urban Development awarded a cooperative agreement to a nonprofit organization to provide technical assistance to certain block grant recipients. While HUD's authority to provide technical assistance to the block grant recipients was clear, there was no authority to provide assistance to the intermediary organization. The essence of the intermediary transaction was the acquisition of services for ultimate delivery to authorized recipients. Thus, GAO concluded that a procurement contract should have been used. The decision largely repudiated (although it did not expressly overrule) B-194229. 61 Comp. Gen. at 641.

The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, in its 1981 report mentioned earlier in this discussion, also addressed the intermediary issue and agreed with GAO's interpretation:

"The choice of instrument for an intermediary relationship depends solely on the principal federal purpose in the relationship with the intermediary. The fact that the product or service produced by the intermediary may benefit another party is irrelevant. What is important is whether the federal government's principal purpose is to acquire the intermediary's services, which may happen to take the form of producing a product or carrying out a service that is then delivered to an assistance recipient, or if the government's principal purpose is to assist the intermediary to do the same thing. Where the recipient of an award is not receiving assistance from the federal agency but is merely used to provide a service to another entity which is eligible for assistance, the proper instrument is a procurement contract."

S. Rep. No. 180 at 3; 1982 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News at 5.

Most of the cases discussed in the remainder of this chapter are expressed in "grant" terms. However, the principles discussed in the cases should generally apply to cooperative agreements as well.

3. Competition for Discretionary Grant Awards

Grant programs are either mandatory or discretionary. In a mandatory grant program, Congress directs awards to one or more classes of prospective recipients who meet specific criteria for eligibility, in specified amounts. These grants, sometimes called "entitlement" grants, are often awarded on the basis of statutory formulas. While the grantor agency may disagree on the application of the formula, it has no basis to refuse to make the award altogether. City of Los Angeles v. Coleman, 397 F. Supp. 547 (D.D.C. 1975). Thus, questions of grantee selection, and hence of competition, do not arise. The concept of competition can only apply when the grantor has discretion to choose one applicant over another. Therefore, the following discussion is limited to discretionary grants.

The Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act encourages competition in assistance programs where appropriate, in order to identify and fund the best possible projects to achieve program objectives. 31 U.S.C. § 6301(3). This, however, is merely a statement of purpose, and there are few other legislative pronouncements specifying how this objective is to be achieved, certainly nothing approaching the detail and specificity of the legislation applicable to procurement contracts, such as the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984. Statutory requirements for competition in grantee selection do exist in certain contexts, but they tend to be very general and do not specify actual procedures. Examples are 10 U.S.C. § 2361(a) (competitive procedures required for Defense Department research grants), and 10 U.S.C. § 2196(i) (ditto for Defense Department manufacturing engineering education grants).

At the request of the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, the General Accounting Office surveyed the administrators of 355 discretionary grant programs listed in the Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance, and studied the award processes for 26 of those programs, to determine the extent of competition. The 355 programs represented about 98,000 awards in fiscal year 1984 to state and local governments and other organizations and individuals, amounting to about $12 billion. GAO found that nearly 2/3 of the programs attempted to solicit applications from all eligible applicants; public interest groups expressed overall satisfaction with agency solicitation practices. Over 3/4 of the programs consistently used persons outside the program office to provide an independent perspective in reviewing applications. Nevertheless, GAO did note some departures from the competitive process which did not appear to have been subjected to internal review and justification. GAO recommended that the President's Council on Management Improvement (established by Executive Order No. 12479, May 24, 1984) work with the agencies in a governmentwide effort to improve managerial accountability for discretionary grant programs. GAO's report is Discretionary Grants—Opportunities to Improve Federal Discretionary Award Practices, GAO/HRD-86-108 (September 1986).

In view of the essential differences between grants and procurement contracts, GAO has declined to use its bid protest mechanism, prescribed to assure the fairness of awards of contracts, to rule on the propriety of individual grant awards—that is, GAO will not consider a complaint by a rejected applicant that it should have received the grant rather than the recipient to whom it was actually awarded. B-203096, May 20, 1981; B-199247, August 21, 1980; B-199147, June 24, 1980; B-190092, September 22, 1977. This does not affect the Comptroller General's jurisdiction to render decisions on the legality of federal expenditures, however, so GAO can and will render decisions on the legality of grant awards in terms of compliance with applicable statutes and regulations.

GAO has adopted a similar position with respect to cooperative agreements. GAO will not consider a "protest" against the award of a cooperative agreement unless it appears that a conflict of interest exists or that the agency is using the cooperative agreement to avoid the competitive requirements of the procurement laws (i.e., in violation of the Federal Grant and Cooperative Agreement Act) and regulations. 64 Comp. Gen. 669 (1985); 61 Comp. Gen. 428 (1982); B-216587, October 22, 1984. Again, this refers to review under GAO's "bid protest" jurisdiction and does not affect review under GAO's other available authorities.

In summary, assuming the proper instrument has been selected, GAO will not question funding decisions in discretionary federal assistance programs. B-228675, August 31, 1987 (denial of application for funding renewal held to be a policy matter within grantor agency's discretion where nothing in program legislation provided otherwise and agency had complied with applicable procedural requirements). See also City of Sarasota v. Environmental Protection Agency, 813 F.2d 1106 (11th Cir. 1987) (court declined jurisdiction over issue which it characterized as a grant funding decision); Massachusetts Department of Correction v. Law Enforcement Assistance Administration, 605 F.2d 21 (1st Cir. 1979) (court upheld agency's refusal to award grant, finding that procedural deficiencies, even though they amounted to "sloppiness," were not sufficiently grave as to deprive applicant of fair consideration).

The law in this area is still developing in terms of the kinds of issues the courts will look at and the standards and remedies they will apply. Trends and case law are discussed in detail in Richard B. Cappalli, Federal Grants and Cooperative Agreements—Law, Policy, and Practice, Chapter 3 (1982). Cappalli sees an emerging "right to fair process" at least to the extent of requiring agencies to follow applicable procedures (id. at § 3:26), although its precise scope and parameters await further legislative or judicial definition.

C. Some Basic Concepts

1. General Rules

A number of principles have evolved that are unique to grant law. These will be discussed in subsequent sections of this chapter. Many cases, however, involve the application of principles of law which are not unique to grants. As a general proposition, the fundamental principles of appropriations law discussed in preceding chapters apply to grants just as they apply to other expenditures. This section is designed to highlight a few of these areas, each of which is covered in detail elsewhere in this publication, and to show how they may apply in assistance contexts.

a. Statutory Construction

Established principles of statutory construction apply equally to grant legislation. Examples are: 49 Comp. Gen. 411 (1970) (resolution of conflicting elements of legislative history); 49 Comp. Gen. 104 (1969) (principle that meaning should be given to every word in a statute used to construe language in disaster relief assistance legislation); 46 Comp. Gen. 699 (1967) (use of legislative history to clarify reapportionment of unused funds under a formula grant program); B-133001, January 30, 1979 (construing the term "unexpected urgent need" in the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act).

Sometimes they may not apply equally. Under traditional thinking, statutes were viewed as applying prospectively only, unless retroactive application was indicated by the statutory language or legislative history. In most contexts, grant law followed this approach. See, e.g., 32 Comp. Gen. 141 (1952); 30 Comp. Gen. 86 (1950). There were occasional exceptions. For example, in 50 Comp. Gen. 750 (1971), GAO held that an amendment to a program statute which eased certain restrictions could be applied retroactively with respect to funds previously awarded but not yet obligated by the grantees. In 1974, the Supreme Court ruled that a court should "apply the law in effect at the time it renders its decision, unless doing so would result in manifest injustice or there is statutory direction or legislative history to the contrary." Bradley v. Richmond School Board, 416 U.S. 696, 711 (1974). Post-Bradley litigation has produced a fairly complex pattern of analysis and, as discussed in Chapter 2, the precise scope of Bradley is unsettled. In any event, the Supreme Court has declined to apply the Bradley presumption to grant law. In a 1985 decision, the Court held:

"[A]bsent a clear indication to the contrary in the relevant statutes or legislative history, changes in the substantive standards governing federal grant programs do not alter obligations and liabilities arising under earlier grants."

Bennett v. New Jersey, 470 U.S. 632, 641 (1985). Thus, for purposes of grant law, "obligations generally should be determined by reference to the law in effect when the grants were made." Id. at 638.

b. The Grant as an Exercise of Congressional Spending Power

When Congress enacts grant legislation and provides appropriations to fund the grants, it is exercising the spending power conferred upon it by the Constitution.[14] As such, it is clear that Congress has the power to attach terms and conditions to the availability or receipt of grant funds, either in the grant legislation itself or in a separate enactment. Oklahoma v. Civil Service Commission, 330 U.S. 127 (1947) (provision of Hatch Act prohibiting political activity by employees of state or local government agencies receiving federal grant funds upheld as within congressional power).

In Fullilove v. Klutznick, 448 U.S. 448 (1980), the Court upheld a provision of the Public Works Employment Act of 1977 imposing minority set-aside requirements on purchases by state and local grantees. The Court said:

"Congress has frequently employed the Spending Power to further broad policy objectives by conditioning receipt of federal moneys upon compliance by the recipient with federal statutory and administrative directives. This Court has repeatedly upheld against constitutional challenge the use of this technique to induce governments and private parties to cooperate voluntarily with federal policy."

Id. at 474. See also Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 451 U.S. 1, 15–17 (1981); King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 333 n.34 (1968). It follows that, under the Supremacy Clause, valid federal legislation will prevail over inconsistent state law. Townsend v. Swank, 404 U.S. 282 (1971) (state statute inconsistent with [14]It may be acting under other enumerated powers as well. "Congress is not required to identify the precise source of its authority when it enacts legislation." Nevada v. Skinner, 884 F.2d 445, 449 n.8 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1070.

However, since the former cashier retained responsibility for the imprest fund until formally replaced, he too was an accountable officer. B-188881, May 8, 1978.

In sum, any government officer or employee who physically handles government funds, even if only occasionally, is accountable for those funds while in his or her custody.

It may be impossible, although this will happen only in extremely rare cases, to specify exactly who the proper accountable officer is. For example, the Drug Enforcement Administration used a flash roll of 650 $100 bills and discovered that 15 bills had been replaced by counterfeits scattered throughout the roll. (The "roll" was actually a number of stacks.) The roll had been used in a number of investigations and in each instance, the transactions (transfers from cashier to investigators, returns to cashier, transfers between different groups of investigators) were recorded on receipts and the money was counted. While it was thus possible to determine precisely who had the roll on any given day, there was no way to determine when the substitution took place and hence to establish to whom the loss should be attributed. B-191891, June 16, 1980.

3. Funds to Which Accountability Attaches

When we talk about the liability of accountable officers, we deliberately use the broad term "public funds." As a general proposition, for purposes of accountability, "public funds" consists of three categories: appropriated funds, funds received by the government from nongovernment sources, and funds held in trust. It is important to emphasize that when we refer to certain funds as "nonaccountable" in the course of this discussion, all we mean is that the funds are not subject to the laws governing the liability and relief of accountable officers. Liability for losses may still attach on some other basis.

a. Appropriated Funds

Appropriated funds are accountable funds. The funds may be in the Treasury, which is where most appropriated funds remain pending disbursement, or they may be in the form of cash advanced to a government officer or employee for some authorized purpose.

REV_00257431

eligibility criteria of Aid to Families with Dependent Children legislation held invalid).[15]

More recently, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed the power of Congress to attach conditions to grant funds, provided that the conditions are (1) in pursuit of the general welfare, (2) expressed unambiguously, (3) reasonably related to the purpose of the expenditure, and (4) not in violation of other constitutional provisions. New York v. United States, ___ U.S. ___, 112 S. Ct. 2408, 2426 (1992); South Dakota v. Dole, 483 U.S. 203, 207–08 (1987). Dole upheld legislation directing the Department of Transportation to withhold a percentage of federal highway funds from states which do not adopt a minimum drinking age of 21. Similarly, legislation conditioning the receipt of federal highway funds on state adoption of the national speed limit has been upheld. Nevada v. Skinner, 884 F.2d 445 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1070.

Where Congress has imposed an otherwise valid condition on the receipt of grant funds by states, the condition is, in effect, a "condition precedent" to a state's participation in the program. Unless permitted under the program legislation, the condition may not be waived or omitted even though a given state may not be able to participate because state law or the state constitution precludes compliance. North Carolina ex rel. Morrow v. Califano, 445 F. Supp. 532 (E.D.N.C. 1977), aff'd mem., 435 U.S. 962; 43 Comp. Gen. 174 (1963).

Of course, it is also within the power of Congress to authorize the making of unconditional grants. See B-80351, September 30, 1948.

c. Availability of Appropriations

As with obligations and expenditures in general, a federal agency may provide financial assistance only to the extent authorized by law and available appropriations. Thus, the three elements of legal availability—purpose, time, and amount—apply equally to assistance funds.

[15]It has also been recognized that the regulations of a grantor agency, if otherwise valid, may preempt state law. S.J. Groves & Sons v. Fulton County, 920 F.2d 752, 763–64 (11th Cir. 1991).

(1) Purpose

Appropriations may be used only for the purpose(s) for which they were made. 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). One of the ways in which this fundamental proposition manifests itself in the grant context is the principle that grant funds may be obligated and expended only for authorized grant purposes. What is an "authorized grant purpose" is determined by examining the relevant program legislation, legislative history, and appropriation acts.

Disaster relief assistance legislation, found at 42 U.S.C. Chapter 68, authorizes, among other things, federal financial contributions to state and local governments for the repair or replacement of public facilities damaged by a major disaster. Decisions under a prior version of this legislation had construed public facilities as including municipal airports (42 Comp. Gen. 6 (1962)), including airport facilities which had been leased to private parties for the purpose of generating income for airport maintenance (49 Comp. Gen. 104 (1969)). Assistance could also extend to a sewage treatment plant, but not one which was not completed, and thus not in operation, at the time of the damage. 45 Comp. Gen. 409 (1966). Unlike the earlier legislation, the current statute defines "public facility," 42 U.S.C. § 5122(8), and specifically includes airport and sewage treatment facilities. Some other examples are:

- Airport development grants under Federal Airport Act may include runway sealing projects which are shown to be part of reconstruction or repair rather than normal maintenance. 35 Comp. Gen. 588 (1956). See also B-60032, September 9, 1946 (grants under same legislation may be made for acquisition of land or existing privately owned airports, to be used as public airports, regardless of whether construction or repair work is immediately contemplated).
- Mining Enforcement and Safety Administration is authorized to make grants to a labor union to fund emergency medical technician training program for coal miners since the proposal bears a sufficiently close relationship to coal mine safety to come within the scope of the governing program legislation. B-170686, November 8, 1977.
- Public Health Service grants for support of research training were found authorized under the Public Health Service Act. B-161769, June 30, 1967.

A grant for unspecified purposes would, unless expressly authorized by Congress, be improper. 55 Comp. Gen. 1059, 1062 (1976).

A case from the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals illustrates the proposition that an agency may reallocate discretionary funds within a lump-sum appropriation as long as it uses those funds for other authorized purposes of the appropriation and does not violate the applicable program legislation. Under the Clean Air Act, the Environmental Protection Agency may prescribe plans to implement air quality standards for states which fail to submit adequate plans. The Act also authorizes air pollution control grants to states, funded under EPA's lump-sum Abatement, Control, and Compliance appropriation. Under its regulations, EPA divides available funds into nonmandatory annual allotments for each state. The regulations also authorize EPA to set aside a portion of the unawarded allotments to support federal implementation programs where required because of the absence of adequate state programs. One state argued that the set-aside policy amounted to a diversion of funds from their intended purpose and therefore violated 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). The court first upheld the regulation as a permissible interpretation of EPA's authority under the Clean Air Act. The court then found that there was no purpose violation because (a) the relevant appropriation act did not earmark any specific amount for grants to states, and (b) EPA was still using the set-aside funds for air pollution abatement programs, which was their intended purpose. Illinois Environmental Protection Agency v. United States EPA, 947 F.2d 283 (7th Cir. 1991).

This is essentially the same reasoning the Comptroller General had applied in B-157356, August 17, 1978. The (then) Department of Health, Education, and Welfare received a lump-sum appropriation for its Office of Human Development Services covering a number of grant programs. The Department wanted to make what it termed "cross-cutting" grants to fund research or demonstration projects which would benefit more than one target population (e.g., aged, children, Native Americans). To do this, each office receiving grant funds under the lump-sum appropriation was asked to set aside a portion of its grant funds. This pool would then be used for approved cross-cutting grants. Since the lump-sum appropriation did not restrict the Department's internal allocation of funds for any given program, GAO approved the concept, provided that the grants were limited to projects within the scope or purpose of the appropriation, a condition necessary to assure compliance with 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a).

(2) Time

Funds must be obligated by the grantor agency within their period of obligational availability. This includes all actions necessary to constitute a valid obligation. For example, an "offer of grant" made by the Economic Development Administration to a Connecticut municipality in 1983 was accepted by a town official who did not have authority to accept the grant, and the funds expired for obligational purposes before the town was able to ratify the unauthorized acceptance. Under these circumstances, GAO concluded that a valid grant never came into existence. B-220527, December 16, 1985. The town later submitted a claim for reimbursement of its expenses, based on an "equitable estoppel" argument. Since the non-existence of the grant was attributable to the town's actions and not those of the EDA, the claim could not be allowed. B-220527, August 11, 1987. See also B-206244, June 8, 1982.

The "bona fide needs" rule applies to grants and cooperative agreements just as it applies to other types of obligations or expenditures. 64 Comp. Gen. 359 (1985); B-229873, November 29, 1988. In 64 Comp. Gen. 359, obligation of fiscal year appropriations for 3-year biomedical research grants was found improper where not authorized by statute and where the grants did not contemplate a required outcome or end product.

(3) Amount

Restrictions on the availability of a lump-sum appropriation are not legally binding unless incorporated expressly or by reference in the appropriation act itself. Thus, a plan to fund National Institutes of Health biomedical research grants, funded under a lump-sum appropriation, in a number less than that specified in committee reports was not unlawful, as long as all funds were properly obligated for authorized grant purposes. 64 Comp. Gen. 359 (1985). See also B-157356, August 17, 1978.

Minimum earmarks (e.g., "not less than" or "shall be available only") in an authorization act were found controlling where a later-enacted appropriation act provided a lump sum considerably less than the amount authorized but nevertheless sufficient to meet the earmark requirements. 64 Comp. Gen. 388 (1985). The grantor agency will have more discretion where the earmark is a maximum ("not to exceed"), or where it is expressed only in legislative history. B-171019, March 2, 1977.

Similar rules apply to expenditures by grantees. In the absence of an earmark or other controlling provision in the applicable program statute, regulations, or the grant agreement, there is no basis to object to a grantee's allocation of grant funds as long as the funds were spent for eligible grant activities. 69 Comp. Gen. 600 (1990).

The concept of augmentation of appropriations also applies to assistance funds. One illustration is the rule that a federal institution is generally not eligible to receive grant funds from another federal institution unless the program legislation expressly so provides. The reason is that the grant funds would improperly augment the appropriations of the receiving institution. For example:

- Federal grant funds for nurse training programs could not be allotted to St. Elizabeths Hospital since it was already receiving appropriations to maintain and operate its nursing school. 23 Comp. Gen. 694 (1944).
- Haskell Indian Junior College, fully funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, was not eligible to receive grant funds from federal agencies other than the Bureau of Indian Affairs, since Congress had already provided for its needs by direct appropriations. B-114868, April 11, 1975.
- The Office of Education could not make a library support grant under the Higher Education Act of 1965 to the National Commission on Libraries and Information Science as it would be an improper augmentation of the Commission's appropriations. 57 Comp. Gen. 662, 664 (1978).

The appropriations which would be augmented by the grant do not have to be specific appropriations for the prohibition to apply. B-69616, November 19, 1947. Of course, Congress may legislatively authorize exceptions. E.g., B-217093, January 9, 1985.

d. Agency Regulations

(1) General principles

Legislation establishing an assistance program frequently will define the program objectives and leave it to the administering agency to fill in the details by regulation. Thus, agency regulations are of paramount importance in assessing the parameters of grant authority.

These regulations, if properly promulgated and within the bounds of the agency's statutory authority, have the force and effect of law and may not be waived on a retroactive or ad hoc basis. 57 Comp. Gen. 662 (1978) (eligibility standards); B-163922, February 10, 1978 (grantee's liability for improper expenditures); B-130515, July 17, 1974; B-130515, July 20, 1973 (matching share requirements). However, the prohibition against waiver does not necessarily apply to regulations which are merely "internal administrative guidelines" as long as the government's interests are adequately protected. See 60 Comp. Gen. 208, 210 (1981).

The operation of several of these principles is illustrated in B-203452, December 31, 1981. The Federal Aviation Administration revised its regulations to permit indirect costs to be charged to Airport Development Aid Program grants. A grantee filed a claim for reimbursement of indirect costs incurred prior to the change in the FAA regulations, arguing that the charging of indirect costs was required by a Federal Management Circular even before FAA recognized it in its own regulations. GAO first pointed out that Federal Management Circulars are internal management tools. They do not have the binding effect of law so as to permit a third party to assert them against a non-complying agency. This being the case, there was no impediment to FAA's revising its regulations without making the revision retroactive, as long as both the old and the new regulations were within the scope of FAA's legal authority. See also Pueblo Neighborhood Health Centers, Inc. v. Department of Health and Human Services, 720 F.2d 622, 625–26 (10th Cir. 1983) (HHS Grant Application Manual was an internal agency publication rather than a regulation with force and effect of law, such that deviation by agency—in this case use of an ineligible member on a funding review panel—did not require reversal of agency action).

Regulations of the grantor agency will generally be upheld, even if they are not specifically addressed in the program legislation, as long as they are within the agency's statutory authority, issued in compliance with applicable procedural requirements, and not arbitrary or capricious. For example, courts have upheld the authority of the Department of Agriculture to impose by regulation strict liability on states for lost or stolen food stamp coupons. Gallegos v. Lyng, 891 F.2d 788 (10th Cir. 1989); Louisiana v. Bergland, 531 F. Supp. 118 (M.D. La. 1982), aff'd sub nom. Louisiana v. Block, 694 F.2d 430 (5th Cir. 1982); Hettleman v. Bergland, 642 F.2d 63 (4th Cir. 1981). Similarly, it was within the discretion of the Environmental Protection Agency under the Clean Water Act to prescribe regulations making wastewater treatment grants available only for the construction of new facilities and not for the acquisition of preexisting facilities. Cole County Regional Sewer District v. United States, 22 Cl. Ct. 551 (1991). "The EPA, like all government agencies, is subject to funding constraints and must effectuate policy objectives with available resources." Id. at 557. Another illustration is American Hospital Association v. Schweiker, 721 F.2d 170 (7th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 466 U.S. 958, upholding regulations imposing community service and uncompensated care requirements on recipients of Hill-Burton hospital construction grants.

Wholly apart from what the courts might or might not do, an agency's discretion in funding matters is subject to congressional oversight as well. Congress, if it disfavors an agency's actual or proposed exercise of otherwise legitimate discretion, can statutorily restrict that discretion, at least prospectively, either by amending the program legislation or by inserting the desired restrictions in appropriation acts. For an example of the latter, see B-238997.4, December 12, 1990.

The informal rulemaking requirements (notice and comment) of the Administrative Procedure Act do not apply to grant regulations. 5 U.S.C. § 553(a)(2). Several agencies, however, have published statements committing themselves to compliance with the APA and have thereby effectively waived the exemption. Where regulations are required to be published in the Federal Register, failure to do so may render them ineffective. The issue has been before the courts on several occasions. See, e.g., B-130515, July 17, 1974. (See Chapter 3 for further elaboration and case citations.)

A case not cited in Chapter 3 which applies several important Administrative Procedure Act principles in the grant context is Abbs v. Sullivan, 756 F. Supp. 1172 (W.D. Wis. 1990). A grantee university and one of its professors challenged a set of scientific misconduct investigation guidelines which the National Institutes of Health had published in a grants administration manual but not in the Federal Register. The court first found that the guidelines met the APA's definition of a "rule." Id. at 1187. The court then noted that the Department of Health and Human Services had voluntarily waived the exemption in 5 U.S.C. § 553 for rules relating to grants, and was thereby bound to follow the notice and comment procedures of the APA. Id. at 1188. The court also rejected the government's contention that the guidelines were "procedural" and therefore exempt. "Although an agency's label is relevant, it is not dispositive of the true character of the agency statement." Id. Accordingly, the court held the guidelines "invalid unless and until they are promulgated in compliance with the procedures required by the APA." Id. at 1189.

(2) The "common rules"

The importance of agency regulations and management guidance from the Office of Management and Budget is apparent throughout this chapter. Since the structure of that material changed drastically in the late 1980s, a summary of the new structure may be helpful.

For a number of years, uniform administrative requirements from OMB have been contained in two key circulars, A-102 (assistance to state, local, and Indian tribal governments) and A-110 (institutions of higher education, hospitals, and other nonprofit organizations). The structure of each circular was similar—a brief introduction followed by more than a dozen attachments with detailed guidance on specific topics.

In 1987, a memorandum from the President directed OMB to revise Circular A-102 to specify uniform, governmentwide terms and conditions for grants to state and local governments, and directed executive branch departments and agencies to propose and issue common regulations adopting these terms and conditions verbatim, modified where necessary to reflect inconsistent statutory requirements. 23 Weekly Comp. Pres. Doc. 254 (March 12, 1987).

A proposed common rule was published on June 9, 1987 (52 Fed. Reg. 21819), and the final common rule was published on March 11, 1988 (53 Fed. Reg. 8033), generally effective as of October 1, 1988. The rule was adopted by over 20 agencies, including all of the major grantor agencies. The title is identical for each agency: Uniform Administrative Requirements for Grants and Cooperative Agreements to State and Local Governments. The revised Circular A-102 was issued on March 3, 1988. It is much simplified from its predecessor, much of the detail having been shifted to the individual agency regulations.

Under the common rule, the pertinent Code of Federal Regulations title and part number will, of course, vary with the agency. Section numbers, however, are identical for each agency. For example, the definition section is ___.3 and the provision dealing with program income is ___.25.

The common rule itself is published at 53 Fed. Reg. 8087–8103. Pages 8042–8087 give the preambles and variations of the adopting agencies. References to the common rule in this chapter will cite the rule itself and not the regulations of any particular agency. The reader is therefore cautioned to check individual agency regulations for possible variations.

The common rule is intended to supersede uncodified manuals and handbooks unless required by statute or approved by the Office of Management and Budget. Common Rule §___ .5, 53 Fed. Reg. 8090. With respect to grants and grantees covered by the common rule, additional administrative requirements are to be in the form of codified regulations published in the Federal Register. Id. §___.6(a).

In addition to the A-102 implementation, the "common rule" format has been used in several other grant-related contexts.

On February 18, 1986, as part of the government's effort to combat fraud, waste, and abuse, the President signed Executive Order No. 12549, which directed the establishment of a system for debarment and suspension in the assistance context. OMB implemented the executive order by publishing a common rule, this one entitled "Governmentwide Debarment and Suspension (Nonprocurement)," adopted by over 25 grantor agencies and patterned generally on comparable provisions for procurement contracts in the Federal Acquisition Regulation. 53 Fed. Reg. 19160 (May 26, 1988). A person (including business entities and units of government) who is debarred is excluded from federal assistance and benefits, financial and nonfinancial, under federal programs and activities for a period of up to three years, possibly longer. Common Rule §§___.100(a) (purpose), ___.105(n) (definition of person), ___.320 (period of debarment), 53 Fed. Reg. at 19204–05, 19208. Causes of debarment are listed in §___.305, 53 Fed. Reg. at 19207. They include certain criminal convictions, antitrust violations, a history of unsatisfactory performance, and failure to pay a single substantial debt or a number of outstanding debts owed to the federal government.

Suspension is a temporary exclusion, usually pending the completion of an investigation involving one or more of the causes for debarment. See generally Common Rule Subpart D, 53 Fed. Reg. 19208–09.

The General Services Administration is responsible for compiling and distributing a list of debarred or suspended persons. Id. §___.500, 53 Fed. Reg. 19209. The list, entitled Lists of Parties Excluded from Federal Procurement or Nonprocurement Programs, is issued monthly by GSA's Office of Acquisition Policy and is also available electronically.

Another common rule, in the form of an "interim final rule" adopted by 28 grantor agencies, was issued on February 26, 1990 (55 Fed. Reg. 6736) to implement restrictions on grantee lobbying enacted in late 1989 and described in our section on lobbying in Chapter 4.

Still another common rule was issued on May 25, 1990 (55 Fed. Reg. 21681) to implement the Drug-Free Workplace Act of 1988 (41 U.S.C. § 702), which requires that grant recipients, including individuals, certify as a precondition of receiving federal funds that they have taken certain anti-drug abuse measures. Violation of the statute or regulations may result in suspension of grant payments, suspension or termination of the grant, and/or suspension or debarment of the grantee for a period of up to 5 years. 41 U.S.C. § 702(b); Common Rule §___.620, 55 Fed. Reg. at 21689.

2. Contracting by Grantees

Grantees commonly enter into contracts with third parties in the course of performing their grants. While the United States is not a party to the contracts, the grantee must nevertheless comply with any requirements imposed by statute, regulation, or the terms of the grant agreement, in awarding federally assisted contracts. 54 Comp. Gen. 6 (1974). Violation of applicable procurement standards may result in the loss of federal funding. E.g., Town of Fallsburg v. United States, 22 Cl. Ct. 633 (1991).

For a period of nearly 10 years, GAO undertook a limited review of the propriety of contract awards made by a grantee in furtherance of grant purposes, upon request of a prospective contractor. This limited review role was announced in 40 Fed. Reg. 42406 (September 12, 1975). (GAO called these "complaints" rather than "protests.") GAO

(1) Imprest funds

The definitions of the various types of cashier refer primarily to the use of "imprest funds." An imprest fund is essentially a petty cash fund. More specifically, it is a fixed-cash fund (i.e., a fixed dollar amount) advanced to a cashier for cash disbursements or other cash requirement purposes as specifically authorized. An imprest fund may be either a stationary fund, such as a change-making fund, or a revolving fund. Treasury Financial Manual (TFM), Vol. I, § 4-3020.

Imprest funds are commonly used for such things as small purchases, travel advances, and authorized emergency salary payments. Guidance on the use of imprest funds may be found in GAO's Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 6.8, I TFM chapter 4-3000, and the Federal Acquisition Regulation (FAR), 48 C.F.R. subpart 13.4. Agencies using imprest funds are required to issue implementing regulations. I TFM § 4-3030; FAR, 48 C.F.R. § 13.403(c). Except to the extent specified in an agency's own regulations (e.g., B-220466 et al., December 9, 1986), there are no subject matter limitations on the kinds of services payable from imprest funds. 65 Comp. Gen. 806 (1986).

Imprest funds of the revolving type are replenished to the fixed amount as spent or used. As replenishments are needed, replenishment vouchers are submitted through the certifying officer to the disbursing officer. Replenishment vouchers must be supported by receipts or other evidence of the expenditures.

At any given time, an imprest fund may consist of cash, uncashed government checks, and other documents such as unpaid reimbursement vouchers, sales slips, invoices, or other receipts for cash payments. An imprest fund cashier must at all times be able to account for the full amount of the fund. I TFM § 4-3040.80. For example, if a cash box containing a $1,000 imprest fund disappears, and at the time of disappearance the box contained $500 in cash and $500 in receipts for which reimbursement vouchers had not yet been issued, the loss to the government is the full $1,000 and the cashier is accountable for that full amount. A cashier's failure to keep adequate records, thus making proper reconciliation impossible, is negligence. B-189084, January 15, 1980.

applied the same limited review to contracts awarded under cooperative agreements. 59 Comp. Gen. 758 (1980).

GAO's review was designed primarily to ensure that the "basic principles" of competitive bidding were applied. 55 Comp. Gen. 390, 393 (1975). Numerous decisions were rendered in this area. E.g., 57 Comp. Gen. 85 (1977) (non-applicability of Buy American Act); 55 Comp. Gen. 1254 (1976) (state law applicable when indicated in grant); 55 Comp. Gen. 413 (1975) (non-applicability of Federal Procurement Regulations).

By 1985, many agencies had developed their own review procedures, and the number of complaints filed with GAO steadily decreased. Determining that its review of grantee contracting was no longer needed, GAO discontinued its limited review in January 1985. 50 Fed. Reg. 3978 (January 29, 1985); 64 Comp. Gen. 243 (1985). The body of decisions issued during the 1975–1985 period should nevertheless remain useful as guidance in this area.

In a 1980 report, GAO reviewed the procurement procedures of selected state and local government grantees and nonprofit organizations in five states. The report concluded that the state and local governments generally had and followed sound procurement procedures (somewhat less so for the nonprofits), but also found a number of weak spots, many of which are now addressed in OMB directives. The report is Spending Grant Funds More Efficiently Could Save Millions, PSAD-80-58 (June 30, 1980).

With respect to state and local governments, standards for grantee procurement are set forth in §___.36 of the Common Rule, 53 Fed. Reg. 8096. Grantor agencies are authorized, but not required, to establish formal review procedures for grantee procurements. See id. §§___.36(b)(11), (12); Supplementary Information Statement, 53 Fed. Reg. 8034, 8039 (March 11, 1988).

An agency which establishes a review procedure for grantee procurement will be held to established precepts of administrative law in applying those procedures. For example, in Niro Atomizer, Inc. v. Environmental Protection Agency, 682 F. Supp. 1212 (S.D. Fla. 1988), the court instructed EPA to either follow its established procedures or announce that it was changing them, giving the parties notice and an opportunity to rebut.

3. Liability for Acts of Grantees

It is often said that the federal government is not liable for the unauthorized acts of its agents, "agents" in this context referring to the government's own officers and employees. If this is true with respect to those who clearly are agents of the government, it logically must apply with even greater force with respect to those who are not its agents. Grantees, for purposes of imposing legal liability on the United States, are not "agents" of the government. While the demarcation is not perfect, we divide our discussion into two broad areas, contractual liability and tortious conduct.

a. Contractual Liability to Third Parties

In order for the United States to be contractually liable to some other party, there must be "privity of contract," that is, a direct contractual relationship, between the parties. When a grantee under a federal grant enters into a contract with a third party (contractor), there is privity between the United States and the grantee, and privity between the grantee and the contractor, but no privity between the United States and the contractor and hence, as a general proposition, no liability.

Perhaps the leading case in this area is D.R. Smalley & Sons, Inc. v. United States, 372 F.2d 505 (Ct. Cl. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 835. The plaintiff contractor had entered into a highway construction contract with the state of Ohio. The project was funded on a cost-sharing basis, with 90 percent of total costs to come from federal-aid highway funds. The contractor lost nearly $3 million on the project, recovered part of its loss from the state of Ohio, and then sued the United States to recover the unpaid balance. The contractor argued that Ohio was really the agent of the United States for purposes of the project because, among other things, the contract had been drafted pursuant to federal regulations, the United States approved the contract and all changes, and the United States was funding 90 percent of the costs.

The court disagreed. Since there was no privity of contract between the United States and the contractor, the government was not liable. The involvement of the government in various aspects of the project did not make the state the agent of the federal government for purposes of creating contractual liability, express or implied. The court stated:

"The National Government makes many hundreds of grants each year to the various states, to municipalities, to schools and colleges and to other public organizations and agencies for many kinds of public works, including roads and highways. It requires the projects to be completed in accordance with certain standards before the proceeds of the grant will be paid. Otherwise the will of Congress would be thwarted and taxpayers' money would be wasted. . . . It would be farfetched indeed to impose liability on the Government for the acts and omissions of the parties who contract to build the projects, simply because it requires the work to meet certain standards and upon approval thereof reimburses the public agency for a part of the costs."

Id. at 507. Some later cases applying the Smalley concept are Somerville Technical Services v. United States, 640 F.2d 1276 (Ct. Cl. 1981); Housing Corporation of America v. United States, 468 F.2d 922 (Ct. Cl. 1972); Cofan Associates, Inc. v. United States, 4 Cl. Ct. 85 (1983); 68 Comp. Gen. 494 (1989).

The Cofan case presented an interesting variation in that the claimant was a disappointed bidder rather than a contractor, trying to recover under the theory, well-established in the law of procurement contracts, that there is an implied promise on the part of the government to fairly consider all bids. This did not help the plaintiff, however, since again there was no privity with the government.

"[I]t is now firmly established that a person who enters into a contract with a [grantee] to perform services on a project funded in part by loans or grants-in-aid from the United States may not thereby be deemed to have entered into a contract with the United States. Nor is the result any different because the United States has imposed guidelines or restrictions on the use of the funds, including procurement procedures." 4 Cl. Ct. at 86.

Another variation occurred in 47 Comp. Gen. 756 (1968). A contractor had succeeded in recovering increased costs from a state grantee. Under Smalley, it was clear that the government could not be held legally liable for a proportionate share of the recovery. However, it was apparent that the increased costs were due to the fact that erroneous soil profile information furnished by the state had contributed to an unrealistically low bid by the contractor. Under these circumstances, GAO advised that the grantor agency and the state could enter into a voluntary modification of the grant agreement to recognize the damage recovery as a project cost. See also B-167310, July 31, 1969.

In limited circumstances, there is a device that may be available to a contractor to have its claim considered by the federal government, illustrated by B-181332, December 28, 1976. In that case, an agency had erroneously refused to fund a grant after it had been approved and the grantee's contractor had incurred expenses in reliance on the approval. There clearly was no privity between the contractor and the United States. However, GAO recognized a procedural device drawn from the law of procurement contracts, and accepted a claim filed by the grantee (with whom the United States did have privity) "for and on behalf of" the contractor, in which the grantee acknowledged liability to the contractor only if and to the extent that the government was liable to the grantee. In effect, the contractor was prosecuting the claim in the name of the grantee. This device is potentially useful only where the government's liability to the grantee can be established. See also 68 Comp. Gen. 494, 495–96 (1989); 9 Comp. Gen. 175 (1929).

A different type of contract, an employment contract, was the subject of 66 Comp. Gen. 604 (1987), in which GAO concluded, applying Smalley, that the United States was not liable to a former employee of a grantee for unpaid salary. The grantor agency had funded all allowable costs under the grant, and the grantee's transgression was not the liability of the United States.

As if to prove the adage that anything that can happen will happen, a 1983 case combined all of the elements noted above. The Agency for International Development made a rural development planning grant to Bolivia. Bolivia contracted with a private American company to perform certain functions under the grant, and the company in turn entered into employment contracts with various individuals. The contract with the private company (but not the grant itself) was terminated, the company terminated the employment contracts, and the individuals then sought to recover benefits provided under Bolivian law. Clearly, AID was not legally liable to the individual claimants. However, some of the benefits to some of the claimants could qualify as allowable costs under the grant and could be paid, if approved by AID and the grantee, to the extent grant funds remained available. B-209649, December 23, 1983.

b. Tortious Conduct

A number of cases have involved attempts to impose liability on the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act or similar situations. The Federal Tort Claims Act makes the United States liable, with various exceptions, for the tortious conduct of its officers, employees, or agents acting within the scope of their employment. As a general proposition, a grantee is not an agent or agency of the government for purposes of tort liability.

REV_00257579

An important Supreme Court case is United States v. Orleans, 425 U.S. 807 (1976), holding that a community action agency funded under the Economic Opportunity Act is not a "federal agency" for purposes of Federal Tort Claims Act. The case arose from a motor vehicle accident involving plaintiff Orleans and an individual acting on behalf of a grantee. The Court first noted that the Federal Tort Claims Act "was never intended, and has not been construed by this Court, to reach employees or agents of all federally funded programs that confer benefits on people." Id. at 813. The Court then stated, and answered, the controlling test:

> "[T]he question here is not whether the [grantee] receives federal money and must comply with federal standards and regulations, but whether its day-to-day operations are supervised by the Federal Government.
> . . . .
> ". . . The Federal Government in no sense controls 'the detailed physical performance' of all the programs and projects it finances by gifts, grants, contracts, or loans." Id. at 815–16.

Thus, the general rule is that the United States is not liable for torts committed by its grantees. Neither the fact of federal funding nor the degree of federal involvement encountered in the typical grant (approval, oversight, inspection, etc.) is sufficient to make the grantee an agent of the United States for purposes of tort liability. Liability could result, however, if the federal involvement reached the level of detailed supervision of day-to-day operations noted in Orleans. An example is Martarano v. United States, 231 F. Supp. 805 (D. Nev. 1964) (state employee under cooperative agreement working under direct control and supervision of federal agency).

The same rules apply for purposes of determining the liability of the United States for a taking of private property under the Fifth Amendment. E.g., Hendler v. United States, 11 Cl. Ct. 91, 98–99 (1986). For actions which may have taking implications, agencies should also be familiar with the policies and requirements of Executive Order No. 12630, March 15, 1988.

In another group of cases, attempts have been made to find the United States liable under the Federal Tort Claims Act for the allegedly negligent performance of its oversight role under a grant. The courts have found these claims covered by the "discretionary function" exception to Federal Tort Claims Act liability. Mahler v. United States, 306 F.2d 713 (3d Cir. 1962), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 923, followed in Daniel v. United States, 426 F.2d 281 (5th Cir. 1970), and Rayford v. United States, 410 F. Supp. 1051 (M.D. Tenn. 1976).

In areas not covered by the Federal Tort Claims Act, such as the so-called constitutional tort, the potential for individual liability cannot be disregarded. For example, an official of the Indian Health Service, acting jointly with a state official, told a nonprofit intermediary that further funding would be conditioned on the dismissal of an employee whom they thought was performing inadequately. The intermediary fired the employee, who then sued the state official and the federal official in their individual capacities. The suit against the federal defendant was based directly on the Fifth Amendment, for deprivation of a property interest (the plaintiff's job) without due process. The court first found that there had been a due process violation, and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity because their conduct exceeded the scope of their authority. Merritt v. Mackey, 827 F.2d 1368 (9th Cir. 1987). The court noted that there was no basis for imposing liability on the United States. Id. at 1373–74. In the second published appellate decision in the case, the court affirmed a monetary damage award and an award of attorney's fees against the individual officials. The federal official was personally liable for the fee award under 42 U.S.C. § 1988 because he had acted in concert with a state official. Merritt v. Mackey, 932 F.2d 1317 (9th Cir. 1991).

Finally, a case deserving brief mention, although not involving the monetary liability of the United States, is Dixson v. United States, 465 U.S. 482 (1984), in which the Supreme Court held that two officers of a private, nonprofit corporation, who were assigned to administer two federal community development block grants awarded by the Department of Housing and Urban Development to the city of Peoria, were "public officials" who could be prosecuted under the federal bribery statute.

4. Types of Grants: Categorical vs. Block

A categorical grant is a grant to be used only for a specific program or for narrowly defined activities. A categorical grant may be allocated on the basis of a distribution formula prescribed by statute or regulation ("formula grant"), or it may be made for a specific project ("project grant"). A block grant is a grant given to a governmental unit, usually a state, to be used for a variety of activities within a broad functional area.[16] Block grants are usually formula grants. Under a block grant, the state is responsible for further distribution of the money. States naturally prefer block grants because they increase the states' spending flexibility and at least in theory reduce federal control.

During the 1960s and 1970s, although some block grant programs were in existence, the emphasis was largely on categorical grants. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 (OBRA), Public Law 97-35, attempted to put a halt to this trend. The statute merged and consolidated several dozen categorical grant programs into block grants. The following programs stem from, or were significantly revised by, the 1981 OBRA (the OBRA title and page citation and U.S. Code location are indicated parenthetically for each program):

- Community Development Block Grant (Title III, 95 Stat. 384, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 69).
- Elementary and Secondary Education Block Grant (Title V, 95 Stat. 463. The law was overhauled in 1988; the successor version is found at 20 U.S.C. Ch. 47).
- Community Services Block Grant (Title VI, 95 Stat. 511, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 106).
- Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant (Title IX, 95 Stat. 535, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 6A, Subch. XVII, Part A).
- Alcohol and Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services Block Grant (Title IX, 95 Stat. 543, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 6A, Subch. XVII, Part B).
- Maternal and Child Health Services Block Grant (Title XXI, 95 Stat. 818, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 7, Subch. V).
- Social Services Block Grant (Title XXIII, 95 Stat. 867, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 7, Subch. XX).
- Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Block Grant (Title XXVI, 95

Stat. 893, 42 U.S.C. Ch. 94, Subch. II).[17]

Block grants do reduce federal involvement in that they transfer much of the decision-making to the grantee and reduce the number of separate grants that must be administered by the federal government. However, it is a misconception to think that block grants are "free money" in the sense of being totally free from federal "strings."

Restrictions on the use of block grant funds may derive from the organic legislation itself. For example, several of the OBRA programs include such items as limitations on allowable administrative expenses, prohibitions on the use of funds to purchase land or construct buildings, "maintenance of effort" provisions, and anti-discrimination provisions. Other OBRA provisions of general applicability (Pub. L. No. 97-35, §§ 1741–1745, 95 Stat. 762–64) impose reporting and auditing requirements, and require states to conduct public hearings as a prerequisite to receiving funds in any fiscal year.

Applicable restrictions are not limited to those contained in the program statute itself. Other federal statutes applicable to the use of grant funds must also be followed. See, e.g., Ely v. Velde, 451 F.2d 1130 (4th Cir. 1971), holding that the National Historic Preservation Act and the National Environmental Policy Act applied to a block grant made by the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration to Virginia under the Safe Streets Act. A later and related decision in the same case is 497 F.2d 252 (4th Cir. 1974). See also Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 854 F.2d 40 (4th Cir. 1988) (requirement for apportionment by Office of Management and Budget applicable to funds under Social Services Block Grant); 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 605 (1982) (Uniform Relocation Assistance Act applicable to Community Development block grant); 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 83 (1982) (various [17]GAO has issued a number of studies and reports on the OBRA block grants. Some of them are Early Observations on Block Grant Implementation, GAO/GGD-82-79 (August 24, 1982); Lessons Learned From Past Block Grants: Implications for Congressional Oversight, GAO/IPE-82-8 (September 23, 1982); A Summary and Comparison of the Legislative Provisions of the Block Grants Created by the 1981 Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act, GAO/IPE-83-2 (December 30, 1982); Block Grants: Overview of Experiences to Date and Emerging Issues, GAO/HRD-85-46 (April 3, 1985); and Community Development: Oversight of Block Grant Needs Improvement, GAO/RCED-91-23 (January 30, 1991). anti-discrimination statutes applicable to Elementary and Secondary Education and Social Services block grants).

Thus, the block grant mechanism does not totally remove federal involvement nor does it permit the circumvention of federal laws applicable to the use of grant funds. In this latter respect, a block grant is legally no different from a categorical grant.

The common rule for uniform administrative requirements does not apply to the OBRA block grants. Common Rule §___.4(a), 53 Fed. Reg. 8089.

5. The Single Audit Act

We noted in our Introduction to this chapter that federal grants to state and local governments exceed $100 billion a year. With expenditures of this magnitude, it is essential that there be some way to assure accountability on the part of the grantees. The traditional means of assuring accountability has been the audit.

Prior to 1984, there were no statutory uniform audit requirements for state and local government grantees. Audits were performed on a grant or program basis and requirements varied with the program legislation. Under this system, gaps in audit coverage resulted because some entities were audited infrequently or not at all. Also, overlapping requirements produced duplication and inefficiency with multiple audit teams visiting the same entity and reviewing the same financial records. Congress addressed the problem by enacting the Single Audit Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-502, codified at 31 U.S.C. §§ 7501–7507.[18] An informative discussion of the need for the legislation, with references to several reports by GAO and the Joint Financial Management Improvement Program, may be found in the report of the House Committee on Government Operations, H.R. Rep. No. 708, 98th Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3955.

[18]For an early review of the law's implementation, see Single Audit Act: Single Audit Quality Has Improved but Some Implementation Problems Remain, GAO/AFMD-89-72 (July 1989).

As a general proposition, a state or local government which receives at least $100,000 in federal financial assistance[19] in any fiscal year must have an audit, of the type prescribed in the statute, performed for that fiscal year by an independent auditor. The requirement differs if federal financial assistance is less than $100,000. 31 U.S.C. §§ 7502(a)(1) and (c). Audits are to be conducted annually. However, biennial audits are permissible if the grantee has, prior to January 1, 1987, so provided in its constitution or statutes. Id. § 7502(b). The audit is to be conducted "in accordance with generally accepted government auditing standards." Id. § 7502(c). These standards are found in GAO's publication Government Auditing Standards (1988), informally known as GAO's "yellow book." The Office of Management and Budget, in consultation with GAO, is required to prescribe "policies, procedures, and guidelines" to implement the Single Audit Act. 31 U.S.C. § 7505(a). These are found in OMB Circular No. A-128, Audits of State and Local Governments (1985).

The audit may be a single comprehensive audit covering the entire state or local government or a series of audits of individual agencies, and may be limited to those agencies which actually received or administered federal financial assistance. 31 U.S.C. §§ 7502(d)(1), (d)(6).

The audit required by the Single Audit Act is essentially a financial and compliance audit and does not include "economy and efficiency audits, program results audits, or program evaluations." Id. § 7502(c).[20] The statute prescribes the major components of the audit:

- Determinations that the grantee's financial statements fairly present its financial position and the results of its financial operations, and that it has complied with laws and regulations that may materially affect its financial statements.
- Evaluation of the recipient's internal control systems.

[19]While we have framed our discussion in terms of grants, "federal financial assistance" for purposes of the Single Audit Act includes "grants, contracts, loans, loan guarantees, property, cooperative agreements, interest subsidies, insurance, or direct appropriations," but excludes direct federal cash assistance to individuals. 31 U.S.C. § 7501(4).

[20]The different types of government audits are described in GAO's Government Auditing Standards, Chapter 2.

Loss of a replenishment check before it reaches the cashier is not a situation requiring relief of the cashier. The proper procedure in such a situation is to report the loss to the disbursing office which issued the check to obtain a replacement. B-203025, October 30, 1981.

If in the government's interests, a checking account may be set up in a private bank for imprest fund disbursements as long as adequate control procedures are developed. B-117566, April 29, 1959. Use of depositary accounts must be approved by the agency head or designee, is authorized only for cash withdrawal transactions, and should be limited to situations in which there is "strong justification." I TFM § 4-3040.60. The account may be interest-bearing, in which event any interest earned must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Id.

The method of imprest fund accountability changed starting with fiscal year 1985. Prior to that time, funds advanced to cashiers by Treasury disbursing officers were not "charged" to the agency's appropriations at the time of the advance but were carried on the disbursing officers' records of accountability. The cashiers were regarded as agents of the disbursing officers. In fact, it was common to refer to cashiers as "agent cashiers." E.g., A-89775, March 21, 1945. Charges were made to the applicable appropriation or fund accounts only when replenishment checks were issued. Relief requests had to be submitted through the Treasury's Chief Disbursing Officer.

In 1983, the Treasury Department proposed removing imprest fund advances from the disbursing officers' accountability inasmuch as the transactions were beyond the disbursing officers' control. GAO concurred. B-212819-O.M., May 25, 1984. The current procedures are discussed in 70 Comp. Gen. 481 (1991). In brief, the charge to the agency's appropriation is now made at the time of the initial advance. However, since the advance does not qualify as an obligation under 31 U.S.C. § 1501, the charge must be in the form of a "commitment" or "reservation." In general, the actual obligation occurs when the advance is used and the cashier seeks replenishment. The preliminary charge is necessary to protect against violating the Antideficiency Act. Except for certain procedural matters (relief requests are no longer processed through the applicable disbursing officer), the changes have no effect on the cashier's liability as an accountable officer.

- Compliance with laws and regulations that may have a material effect upon applicable major federal assistance programs. This includes the testing of a representative number of transactions from each major program. ("Major" programs are determined under criteria specified in 31 U.S.C. § 7501(12).)

31 U.S.C. § 7502(d)(2)–(d)(4); H.R. Rep. No. 708 at 10, reprinted in 1984 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3964. The state or local government must submit to the appropriate federal officials a plan for corrective action to address any material noncompliance with applicable laws and regulations or material weakness in internal controls uncovered by the audit. 31 U.S.C. § 7502(g).

The "single audit" replaces financial or financial and compliance audits which state or local governments are required to conduct under various program statutes. 31 U.S.C. § 7503(a). Thus, for example, absent a statutory exception to the Single Audit Act, the Environmental Protection Agency is not authorized to require a state to provide a separate financial or financial and compliance audit of its water pollution revolving fund in addition to the "single audit." B-241096, January 30, 1991 (internal memorandum). However, the Act does not limit the authority of any federal agency to conduct additional audits or evaluations authorized by federal law or regulation, including economy/efficiency and program audits. 31 U.S.C. §§ 7503(c), (e).

The cost of a single audit is to be shared by the state or local government and the federal government, generally in the same proportion that federal financial assistance bears to the recipient's total expenditures for the fiscal year(s) covered by the audit. 31 U.S.C. § 7505(b); OMB Circular No. A-128, § 16. The federal government's share, determined under this formula, becomes an allowable cost to the relevant programs. Federal agencies which conduct additional audits or evaluations as authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 7503(c) are responsible for their funding. Id. § 7503(e).

The law also directs the Comptroller General to monitor provisions in bills and resolutions reported by committees of the Senate and House of Representatives that require financial or financial and compliance audits, and to report to appropriate congressional committees any such provisions which are inconsistent with the Single Audit Act. 31 U.S.C. § 7506.

As noted above, the Single Audit Act applies only to state and local governments. The need for reliable and comprehensive auditing, however, applies equally to all grantees. In recognition of this, the Office of Management and Budget issued OMB Circular No. A-133, Audits of Institutions of Higher Education and Other Nonprofit Institutions (1990), which establishes auditing requirements for nonprofits similar to those of the Single Audit Act. Regardless of the identity of the grantee, whether a governmental organization or a nonprofit institution, sound auditing practices of the type envisioned by the Single Audit Act and the OMB Circulars are indispensable to assuring the efficient use of audit resources and to improving the financial management of federal assistance programs. See, e.g., GAO report Promoting Democracy: National Endowment for Democracy's Management of Grants Needs Improvement, GAO/NSIAD-91-162 (March 1991).

D. Funds in Hands of Grantee: Status and Application of Appropriation Restrictions

Expenditures by grantees for grant purposes are not subject to all of the same restrictions and limitations imposed on direct expenditures by the federal government. For this reason, grant funds in the hands of a grantee have been said to largely lose their character and identity as federal funds. The Comptroller General has stated the principle as follows:

> "It consistently has been held with reference to Federal grant funds that, when such funds are granted to and accepted by the grantee, the expenditure of such funds by the grantee for the purposes and objects for which made [is] not subject to the various restrictions and limitations imposed by Federal statute or our decisions with respect to the expenditure, by Federal departments and establishments, of appropriated moneys in the absence of a condition of the grant specifically providing to the contrary." 43 Comp. Gen. 697, 699 (1964).

Thus, except as otherwise provided in the program statute, regulations, or the grant agreement, the expenditure of grant funds by a state government grantee is subject to the applicable laws of that state rather than federal laws applicable to direct expenditures by federal agencies. 16 Comp. Gen. 948 (1937). The rule applies "with equal if not greater force" when the grantee is another sovereign nation. B-80351, September 30, 1948.

This does not mean that an agency can circumvent a statutory restriction by making a grant to do something it could not do directly. What it does mean is that when an agency makes a grant for a valid grant purpose, the grantee has a measure of discretion in choosing the means to implement the grant, subject to applicable statutes, regulations, and the terms of the grant agreement. In exercising that discretion, restrictions that would apply to direct expenditures by the grantor agency do not necessarily apply to the grantee. Of course, the expenditure must be for an otherwise valid grant purpose and must not be prohibited by the terms of the grant agreement.

One group of cases[21] involves restrictions on employee compensation and related payments. Examples are:

- Provision in Labor-Federal Security Appropriation Act, 1948, prohibiting use of federal funds to pay salaries of persons engaging in a strike against the United States Government, did not apply to funds granted to states to assist in enforcing Fair Labor Standards Act and Walsh-Healey Public Contracts Act. The funds were not "salaries" as such; they were grant funds to reimburse states for services of state employees, and therefore were state rather than federal funds. 28 Comp. Gen. 54 (1948). See also 39 Comp. Gen. 873 (1960).
- Requirement for specific authorizing legislation to use public funds to pay employer contributions for federal employees' health and life insurance benefits does not apply to use of federal grant funds to contribute to state group health and life insurance programs for state employees. 36 Comp. Gen. 221 (1956).
- Restrictions on retired pay not applicable to retired military officer working on grant-funded state project. 14 Comp. Gen. 916 (1935), modified on other grounds by 36 Comp. Gen. 84 (1956).
- Federal restrictions on dual compensation for federal employees are inapplicable to grantee employees. B-153417, February 17, 1964.

The rule has been applied in a variety of other contexts as well. One example is the area of state and local taxes. Thus, federal immunity from payment of certain sales taxes does not apply to a state grantee since the grantee is not a federal agent. The grant funds lose their federal character and become state funds. Therefore, the state grantee may pay a state sales tax on purchases made with federal grant funds if the tax applies equally to purchases made from all nonfederal funds. 37 Comp. Gen. 85 (1957). See also B-177215, November 30, 1972, applying the same reasoning for purchases made by a contractor who [21]Some of the decisions cited may involve statutory restrictions on federal expenditures which have been changed or repealed since the decisions were issued. The cases are cited solely to illustrate the application of the grant rule and thus remain valid to that extent.

was funded by a federal grantee. Similarly, a state tax on the income of a person paid from federal grant funds involves no question of federal tax immunity. 14 Comp. Gen. 869 (1935).

The following is a sampling of other restrictions which have been found inapplicable to grantee expenditures:

- Adequacy of Appropriations Act (41 U.S.C. § 11) and prohibition on entering into contracts for construction or repair of public buildings, or other public improvements, in excess of amount specifically appropriated for that purpose (41 U.S.C. § 12). B-173589, September 30, 1971.
- Prohibition in 31 U.S.C. § 1343 on purchasing aircraft without specific statutory authority. 43 Comp. Gen. 697 (1964) (permissible for grantee under National Science Foundation research grant). See also B-196690, March 14, 1980 (purchase of motor vehicles). However, an agency may not acquire excess aircraft or passenger vehicles by transfer for use by its grantees. 55 Comp. Gen. 348 (1975).
- Prohibition in 31 U.S.C. § 1345 on payment of nonfederal persons' travel and lodging expenses to attend a meeting. 55 Comp. Gen. 750 (1976).
- Requirement for specific authority in order to establish a revolving fund. (Federal agency would need specific authority in view of 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b)). 44 Comp. Gen. 87 (1964).
- A grantee's entertainment expenses may be allowable if incurred in furtherance of grant purposes and if not otherwise prohibited by statute, regulation, or the grant agreement. 64 Comp. Gen. 582, 587 (1985); B-196690, March 14, 1980; B-187150, October 14, 1976. Having said this, however, it should be the rare occasion when entertainment expenses are in fact allowable, assuming agencies follow the Office of Management and Budget's instructions to treat them as unallowable. (See OMB Circulars A-21, A-87, A-122.)

Where assistance funds are provided to the District of Columbia under a program of assistance to the states which defines "state" as including the District of Columbia, statutory restrictions expressly applicable to the District of Columbia remain applicable with respect to the assistance funds even though they would not necessarily apply to the assistance funds in the hands of the other states. 34 Comp. Gen. 593 (1955); 17 Comp. Gen. 424 (1937); A-90515, December 23, 1937.

When applying the general proposition that grantee expenditures are not subject to the same restrictions as direct federal expenditures, it is important to keep in mind that grantees are obligated upon acceptance of grant funds to spend them for the purposes and objectives of the grant, subject to any statutory or special conditions imposed on the use of assistance funds. See, e.g., 42 Comp. Gen. 682 (1963); 2 Comp. Gen. 684 (1923). These conditions may include implied requirements, such as the implied requirement of the "basic principles" of open and competitive bidding in the case of grantee contracts. 55 Comp. Gen. 390 (1975). They also include statutorily authorized requirements, as in the case of the Office of Personnel Management's authority to establish merit standards for grantees under 42 U.S.C. § 4728(b) (Intergovernmental Personnel Act of 1970). Statutory restrictions on lobbying with public funds may also apply to grantee expenditures.

In addition, several federal statutes prohibit various types of discrimination.[22] Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. § 2000d) prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national origin under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance. The Rehabilitation Act of 1973, as amended in 1978 (29 U.S.C. § 794), similarly prohibits discrimination against handicapped individuals. The Age Discrimination Act of 1975 extends the prohibition to discrimination on the basis of age (42 U.S.C. § 6102).

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 (20 U.S.C. § 1681) prohibits sex discrimination under certain education programs, and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. § 2000e-2) would prohibit employment discrimination by grantees on the basis of sex as well as race, color, religion, or national origin. In addition, several block grant statutes contain their own anti-discrimination provisions and include sex discrimination. As of the date of this publication, however, the editors have found no general statutory prohibition against sex discrimination in the awarding of federal assistance funds. (The extent to which the equal protection clause of the Constitution might come into play is a question left to the courts.)

[22]For a detailed Justice Department opinion on the applicability of the major anti-discrimination statutes to federal assistance funds, with particular emphasis on block grants, see 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 83 (1982).

Statements in some of the cases to the effect that grant funds upon being paid over to the grantee are no longer federal funds should not be taken out of context. The fact that grant funds in the hands of a grantee are no longer viewed as federal funds for certain purposes does not mean that they lose their character as federal funds for all purposes. It has been held that the government retains a "property interest" in grant funds until they are actually spent by the grantee for authorized purposes. This property interest may take the form of an "equitable lien," stemming from the government's right to ensure that the funds are used only for authorized purposes, or a "reversionary interest" (funds that can no longer be used for grant purposes revert to the government). By virtue of this property interest, the funds—and property purchased with those funds to the extent unrestricted title has not vested in the grantee—are not subject to judicial process without the government's consent. E.g., Henry v. First National Bank of Clarksdale, 595 F.2d 291, 308–09 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 1074.

The concept is illustrated in two cases from the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. In Palmiter v. Action, Inc., 733 F.2d 1244 (7th Cir. 1984), the court rejected the argument that grant funds lose their federal character when placed in the grantee's bank account, and held that federal grant funds in the hands of a grantee are not subject to garnishment to satisfy a debt of the grantee. The holding would presumably not apply where the grantee had actually spent its own money and the federal funds were paid over as reimbursement. Id. at 1249. More recently, the court considered a similar issue in the context of a bankruptcy petition filed by a grantee under Chapter 7 of the Bankruptcy Code. The issue was whether grant funds in the hands of the grantee, as well as personal property purchased with grant money, were assets of the bankrupt and therefore subject to the control of the trustee in bankruptcy. Directing the trustee to abandon the assets, the court held that they remained the property of the federal government. In the course of reaching this result, the court noted that unpaid creditors of the bankrupt could, to the extent their claims were within the scope of the grant, be paid by the grantor agency out of the recovered funds. In re Joliet-Will County Community Action Agency, 847 F.2d 430 (7th Cir. 1988).

A case discussing both Palmiter and Joliet-Will, and reaching a similar result, is In re Southwest Citizens' Organization for Poverty Elimination, 91 Bankr. 278 (Bankr. D.N.J. 1988). A grantee, which had purchased a number of motor vehicles with Head Start grant funds, filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition. The Department of Health and Human Services sought turnover of the property, contending that the bankrupt's title was subject to the government's right to require transfer to another grantee under the program legislation and regulations. The trustee argued that the motor vehicles were property of the bankruptcy estate, and that the trustee's interest superseded any interest of the government. After a detailed review of precedent, the court directed turnover of the vehicles, concluding that the government's rights amounted to a reversionary interest.

Another theory occasionally encountered but which appears to have received little in-depth discussion is the trust theory—that a grantee holds grant funds, and property purchased with those funds, in the capacity of a trustee. In Joliet-Will, for example, the court found that the grantee was essentially "a trustee, custodian, or other intermediary, who . . . is merely an agent for the disbursal of funds belonging to another," and that the grantee's "ownership" was nominal, like that of a trustee. 847 F.2d at 432. The trust concept finds support in an early Supreme Court decision, Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U.S. 223 (1900), a land grant case in which the Court discussed the grant in trust terms. Id. at 243, 249. Some agencies have incorporated the trust concept in their program regulations. Examples are cited in B-239907, July 10, 1991 (Economic Development Administration), and United States v. Rowen, 594 F.2d 98, 100 (5th Cir. 1979) (former Department of Health, Education, and Welfare). See also 64 Comp. Gen. 103, 106 (1984).

A final area in which grant funds in the hands of a grantee continue to be treated as federal funds is the application of federal criminal statutes dealing with theft of money or property belonging to the United States. There are numerous cases in which the courts have applied various provisions of the Criminal Code, such as 18 U.S.C. § 641, to the theft or embezzlement of grant funds or grant property in the hands of grantees. Examples involving a variety of grant programs are Hayle v. United States, 815 F.2d 879 (2d Cir. 1987); United States v. Harris, 729 F.2d 441 (7th Cir. 1984); United States v. Hamilton, 726 F.2d 317 (7th Cir. 1984); United States v. Montoya, 716 F.2d 1340 (10th Cir. 1983); United States v. Smith, 596 F.2d 662 (5th Cir. 1979); United States v. Rowen, 594 F.2d 98 (5th Cir. 1979).

In each of these cases, the court rejected the argument that the statute did not apply because the funds or property were no longer federal funds or property. It makes no difference whether the funds are paid to the grantee in advance or by reimbursement (Montoya, 716 F.2d at 1344), or that the funds may have been commingled with nonfederal funds (Hayle, 815 F.2d at 882). The holdings are based on the continuing responsibility of the federal government to oversee the use of the funds. E.g., Hayle, 815 F.2d at 882; Hamilton, 726 F.2d at 321. The result would presumably be different in the case of grant funds paid over outright with no continuing federal oversight or supervision. E.g., Smith, 596 F.2d at 664.

E. Grant Funding

1. Advances of Grant/Assistance Funds

The statutory prohibition on the advance payment of public funds, 31 U.S.C. § 3324, does not apply to grants. Since assistance awards are made to assist authorized recipients and are not primarily for the purpose of obtaining goods or services for the government, the policy behind the advance payment prohibition has much less force in the case of assistance awards than in the case of procurement contracts. Accordingly, it has been held that 31 U.S.C. § 3324 does not preclude advance funding in authorized grant relationships. Unless restricted by the program legislation or the applicable appropriation, the authority to make grants is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of 31 U.S.C. § 3324. 60 Comp. Gen. 208 (1981); 59 Comp. Gen. 424 (1980); 41 Comp. Gen. 394 (1961). As stated in 60 Comp. Gen. at 209, "[t]he policy of payment upon receipt of goods or services is simply inconsistent with assistance relationships where the Government does not receive anything in the usual sense."

This does not mean that there can never be an advance payment problem in a grant case. Two cases involving violations—56 Comp. Gen. 567 (1977) and B-159715, August 18, 1972—are discussed in Chapter 5. Also, since the authority to advance funds must, at least in a general sense, be founded on the program legislation, advance payments would probably not be authorized under an assistance program that provided for payment by reimbursement.

2. Cash Management Concerns and Requirements

One problem with the advance funding of assistance awards is that the recipient may draw down funds before they are actually needed. This is a matter of concern for several reasons. For one thing, advances under an assistance program are intended to accomplish the program purposes and not to profit the recipient other than in the manner and to the extent specified in the program.

But there is another reason. When money is drawn from the Treasury before it is needed, or in excess of current needs, the government loses the use of the money. The principle was expressed as follows in B-146285, October 2, 1973:

> "When Federal receipts are insufficient to meet expenditures, the difference is obtained through borrowing; when receipts exceed expenditures, outstanding debt can be reduced. Thus, advancing funds to organizations outside the Government before they are needed either unnecessarily increases borrowings or decreases the opportunity to reduce the debt level and thereby increases interest costs to the Federal Government."

Thus, premature drawdown not only profits the recipient, but does so at the expense of the rest of the taxpayers. GAO has made the same point in several reports, such as Improving Medicaid Cash Management Will Reduce Federal Interest Costs, HRD-81-94 (May 29, 1981), and Better Cash Management Can Reduce the Cost of the National Direct Student Loan Program, FGMSD-80-5 (November 27, 1979).[23]

Congress has recognized these concerns in several ways, one of which was the October 1990 enactment of section 4 of the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-453, 104 Stat. 1058, 31 U.S.C. § 3335. This legislation requires executive agencies to provide for the "timely disbursement" of federal funds in accordance with Treasury Department regulations.

If an agency's failure to comply with Treasury disbursement regulations results in increased cost to the General Fund of the Treasury (for example, increased interest expenses resulting from increased borrowing needs), the Secretary of the Treasury may collect this amount from the offending agency for credit as miscellaneous

[23]This principle is not limited to premature drawdown but applies equally to other types of premature or excess payments. E.g., GAO report entitled Unnecessary Interest Costs Incurred by the Government Because of Excess Progress Payments to Contractors (B-118662, March 22, 1965).

receipts. 31 U.S.C. §§ 3335(b) and (c). The legislative history stresses that this penalty authority is to be "restricted to cases of egregious or repeated noncompliance, and [not to] be used in a routine manner to finance interest costs incurred by the Federal Government." H.R. Rep. No. 696, 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1990).

If an agency could pay its noncompliance penalty to the Treasury simply by reducing awards under its assistance programs, the penalty would effectively "cost" the agency nothing, the program beneficiaries would suffer, and little would be accomplished. The legislation addresses this by requiring that penalties be paid from administrative rather than program appropriations, "to the maximum extent practicable." 31 U.S.C. § 3335(d); H.R. Rep. No. 696 at 7.

Regulations applicable to all assistance recipients are found in Treasury Department Circular No. 1075 (31 C.F.R. Part 205) and pertinent Office of Management and Budget circulars. The essence of the government's policy is stated in 31 C.F.R. § 205.4(a):

"Cash advances to a recipient organization shall be limited to the minimum amounts needed and shall be timed to be in accord only with the actual, immediate cash requirements of the recipient organization in carrying out the purpose of the approved program or project. The timing and amount of cash advances shall be as close as is administratively feasible to the actual disbursements by the recipient organization for direct program costs and the proportionate share of any allowable indirect costs."

Thus, it is within the discretion of the Social Security Administration to determine that a period of 15 months between drawdown and disbursement for state employee retirement contributions is excessive, and to make an appropriate disallowance. B-244617, December 24, 1991. The requirement to minimize the time elapsing between transfer of funds to the recipient and disbursement by the recipient is also stated in OMB Circulars A-102 (para. 7a) and A-110 (Attachment I, para. 1). It is also reflected in the Common Rule §§___.20(b)(7) and ___.21(b), 53 Fed. Reg. 8091.

Until the Cash Management Improvement Act is fully implemented, current Treasury regulations provide that, if annual advances to a grantee total less than $120,000, or there is no continuing grantor-grantee relationship for at least one year, advances are made by direct Treasury check scheduled to make funds available only immediately prior to grantee disbursement. 31 C.F.R. § 205.4(c).

An alternative approach to managing imprest funds is the "third-party draft" procedure described in I TFM § 4-3040.70. In brief, an agency may, with written approval from its Treasury Financial Center, retain a contractor to provide the agency with payment instruments, not to exceed a face value of $1,000 each, drawn on the contractor's account. The agency then uses these drafts for its imprest fund transactions, and reimburses the contractor for properly payable drafts which the contractor has paid. Since the funds being disbursed from the imprest fund under this system are not government funds, personal liability does not attach to the cashier. Id.; GAO Policy and Procedures Manual, title 7, § 6.8.B.

(2) Flash rolls

Law enforcement officers on undercover assignments frequently need a supply of cash to support their operations, for example, to purchase contraband or to use as a gambling stake. This money, often advanced from an imprest fund, is called a "flash roll." By the very nature of the activities involved, flash roll money is at high risk to begin with.

It is clear that a flash roll in the hands of a law enforcement agent retains its status as government funds. Garcia v. United States, 469 U.S. 70 (1984) (flash roll held to be money of the United States for purposes of 18 U.S.C. § 2114, which makes it a criminal offense to assault a custodian of government money). However, flash roll money will be accountable in some situations and nonaccountable in others, depending on the nature of the loss. If the loss is within the risk inherent in the operation, such as the suspect absconding with the money, it is not viewed as an "accountable officer" loss but may be handled internally by the agency. If the agency, under its internal investigation procedures, finds the agent with custody of the funds to have been negligent, it should hold the agent liable to the extent provided in its regulations. Otherwise, it may simply record the loss as a necessary expense against the appropriation which financed the operation. If, on the other hand, the loss occurs in the course of the operation but is unrelated to carrying out its purpose, the accountable officer laws apply. The decision first recognizing this distinction is 61 Comp. Gen. 313 (1982), applying it in the context of Drug Enforcement Administration undercover operations.[8] [8]Prior decisions, such as B-192010, August 14, 1978, which had treated all flash roll losses as accountable officer losses, were modified accordingly. 61 Comp. Gen. at 316.

If annual advances aggregate $120,000 or more and the relationship is expected to continue for at least one year, advances are made by "letter of credit." 31 C.F.R. § 205.4(b). A letter of credit is an instrument (Standard Form 1193A) executed by an authorized certifying officer of the grantor agency permitting a grantee to draw funds needed for immediate disbursement. A letter of credit is irrevocable and is the equivalent of cash "to the extent the recipient organization has obligated funds in good faith thereunder in executing the authorized Federal program in accordance with the grant, contract, or other agreement." 31 C.F.R. § 205.5. The Treasury Department's letter of credit procedures are found in the Treasury Financial Manual, Vol. I, Part 6, Chapters 2000 and 2500. Disbursements under most letters of credit are made by electronic fund transfer to a financial institution designated by the recipient organization.

If a recipient is unwilling or unable to establish procedures to minimize the gap between drawdown and disbursement, advance funding may be terminated and payments made only on a reimbursement basis. 31 C.F.R. § 205.7.

In Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 854 F.2d 40 (4th Cir. 1988), the plaintiff state argued that it should receive its entire annual Social Services Block Grant allotment at once at the beginning of the fiscal year. The court disagreed, upholding quarterly apportionment by the Office of Management and Budget under 31 U.S.C. § 1512.

3. Interest on Grant Advances

a. In General

The Comptroller General has consistently held that except as otherwise provided by law, interest earned by a grantee on funds advanced by the United States under an assistance agreement pending their application to grant purposes, belongs to the United States rather than to the grantee. All such interest is required to be accounted for as funds of the United States, and must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts under 31 U.S.C. § 3302(b). 71 Comp. Gen. 387 (1992); 69 Comp. Gen. 660 (1990); 42 Comp. Gen. 289 (1962); 40 Comp. Gen. 81 (1960); B-203681, September 27, 1982; B-192459, July 1, 1980; B-149441, April 16, 1976; B-173240,

REV_00257596

August 30, 1973. See also Common Rule §___.21(i), 53 Fed. Reg. 8091. If the grantee is unable to document the actual amount of interest earned on the grant advances, the grantor agency should use the "Treasury tax and loan account" rate prescribed by 31 U.S.C. § 3717 for debts owed to the United States. 69 Comp. Gen. 660 (1990).

Except for states, discussed separately later, the rule applies whether the grantee is a public or private agency. The rationale for the rule is that unless expressly provided otherwise, funds are paid out to a grantee to accomplish the grant purposes, not for the grantee to invest the money and earn interest at the expense of the Treasury. Thus, funds paid out to a grantee are not to be held, but are to be applied promptly to the grant purposes. 1 Comp. Gen. 652 (1922).

In 40 Comp. Gen. 81 (1960), the Comptroller General held that interest on foreign currencies advanced by the Department of Agriculture under cooperative agreements, earned between the time the funds were advanced and the time they were used, could not be retained for program purposes but had to be returned to the Treasury for deposit as miscellaneous receipts.

In 42 Comp. Gen. 289 (1962), the rule was applied with respect to State Department grants to American-sponsored schools and libraries overseas. The Comptroller General stated, "[t]here can be no doubt that only the Congress is legally empowered to give away the property or money of the United States." Id. at 293. The decision further concluded that the enabling legislation did not provide sufficient authority to use the grant funds to establish a permanent interest-bearing endowment fund. In B-149441, February 17, 1987, GAO found that since the National Endowment for the Humanities had no authority in its program legislation to permit its grantees to establish an endowment fund with grant moneys, it could not authorize its grantees to accomplish the same purpose with matching funds.

Citing both 42 Comp. Gen. 289 and B-149441, the Comptroller General held in 70 Comp. Gen. 413 (1991) that legislative authority would be required for a proposal whereby the United States Information Agency would purchase discounted foreign debt from commercial lenders and transfer the notes to grantees in the foreign country, who would in turn exchange the notes for local currency or local currency denominated bonds and use the income for program activities. However, since USIA has statutory authority to accept conditional gifts, it could accept a donation of foreign debt and use the principal and income for authorized activities in accordance with the conditions specified.

Once grant funds are applied by the grantee to the accomplishment of the purpose of the grant, the rule no longer applies. Thus, in B-230735, July 20, 1988, where use of grant funds to establish an endowment trust was authorized by law, GAO concluded that the grantee could use income from the endowment as nonfederal matching funds on other grants, as long as such use was consistent with the terms and conditions of the grant agreement.

In B-192459, July 1, 1980, a grantee transferred grant funds to a trustee under a complex construction financing arrangement. The trustee was independent rather than an agent of the grantee and the grantee could not get the funds back upon demand. GAO determined that the transfer to the trustee was in the nature of a disbursement for grant purposes. Therefore, interest earned by the trustee after the transfer could be treated as grant income and retained under the terms of the grant agreement. However, interest on grant funds placed in bank accounts and certificates of deposit by the grantee prior to transfer had to be returned to the Treasury. The grantor agency lacked the authority to permit the grantee to retain interest earned on grant funds prior to their application to grant purposes.

In 64 Comp. Gen. 103 (1984), the Agency for International Development advanced grant funds to the government of Egypt, which in turn advanced them to certain local and provincial elements of that government. Since the purpose of the grant was to assist Egypt in its efforts to decentralize certain governmental functions by developing experience at the local level in managing and financing selected projects, GAO concluded that the advances of funds by the government of Egypt to the local and provincial entities could legitimately be viewed as disbursements for grant purposes. Thus, the subgrantees could retain interest earned on those advances. However, in another 1984 case also involving the Agency for International Development, GAO found that subgrantees could not retain interest on funds advanced to them by the recipient under a cooperative agreement whose purpose was to help develop certain technologies, where the funds had been advanced prior to any legitimate program need. 64 Comp. Gen. 96 (1984). Both decisions followed the approach set forth in B-192459, summarized above.

In evaluating the disposition of interest income, an important determinant is whether the interest was earned before or after the grant funds were applied to authorized grant purposes. The key word here is "authorized." For example, under the Community Development Block Grant program, grantees may use the funds to make loans for certain community projects. Grantees may retain interest earned on those loans as a type of "program income." However, if a loan is later found to be ineligible under the program, the funds were never used for an authorized grant purpose, and interest earned by the grantee must be paid over to the United States for deposit as miscellaneous receipts. 71 Comp. Gen. 387 (1992).

Congress can, of course, legislatively make exceptions to the rule, by providing assistance in the form of an unconditional gift or by other appropriate statutory provisions. See, e.g., 44 Comp. Gen. 179 (1964) (provision in appropriation act exempting educational institutions from liability for interest under certain Public Health Service Act grants); B-175155, June 11, 1975 (interest rule not applicable with respect to "grants" to Amtrak); B-202116-O.M., February 12, 1985 (Legal Services Corporation grantees).[24]

b. Grants to State Governments

Prior to 1968, the prohibition on retention of interest income applied to states as well as to other grantees. 20 Comp. Gen. 610 (1941); 3 Comp. Gen. 956 (1924); 26 Comp. Dec. 505 (1919); 24 Comp. Dec. 403 (1918); A-46031, January 16, 1933. There was no reason to draw a distinction. This, of course, was premised on the absence of any statutory guidance.

The treatment of interest on grant advances to state governments is now governed by the so-called Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968 (IGCA), as amended, 31 U.S.C. Chapter 65. The law evolved in two stages. The original IGCA created what was to be, for 22 years, the major exception to the rule that interest on grant advances belongs to the United States. The law first codified the requirement for agencies to schedule the transfer of grant funds so as to minimize [24]A conceptually related case is 71 Comp. Gen. 310 (1992), upholding a Small Business Administration regulation providing for a reasonable profit to grantees under the Small Business Innovation Development Act.

the time elapsing between transfer and grantee disbursement.[25] It then provided: "A State is not accountable for interest earned on grant money pending its disbursement for program purposes." 31 U.S.C. § 6503(a) (1988).

The theory behind the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act was to control the release of grant funds and thereby preclude situations from arising in which state grantees would be in a position to earn excessive interest on grant advances. If funds were properly released, interest the state might earn would be too small to be a matter of concern. The statutory exception was not intended to create a windfall for state grantees. The situation did not prove satisfactory, however. Grantor agencies complained of premature drawdown of grant advances; states complained of slow federal payment in reimbursement situations. Congress responded by amending the IGCA by section 5 of the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1990 (CMIA), Pub. L. No. 101-453, 104 Stat. 1058, 1059.

The revised 31 U.S.C. § 6503 retains the general requirement to minimize the time elapsing between transfer of funds from the Treasury and grantee disbursement for program purposes. Id. § 6503(a). It then requires the Secretary of the Treasury to enter into an agreement with each state which receives federal grant funds prescribing fund transfer methods and procedures, as chosen by the state and approved by the Secretary. Id. § 6503(b). If an agreement cannot be reached with a particular state, the Secretary is authorized to establish procedures for that state by regulation. Id. § 6503(b)(3).

For advance payment programs, unless inconsistent with program purposes, the state must pay interest to the United States from the time the funds are transferred to the state's account to the time they are paid out by the state for program purposes. Interest payments are to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Id. § 6503(c). For reimbursement situations, the United States must pay interest to the state from the time of payout by the state to the time the federal funds are deposited in the state's bank account. The law includes a permanent, indefinite appropriation from the general fund [25]In B-146285, April 10, 1978, GAO concluded that this provision did not repeal by implication a statute which prescribed both the timing schedule and the amount of payments under a particular assistance program, but rather was geared primarily to programs without statutory payment schedules.

of the Treasury for this purpose. Id. § 6503(d). Interest in both directions is to be paid annually, at a rate based on the yield of 13-week Treasury bills, using offset to the extent provided in Treasury regulations. Id. §§ 6503(c), (d), and (i). The interest provisions of the CMIA take effect during the second half of 1993. Pub. L. No. 101-453, § 5(e), as amended by Pub. L. No. 102-589, § 2 (1992).

The original IGCA applied only to states and their agencies or "instrumentalities." It did not extend to governments of "political subdivisions" of states such as cities, towns, counties, or special districts created by state law. The CMIA revision applies to "an agency, instrumentality, or fiscal agent" of a state, including territories and the District of Columbia, but retains the exclusion for "a local government of a State." 31 U.S.C. § 6501(9), amended by CMIA § 5(a), 104 Stat. at 1059. Thus, decisions under the 1968 law should remain relevant in determining which entities and situations are now covered by the CMIA and which remain subject to the decisional rules.

In 56 Comp. Gen. 353 (1977), the Comptroller General considered the basis for determining which state entities were covered by the IGCA, concluding as follows:

> "[A] Federal grantor agency is not required by the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act of 1968 and its legislative history to accept the Bureau of the Census' classification of an entity . . . in determining whether that entity is a State agency or instrumentality or a political subdivision of the State. It is bound by the classification of the entity in State law. Only in the absence of a clear indication of the status of the entity in State law may it make its own determination based on reasonable standards, including resort to the Bureau of the Census' classifications." Id. at 357.

If the classification under state law is not clear and unambiguous, the grantee may be required to obtain a legal opinion from the state Attorney General in order to assist in making the determination. Id.

The exception for states in the 1968 IGCA was held to apply to pass-through situations where states are the primary recipients of grant funds which are then passed on to subgrantees. In B-171019, October 16, 1973, the Comptroller General concluded that the exception applied to political subdivisions which were subgrantees of states. The Justice Department reached the same conclusion in 6 Op. Off. Legal Counsel 127 (1982). Subsequent decisions applied the exception to nongovernmental subgrantees as well, recognizing that there was no basis to distinguish between governmental and nongovernmental subgrantees. 59 Comp. Gen. 218 (1980), aff'd, B-196794, February 24, 1981.

The authority of a state to require its own grantees to account to it for funds it makes available to them is a matter within the discretion of the state. See B-196794, January 28, 1983 (non-decision letter).

Other cases under the pre-CMIA version of the IGCA may remain relevant as well. For example, the statute does not necessarily apply to funds in contexts other than those specified. Thus, in 62 Comp. Gen. 701 (1983), the Comptroller General concluded that a subgrantee under a Labor Department grant to a state was not entitled to retain interest it had earned by investing funds received from the Internal Revenue Service as a refund of Federal Insurance Contributions Act (social security) taxes. In North Carolina v. Heckler, 584 F. Supp. 179 (E.D.N.C. 1984), the court found the statute inapplicable in a situation where the state had wrongfully obtained federal funds and earned interest on them pending repayment to the government.

4. Program Income

Once grant funds have been applied to their grant purposes, they still can generate income, directly or indirectly, in various ways. This—as distinguished from interest on grant advances—is called "program income."

Program income may be defined as "gross income received by the grantee or subgrantee directly generated by a grant supported activity, or earned only as a result of the grant agreement during the grant period." Common Rule §___.25(b), 53 Fed. Reg. 8093. It may include such things as income from the sale of commodities, fees for services performed, and usage or rental fees. Id. §___.25(a); OMB Circular No. A-110, Attachment D. Grant generated income may also include investment income, although this will be uncommon. See B-192459, July 1, 1980.

In contrast with income earned on grant advances, program income does not automatically acquire a federal character and is not required to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. It may, unless the grant provides otherwise, be retained by the grantee for grant-related use. 44 Comp. Gen. 87 (1964); 41 Comp. Gen. 653

(1962); B-192459, July 1, 1980; B-191420, August 24, 1978. In 44 Comp. Gen. 87, the Comptroller General concluded that a grantee could establish a revolving fund with grant income in the absence of a contrary provision in the grant agreement. However the initial amount of a revolving fund established from either the principal of a grant or the income generated under the grant, when returned to the grantor agency upon completion of the grant, may not be considered a return of grant funds for further use by the grantor but must be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. B-154996, November 5, 1969.

There are three generally recognized methods for the treatment of program income:

(1) Deduction. Deduct program income from total allowable costs to determine net costs on which grantor and grantee shares will be based. This approach results in savings to the federal government because the income is used to reduce contributions rather than to increase program size.

(2) Addition. Add income to the funds committed to the project, to be used for program purposes. This approach increases program size.

(3) Cost-sharing. Use income to meet any applicable matching requirements. Under this approach, the federal contribution and program size remain the same.

Both OMB and GAO have expressed preference for the deduction method since it results in savings to the federal government and to grantees, and it is the preferred method under OMB Circular A-102, although grantor agencies have a measure of discretion. See OMB Circular A-102, para. 7.e; Supplementary Information Statement on revised circular, 53 Fed. Reg. at 8029; Common Rule §___.25(g), 53 Fed. Reg. at 8093; Supplementary Information Statement on common rule, 53 Fed. Reg. at 8038. See also GAO report entitled Improved Standards Needed for Managing and Reporting Income Generated Under Federal Assistance Programs, GAO/GGD-83-55 (July 22, 1983). (This report was issued several years prior to the revision of OMB Circular A-102 and issuance of the Common Rule).

Some types of program income are subject to special rules:

- Rules relating to proceeds from the sale of real and personal property provided by the federal government or purchased in whole or in part with federal funds are set forth in the Common Rule §§___.25(f), ___.31, and ___.32, 53 Fed. Reg. 8093–95. See also OMB Circular A-110, Attachment N.
- Royalties received as a result of copyrights or patents produced under a grant may be treated as other program income if specified in applicable agency regulations or the grant agreement. Common Rule §___.25(e), 53 Fed. Reg. 8093. See also B-186284, June 23, 1977; GAO report entitled Administration of the Science Education Project "Man: A Course of Study"(MACOS), MWD-76-26 (October 14, 1975).

5. Cost-Sharing

When the federal government chooses to provide financial assistance to some activity, it may also choose to fund the entire cost, but it is not required to do so. City of New York v. Richardson, 473 F.2d 923, 928 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 412 U.S. 950. "[T]he judgment whether to [provide assistance], and to what degree, rests with [Congress]." Id. Thus, a program statute may provide for full funding, or it may provide for "cost-sharing," that is, financing by a mix of federal and nonfederal funds. Reasons for cost-sharing range from budgetary considerations to a desire to stimulate increased activity on the part of the recipient. The two primary cost-sharing devices are "matching share" provisions and "maintenance of effort" provisions. For a detailed analysis and critique of both devices, see GAO's report Proposed Changes in Federal Matching and Maintenance of Effort Requirements for State and Local Governments, GGD-81-7 (December 23, 1980) (hereafter cited as "GGD-81-7").

Federal grant funds constitute a significant portion of the total expenditures of state and local governments. Thus, cost-sharing clearly has an impact on the relationship between the federal government and the states, and on the executive-legislative relationship at the state level. This gives rise to many interesting problems,[26] discussed in detail in GAO's report Federal Assistance System Should Be Changed to Permit Greater Involvement by State Legislatures, GGD-81-3 (December 15, 1980).

[26]For example, can a state legislature appropriate federal grant funds? State courts have split on the issue. See GGD-81-3 at 27–30.

REV_00257604

a. Local or Matching Share

(1) General principles

A matching share provision is one under which the grantee is required to contribute a portion of the total project cost. The "match" may be 50-50, or any other mix specified in the governing legislation. A matching share provision typically prescribes the percentages of required federal and nonfederal shares. However, the legislation need not provide explicitly for a nonfederal share. A statute authorizing assistance not in excess of a specified percentage of project costs will normally be interpreted as requiring a local share of nonfederal funds to make up the difference. (The rest of the money has to come from someplace.) B-214278, January 25, 1985 (construing a provision of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act authorizing water and waste disposal grants).

When a federal agency enters into an assistance agreement with an eligible recipient, an entire project or program is approved. Where a local share is required, this agreement includes an estimate of the total costs, that is, a total which will exceed the amount to be borne by the federal government. The additional contribution which is needed to supply full support for the anticipated costs is the local or nonfederal matching share. Once the agreement is accepted, the assistance recipient is committed to provide the nonfederal share if it wishes to continue with the grant. E.g., B-130515, July 20, 1973. Failure to meet this commitment may result in the disallowance of all or part of otherwise allowable federal share costs.

Matching share requirements are often intended to "assure local interest and involvement through financial participation." 59 Comp. Gen. 668, 669 (1980). They may also serve to hold down federal costs. The theory behind the typical matching share requirement may be summarized as follows:

> "In theory, the fiscal lure of Federal grants entices State and local governments into allocating new resources to satisfy the non-Federal match for programs they otherwise would not have funded on their own. While State and local jurisdictions may not be willing or able to fully fund a program from their own resources, they would most likely agree to spend new resources on the same project if most of the project costs were paid by the Federal Government."

GGD-81-7 at 9. This approach has been termed "cooperative federalism." E.g., King v. Smith, 392 U.S. 309, 316 (1968). It is also

The fact pattern in the Garcia case illustrates the nonaccountable situation. A Secret Service agent had been given a flash roll to buy counterfeit currency from suspects in Miami. The agent met the suspects in a park. One of the suspects pulled a semi-automatic pistol and demanded the money. Other Secret Service agents rushed to the scene and apprehended the suspects, one of whom was trying to run off with the money. Of course there was no loss since the money was recovered. If the second suspect had gotten away with the money, however, the loss could have been treated as an expense of the operation, without the need to seek relief for anyone. GAO decisions finding flash roll losses "nonaccountable" under the standards of 61 Comp. Gen. 313 are B-238222, February 21, 1990 (suspect stole flash roll during drug arrest); B-232253, August 12, 1988 (informant stole money provided to rent undercover apartment); and B-205426, September 16, 1982 (federal agent robbed at gunpoint while trying to purchase illegal firearms).

An example of a case which remains subject to the accountable officer laws is B-218858, July 24, 1985. A federal agent, posing as a narcotics trafficker, stopped at a telephone booth to make a call. Two women approached the booth, which did not have a door. One diverted the agent's attention while the other picked his pocket. The loss, while certainly incident to the undercover operation, was unrelated to its central purpose. Relief was granted. Other cases are:

- 64 Comp. Gen. 140 (1984) (agent set shoulder bag containing flash money on airport counter and left it unattended for several minutes while making ticket arrangements; relief denied).
- B-210507, April 4, 1983 (briefcase containing funds stolen when agent set it down in coffee shop for 15—20 seconds to remove jacket; relief granted).
- B-220492, December 10, 1985 (agent left funds in glove compartment while making phone call in high crime area; agency found him negligent).

As 64 Comp. Gen. 140 and B-210507 point out, losses which occur while flash money is being transported to the location where it is intended to be used are at best incidental to the operation and are thus governed by the accountable officer laws.

known as the "federal carrot." See City of New York v. Richardson, 473 F.2d at 928.

Matching requirements are most commonly found in the applicable program legislation. However, they may also be found in appropriation acts. E.g., 58 Comp. Gen. 524 (1979); 31 Comp. Gen. 459 (1952). A matching provision in an appropriation act, like any other provision in an appropriation act, will apply only to the fiscal year(s) covered by the act or the appropriation to which it applies, unless otherwise specified. 58 Comp. Gen. at 527.

If a program statute authorizes grants but neither provides for nor prohibits cost-sharing, the grantor agency may in some cases be able to impose a matching requirement administratively by regulation. The test is the underlying congressional intent. If legislative history indicates an intent for full federal funding, then the statute will generally be construed as requiring a 100 percent federal share. B-226572, June 25, 1987; B-169491, June 16, 1980. However, cost-sharing regulations have been regarded as valid where the statute was silent and it could reasonably be concluded that Congress left the matter to the judgment of the administering agency. B-130515, July 17, 1974; B-130515, July 20, 1973. Such regulations may be waived uniformly and prospectively, but may not be waived on a retroactive and ad hoc basis. Id.

Matching funds, as with the federal assistance funds themselves, can be used only for authorized grant purposes. B-230735, July 20, 1988; B-149441, February 17, 1987. In the latter case, GAO concluded that the National Endowment for the Humanities could not divert state matching funds to establish private endowments which, under existing authorities, could not have been created by a direct award of NEH funds. See also 42 Comp. Gen. 289, 295 (1962).

Unless otherwise specified in the governing legislation, a grantee may match only a portion of the funds potentially available to it, and thereby receive a correspondingly smaller grant. 16 Comp. Gen. 512 (1936).

Under a cost-sharing assistance program funded by advance payments of the federal contribution, the Comptroller General has held that the advances may be made prior to the disbursement of the nonfederal share as long as adequate assurances exist (e.g., by contractual commitments) that the local share will be forthcoming. 60 Comp. Gen. 208 (1981). See also 23 Comp. Gen. 652 (1944) (payment by federal agency of local share under cooperative agreement, subject to contractual agreement to reimburse).

Where the statute authorizing federal assistance specifies the federal share of an approved program as a specific percentage of the total cost, the grantor agency is required to make awards to the extent specified and has no discretion to provide a lesser (or greater) amount. Manatee County v. Train, 583 F.2d 179, 183 (5th Cir. 1978); 53 Comp. Gen. 547 (1974); B-197256, November 19, 1980. However, where the federal share is defined by statutory language which specifies a maximum federal contribution but no minimum, the agency can provide a lesser amount. 50 Comp. Gen. 553 (1971).

Although most cost-sharing programs are in terms of a fixed federal share, some programs may provide for a declining federal share. Under a declining share program in the Regional Rail Reorganization Act, GAO concluded that the federal share could be determined in the year the grant was made, notwithstanding the fact that the grantee would not actually incur the costs until the following fiscal year. B-175155, July 29, 1977. Another cost-sharing variation is the "aggregate match," in which the nonfederal share is determined by cumulating the grantee's contributions from prior time periods. An example is discussed in 58 Comp. Gen. 524 (1979).

(2) Hard and soft matches

The program statute may define or limit the types of assets which may be applied to the nonfederal share. A provision limiting the nonfederal share to cash contributions is called a "hard match." In 31 Comp. Gen. 459 (1952), the matching share was described in the appropriation act that required it as an "amount available." In the absence of legislative history to support a broader meaning, GAO concluded that the matching share must be in the form of money and that the value of other non-monetary contributions could not be considered. A more explicit "hard match" requirement is discussed in 52 Comp. Gen. 558 (1973), in which GAO concluded that the matching share, while it must be in the form of money, could include donated funds as well as grantee funds. While the program discussed in 52 Comp. Gen. 558 no longer exists, the case remains useful for this point and for the detailed review of legislative history illuminating the purpose and intent of the "hard match" provision.

The program legislation may expressly authorize the inclusion of assets other than cash in the nonfederal contribution. See 56 Comp. Gen. 645 (1977). If the legislation is silent with respect to the types of assets which may be counted, the statute will generally be construed as permitting an "in-kind" or "soft" match, that is, the matching share may include the reasonable value of property or services as well as cash. 52 Comp. Gen. 558, 560 (1973); B-81321, November 19, 1948. The valuation of in-kind contributions can get complicated. An example is 31 Comp. Gen. 672 (1952) (value of land could not include the cost or value of otherwise unallowable improvements to the land previously added by the grantee). Current valuation standards for state and local governments are found in the Common Rule, §___.24, 53 Fed. Reg. 8092.

(3) Matching one grant with funds from another

An important and logical principle is that neither the federal nor the nonfederal share of a particular grant program may be used by a grantee to match funds provided under another federal grant program, unless specifically authorized by law. In other words, a grantee may not (1) use funds received under one federal grant as the matching share under a separate grant, nor may it (2) use the same grantee dollars to meet two separate matching requirements. 56 Comp. Gen. 645 (1977); 47 Comp. Gen. 81 (1967); 32 Comp. Gen. 561 (1953); 32 Comp. Gen. 141 (1952); B-214278, January 25, 1985; B-212177, May 10, 1984; B-130515, July 20, 1973; B-229004-O.M., February 18, 1988; B-162001-O.M., August 17, 1967. See also Common Rule §___.24(b), 53 Fed. Reg. 8092. A contrary rule would largely nullify the cost-sharing objective of stimulating new grantee expenditures.[27]

Normally, exceptions to the rule are in the form of express statutory authority. A prominent example is section 105(a)(9) of the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974, 42 U.S.C. § 5305(a)(9), [27]By way of contrast, the rule that funds received under one federal grant may not, absent congressional authorization, be used to finance the local match under another federal grant, does not apply to federal loans. The reason is that loans, unlike grants, are expected to be repaid and the recipient is thus, at least ultimately, using its own funds. Of course, the proposed use of the funds must be authorized under the loan program legislation. B-207211-O.M., July 9, 1982. See also B-214278, January 25, 1985.

which authorizes community development block grant funds to be used as the nonfederal share under any other grant undertaken as part of a community development program. See 59 Comp. Gen. 668 (1980); 56 Comp. Gen. 645 (1977); B-239907, July 10, 1991. The latter opinion concluded that community development block grant regulations no longer apply once the funds have been applied as a match under another grant program, at least where applying the regulations would substantially interfere with use of the funds under the receiving grant. For other examples, see 52 Comp. Gen. 558, 564 (1973) and 32 Comp. Gen. 184 (1952).

In 59 Comp. Gen. 668, GAO considered a conflict between two statutes—the Housing and Community Development Act which, as noted, permits federal grant funds to fill a nonfederal matching requirement, and the Coastal Zone Management Act, which provides for cost-sharing grants but expressly prohibits the use of federal funds received from other sources to pay a grantee's matching share. Finding that the statutory language could not be reconciled, and noting further that there was no helpful legislative history under either statute, the Comptroller General concluded, as the most reasonable result consistent with the purposes of both statutes, that community development block grant funds were available to pay the nonfederal share of Coastal Zone Management Act grants for projects properly incorporated as part of a grantee's community development program. See also B-229004-O.M., February 18, 1988, which essentially followed 59 Comp. Gen. 668 and concluded that community development block grant funds could be used for the matching share of certain grants under the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act of 1987.

A somewhat less explicit exception is discussed in 57 Comp. Gen. 710 (1978), holding that funds distributed to states under Title II of the Public Works Employment Act of 1976, 42 U.S.C. §§ 6721–6736 (called the "countercyclical revenue sharing program"), may be applied to the states' matching share under the Medicaid program. GAO agreed with the Treasury Department that Title II payments amounted to "general budget support as opposed to categorical or block grants or contracts" (57 Comp. Gen. at 711)—a form of revenue sharing—and thus should be construed in the context of the (since repealed) General Revenue Sharing Program. General Revenue Sharing was characterized by a "no strings on local expenditures" policy, evidenced by the fact that a provision in the original legislation barring the use of funds as the nonfederal share in other federal programs had been repealed. Stressing the strong analogy between Title II and General Revenue Sharing, the decision concluded that implicit in the "no strings" policy was the authority to apply Title II funds to a state's matching share under Medicaid.

It should also be noted that where any federal assistance funds are used as nonfederal matching funds for another grant, such use must be consistent with the grant under which they were originally awarded as well as the grant they are intended to implement. 59 Comp. Gen. 668 (1980); 57 Comp. Gen. at 715; B-230735, July 20, 1988.

Funds received by a property owner from a federal agency as just compensation for property taken by eminent domain belong to the owner outright and do not constitute a "grant." Therefore, they may be used as the nonfederal share of a grant from another federal agency, even where the taking and the grant relate to the same project. B-197256, November 19, 1980.

(4) Relocation allowances

Federally assisted programs which result in the displacement of individuals and business entities may, apart from eminent domain payments, result in the payment of relocation allowances under the Uniform Relocation Assistance and Real Property Acquisition Policies Act of 1970. Under the statute, authorized relocation payments provided by a state incident to a federally assisted project which results in relocations are to be treated in the same manner as other project costs. Thus, under a program statute which provides for a 90 percent federal contribution, 90 percent of authorized relocation payments will be reimbursable as an allowable program cost. In other words, any applicable matching share requirement will apply equally to the relocation payments. B-215646, August 7, 1984.

(5) Payments by other than grantor agency

Of course there is nothing wrong with grantees receiving funds under more than one grant for which they are eligible. If the grants are administered by different agencies, each agency is making payments under its own program. Occasionally, an agency is asked to make payments not associated with any of its own assistance programs, to a grantee or grant beneficiary under some other agency's program. The cases fall into two groups.

The first situation involves services performed by an assistance beneficiary to an agency other than the grantor agency. Under the College Work-Study Program, not to exceed 70 percent of the student's salary is paid by the college under a Department of Education grant, with the remainder paid by the employer. 42 U.S.C. § 2753(b)(5). The "employer" may be another federal agency. 46 Comp. Gen. 115 (1966). In addition to the salary contribution, the employing agency may pay unreimbursed administrative costs such as social security taxes and compensation insurance. 50 Comp. Gen. 553 (1971); 46 Comp. Gen. 115. However, an agency may not, without statutory authority, participate in a work-study program authorized by state law and not coordinated with the federal program. B-159715, December 18, 1978.

The authority to pay administrative costs under the work-study program is based on the cost-sharing nature of that program. Absent cost-sharing, there is no comparable authority. 61 Comp. Gen. 242 (1982) (agency to which employee had been assigned under former Comprehensive Employment and Training Act lacked authority to reimburse grantee for retirement contributions).

The second group of cases involves projects which benefit other federal facilities. Under program legislation which does not give the grantor agency discretion to reduce the federal share, the grantor agency is not authorized to exclude from total cost a portion of an otherwise eligible project solely because that portion would provide service to another federal facility. 59 Comp. Gen. 1 (1979). Where the grantor agency has reduced its contribution because a portion of the project would serve another federal facility, the "benefited agency" normally would not be authorized to make up the shortfall without receiving additional consideration above and beyond the improved service it would have received anyway. B-189395, April 27, 1978. However, if Congress chooses to appropriate funds to the benefited agency to make up the shortfall, the benefited agency may make otherwise proper contributions without requiring additional legal consideration as long as its contribution, when added to the amount contributed by the grantor agency, does not exceed the statutorily specified federal share. 59 Comp. Gen. 1; B-198450, October 2, 1980; B-199534/B-200086, October 2, 1980.

The illustration given in 59 Comp. Gen. 1 may help to clarify these principles. Suppose the statutory federal share is 75 percent and the total project cost is $10 million. The federal share is 75 percent of 10 million, or $7.5 million. Now suppose the grantor agency determines that 20 percent of the project will serve another federal facility. Under 59 Comp. Gen. 1, it is improper for the grantor agency to reduce total cost by 20 percent (i.e., from $10 million to $8 million) and to then contribute only 75 percent of the $8 million, for a federal share of $6 million. The correct federal share should have remained 75 percent of $10 million.

Suppose further that the grantor agency has made the reduction and Congress appropriates money to the benefited agency to make up the shortfall. Using the same hypothetical figures, the benefited agency may contribute $1.5 million (20 percent of the federal share of $7.5 million) as the federal share of that portion of the project attributable to its use, without further legal consideration. However, as mentioned above, its contribution, when added to the contribution of the grantor agency, may not exceed the specified statutory share unless further legal consideration is received by the government.

The decision at 59 Comp. Gen. 1 and the two October 1980 unpublished decisions resulted from a disagreement between GAO and the Environmental Protection Agency over grant funding policy under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. The Act authorized EPA to make 75 percent [28] construction grants for wastewater treatment systems. EPA construed the statute as permitting it to proportionately reduce its contribution to the extent a project benefits other federal facilities. As noted, GAO concluded that EPA lacked authority to reduce its contribution below 75 percent, and that the benefited agencies could not make up the shortfall. EPA disagreed, and to resolve the funding impasse, Congress, apparently as a temporary expedient, provided funds to certain agencies, specifically the Army and the Navy. However, Congress did not provide funds for the Air Force to offset the reduced grants, and the issue arose again in B-194912, August 24, 1981. The Comptroller General reaffirmed GAO's position and concluded that, absent specific congressional approval, the appropriations of the Air Force were not available to make up for the reduced grant amounts.

[28]Subsequent legislation reduced the percentage of the federal share under this program. See B-207211-O.M., July 9, 1982, for a general discussion of matching share requirements in Federal Water Pollution Control Act wastewater treatment construction grants.

b. Maintenance of Effort

Suppose the state of New Euphoria spends around a million dollars a year for the control of noxious pests. After several years, the continued proliferation of noxious pests leads Congress to conclude that the program is not going as well as everyone might like, and that federal financial assistance is in order. Congress therefore enacts legislation and appropriates funds to provide annual pest-control grants of half a million dollars to each affected state.

New Euphoria applies for and receives its grant. Like most other states, however, New Euphoria is strapped for money and faced with various forms of taxpayer revolt. While the state government certainly believes that noxious pests merit control, it would, if it had free choice in the matter, rather use the money on what it regards as higher priority programs. The state uses the $500,000 federal grant for its pest control program—it has no choice because it has contractually committed itself with the federal government to do so as a condition of receiving the grant. However, it then takes $500,000 of its own money away from pest control and applies it to other programs. If the purpose of the federal grant legislation is simply to provide general financial support to New Euphoria, that purpose has been accomplished and the state has clearly benefited. But if the federal purpose is to fund an increased level of pest control activity, the objective has just as clearly been frustrated.

When Congress wants to avoid this result, a device it commonly uses is the "maintenance of effort" requirement. Under a maintenance of effort provision, the grantee is required, as a condition of eligibility for federal funding, to maintain its financial contribution to the program at not less than a stated percentage (which may be 100 percent or less) of its contribution for a prior time period, usually the previous fiscal year. The purpose of maintenance of effort is to ensure that the federal assistance results in an increased level of program activity, and that the grantee, as did New Euphoria, does not simply replace grantee dollars with federal dollars. GAO has observed that maintenance of effort, since it requires a specified level of grantee spending, "effectively serves as a matching requirement." GGD-81-7 at 2.

GAO has also observed that a grant for something the grantee is already spending its own money on is, without maintenance of effort, little more than another form of revenue sharing.

"When Federal grant money is used to substitute for ongoing or planned State and local expenditures, the ultimate effect of the Federal program funds is to provide fiscal relief for recipient States and localities rather than to increase service levels in the program area. When fiscal substitution occurs, narrow-purpose categorical Federal programs enacted to augment service levels are transformed, in effect, into broad purpose fiscal assistance like revenue sharing. Maintenance of effort provisions, if effective, can prevent substitution and ensure that the Federal grant is used by the grantee for the specific purpose intended by the Congress." GGD-81-7 at 48–49.

One type of maintenance of effort requirement is illustrated by the following provision from the Clean Air Act:

"No [air pollution control] agency shall receive any grant under this section during any fiscal year when its expenditures of non-Federal funds for recurrent expenditures for air pollution control programs will be less than its expenditures were for such programs during the preceding fiscal year. . . ."

42 U.S.C. § 7405(c), amended by Pub. L. No. 101-549, § 802(e), 104 Stat. 2399, 2688 (1990).

A variation is found in 20 U.S.C. § 2971, applicable to certain education grants, which we chose because it includes most of the points we will note in this discussion. The basic requirement is subsection (a)(1):

"[A] State is entitled to receive its full allocation of funds . . . for any fiscal year if the Secretary finds that either the combined fiscal effort per student or the aggregate expenditures within the State with respect to the provision of free public education for the preceding fiscal year was not less than 90 percent of such combined fiscal effort or aggregate expenditures for the second preceding fiscal year."

Maintenance of effort statutes will invariably provide fiscal sanctions if the grantee does not meet its commitment. Sanction provisions are of two types. Under one version, the grantee's allocation of federal funds is reduced in the same proportion as its contribution fell below the required level. For example, 20 U.S.C. § 2971(a)(2) provides:

"The Secretary shall reduce the amount of the allocation of funds under this division in any fiscal year in the exact proportion to which the State fails to meet the requirements of paragraph (1) by falling below 90 percent of both the fiscal effort per student and aggregate expenditures . . . ."

The second and more draconian version is illustrated by the Clean Air Act provision quoted above and discussed in B-209872-O.M., March 23, 1984, an internal GAO memorandum. Under this version, the grantee falling short of its maintenance of effort commitment loses all grant funds under the program for that fiscal year. GAO has endorsed the enactment of legislation making proportionate reduction the standard rather than total withdrawal. GGD-81-7 at 71.

Some maintenance of effort statutes authorize the administering agency to waive the requirement for a specified time period if some natural disaster or other unforeseen event caused the funding shortfall. An illustration is 20 U.S.C. § 2971(a)(3):

"The Secretary may waive, for 1 fiscal year only, the requirements of this subsection if the Secretary determines that such a waiver would be equitable due to exceptional or uncontrollable circumstances such as a natural disaster or a precipitous and unforeseen decline in the financial resources of the State."

If a grantee fails to meet its commitment and the noncompliance cannot be waived, any disbursement of federal funds in excess of the amount permitted by the program statute must generally be recovered. 51 Comp. Gen. 162 (1971). Failure to require repayment of such funds "would, in effect, constitute the giving away of United States funds without authority of law." Id. at 165.

A variation of the maintenance of effort provision is the so-called "nonsupplant" provision, which requires that federal funds be used to supplement, and not supplant, nonfederal funds which would otherwise have been made available. Nonsupplant is sometimes used in conjunction with maintenance of effort, an example again being the education statute, 20 U.S.C. § 2971(b):

"A State or local educational agency may use and allocate funds received under this division only so as to supplement and, to the extent practical, increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of Federal funds made available under this division, be made available from non-Federal sources, and in no case may such funds be used so as to supplant funds from non-Federal sources."

(3) Travel advances

Travel advances are authorized by 5 U.S.C. § 5705. The statute expressly directs the recovery, from the traveler or from his or her estate, of advances not used for allowable travel expenses.

A travel advance is "based upon the employee's prospective entitlement to reimbursement" (B-178595, June 27, 1973), and is essentially for the convenience of the traveler. If it were not authorized, the traveler would have little choice but to use personal funds and then seek reimbursement at the end of the travel. Travel advances in the hands of the traveler are regarded as nonaccountable and hence not governed by the accountable officer laws. Rather, they are treated as loans for the personal benefit of the traveler. As such, if the funds are lost or stolen while in the traveler's custody, regardless of the presence or absence of fault attributable to the traveler, the funds must be recovered as provided by 5 U.S.C. § 5705, and the accountable officer relief statutes do not apply. 54 Comp. Gen. 190 (1974); B-206245, April 26, 1982; B-183489, June 30, 1975. The same principle applies to traveler's checks. 64 Comp. Gen. 456, 460 (1985).

In many cases, a messenger or some other clerical employee picks up the funds for the traveler. If the funds are lost or stolen while in the intermediary's custody, and use of the intermediary was the traveler's choice, the intermediary is the agent of the traveler and the traveler, having constructively received the funds, remains liable. B-204387, February 24, 1982; B-200867, March 30, 1981. However, if use of the intermediary is required by agency or local policy, then the intermediary is the agent of the government and the traveler is not liable. 67 Comp. Gen. 402 (1988).

Even though the accountable officer relief statutes do not apply, it may be possible to effectively "relieve" the non-negligent traveler by considering a claim under the Military Personnel and Civilian Employees' Claims Act of 1964, 31 U.S.C. § 3721, to the extent permissible under the agency's implementing regulations. B-208639, October 5, 1982; B-197927, September 12, 1980.

The Clean Air Act provision, quoted in part above, also includes a nonsupplant clause. GAO's 1980 study concluded that nonsupplant provisions were largely unenforceable, and recommended against their use. GGD-81-7 at 71.[29]

F. Obligation of Appropriations for Grants

1. Requirement for Obligation

As with any other type of expenditure, the expenditure of federal assistance program funds requires an obligation that is proper in terms of purpose, time, and amount, and the obligation must be properly recorded. The purpose, time, and amount requirements are essentially the same for grants as for other expenditures. With respect to recording of the obligation, 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(5) requires that the obligation be supported by documentary evidence of a grant payable—

"(A) from appropriations made for payment of, or contributions to, amounts required to be paid in specific amounts fixed by law or under formulas prescribed by law;

"(B) under an agreement authorized by law; or

"(C) under plans approved consistent with and authorized by law."

What constitutes an obligation in the grant context, and what will or will not satisfy 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a)(5), are discussed in more detail in Chapter 7.

[29]"Most Federal program officials we contacted agreed that nonsupplant is difficult, if not impossible, to enforce because it calls for an external judgment on what grantees would have done if Federal funds were not available. Basically, this calls for a Federal agency to assess the motives behind particular changes in State and local plans or budgets and to judge whether the presence of Federal grant funds drove the particular State or local action." GGD-81-7 at 54.

REV_00257616

2. Changes in Grants—Replacement Grants vs. New Obligations

a. The Replacement Grant Concept

Changes in grants may come about for a variety of reasons—the original grantee may be unable to perform, the grant amount may be increased, there may be a redefinition of objectives, etc. If the change occurs in the same fiscal year (or longer period if a multiple-year appropriation is involved) in which the original grant was made, there is no obligation problem as long as the amount of the appropriation is not exceeded. If, however, the change occurs in a later fiscal year, the question becomes whether the amended grant remains chargeable to the appropriation initially obligated or whether it constitutes a new obligation chargeable to appropriations current at the time the change is made.

As a general proposition, a grant amendment which changes the scope of the grant or which makes the award to an entirely different grantee (not a successor to the original grantee), and which is executed after the appropriation under which the original grant was made has ceased to be available for obligation, may not be charged to the original appropriation. E.g., 58 Comp. Gen. 676 (1979). If the amendment amounts to a substitute grant, it extinguishes the old obligation and creates a new one. The new obligation is chargeable to the appropriation available at the time the new obligation is created. There are also situations where a grant amendment creates a new obligation chargeable to the later appropriation without extinguishing the original obligation. In either event, if the grantor agency does not recognize that the change creates a new obligation when the change is made, there is a potential Antideficiency Act violation. On the other hand, a change which qualifies as a "replacement grant" remains chargeable to the original appropriation. Of course, an agency with the requisite program authority can change the scope of a grant if current appropriations are used. 60 Comp. Gen. 540 (1981).

The clearest example of a change that creates a new obligation is where the amount of the award is increased. If the grantee has no legal right stemming from the original grant agreement to compel execution of the amendment, the increase in amount is a new obligation chargeable to appropriations current when the change is made. 41 Comp. Gen. 134 (1961); 39 Comp. Gen. 296 (1959); 37 Comp. Gen. 861 (1958). However, an upward adjustment in a "provisional indirect cost rate" contained in a grant award, which contemplated a possible increase in the indirect cost rate at a later date, does not constitute an additional or new award. Payments resulting from such an adjustment are chargeable to the appropriation originally obligated by the grant. 48 Comp. Gen. 186 (1968).

Where a change involves some other aspect of the grant, it is necessary to determine whether the change, viewed as a whole, will create a new and separate undertaking or will enlarge the scope of the grant, thereby creating a new obligation. As pointed out in 58 Comp. Gen. 676, 680 (1979), the cases have identified three closely related areas of concern that must be satisfied before a change may be viewed as a "replacement grant" and not as creating a new obligation:

(1) The bona fide need for the grant project must continue;

(2) The purpose of the grant from the government's standpoint must remain the same; and

(3) The revised grant must have the same scope.

The "scope" of a grant, as stated in 58 Comp. Gen. at 681:

> "grows out of the grant purposes. These purposes must be referred to in order to identify those aspects of a grant that make up the substantial and material features of a particular grant which in turn fix the scope of the Government's obligation."

b. Substitution of Grantee

As a general rule, when a recipient of a grant is unable to implement the grant as originally contemplated, and an alternative grantee is designated subsequent to the expiration of the period of availability for obligation of the grant funds, the award to the alternative grantee must be treated as a new obligation and is not properly chargeable to the appropriation current at the time the original grant was made. B-164031(5), June 25, 1976; B-114876/A-44014, January 21, 1960.

However, it is possible in certain situations to make an award to an alternative grantee after expiration of the period of availability for obligation where the alternative award amounts to a "replacement grant" and is substantially identical in scope and purpose to the original grant. 57 Comp. Gen. 205 (1978); B-157179, September 30, 1970. In the latter decision, the Comptroller General did not object to the use of unexpended grant funds originally awarded to the University of Wisconsin to engage Northwestern University in a new fiscal year to complete the unfinished project. Approval was granted because the project director had transferred from the University of Wisconsin to Northwestern University and he was viewed by all the parties as the only person capable of completing the work. The decision also noted that the original grant was made in response to a bona fide need then existing, and that the need for completing the project continued to exist.

GAO has also indicated that it might be possible in certain situations to develop procedures to designate an alternate grantee at the time an award is made to the principal grantee, provided that all of the criteria for selection of the principal and required administrative action are also met concerning the alternate, with the sole exception that the award to the alternate is not mailed to it pending a determination as to whether the principal actually complies with the terms of the award. The validity of any such procedure would have to be assessed on a case-by-case basis. B-114876, July 29, 1960; B-114876, March 15, 1960.

c. Other Changes

A shift in the community to be served by the grant has been held to constitute a new obligation. Thus, in B-164031(5), June 25, 1976, the original grantee ran into financial difficulties and was unable to utilize a hospital modernization award under the Hill-Burton program. The Comptroller General found that a proposal to shift the award to another hospital would constitute a new undertaking rather than a replacement grant since the hospitals were over 100 miles apart and served essentially different communities.

An enlargement of the community to be served will not necessarily constitute a new obligation. The grant in 58 Comp. Gen. 676 (1979) was to set up a demonstration community service volunteer program. The grant defined the number of participants deemed necessary to generate the desired test results. The geographic site for which the grant was awarded was expected to produce the necessary number of volunteers, but did not. It was held that the geographical area could be expanded to produce the desired number of volunteers. The modification in these circumstances would not constitute a new and separate undertaking and could be funded from the appropriation originally obligated.

A change in the research objectives of a grant will constitute a new obligation notwithstanding that some aspects of the original grant and the modification may be related. 57 Comp. Gen. 459 (1978). See also 39 Comp. Gen. 296 (1959).

A 1969 decision involved amendments by the National Institute of Mental Health which would change the use of grant funds from construction to renovation and vice-versa beyond the period of obligational availability. Since the amendments met the statutory eligibility criteria, since they would still accomplish the original grant objectives, and since they involved neither a change in grantees nor an increase in amount, they were held permissible under the original obligations. B-74254, September 3, 1969.

G. Grant Costs

1. Allowable vs. Unallowable Costs

a. The Concept of Allowable Costs

Recipients of assistance awards are expected to use the assistance funds for the purposes for which they were awarded, subject to any conditions that may attach to the award. Expenditures or costs that meet the grant purposes and conditions are termed "allowable costs." An expenditure which is not for grant purposes or is contrary to a condition of the grant is not an allowable cost and may not be properly charged to the grant.

Where a cost is not allowable, as far as the government is concerned the recipient still has the funds. If the grant funds have already been paid over to the grantee and no allowable costs of an equal amount are subsequently incurred, the recipient is required to return the amount of the improper charge to the government. E.g., Utah State Board for Vocational Education v. United States, 287 F.2d 713 (10th Cir. 1961). The United States "has a reversionary interest in the unencumbered balances of such grants, including any funds improperly applied." 42 Comp. Gen. 289, 294 (1962). See also B-198493, July 7, 1980. This requirement cannot be waived. B-171019, June 3, 1975. Thus, the Comptroller General has held that an agency cannot waive its statutory regulations to relieve a grantee of its liability for improper expenditures. B-163922, February 10,.1978.

Similarly, an agency may not amend its regulations to relieve a grantee's liability for expenditures for administrative costs in excess of a statutory limitation. B-178564, July 19, 1977, reaffirmed in 57 Comp. Gen. 163 (1977).

Guidance from the Office of Management and Budget on cost principles is found in a series of OMB Circulars: A-21 (Cost Principles for Educational Institutions); A-87 (Cost Principles for State and Local Governments); A-122 (Cost Principles for Nonprofit Organizations). These circulars are expressly incorporated in the common rule adopted under OMB Circular No. A-102. Common Rule §___.22, 53 Fed. Reg. 8092.

Costs are of two types, direct and indirect. Direct costs are items that are specifically identifiable and attributable to a particular cost objective.[30] In other words, direct costs are obligations or expenditures of a recipient which can be tied to a particular award. For example, if a recipient purchases an item of equipment necessary to carry out a particular award, the purchase price is a direct cost under that award. Indirect costs are costs incurred for common objectives which cannot be directly charged to any single cost objective.[31] A common example is depreciation. The concept of indirect costs is essentially an accounting device to permit the allocation of overhead in proportion to benefit. See B-203681, September 27, 1982. Indirect cost rates are usually negotiated by the grantor and grantee.

The overallocation of indirect costs is unauthorized and therefore unallowable. The reason is that 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a) restricts the use of appropriated funds to the purposes for which they were appropriated, and payment of the overallocation would not serve the purposes of the appropriation. B-203681, September 27, 1982.

A grantee may generally substitute other allowable costs for costs which have been disallowed, subject to any applicable cost ceiling. If additional funds become available as the result of a cost disallowance, those funds should be used to pay any "excess" allowable costs which could not be paid previously because of the ceiling. B-208871.2, February 9, 1989.

[30]E.g., OMB Circular No. A-87, para. E.1.

[31]GAO, A Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27, at 87 (1981).

REV_00257621

Allowable costs are determined on the basis of the relevant program legislation, regulations, including OMB directives, and the terms of the grant agreement. First and foremost, of course, is the program statute. Thus, where the legislation and legislative history of a program clearly limited the purposes for which grant funds could be used, grantees could not use grant funds for non-specified purposes, including one for which Congress had provided funds under a separate appropriation. 35 Comp. Gen. 198 (1955). In 55 Comp. Gen. 652 (1976), however, a statute prohibiting certain costs was held to apply only to direct costs and, absent legislative history to the contrary, did not preclude use of standard indirect cost rates even though technically a percentage of the indirect cost rates could be attributed to the prohibited items.

The role of agency regulations is illustrated by California v. United States, 547 F.2d 1388 (9th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 824. Under the Federal-Aid Highway Act, the United States pays 90 percent of the "total cost" of certain highway construction, with "cost" being defined to include the cost of right-of-way acquisition. The Federal Highway Administration had issued a policy memorandum stating that program funds would not be used to pay interest on any portion of a condemnation award or settlement for more than 30 days after the money is deposited with the court. California challenged the restriction. The court said:

> "Certainly, Congress must have intended that the statutory obligation to pay 90 percent of the total cost must include some corresponding right to impose reasonable limitations upon such costs, rather than to leave the Federal Treasury at the mercy of unfettered discretion by the State as to what expenditures may be made and charged accordingly."

Id. at 1390. The court saw no need to decide whether the policy memorandum rose to the level of a "regulation." Either way, it was a reasonable exercise of the agency's authority to administer the program. See also Louisiana Department of Highways v. United States, 604 F.2d 1339 (Ct. Cl. 1979) (Federal Highway Administration regulation disallowing costs of grantee settlements of worthless claims).

Several GAO decisions illustrate the significance of the grant agreement. For example, where a grant application specified that certain costs would be incurred and the program legislation was ambiguous as to whether those costs should be allowed, the grantor agency was held bound by the grant agreement, i.e., by its acceptance of the application. B-118638.101, October 29, 1979.

The familiar cost overrun is not the exclusive province of the government contractor. Assistance recipients may also incur overruns. A claim resulting from an overrun under a cooperative agreement was denied in B-206272.5, March 26, 1985, because, under the agreement, the agency was not obligated to fund overruns unless it chose to amend the agreement and, in its discretion, it had declined to do so. Cf. B-209649, December 23, 1983 (labor benefits awarded by court to employees of grantee's contractor could be regarded as indirect costs under grant terms, as long as applicable ceiling on indirect costs was not exceeded).

GAO is occasionally asked to review allowable cost determinations. Two examples are Nuclear Waste: DOE Needs to Ensure Nevada's Conformance With Grant Requirements, GAO/RCED-90-173 (July 1990), and Job Training Partnership Act: Review of Audit Findings Related to the Downriver Community Conference Program, GAO/HRD-90-105 (May 1990). The analytical framework employed is that outlined above.

b. Grant Cost Cases

Grant cost cases are extremely difficult to categorize because what is allowable under one assistance program may not be allowable under another. Accordingly, summaries of a number of cases are given below with no further attempt to generalize.

Recovery of antitrust damages by a state grantee stemming from a grant-financed project serves to reduce the actual costs of the grantee and must be accounted for to the government. This is true even where the United States has declined to participate in the cost of the antitrust action. 57 Comp. Gen. 577 (1978). However, the government is not entitled to share in treble damages. 47 Comp. Gen. 309 (1967). Out-of-pocket expenses incurred by the state in effecting the recovery should be shared by the federal government in the same proportion as the recovered damages. B-162539, October 11, 1967.

Where a grantee paid a nondiscriminatory sales tax on otherwise proper expenditures with grant funds, the taxes are not taxes imposed on the United States and are allowable. 37 Comp. Gen. 85 (1957). However, property taxes were held not allowable under a construction grant because they represent operating costs rather than construction costs. B-166506, February 14, 1973.

The payment of expert witness fees was found unrelated to the purposes of a research grant. 42 Comp. Gen. 682 (1963).

Construction of a bridge could not be paid for out of federal aid highway funds where the construction was necessitated by a flood control project and not as a highway project. 41 Comp. Gen. 606 (1962).

Buses acquired by a city under a "mass transportation" grant could be used for charter service, an unauthorized grant purpose, where such use was merely incidental to the primary use of the buses for authorized mass transit purposes. B-160204, December 7, 1966.

The salary of an individual hired to evaluate the Upward Bound Program at a grantee college was disallowed as a grant cost, because the grant document contained no provision for such an expenditure and the applicable program guidelines specified that evaluation was not an allowable expense. B-161980, November 23, 1971.

The cost of a luncheon for top officials of the Department of Human Resources, District of Columbia Government, was disallowed as an improper administrative expense under a social services program grant under Title XX of the Social Security Act. B-187150, October 14, 1976.

Ordinarily, increased project costs resulting from grantee negligence giving rise to justified claims for damages would not be allowable. However, a damage award was viewed as a recognizable cost element where the grantee's error had contributed to an unrealistically low initial cost, but an amendment to the grant was required before the increased costs could be allowed. 47 Comp. Gen. 756 (1968).

Under a Federal Airport Act program providing for federal payment of a specified percentage of allowable project costs, the fair value of land and equipment donated to the grantee could be treated as an allowable cost because failure to do so would, in effect, penalize the grantee for the contributions of "public spirited citizens." B-81321, November 19, 1948.

Litigation costs incurred by grantees in suing the United States were found unallowable under the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982. Nevada v. Herrington, 827 F.2d 1394 (9th Cir. 1987).

c. Note on Accounting

Cost principles on which a grant award is conditioned are binding on the grantee. B-203681, September 27, 1982. It is the grantee's responsibility to maintain adequate fiscal records to support the allowable costs claimed. With respect to state and local governments, see generally Common Rule §___.20, 53 Fed. Reg. 8090. Where a grantee has not kept adequate records, evidence of satisfactory progress on the grant may nevertheless justify a limited "presumption of regularity" since by inference the grantee must have incurred some allowable expenses. However, it does not follow that all expenses claimed should be allowed. Where a particular accounted-for time period includes disallowed costs, similar disallowable costs must be projected as present during prior unaccounted-for periods unless there is proof to the contrary, the presumption being that similar errors occurred during the prior periods. B-186166, August 26, 1976. Although the agency has discretion to determine the precise method of calculation, one approach is to disallow the same proportion of funds for the unaccounted-for periods as were disallowed for the period for which accounts were available. Id.

GAO has questioned the assessment of fiscal sanctions by a grantor agency against a grantee on the basis of error rate statistical data, such as errors imputed from a quality control system. See B-194548, July 10, 1979. In Georgia v. Califano, 446 F. Supp. 404, 409–10 (N.D. Ga. 1977), however, the court upheld the determination of overpayments under the Medicaid program on the basis of statistical sampling, in view of the "practical impossibility" of individual claim-by-claim audit. The court also noted that, under the pertinent federal regulations, the state was given the opportunity to present evidence before the disallowance became final.

In Maryland v. Mathews, 415 F. Supp. 1206 (D.D.C. 1976), a case involving the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program, the court held that an agency can establish by regulation a withholding of federal financial participation in a specified amount set by a tolerance level, as long as the tolerance level is reasonable and supported by an adequate factual basis. The regulation involved in the specific case, however, did not meet the test and was found to be arbitrary and therefore invalid. It has also been held that, if setting a tolerance level

Travel advances returned to government custody for reasons such as postponement of the travel regain their status as accountable funds, and an employee receiving custody of these funds is governed by the laws relating to the liability and relief of accountable officers. B-200404, February 12, 1981; B-170012, March 14, 1972; B-170012, May 3, 1971. Also, where an advance greatly exceeds the employee's legitimate travel expense needs and it is clear that the excess is intended to be used for operational purposes, the excess over reasonable needs may be treated as accountable funds and not part of the "loan." B-196804, July 1, 1980.

b. Receipts

In our definitions of governmental receipts and offsetting collections in Chapter 2, we noted that the government receives funds from nongovernment sources (a) from the exercise of its sovereign powers (e.g., tax collections, customs duties, court fines), and (b) from a variety of business-type activities (e.g., sale of publications). These collections, whether they are to be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts or credited to some agency appropriation or fund, are accountable funds from the moment of receipt. Some examples are 64 Comp. Gen. 535 (1985) (fees paid to bankruptcy court); 60 Comp. Gen. 674 (1981) (tax collections); B-200170, April 1, 1981 (petroleum overcharge refunds); B-194782, August 25, 1980 (recreational fee collections).

c. Funds Held in Trust

When the government holds private funds in a trust capacity, it is obligated, by virtue of its fiduciary duty, to pay over those funds to the rightful owners at the proper time. Thus, although the funds are not appropriated funds, they are nevertheless accountable funds. The principle has been stated as follows:

> "[T]he same relationship between an accountable officer and the United States is required with respect to trust funds of a private character obtained and held for some particular purpose sanctioned by law as is required with respect to public funds."

6 Comp. Gen. 515, 517 (1927). The Court of Claims said the same thing in Woog v. United States, 48 Ct. Cl. 80 (1913).

A common example is the Department of Veterans Affairs "Personal Funds of Patients" (PFOP) account. Patients, upon admission to a VA hospital, may deposit personal funds in this account for safekeeping and use as needed. Upon release, the balance is returned to the is discretionary, the agency can set it at zero. Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 762 F.2d 406 (4th Cir. 1985); California v. Settle, 708 F.2d 1380 (9th Cir. 1983).

2. Pre-Award Costs (Retroactive Funding)

"Retroactive funding" means the funding of costs incurred by a grantee before the grant was awarded. Three separate situations arise: (1) costs incurred prior to award but after the program authority has been enacted and the appropriation became available; (2) costs incurred prior to award and after program authority was enacted but before the appropriation became available; and (3) costs incurred prior to both program authority and appropriation availability.

Situation (1): In this situation, the grantee seeks to charge costs incurred before the grant was awarded (in some cases even before the grantee submitted its application) but after both the program legislation and the implementing appropriation were enacted.

There is no rule or policy that generally restricts allowable costs to those incurred after the award of a grant. However, agencies may adopt such a policy by regulation. B-197699, June 3, 1980.

Thus, in a number of cases, grant-related costs incurred prior to award, but after the program was authorized and appropriated funds were available for obligation, have been allowed where (a) there was no contrary indication in the language or legislative history of the program statute or the appropriation, (b) allowance was not prohibited by the regulations of the grantor agency, and (c) the agency determined that allowance would be in the best interest of carrying out the statutory purpose. 32 Comp. Gen. 141 (1952); 31 Comp. Gen. 308 (1952); B-197699, June 3, 1980; B-133001, March 9, 1979; B-75414, May 7, 1948. (The above criteria are not specified as such in any of the cases cited but are derived from viewing all of the cases as a whole.)

Situation (2): In this situation, pre-award costs are incurred after program legislation has been enacted, but before an appropriation becomes available.

Prior to the Comptroller General's decision in 56 Comp. Gen. 31 (1976), a "general rule" was commonly stated to the effect that absent some indication of contrary intent, an appropriation could not be used to pay grant costs where the grantee's obligation arose before the appropriation implementing the enabling legislation became available. 45 Comp. Gen. 515 (1966); 40 Comp. Gen. 615 (1961); 31 Comp. Gen. 308 (1952); A-71315, February 28, 1936.

In 56 Comp. Gen. 31, the Comptroller General reviewed the earlier decisions and concluded that there was no legal requirement for a general rule prohibiting the use of grant funds to pay for costs incurred prior to the availability of the applicable appropriation. Rather, the determination should be made on a case-by-case basis. Thus, the decision announced:

"We would prefer to base each decision from now on on the statutory language, legislative history, and particular factors operative in the particular case in question, rather than on a general rule." Id. at 35.

In reviewing the earlier decisions, the Comptroller General found that each had been correctly decided on its own facts. Thus, retroactive funding was prohibited in 40 Comp. Gen. 615 (1961), 31 Comp. Gen. 308 (1952), and A-71315, February 28, 1936. However, in each of those cases, there was some manifestation of an affirmative intent that funds be used only for costs incurred subsequent to the appropriation. For example, 31 Comp. Gen. 308 concerned grants to states under the Federal Civil Defense Act. The committee reports and debates on a supplemental appropriation to fund the program contained strong indications that Congress did not intend that the money be used to retroactively fund expenses incurred by states prior to the appropriation. By way of contrast, there were no such indications in the situation considered in 56 Comp. Gen. 31 (matching funds provided to states under the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965). Accordingly, 56 Comp. Gen. 31 did not overrule the earlier decisions, but merely modified them to the extent that GAO would no longer purport to apply a "general rule" in this area.

In determining whether retroactive funding is authorized, relevant factors are evidence and clarity of congressional intent, the degree of discretion given the grantor agency, and the proximity in time of the cost being incurred to the grant award. As in Situation (1), significant factors also include the agency's own regulations and the agency's determination that funding the particular costs in question will further the statutory purpose. Accordingly, the authority will be easier to find where an agency has broad discretion and favorable legislative history. Using this approach, retroactive funding authority may be found to exist (as in 56 Comp. Gen. 31), or not to exist (as in 40 Comp. Gen. 615).

If an agency wishes to recognize retroactive funding in limited situations in its regulations, it must, in order to avoid potential Antideficiency Act problems, make it clear that no obligation on the part of the government can arise prior to the availability of an appropriation. Of course, the grant itself cannot be made until the appropriation becomes available. 56 Comp. Gen. 31, 36 (1976).

Situation (3): In this situation, the grantee seeks to charge costs incurred not only before the appropriation became available, but also before the program authority was enacted.

Costs incurred prior to both the program authorization and the availability of the appropriation may generally not be funded retroactively. See 56 Comp. Gen. 31 (1976); 32 Comp. Gen. 141 (1952); B-11393, July 25, 1940. GAO recognizes that there may possibly be exceptions even to this rule (56 Comp. Gen. at 35), but thus far there are no decisions identifying any.

One final situation deserves mention. In each of the retroactive funding cases cited above, the grant was in fact subsequently awarded. In B-206244, June 8, 1982, a state had applied for an Interior Department grant under the Youth Conservation Corps Act and later withdrew its application due to funding uncertainties. The state then filed a claim for various expenses it had incurred in anticipation of the grant. GAO held that payment would violate both the program legislation and the purpose statute, 31 U.S.C. § 1301(a). Interior's appropriation was intended to accomplish grant purposes, but the state's expenses did not accomplish any grant purposes since the grant was never made.

H. Recovery of Grantee Indebtedness

1. Government's Duty to Recover

This section is intended to summarize the application of "debt collection law" (covered in detail in Chapter 13) in the context of assistance programs, and to highlight a few issues in which the fact that a grant is involved may be of special relevance. This brief discussion is intended to supplement the detailed coverage in Chapter 13; it is not a substitute.

Claims in favor of the United States against an assistance recipient may arise for a variety of reasons. As a general proposition, it has been the view of both GAO and the executive branch that the United States has not only a right but a duty to recover amounts owed to it, and that this duty exists without the need for specific statutory authority. This applies to assistance recipients just as it would apply to other debtors. The Federal Claims Collection Standards require each agency to "take aggressive action . . . to collect all claims of the United States for money or property arising out of the activities of, or referred to, that agency." 4 C.F.R. § 102.1(a). See also Common Rule §___.52, 53 Fed. Reg. 8102.

For example, grant funds erroneously awarded to an ineligible grantee must be recovered by the agency responsible for the error, including expenditures the grantee incurred before receiving notice that the agency's initial determination had been made in error. 51 Comp. Gen. 162 (1971); B-146285/B-164031(1), April 19, 1972. The cited decisions recognize that there might be exceptional circumstances in which full recovery might not be required, but exceptions would have to be considered on an individual basis.

Similarly, where an agency misapportions formula grant funds so that some states receive excess funds, the excess must be recovered. If the misapportionment resulted in other states receiving less than their formula amount, the apportionments of all of the states involved must be appropriately adjusted. 41 Comp. Gen. 16 (1961).

Where, under an assistance program, the government is authorized or required to recover funds for whatever reason, the Federal Claims Collection Act of 1966, as amended by the Debt Collection Act of 1982 (31 U.S.C. Chapter 37, Subchapter II), and the joint GAO-Justice Department implementing regulations (Federal Claims Collection Standards, 4 C.F.R. Parts 101–105) apply unless the program legislation under which the claim arises or some other statute provides otherwise. See 4 C.F.R. § 101.4; B-163922, February 10, 1978; B-182423, November 25, 1974.

Indebtedness to the United States may also result from the misuse of grant funds. E.g., Utah State Board for Vocational Education v. United States, 287 F.2d 713 (10th Cir. 1961); Mass Transit Grants: Noncompliance and Misspent Funds by Two Grantees in UMTA's New York Region, GAO/RCED-92-38 (January 1992). The cases usually arise when the grantor agency disallows certain costs. Here again the government's position has been that the right to recover exists independent of statute, supplemented or circumscribed by any statutory provisions that may apply. See, e.g., B-198493, July 7, 1980; B-163922, February 10, 1978. In this area, however, the government's right to recover has come under increasing attack by recipients, particularly during the 1980s.

What we present here is by no means an exhaustive cataloguing of the cases. Our selection is designed to serve three purposes: (1) summarize what the law appears to be as of the date of this publication; (2) reflect any discernible trends; and (3) point out some issues that may be of more general relevance. As a general proposition, the courts have looked first to the program legislation and, with some exceptions, have declined to rule on the government's common-law right of recovery where adequate authority could be found in, or deduced from, the enabling statute.

The cases we selected for purposes of illustration are drawn largely from two programs—Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), and the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA). ESEA was extensively revised by the Hawkins-Stafford Elementary and Secondary School Improvement Amendments of 1988 (Pub. L. No. 100-297, 102 Stat. 130); CETA was replaced in 1982 by the Job Training Partnership Act. Nevertheless, we chose these programs because they both generated a large volume of litigation on a variety of relevant topics. Apart from whatever value specific cases may have by analogy to other programs, the material illustrates the kinds of issues that have arisen and the approach the courts, including the Supreme Court, have taken in resolving them.

ESEA included a provision, very common in grant program legislation, requiring the states to provide adequate assurances to the Department of Education that grant funds would be used only on qualifying programs. In addition, the law was amended in 1978 to give the Secretary of Education explicit authority to direct the repayment of misspent grant funds from non-ESEA sources. 20 U.S.C. § 2835(b) (1982). Prior to this amendment, the statute had provided simply that payments under Title I shall take into account the extent to which any previous payment to the same state was greater or less than it should have been.

Two states argued that the 1978 amendments did not apply to misspent funds prior to 1978, and that the government's sole remedy with respect to pre-1978 funds was to withhold future grant funds, in which event the state would simply undertake a smaller Title I program. The government argued that the right to recover existed both under the pre-1978 law and under the common law. The Supreme Court held that the pre-1978 version of the law clearly gave the government the right to recover misspent funds. Bell v. New Jersey, 461 U.S. 773 (1983). Apart from the holding itself and its significance with respect to any program statutes with similar language, several other points from this decision are noteworthy:

- The existence and amount of the state's debt are to be determined administratively by the agency in the first instance, subject to judicial review. Id. at 791–92. (This is the same approach used in the Federal Claims Collection Standards for debt collection generally.)
- The Court rejected the argument that the government had a remedy by withholding future funds, with the state correspondingly reducing its program level.
- Because the Court found adequate authority in the statute, it declined to rule on the existence of a common-law right. Id. at 782 n.7.

In a 1981 case, a lower court had found a common-law right of recovery along with the ESEA statutory right. West Virginia v. Secretary of Education, 667 F.2d 417 (4th Cir. 1981). A 1987 case also upheld the government's common-law right of recovery, at least to the extent of overallocations or other erroneous payments. California Department of Education v. Bennett, 829 F.2d 795, 798 (9th Cir. 1987).

REV_00257631

Two years after Bell v. New Jersey, the Supreme Court considered another issue arising from the same litigation and held that the 1978 amendments to ESEA were not retroactive for purposes of determining whether funds had been misspent. Bennett v. New Jersey, 470 U.S. 632 (1985). What is important here is the more general rule the Court announced, namely, that substantive rights and obligations under federal grant programs are to be determined by reference to the law in effect when the grants were made. Id. at 638–41.

The Court also rejected an argument that recovery would be inequitable because the state acted in good faith. The role of the reviewing court is to determine if the proper legal standards are applied. If they are, a court has "no independent authority to excuse repayment based on its view of what would be the most equitable outcome." Id. at 646. In any event, said the Court, "we find no inequity in requiring repayment of funds that were spent contrary to assurances provided by the State in obtaining the grants." Id. at 645.

In Bennett v. Kentucky Department of Education, 470 U.S. 656 (1985), decided on the same day as Bennett v. New Jersey, the Court reaffirmed the government's right of recovery under ESEA Title I:

"The State gave certain assurances as a condition for receiving the federal funds, and if those assurances were not complied with, the Federal Government is entitled to recover amounts spent contrary to the terms of the grant agreement." 470 U.S. at 663.

The Court further concluded that neither "substantial compliance" by the state nor the absence of bad faith would absolve the state from its liability. Id. at 663–65. See also B-229068-O.M., December 23, 1987, applying Kentucky to grants under Title V of the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act.

One point in Bell v. New Jersey seems to have generated some uncertainty. The Court noted that the Secretary "has not asked us to decide what means of collection are available to him, but only whether he is a creditor. Since the case does not present the issue of available remedies, we do not address it." Bell, 461 U.S. at 779 n.4. Thus, the Court did not approve or disapprove of any particular remedy. This led one court to conclude that the Bell analysis requires two separate questions: whether the federal government has a right of recovery and, if so, what remedies are available to it. Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 763 F.2d 1441, 1455 (D.C. Cir. 1985) (holding that government has statutory right of recovery under Title XX of Social Security Act). However, another court expressed doubt over the existence of such a dichotomy, construing the Supreme Court's silence in Bennett v. Kentucky Department of Education as approval of the means of recovery employed in that case, a direct repayment order. St. Regis Mohawk Tribe v. Brock, 769 F.2d 37, 49 (2d Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1140 (right of recovery under Comprehensive Employment and Training Act). The St. Regis court went on to conclude that "Congress left it to the Secretary to establish additional remedial procedures, consistent with the purposes of the legislation, to insure compliance by prime sponsors." 769 F.2d at 50. Where this issue may lead in the future is unclear, although as noted briefly later in this chapter and discussed more fully in Chapter 13, the availability of a particular remedy sometimes is a very different question from the existence of the underlying right to recover.

Another group of cases involves the former CETA program. There is a strong parallel to the ESEA cases in that the original CETA included general authority to adjust payments to reflect prior overpayments or underpayments, and was amended in 1978 to explicitly authorize the Secretary of Labor to recover misspent funds by ordering repayment from non-CETA funds. Essentially following Bell v. New Jersey, a rather long line of cases upheld the Labor Department's right, under the pre-1978 CETA, to recover misspent funds and to do so by directing repayment from non-CETA funds. City of Gary v. United States Department of Labor, 793 F.2d 873 (7th Cir. 1986); St. Regis Mohawk Tribe v. Brock, 769 F.2d 37 (2d Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1140; Mobile Consortium v. United States Department of Labor, 745 F.2d 1416 (11th Cir. 1984); California Tribal Chairman's Association v. United States Department of Labor, 730 F.2d 1289 (9th Cir. 1984); North Carolina Commission of Indian Affairs v. United States Department of Labor, 725 F.2d 238 (4th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 828; Texarcana Metropolitan Area Manpower Consortium v. Donovan, 721 F.2d 1162 (8th Cir. 1983); Lehigh Valley Manpower Program v. Donovan, 718 F.2d 99 (3d Cir. 1983); Atlantic County v. United States Department of Labor, 715 F.2d 834 (3d Cir. 1983).

The St. Regis (769 F.2d at 47), California Tribal (730 F.2d at 1292), and North Carolina (725 F.2d at 240) courts, as had the Supreme Court in Bell v. New Jersey, declined to comment on the existence of a common-law right of recovery. The Texarcana court noted that its decision was consistent with prior decisions recognizing the common-law right. 721 F.2d at 1164. None of the cases purported to deny that right.

Another group of CETA cases concerned a provision which required the Secretary of Labor to investigate any complaint alleging improprieties and to issue a final determination not later than 120 days after receiving the complaint. The consequences of failing to meet the 120-day deadline became a hotly litigated issue. The lower courts split, some holding that failure to meet the deadline barred the Labor Department from attempting to recover misused funds, while others held that the failure did not bar further action. Using an analysis which should be useful in a variety of situations, the Supreme Court resolved the conflict in Brock v. Pierce County, 476 U.S. 253 (1986), holding that the mere use of the word "shall" in the statute did not remove the power to act after 120 days.

One additional CETA case deserves mention. In Board of County Commissioners v. United States Department of Labor, 805 F.2d 366 (10th Cir. 1986), the court held that funds embezzled by an employee of a CETA grantee are "misspent" for purposes of the government's right of recovery. The grantee had argued that the funds were not "misspent" because it had never spent them. "No CETA regulation lists embezzlement as an allowable cost," rejoined the court. Id. at 368.

Where does all this leave us? Certainly the government's right to recover under programs with statutory provisions similar to the former ESEA Title I and CETA programs would seem to be settled. In more general terms, several lower courts have recognized the government's basic right to recover under the common-law,[32] although as we shall see, the means of recovery has become controversial. While the Supreme Court declined to address the common law issue in Bell v. New Jersey, its later decision in West Virginia v. United States, 479 U.S. 305 (1987) seems instructive.

[32]See, in addition to the cases cited in the text, Tennessee v. Dole, 749 F.2d 331, 336 (6th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 472 U.S. 1018 (Federal-Aid Highway Act); Woods v. United States, 724 F.2d 1444 (9th Cir. 1984) (Food Stamp Act); Mount Sinai Hosp. v. Weinberger, 517 F.2d 329 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 935 (Medicare); Pennsylvania Dep't of Transp. v. United States, 643 F.2d 758, 764 (Ct. Cl. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 826 (Federal-Aid Highway Act).

The issue in West Virginia was whether the United States could recover "prejudgment interest on a debt arising from a contractual obligation to reimburse the United States for services rendered by the Army Corps of Engineers." 479 U.S. at 306. Applying federal common law, a unanimous Court held that it could.[33] While this was not a grant case nor was the government's right to collect the underlying debt in dispute, it would not seem to require a huge leap in logic to infer a recognition of an inherent right in the government to recover amounts owed to it.

In sum, the government's assertion of an inherent (i.e., common law) right to recover sums owed to it under assistance programs thus far seems to have withstood assault. However, it is safe to say that the question is by no means as simple as it once might have seemed.

2. Offset and Withholding of Claims Under Grants

Offset and withholding are two closely related remedies. While the terms are sometimes used interchangeably, they are not the same. Offset, in the context of grantee indebtedness, refers to a reduction in grant payments to a grantee who is indebted to the United States where the debt arises under a separate assistance program or is owed to an agency other than the grantor agency. Withholding is the act of holding back funds from the same grant or program in which the violation or other basis for creating the government's claim occurred. In a sense, withholding may be viewed as a type of offset.

GAO has adopted a "policy rule" that offset or withholding should not be used where it would have the effect of defeating or frustrating the purposes of the grant. E.g., B-171019, December 14, 1976; B-186166, August 26, 1976. The application of this rule depends upon the nature and purpose of the assistance program. "Individual consideration must be given to each instance." B-182423, November 25, 1974. Naturally, this consideration must include any relevant provisions of the program legislation, agency regulations, or the grant agreement.

In 43 Comp. Gen. 183 (1963), for example, a farmer who was receiving payments under the Soil Bank Act, administered by the patient. Patient funds in the PFOP account have been consistently treated as accountable funds. 68 Comp. Gen. 600 (1989); 68 Comp. Gen. 371 (1989); B-226911, October 19, 1987; B-221447, April 2, 1986; B-215477, November 5, 1984; B-208888, September 28, 1984.

Another example is private funds of litigants deposited in a registry account of a court of the United States, to be held pending distribution by order of the court in accordance with 28 U.S.C. §§ 2041 and 2042. These are also accountable funds under the trust fund concept. 64 Comp. Gen. 535 (1985); 6 Comp. Gen. 515 (1927); B-200108/B-198558, January 23, 1981. See also Osborn v. United States, 91 U.S. 474 (1875) (court can summarily compel restitution of funds improperly withdrawn from registry account by former officers).

Other situations applying the trust fund concept are 67 Comp. Gen. 342 (1988) (Indian trust accounts administered by Bureau of Indian Affairs); 17 Comp. Gen. 786 (1938) (United States Naval Academy laundry fund); B-190205, November 14, 1977 (foreign currencies accepted in connection with accommodation exchanges authorized by 31 U.S.C. § 3342); and A-22805, November 30, 1929 (funds taken from prisoners at the time of their confinement, to be held in their behalf). See also 69 Comp. Gen. 314 (1990) (BIA may contract with private bank for ministerial aspects of trust fund disbursements, but government disbursing officer must retain responsibility for managerial and judgmental aspects).

Not all nongovernment funds in the custody of a government official are held in a trust capacity. For example, in B-164419-O.M., May 20, 1969, GAO distinguished between funds of a foreign government held by the United States incident to a cooperative agreement (trust funds), and funds of a private contractor held by a government official for safekeeping as a favor to the contractor. The latter situation was a mere bailment for the benefit of the contractor, and the official was not an accountable officer with respect to those funds.

d. Items Which Are the Equivalent of Cash

The concepts of accountability and liability discussed in this chapter apply primarily to money. However, for reasons which should be apparent, accountability also attaches to certain non-cash items which are negotiable by the bearer or are otherwise the equivalent of cash. Examples are:

REV_00257438

Department of Agriculture, was indebted to the United States for unpaid taxes. Since the basic purpose of the Soil Bank Act was to protect and increase farm income, GAO decided that whether those payments should be applied to the recovery of an independently arising debt was a matter within Agriculture's discretion, based on Agriculture's determination "as to the extent to which such withholding would tend to effectuate or defeat the purposes of the [Soil Bank Act]." Id. at 185. Similarly, relying heavily on the Treasury Department's interpretation of the State and Local Fiscal Assistance Act of 1972 (general revenue sharing, since repealed), GAO concluded in B-176781-O.M., December 6, 1974, that offset against revenue sharing funds payable to a city was inappropriate to recover an overpayment to that city under a Federal Aviation Administration grant. Thus, agencies have some discretion in the matter.

It has been somewhat easier to conclude that offset will frustrate grant objectives where grant payments are made in advance of grantee performance. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 1329 (1976); B-171019, December 14, 1976. This is true to the extent the grantee is able to reduce its level of performance. Take, for example, a grant to construct a hospital. If a debt is offset against grant advances and the grantee can simply forgo the project and not build the hospital, there is no meaningful recovery. The federal government ends up keeping its own money, the grantee pays nothing, and the losers are the intended beneficiaries of the assistance, the patients who would have used the hospital. To this extent, an offset would accomplish nothing. This was the explicit grounds for rejecting offset, for example, in B-171019, December 14, 1976.

The problem was highlighted in a 1982 GAO report, Federal Agencies Negligent in Collecting Debts Arising From Audits, AFMD-82-32 (January 22, 1982). The report first noted GAO's policy and its rationale:

"[I]t is normally inappropriate for the Government to offset debts against an advance of funds to a grantee unless there is assurance that the same level of grant performance will be maintained.

"... When the offset is not replaced with non-Federal funds, there has, in effect, been no repayment. The scope of the program has simply been reduced and the intended recipient of the benefits loses by the amount of the audit disallowance."

Id. at 26. The report then recommended that grantor agencies "require grantee debtors to certify that their payment of audit-related debts has not reduced the level of performance of any Federal program," and monitor those assurances through grant management and audit follow-up. Id. at 28.

The concept also appeared in B-186166, August 26, 1976, in which the Department of Agriculture was exploring options to recover misapplied and unaccounted-for funds advanced to a university under research grants. Agriculture proposed crediting the indebtedness against allowable indirect grant costs. This would be done by requiring the university to document that it was expending the amount of earned indirect costs on approved program grants, thus maintaining the agreed-upon performance level. GAO concurred cautiously, on the condition that the grantee voluntarily agree to this approach. Should this method fail to satisfy the indebtedness, GAO further noted that the grantee was a state university and advised Agriculture to seek offset against other amounts owed to the state by the federal government.

A solution to the problem would be a rule that offset or withholding implicitly carries with it an obligation that the grantee not reduce its level of performance. As demonstrated by GAO's caution in B-186166, however, GAO has been reluctant to state such a rule in the absence of solid judicial precedent. As discussed later, this precedent may now exist, at least to some extent.

Whatever impediments may exist in the case of grant advances, offset will be more readily available under reimbursement-type grants. E.g., 55 Comp. Gen. 1329, 1332 (1976). Nevertheless, the general policy rule still applies. Thus, in B-163922.53, April 30, 1979, the Comptroller General advised the Departments of Labor and Transportation that disallowed costs under a Labor Department grant could be offset against reimbursements due under a Federal Highway Administration grant, but that Transportation still "must make the determination on a case-by-case basis as to whether offset will impair the program objectives."

When the GAO decisions cited in the preceding paragraphs were issued, the offset referred to was essentially nonstatutory. Administrative offset received a statutory basis with the enactment of section 10 of the Debt Collection Act of 1982, 31 U.S.C. § 3716. The corresponding portion of the Federal Claims Collection Standards, revised to reflect the 1982 legislation, is 4 C.F.R. § 102.3.

The administrative offset provided by 31 U.S.C. § 3716 does not apply to debts owed by state and local governments. 31 U.S.C. § 3701(c). Whether common-law offset remains against state and local governments has become a highly controversial issue. The position of GAO and the executive branch is that the government's common-law right of offset has not been abrogated with respect to state and local governments. See 4 C.F.R. § 102.3(b)(4); Common Rule §___.52(a)(1), 53 Fed. Reg. 8103. The issue is explored more fully in Chapter 13.

As noted above, offset and withholding are technically different. Many program statutes include withholding provisions. E.g., Perales v. Heckler, 762 F.2d 226 (2d Cir. 1985) (withholding provision in Medicaid legislation may be used to recoup overpayments from state even though state has not yet recovered from provider).

The theory behind withholding is that where a grantee has misapplied grant funds, or in other words, where a grantee's costs are disallowed, the grantee has, in effect, spent its own money and not funds from the grant. Since the issue frequently comes to light in a subsequent budget period, withholding may be viewed as the determination that an amount equal to the disallowed cost remains available for expenditure by the grantee and is therefore carried over into the new budget period. Accordingly, the amount of new money that must be awarded to the grantee to carry on the grant program is reduced by the amount of the disallowance. This may not be strictly applicable where the statutory program authority establishes an entitlement to the funds on the part of the grantee or provides other specific limitations on the use of withholding.

Under the Federal Claims Collection Standards, an agency to whom a debt is owed is required in all cases to explore the possibility of collecting by offset from other sources. 4 C.F.R. § 102.3(a). If offset is not available, a withholding provision may provide the basis to accomplish a similar result, at least in part. In 55 Comp. Gen. 1329 (1976), for example, the former Community Services Administration was statutorily authorized to suspend (withhold) grant payments to satisfy certain grantee tax delinquencies. Under this authority, the CSA could pay the suspended amounts over to the Internal Revenue Service to satisfy a grantee's tax liability to the extent that it was incurred by the grantee in carrying out CSA grants. Since funds previously advanced under the grant should have been used to pay the required taxes in the first place, transfer of the suspended funds to the IRS amounted to payment of an authorized grant purpose. See also B-171019, December 14, 1976 (withholding authority of former Law Enforcement Assistance Administration).

In any event, withholding under a limited statutory withholding provision does not satisfy the requirement for the agency to seek offset from other sources to the extent of any remaining liability for which withholding is not available. B-163922, February 10, 1978.

Statutory withholding provisions may include procedural safeguards, most typically notice and opportunity for hearing. Any such procedural requirements must, of course, be satisfied. See B-226544, March 24, 1987; Common Rule § ___.43(b), 53 Fed. Reg. 8102. The Common Rule authorizes withholding against advances, but cautions agencies to use sound judgment in exercising that authority. Common Rule § ___.52(a)(2), 53 Fed. Reg. 8103; Supplementary Information statement, id. at 8042.

As with offset, it should be kept in mind that nothing is accomplished by withholding unless the grantee carries out its program at the same level as would otherwise have been the case. The Supreme Court considered this issue in Bell v. New Jersey, 461 U.S. 773 (1983), upholding the statutory authority of the Department of Education to recover misspent grant funds. The Court rejected the state's suggestion that the federal government was free to reduce future grant advances, with the state then undertaking a smaller program. The Court recognized that, under this approach, the government would recover nothing and the states would effectively have no liability for misspent funds. Congress, said the Court, must have contemplated that the government would receive a net recovery by paying less for the same program level. Id. at 781 n.5 and 783 n.8.

A 1985 decision of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit took the analysis one step further. The case is Maryland Department of Human Resources v. Department of Health and Human Services, 763 F.2d 1441 (D.C. Cir. 1985). After discussing the Bell analysis, the court went on to conclude:

"[W]here a statute gives the federal government a right of recovery and also authorizes prospective withholding [withholding funds for services not yet rendered] as a remedy, the state remains obligated to provide all the services that it promised to supply in return for the funds that were then prospectively withheld in satisfaction of the state's debt to the federal government. If a state then proceeds to reduce the size of its federally funded program, the state has committed a new and independent breach of the funding conditions, which gives rise to a new debt to the federal government." 763 F.2d at 1455–56.

Under this approach, the remedy is clearly a meaningful one. How far the courts will go in applying it remains to be seen. Issues still to be resolved are the extent to which the principle may apply to an offset as opposed to a withholding, or to a nonstatutory offset or withholding.

In Housing Authority of the County of King v. Pierce, 701 F. Supp. 844 (D.D.C. 1988), modified on other grounds, 711 F. Supp. 19 (D.D.C. 1989), the court considered the recoupment of overpayments under advance-funded Department of Housing and Urban Development housing subsidies. HUD regulations (but not the program statute) authorized recoupment by reducing future subsidy payments. The court upheld HUD's common-law right to recover in the manner specified in the regulations. The court further commented that the teachings of Bell and Maryland Department of Human Resources "might and perhaps should guide HUD in the course of the recovery here," but found those cases not dispositive because they dealt with statutory rather than common-law remedies. 701 F. Supp. at 850 n.11.

Thus, there is a direct relationship between the appropriateness of offset or withholding against grant advances and the grantee's obligation to maintain the agreed-upon program level. Future litigation or legislation will determine the details of this relationship.

Federal Assistance: Guaranteed and Insured Loans

A. Introduction

1. General Description

The preceding chapter dealt with one of the major forms of federal financial assistance, the grant. Another major form is credit assistance, which includes direct loans and, the subject of this chapter, guaranteed and insured loans. In essence, a guaranteed loan is a loan or other advance of credit made to a borrower by a participating lending institution, where the United States Government, acting through the particular federal agency involved, "guarantees" payment of all or part of the principal amount of the loan, plus interest, in the event the borrower defaults. A statutory definition along these lines is found in 2 U.S.C. § 661a(3) (Supp. III 1991).[1] Depending on the particular program, the borrower may be a private individual, business entity, educational institution, or a state, local, or foreign government. In some cases, the guarantee may be created when a loan originally made by a government agency is subsequently sold by the agency to a third party with the government's assurance of repayment.

Strictly speaking, an insured loan and a guaranteed loan are two different things. An insured loan is one made initially by the federal agency and then sold, while a guaranteed loan is a loan made by a private lender. Occasionally, the agency's program legislation may draw the distinction. For example, the Rural Electrification Administration has authority both to make insured loans and to guarantee loans made by other lenders. Under 7 U.S.C. § 935, REA can make insured loans, defined in subsection 935(c) as loans that are "made, held, and serviced by the Administrator, and sold and insured by the Administrator hereunder." Under 7 U.S.C. § 936, REA can guarantee loans which are "initially made, held, and serviced by a legally organized lending agency."[2] Another example is the business and industrial loan program of the Farmers Home Administration established by 7 U.S.C. § 1932, again authorizing both insured and guaranteed loans. For purposes of this chapter, we use the term

[1]Similar definitions are found in GAO's Glossary of Terms Used in the Federal Budget Process, PAD-81-27 (3d ed. 1981), and in OMB Circular No. A-34, Part VI (1991). Summary information on individual programs may be found in the Catalog of Federal Domestic Assistance, published annually by the General Services Administration and Office of Management and Budget.

"guarantee" to refer to both guaranteed and insured loans unless otherwise indicated.

The objective of this chapter is to illustrate the kinds of issues and problems that arise in this area and the approaches used in resolving them. We have for the most part emphasized several of the better-known guarantee programs. Naturally, the extent to which any given case will have more general applicability will depend on the agency's organic legislation, program regulations, and the particular circumstances. Since program statutes and regulations are subject to change, the reader should view the discussion as merely illustrative of the particular issue involved.

The primary purpose of loan guarantees is to induce private lenders to extend financial assistance to borrowers who otherwise would not be able to obtain the needed capital on reasonable terms, if at all. Or, as a congressional subcommittee put it, loan guarantee programs are designed to redirect capital resources by intervening in the private market decision process, in order to further objectives deemed by Congress to be in the national interest.[3] These objectives may be social (veterans' home loan guarantees), economic (small business programs), or technological (guarantees designed to foster emerging energy technologies).[4]

When the federal government guarantees a loan, the guarantee is extended to the original lender supplying the funds, generally either a private lender or the Federal Financing Bank, as well as to any subsequent assignees or purchasers of the guaranteed portion of the loan. The subsequent purchase of a guaranteed loan from the original lender is called the "secondary market." See, for example, 51 Comp. Gen. 474 (1972). Secondary market purchasers are frequently large investment entities such as mutual funds or pension funds.

Secondary market purchasers are not always waiting in the wings, checkbooks in hand. Congress has on several occasions taken action to help create, stimulate, or facilitate secondary markets by [3]Subcomm. on Economic Stabilization, House Comm. on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, 95th Cong., 1st Sess., Catalog of Federal Loan Guarantee Programs x (Comm. Print 1977).

[4]In the technological area, GAO has suggested that the loan guarantee device is best suited to situations in which the technology has been known to work and is marginally economical, with the primary investment constraint being financial. - Treasury bonds with interest coupons attached. B-190506, November 28, 1977, affirmed on reconsideration, B-190506, December 20, 1979.

In the second decision in B-190506, it was contended that loss of the bonds did not really result in a loss to the government because neither the bonds nor the coupons had been cashed and a "stop notice" had been placed with the Federal Reserve Bank. GAO could not agree, however, since the bonds were bearer bonds and the stop notice does not completely extinguish the government's liability to pay on them. (The Treasury Department no longer issues coupon bonds, although many older ones are still outstanding.)

4. What Kinds of Events Produce Liability?

The generic term for losses which trigger an accountable officer's liability is "fiscal irregularity." See GAO, Policy and Procedures Manual for Guidance of Federal Agencies, title 7, § 8.2. Fiscal irregularities are divided into two broad categories: (1) physical loss or deficiency, and (2) illegal or improper payment. Since, as we will see, the relief statutes are expressly tied to these categories, the proper classification of a fiscal irregularity is the essential first step in determining which statute to apply.

A working definition of "physical loss or deficiency" may be found in B-202074, July 21, 1983:

> "In sum, 'physical loss or deficiency' includes such things as loss by theft or burglary, loss in shipment, and loss or destruction by fire, accident, or natural disaster. It also includes the totally unexplained loss, that is, a shortage or deficiency with absolutely no evidence to explain the disappearance. . . . Finally, . . . losses resulting from fraud or embezzlement by subordinate finance personnel may . . . be treated as physical losses."

This definition has been repeated in several subsequent decisions such as 70 Comp. Gen. 616, 621 (1991) and 65 Comp. Gen. 881, 883 (1986). A loss resulting from a bank failure would also be treated as a physical loss. See 18 Comp. Gen. 639 (1939); 20 Op. Att'y Gen. 24 (1891).

establishing privately owned but federally chartered corporations known as "government-sponsored enterprises" (GSE). Since a GSE is a creature of Congress, the actions it may take are those authorized in its enabling legislation. 71 Comp. Gen. 49 (1991) (Federal Agricultural Mortgage Corporation, or "Farmer Mac"). For a discussion from the programmatic perspective, see Federal Agricultural Mortgage Corporation: Issues Facing the Secondary Market for FmHA Guaranteed Loans, GAO/RCED-91-138 (June 1991).[5]

Under a loan guarantee, the risk against which the guarantee is made is, for the most part, default by the borrower. In some cases, however, other risks may be covered as well, and a few examples will be noted later in this chapter.

In the typical loan guarantee program, the lender is charged a fee by the agency, prescribed in the program legislation. However, there are statutory exceptions. For example, 7 U.S.C. § 936 provides that no fee shall be charged for Rural Electrification Administration loan guarantees. Where a fee is charged, its disposition, discussed later, is governed by (1) the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990, or (2) where the Credit Reform Act does not apply, the applicable program legislation, or (3) in the absence of any guidance in the program legislation, the miscellaneous receipts statute (31 U.S.C. § 3302(b)).

A guarantee may extend to 100 percent of the amount of the underlying loan, or some lesser percentage as specified in the program legislation. E.g., 7 U.S.C. § 936 (REA, 100 percent); 42 U.S.C. § 3142(a) (Economic Development Administration business loan guarantees, 90 percent of outstanding unpaid balance). Unless otherwise provided, a maximum guarantee percentage applies only to restrict the amount the administering agency is authorized to guarantee. E.g., B-137514, November 3, 1958 (no objection to proposal for borrower to "guarantee" portion of loan not covered by government guarantee by making "irrevocable deposit" financed by separate loan, thereby providing lender with 100 percent guarantee).

[5]Since GSEs are essentially privately owned corporations, we do not address them further in this publication. Readers needing more may consult several GAO reports such as Government-Sponsored Enterprises: A Framework for Limiting the Government's Exposure to Risks, GAO/GGD-91-90 (May 1991); Budget Issues: Profiles of Government-Sponsored Enterprises, GAO/AFMD-91-17 (February 1991); and Government-Sponsored Enterprises: The Government's Exposure to Risks, GAO/GGD-90-97 (August 1990).

Banks do not loan money without interest, and the typical loan guarantee therefore covers accrued but unpaid interest as well as unpaid principal. The program statute may set a maximum acceptable rate of interest, or may authorize the administering agency to do so by regulation. Assuming there is nothing to the contrary in the enabling legislation, an agency may, within its discretion, extend its guarantees to loans with variable interest rates (rates which rise or fall with changes in prevailing rates) as well as loans with fixed interest rates. B-184857, June 11, 1976.

Credit assistance legislation frequently vests considerable discretion in the administering agency. E.g., B-202568, September 11, 1981 (imposition of "no credit elsewhere" eligibility test to meet funding shortfall within SBA's broad discretion under section 7(b) of Small Business Act); B-134628, January 15, 1958 (Civil Aeronautics Board authorized within its discretion to make payments to lender immediately upon debtor's default rather than after completion of foreclosure proceedings).

For non-entitlement programs, just as in the case of grants and cooperative agreements, GAO will not, at the request of a rejected applicant, review the exercise of an agency's discretion in rejecting an application for a loan guarantee. B-178460, June 6, 1973 (non-decision letter). Nevertheless, GAO may become involved under its other authorities (decision, account settlement, claims settlement), and may review an agency's conduct of a program under its general audit authority. For example, the Emergency Loan Guarantee Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1841–1852, specifically authorized GAO to audit any borrower applying for a loan guarantee, but made no mention of auditing the Emergency Loan Guarantee Board which administered the program. The issue arose in connection with the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation assistance program, carried out under this statute. GAO took the position that it had the authority to audit the Board's conduct of the program to evaluate whether the Board and borrower were complying with the statutory provisions and whether the government's interests were being adequately protected. This authority derives from GAO's basic audit statutes and does not have to be repeated in every piece of legislation. B-169300, September 6, 1972; B-169300, September 21, 1971.

2. Sources of Guarantee Authority

The authority to guarantee the repayment of indebtedness must be derived from some statutory basis. In most cases, this takes the form of express statutory authorization. Typically, the statute will authorize the administering agency to establish the terms and conditions under which the guarantee will be extended, but may also impose various limitations. An example is section 202(a)(1) of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965, as amended, 42 U.S.C. § 3142(a)(1), which authorizes the Economic Development Administration to provide financial assistance to eligible borrowers through direct business loans and loan guarantees:

> "The Secretary is authorized to aid in financing, within a redevelopment area, the purchase or development of land and facilities (including machinery and equipment) for industrial or commercial usage . . . by (A) purchasing evidences of indebtedness, (B) making loans (which for purposes of this section shall include participation in loans), (C) guaranteeing loans made to private borrowers by private lending institutions, for any of the purposes referred to in this paragraph upon application of such institution and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe, except that no such guarantee shall at any time exceed 90 per centum of the amount of the outstanding unpaid balance of such loan."

Program authority, as in the example cited, is most commonly in the form of permanent legislation authorizing an ongoing program. In addition, guarantee programs are occasionally enacted to deal with a specific crisis of limited duration, and are either not codified or removed from the United States Code when the program is completed. An example of this latter type is the Chrysler Corporation Loan Guarantee Act of 1979, Pub. L. No. 96-185, 93 Stat. 1324 (1980), dropped from the 1988 edition of the U.S. Code because the authority to issue commitments and guarantees expired at the end of 1983 and all loans guaranteed were repaid in full. Guarantee programs may also be enacted as part of appropriation acts. An example is discussed in GAO's report Israel: U.S. Loan Guaranties for Immigrant Absorption, GAO/NSIAD-92-119 (February 1992).

It is also possible for loan guarantee authority to be derived by necessary implication from a statutory program of financial assistance, that is, under program legislation which does not explicitly use the term "guarantee" or "insure." For example, the current version of section 7(a) of the Small Business Act, 15 U.S.C. § 636(a), authorizes the Small Business Administration to make loans to small business concerns as follows:

"The Administration is empowered to the extent and in such amounts as provided in advance in appropriation Acts to make loans for plant acquisition, construction, conversion, or expansion, including the acquisition of land, material, supplies, equipment, and working capital, and to make loans to any qualified small business concern . . . for purposes of this chapter. Such financings may be made either directly or in cooperation with banks or other financial institutions through agreements to participate on an immediate or deferred (guaranteed) basis."

The statute then goes on to list a number of limitations. A 1981 amendment (95 Stat. 357, 767) added the word "guaranteed." Even before the amendment, GAO had concluded that a loan guarantee program was within the SBA's discretion under section 7. 51 Comp. Gen. 474 (1972). An earlier decision, B-140673, October 12, 1959, had upheld a "deferred participation" program under section 7(a), under which SBA would purchase the agreed portion of the deferred participation loan immediately upon demand and reserve the right to recover from the lender if SBA subsequently determined that the lender had not substantially complied with the participation agreement. In view of the broad discretion granted SBA under the statute, SBA was not required to make the "substantial compliance" determination before making payment to the lender.[6]

The evolution of SBA's authority to conduct its disaster loan program, 15 U.S.C. § 636(b), followed a similar pattern. In B-121589, October 19, 1954, the Comptroller General tentatively approved a deferred participation program, strongly urging that the statute be amended to include "immediate or deferred participation" language patterned after the pre-1981 version of section 636(a). This was done and, based on 51 Comp. Gen. 474, was found sufficient to authorize SBA to guarantee disaster loans to eligible borrowers by participating lending institutions. 58 Comp. Gen. 138, 145 (1978). To remove any doubt, the same amendment which added the word "guaranteed" to section 636(a) added it as well to section 636(b) (95 Stat. at 778).

In connection with credit assistance under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, GAO recognized the SBA's implied authority to establish a program in which SBA would guarantee loans made by private lending institutions to small business investment companies, [6]The primary difference between a loan guarantee program and a deferred participation loan program is that the lending institution can demand that SBA pay the outstanding balance of a deferred participation loan at any time, but can demand SBA's purchase of the outstanding balance of a guaranteed loan only under the conditions prescribed in the regulations—generally only upon default of the borrower.

even though the statute authorized only a direct loan program. 42 Comp. Gen. 146 (1962). The decision pointed out that the legislative history of a 1961 amendment to the act clearly demonstrated that Congress intended to continue the nonstatutory "standby" guaranteed loan program that had existed for several years, and concluded therefore that the absence of specific language authorizing the program was due to the apparent belief by both Congress and SBA that such language was unnecessary and did not reflect an intent to deny SBA the authority. See also B-149685, March 20, 1968. The guarantee program is now expressly authorized in 15 U.S.C. § 683.

Authority by necessary implication cannot be derived solely from a purpose clause, but must be supported by the operative provisions of the statute. 71 Comp. Gen. 49 (1991).

Regardless of whether a loan guarantee program is established under an express statutory provision or by necessary implication, the basic responsibility for administering the program clearly rests with the agency involved. This includes the authority to determine whether or not to extend a guarantee in a particular case, and the manner in which the guarantees are to be handled. The agency has considerable discretion, subject of course to any applicable statutory requirements or restrictions.

B. Budgetary and Obligational Treatment

When a federal agency guarantees a loan, there is no immediate cash outlay. The need for an actual cash disbursement, apart from administrative expenses, does not arise unless and until the borrower defaults on the loan and the government is called upon to honor the guarantee. Depending on the terms of the loan, this may not happen until many years after the guarantee is made. It is thus apparent that loan guarantees require budgetary treatment different from ordinary government obligations and expenditures. This treatment is prescribed generally by the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990 (FCRA). Before describing the FCRA, it is important to first describe the pre-credit reform situation because it illustrates the objectives of credit reform and because FCRA does not cover all programs.

1. Prior to Federal Credit Reform Act

Prior to credit reform, the authority to guarantee or insure loans generally was not regarded as budget authority. Indeed, the original enactment of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 expressly excluded loan guarantees from the statutory definition of budget authority. Pub. L. No. 93-344, § 3(a)(2), 88 Stat. 297, 299 (1974). Under this treatment, the extension of a loan guarantee was an off-budget transaction and was, at the extension stage, largely not addressed by the budget and appropriations process. If and when the government had to pay on the guarantee, i.e., upon default, the administering agency would seek liquidating appropriations, and these liquidating appropriations counted as budget authority. Of course, by the time a liquidating appropriation became necessary, the United States was contractually committed to honor the guarantee, and Congress had little choice but to appropriate the funds. This is an example of so-called "backdoor spending." By the time the budget and appropriations process became involved, there was no meaningful role for it to play.

When a loan guarantee is committed or issued, it cannot be known with absolute certainty when or to what extent the government might be called upon to honor it. Accordingly, and since budget authority was not provided in advance, the making of a loan guarantee, however binding on the government the commitment may have been, was treated only as a contingent liability and did not result in a recordable obligation for purposes of 31 U.S.C. § 1501(a). A recordable obligation did not arise until the contingency occurred (default by the borrower or other event as authorized in the program legislation), at which time it was recorded against the appropriation or fund available for liquidation. 65 Comp. Gen. 4 (1985); 60 Comp. Gen. 700, 703 (1981).

Under this approach, the obligation was viewed as "authorized by law" for purposes of the Antideficiency Act, and there was no violation if obligations resulting from authorized guarantees exceeded available budgetary resources. 65 Comp. Gen. 4 (1985); B-226718.2, August 19, 1987.

In a limited sense, there was a certain logic to this approach. Many loans are repaid in whole or in part, with the result that the government is never called upon to pay under the guarantee, the only disbursements being the administrative expenses of running the program. To require budget authority in the full amount being guaranteed would artificially inflate the budget. The problem was that the pre-credit reform approach went to the opposite extreme, by reflecting the cost to the government in the year the guarantee was made as zero. Since there was no longer any room for discretion by the time liquidating appropriations became necessary, loan guarantee programs were not forced to compete with other programs for increasingly scarce budgetary resources. No one involved in the budget process—Congress, OMB, GAO—particularly liked this system, and reform became inevitable.

At an absolute minimum, GAO strongly encouraged the imposition of limits, either in the enabling legislation or in appropriation acts, on the total amount of loans to be guaranteed. E.g., Legislation Needed to Establish Specific Loan Guarantee Limits for the Economic Development Administration, FGMSD-78-62 (January 5, 1979). Ceilings of this type may limit the amount of guarantees that can be issued in a given fiscal year, or the total amount of guarantees that can be outstanding at any one time. An example of the former is discussed in 60 Comp. Gen. 700 (1981).

A device that became common in the 1980s was the granting of loan guarantee authority only to the extent provided in advance in appropriation acts. The device was reinforced in 1985 when Congress (1) added to the Congressional Budget Act a definition of "credit authority" ("authority to incur direct loan obligations or to incur primary loan guarantee commitments"), and (2) subjected to a point of order any bill providing new credit authority unless it also limited that authority to the extent or amounts provided in appropriation acts. 2 U.S.C. §§ 622(10), 652(a).

While this device provided a measure of congressional control, it still did not require the advance provision of actual budget authority. For example, the Chrysler Corporation Loan Guarantee Act, which predated the 1985 legislation noted above, limited the authority to guarantee loans to the amounts provided in advance in appropriation acts. The Comptroller General and the Attorney General both concluded that this provision did not require advance budget authority, but was satisfied by an appropriation act provision placing a ceiling on the total amount of loans that could be guaranteed, i.e., on contingent liability. B-197380, April 10, 1980; Loan Guarantees—Authority of Chrysler Corporation Loan Guarantee Board to Issue Guarantees, 43 Op. Att'y Gen. No. 27 (April 23, 1980).

Both opinions also concluded that the appropriation act ceiling related only to outstanding loan principal, with contingent liability for loan interest being in addition to the stated amount.

Where loan guarantee authority is limited to amounts provided in appropriation acts—and we emphasize that we are addressing situations not governed by the Federal Credit Reform Act—those "amounts," as noted, are not actual budget authority but ceilings on contingent liability. Therefore, while exceeding the ceiling may be illegal for other reasons,[7] it does not violate the Antideficiency Act. 64 Comp. Gen. 282, 288–90 (1985). Analogous to budget authority, loan guarantee authority must generally be used (i.e., commitments made) in the fiscal year or years for which it is provided unless the appropriation act provides otherwise. B-212857, November 8, 1983. Also, where advance authority in appropriation acts is statutorily required and Congress does not provide it, the agency's authority to carry out the program may be effectively suspended for the fiscal year in question. B-230951, March 10, 1989.[8]

Congress may set a minimum program level as well as a ceiling. Again for programs not governed by the Credit Reform Act, failure to achieve the minimum commitment level would not constitute an impoundment since the commitment amount is not budget authority. B-195437.2, September 17, 1986. However, under a loan insurance program where the loan itself is made by the agency, failure to achieve a mandated minimum program level would be an impoundment unless the failure results from programmatic factors. Id.; B-195437.3, February 5, 1988.

2. Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990

Consideration of various reform proposals during the 1980s centered on the recognition that there is a "subsidy element" to a government loan guarantee program. If all loans were repaid, there would be no cost to the government apart from administrative expenses. Were this the case, however, there would probably have been no need for the program to begin with. Since the objective of a loan guarantee

[7]An "unusual" case where exceeding a ceiling was not illegal, because of rather explicit legislative history, is 53 Comp. Gen. 560 (1974).

[8]Standing alone, 2 U.S.C. § 652(a) is not a statutory requirement for advance appropriation authority. A point of order may not be raised or may be defeated, in which event the validity of any ensuing legislation is not affected. As in the situation discussed in B-230951, many program statutes independently impose the requirement.

program is to enhance the availability of credit which the private lending market alone cannot or will not provide, it is reasonable to expect that there will be defaults, most likely at a higher rate than the private lending market experiences. It became apparent that credit reform had to do two things. First, it had to devise a meaningful way of measuring the true cost to the government; and second, it had to bring those costs fully within the budget and appropriations process. See, e.g., Budget Issues: Budgetary Treatment of Federal Credit Programs, GAO/AFMD-89-42 (April 1989).

The culmination of these reform efforts was the Federal Credit Reform Act of 1990, enacted by section 13201(a) of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-508, 104 Stat. 1388, 1388-609, and codified at 2 U.S.C. §§ 661—661f (Supp. III 1991). The approach of the FCRA is to require the advance provision of budget authority to cover the subsidy portion of a loan guarantee program, with the non-subsidy portion (i.e., the portion expected to be repaid) financed through borrowings from the Treasury. The Office of Management and Budget has issued detailed implementing instructions in OMB Circular No. A-34, Part VI, transmitted by OMB Bulletin No. 92-01, October 1, 1991. The FCRA applies to loan guarantee commitments made on or after October 1, 1991, with exceptions to be noted later.

a. Post-1991 Guarantee Commitments

One of the major purposes of the FCRA is to "measure more accurately the costs [the subsidy element, in essence] of Federal credit programs." 2 U.S.C. § 661(1). Before the budgetary and appropriations aspects of FCRA can come into play, the administering agency, working with OMB, must determine the cost of its programs. The law defines "cost" as the "estimated long-term cost to the Government . . . calculated on a net present value basis, excluding administrative costs." Id. § 661a(5)(A). More specifically for purposes of this chapter, the cost of a loan guarantee is the—

"net present value when a guaranteed loan is disbursed of the cash flow from—

"(i) estimated payments by the Government to cover defaults and delinquencies, interest subsidies, or other payments, and

"(ii) the estimated payments to the Government including origination and other fees, penalties and recoveries." Id. § 661a(5)(C).

REV_00257654

Historical experience is obviously a relevant factor in determining cost. Risk assessment is also very important, and OMB requires agencies to develop risk categories for their credit programs. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.3. Agencies should not blindly rely on historical experience when the risk factor has changed. See Loan Guarantees: Export Credit Guarantee Programs' Long-Run Costs Are High, GAO/NSIAD-91-180 (April 1991) at 3. For example, it is not unreasonable to expect the default rate under a guaranteed student loan program to increase during a recession, resulting in a higher cost. Established secondary market experience is also relevant in assessing risk. NSIAD-91-180 at 15.

The second major purpose of FCRA is to "place the cost of credit programs on a budgetary basis equivalent to other Federal spending." 2 U.S.C. § 661(2). To accomplish this, 2 U.S.C. § 661c(b), perhaps the key provision of FCRA, provides:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, . . . new loan guarantee commitments may be made for fiscal year 1992 and thereafter only to the extent that—

"(1) appropriations of budget authority to cover their costs are made in advance;

"(2) a limitation on the use of funds otherwise available for the cost of a . . . loan guarantee program is enacted; or

"(3) authority is otherwise provided in appropriation Acts."

Thus, unless Congress specifically provides otherwise, loan guarantees may be made only if budget authority to cover their cost has been provided in advance. The cost of a loan guarantee is regarded as new budget authority for the fiscal year "in which definite authority becomes available or indefinite authority is used." 2 U.S.C. § 661c(d)(1).

To implement these new concepts, the law defines two new accounts for credit programs, a "credit program account" and a "financing account." The program account is the budget account into which appropriations of budget authority are made. The financing account is a revolving, non-budget account from which the guarantees are actually administered. It receives cost payments from the program account and includes all other cash flows resulting from the guarantee commitment. 2 U.S.C. §§ 661a(6) and (7). Administrative expenses are

The second type of fiscal irregularity is the "illegal, improper, or incorrect payment." 31 U.S.C. §§ 3527(c), 3528(a)(4). The key word here is "payment"—"the disbursement of public funds by a disbursing officer or his subordinate." B-202074, July 21, 1983. Improper payments include such things as payments obtained by fraud, whether by nongovernment persons or by government employees other than subordinate finance personnel; erroneous payments or overpayments resulting from human or mechanical error attributable to the government; payments prohibited by statute; and disbursements for unauthorized purposes. The legislative history of 31 U.S.C. § 3527(c), the improper payment relief statute for disbursing officers, describes an improper payment as a payment "which the Comptroller General finds is not in strict technical conformity" with the law. Excerpts from the pertinent committee reports are quoted in 49 Comp. Gen. 38, 40 (1969) and in B-202074, cited above.

A loss resulting from an uncollectible personal check may be an improper payment or a physical loss, depending on the circumstances. If the loss results from an authorized check-cashing transaction, it is an improper payment because government funds were disbursed to the bearer. 70 Comp. Gen. 616 (1991). However, if the check is tendered to pay an obligation owed to the United States or to purchase something from the government, the loss, to the extent an accountable loss exists, would be a physical loss. In this connection, Treasury regulations provide:

> "All checks received by any Government officer are accepted subject to collection. If any check cannot be collected in full or is lost or destroyed before collection, the administrative agency concerned is responsible for obtaining the proper payment. A payment by check is not effective unless and until the full proceeds have been received."

I Treasury Financial Manual § 5-2010. If a personal check is accepted subject to collection, and if the government does not exchange value for the check, any resulting loss is not a loss within the scope of the accountable officer laws and may be adjusted administratively by the agency. If, however, an accountable officer purports to accept a personal check in satisfaction of an obligation due the United States (rather than for collection only), or if the government parts with something of value in exchange for the check (e.g., sale of government property), a resulting loss is treated as a physical loss. B-201673 et al., September 23, 1982. See also 3 Comp. Gen. 403 shown as a separate and distinct line item within the program account. Id. § 661c(g).

A review of 1992 appropriation acts disclosed several variations in the way Congress made the appropriations contemplated by 2 U.S.C. § 661c.

- The Federal Housing Administration General and Special Risk Program Account received an appropriation of costs and a ceiling on the total loan principal to be guaranteed ($55 million to support a program level of $8.6 billion).[9]
- The program account for Economic Development Administration guaranteed loans received an appropriation of costs with no program ceiling specified.[10]
- The Small Business Administration Business Loans Program Account received separate cost appropriations for direct and guaranteed loans with a total loan ceiling for direct, but not guaranteed, loans.[11]

Each of these appropriations also includes a separate specific appropriation for administrative expenses.[12]

From a chronological perspective, the first step is to determine the cost of a guaranteed loan program in accordance with 2 U.S.C. § 661a(5). The President's annual budget is to reflect these costs and [12]A very general definition of "administrative expenses" may be found in B-24341, March 12, 1942, at 5:

"The term 'administrative expenses' would appear to relate, generally, to those expenses necessarily incurred in administering, executing, or carrying out the primary purposes of legislative enactments. Whether a particular expense should be classified as an 'administrative expense' would appear to be governed by the particular program involved, the provisions of the act in which the term appears or to which it relates, and the intention of the legislative body in using the expression, and what might be regarded as an item of 'administrative expense' within the meaning of one statute might not be so regarded under another statute enacted for entirely different purposes."

For FCRA purposes, see also OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.5.

the planned level of new guarantee commitments. 2 U.S.C. § 661c(a). Congress then makes the appropriation of costs and administrative expenses to the program account.

The appropriation of costs "shall constitute an obligation of the credit program account to pay to the financing account." Id. § 661c(d)(1). When a loan for which a guarantee commitment has been made is disbursed by the lender, the cost of the guarantee is obligated against the program account and paid into the financing account. Id. § 661c(d)(2). If the loan is disbursed in a single payment, the cost is paid into the financing account in a single payment. If the loan is disbursed in more than one payment, costs are paid into the financing account in the same proportion. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.7(e). The cost payments are carried in the financing account as unobligated balances until obligations are incurred to make payments under the terms of the guarantee, at which time they become obligated balances until disbursed. Id.

The law recognizes that estimating costs is not an exact science and that cost estimates are subject to change over time. Accordingly, costs are to be reestimated annually as long as the loans are outstanding. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.8. If a reestimation results in an increase to the cost estimate, the law provides permanent indefinite budget authority for the program account. 2 U.S.C. § 661c(f). The agency requests an apportionment of this indefinite authority from OMB, and then immediately records an obligation against the program account and pays the funds into the financing account. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.8.

The law also provides for the treatment of "modifications." For purposes of FCRA, a modification is any government action that alters the cost of an outstanding loan guarantee from the most recent estimate or reestimate, except actions permitted under the terms of existing contracts. 2 U.S.C. § 661a(5)(D); OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.9(a). The law prohibits the modification of a loan guarantee commitment "in a manner that increases its cost unless budget authority for the additional cost is appropriated, or is available out of existing appropriations or from other budgetary resources." 2 U.S.C. § 661c(e). Modifications include such things as forgiveness, forbearance, reductions in interest rate, prepayments without penalty, and extensions of maturity, except where permitted under an existing contract. OMB Circular No. A-34, § 62.9(a). They also include the sale of loan assets and actions resulting from new legislation, such as a statutory restriction on debt collection. Id. As with reestimates, at the time a modification is made, the agency records an obligation of the estimated cost increase against the program account and pays the amount into the financing account. Id. § 62.9(c).

If an agency's original cost estimates, reestimates, and modification estimates have been accurate, the balances of financing accounts for loan guarantees should always be sufficient to make any required payments. However, if a balance is not sufficient, the "Secretary of the Treasury shall . . . lend to, or pay to the financing accounts such amounts as may be appropriate." 2 U.S.C. § 661d(c). The Secretary is also authorized to borrow or receive amounts from the financing accounts. Id. All of these transactions between the Treasury and financing accounts are subject to the apportionment requirements of the Antideficiency Act. Id.

Under the FCRA structure as outlined above, there are two separate sets of "obligations"—obligations against the program account when budget authority is paid over to the financing account, and obligations against the financing account when claims are made for payment under a guarantee.

OMB Circular A-34, § 63.2, identifies four actions that will result in Antideficiency Act violations:

(1) Overobligation or overexpenditure of the amounts appropriated for costs. This includes a modification resulting in an overobligation.

(2) Overobligation or overexpenditure of the credit level supported by the enacted cost appropriation.

(3) Overobligation or overexpenditure of the amount appropriated for administrative expenses.

(4) Obligation or expenditure of the lapsed unobligated balance of the cost appropriation, except to correct mathematical or data input errors in calculating subsidy amounts. However, error correction will be considered a violation if it exceeds the amount of the lapsed unobligated balance.

Finally, the law emphasizes that the provisions of the FCRA are not to be construed as changing or overriding the administering agency's authority to determine the terms and conditions of eligibility for, or amount of, a loan or loan guarantee. 2 U.S.C. § 661d(g).

As a result of FCRA, guarantee programs should no longer be unrestricted. Even if the applicable appropriation act does not explicitly set a maximum program level, the program level that can be supported by the enacted cost appropriation, reenforced by the Antideficiency Act, constitutes an effective ceiling. Programs not governed by FCRA may have their own ceilings. Although a loan or guarantee may not exceed a statutory ceiling, it may nevertheless be possible to extend assistance if the borrower qualifies under another program. For example, in 35 Comp. Gen. 219 (1955), the Small Business Administration could not make a disaster loan to a small business concern which had suffered damage in a flood because SBA had already used up the applicable ceiling on disaster loans. However, it could make a business loan to the same borrower if the transaction otherwise met the criteria under SBA's business loan program.

b. Pre-1992 Commitments

The treatment described above applies to loan guarantee commitments made on or after October 1, 1991. Commitments made prior to fiscal year 1992 were made under the rules summarized in Section B.1. Given the varying maturities under different credit programs, pre-1992 guarantees are likely to be around for many years. Since pre-1992 guarantees were not subject to any requirement to determine subsidy costs or to obtain advance appropriations of budget authority, they require different treatment and are addressed in separate provisions of the FCRA.

Three provisions are particularly relevant. First, the law establishes "liquidating accounts," defined as budget accounts which include all cash flows to and from the government resulting from pre-1992 commitments. 2 U.S.C. § 661a(8). Second, all collections resulting from pre-1992 guarantee commitments are to be credited to the liquidating account and are available to liquidate obligations to the same extent they were under the applicable program legislation prior to enactment of FCRA. Id. § 661f(b). At least once a year, unobligated balances in the liquidating account which are in excess of current needs are to be transferred to the general fund of the Treasury. Id.

Third, 2 U.S.C. § 661d(d) provides:

"If funds in liquidating accounts are insufficient to satisfy the obligations and commitments of said accounts, there is hereby provided permanent, indefinite authority to make any payments required to be made on such obligations and commitments."

Thus, for pre-1992 guarantees which are liquidated in accordance with the terms of the original commitment, payment will still be made from liquidating appropriations. The main change under FCRA is the provision of these liquidating appropriations on a permanent, indefinite basis.

A "modification" to a pre-1992 loan guarantee—the term having the same meaning as described in Section B.2.a for post-1991 guarantees—is treated differently. See OMB Circular No. A-34, §§ 62.1(c) and 62.9 for applicable procedures.

c. Entitlement Programs

A partial exemption from FCRA is found in 2 U.S.C. § 661c(c), which provides that the requirement for the advance appropriation of budget authority to cover estimated costs does not apply to (1) a loan guarantee program which constitutes an entitlement, or (2) programs of the Commodity Credit Corporation existing on FCRA's date of enactment (November 5, 1990). An entitlement program is one in which the provision of assistance is mandatory with respect to borrowers and lenders who meet applicable statutory and regulatory eligibility requirements. The statute gives two examples—the guaranteed student loan program and the veterans' home loan guarantee program. Since the exemption is from the appropriation requirement of 2 U.S.C. § 661c(b) and not the entire act, other provisions of FCRA and OMB Circular A-34 presumably apply to the extent not inconsistent with the exemption.

The pre-FCRA rules summarized in Section B.1 form the starting point with respect to obligational treatment and the application of the Antideficiency Act. A 1985 decision, 65 Comp. Gen. 4, reiterated these rules in the context of the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. GAO advised the Department of Education that (1) a guarantee itself is only a contingent liability and is not recordable as an obligation; (2) an obligation must be recorded upon occurrence of one of the contingencies specified in the program legislation which will require the government to honor the guarantee (in this case, loan default or the death, disability or bankruptcy of the borrower); and (3) the Antideficiency Act does not require that sufficient budget authority be available at the time the obligation is recorded because, by virtue of the requirements of the program legislation, incurring the obligation is "authorized by law" for Antideficiency Act purposes.

For fiscal year 1992, Congress appropriated to the program accounts for both the guaranteed student loan and the veterans' home loan programs, for costs as defined in FCRA, "such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the program," together with a definite (specific dollar amount) appropriation for administrative expenses.[13]

d. Certain Insurance Programs

Another provision of FCRA, 2 U.S.C. § 661e(a)(1), exempts from the entire act—

> "the credit or insurance activities of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, National Credit Union Administration, Resolution Trust Corporation, Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, National Flood Insurance, National Insurance Development Fund, Crop Insurance, or Tennessee Valley Authority."

Thus, to the extent the rules in Section B.1 would apply to any of the programs conducted by these entities to begin with, they continue to apply unaffected by FCRA.

C. Extension of Guarantees

1. Coverage of Lenders (Initial and Subsequent)

a. Eligibility of Lender/Debt Instrument

Program legislation may prescribe eligibility criteria for lending institutions, or may otherwise limit the types of lending institutions to which guarantees may be extended, either as the initial lender or as a subsequent transferee, or may address the manner in which the debt instrument covered by the guarantee may be treated. The safest generalization in this area, and the common strain throughout the cases, is that any proposed action must be consistent with the terms and intent of the agency's statutory authority.

For example, in B-194153, September 6, 1979, GAO considered a proposed pilot program in which the Economic Development Administration, an agency within the Department of Commerce, would guarantee loans made to private borrowers by participating lending institutions, with the guaranteed portion of the loan to be subsequently assigned to the city of Chicago and financed through the issuance of bonds. The statutory basis for the proposal, 42 U.S.C. § 3142, authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to guarantee up to 90 percent of the outstanding balance of loans for certain specified purposes "made to private borrowers by private lending institutions." GAO concluded that allowing the guarantee to be assigned to an entity that was neither private nor a lending institution and could not have qualified for a guarantee initially, would exceed EDA's statutory authority since EDA would be doing something indirectly—guaranteeing a loan by a non-private lender—that the statute would not permit it to do directly.

GAO revisited the issue a few years later, and reaffirmed the ineligibility of public lenders to participate as secondary market purchasers under the "private lending institution" requirement of 42 U.S.C. § 3142. Since a secondary market purchaser effectively becomes the lender, it makes no difference whether sale to the public lender is contemplated from the loan's inception or merely occurs in the ordinary course of secondary market operations. 61 Comp. Gen. 517 (1982).

Another issue in B-194153 was whether EDA could legally allow a guaranteed loan to be evidenced by two notes, one to be fully guaranteed and the second with no guarantee. The Comptroller General found the proposed arrangement within EDA's administrative discretion under the statute since the two-note arrangement would still conform to the statutory requirement that no more than 90 percent of a loan be guaranteed, and furthermore was apparently intended to effectuate the basic legislative purpose. The decision pointed out, however, that since the two notes represented one loan, their substantive terms such as maturity dates and interest rates must be the same, and the two-note mechanism must not increase the government's potential liability. This portion of the decision was later modified in 60 Comp. Gen. 464 (1981), to the extent that GAO approved use of a "split interest rate" in which the interest on the EDA-guaranteed note was lower than the interest rate on the unguaranteed note. The split-interest scheme was consistent with programs by other agencies under similar legislation and would be more favorable to the government.

A related type of question arose under the now defunct New Community Development Program authorized by the Urban Growth and New Community Development Act of 1970. The legislation authorized various forms of financial assistance to stimulate the development of new communities, including the guarantee of obligations of private new community developers and state development agencies. A question arose as to whether the Department of Housing and Urban Development was authorized or required to guarantee the indebtedness of a private developer to contractors and subcontractors who had supplied goods and services to the developer. Finding that the intent of the program legislation was that HUD guarantee only obligations issued to private investors, the Comptroller General concluded that HUD was neither required nor authorized to issue guarantees that would run to a developer's contractors and subcontractors. B-170971, August 22, 1975; B-170971, July 22, 1975.

b. Substitution of Lender

As a general proposition, substitution of lenders is permissible as long as it is not prohibited by the program legislation or regulations and the "replacement lender" meets any applicable eligibility requirements.

In 60 Comp. Gen. 700 (1981), GAO considered the effect of a change in lenders in the Farmers Home Administration's rural development loan guarantee program. The program operated under an annual ceiling, and the specific question was whether a guarantee could continue to be charged against the ceiling for the fiscal year in which it was initially approved, when a change in lenders took place in a subsequent fiscal year. As to the programmatic significance of the change, the decision stated:

"[T]he basic purpose of the FmHA rural development loan guarantee program is to provide assistance to eligible borrowers to enable them to accomplish one or more of the statutory objectives. In other words, although the guarantee is extended to the lender, it is clear that the purpose of doing so is not to provide a Federal benefit to the lending institution but to induce the lender to make the loan to the borrower. In this sense, the lender is just a conduit or funding mechanism through which FmHA provides assistance to an eligible borrower so that the statutory objectives can be realized. Thus, the particular lender involved is of relatively little consequence."

Id. at 708–09. Therefore, the decision held that where a guarantee is charged against the ceiling for a particular fiscal year, it can continue to be charged against the same ceiling notwithstanding a substitution of lenders in a subsequent fiscal year, provided that the other relevant terms of the agreement (borrower, loan purpose, loan terms) remain substantially the same. Id. at 709. The statement that the particular lender is of little consequence presumes, as was in fact the case, that the program legislation does not contain any specific eligibility requirements for lenders. Any such requirements (for example, the "private lender" requirement in the EDA cases discussed above) would of course have to be followed.

c. Existence of Valid Guarantee

In order for a loan guarantee commitment to be valid and hence binding on the government, the government official making the commitment must be authorized to do so, and the guarantee must be made to an eligible lender extending credit to an eligible borrower for an authorized purpose. Questions as to whether a valid guarantee was ever created often do not arise until the lender calls upon the government to pay under the guarantee. The answer depends on the program statute and regulations, the terms of the guarantee instrument, and the conduct of the parties.

In 54 Comp. Gen. 219 (1974), GAO considered the authority of the Small Business Administration to reimburse three different lenders. In each case, the borrower had applied to SBA for financial assistance, the lender (at the request or with the approval of an SBA official) had provided interim funds to the borrower, but, for various reasons, the financial assistance was ultimately not extended.

In the first case, an SBA official who was authorized to approve loan guarantees advised the bank in writing that the guarantee had been approved. SBA subsequently issued a formal loan authorization, but later canceled it because the bank did not comply with all of the terms and conditions of the guarantee agreement, one of which was that the bank disburse the loan within 3 months. Although the initial written approval created a valid guarantee, the bank's noncompliance caused it to lapse, and SBA was therefore not obligated to purchase the interim note, i.e., to reimburse the bank for the advance.

In the second case, an authorized SBA official had similarly advised the bank in writing that the guarantee had been approved. Here, however, SBA subsequently determined that the borrower was not eligible for the guarantee, and therefore never issued a formal loan authorization. Since the bank relied on the prior approval and was not legally required to comply with the conditions of the guarantee agreement (such as payment of the guarantee fee) until SBA issued the formal authorization, the bank was entitled to reimbursement for the interim loan.

In the third case, SBA had formally approved a direct loan to a borrower and had issued a written loan authorization. Because of its inability to immediately disburse the funds, SBA requested a private lender to disburse the funds on an interim basis, with SBA's assurance of repayment. SBA later refused to disburse the loan funds because the borrower had disappeared and his business had become defunct. Under the circumstances, SBA's written commitment to reimburse the lender did constitute SBA's "guarantee" of any advances the lender made in reasonable and justified reliance on it. Therefore, even though the direct loan by SBA was never disbursed, SBA was authorized to reimburse the lender.

The decision discussed two earlier cases—B-178250, August 6, 1973, and B-164162, September 20, 1968—involving direct rather than guaranteed loans. GAO had concluded in these cases that, under the specific circumstances involved, SBA could not reimburse a lender for losses suffered on interim disbursements made after SBA had authorized loans to the borrower. In both cases, the claimant bank was unable to adequately establish that any SBA official had made a promise or commitment on which the bank could justifiably rely.

Essentially, the primary theory of recovery in all of these cases, although not specifically identified as such, is estoppel—conduct by the government sufficient to later preclude it from denying the existence of a valid guarantee. Several similar cases have specifically raised the estoppel theory.[14] For example, the issue in B-187445, January 27, 1977, was whether SBA was legally obligated for a $10,000 loss suffered by a bank on a loan made to a small business

[14]Estoppel claims against the government can rarely succeed, and even those few cases in which GAO has sanctioned them would, in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Office of Personnel Management v. Richmond, 496 U.S. 414 (1990), have to be reassessed before being used as precedent. Estoppel claims arise in many contexts and are discussed further in Chapter 12.

(1924); A-44019, March 15, 1934; A-24693, October 30, 1929. The distinction is summarized in the following passage from B-201673:

"If a check tendered in payment of a fine, duty, or penalty becomes uncollectible, it may be argued that the Government incurs a loss in the sense that it does not have money to which it was legally entitled, but it has not lost anything that it already had. When the check is in exchange for property, the Government has lost the property, the value of which is measured by the agreed-upon sales price. Of course, recovery of the property will remove or mitigate the loss."

The concept of B-201673 has also been applied to a check seized as forfeiture under the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act and subsequently returned as uncollectible. B-208398, September 29, 1983.

A conceptually similar case is B-216279, October 9, 1984. A teller at a Customs Service auction gave a receipt to a customer and negligently failed to collect the tendered funds. It was suggested that there was no loss because the teller never had physical possession of the funds. However, the applicable relief statute (31 U.S.C. § 3527) uses the terms "physical loss or deficiency" in the disjunctive, and there was clearly a deficiency in the teller's account to the extent of the property turned over in exchange for the lost payment.

While every fiscal irregularity by definition involves a loss or deficiency for which someone is accountable, not every loss or deficiency is a fiscal irregularity which triggers accountability. For example, an accountable officer is not liable for interest lost on collections which should have been deposited promptly but were not. 64 Comp. Gen. 303 (1985) (failure to deposit collections in designated depositary); B-190290, November 28, 1977 (increased interest charges on funds borrowed from Treasury, no net loss to United States).

Also, losses resulting from the imperfect exercise of judgment in routine business operations, where no law has been violated, do not create accountable officer liability. 65 Comp. Gen. 881 (1986) (loss to Internal Revenue Service Tax Lien Revolving Fund caused by sale of property for substantially less than amount for which it had been redeemed).

contractor under section 8(a) of the Small Business Act. The bank alleged that the loan was made on the basis of assurances from an SBA official that the loan would be guaranteed. GAO found, however, that the loan was not in fact guaranteed since it was never approved in writing as required by the applicable provision in the guarantee agreement between SBA and the bank. Also, SBA had no liability to the bank under an estoppel theory since the bank was aware that the SBA official involved lacked authority to approve a loan guarantee or otherwise assure the bank of repayment. Further, the bank could not demonstrate that it had made the loan primarily in reliance on the alleged misrepresentations.

In another 1977 case, a bank argued that SBA was liable under an estoppel theory to reimburse the bank for a loss suffered as a result of SBA's approval of a direct disaster loan to the borrower. However, the facts did not support an estoppel since SBA made no misrepresentations to the bank, and the bank did not make the loan in reliance on the representations that SBA did make. B-181432, February 4, 1977. A somewhat similar case involving the Farmers Home Administration denied the claim of a creditor who alleged that he had advanced supplies and services to a borrower on the basis of assurances from a Farmers Home employee that the borrower's obligation would be guaranteed by the government. Since FmHA regulations then expressly prohibited employees from guaranteeing repayment of non-FmHA loans, either personally or on behalf of the government, the creditor was necessarily on notice of the employee's lack of authority to make such assurances. B-168300, December 4, 1969; B-168300, December 3, 1969.

Another estoppel case is B-198310, April 23, 1981. SBA had sent a letter to a borrower confirming approval of a direct handicapped assistance loan. Allegedly in reliance on this letter, the claimant bank advanced funds to the borrower. SBA then issued its formal loan authorization, but canceled it shortly thereafter based on the borrower's failure to disclose all pertinent information on its loan application. The bank sought reimbursement on a theory of "promissory estoppel." The Comptroller General held that SBA was under no obligation to reimburse the bank for two reasons. First, SBA's letter had been to the borrower, not the bank. Thus, SBA had made no representations to the bank. Second, the bank's reliance on the letter was not reasonable because the letter contained no mention of the possibility that the loan might be used to obtain interim financing, nor did the bank attempt to obtain any assurance from SBA that the borrower would be required to use the proceeds of the SBA loan to repay the interim loan.

The existence of a valid guarantee also was an issue in 60 Comp. Gen. 700 (1981) in a different context. Farmers Home Administration regulations required written notification to the lender of the approval or disapproval of a guarantee application. Based on these regulations, and citing B-187445, January 27, 1977, discussed above, GAO concluded that oral notification of a loan guarantee approval was not sufficient to create a valid guarantee for purposes of charging that guarantee against the FmHA's annual ceiling. 60 Comp. Gen. at 709–10.

d. Small Business Investment Companies

A "small business investment company" (SBIC) is a private company organized under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, as amended (15 U.S.C. §§ 661–697c), and licensed by the Small Business Administration. Its purpose is to provide financial assistance to small business concerns.

A series of decisions in the 1960s upheld SBA's authority to provide various forms of financial assistance to SBICs. First, SBA may guarantee loans made to SBICs by private financial institutions. 42 Comp. Gen. 146 (1962). While the guarantee authority was not explicit at the time of the 1962 decision, it was later added and is now found at 15 U.S.C. § 683. SBA also has "secondary guarantee" authority, authority to sell to private investors, with recourse (SBA's guarantee), debt instruments representing loans SBA had made to SBICs. 44 Comp. Gen. 549 (1965). The proposal considered in 44 Comp. Gen. 549 involved loans with a maturity of 5 or 6 years. Later that same year, SBA proposed extending its program to loans with 15-year maturities. GAO again approved, noting that the difference in maturity did not affect the basic authority. 45 Comp. Gen. 253 (1965). The 15-year period also is now specified in 15 U.S.C. § 683. See also 45 Comp. Gen. 370 (1965) (same holding for similar program under different provision of Small Business Investment Act).

The Comptroller General concluded further in 45 Comp. Gen. 253 that SBA could make the sales through an agent or broker with reasonable compensation if administratively determined to be necessary or more economical. However, the broker's compensation may not be paid from the proceeds of the loan sales but must be charged to SBA's appropriation for administrative expenses.

A small business investment company may be either a corporation or a limited partnership. 15 U.S.C. § 681(a). The scope of authorized SBA assistance includes non-recourse loans to a limited partnership SBIC (by purchasing or guaranteeing its debentures). B-149685, January 12, 1978. Non-recourse in this context means that SBA would "waive" its right to recover, provided under the laws of most states, against the separate assets of the general partner.

In B-149685, March 25, 1971, GAO considered SBA's authority to sell guaranteed SBIC debentures to a group of underwriters for resale to private investors. Under this program, SBA would first purchase $30 million of newly issued debentures from SBICs and then immediately sell them to private investors, with SBA's guarantee of payment of principal and interest according to the terms of the instrument. SBA would act as servicing agent for the holders, receiving payment on the debentures from the SBICs and then paying the holders in accordance with the terms of the debentures. The Comptroller General concluded that the proposed sale and guarantee of debentures in this manner was within the scope of SBA's statutory authority, provided SBA did not exceed any existing statutory program level limitations. See also B-149685, June 3, 1969.

Another issue is whether a small business investment company is eligible to participate, as a lending institution, in a government guaranteed loan program. In 49 Comp. Gen. 32 (1969), the Comptroller General held that SBICs were not eligible lenders for purposes of SBA's guaranteed loan program under section 7(a) of the Small Business Act, 15 U.S.C. § 636(a). The decision relied heavily on the legislative history of the Small Business Investment Act.

Some years later, GAO again considered the eligibility of SBICs to be guaranteed lenders in SBA's section 7(a) guaranteed loan program as well as the Farmers Home Administration's business and industrial loan program (7 U.S.C. § 1932). SBA's new proposal was somewhat different from the arrangement considered in 49 Comp. Gen. 32, because after originating the loan, the SBIC would then immediately sell the guaranteed portion to another lending institution and remain the servicing agent. GAO's conclusion remained the same, again based on the legislative history of the Small Business Investment Act which indicated that Congress intended SBICs to operate independently of other federal loan programs. With respect to the Farmers Home Administration program, nothing in either the Small Business Investment Act or the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act or their legislative histories supported a different conclusion. 56 Comp. Gen. 323 (1977).

One type of small business investment company is the "minority enterprise small business investment company," or "MESBIC." As the name implies, a MESBIC is a small business investment company formed to aid minority-owned small businesses. In 59 Comp. Gen. 635 (1980), aff'd on reconsideration, B-197439, November 26, 1980, GAO considered SBA's authority to "leverage" against federal funds invested in MESBICs. "Leveraging" means investing on a partial matching basis through the purchase or guarantee of debentures or the purchase of preferred securities. The specific issue was whether SBA could leverage against Federal Railroad Administration investments in MESBICs. Since the Small Business Investment Act authorizes SBA to leverage only against private money, the decision concluded that, absent specific statutory authority, SBA could not leverage against federal funds invested in MESBICs. The MESBICs took the case to court, arguing that "private" meant simply "non-SBA." Based on the plain meaning of the statutory language, the court agreed with GAO. Inner City Broadcasting Corp. v. Sanders, 733 F.2d 154 (D.C. Cir. 1984). "[P]rivate means private and not governmental." Id. at 157.[15]

GAO and the court had both recognized that leveraging against other federal funds would be permissible if authorized by the statute under which those other funds were provided. One such example is community development block grant funds provided under the Housing and Community Development Act of 1974. 60 Comp. Gen. 210 (1981).

e. The Federal Financing Bank

The Federal Financing Bank was created by the Federal Financing Bank Act of 1973, 12 U.S.C. §§ 2281–2296. Its purpose is to [15]A 1989 amendment added 15 U.S.C. § 683(e), providing that federal, state, or local government funds received by a small business investment company from non-SBA sources shall be included in determining private capital "solely for regulatory purposes, and not for the purpose of obtaining financial assistance from or licensing by [SBA], providing such funds were invested prior to November 21, 1989."

coordinate federal credit programs with overall government economic and fiscal policies. It is a corporate instrumentality of the United States Government, subject to the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Id. § 2283. The Bank acts essentially as an intermediary. Its powers include purchasing agency debt securities and federally guaranteed borrowings. Specifically, it is authorized by 12 U.S.C. § 2285 to—

"purchase and sell on terms and conditions determined by the Bank, any obligation which is issued, sold, or guaranteed by a Federal agency. Any Federal agency which is authorized to issue, sell, or guarantee any obligation is authorized to issue or sell such obligations directly to the Bank."

The Bank obtains funds by issuing its own securities, almost entirely to the Treasury. Id. §§ 2288(b), (c). The decisions summarized below illustrate the varying roles the Bank plays in the credit financing arena.

In 58 Comp. Gen. 138 (1978), GAO considered the SBA's authority to issue certificates to the Federal Financing Bank evidencing transfer of title of a number of individual loans and setting forth SBA's guaranteed assurance of payment, either in cash or by loan substitution. Even though this arrangement contemplated the sale of certificates evidencing ownership of a group of SBA loans rather than individual loans, it was sufficiently similar to the arrangement upheld in B-149685, March 25, 1971, discussed above in connection with SBICs, and was therefore permissible. Since the certificate did refer to specific loans and, when transferred to the Bank, would represent a transfer of ownership of the loans to the Bank, the plan would not constitute borrowing by SBA, which would have required specific statutory authority.[16]

The same decision, while noting that SBA's authority to sell loans to the Federal Financing Bank with its guarantee was "neither greater nor less" than its authority to sell loans to other purchasers (58 Comp. Gen. at 139), nevertheless concluded that SBA lacked the authority to sell direct disaster loans (15 U.S.C. § 636(b)) to the Federal Financing Bank on a guaranteed basis. Although SBA does have authority to guarantee disaster loans made to eligible borrowers by participating lending institutions, it is not authorized, in the absence of specific statutory authority or a clear expression of congressional intent, to sell and guarantee disaster loans that it had originally made directly. Since there was at the time no statutory ceiling on the type of loans in question, the proposal would enable SBA to "replenish its disaster loan revolving fund so as to enable it to make new disaster loans and repeat the process indefinitely," potentially resulting in an unlimited contingent liability against the United States with no congressional restraint. Id. at 146. In addition, the proposal contemplated a 100 percent guarantee which would have violated the statutory 90 percent maximum guarantee of disaster loans.

[16]SBA now has such borrowing authority in 15 U.S.C. § 633(c)(5).

Another case involving the Bank as "guaranteed lender" is B-162373-O.M., July 31, 1979, finding that an agreement between the Rural Electrification Administration and the Bank by which the Bank made loans to borrowers that REA guaranteed under the authority of section 306 of the Rural Electrification Act of 1936 (7 U.S.C. § 936), was within the statutory authority of both agencies. The legality of the arrangement was considered from the perspectives both of REA's authority to guarantee loans made by a non-private entity such as the Bank and of the Bank's authority to act as the initial lender, making loans directly to a private nongovernmental borrower with REA's guarantee. Since REA has authority to guarantee loans made by "any legally organized lending agency," it could guarantee loans made by the Federal Financing Bank. At the same time, the Bank was acting within its statutory authority to purchase obligations guaranteed by a federal agency, since the transaction was in the form of its purchasing the borrower's note from the borrower with payment being guaranteed by REA. Although the arrangement was legal, GAO was critical because it did not involve the private credit sector in the REA program as contemplated by the Rural Electrification Act. See GAO report, Financing Rural Electric Generating Facilities: A Large and Growing Activity, CED-81-14 (November 28, 1980), pages 16—17.

Congress subsequently confirmed the REA-FFB arrangement by amending 7 U.S.C. § 936 to provide that the loans, upon request of the borrower, "shall be made by the Federal Financing Bank." Under the statute, loan servicing is the responsibility of the lender. Thus, REA's funds are available to perform the loan servicing function as the Bank's agent only on a reimbursable basis. 62 Comp. Gen. 309 (1983).

Two 1987 opinions discussed the Federal Financing Bank's role in the foreign military sales program. The Bank finances credit sales under the Arms Export Control Act, with the loans being guaranteed by the Defense Security Assistance Agency. If the debtor nation defaults, DSAA pays the Bank. One opinion concluded that the Bank is not authorized to deliberately delay making demand on DSAA for payment upon default. B-226718.2, August 19, 1987. The second advised that two refinancing options under consideration, one involving prepayment without penalty and one involving the partial capitalization of interest, would result in a financial loss to the United States or the substantial risk of one, and should not be implemented without clear evidence of congressional approval. 66 Comp. Gen. 577 (1987). Congress subsequently approved a prepayment option. See Security Assistance: Foreign Military Sales Debt Refinancing, GAO/NSIAD-89-175 (August 1989); Federal Financing Bank: The Government Incurred a Cost of $2 Billion on Loan Prepayments, GAO/AFMD-89-59 (August 1989).

A 1985 transaction illustrates a very different role for the Bank. In October 1985, the Treasury Department had reached its statutory public debt ceiling and was in danger of defaulting on its obligations pending congressional action to raise the ceiling. The Bank effectively borrowed $5 billion from the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund by issuing securities to the Fund and accepting Treasury obligations in payment. The Bank then used these securities to prepay part of its outstanding debt to Treasury. This in turn reduced Treasury's outstanding debt, enabling it to borrow an additional $5 billion from the public to meet its obligations. Based on the Bank's statutory authority and the conclusion that its obligations do not count against the public debt limit set by 31 U.S.C. § 3101(b), the Comptroller General found the transaction legally unobjectionable. B-138524, October 30, 1985.

When the Federal Financing Bank was first created, its transactions were entirely off-budget. 12 U.S.C. § 2290(c) ("receipts and disbursements of the Bank . . . shall not be included in the totals of the budget of the United States Government"). With the budget reforms of the Congressional Budget Act and subsequent legislation, this treatment came under increasing criticism and GAO, among others, recommended that Bank transactions involving other government entities be reflected in the budget. E.g., Government Agency Transactions With the Federal Financing Bank Should Be Included on the Budget, PAD-77-70 (August 3, 1977) (detailed analysis); 58 Comp. Gen. 138, 142–44 (1978); B-178726, September 16, 1976 (pointing out that purchase by the Bank of a loan guaranteed by another agency amounts to a direct loan).

While the Federal Financing Bank Act itself has not been amended, Congress in 1985 added 2 U.S.C. § 655(b) to the Congressional Budget Act:

"All receipts and disbursements of the Federal Financing Bank with respect to any obligations which are issued, sold, or guaranteed by a Federal agency shall be treated as a means of financing such agency for purposes of section 1105 of Title 31 [submission of President's budget] and for purposes of [the Congressional Budget] Act."

Under this provision, direct loans of the Bank are accounted for as loans of the guaranteeing agency. See B-226718.2, August 19, 1987.

2. Coverage of Borrowers

a. Eligibility of Borrowers

Loan guarantee program legislation may or may not establish criteria for lender eligibility; it will almost invariably address borrower eligibility. This is because the primary purpose of a guarantee program is to enhance credit availability to a particular class of borrowers (farmers, veterans, small businesses, etc.). The significance of any such eligibility requirements is that an agency is not authorized to issue a guarantee or reimburse a lender on behalf of an ineligible borrower.

For example, one portion of the National Housing Act, 12 U.S.C. § 1703, authorizes the insurance of loans made to finance repairs or improvements to real property by owners or lessees. Under this statute, it is the lending institution's responsibility to determine borrower eligibility. Thus, a lending institution making a loan to someone who is neither the owner nor the lessee of the property involved is not entitled to be reimbursed for losses resulting from borrower default. B-180015, November 28, 1973; B-174739, January 19, 1972.

While most eligibility requirements are found in the program statute itself, they may appear in other legislation. For example, the Military Selective Service Act provides that any person who is required to register for the draft and knowingly and willfully fails to do so shall be ineligible for guaranteed student loan assistance. 50 U.S.C. App. § 462(f). The Department of Education is authorized to issue implementing regulations, discussed in B-210733, February 25, 1983.

b. Substitution of Borrowers

Generally, the substitution of borrowers within the same fiscal year will not present problems. However, as with contracts and grants, the substitution may or may not be proper when made in a subsequent fiscal year. Loan guarantee authority—whether it is an advance appropriation of budget authority under the Federal Credit Reform Act or a program level ceiling in a situation not governed by the Credit Reform Act—is granted on an annual, multiple-year, or no-year basis. It thus has a period of availability analogous to a regular appropriation. Where the period of availability is a fixed time period, the authority ceases to be available when that period expires.

The issue in B-164031(5), June 25, 1976, was the transferability of a loan guarantee and interest subsidy originally approved under a program of federal assistance for the construction and modernization of hospitals. The question was whether the guarantee could be transferred from one hospital to another in the following fiscal year, when the original hospital became unable to take advantage of the guarantee due to apparent financial difficulties. The Comptroller General found that, since the period of availability of the guarantee authority had expired, the transfer would be authorized only if it could be viewed as a "replacement." Since the second hospital did not serve the same community as the first, the transfer of the loan guarantee to the new "borrower" was not merely a "replacement" and therefore could not be approved.

A few years later, the Farmers Home Administration asked whether it could continue to charge a guarantee to the annual ceiling for the fiscal year in which it was originally approved when a new borrower was substituted in a later fiscal year. As a general rule, the answer is no, and the substitution would have to be treated as a new undertaking. This is different from the substitution of lenders discussed previously in this chapter because the approval of a guaranteed loan to a particular borrower requires a specific eligibility determination. Thus, while the identity of the particular lender may be of relatively little consequence, the identity and eligibility of the borrower are essential to the transaction. However, the substitution may be treated as a continuation of the original guarantee where the substituted borrower bears a "close and genuine relationship" to the originally approved borrower (for example, a corporation and partnership controlled by the same individuals), provided of course that the loan purpose remains substantially unchanged. 60 Comp. Gen. 700 (1981).[17]

c. Loan Purpose

The authority to make a loan guarantee commitment depends not only on the eligibility of the particular borrower, but also on whether the purpose for which the guaranteed loan is to be made is consistent with the applicable program statute and regulations. The analysis is essentially an application of the "necessary expense" doctrine used in other purpose availability contexts.
