Declaring class certification appropriate and the settlement fair, the district court preliminarily enjoined all class members from commencing any asbestos-related suit against the CCR defendants in any state or federal court. [80] Certain parties appealed and the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit vacated the certification as further described below, holding that the requirements of Rule 23 had not been satisfied and setting the stage for the Supreme Court case. [81]

2. The Ahearn Case: A Factual and Procedural History Leading to the Appeal to the Circuit Court

The origins of Ahearn stretch back to 1991, when the Fibreboard Corporation sought a global solution to the overwhelming, or at least seriously distracting, asbestos claims being filed against it. The Ahearn case was one of the pending asbestos cases that did not fall under the ambit of the MDL referral which led to the Amchem settlement.

Fibreboard approached several leading plaintiffs' counsel to discuss settlement. There was no class action by future claimants against Fibreboard at the time; rather, Fibreboard chose counsel already litigating against it on behalf of claimants presently manifesting symptoms from asbestos exposure. Negotiations ensued under the supervision of the district court, including, most famously, a meeting at Judge Parker's house outside Tyler, Texas which resulted in an increase in the settlement offer by an aggregate of $ 35,000,000, and a chance midnight meeting by the attorneys at a Tyler coffeehouse. [82] The parties finally entered into agreements in 1993 settling present and future claims against Fibreboard. [*27]

Once the agreements had been reached, counsel also representing present claimants filed a complaint under Federal Rule 23(b)(1) on behalf of a nationwide asbestos damages class consisting exclusively of future asbestos claimants. The court almost immediately entered an order provisionally approving the class certification and a temporary restraining order enjoining commencement of further separate litigation against Fibreboard by putative class members. The agreements were then finalized and approved by the court. [83]

REV_00261850

Although Ahearn was commenced under Rule 23(b)(1), [84] a mandatory provision of the class action rule, it was actually a hybrid and provided for a kind of opt-out. As part of the class action settlement, the defendants set aside funds for future claimants. Through spendthrift provisions, the settlement limited the amount of the trust assets that could be paid out in any given year. [85] The parties believed that this arrangement might protect assets so that they would be available to compensate injured class members whose claims develop far in the future.

Parties could in effect opt-out of the settlement, but faced procedural and substantive hurdles in doing so. [86] Before going to trial, an opt-out party had to submit to non-binding arbitration. If this did not result in a resolution of the claim, a judge or judge's designee from the Eastern District of Texas was to hold a settlement conference. If this in turn did not produce a settlement, the claimant was permitted to proceed against the trust in the tort system, complete with a jury trial if requested. [87] The recovery of the claimant in the tort system, however, was subject to the cap. Attorneys' fees for claimant's counsel were limited to 25% of the compensation paid to the claimant. Any resulting judgment would be paid out over a period of years depending upon the financial condition of the trust at the time. Therefore, the opt-out right was not a true opt-out, because any recovery of a party not opting out was capped by $ 500,000 per claim, with the elimination of punitive damages. [88] The district court certified the class action and the Third Circuit upheld the certification. [89] [*28]

F. The Varying Approaches of Amchem and Ahearn Circuit Courts in Resolving Class Action Issues

1. Adequate Representation: Selling Out of A Class

As set forth above, courts considering the adequacy of representation in class actions must consider the composition of the class and the various interests of parties within the class. [90] With a class action, a court may bind an absent person whose interests are considered in a class action, and as we have seen this aspect of the class action is not in accord with the usual practice within the adversary system with its emphasis on individualized justice. As such, the Amchem and Ahearn cases brought to the fore the debate on how much class actions may depart from the usual principles of the adversary system regarding the primacy of individual autonomy in guiding a case, as opposed to attorneys negotiating terms for the sake of efficiency.

In the Amchem case, the Third Circuit looked at two components with respect to adequate representation: (a) whether the named parties' interests were sufficiently aligned with the absentees'; and (b) the qualifications of counsel. [91] The Third Circuit was very concerned about the trampling of individual autonomy. Skeptical of the settlement agreement before it, the court held that Rule 23(a)'s requirements with respect to adequacy of counsel must be satisfied as if the case were going to be litigated, even though no litigation would actually take place. [92]

While acknowledging that the members of the class were united in seeking the maximum possible recovery, the court believed that the settlement made important decisions about allocation of settlement resources to the different plaintiffs, decisions that favored some claimants over others. Although all future claimants were thrown together under the settlement class, they were separated in their interests: for example, members with injuries [*29] that quickly manifest themselves might seek higher pay outs, while more theoretical

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*26 J. Legal Stud. 663, **

Copyright (c) 1997 The University of Chicago
The Journal of Legal Studies

June, 1997

26 J. Legal Stud. 663

LENGTH: 8303 words

JOHN M. OLIN PROGRAM IN LAW AND ECONOMICS CONFERENCE ON "TORT REFORM": ARE PUNITIVE DAMAGES REALLY INSIGNIFICANT, PREDICTABLE, AND RATIONAL? A COMMENT ON EISENBERG ET AL.

A. Mitchell Polinsky *

* Stanford Law School and National Bureau of Economic Research. Research on this comment was supported by the John M. Olin Program in Law and Economics at Stanford Law School. I received helpful comments from Joseph Bankman, Daniel Kessler, Daniel Rubinfeld, and Steven Shavell.

SUMMARY:
... THE preceding article by Theodore Eisenberg and his colleagues is one of the most ambitious empirical studies of punitive damages undertaken to date. ... In their sample, there are 2,849 compensatory damage awards, with a mean of $ 386,000, and 177 punitive damage awards, with a mean of $ 534,000. ... If a case settles, let the settlement amount equal the expected value of the trial outcome. ... The contrast between their inability to predict when, within a particular case category or jurisdiction, punitive damages will be awarded and their ability to predict the level of punitive damages given a punitive damage award is central to the point I want to make: Eisenberg et al.'s results are consistent with the possibility that, within each case category or jurisdiction, the decision to award punitive damages is random. ... The $ 400,000 amount can be described as consisting of a $ 100,000 compensatory damage payment plus a $ 300,000 punitive damage payment. ... What this implies about the relationship between the proper level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages depends on whether the change in the probability causes the punitive damage multiplier to fall less than proportionally or more than proportionally with the level of harm. ...

ABSTRACT

This comment on an empirical study of punitive damages by Theodore Eisenberg and several coauthors makes three main points. First, contrary to what they imply, punitive damages may be a significant factor in litigation despite the fact that only a small fraction of cases in their sample involve punitive damage judgments. Second, notwithstanding their interpretation, their results are consistent with the possibility that punitive damages are awarded on a random basis. Third, in opposition to their suggestion, punitive damages may punitive damages cases. The absence of such cases in a sample as broad as ours suggests that the punitive damages cases emphasized in the media are newsworthy precisely because they are so rare and because they depart from an explicable underlying pattern of awards." Id at 625. The two newspaper articles about the Eisenberg et al. study cited in note 3 also interpret their study as showing that punitive damages are both "modest" and "rare" (Felsenthal) or "small" and "rare" (Blum).

REV_00261887

n9 Id.

n10 Id.

n11 This observation is an example of the general point that cases that go to trial may not be representative of the cases that settle. This point was first emphasized in George Priest and Benjamin Klein, The Selection of Disputes for Litigation, 13 J Legal Stud 1 (1984). It has been elaborated on by many authors since then.

n12 This last assumption is made in part so that the example is most consistent with Eisenberg et al.'s statement that "pretrial effects should reflect what juries have done in prior cases." Id at 625. For purposes of the example, however, all that is necessary is that the settlement amount is positively related to the expected value of the trial outcome.

n13 In this example and in others below, I will for simplicity use the expected values of random variables. Thus, here I am assuming that there are 125 judgments because plaintiffs have a 50 percent chance of prevailing in each of 250 trials. This practice will not affect any of the points that the examples are used to illustrate.

n14 It would be easy to demonstrate in the example that if the settlement rates were the same, then the effect of punitive damages on settlements would exactly mirror the average effect of punitive damages on trials.

n15 For some evidence regarding the magnitude of this effect, see James S. Kakalik, Patricia A. Ebener, William L. F. Felstiner, Gus W. Haggstrom, and Michael G. Shanley, Variation in Asbestos Litigation Compensation and Expenses, 72-91 (R-3132-ICJ, Institute for Civil Justice, Rand Corp 1984) (especially table 9.2 and figure 9.1).

n16 This statement does not mean that every potentially large punitive damage case will settle before a trial judgment. Some notable exceptions are the Texaco-Pennzoil dispute, in which a jury awarded Pennzoil $ 3 billion in punitive damages, and the Exxon Valdez oil spill litigation, involving a $ 5 billion punitive damage judgment against Exxon. See Thomas C. Hayes, Texaco Told to Pay $ 10.5 Billion, NY Times (November 20, 1985), at D1 (the jury awarded $ 7.53 billion in actual damages plus $ 3 billion in punitive damages); and Caleb Solomon, Exxon Is Told to Pay $ 5 Billion for Valdez Spill, Wall St J (September 19, 1994), at A3. There are other reasons why these cases may have gone to trial, including possibly the reason discussed two paragraphs below.

n17 There is another factor that might cause punitive damage cases to be underrepresented in trial outcomes. Suppose that a defendant who is found liable at trial for punitive damages will suffer a reputational loss due to having been shown to have engaged in the type of conduct that justifies the imposition of punitive damages. For an individual this loss might take the form of a loss of social standing; for a business it might be a loss of sales. Because such a loss presumably is lower, possibly substantially so, if the case settles (especially if the settlement is subject to a confidentiality agreement), defendants will have stronger incentives to settle cases in which a punitive damage judgment is a possibility at trial.

n18 See Supreme Court Rules Taxes Must Be Paid on Punitive Damages, Wall St J

REV_00261896

(December 11, 1996), at B13, referring to O'Gilvie v U.S., 65 USLW 4026. In 1991-92, the period studied by Eisenberg et al., the circumstances in which compensatory damages were not taxable and punitive damages were taxable were different than at present.

n19 For a summary of state policies in this regard, see BMW of North America, Inc v Gore, 116 SCt 1589, 1619 (appendix to dissenting opinion of Justice Ginsburg, describing in part the allocation of punitive damages to state agencies). Because relatively few states had such a policy during the period studied by Eisenberg et al., the point in the text regarding the effect of this policy probably has little bearing on their empirical results.

n20 See, generally, Tom Baker, Transforming Punishment into Compensation: Insurance and Punitive Damages Law in Action 23-30 (unpublished manuscript, Univ Miami School of Law, October 1996; pages cited refer to pagination of the unpublished manuscript).

n21 See, for example, Steven Shavell, Suit, Settlement, and Trial: A Theoretical Analysis under Alternative Methods for the Allocation of Legal Costs, 11 J Legal Stud 55 (1982).

n22 These features of punitive damage law have been described by one prominent commentator as follows: "The law of punitive damages is characterized by a high degree of uncertainty that stems from the use of a multiplicity of vague, overlapping terms and the extraordinary deference accorded to juries who receive little meaningful guidance. . . . Jury instructions on the permissible magnitude of punitive damage assessments generally provide even less guidance than do those that purport to explain the bases of punitive damage liability." Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S Cal L Rev 1, 52-53 (1982). Note, however, that vagueness and uncertainty per se do not lead to divergent beliefs; parties might be in agreement about the distribution of possible outcomes. In addition, a countervailing consideration to the point in the text is that there may be more concurrence about whether the defendant will be found liable for compensatory damages in cases in which there is a plausible claim for punitive damages.

n23 Another implication of the divergent beliefs model of litigation, which reinforces this conclusion, is that the greater the stakes at trial, the greater the likelihood that the parties will go to trial (in essence, because a relatively optimistic plaintiff will more readily reject a settlement offer when the plaintiff has more to gain at trial). This point is noted in Robert D. Cooter and Daniel L. Rubinfeld, Economic Analysis of Legal Disputes and Their Resolution, 27 J Econ Literature 1067, 1076-77 (1989). However, whether this result carries over to models of litigation with asymmetric information depends on the specification of the model. Compare Lucian Arye Bebchuk, Litigation and Settlement under Imperfect Information, 15 Rand J Econ 404, 409 (1984); and Barry Nalebuff, Credible Pretrial Negotiation, 18 Rand J Econ 198, 204 (1987).

n24 Under a reasonable assumption about how litigation costs vary with the stakes of a case (that they increase with the stakes but less than proportionally), it can be demonstrated in the standard divergent beliefs model of litigation that raising the stakes will increase the likelihood of trial despite higher litigation costs. In other words, the result stated at the beginning of the preceding footnote holds even if litigation costs rise with the stakes (in the way assumed). The incentive to go to trial, however, is dampened due to the higher litigation costs. Moreover, the risk aversion and institutional effects still could dominate.

n25 Some empirical evidence that bears on this question is summarized by Cooter and Rubinfeld, at 1081 (cited in note 23):

A question investigated empirically . . . is whether augmenting compensatory damages will result in more or fewer trials. . . . Perloff and Rubinfeld (1987) found evidence suggesting that in antitrust cases . . . treble damages lead to a decrease in the proportion of cases resolved by trial and an increase in the number of settlements.

REV_00261897

Other studies, however, have suggested a contrary result, including Danzon and Lee Lillard (1983).

The citations are to Jeffrey M. Perloff and Daniel L. Rubinfeld, Settlements in Private Antitrust Litigation, in Lawrence J. White, ed, Private Antitrust Litigation: New Evidence, New Learning 149 (1988); and Patricia Munch Danzon and Lee A. Lillard, Settlement out of Court: The Disposition of Medical Malpractice Claims, 12 J Legal Stud 345 (1983). A contemporaneous empirical study that was not included in Cooter and Rubinfeld's survey observed that, "clearly, both higher mean trial awards and higher alleged damages have a positive and significant effect on the likelihood of a settlement. This may suggest that as the stakes in a trial are increased, parties intensify their efforts to reach a settlement and are more likely to succeed." See Gary M. Fournier and Thomas W. Zuehlke, Litigation and Settlement: An Empirical Approach, 71 Rev Econ and Stat 189, 193 (1989). (It should be noted, however, that Fournier and Zuehlke's result regarding the effect of litigation costs on the settlement rate is contrary to the intuition discussed above in the text.)

n26 Eisenberg et al, at 624, 649 (cited in note 1).

n27 Id at 632-37, 640-41, 644-47. They also consider whether the likelihood of a punitive damage award depends on the level of compensatory damages and the litigants' status (whether the litigant is an individual or a corporation). These variables generally are not significant (see id, table 4).

n28 Id at 644, 646.

n29 Id at 647.

n30 Id at 651-52.

n31 See the quoted material in the second paragraph of this section.

n32 Id at 652.

n33 There is a certain tension between their suggestion in the quoted passage that one could use their results to identify awards that "are questionable" and their disclaimer in the introduction of the article that their study "is not about the normative desirability of punitive damages." Id at 625.

n34 In discussing the rationality of punitive damages, I am focusing on the deterrence objective of punitive damages because the implications of the punishment objective of punitive damages are not as well developed or as widely agreed on.

n35 The principles of deterrence theory have been applied to punitive damage policy by several scholars, including Ellis, cited at note 22; Bruce Chapman and Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: Deterrence in Search of a Rationale, 40 Ala L Rev 741 (1989); Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much? 40 Ala L Rev 1143 (1989); and Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 La L Rev 3 (1990).

n36 Under their formula, reported above in the text, a 10 percent increase in compensatory damages would imply a 7.82 percent increase in punitive damages.

n37 There is a countervailing consideration. Injurers who cause higher harms will have a greater incentive both to try to "cover up" the harm and, if they are unsuccessful and are sued, to spend more in litigation in order to reduce the chance of being found liable. Such behavior could lead to the probability of detection and liability falling with the level of compensatory damages. The implication of this possibility is discussed in note 38 below.

REV_00261898

n38 As observed above, if the probability of detection and liability is independent of the level of harm, then punitive damages should rise proportionally with compensatory damages. Another possibility, not considered in the text, is that the probability falls with the level of harm (for reasons discussed in the preceding note). Then punitive damages should rise more than proportionally with compensatory damages.

n39 As the discussion in this section makes clear, the proper focus in terms of deterrence principles is on the chance that the defendant might have escaped liability in the circumstances of the case at hand. This inquiry may lead to a level of punitive damages that has no relationship to the level implied by the punitive damage formula suggested by Eisenberg et al.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:08 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

not be rational even if the level of punitive damages is systematically and positively related to the level of compensatory damages.

TEXT:

[*663] THE preceding article by Theodore Eisenberg and his colleagues [1] is one of the most ambitious empirical studies of punitive damages undertaken to date. [2] It undoubtedly will receive considerable attention in popular and academic circles, [3] and deservedly so. The authors painstakingly test the robustness [*664] of their results, and, as a consequence, the reader will find it hard not to be convinced of the validity of the empirical regularities that they identify.

For purposes of this comment, I will assume that their methodology is appropriate and that their empirical results are correct. The premise of this comment, however, is that they have seriously misinterpreted, or drawn incorrect conclusions from, their empirical results. I will take issue with each of their main points and argue that one cannot conclude from their study that punitive damages are insignificant, predictable, and rational.

Section I discusses why, contrary to what they imply, punitive damages may be a significant factor in litigation despite the fact that only a small fraction of cases in their sample involve punitive damage judgments. Section II explains why, notwithstanding their interpretation, their results are consistent with the possibility that punitive damages are awarded on a random basis. Section III shows why, in opposition to their suggestion, punitive damages may not be rational even if the level of punitive damages is systematically and positively related to the level of compensatory damages.

I. ARE PUNITIVE DAMAGES REALLY INSIGNIFICANT?

In this section I first discuss why Eisenberg et al. can be interpreted as claiming that punitive damages are, on average, not significant. I then explain why this conclusion does not follow from their empirical results. The explanation stems from showing that punitive damages can have a substantial effect on settlements even if punitive damages are not significant in trial outcomes.

One of the main empirical observations in Eisenberg et al.'s article is that punitive damages are awarded infrequently: [4] "The third numerical column of Table 1, Panel B, suggests the infrequency of punitive damages awards. For all case categories combined, punitive damages were awarded in 177, about 6 percent, of the jury trials at which plaintiffs prevailed. Since plaintiffs prevailed about half the time, punitive damages were awarded in about 3 percent of the jury trials." They observe that their conclusion is not an aberration: [5] "All credible sources confirm the pattern evident in Table 1 of punitive damages awards' frequency. Punitive damage awards are rare, and they are especially rare in the areas that have captured the most attention, products liability and medical malpractice."

Table 1 in their article also contains data concerning the magnitude of punitive damages when they are awarded. In their sample, there are 2,849 [*665] compensatory damage awards, with a mean of $ 386,000, and 177 punitive damage awards, with a mean of $ 534,000. [6] The total level of punitive damages awarded therefore is $ 94.5 million (= 177 x $ 534,000). If this amount is averaged over the 2,849 cases in which there are compensatory awards, the mean punitive award is $ 33,170, which is equivalent to 8.6 percent of the mean compensatory award (= $ 33,170/$ 386,000 x 100%). In other words, in their sample, punitive damages represent less than a 9 percent "tax" on compensatory damages. [7]

Given Eisenberg et al.'s explicit comments about the infrequency of punitive damages and the implications of their results regarding the magnitude of punitive damages, a reasonable interpretation of their position is that punitive damages are, on average, not significant. [8]

REV_00261888

Because the overwhelming majority of cases settle, however, a natural question is whether the general unimportance of punitive damage awards in cases that go to trial means that their effect on settlements is equally insignificant. Eisenberg et al. admit that they "do not account for the impact of punitive damages awards on cases that never reach trial." [9] But they suggest that settlements will mirror trial outcomes: [10] "The possibility of punitive damages likely shapes the settlement process in which the bulk of cases terminate. Perhaps uncounted thousands of cases settle on terms different than those on which they would otherwise settle because of the possibility of punitive damages. But pretrial effects should reflect what juries have done in prior cases" (emphasis added). By implication, therefore, if punitive damages are unimportant on average at trial, they will not have a significant [*666] effect on the settlement process either. This is the message suggested by Eisenberg et al. that I want to question.

The point I will emphasize here is that even if punitive damage awards at trial are on average insignificant, it does not follow that the effect of punitive damages on settlements is minimal as well. This point, moreover, will be seen to be consistent with the position that in a particular case the magnitude of the threat of punitive damages at trial will be reflected in the settlement amount in that case.

The key to understanding this point is the observation that the cases in which punitive damages are likely to be of greatest potential importance at trial are also cases that may be disproportionately likely to settle (for reasons explained below). [11] Thus, there could be very few judgments at trial in which punitive damages are awarded, yet settlement amounts might reflect a substantial component of punitive damages.

Let me provide a simple example. Suppose there two types of cases. Type A cases are those in which punitive damages are not an issue, and type B cases are those in which, if the plaintiff prevails at trial, she will be awarded $ 500,000 in punitive damages. In both types of case, plaintiffs have a 50 percent chance of prevailing at trial and will be awarded $ 100,000 in compensatory damages if they do prevail. Assume--and this is the key assumption--that 75 percent of all type A cases settle but that 98 percent of all type B cases settle. If a case settles, let the settlement amount equal the expected value of the trial outcome. [12]

Suppose there are 1,000 cases of type A and 100 cases of type B. Then 750 type A cases will settle for $ 50,000 each (= .5 x $ 100,000), and 250 type A cases will go to trial, resulting in 125 judgments of $ 100,000 in compensatory damages. [13] Similarly, 98 type B cases will settle for $ 300,000 each, with $ 50,000 of this amount attributed to the risk of compensatory damages and $ 250,000 attributed to the risk of punitive damages; and two type B cases will go to trial, resulting in one judgment in which $ 100,000 [*667] is awarded in compensatory damages and $ 500,000 is awarded in punitive damages.

Considering just the trial outcomes would show the following. There are 126 compensatory awards of $ 100,000 each and one punitive award of $ 500,000. Punitive damages are awarded in less than 1 percent of all trial judgments (one of 126). When averaged over the 126 judgments for plaintiffs, the mean punitive award is $ 3,968 (= $ 500,000/126). Thus, based on trial outcomes alone, one would conclude that punitive damages represent only a 4 percent "tax" on compensatory damages (= $ 3,968/$ 100,000 x 100%).

Now consider the cases that settle: 750 type A cases settle for $ 50,000, reflecting just the risk of compensatory damages, and 98 type B cases settle for $ 300,000, of which $ 50,000 is due to compensatory damages and $ 250,000 to punitive damages. Punitive damages affect the settlement amount in approximately 12 percent of the cases that settle (98 out of 848 settlements), and $ 24.5 million is paid in settlements due to the risk of punitive damages (= 98 x $ 250,000). When averaged over the 848 cases that settle, the mean amount paid due to the risk of punitive damages is $ 28,892 (= $ 24,500,000/848). Thus, in settlement outcomes, punitive damages represent a 58 percent "tax" on compensatory damages (= $ 28,892/$ 50,000 x 100%).

REV_00261889

In this example, therefore, even though punitive awards at trial occur less than 1 percent of the time and represent only a 4 percent tax on compensatory damages, the threat of punitive damages affects nearly 12 percent of all settlements and represents a 58 percent tax on compensatory damages in the settlement process. It would be a mistake to conclude that because punitive damages are not a significant factor in cases that go to trial, they also are not a significant factor in the settlement process. Moreover, the results in the example are consistent with the view that the settlement amount in each case reflects the expected value of the trial outcome in that case.

As noted, the key assumption in the example is that cases in which there is a threat of punitive damages are more likely to settle than cases involving just the threat of compensatory damages. [14] To understand why this assumption is plausible, consider why parties settle cases rather than litigate them at trial. One reason is to reduce litigation costs. Although some, possibly substantial, litigation costs are incurred prior to trial, proceeding through trial obviously adds to these costs. The additional costs can be avoided by settling prior to trial. A second reason parties may prefer to settle is to avoid [*668] risk. A settlement guarantees each party a fixed sum, whereas the trial outcome may be quite uncertain, both with respect to who prevails and how much will be awarded. The more risk averse are the parties (either one alone or both), the more significant is this advantage of settlements.

Both of these reasons for settling cases are stronger when there is the possibility of a punitive damage award. With respect to litigation costs, it is obvious that the greater the stakes in a case, the more the parties will spend in time and money at trial. [15] Since the possibility of punitive damages raises the stakes at trial--often dramatically--the amount spent on litigation if the case goes to trial would tend to be higher than in cases with similar compensatory damages but without the prospect of punitive damages. Hence, there will be a greater saving in litigation costs from settling punitive damage cases and a correspondingly greater incentive to settle them.

Similarly, because the stakes are higher in punitive damage cases, the risks are greater in such cases for both the plaintiff and the defendant if the parties go to trial. In the example discussed above, the possibility of punitive damages changed the risk from a fifty-fifty chance that the plaintiff would recover and the defendant would pay $ 100,000 to a fifty-fifty chance involving $ 600,000. If either or both of the parties is risk averse, then the benefit from settling--in the form of eliminating uncertainty about the trial outcome--is greater for cases in which punitive damages are an issue than for ordinary cases. Hence, to the extent that parties are risk averse, one would expect a disproportionately high settlement rate for cases involving punitive damages.

The preceding reasons why punitive damage cases tend to settle more frequently than ordinary cases also imply that "big" punitive damage cases will tend to settle more frequently than "small" punitive damage cases. This is because the higher the amount of punitive damages at stake, the more will be spent on litigation and the larger the risk for the parties. Consequently, there will be a greater advantage to settling more significant punitive damage cases. [16] This effect reinforces the point that the observed [*669] impact of punitive damages on trial outcomes may substantially understate the impact of punitive damages on settlements. [17]

There are two additional institutional reasons why punitive damage cases can be expected to settle more frequently than ordinary cases. First, in some circumstances the receipt of compensatory damages will not be treated as taxable income to individuals, but the receipt of punitive damages stemming from the same claim will be. [18] A plaintiff then would have a tax-based motivation to settle the case and characterize a disproportionate share (possibly all) of the settlement as compensation for actual harm. (Because of the practical difficulty of determining the extent to which a settlement reflects the threat of punitive damages, it often would be hard for the government to challenge this characterization.) Second, in states in which a portion of a punitive damage award is allocated to a state agency rather than to the plaintiff, [19] the plaintiff may be able to circumvent this levy on the punitive damage judgment by settling the case. (Again, it often would be difficult for the state to prevent this method of evading the state's levy.) When applicable, therefore, both of these considerations enhance the incentive to settle cases in which there is a threat of punitive damages. [20]

REV_00261890

It should be observed, however, that there are other factors in the litigation process that could mitigate, or even reverse, the point that punitive damage cases tend to settle more frequently than ordinary cases. Consider, for example, a standard model of litigation in which parties go to trial rather than settle when they have sufficiently different beliefs about the plaintiff's [*670] expected recovery at trial (specifically, when the plaintiff is sufficiently more optimistic than the defendant). [21] It is plausible to suppose that such disagreements will be more frequent and more substantial when punitive damages are at issue in addition to compensatory damages. In particular, the vagueness of punitive damage law and the significant discretion of juries in awarding punitive damages presumably contribute to divergent beliefs about the plaintiff's expected recovery at trial. [22] And the fact that punitive damages are added to and can far exceed compensatory damages obviously increases the range of potential disagreement about the magnitude of the plaintiff's recovery. If the parties' beliefs do differ more often and more significantly when punitive damages are at issue, then, according to the model of litigation under consideration, cases involving punitive damages should be expected to go to trial with a greater frequency than cases in which only compensatory damages are in dispute. [23] If this effect dominates the litigation cost, risk aversion, and institutional effects discussed above, punitive damage cases will be "overrepresented" in trial outcomes, the opposite of the result I have been focusing on. [24]

[*671] Whether punitive damage cases settle more often or less often than ordinary cases is not a question that I am able to answer here or a question that Eisenberg et al. addressed. [25] But without knowing the answer, it is not possible to say whether the effect of punitive damages on trial outcomes is representative of the effect of punitive damages on settlements. Thus, even if punitive damage awards at trial are on average insignificant, it does not follow, as Eisenberg et al. implied, that the effect of punitive damages on settlements is minimal as well. For the reasons suggested in this section, the effect may well be substantial.

II. ARE PUNITIVE DAMAGES REALLY PREDICTABLE?

The point that is featured most prominently by Eisenberg et al.--and reinforced by their title--is that punitive damages are predictable. They also stress that the key to predicting the level of punitive damages is the level of compensatory damages.

The forcefulness with which they make these points is exemplified by the following passages: [26] "this article shows that some of the gravest concerns about punitive damages, their unpredictability and lack of relationship to compensatory damages, are less warranted than is commonly believed. In fact, the correlation between compensatory and punitive damages may make punitive damages one of the more explicable features of the legal system." "Far from picking numbers out of the air, jurors and judges across dozens of jurisdictions and many case categories determine punitive damages [*672] award levels with a startling consistency. . . . Our data . . . suggest an essential rationality and connection to compensatory damages."

The point I want to make here is that, notwithstanding their claims, their results are consistent with the possibility that in each jurisdiction and case category jury decisions to award punitive damages are random. To understand this point, it is important to distinguish between predicting whether punitive damages will be awarded at all and predicting the level of punitive damages in cases in which some punitive damages are awarded. Eisenberg et al. focus on the second issue. My point, in essence, is that even if the level of punitive damages can be predicted when punitive damages are awarded, whether punitive damages will be awarded could be randomly determined. I will now elaborate on these observations.

REV_00261891

With respect to the first issue--whether punitive damages will be awarded--Eisenberg et al. show how the fraction of cases in which punitive damages are awarded depends on the case category and jurisdiction. [27] This fraction ranges from 2 percent for the "automobile tort" and "dangerous premises" categories to 27 percent for the "slander/libel" category, with a mean for the entire sample of 6 percent. Similar variation exists among jurisdictions. They readily admit that because they lack data on the degree of the defendant's misbehavior, they cannot explain, within each case category or jurisdiction, when punitive damages will be awarded. [28]

Eisenberg et al.'s main attention is given to the second issue--predicting the level of punitive damages in cases in which some punitive damages are awarded. Here they are more successful and account for a substantial fraction of the variation among punitive damage awards. They conclude that "after controlling for other factors, the level of punitive damages awarded is strongly and significantly correlated with the level of compensatory damages awarded." [29] In addition, they offer a simple formula for determining the mean punitive award from the compensatory award: the punitive award equals the compensatory award raised to the power of .782 and multiplied by 8.117. [30]

The contrast between their inability to predict when, within a particular case category or jurisdiction, punitive damages will be awarded and their ability to predict the level of punitive damages given a punitive damage [*673] award is central to the point I want to make: Eisenberg et al.'s results are consistent with the possibility that, within each case category or jurisdiction, the decision to award punitive damages is random. Their success in predicting the level of punitive damages when they are awarded does not negate this point.

A simple example will make my point concrete. Consider a case category in which plaintiffs prevail in 50 percent of the cases that go to trial and suppose that their compensatory damages when they do prevail is one of three values--$ 1,000, $ 10,000, or $ 100,000--with equal frequency. Let there be 5,000 cases in this category that go to trial. Suppose further that punitive damages are awarded 6 percent of the time when plaintiffs prevail (the average percentage in Eisenberg et al.'s sample) and that the punitive award is equal to twice the compensatory award. Finally, to underscore my point, assume that the decision to award punitive damages is random, determined, say, by spinning a roulette wheel in which six of the hundred numbers on the wheel result in a punitive damage award.

Now consider the "data" generated in this example. Plaintiffs will prevail in 2,500 of the 5,000 cases that go to trial. Six percent of the 2,500 cases--150 cases--will be ones in which punitive damages are awarded as a result of the spinning of the roulette wheel. Of these 150 cases, 50 will have compensatory damages of $ 1,000 and punitive damages of $ 2,000; 50 will have compensatory damages of $ 10,000 and punitive damages of $ 20,000; and 50 will have compensatory damages of $ 100,000 and punitive damages of $ 200,000.

These results are analogous to those found by Eisenberg et al. Indeed, the results are even stronger than theirs since, in this example, the level of punitive damages can be perfectly predicted from the level of compensatory damages; the formula is "the punitive award equals twice the compensatory award." Yet, which 150 of the 2,500 plaintiff victories result in punitive damage awards was determined, by design, in a random way. One would hardly be led to conclude, knowing this, that punitive damages are "one of the more explicable features of the legal system." Yet this is Eisenberg et al.'s conclusion [31] despite the fact that they cannot, given their data, rule out the possibility that the decision to award punitive damages is highly random.

REV_00261892

I am not, of course, suggesting (nor do I believe) that punitive damages are awarded in practice in a random way. Rather, my point is that, by focusing on the relationship between punitive damages and compensatory damages in the 177 cases in their sample in which punitive damages are [*674] awarded, Eisenberg et al. have drawn too strong a conclusion about the predictability of punitive damages. Despite their study, we still do not know much about what determines which 177 cases of the 2,849 cases in their sample are the ones in which punitive damages are awarded in the first place. In this important sense punitive damages are not nearly as predictable as they would have us believe.

III. ARE PUNITIVE DAMAGES REALLY RATIONAL?

In the last substantive section of their article, Eisenberg et al. discuss how their empirical results can be used to assess the reasonableness of actual punitive damage awards: [32] "Since the vast majority of punitive damages awards fit a regular and sober pattern, one could use that pattern to identify awards that, in light of historical practice, are questionable. The premises underlying such use would be: (1) the present system usually leads to reasonable results, (2) a few outlying awards . . . should be reeled in, and (3) it is sensible to define outlying awards by reference to the results of the mass of cases" (emphasis added). I have drawn attention in the preceding quotation to their first premise, which can be stated more fully as follows: the observed positive relationship between the level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages is rational. [33]

The point I want to make is that the principal basis for assessing the rationality of punitive damages--deterrence theory--does not necessarily support their premise and may even imply in some contexts that the proper level of punitive damages is inversely, not positively, related to the level of compensatory damages. [34]

To understand this point, it is necessary to briefly review some wellknown ideas from deterrence theory as that theory applies to punitive damages. [35] To achieve proper deterrence, injurers should be made to pay for the harm their conduct causes. If they are caught and found liable with certainty, [*675] then making them pay compensatory damages will accomplish this. But if they can escape liability sometimes, then the level of liability imposed on them when they are found liable needs to exceed compensatory damages so that, on average, they will pay for the harm done. This excess liability can be labeled "punitive damages."

For example, suppose that an injurer causes a $ 100,000 harm but is caught only with a one-in-four chance. If the injurer is made to pay just compensatory damages of $ 100,000 when he is caught, his average liability cost each time he causes harm will be only $ 25,000 (since he will pay $ 100,000 only every fourth time he causes harm). It is easy to see, however, that if he is made to pay $ 400,000 when he is caught, his average liability cost will be correct, equal to $ 100,000. The $ 400,000 amount can be described as consisting of a $ 100,000 compensatory damage payment plus a $ 300,000 punitive damage payment.

The preceding discussion suggests a simple formula for determining the level of punitive damages that achieves proper deterrence. Let h be the magnitude of harm and p be the probability that the injurer will be detected and found liable. Then the proper level of total liability is h/p. This amount would be composed of a payment of h in compensatory damages and $(h/p) - h$ in punitive damages. The punitive payment can be rewritten as $[(1 - p)/p]h$. In the example in the previous paragraph, h = $ 100,000 and p = .25, so punitive damages are, according to this formula, [(1 - .25)/.25]$ 100,000 = $ 300,000.

The punitive damage formula just described would seem to support the premise of Eisenberg et al. that there should be a systematic positive relationship between the level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages. The formula implies that, for any given probability of detection and liability, punitive damages should rise proportionally with compensatory damages. However, there still would be a discrepancy between the theory of deterrence and Eisenberg et al.'s findings since their formula for punitive damages would have punitive damages rising less than proportionally with compensatory damages. [36]

REV_00261893

The discussion in the preceding paragraph presumed that the probability that the injurer will be detected and found liable is independent of the magnitude of compensatory damages. But this probability may not be constant. In fact, there are some reasons to believe that the probability of detection and liability will rise as the level of compensatory damages rises: higher harms may be more easily detected because they may be more difficult to [*676] hide, and the victims of higher harms will be more likely to sue, everything else being equal. [37]

If the probability rises with the level of compensatory damages, then the punitive damage multiplier--the term (1 - p)/p that multiplies h in the formula--would fall with the level of compensatory damages. What this implies about the relationship between the proper level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages depends on whether the change in the probability causes the punitive damage multiplier to fall less than proportionally or more than proportionally with the level of harm.

If the punitive damage multiplier falls less than proportionally, then the proper level of punitive damages rises with the level of compensatory damages, but not proportionally. This possibility is most consistent with Eisenberg et al.'s empirical results since, as noted above, they find that punitive damages rise less than proportionally with compensatory damages.

If, however, the punitive damage multiplier falls more than proportionally, then the proper level of punitive damages falls with the level of compensatory damages. This outcome obviously is completely at odds with Eisenberg et al.'s premise that the observed positive relationship between the level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages is rational.

That the level of punitive damages should fall with the level of compensatory damages is a realistic possibility, as the following example will suggest. Suppose a company that is responsible for trucking toxic waste to a dump site intentionally allows the waste to leak slowly onto the highway so that it will not be easily noticed or traced. Let the harm caused be $ 100,000 and assume that there is only a one-in-ten chance that the company will be caught and found liable. Then deterrence theory implies that the company should have to pay a total of $ 1 million (ten times the harm) if it is caught and found liable--$ 100,000 in the form of compensatory damages and $ 900,000 in the form of punitive damages.

Now consider a firm responsible for storing and treating toxic waste at a dump site. Suppose this firm, in order to reduce costs, uses unreasonably thin walls in constructing waste storage tanks. As a consequence, a rupture occurs, causing a major and highly visible spill that leads to harm of $ 100 million. This injurer presumably will not be able to escape detection and liability because the spill is highly visible, the cause of the spill is easily determined, and the magnitude of the harm virtually guarantees that litigation [*677] against the injurer will result. According to deterrence theory, no punitive damages are needed in this situation because there is, let us suppose, no chance that the injurer will escape liability. Thus, despite the fact that the harm from the dump site spill is a thousand times larger than the harm from the truck leakage, the proper level of punitive damages is lower (zero).

The discussion in this section has shown that from the perspective of deterrence theory, the rational relationship between the level of punitive damages and the level of compensatory damages could be one in which the two levels are positively related or negatively related. Even if they are positively related, there is no reason to suppose that punitive damages should rise less than proportionally, as Eisenberg et al. presume. [38]

REV_00261894

Thus, not only does deterrence theory not necessarily support their premise that the existing pattern of punitive damages is rational, deterrence theory may be antithetical to it in some contexts. From a public policy perspective, therefore, the relationship between punitive damages and compensatory damages observed by Eisenberg et al. is not a proper basis for determining what punitive damage judgments should be. [39]

* * *

Although the Eisenberg et al. study adds substantially to our empirical understanding of punitive damages, I believe--for the reasons set forth in this comment--that they have seriously misinterpreted, or drawn incorrect conclusions from, their empirical results. I have explained why punitive damages may be a significant factor in litigation despite the fact that only a small fraction of cases in their sample involve punitive damage judgments, why their results are consistent with the possibility that punitive damages are awarded on a random basis, and why punitive damages may not be rational even if the level of punitive damages is systematically and positively related to the level of compensatory damages. In a nutshell, punitive damages may be significant, unpredictable, and irrational, contrary to what Eisenberg et al. would have us believe. $$ n1 Theodore Eisenberg, John Goerdt, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman, and Martin T. Wells, The Predictability of Punitive Damages, in this issue, at 623. I refer to this article throughout as "Eisenberg et al."

FOOTNOTES:

n2 Some early empirical studies of punitive damages include William M. Landes and Richard A. Posner, New Light on Punitive Damages, 1986 Regulation 33 (September/October); Mark Peterson, Syam Sarma, and Michael Shanley, Punitive Damages: Empirical Findings (R-3311-ICJ, Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp, Santa Monica, Cal 1987); Stephen Daniels and Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn L Rev 1 (1990); and Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L Rev 1 (1992). Several other empirical studies are cited by Eisenberg et al. and are not repeated here.

n3 Even before publication, their article has been discussed in the national press. See Edward Felsenthal, Punitive Awards Are Called Modest, Rare, Wall St J (June 17, 1996), at B2; and Andrew Blum, Study Finds Punitives Are Small, Rare, Natl L J (July 1, 1996), at A6.

n4 Eisenberg et al, at 633 (cited in note 1).

n5 Id.

n6 Eisenberg et al. also present data on the median compensatory and punitive awards, which are $ 49,000 and $ 50,000, respectively. With respect to these numbers, they remark that "neither amount is strikingly high." Id. They do not comment on the mean compensatory and punitive awards other than to say that "the much higher mean awards indicate the influence of high-end awards." Id.

n7 Eisenberg et al. do not express their results in terms of a punitive damage "tax," as I have done here. Because the punitive damage tax is 8.6 percent and the frequency of punitive damage awards when plaintiffs prevail is 6.2 percent (= 177/2,849 x 100%), punitive damages appear somewhat more significant when described in this way.

n8 This interpretation is supported by the following passage in the introduction of their article: "Our subject is of the mass of cases, not the few headline-grabbing awards that dominate the news. The data analyzed here do not appear to include the most extreme

REV_00261895

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*42 J. Law & Econ. 527, **

Copyright (c) 1999 The University of Chicago
The Journal of Law & Economics

April, 1999

42 J. Law & Econ. 527

LENGTH: 22951 words

PENALTIES: PUBLIC AND PRIVATE: A CONFERENCE SPONSORED IN PART BY THE JOHN M. OLIN PROGRAM IN LAW AND ECONOMICS AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO LAW SCHOOL AND THE GEORGE J. STIGLER CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF THE ECONOMY AND THE STATE AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO GRADUATE SCHOOL OF BUSINESS: On the Determinants and Importance of Punitive Damage Awards *

* We thank Bruce Kobayashi, Jeff Pontiff, Mike Waldman, and participants at the University of Chicago Law School John M. Olin Program in Law and Economics Conference on Penalties: Public and Private for helpful comments and discussions. Lucinda Gilbert and Eric Wehrly provided excellent and extensive research assistance.

Jonathan M. Karpoff, University of Washington and John R. Lott, Jr., University of Chicago

SUMMARY:
... THE sizes and variability of punitive damage awards generate substantial debate. ... DESCRIPTION OF THE PUNITIVE LAWSUIT SAMPLE AND AWARD AMOUNTS ... The median punitive award for settlements is zero for all the categories. ... "Index # 1" of industry-related punitive award liability is the three-year moving average of this ratio, centered on the year of the lawsuit being considered. ... The independent variables include the compensatory award, the punitive award, the natural log of the market value of the firm's equity, and four measures of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability. ... One possibility is that publicity about the lawsuit, or about an adverse punitive award, imposes reputational costs on the defendant firm. ... The abnormal return is not significantly related to the sizes of the compensatory or punitive awards, nor to the specific content of the announcement. ... Conditional on knowledge of the compensatory award and that a punitive award will be assessed, roughly 50 percent of the variation in punitive awards can be explained using simple characterizations of the defendant firm, lawsuit type, and location of its filing. ... On average, press announcements of punitive damage lawsuits impose larger market value losses on the defendant firms than the total compensatory and punitive damages eventually awarded. ...

ABSTRACT

We examine several theoretical and empirical issues concerning punitive damage awards and their importance to business. First, we argue that previous justifications of punitive damage awards ignore the role of private contracting and reputation in assuring contractual

REV_00261900

Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Insurance claims		n = 48
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Employment claims		n = 50
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Asbestos claims		n = 14
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Vehicular accidents		n = 3
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Malpractice claims		n = 6
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Miscellaneous claims		n = 57
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
All lawsuit types		n = 290
Mean	.005	.000	.005
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.830	.005	.835
SD	.054	.000	.055

NOTE.--Summary statistics on compensatory, punitive, and total amounts awarded in 1,979 lawsuits in which plaintiffs sought punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations. Verdicts were rendered or settlements made between 1985 and June 1996. The lawsuits are grouped in columns by outcome (defense verdict, plaintiff verdict, or settlement) and in rows by the lawsuit topic. In each cell, we report the mean, median, maximum, and SD of the punitive, compensatory, or total award for lawsuits in the cell. Positive award amounts for defense verdicts represent payments agreed to after the verdict.

REV_00261909

TABLE 2

SUMMARY OF AWARD AMOUNTS (in $ millions)

	PLAINTIFF VERDICTS
LAWSUIT TOPIC	Compensatory Award	Punitive Award	Total Award
Product liability	n = 310
Mean	3.734	6.184	9.917
Median	1.059	.694	2.030
Maximum	50.000	101.000	150.000
SD	6.960	14.005	18.224
Fraud	n = 86
Mean	5.301	14.811	20.287
Median	.154	.130	.540
Maximum	154.160	250.000	404.160
SD	20.437	42.989	60.114
Business negligence	n = 280
Mean	2.096	20.693	22.861
Median	.152	.300	.525
Maximum	287.000	5,000.000	5,287.000
SD	17.449	298.763	316.486
Breach of contract	n = 108
Mean	7.837	9.550	17.567
Median	.394	.000	.912
Maximum	130.000	400.000	500.000
SD	23.190	41.564	55.859
Insurance claims	n = 244
Mean	.939	3.817	4.804
Median	.200	.100	.611
Maximum	25.000	100.000	100.432
SD	2.466	11.473	12.687
Employment claims	n = 168
Mean	.852	2.693	3.578
Median	.250	.100	.500
Maximum	9.800	100.000	107.750
SD	1.700	10.880	12.184
Asbestos claims	n = 36
Mean	2.419	2.909	5.328
Median	1.519	.000	1.519
Maximum	8.450	54.000	57.370
SD	2.707	9.474	10.315
Vehicular accidents	n = 98
Mean	.992	.991	2.015

REV_00261910

Median	.376	.015	.545
Maximum	13.700	22.500	25.000
SD	1.750	2.938	3.919
Malpractice claims	n = 20
Mean	.728	1.625	2.353
Median	.036	.027	.133
Maximum	5.900	24.000	25.250
SD	1.681	5.331	5.757
Miscellaneous claims	n = 245
Mean	3.890	3.419	7.376
Median	.200	.040	.478
Maximum	416.000	125.000	541.000
SD	27.573	13.320	37.301
All lawsuit types	n = 1,595
Mean	2.867	7.819	10.765
Median	.300	.130	.770
Maximum	416.000	5,000.000	5,287.000
SD	15.558	126.423	135.717

NOTE.--Summary statistics on compensatory, punitive, and total amounts awarded in 1,979 lawsuits in which plaintiffs sought punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations. Verdicts were rendered or settlements made between 1985 and June 1996. The lawsuits are grouped in columns by outcome (defense verdict, plaintiff verdict, or settlement) and in rows by the lawsuit topic. In each cell, we report the mean, median, maximum, and SD of the punitive, compensatory, or total award for lawsuits in the cell. Positive award amounts for defense verdicts represent payments agreed to after the verdict.

TABLE 2

SUMMARY OF AWARD AMOUNTS (in $ millions)

	SETTLEMENTS
LAWSUIT TOPIC	Compensatory Award	Punitive Award	Total Award
Product liability	n = 22
Mean	.765	.000	.765
Median	.430	.000	.430
Maximum	4.400	.000	4.400
SD	1.032	.000	1.032
Fraud	n = 3
Mean	1.157	2.500	3.657
Median	.900	.000	.900
Maximum	2.250	7.500	9.750
SD	.990	4.330	5.285
Business negligence	n = 5

REV_00261911

Mean	1.629	.000	1.629
Median	2.055	.000	2.055
Maximum	2.600	.000	2.600
SD	1.124	.000	1.124
Breach of contract	n = 4
Mean	1.381	.000	1.381
Median	.685	.000	.685
Maximum	3.353	.000	3.353
SD	1.733	.000	1.733
Insurance claims	n = 22
Mean	1.482	.080	1.495
Median	.365	.000	.330
Maximum	19.450	1.750	19.450
SD	4.260	.373	4.168
Employment claims	n = 4
Mean	1.045	.000	1.045
Median	.750	.000	.750
Maximum	2.637	.000	2.637
SD	1.130	.000	1.130
Asbestos claims	n = 9
Mean	1.641	.000	1.641
Median	1.016	.000	1.016
Maximum	3.877	.000	3.877
SD	1.746	.000	1.746
Vehicular accidents	n = 9
Mean	2.304	.000	2.304
Median	2.797	.000	2.797
Maximum	5.500	.000	5.500
SD	2.025	.000	2.025
Malpractice claims	n = 0
Mean	. . .	. . .	. . .
Median	. . .	. . .	. . .
Maximum	. . .	. . .	. . .
SD	. . .	. . .	. . .
Miscellaneous claims	n = 16
Mean	1.507	.000	1.507
Median	.307	.000	.307
Maximum	8.350	.000	8.350
SD	2.377	.000	2.377
All lawsuit types	n = 94
Mean	1.372	.098	1.460
Median	.517	.000	.500
Maximum	19.450	7.500	19.450
SD	2.463	.792	2.609

NOTE.--Summary statistics on compensatory, punitive, and total amounts awarded in 1,979 lawsuits in which plaintiffs sought punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations. Verdicts were rendered or settlements made between 1985 and June 1996. The lawsuits are grouped in columns by outcome (defense verdict, plaintiff verdict, or settlement) and in rows by the lawsuit topic. In each cell, we report the mean, median, maximum, and SD of the punitive, compensatory, or total award for lawsuits in the cell. Positive award amounts for defense verdicts represent payments agreed to after the verdict.

REV_00261912

TABLE 2

SUMMARY OF AWARD AMOUNTS (in $ millions)

ALL LAWSUITS

LAWSUIT TOPIC	Compensatory Award	Punitive Award	Total Award
Product liability	n = 374
Mean	3.140	5.126	8.265
Median	.652	.197	1.449
Maximum	50.000	101.000	150.000
SD	6.475	12.959	16.993
Fraud	n = 118
Mean	3.886	10.858	14.837
Median	.070	.000	.262
Maximum	154.160	250.000	404.160
SD	17.547	37.221	51.935
Business negligence	n = 291
Mean	2.047	19.910	22.025
Median	.151	.300	.523
Maximum	287.000	5,000.000	5,287.000
SD	17.117	293.069	310.433
Breach of contract	n = 147
Mean	5.797	7.016	12.960
Median	.117	.000	.253
Maximum	130.000	400.000	500.000
SD	20.165	35.833	48.485
Insurance claims	n = 314
Mean	.828	2.972	3.836
Median	.100	.000	.366
Maximum	25.000	100.000	100.432
SD	2.450	10.233	11.381
Employment claims	n = 222
Mean	.662	2.038	2.719
Median	.154	.000	.284
Maximum	9.800	100.000	107.750
SD	1.525	9.528	10.685
Asbestos claims	n = 59
Mean	1.726	1.775	3.501

REV_00261913

Median	.500	.000	.500
Maximum	8.450	54.000	57.370
SD	2.421	7.497	8.378
Vehicular accidents	n = 110
Mean	1.063	.883	1.979
Median	.338	.010	.523
Maximum	13.700	22.500	25.000
SD	1.780	2.789	3.761
Malpractice claims	n = 26
Mean	.560	1.250	1.810
Median	.015	.000	.067
Maximum	5.900	24.000	25.250
SD	1.499	4.700	5.120
Miscellaneous claims	n = 318
Mean	3.090	2.634	5.765
Median	.071	.000	.177
Maximum	416.000	125.000	541.000
SD	24.314	11.774	32.907
All lawsuit types	n = 1,979
Mean	2.377	6.317	8.749
Median	.196	.025	.478
Maximum	518.536	5,000.000	5,287.000
SD	18.242	113.507	121.940

NOTE.--Summary statistics on compensatory, punitive, and total amounts awarded in 1,979 lawsuits in which plaintiffs sought punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations. Verdicts were rendered or settlements made between 1985 and June 1996. The lawsuits are grouped in columns by outcome (defense verdict, plaintiff verdict, or settlement) and in rows by the lawsuit topic. In each cell, we report the mean, median, maximum, and SD of the punitive, compensatory, or total award for lawsuits in the cell. Positive award amounts for defense verdicts represent payments agreed to after the verdict.

[*540] mean total award in plaintiff verdicts for six of the 10 categories of cases and less than 33 percent for three others. Only for vehicular accidents is the mean total settlement larger, and in that case it is only 14 percent larger. Averaging over all lawsuit types, the total settlement amount is 13.6 percent of the total amount awarded in plaintiff verdicts.

There are several mutually nonexclusive ways to interpret this result: (i) Perhaps small cases tend to settle, and large cases tend to proceed to trial. (ii) Punitive awards may not be important in cases that settle. (iii) Plaintiffs may be extremely risk averse, leading them to settle for less than the expected value of the trial outcome. (iv) Or perhaps settlement amounts do equal expected trial outcomes, but plaintiffs win verdicts, on average, only about 13.6 percent of the time. (v) It also is possible that plaintiffs eventually receive substantially less than the verdict amounts we have recorded, despite our attempts to track reductions in verdict awards in the Lexis/Nexis database. (vi) Yet another possibility is that there is a reporting bias. For example, cases in which settlement amounts remain sealed or unreported may differ from cases in which the settlement amounts are reported.

REV_00261914

IV. DETERMINANTS OF PUNITIVE AWARD AMOUNTS

In this section we report on the empirical predictability of punitive awards, thereby addressing the controversy raised by Sunstein et al., Eisenberg et al., and Polinsky. [27] Table 3 summarizes the results of three regressions in which the dependent variable is the punitive award. The regressors include the following variables:

The Compensatory Award. According to the probability-of-detection theory, punitive awards should be a positive multiple of the compensatory award (and the multiple should be inversely correlated with the probability of detection and punishment). Alternatively, juries may treat compensatory and punitive awards as substitutes. If so, the punitive award should be negatively related to the compensatory amount. It also is possible that juries consider the distinction between compensatory and punitive awards to be arbitrary and assign total awards to plaintiffs without much regard to their classifications. In this case, the punitive and compensatory amounts should be unrelated.

The Square of the Compensatory Award. We include this term to allow for a nonlinear relation between the punitive and compensatory awards.

The Natural Log of the Market Value of the Defendant Company's Common [*541]

TABLE 3

DETERMINANTS OF PUNITIVE AWARD AMOUNTS

Variable	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3
Compensatory award	1.78 	1.42 	1.37 **
	(.000)	(.000)	(.000)
Compensatory award squared (X 10<-9>)	-9.57 	-7.22 	-.04
	(.000)	(.000)	(.980)
In of the market value of equity	.55 +	.89 	.98 **
	(.071)	(.007)	(.002)
Index # 1 of industry exposure to punitive award liability	-.92	-1.30	-30.70
	(.978)	(.713)	(.374)
Number of defendants	.01	.04	1.57 *
	(.987)	(.956)	(.033)
Fixed effects for lawsuit type	Yes	Yes	Yes
Fixed year effects	Yes	Yes	Yes
Fixed state effects	Yes	Yes	Yes
Intercept	12.60 +	8.79	.45
	(.073)	(.210)	(.944)
n	1,087	807	668
Chi-squared (F-value for model 3)	446.7	340.7	8.41
p-Value	.000	.000	.000
Pseudo-R<2> (adjusted R<2> for model 3)	.018	.015	.508

NOTE.--Estimates of the relations between the punitive award and characteristics of the lawsuit and the defendant company. Model 1 is a Tobit regression using data from 1,087 cases, including cases in which the punitive and/or compensatory award is zero. Model 2 is a Tobit regression using data from 807 cases in which the compensatory award is positive. Model

REV_00261915

3 is an ordinary least squares regression using data from 668 cases in which positive punitive amounts are awarded. All coefficients except for the compensatory award and compensatory award squared are in millions. Values in parentheses are p-values.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

Stock, Measured at the End of the Year Immediately Preceding the Year in Which a Settlement or Verdict Is Reached. We conjecture that award amounts are positively related to juries' perceptions of the defendants' abilities to pay. Firm size serves as a proxy for deep financial pockets.

The Number of Defendants. Some of the defendants of lawsuits in our sample share potential liability with other parties. The punitive award may be related to the number of parties that potentially share responsibility for an award, because multiple parties represent deeper pockets.

An Index ("Index # 1") of the Firm's Industry-Related Exposure to Punitive Lawsuits. Some lines of business attract more and different types of punitive lawsuits than others. Automobile manufacturers, for example, are defendants in many lawsuits prompted by automobile accidents, in which [*542] plaintiffs allege some type of product failure. We conjecture that punitive awards differ systematically across industries and according to the frequencies with which firms in an industry are targets of punitive lawsuits.

To test this hypothesis, we created an index of each firm's industry-related exposure to punitive award liability. Using data from all 1,979 lawsuits in our sample, we partitioned the lawsuits by year and the two-digit Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) code of the defendant company. The SIC codes are taken from the 1996 CRSP database and, when not available on CRSP, from the 1996 Compustat database. [28] The number of lawsuits in each year-SIC classification then is divided by the number of CRSP-listed firms with the same two-digit SIC. This ratio provides a measure of the relative intensity of punitive lawsuits in each year for each SIC category. "Index # 1" of industry-related punitive award liability is the three-year moving average of this ratio, centered on the year of the lawsuit being considered. Therefore, all firms in the same SIC category with punitive lawsuits in the same year have the same index of punitive award liability. Firms with lawsuits in different years, or in different SIC codes, generally have different index values.

Finally, we include dummy variables to control for the lawsuit type (using the categories reported in Table 1), the year, and the state in which the trial was heard (or in the case of settlements, where the lawsuit was filed). Results reported in Table 3 exclude the Exxon Valdez oil spill because the $ 5 billion punitive award in this case is an extreme outlier. (The next largest punitive award in our sample is $ 250 million.) [29]

Model 1 in Table 3 uses information from 1,087 lawsuits for which we have sufficient data on all variables. Some of these lawsuits were resolved in defendants' favor and have zero compensatory and punitive awards. Others have positive compensatory awards, but zero punitive awards. To accommodate the large number of zero punitive awards, we use a Tobit regression model. Model 2 includes data on 807 cases in which the compensatory award is positive. Because many of the punitive awards in these cases are zero, we use a Tobit regression model here also. Model 3 includes only cases in which positive punitive amounts were awarded. It is estimated using ordinary least squares.

[*543] The pseudo-R<2> in model 1 indicates that less than 2 percent of the total variation in punitive awards is explained using our control variables. Model 2 yields a similar result. The adjusted R<2> in model 3, in contrast, indicates that the explanatory variables explain about 51 percent of the variation in punitive awards conditional on the award's being positive. Thus, the model 3 result is similar to that reported by Eisenberg et al. [30] When we include cases in which punitive damages are not awarded, as in models 1 and 2, our ability to explain the total variation in the award amounts drops dramatically. This result is consistent with Polinsky's prediction: we can explain the level of punitive damages if we know they will be awarded, but we have a difficult time explaining any of the overall variation in awards. [31]

REV_00261916

In fact, our ability to predict punitive awards, ex ante, most likely is even lower than the results in models 1-3 suggest. This is because one key variable in these regressions--the compensatory award--is not known until after the verdict. Plaintiffs and defendants might forecast the compensatory award, but they are unlikely to do so without error. (Indeed, regressions that seek to explain compensatory awards, using the explanatory variables listed in Table 3, yield pseudo R<2>'s of less than 3 percent.) To the extent that knowing the actual ex post compensatory damages provides better information on the jury than could be guessed at before the end of the trial, models 1-3 overestimate the amount of the variation in punitive damages that a typical firm can predict.

In all three models, the punitive award is positively and significantly related to the compensatory award. This indicates that juries do not treat punitive and compensatory awards as substitutes but, rather, award punitives as a positive multiple of the compensatory award. As indicated by the negative (and significant, in models 1 and 2) coefficient for the square of the compensatory award, however, the punitive award increases less than proportionately with the compensatory amount. Assuming that the penalties are optimal in the sense proposed by Becker, [32] this implies that the probability of detection rises with the size of the loss. This result, however, is not robust--including [*544]

TABLE 4

FACTORS AFFECTING THE LIKELIHOOD THAT PUNITIVE DAMAGES WILL BE AWARDED

Variable	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model 4
Compensatory award (x 10<-7>)	2.16 	.82 	.58	.17
	(.000)	(.000)	(.101)	(.152)
Compensatory award squared (x 10<-16>)	-26.70 	-1.85 	-9.22	-.34
	(.000)	(.000)	(.148)	(.360)
ln of the market value of equity	-.05	...	-.02	...
	(.195)		(.735)
Index of industry exposure to punitive award liability	3.30	1.53	-1.05	-1.94
	(.449)	(.652)	(.861)	(.680)
Number of defendants	-.12	-.20 	-.18	-.218 *
	(.202)	(.004)	(.181)	(.026)
Intercept	21.67 	19.52 	21.26 	20.67 **
	(.000)	(.000)	(.000)	(.000)
Fixed effects for lawsuit type	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
Fixed year effects	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
Fixed state effects	Yes	Yes	Yes	Yes
n	953	1,497	636	1,058
Pseudo-R<2>	.220	.203	.183	.192
Model chi-squared	287	411	135	221

NOTE.--Logistic regression estimates in which the dependent variable is equal to one if a punitive amount is awarded, and zero otherwise. Model 1 includes all cases in the sample for which the punitive award amount is reported and data are available on the firm's market value of equity. Model 2 includes additional firms without market value of equity data. Models 3 and 4 include only cases in which positive compensatory amounts are awarded. The p-values are in parentheses.

REV_00261917

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

the Exxon Valdez case reverses the signs for the coefficients on both the compensatory award and its square.

In all three models, the coefficient on the log of the market value of equity is positive and statistically significant, indicating that punitive damages increase with firm size at a decreasing rate. This indicates that firms with deeper pockets (measured here by greater market value) have higher punitive damages. Neither Index # 1 of the vulnerability to punitive damages nor the number of defendants is significantly related to the level of punitive damages. Individual state coefficients are not reported in the tables, but the states with significant negative coefficients are California, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, and South Dakota. Alabama and Texas have large positive coefficients.

Table 4 reports the results of tests designed to investigate the factors that affect the likelihood that punitive damages are awarded. In each regression, the dependent variable is equal to one if punitive damages were awarded [*545] and to zero otherwise. Regressions using the logit procedure are reported, although probit estimates produce similar results. [33]

Model 1 in Table 4 uses data from all cases, including those for which the compensatory award is zero. Model 3 excludes cases for which the compensatory award is zero. Because the firm size variable is statistically insignificant, it is excluded in models 2 and 4, thus permitting use of additional cases for which firm size data are not available. When cases with zero compensatory awards are included (models 1 and 2), the results indicate that the probability of a punitive award increases at a decreasing rate with the level of the compensatory award. When the firm size variable is excluded (models 2 and 4), the probability of a punitive award is negatively and significantly related to the number of defendants. This result suggests that multiple defendants are named in more speculative cases, or perhaps that multiple defendants pool resources and defend themselves more successfully. The pseudo-R<2>'s indicate that the regressors in models 1-4 explain only about 18-22 percent of the variation in the probability that punitive damages will be awarded.

V. SHARE VALUE EFFECTS OF IMPORTANT SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

A. Market-Wide Share Value Effects

The evidence in Table 2 indicates that adverse punitive damage judgments can be very costly to individual firms. Little is known, however, about the importance of punitive damages to businesses in general. To investigate this issue, we examine the effects on firm values of changes in the legal environment that affect firms' prospects of large punitive award liabilities.

Between April 1986 and May 1996, the U.S. Supreme Court rendered seven decisions regarding claims that punitive damage awards can be excessive. Table 5 contains summaries of these seven decisions. In the first five, the Supreme Court upheld lower courts' punitive awards and rejected claims that the awards were excessive (although in the Browning-Ferris case the Court based its decision on the defendant's failure to argue that the punitive performance. In the absence of externalities, punitive awards are not necessary to assure contractual performance even when firms face less than a 100 percent probability of being sued for contractual breach. Next, we examine empirically the sizes, determinants, and valuation impacts of punitive awards assessed against publicly held companies. We find that settlement amounts are low compared to jury awards, and punitive awards are highly variable and difficult to explain using characteristics of the lawsuit or defendant company. Supreme Court and legislative actions affecting punitive awards generally have not had systematic impacts on firm values. Specific punitive lawsuits, however, decrease the values of defendant companies by amounts that exceed settlement or jury verdict amounts, indicating that punitive lawsuits impose reputational costs on defendants.

REV_00261918

TEXT:
[*527] I. INTRODUCTION

THE sizes and variability of punitive damage awards generate substantial debate. They also appear to affect some firms' business decisions. The prospect of high adverse awards so concerned cigarette manufactures that they agreed to pay over $ 350 billion to limit much of their punitive exposure. Defenders of punitive awards point out that punitive award liability was "the lever that brought the tobacco industry to the table." [1] Opponents of large punitive awards, however, claim that these awards impose undue costs [*528] on prospective defendants: "To play the game, you have to bet the corporation." [2] Supporters and opponents may not agree on many things, but they both agree that punitive damages are important.

One reason punitive awards are potentially costly to firms is that they appear to be both highly variable and large relative to the losses suffered by the plaintiff. In Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., compensatory damages of $ 52,146 were combined with a $ 6 million punitive judgment. In Pacific Mutual Life v. Haslip, compensatory damages of $ 200,000 prompted additional punitive damages of $ 3.84 million. And in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., compensatory damages of $ 19,000 were boosted with a $ 10 million punitive award.

All three of these punitive awards were upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court. In recent decisions, however, the Court has reversed large awards. The Court ruled that the punitive damage award in BMW v. Gore, for example, was so excessive that it violated the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution. Congress also recently has considered legislation that would place limits on punitive damages. In 1995, for example, the House of Representatives passed two bills that would cap punitive awards and impose costs on parties who refused settlements and subsequently received judgments for smaller amounts.

These efforts are based on a view that large punitive awards are overly costly to defendant companies and the overall economy. Little is known, however, about the importance of punitive awards for firm value and, hence, the value of judicial or legislative limits on such awards. Anecdotes about a few exceptionally large awards do not necessarily imply that firms in general expect large losses when cases are filed against them. Nor do they indicate that punitive damages impose large losses on the market as a whole. One objective of this article is to measure the valuation impacts of punitive awards, the lawsuits that bring them about, and judicial and legislative attempts to place limits on them.

We also examine the predictability of punitive damage awards. Sunstein et al. present a theory implying that potential punitive awards should be both unbounded and unpredictable. [3] The evidence about the predictability of punitive awards, however, is mixed. Consistent with their prediction, Sunstein et al. provide experimental evidence supporting the notion that dollar awards made by juries are inherently difficult to predict. Similar results using experimental markets are reported by Kahneman [*529] et al. [4] Using data from actual practice, however, Eisenberg et al. conclude that punitive damages are at least as predictable damages awarded violated the Due Process Clause). In the two [*546]

REV_00261901

TABLE 5

INFORMATION ON IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS REGARDING PUNITIVE DAMAGE AWARDS, 1985-96

TITLE	DESCRIPTION	LOWER COURT OUTCOME
Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	Breach of contract	$ 1,650 actual damages, $ 3.5 million punitive award
Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	Breach of contract	$ 20,000 actual damages, $ 1.6 million punitive award
Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.	Antitrust claim	$ 366,000 (treble) damages and court costs, $ 6.066 million punitive award
Pacific Mutual Life v. Haslip	Breach of contract	$ 200,000 actual damages, $ 3.84 million punitive award
TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	Title dispute	$ 19,000 actual damages, $ 10 million punitive award
Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	Product liability	$ 900,000 actual damages, $ 5 million punitive award
BMW of North America v. Gore	Consumer fraud	$ 4,000 actual damages, $ 2 million punitive award

NOTE.--N.A. = not available.

TABLE 5

INFORMATION ON IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS REGARDING PUNITIVE DAMAGE AWARDS, 1985-96

U.S. SUPREME COURT DATES

TITLE	Writ	Argued	Decided	OUTCOME
Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	N.A.	12/4/85	4/22/86	Award affirmed
Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	N.A.	10/30/87	5/16/88	Award affirmed
Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.	12/5/88	4/18/89	6/26/89	Award affirmed
Pacific Mutual Life v. Haslip	4/2/90	10/3/90	3/4/91	Award affirmed
TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	11/30/92	3/31/93	6/25/93	Award affirmed
Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	1/14/94	4/20/94	6/24/94	Reversed and remanded
BMW of North America v. Gore	1/23/95	10/11/95	5/20/96	Reversed and remanded

NOTE.--N.A. = not available.

[*547] most recent cases, the Court reversed lower courts' rulings, arguing in part that the punitive awards were excessive. [34] Each of these seven decisions resolved some uncertainty regarding the Court's attitudes toward punitive awards. Thus, they affect many firms' exposure to punitive damage liability.

REV_00261919

Initially, we examine the Court decisions' effects on the values of a broad set of common stocks, using the CRSP equal weighted market index. For each Supreme Court case we focus on three event dates: when writ of certiorari was granted, when arguments were heard, and when the Court's decision was rendered. Table 6 reports the CRSP cumulative equal weighted index returns for two event windows around each of these dates: the 3-day window (-1, +1) centered on the event date (which we label day 0), and the 12-day window (-1, +10). To assess statistical significance, Table 6 also reports the following test statistic:

z(t[1], t[2]) = (R(t[1], t[2]) - (t[2] - t[1] + 1)R[-201,-2])/((t[2] - t[1] + 1)<0.5> s[-201,-2]).

Here, R(t[1], t[2]) equals the cumulative index return measured over the (t[1], t[2]) interval, R[-201,-2] is the mean daily index return measured over the 200 trading days (-201, -2) relative to the event day, and s[-201,-2] is the SD of daily index returns over the (-201, -2) interval. Under the null hypothesis that the distributions of index daily returns are identical, independent, and asymptotically normal, z(t[1], t[2]) is distributed approximately unit normal. Note that, since the numerator in z(t[1], t[2]) is the abnormal index return, the sign of z(t[1], t[2]) can differ from the sign of the raw return. [35]

Perhaps the most important recent Supreme Court decision regarding punitive awards is BMW of North America v. Gore, in which the Court reversed a $ 2 million punitive award (when actual damages were $ 4,000), arguing that the award was excessive. While the Court remained vague regarding exactly what constitutes excessive punitive awards, the decision received widespread publicity for signaling a limit to future punitive awards. As reported in Table 6, the CRSP equal weighted index increased in value 1.413 percent during the three trading days centered on the BMW decision date and 3.136 percent during the (-1, +10) 12-day window around the date. Both estimates are statistically significant at the 10 percent level. This result is consistent with the joint argument that punitive damages are important [*548]

TABLE 6

MARKET-WIDE STOCK RETURNS AROUND IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

		CUMULATIVE AGGREGATE RETURNS AROUND THE FOLLOWING DATES Petition for Writ of Certiorari Granted
CASE	TITLE	(-1, +1)	(-1, +10)
1	Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	N.A.	N.A.
2	Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	N.A.	N.A.
3	Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.	.392	3.060
		(.11)	(.62)
4	Pacific Mutual Live v. Haslip	* -1.045	* -1.532
		(-2.00)	(-1.99)
5	TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	1.456	4.581
		(1.08)	(1.44)
6	Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	.489	.907
		(-.20)	(-1.14)
7	BMW of North America v. Gore	-.168	2.265
		(-.96)	(.42)
Average, cases 1-5		.268	2.036

REV_00261920

t-statistic	(-.47)	(.04)
Average, cases 6-7	.161	1.586
t-statistic	(-.79)	(-.57)

NOTE.--Cumulative (raw) returns for the CRSP equal weighted index with dividends around key U.S. Supreme Court decisions regarding punitive damage awards, 1985-96. Test statistics, in parentheses, are distributed approximately as unit normal under the null hypothesis of no abnormal returns. Each test statistic is computed as the cumulative CRSP index return minus the expected return, divided by an estimate of the SE of the cumulative return. The expected return and SE are estimated from stock returns during the 200 trading days immediately preceding the event period. Each test statistic can have a sign that differs from its associated cumulative CRSP index return.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

TABLE 6

MARKET-WIDE STOCK RETURNS AROUND IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

		CUMULATIVE AGGREGATE RETURNS AROUND THE FOLLOWING DATES Arguments Heard
CASE	TITLE	(-1, +1)	(-1, +10)
1	Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	.316	1.766
		(.23)	(.81)
2	Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	* 3.797	4.695
		(2.06)	(1.14)
3	Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.	.413	1.943
		(.09)	(.26)
4	Pacific Mutual Live v. Haslip	 -2.353	+ -2.785
		(-2.69)	(-1.75)
5	TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	-.700	.692
		(-1.50)	(-1.02)
6	Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	.650	1.830
		(.07)	(-.36)
7	BMW of North America v. Gore	.757	.642
		(1.91)	(.50)
Average, cases 1-5		-.295	1.262
t-statistic		(-.81)	(-.25)
Average, cases 6-7		.704	1.236
t-statistic		(1.26)	(.60)

NOTE.--Cumulative (raw) returns for the CRSP equal weighted index with dividends around key U.S. Supreme Court decisions regarding punitive damage awards, 1985-96. Test statistics, in parentheses, are distributed approximately as unit normal under the null hypothesis of no abnormal returns. Each test statistic is computed as the cumulative CRSP index return minus the expected return, divided by an estimate of the SE of the cumulative return. The expected return and SE are estimated from stock returns during the 200 trading days immediately preceding the event period. Each test statistic can have a sign that differs from its associated cumulative CRSP index return.

REV_00261921

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.
* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.
 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

TABLE 6

MARKET-WIDE STOCK RETURNS AROUND IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

		CUMULATIVE AGGREGATE RETURNS AROUND THE FOLLOWING DATES Decision Rendered
CASE	TITLE	(-1, +1)	(-1, +10)
1	Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	.194	.979
		(-.18)	(-.20)
2	Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	.164	1.573
		(-.10)	(.04)
3	Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc.	-.749	1.344
		(-1.293)	(-.067)
4	Pacific Mutual Live v. Haslip	+ 2.192	* 6.199
		(1.83)	(2.50)
5	TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	.912	2.170
		(.34)	(-.25)
6	Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	-.407	.866
		(-1.18)	(-.76)
7	BMW of North America v. Gore	* 1.413	+ 3.136
		(1.75)	(1.94)
Average, cases 1-5		.543	2.453
t-statistic		(.27)	(.91)
Average, cases 6-7		.503	+ 2.001
t-statistic		(.44)	(1.92)

NOTE.--Cumulative (raw) returns for the CRSP equal weighted index with dividends around key U.S. Supreme Court decisions regarding punitive damage awards, 1985-96. Test statistics, in parentheses, are distributed approximately as unit normal under the null hypothesis of no abnormal returns. Each test statistic is computed as the cumulative CRSP index return minus the expected return, divided by an estimate of the SE of the cumulative return. The expected return and SE are estimated from stock returns during the 200 trading days immediately preceding the event period. Each test statistic can have a sign that differs from its associated cumulative CRSP index return.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

REV_00261922

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.
 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

[*549] to businesses and that the BMW decision substantially decreased firms' punitive liability exposure.

Other results in Table 6, however, are not consistent with the argument that businesses' punitive liability exposure is harmful. The only other case associated with statistically significant index returns is Pacific Mutual Life v. Haslip. The Court ruled seven to one that the large punitive award in this case did not violate the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution. It is implausible to argue that this decision decreased firms' punitive liability exposure. Nonetheless, the index returns around this date are positive and statistically significant. Most other index returns in Table 6 are statistically insignificant. Thus, most Supreme Court decisions regarding punitive damages are not systematically associated with market-wide stock price changes.

B. Effects on Firms Defending Recent or Pending Punitive Damage Lawsuits

Whereas the previous section reports on market-wide effects of the Supreme Court decisions, in this section we investigate the effects on the values of firms defending recent or pending punitive damage lawsuits. Table 7 reports the mean 3-day (-1, +1) abnormal stock returns for firms that defended lawsuits seeking punitive damages within 365 days of each of the key dates for the seven Supreme Court decisions summarized in Table 5. Abnormal stock returns are calculated using coefficients estimated from a one-factor market model over days -230 through -31 relative to each Supreme Court date, using the Eventus software package. Standard errors for computing test statistics are calculated using the procedure described by Mikkelson and Partch. [36]

Several of the mean abnormal returns reported in Table 7 have large t-statistics. For example, 148 firms had punitive damage lawsuits decided or settled within 365 days of the decision date (April 22, 1986) of the Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie case. The mean cumulative abnormal return for these firms for the three trading days centered on this date is -1.56 percent, with a t-statistic of -5.61. By itself, this result suggests that news of the Aetna decision resulted in lower stock values of firms with pending or recently decided punitive lawsuits.

Overall, however, the results in Table 7 do not yield a consistent interpretation. The TXO Production decision date, for example, is associated with a statistically significant positive average abnormal return, even though this [*550]

TABLE 7

AVERAGE ABNORMAL STOCK RETURNS FOR FIRMS WITH RECENT, CURRENT, OR PENDING PUNITIVE AWARDS CASES

	Petition for Writ of Certiorari Granted	Arguments Heard	Decision Rendered
Aetna Life Insurance v. Lavoie	N.A.	n = 127 -.15 (-.64)	n = 148 -1.56  (-5.61)
Bankers Life and Casualty v. Crenshaw	N.A.	n = 189 -3.36  (-7.76)	n = 195 .05 (.22)
Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco

REV_00261923

Disposal, Inc.	n = 185	n = 185	n = 200
	-.27	.35	.18
	(-1.36)	(1.42)	(.83)
Pacific Mutual Life v. Haslip	n = 260	n = 258	n = 253
	.04	-1.53 	-.27
	(.22)	(-4.79)	(.41)
TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp.	n = 256	n = 261	n = 272
	.89 	-.18	1.05 **
	(3.76)	(-.62)	(5.55)
Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg	n = 282	n = 276	n = 263
	-.35 +	.37	.24
	(-1.87)	(1.57)	(1.48)
BMW of North American v. Gore	n = 240	n = 163	n = 108
	-.27	.29	.18
	(-1.52)	(1.43)	(.93)

NOTE.--Mean 3-day abnormal stock returns for defendant companies in lawsuits seeking punitive awards that occur within 365 calendar days of U.S. Supreme Court actions concerning seven cases with important implications for punitive awards. Each cell presents the number of firms with lawsuits settled within 365 days of the Supreme Court action, the mean abnormal stock return (in percent) for the 3 days centered on the day of the Court action, and (in parentheses) the associated t-statistic. N.A. = not available.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

decision upheld a large punitive award. Furthermore, most of the average abnormal returns are not statistically significant.

We examined the sensitivity of the results in Table 7 to the inclusion of different sets of firms. For example, we restricted the samples to firms with pending lawsuits and to firms whose verdicts were rendered within 6 months or 3 months of the Supreme Court action. The results, however, are similar to those reported in Table 7: individual estimates have high associated t-statistics, but most are statistically insignificant. Overall, we infer that the Supreme Court decisions are not systematically associated with significant movements in the stock prices of firms with pending or recently decided punitive damage lawsuits.

[*551] C. Cross-Sectional Differences in Share Value Reactions to Supreme Court Decisions

Table 8 reports on our attempts to explain the cross-sectional variation in share value reactions to the BMW and Honda decisions. As in Table 7, we focus on firms with punitive award judgments or settlements within 365 days of the decision date. In each regression, the dependent variable is the 3-day abnormal stock return centered on the decision date, divided by its standard error. The independent variables include the compensatory award, the punitive award, the natural log of the market value of the firm's equity, and four measures of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability. The first measure, Index # 1, as described in Section IV, measures the firm's industry's exposure to punitive damage lawsuits. The second measure, Index # 2, equals Index # 1 multiplied by the average punitive damage award for these same lawsuits. The third and fourth measures of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability are interaction terms, in which Index # 1 (or Index # 2) is multiplied by the natural log of the market value of the firm's equity.

REV_00261924

Once again, many of the coefficients are statistically significant, but overall they do not support the notion that punitive damages are important to firms. Presumably, firms facing the highest expected punitive damages should have expected the largest benefits from either the BMW or the Honda decisions. But the coefficients on punitive damages are negative (and statistically significant in the Honda case). Index # 1 of the firm's exposure to punitive damages is positively and significantly related to abnormal returns for the BMW case. The net effect of the index, however, is actually negative because the interaction of the index with the firm's market value has a consistently larger impact. (Rerunning the regressions for the BMW case without the market value interactions produces a negative but statistically insignificant coefficient for Index # 1.)

More puzzling still, the results for the Honda case are not consistent with those for the BMW case. For example, the coefficients for the compensatory award are positive and statistically significant for the BMW case, but negative and statistically significant for the Honda case. Even the signs of the coefficients for firm size differ. Overall, we are unable to explain the cross section of abnormal stock returns for these cases in a consistent fashion.

VI. IMPACT OF CONGRESSIONAL ATTEMPTS TO LIMIT PUNITIVE AWARDS

During 1995 and 1996, the U.S. Congress considered and passed legislation that promised to limit many firms' exposure to punitive damage awards. The legislation ultimately was vetoed by President Clinton, and on May 9, 1996, the House of Representatives failed by 23 votes to override [*552]

TABLE 8

DETERMINANTS OF CROSS-SECTIONAL DIFFERENCES IN STOCK PRICE REACTIONS TO IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

EXPOSURE TO PUNITIVE AWARD LIABILITY

Regression Number	Compensatory Award (x 10<-5>)	Punitive Award (x 10<-5>)	ln(MVE) (x 10<-4>)	Index # 1 (x 10<-1>)
Panel A: Effects of BMW of North America v. Gore on Values of Firms with Nearby Punitive Damage Award Cases (n = 106)
1	5.29 		7.58 	4.94 *
	(4.67)		(3.43)	(2.59)
2		-5.58	7.41 	8.51 **
		(-1.18)	(3.00)	(4.43)
3	6.53 		3.90 *
	(6.10)		(2.24)
4		-5.40	7.07
		(-1.04)	(.04)
Panel B: Effects of Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg on Values of Firms with Nearby Punitive Damage Award Cases (n = 262)
1	-6.96 		-3.71	1.03
	(-5.15)		(-1.17)	(.54)
2		-6.84 	-4.77	.18
		(-6.01)	(-1.52)	(.10)
3	-7.07		-4.00
	(-5.27) 		(-1.77) +

REV_00261925

4		-7.02 	-4.53 *
		(-6.27)	(-2.05)

NOTE.--Estimated coefficients from regressions using the firm-specific 3-day standardized abnormal stock return as the dependent variable. In panel A, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on May 20, 1996, the day the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision in the BMW case. In panel B, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on June 24, 1994, the day the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision in the Honda Motor case. In each panel, observations are included only for firms that are defendants in punitive award cases within 365 calendar days, before or after, the date of the Supreme Court action. The regressors include the compensatory award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the punitive award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the natural log of the firm's market value of equity, and indices of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability. Index # 1 reflects the relative frequency of punitive award lawsuits for firms in the same industry during the 3-year period centered on the current year. Index # 2 is Index # 1 multiplied by the average punitive award in those same lawsuits. The t-statistics are in parentheses.

+ The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 10% level.

* The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 5% level.

 The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 1% level.

TABLE 8

DETERMINANTS OF CROSS-SECTIONAL DIFFERENCES IN STOCK PRICE REACTIONS TO IMPORTANT U.S. SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

EXPOSURE TO PUNITIVE AWARD LIABILITY

Regression Number	Index # 2 (x 10<-9>)	Index # 1 x ln(MVE) (x 10<-3>)	Index # 2 x ln(MVE) (x 10<-11>)	ADJUSTED R<2>	F-STATISTIC
Panel A: Effects of BMW of North America v. Gore on Values of Firms with Nearby Punitive Damage Award Cases (n = 106)
1		-3.17 *		.292	11.85 **
		(-2.48)
2		-5.47 		.151	5.68 **
		(-4.23)
3	-1.52		9.14	.244	9.46 **
	(-.50)		(.50)
4	-1.79		10.82	-.024	.39
	(-.51)		(.51)

REV_00261926

Panel B: Effects of Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg on Values of Firms with Nearby Punitive Damage Award Cases (n = 262)

1	-5.39 (-.41)		.094	7.74 **
2	.33 (.03)		.123	10.18 **
3	-.81 (-.41)	.40 (.33)	.089	7.39 **
4	-2.47 (-1.26)	1.41 (1.18)	.125	10.29 **

NOTE.--Estimated coefficients from regressions using the firm-specific 3-day standardized abnormal stock return as the dependent variable. In panel A, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on May 20, 1996, the day the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision in the BMW case. In panel B, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on June 24, 1994, the day the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision in the Honda Motor case. In each panel, observations are included only for firms that are defendants in punitive award cases within 365 calendar days, before or after, the date of the Supreme Court action. The regressors include the compensatory award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the punitive award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the natural log of the firm's market value of equity, and indices of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability. Index # 1 reflects the relative frequency of punitive award lawsuits for firms in the same industry during the 3-year period centered on the current year. Index # 2 is Index # 1 multiplied by the average punitive award in those same lawsuits. The t-statistics are in parentheses.

+ The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 10% level.

* The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 5% level.

 The estimated coefficient (or F-statistic) is significant at the 1% level.

[*553] the veto. To further investigate the importance of punitive damages to businesses, we measure the market value impacts of eight important events in the development of this legislation. [37]

The eight key events are summarized in Table 9. On March 10, 1995, the House of Representatives passed legislation that would limit punitive damages to $ 250,000 or three times the compensatory damages, whichever is greater. On March 16, a bipartisan group of senators proposed a narrow version of product liability reform directed primarily at very small firms. Press articles interpreted this as evidence that the strong reforms passed by the House would not pass in the Senate. Nonetheless, on May 10, the Senate passed its own bill that was fairly close to the original House bill. Nearly one year later, on March 18, 1996, the House-Senate Conference Committee reported out legislation that conformed to the general limits passed by the House (limiting punitive damages for defective-product cases in state and federal courts to $ 250,000 or twice the amount of actual damages, whichever is higher). The White House immediately announced that it likely would veto the bill. The House (on March 21, 1996) and the Senate (on March 29, 1996) both passed the compromise bill, but neither vote was by the two-thirds majority necessary to override a presidential veto. On May 2, 1996, President Clinton vetoed the bill, and on May 9 the House failed to override the veto.

REV_00261927

If punitive damages are bad for firms, we should expect the events that increased the likelihood of strong reform legislation (that is, on March 10, 1995, May 10, 1995, and March 18, 1996) to increase stock values, while events that decreased the likelihood of significant reform (on March 16, 1995, May 2, 1996, and May 9, 1996) should decrease stock values. The effects of the House and Senate votes on the conference bill (March 21 and March 29, 1996) are less clear. Both votes supported the conference compromise bill, but both were short of veto-proof margins and probably signaled that the bill ultimately would fail. It thus is reasonable to expect these votes to be associated with drops in market value.

Using these eight event dates, we conducted a set of experiments similar to those reported for the Supreme Court cases. The third column in Table 9 reports the 3-day market-wide stock returns for each of these eight dates. None of the eight dates are associated with statistically significant changes in the CRSP equal weighted stock index. Thus, despite the large political fights over punitive reform legislation, these events had a negligible effect on the overall market. [*554]

TABLE 9

STOCK RETURNS AROUND KEY DATES IN THE HISTORY OF PUNITIVE AWARD REFORM LEGISLATION

Date	Description of Event	CRSP Equal Weighted Index Return (%)	Average Abnormal Stock Return for Firms Defending Punitive Lawsuits (%)
3/10/95	House passes HR 988 (imposing costs in some circumstances on parties who refuse settlements); House passes HR 956 (capping damage awards)	.94 (1.00)	.63  (2.97)
3/16/95	Headline on article when bills arrive in Senate: "House legal bill called all but dead in Senate"	.84 (.85)	-1.04  (-5.37)
5/10/95	Curb on punitive awards passed in Senate	.64 (.45)	.88  (2.95)
3/18/96	Press attention for product liability bill approved by House-Senate conference committee	1.24 (.90)	1.17  (3.12)
3/21/96	Bill passes in Senate 59-40, "not strong enough to override a veto"	.75 (.31)	-.61 + (-1.86)
3/29/96	Bill passes in House 259-158, "not strong	1.15	-.89 **

REV_00261928

as compensatory damages. [5] They find that nearly 50 percent of the cross-sectional variation in punitive damages can be explained with a simple linear model using compensatory damages and broad descriptions of the type of case (for example, medical malpractice or fraud).

Polinsky raises serious concern about the Eisenberg et al. study, noting that it excludes cases that have been settled and explains variation in punitive damages only when they have been awarded. [6] We address this issue by examining the predictability of punitive awards using data from both settlements and verdicts. We also attempt to explain the variation in punitive damages across all cases, rather than those merely in which punitive awards are levied.

An additional concern is not just whether punitive damages are predictable, but whether they are predictable for the right reasons. Landes and Posner and Polinsky and Shavell argue that punitive damages should be used when the probability of detection is low, so that the total penalty imposed on the defendant ensures that the firm internalizes the damages imposed on others. [7]

In this article we seek to add to this theoretical debate as well. We argue that relating punitive damages strictly to the probability of punishment ignores the role of private contracting and reputation in assuring contractual performance. The probability-of-detection justification for punitive awards holds only when the costs imposed on the plaintiff represent an externality or, alternatively, where a contractual relationship does not take place. One example of this may be environmental damage, such as that imposed by the Exxon Valdez oil spill. [8] Most activities over which punitive awards are [*530] brought, however--including fraud, product liability, business negligence, insurance claims, asbestos-related lawsuits, and employment claims--contain few obvious externality problems.

The recent Supreme Court case BMW v. Gore illustrates our argument. In this case, the original defendant sought damages because a car dealer had secretly retouched the paint job on his newly purchased automobile. As the case illustrates, the true underlying quality of a car's paint job is valuable to customers. Providing such high-quality paint jobs or handling procedures that cars never have to be retouched, however, is costly. There are no externalities in this situation, so customer demands will encourage firms to provide higher quality paint jobs, or careful handling procedures, up to the point at which the cost of doing so equals the marginal benefit obtained by the customers. Thus, paint job quality is assured even in the absence of punitive awards--and is enforced by the firm's reputational guarantee--up to the level and cost of quality assurance that consumers demand.

This article is organized as follows. In Section II we present our argument about the role of reputation in assuring contractual performance and the effect of punitive awards on firms' use of reputational guarantees. Section III describes the sample of punitive lawsuits we use to investigate punitive awards. We report tests that attempt to explain the sizes of punitive awards in Section IV. Sections V--VIII introduce several approaches to examine the importance of punitive awards. In Section V, we measure the valuation impacts of U.S. Supreme Court decisions that affect the expected sizes of future punitive awards, both on the market as a whole and on firms defending recent or current punitive award lawsuits. Section VI reports on similar tests of the valuation impacts of congressional attempts in 1995 and 1996 to limit the sizes of punitive awards. In Section VII, we explore whether the Supreme Court decisions and punitive reform legislation affected company values differently, depending on firms' exposures to punitive award liability. Finally, Section VIII examines the valuation effects on the defendant firms directly affected by individual punitive-seeking lawsuits. Section IX concludes the article.

II. THE THEORY OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

REV_00261902

	enough to override a veto"	(.81)	(-4.74)
5/2/96	Common Sense Product Liability Legal	.57	-.77
	Reform Act vetoed by President Clinton	(.11)	(-1.56)
5/9/96	House fails to override veto by 23 votes	1.38	1.39 **
		(1.12)	(3.00)

NOTE.--Three-day stock returns and abnormal stock returns centered on each of eight dates in the development of punitive award legislation during 1995 and 1996. The second column reports the cumulative equal weighted CRSP index return for the 3 days centered on the reported date. The far right column reports average abnormal 3-day stock return for companies that were defendants in unresolved punitive award lawsuits on the date of the legislative development. Because our sample of firms ends in June 1996, the sample size of pending lawsuits declines over time, from 125 for the first date to eight for the last date. The t-statistics are in parentheses. For the index return, each test statistic is computed as the cumulative aggregate return minus the expected return, divided by an estimate of the SE of the cumulative return. The expected return and SE are estimated from stock returns during the 200 trading days immediately preceding the event period. For the firms with pending lawsuits, abnormal returns and t-statistics are calculated using estimates from a one-factor market model.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

[*555] The right-hand column in Table 9 reports the impact of the proposed legislation on the share values for companies that were defendants in unresolved punitive award lawsuits as of the event date. In this test, we do not include recently decided cases because, at most, the legislation could affect only cases that had not yet been decided. The sample period ends in June 1996, so the sample of pending lawsuits declines over time, from 125 cases for the first date to eight for the last date.

The results indicate that the share values of firms with pending punitive damage lawsuits generally were affected by the proposed legislative changes. In seven of the eight event periods, the average abnormal stock return is consistent with the hypothesis that the threat of large punitive damage awards adversely affects those firms facing suits. For example, the March 10, 1995, House passage of its aggressive reform bills is associated with an average increase of 0.63 percent in the stock values of firms with pending punitive lawsuits. The subsequent March 16, 1995, news that the Senate was unlikely to pass similar reforms corresponds to an average abnormal stock return of -1.04 percent for firms with pending lawsuits. As with most of the estimates reported in the last column of Table 9, these estimates are statistically significant at the 1 percent level.

One result is not consistent with the hypothesis that potentially large punitive damages matter. On May 9, 1996, the House failed by 23 votes to override President Clinton's veto of the compromise legislation. The associated 3-day average abnormal stock return for firms with pending punitive lawsuits is positive and statistically significant. Despite this finding, the overall results indicate that the proposed legislation had material and statistically significant effects on the share values of firms with pending punitive damage lawsuits. [38]

Table 10 attempts to explain the cross-sectional variation in stock prices shown in the third column in Table 9. Because of the small sample sizes available for 1996, we examine only the three events in 1995. In each regression in Table 10, the dependent variable is the cumulative abnormal stock return for the three trading days centered on the key event day, divided by its SE. The regressors are the compensatory amount eventually awarded in the case, the natural log of the defendant firm's market value of equity, Index # 1 of industry exposure, and an interaction term equal to the product of Index # 1 and the natural log of the market value of equity. The first row reports the results for the March 10, 1995, House passage of two aggressive reform bills. The second row reports results for the March 16, [*556]

REV_00261929

TABLE 10

CROSS-SECTIONAL DETERMINANTS OF STOCK PRICE REACTIONS TO KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN PUNITIVE AWARD LEGISLATION

	Compensatory Award (x 10<-4>)	ln(MVE) (x 10<-2>)	Index # 1 of Exposure to Punitives
Effects of U.S. House of Representatives passage of anti-punitive-award legislation	-.92 *	2.47 	10.98
	(-1.97)	(2.79)	(1.43)
Effects of publicity that passage of the legislation in the U.S. Senate was unlikely	-5.27	.84	14.95 *
	(-1.23)	(1.03)	(2.12)
Effects of U.S. Senate passage of anti-punitive-award reform legislation	-20.85 	.52	40.81 **
	(-3.35)	(.43)	(3.89)

NOTE.--Estimated coefficients from ordinary least squares regressions using the firm-specific 3-day standardized abnormal stock return as the dependent variable. In the first row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on March 10, 1995, the day the U.S. House passed two bills that would discourage large punitive awards. In the second row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on March, 16, 1995, the day leading U.S. senators declared that passage in the Senate was unlikely. In the third row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on May 10, 1995, the day a weaker form of punitive award reform legislation was passed in the U.S. Senate. Observations are included only for firms that are defendants in unresolved punitive award lawsuits. The regressors include the (eventual) compensatory award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the natural log of the firm's market value of equity, and an index of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability (which reflects the relative frequency of punitive award lawsuits for firms in the same industry during the 3-year period centered on the current year). The t-statistics are in parentheses.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

REV_00261930

TABLE 10

CROSS-SECTIONAL DETERMINANTS OF STOCK PRICE REACTIONS TO KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN PUNITIVE AWARD LEGISLATION

	Index # 1 x ln(MVE)	n	Adjusted R<2>	F-Statistic
Effects of U.S. House of Representatives passage of anti-punitive-award legislation	-.68 (-1.31)	119	.094	4.05 **
Effects of publicity that passage of the legislation in the U.S. Senate was unlikely	-.92 + (-1.94)	119	.021	1.65
Effects of U.S. Senate passage of anti-punitive-award reform legislation	-2.45  (-3.49)	107	.120	7.61 **

NOTE.--Estimated coefficients from ordinary least squares regressions using the firm-specific 3-day standardized abnormal stock return as the dependent variable. In the first row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on March 10, 1995, the day the U.S. House passed two bills that would discourage large punitive awards. In the second row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on March, 16, 1995, the day leading U.S. senators declared that passage in the Senate was unlikely. In the third row, abnormal stock returns are measured over the three trading days centered on May 10, 1995, the day a weaker form of punitive award reform legislation was passed in the U.S. Senate. Observations are included only for firms that are defendants in unresolved punitive award lawsuits. The regressors include the (eventual) compensatory award divided by the firm's market value of equity, the natural log of the firm's market value of equity, and an index of the firm's exposure to punitive award liability (which reflects the relative frequency of punitive award lawsuits for firms in the same industry during the 3-year period centered on the current year). The t-statistics are in parentheses.

\+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

[*557] 1995, report that Senate passage was unlikely, and the third row reports results for the May 10, 1995, passage in the Senate.

In both the first and third rows, the abnormal stock return is negatively related to the compensatory amount eventually awarded in these cases. This result is surprising, since one would expect that firms defending cases in which plaintiffs suffered large losses would benefit the most from the prospect of lower punitive award limits. In both rows, however, the abnormal stock return is positively related to Index # 1. This suggests that news of potential legislative reforms is most beneficial for firms in industries subjected to frequent punitive damage lawsuits. Furthermore, in the first row, the coefficient for the natural log of the market value of firm equity is positive and statistically significant, indicating that larger firms, with potentially great exposure to punitive damage liability, benefited most from the prospect of punitive damage reform.

REV_00261931

Despite these findings, it is difficult to place too much confidence in them. The F-statistic in the second row is statistically insignificant, indicating that we cannot reject the hypothesis that the coefficients on all regressors are all equal to zero. For the first and third rows, the F-statistics are significant at the 1 percent level. In these cases, however, the adjusted-R<2>'s are low (.094 and .120, respectively), indicating that the models explain little of the cross-sectional variation in abnormal returns around the March 10, 1995, and May 10, 1995, dates. Thus, while the Table 9 results suggest that punitive damages are important to firms with pending lawsuits, the Table 10 results indicate that we cannot clearly discern the specific reasons why.

VII. THE VALUATION IMPACTS OF LEGAL CHANGES ON FIRMS WITH PUNITIVE EXPOSURE

The tests reported in previous sections examine the impact of Supreme Court decisions and legislation affecting punitive damages on market-wide stock price changes and on firms that are defendants in current or pending punitive award lawsuits. In this section we examine whether changes in the legal environment affect firms in systematically different ways. In particular, do changes affect firms differently depending on the firms' exposure to punitive award lawsuits?

To examine this issue, we estimate cross-sectional regressions for each date representing an important Supreme Court decision or news about a key legislative development. The dependent variable in each regression is each firm's cumulative abnormal return for the 3-day period centered on this date, divided by its SE. As before, abnormal returns are calculated from a one-factor market model estimated over days -230 through -31 relative [*558] to date 0, using the CRSP equal weighted portfolio as the market index. In a variation from previous tests, here we include data on all firms listed on the 1996 CRSP tapes that have at least 60 days' data during the estimation period.

The key independent variable in each regression is Index # 1 of the firm's industry-related exposure to punitive award liability. Because of the well-known effect of firm size on cross-sectional differences in returns, we also include the natural log of the market value of common stock as a control variable.

Table 11 reports on the coefficients estimated for the Index # 1 variable, plus the F-statistic calculated for each regression. Panel A contains the results for two important Supreme Court decisions, regarding Honda Motor Co. V. Oberg and BMW of North America v. Gore. Panel B contains results for each of the eight key legislation dates examined in Table 9. In none of the individual cross-sectional regressions is the coefficient for the industry-related index of punitive exposure statistically significant at the 5 percent level. In one case, regarding the March 18, 1996, press announcement that a compromise bill had emerged from the House-Senate Conference Committee, the Index # 1 coefficient is positive and significant at the 10 percent level. This isolated result is consistent with the hypothesis that stock price changes to news that some punitive awards might be limited were positively related to the firms' exposures to punitive award liability. Overall, however, there is little evidence to support the notion that firm value changes are sensitive to the firms' exposure to punitive liabilities.

To summarize our findings to this point, we examine the impacts on firm values of important Supreme Court decisions and recent legislation regarding punitive awards. Most evidence indicates that market-wide stock price changes, as well as the stock prices of firms that are defendants in current or pending punitive award cases, are not significantly affected by these changes in the legal environment. Furthermore, most firms' stock price changes are not significantly related to the firms' exposure to punitive award liability.

REV_00261932

We do find some limited evidence consistent with the hypothesis that changes in the legal environment affect firm values. In particular, the 1996 BMW Supreme Court decision corresponds to a statistically significant increase in all firms' values, particularly for firms in industries with significant exposure to punitive award liability. Also, news reports of pending legislation aimed at limiting the sizes of punitive awards are associated with positive changes in the values of firms with pending punitive award cases. In the next section, we examine the valuation effects not of changes in the legal environment, but of specific punitive lawsuits.

[*559] TABLE 11

THE RELATION BETWEEN STOCK RETURNS AND EXPOSURE TO PUNITIVE AWARD LIABILITY AROUND KEY SUPREME COURT DECISIONS AND DATES IN THE HISTORY OF PUNITIVE REFORM LEGISLATION

Date	Description of Event	Coefficient for Index # 1 of Industry-Related Punitive Liability Exposure (t-statistic)	F-Statistic (n)
	Panel A: Two Important U.S. Supreme Court Decisions
6/24/94	Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg decision rendered	.086	.52
		(.93)	(7,203)
5/20/96	BMW of North America v. Gore decision rendered	.153	28.58
		(.88)	(8,184)
	Panel B: Important Legislation or Pending Legislation Announcement Dates
3/10/95	House passes HR 988 (imposing costs in some circumstances on parties who refuse settlements); House passes HR 956 (capping damage awards)	-.060	.56
		(-.36)	(7,802)
3/16/95	Headline on article when bills arrive in Senate: "House legal bill called all but dead in Senate"	.083	27.48
		(.54)	(7,806)
5/10/95	Curb on punitive awards passed in Senate	.096	27.33
		(.59)	(7,638)
3/18/96	Press attention for product liability bill approved by House-Senate Conference Committee	.292	4.09
		+ (1.76)	(7,888)
3/21/96	Bill passes in Senate 59-40, "not strong enough to override a veto"	-.014	30.95

REV_00261933

		(-.09)	(8,066)
3/29/96	Bill passes in House 259-158, "not strong enough to override a veto"	.105	5.05
		(.73)	(8,079)
5/2/96	Common Sense Product Liability Legal Reform Act vetoed by President Clinton	-.111	65.67
		(-.59)	(8,113)
5/9/96	House fails to override veto by 23 votes	.119	5.33
		(.82)	(8,018)

NOTE.--Results from ordinary least squares regressions using cross-sectional data for each of several dates regarding actual or proposed changes in the legal environment. In each regression, the dependent variable is the 3-day standardized abnormal stock return centered on date in question (that is, the 3-day abnormal return divided by its SE). The independent variables are the natural log of the market value of common stock and the coefficient for the index (# 1) of industry-related punitive award liability. Data on all firms listed in the 1996 CRSP tapes are used in each regression, subject to firm-specific data availability to estimate the firm's abnormal stock return. The coefficients for the index of liability exposure are reported, along with the associated t-statistics.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

[*560] VIII. VALUATION IMPACTS OF PUNITIVE LAWSUITS ON DEFENDANT COMPANIES

A. Average Valuation Impacts of Press Announcements about Punitive Lawsuits

In this section we examine the valuation effects on defendant companies when punitive award lawsuits or their outcomes are publicized. We searched the Lexis/Nexis "All News" database for newspaper stories of punitive award lawsuits. Of the 1,249 cases in our sample in which the defendant firm is listed in the 1996 CRSP daily returns database, we found at least one news story each for 351 cases. The type and timeliness of news coverage varies widely. We group the initial press reports into three groups: preverdict announcements, verdict or settlement announcements, and postverdict announcements. Verdict or settlement announcements, in turn, consist of settlements, defense verdicts, and plaintiff verdicts. Postverdict announcements consist of information that is favorable, unfavorable, or neutral for the defendant firm.

Table 12 reports on the average 2-day abnormal stock returns for the initial press announcements of punitive award lawsuits for all 351 cases and for each announcement type. The 2-day event window consists of the day before plus the day of the initial press report. As in our previous tests, abnormal returns are calculated as the difference between the actual 2-day return minus a forecast return from a one-factor market model. We estimate the market model using trading days -230 through -31 relative to the initial press date and measure market returns using the CRSP equal weighted index with dividends.

For all 351 initial press announcements, the average 2-day abnormal stock return is -0.45 percent. The t-statistic is -2.70, which is statistically significant at the 1 percent level. The binomial sign test statistic is -1.91, which is significant at the 10 percent level. [39] These results indicate that, on average, the initial press report of a lawsuit seeking punitive damages is associated with a small but statistically significant decrease in the defendant company's stock value.

REV_00261934

The valuation impact is not uniform across announcement types, however. For initial announcements about an upcoming or currently pending lawsuit, the average abnormal return is -1.02 percent with a t-statistic of -2.86. For the 188 cases in which the initial announcement is of a plaintiff verdict, the average abnormal return is -0.62 percent with a t-statistic of [*561]

TABLE 12

AVERAGE ABNORMAL STOCK RETURNS ON PRESS ANNOUNCEMENTS OF PUNITIVE LAWSUITS

Type of Press Announcement	Initial Announcements (%)	Subsequent Announcements (%)
Preverdict news	-1.02	.49
	(-2.86) *	(.38)
	[-1.98] *	[.82]
	n = 80	n = 10
Verdict or settlement news:
Defense verdict	-.36	-.44
	(-.51)	(-.44)
	[-1.12]	[-.58]
	n = 15	n = 3
Settlement	-2.43	. . .
	(-1.35)	. . .
	[-.13]	. . .
	n = 4	n = 0
Plaintiff verdict	-.62	-1.36
	(-2.74) 	(-2.37) *
	[-1.94] +	[-1.60]
	n = 193	n = 47
Postverdict news:
Neutral news	.62	.17
	(1.35)	(.26)
	[1.38]	[-.15]
	n = 25	n = 11
Postverdict news favorable to the defendant firm	1.29	.36
	(1.93) +	(.80)
	[.47]	[-.56]
	n = 18	n = 39
Postverdict news unfavorable to the defendant firm	-.11	-.06
	(-.16)	(-.14)
	[-.25]	[-1.23]
	n = 16	n = 25
All announcements	-.45	-.33

REV_00261935

	(-2.70) 	(-1.15)
	[-1.91] +	[-1.18]
	n = 351	n = 135

NOTE.--Average abnormal stock returns associated with 351 press announcements pertaining to lawsuits in which punitive damages were sought or awarded, involving 235 different defendant firms between 1979 and 1995. Each cell reports the mean 2-day abnormal return, the associated t-statistic (in parentheses), the z-statistic for the generalized sign test based on the proportion of positive abnormal returns (in brackets), and the number of announcements in that category. Events are grouped by announcement type and according to whether the announcement was the initial or a subsequent press announcement about the lawsuit. Abnormal returns are measured relative to a benchmark determined by a one-factor market model using the CRSP equal weighted index.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

[*562] -2.74. Thus, the initial announcement of an upcoming or plaintiff verdict is associated with a statistically significant decrease in share values, on average. We infer that the loss associated with a plaintiff verdict is relatively small because the trial generates much information about the prospective award. Indeed, if investors accurately predict plaintiff outcomes, the average abnormal return to a plaintiff verdict would be zero. Evidently, investors are unable to perfectly anticipate trial outcomes.

Postverdict news also is not perfectly anticipated. Specifically, the average reaction to postverdict announcements that are favorable to the defendant firm is positive, 1.29 percent, and statistically significant at the 10 percent level. "Favorable" announcements include news that the firm won the right to appeal an earlier verdict or that the award amount was reduced. Unfavorable postverdict news, which includes announcements that the firm failed in an attempt to gain an appeal or have the award reduced, is associated with a small negative but statistically insignificant average stock price reaction. The average abnormal stock return to postverdict news that we label neutral also is statistically insignificant.

The average abnormal return to settlement announcements is negative and large in magnitude (-2.43 percent). This point estimate is consistent with Polinsky's [40] hypothesis that settlements involve the largest losses. The estimate, however, is not statistically significant. Combined with our earlier finding (see Table 2) that settlement amounts are relatively small, the data from our sample do not support Polinsky's hypothesis.

Many lawsuits received press attention after their initial news articles. The right-hand column in Table 12 reports on the valuation impacts of the first subsequent article that reported substantially new information about the lawsuit. For most types of subsequent announcements, the average abnormal returns are not significantly different from zero. Averaging across all subsequent announcements, for example, the mean abnormal return is -0.33 percent with a t-statistic of -1.15. The one exception is for subsequent announcements about plaintiff verdicts. In each of these cases, the lawsuit was the subject of a previous press article. Nonetheless, the mean 2-day abnormal stock return for these cases is -1.36 percent, with a t-statistic of -2.37. This provides further evidence that plaintiff verdicts are not fully anticipated and that they are associated with declines in the share values of the defendant companies.

The results imply that publicity about lawsuits involving actual or potential punitive awards are associated, on average, with declines in the values of the defendant companies. This is true particularly for any initial preverdict [*563]

REV_00261936

TABLE 13

CHANGES IN THE MARKET VALUE OF EQUITY (in $ millions)

Type of Press Announcement	Minimum	Twenty-fifth Percentile	Median	Seventy-fifth Percentile	Maximum
Preverdict news (n = 80)	-2,019.1	-39.4	-2.4	13.5	1,317.9
Verdict or settlement:
Defense verdict (n = 14)	-240.6	-40.3	-1.1	116.1	379.1
Settlement (n = 4)	-44.2	-32.7	-1.9	444.6	871.9
Plaintiff verdict (n = 193)	-1,554.2	-77.9	-8.5	18.9	1,802.3
Postverdict news:
Neutral news (n = 25)	-580.8	22.1	3.2	68.2	292.2
Favorable news (n = 18)	-426.2	-81.6	3.4	39.7	669.3
Unfavorable news (n = 16)	-371.5	-49.8	-4.0	19.1	313.1
All announcements	-2,019.1	-62.0	-2.9	23.9	1,802.3

NOTE.--Summary statistics on the 2-day abnormal changes in common stock market values associated with 351 initial press announcements between 1979 and 1995 pertaining to lawsuits in which punitive damages were sought or awarded from 235 defendant firms. The events are categorized by the timing of the initial press announcement relative to the verdict or settlement. The abnormal stock value changes are calculated as the 2-day abnormal stock return times the market value of the firm's common stock measured 10 calendar days before the press announcement. The abnormal stock return is measured relative to a benchmark determined by a one-factor market model using the CRSP equal weighted index.

publicity about current or pending lawsuits, as well as for verdicts in favor of plaintiffs. Announcements of plaintiff verdicts are associated with stock value losses, on average, even for cases that previously received press attention.

B. Average Changes in Defendant Firms' Market Value of Equity

While punitive lawsuits are bad news for defendant companies, the average valuation impact is small in percentage terms. In Table 13 we report summary statistics on the dollar magnitude of the abnormal returns. For each firm, we compute the dollar change in the market value of equity by multiplying the firm's initial announcement 2-day abnormal stock return by the market value of its common stock, computed 10 calendar days before the initial press announcement. The distribution of company values is highly skewed, so the distribution of the change in the market value of equity is skewed and contains many extreme values. For the whole sample, the change in the market value of equity ranges from a low of -$ 2,019 million to a high of $ 1,802 million. To draw inferences about the average magnitudes of the changes in value, we therefore focus on the median [*564] changes. Table 13 also reports the changes in the twenty-fifth and seventy-fifth percentiles of the distribution of market value changes.

Over all firms, the median change in the market value of equity is negative, -$ 2.9 million. As a basis for comparison, in previous work we report a median market value loss of $ 5.5 million for firms investigated or charged with fraud. [41] Similarly, Karpoff, Lee, and Vendrzyk find that the median value loss to contractors charged with defense procurement fraud is $ 5.0 million. [42] Based on these medians, the average announcement period market value loss for defendant companies in punitive lawsuits is approximately half as large as that for firms involved with criminal, civil, or defense procurement fraud.

REV_00261937

As might be expected, the median market value losses differ according to the nature of the initial press announcement. The median changes in market value are negative for preverdict announcements, settlements, plaintiff verdicts, and postverdict unfavorable information. Median changes in market value are positive for neutral and favorable postverdict announcements. An anomalous finding is that the median change in market value is negative for defense verdicts.

C. Reputational Effects and Defense Costs of Punitive Award Lawsuits

The market value losses for preverdict announcements, settlements, and plaintiff verdicts provide insight into the nature of the costs of punitiveseeking lawsuits on the defendant companies. For preverdict announcements, the median market value loss is $ 2.4 million. The median total award eventually reached for these cases is $ 1.7 million, or 71 percent of the initial market value loss. For settlements, the median total award is $ 0.8 million, which is 42 percent of the median announcement period market value loss for these firms (which, as reported in Table 13, is $ 1.9 million). The median total amount awarded by juries in our sample of plaintiff announcements is $ 6.9 million, or 81 percent of the $ 8.5 million median market value loss generated by the initial announcements of these cases.

These figures imply that preverdict news, settlements, and adverse jury verdicts have consequences that, on average, are more costly than the nominal amount of the awards. One possibility is that publicity about the lawsuit, or about an adverse punitive award, imposes reputational costs on the defendant firm. Such costs can arise from an increase in the firm's costs, or decrease in sales, that result from publicity about the case. As examples, [*565] product liability charges can decrease demand for the firm's product, breach of contract charges can increase contracting costs, and charges of discrimination or harassment by employees can raise the reservation wages of current or prospective employees. Another possibility is that the market value loss includes the defendant's defense costs, including any disruption to the firm's operations as a result of significant litigation.

Whether they are reputational or defense costs, our estimates suggest that they can be substantial. Consider, for example, adverse jury verdicts. If the only cost is the amount of the award, the average valuation impact of the verdict would be no greater than $ 6.9 million. A lower-bound estimate of the median reputational and defense cost therefore is the difference between the median market value loss ($ 8.5 million) and this amount, or $ 1.6 million. If investors previously were aware of the lawsuit, however, the implied reputational and defense cost is much higher. Suppose that the ex ante likelihood of an adverse jury ruling is 50 percent and that the firm's preverdict market value reflects this expectation. Then a drop in value of $ 8.5 million on the announcement implies that the ex ante total expected cost to the firm is twice that, or $ 17.0 million. Thus, if the jury-awarded cost to the firm is only $ 6.9 million, the implied reputational and defense cost is approximately $ 10.1 million (equal to $ 17.0 million - $ 6.9 million).

Since many jury awards are reduced through appeal or postverdict settlements, the portion of the total $ 17.0 million loss that could be attributed to reputational or defense costs could be even larger than $ 10.1 million. These figures imply that the reputational and defense loss make up a large share of the total cost to firms that have adverse jury verdicts in punitive award lawsuits.

REV_00261938

A. Guarantees through Reputation or Privately Agreed-to Penalties

Landes and Posner and Polinsky and Shavell argue that punitive awards help enforce contractual performance by forcing all parties in a trading relationship to internalize the costs of subpar performance. [9] According to this [*531] argument, the prospect of punitive liability offsets the chance that a party will not be held liable for any damages. The optimal punitive award therefore is decreasing in the probability that the underperforming party will be held liable. [10]

Punitive awards surely increase the expected cost to subpar contractual performance. What this line of reasoning misses, however, is the fact that in most contractual relationships, punitive awards are unnecessary to encourage optimal contractual performance. Indeed, the prospect of punitive awards can encourage too much investment to assure contractual performance, thereby increasing costs and contractual assurance beyond the optimal levels.

To see this point, consider contractual performance in a situation without the prospect of punitive awards. Contrary to the implication of Polinsky and Shavell's argument, this generally would not lead to underinvestment in assuring contractual performance. Breaching contracts, denying insurance claims, providing defective products, committing fraud, and causing employees to work in unsafe environments all impose costs. The parties that may incur these costs seek to decrease their likelihood, but generally are unwilling to pay enough to cover the costs of completely eliminating them.

As an example, insurance companies can be sued for wrongly denying claims from customers. An insurance company could choose to avoid such lawsuits by never denying claims. But such a policy is costly because it would encourage false claims. To finance a no-potential-for-lawsuit policy, the insurance company would have to charge correspondingly high premiums to finance its high costs. Presumably, some customers are unwilling to pay such high premiums. These customers prefer to buy insurance at lower rates from companies that reserve the right to deny payments. The policy of denying some claims can prevent fraudulent or uncovered claims, but it also increases the probability that the company will deny coverage to those with valid claims. Thus, customers and insurance companies can trade off the cost of insurance with the probability the company will deny valid [*532] claims. The optimal probability of denying claims--and the optimal price for insurance--is one that at the margin equates the benefits and costs.

Firms undoubtedly from time to time try to renege on promises of how they will make their decisions to deny coverage, but a similar solution exists here also. To the extent that insured individuals value decreasing the probability that they will be "held up" by the insurance company when coverage decisions are made, they will be willing to pay the additional costs associated with firms guaranteeing this outcome.

Consumers value reducing the probability that their implicit agreement with firms will be breached, but reducing that probability is costly. In the absence of punitive awards, consumers can reduce the probability of coverage denial by buying from insurance companies with large reputational investments or through privately negotiated penalty clauses. At some total penalty level, the cost to consumers of extra assurance exceeds the incremental expected cost of having their insurance claims denied. When the cost of denial is low, or when individuals can insure themselves at low cost, insurance companies will invest less in reputation and provide fewer guarantees. We observe this behavior in many areas of life, such as when people buy cars from fly-by-night dealers or through newspaper advertisements. Most people choosing to buy used cars with little quality assurance probably are not making mistakes. They face a relatively high probability of being defrauded, but they also pay less for their cars.

We illustrate our argument using insurance fraud, but the argument is the same for breaches

REV_00261903

It is possible to back out estimates of the implied reputational and defense cost using data on preverdict and settlement announcement market value losses, compared to the median awards in those cases. As reported above, the median awards in these cases are even smaller relative to the median market value losses than for the plaintiff verdict subsample. The uncertainty surrounding the outcomes for these cases differs also. For settlements, for example, the uncertainty about the size of the award is reduced to zero. Using median values, we estimate that the reputational plus defense cost is approximately 58 percent of the median market value loss in these cases. [43]

[*566] Table 14 presents summary information that permits us to investigate the sizes of the reputational and defense costs of different lawsuit types. For each lawsuit type, we report summary measures of the loss in market value on the initial press announcement, the size of the total award, the difference between the market value loss and the total award, and the ratio of the total award to the size of the market value loss. We include only cases for which the initial press announcement is of a pending lawsuit, a settlement, or a plaintiff verdict, and exclude defense verdicts and postverdict announcements. In a small number of cases, the change in the market value of equity is very small compared to the total award, implying extreme positive and negative values for the ratio of the penalty to the loss in market value. Since, for most firms, this ratio is small, the inclusion of such extreme values swamps any measure of the sample mean. We therefore exclude 41 cases for which the absolute value of the ratio of the total award to the loss in the market value of equity is greater than 2.0. Of the excluded cases, 22 have positive values of this ratio and 19 have negative values. [44]

Over all lawsuit types in this reduced sample, the median loss in market value is $ 9.6 million. The median total award is $ 3.9 million. Again, this comparison of medians suggests that, on average, firms experience market value losses that are not completely explained by the size of the award. This conclusion is implied also by the fact that the median ratio of the total award to the market value loss is only 0.01. (The mean is 0.16.)

Across lawsuit types, none of the median ratios of the total award to the change in market value of equity approach 1.0, suggesting that the implied reputational or legal cost penalties are substantial for all lawsuit types. In dollar terms, the largest implied median reputational costs are for business negligence ($ 22.1 million) and employment-related lawsuits ($ 16.2 million). Substantial costs are also implied for fraud ($ 8.1 million), vehicular accident ($ 5.8 million), and insurance claim ($ 3.3 million) lawsuits. These figures must be regarded as rough estimates only, however. As reported, the median reputational losses implied for breach of contract, products liability, and asbestos-related lawsuits are negative. For asbestos-related lawsuits, the median ratio of total award to the loss in market value is negative. In our sample, negative values arise when the median announcement period abnormal return, and hence the measured change in equity value, is positive. The occasional negative median values indicate that our estimates are highly variable, perhaps because of small sample sizes for some lawsuit types. [*567]

TABLE 14

COMPARISON OF THE AWARD AMOUNTS TO THE LOSSES IN FIRM VALUES

Type of Lawsuit	Loss in Equity Value	Total Award or Settlement	Difference between Loss and Total Award (Implied Reputational Loss)	Total Award Divided by Loss in Equity Value Products liability (n = 54):
Mean	-79.0	17.1	-96.1	.29
Median	1.7	11.6	-2.9	.00
Fraud (n = 14):

REV_00261939

Mean	192.6	27.0	165.5	.35
Median	24.1	7.2	8.1	.17
Business negligence (n = 44):
Mean	53.6	6.0	47.5	-.09
Median	22.9	1.5	22.1	.00
Breach of contract (n = 15):
Mean	-48.0	15.5	-63.5	-.69
Median	1.3	5.2	-2.0	.03
Insurance claims (n = 26):
Mean	40.3	11.4	28.9	.08
Median	15.2	5.7	3.3	.01
Employment claims (n = 36):
Mean	21.3	8.8	12.6	.12
Median	19.6	1.3	16.2	.01
Asbestos claims (n = 13):
Mean	-20.0	5.5	-25.5	-.30
Median	-14.8	2.5	-16.6	-.11
Vehicular accident claims (n = 7):
Mean	8.2	4.0	3.5	.38
Median	6.7	.9	5.8	.13
Miscellaneous claims (n = 33):
Mean	-.4	13.2	-13.6	.80
Median	10.4	4.5	.9	.03
Total--all lawsuits (n = 231):
Mean	6.9	12.2	-5.3	.16
Median	.01	9.6	3.9	2.0

NOTE.--Summary statistics on the loss in market value and court-imposed penalties for 242 lawsuits between 1979 and 1995. The loss in market value is computed as the initial press announcement 2-day abnormal stock return times the firm's market value of equity measured 10 calendar days previously. Negative entries indicate that the mean (or median) change in firm value is positive. Only events for which the initial press article is about a current lawsuit, a verdict, or settlement are included. To eliminate extreme outliers, cases for which the absolute value of the ratio of the total award to the loss in market value exceeds 2.0 are excluded. All amounts, other than the ratios in the right-hand column, are in millions of dollars.

[*568] D. Determinants of the Cross Section of Abnormal Returns to Initial Publicity about the Lawsuits

REV_00261940

Table 15 reports on ordinary least squares regressions that are used to investigate the determinants of the cross section of abnormal returns to initial publicity about the punitive award lawsuits. For these tests, we use data on all the 287 observations for which the initial press announcements are about a pending lawsuit, settlement, or verdict. (Postverdict initial announcements are excluded.) The dependent variable is the 2-day announcement period abnormal return divided by its SE. Independent variables include characteristics of the lawsuit and the defendant firm.

In model 1, the regressors include measures of firm size, Index # 1 of the firm's exposure to punitive award lawsuits, the sizes of the compensatory and punitive awards, and dummy variables for the type of announcement. The abnormal return is positively and significantly related to the natural log of the value of the firm's common stock. Further investigation reveals that this result is partly attributable to several small firms for which the standardized announcement period abnormal return is negative and large in magnitude. Even excluding these cases, however, the coefficient on the log of the market value of equity is positive and statistically significant.

The positive relation does not imply that large firms have positive announcement period abnormal returns, however. Even among the top half of the firms partitioned by the market value of equity, the average standardized abnormal return is negative. [45] Rather, the positive relationship indicates that the percentage decrease in firm value on the initial press announcement of a punitive lawsuit is relatively small for large firms. We interpret this as indicating that the proportionate impact of a punitive lawsuit on firm value decreases with firm value.

The coefficient on Index # 1 of punitive liability exposure also is positive and is significant at the 5 percent level. This result indicates that the surprise of news about a punitive lawsuit, and therefore the decrease in firm value, is relatively small for firms in industries that are subject to frequent punitive lawsuits. Thus, capital markets appear to take into account a firm's potential to be sued for punitive damages in the valuation of the firm's common stock.

Other than for the constant term, none of the other coefficients in model 1 are significantly different from zero. The abnormal return is not significantly related to the sizes of the compensatory or punitive awards, nor to the specific content of the announcement. The coefficient for defense verdicts [*569]

TABLE 15

DETERMINANTS OF THE DEFENDANT FIRMS' ANNOUNCEMENT PERIOD ABNORMAL RETURNS

Variable	Model 1	Model 2	Model 3	Model 4
In of the market value of equity (%)	2.77	2.86	2.24	2.74
	 (4.08)	 (4.17)	 (3.49)	 (3.98)
Indices for industry exposure to punitive award liability:
Index # 1 (based on relative frequencies of cases)	1.38	1.25	1.28
	* (1.97)	+ (1.75)	+ (1.80)
Index # 2 (based on relative frequencies of cases and award amounts) (x 10<-9>)				2.89

REV_00261941

				(.31)
Compensatory award divided by the market value of equity (x 10<-4>)	3.78	3.79		3.70
	(1.55)	(1.56)		(1.51)
Punitive award divided by the market value of equity (x 10<-4>)	-.64	-.64		-.67
	(-.70)	(-.70)		(-.74)
Total award divided by the market value of equity (x 10<-4>)			-1.74
			(-1.00)
Dummy variable for defense verdict announcement (%)	2.99	3.71	3.43	2.97
	(.52)	(.64)	(.58)	(.51)
Dummy variable for settlement announcement (%)	9.00	8.67	9.46	8.53
	(1.29)	(1.23)	(1.32)	(1.21)
Dummy variable for plaintiff verdict announcement (%)	-1.34	-1.11	.00	-1.10
	(-.50)	(-.41)	(.00)	(-.41)
Dummy variable for death involved (%)		1.76
		(.52)
Dummy variable for nondeath injury involved (%)		-2.16
		(-.75)
Intercept	-.47	-.48	-.39	-.44
	 (-4.60)	* (-4.65)	 (-4.11)	 (-4.34)
F-value	3.21	2.61	2.96	2.63
p-Value	[.003]	[.007]	[.008]	[.012]
Adjusted R<2>	.051	.048	.042	.038

NOTE.--Ordinary least squares estimates of the relations between standardized abnormal returns associated with 287 initial announcements of punitive award lawsuits and characteristics of the lawsuit and defendant company. This table contains results only for cases in which the first news article reports news of a current lawsuit, verdict, or settlement. The dependent variable is the 2-day announcement period abnormal stock return divided by its SE. Independent variables include the natural log of the market value of firm equity, indices for the firm's exposure to punitive award liability, the compensatory and punitive amounts awarded, and dummy variables for the type of news about the lawsuit. The t-statistics are in parentheses.

+ Significant at the .10 level based on a two-tailed test.

* Significant at the .05 level based on a two-tailed test.

 Significant at the .01 level based on a two-tailed test.

REV_00261942

[*570] is positive and for plaintiff verdicts is negative, but neither is significantly different from zero. Nor are the two coefficients significantly different from each other.

We conducted additional tests to examine the sensitivity of these results to alternate specifications and also to examine the influence of several additional explanatory variables. In model 2, we introduce two dummy variables that account for the nature of any personal injury or death involved in the lawsuit. Neither of these dummy variables is significantly related to the abnormal return, indicating that the lawsuits in which a victim suffered injury or death are not, on average, associated with unusually large market value losses to the defendant firm. In model 3, we enter the sum of the compensatory and punitive awards as a new regressor. The total award, however, is not significantly related to the standardized abnormal return. In model 4 we examine the effect of our second index of a firm's exposure to punitive award liability (Index # 2). This variable also is not significantly related to the abnormal return.

In summary, the announcement period abnormal return increases with firm size and also somewhat with our first index of the firm's exposure to punitive-seeking lawsuits. None of our attempts to explain the cross section of abnormal returns is very successful, however. The adjusted $R<2>$ values, for example, are no higher than 0.051. We conclude that, like the punitive awards, the changes in firms' values in response to initial publicity about the lawsuits are not easily explainable.

IX. CONCLUSIONS

Punitive damage awards represent potentially large and uncertain liabilities for parties to contracts. In this article we examine both theoretical and empirical issues related to punitive awards and their importance to businesses. First, we argue that, in the absence of externalities, punitive awards or other legal sanctions are not necessary to assure contractual performance, even when firms face less than a 100 percent probability of being sued for contractual breach. Firm values and the use of reputational investments to assure contractual performance, however, will be affected by both the size and predictability of prospective punitive awards.

Using a sample of 1,979 punitive lawsuits from 1985 to 1996, we then examine punitive awards' predictability, the valuation impacts of judicial and legislative actions that change firms' prospective punitive liabilities, and the valuation effects of punitive lawsuits on defendant companies. Our primary empirical findings are as follows:

1. Conditional on knowledge of the compensatory award and that a punitive award will be assessed, roughly 50 percent of the variation in punitive [*571] awards can be explained using simple characterizations of the defendant firm, lawsuit type, and location of its filing. Without prior information that the punitive award will be positive, however, only 1-2 percent of the variation in punitive awards can be explained. These results are consistent with Sunstein et al.'s experimental evidence and Polinsky's arguments that punitive awards are highly variable and unpredictable. [46] Inconsistent with Polinsky's argument, however, we do not find support for the notion that settlements represent bigger losses to firms than court verdicts.

2. We examine the impacts on firm values of several key Supreme Court decisions and congressional actions that changed, or sought to change, firms' exposure to punitive liabilities. There is little consistent evidence that Supreme Court or legislative actions have significant effects on firm values in general. For firms then facing punitive-seeking lawsuits, however, proposed reform legislation during 1995-96 had impacts on share values, with announcements increasing the likelihood of legislative reform generally increasing share values and announcements decreasing such likelihood generally decreasing share values.

REV_00261943

3. The strongest evidence that punitive awards affect share values comes from announcements of specific punitive lawsuits. The average abnormal stock return associated with the initial press announcement that a firm is a defendant in a lawsuit seeking punitive damages is negative and statistically significant. When the initial announcement reports that the lawsuit is pending, the average abnormal 2-day stock return is -1.02 percent. When the initial news is of a plaintiff verdict, the average abnormal return is negative and statistically significant but smaller (-0.62 percent), most likely because of information leakage before the initial press report of a verdict.

4. On average, press announcements of punitive damage lawsuits impose larger market value losses on the defendant firms than the total compensatory and punitive damages eventually awarded. For initial announcements about pending lawsuits, the median total award is 71 percent of the initial market value loss. For initial press reports of a plaintiff verdict, the median total award is 81 percent of the initial market value loss. And for initial press announcements about settlements, the median total award is 42 percent of the median initial market value loss. We attribute these differences to reputational or defense-related costs incurred by the defendant companies. These costs constitute a smaller fraction of the total market losses experienced by firms committing frauds [47] but are larger than the negligible reputational losses found for environmental violations. [48]

[*572] 5. We are unable to explain with consistency the cross-sectional variation in companies' stock price reactions for most of the news events we examine. For example, in 1994 the Supreme Court reversed a large punitive award in the Honda Motor decision. Abnormal stock returns for firms then involved in punitive lawsuits are negatively related to the sizes of their compensatory awards. For the subsequent BMW decision, however, which also reversed a large punitive award, abnormal stock returns for firms involved in punitive lawsuits are positively related to their compensatory awards. As another example, there is some evidence that the share value impacts of legislative attempts to limit punitive damages are positively related to firm size and the firm's industry's exposure to punitive lawsuits. These effects, however, are not consistent across different announcements in the legislative history.

Overall, the evidence indicates that punitive damages are highly variable and difficult to predict. They are important and costly to defendant firms, and such firms experience reputational or defense-related losses over and above the direct costs of the monetary awards. There is little consistent evidence, however, that changes in the legal environment that affect companies' exposure to punitive losses have significant effects on company values.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Former Federal Trade Commission Chairman Michael Pertchuk, quoted by Peter Passell, The Split over Punitive Awards in Getting the Bad Guys, N.Y. Times, July 10, 1997, at D2.

n2 Michael Horowitz, director of the Hudson Institute's Project for Civil Justice, quoted by Passell, in id.

n3 Cass R. Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman, & David Schkade, Assessing Punitive Damages, 107 Yale L. Rev. 2071 (1998).

n4 Daniel Kahneman, David Schkade, & Cass R. Sunstein, Shared Outrage and Erratic Awards: The Psychology of Punitive Damages, J. Risk & Uncertainty (forthcoming).

n5 Theodore Eisenberg et al., The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623 (1997).

n6 A. Mitchell Polinsky, Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and

REV_00261944

Rational? 26 J. Legal Stud. 663 (1997).

n7 William M. Landes & Richard Posner, Economic Analysis of Tort Law 160-65 (1993); and A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steve Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, 11 Harv. L. Rev. 869 (1998).

n8 Note that the probability of punishment theory does not apply very well to this case either. The probability of detection in the case of the Exxon Valdez oil spill had to be close to 1.0. The award of punitive damages therefore cannot be justified by the notion that they were necessary to get Exxon to internalize the expected cost of the spill, ex ante. Issues raised in trial to determine imposition of punitive damages, such as the plaintiff's recklessness, also do not correspond well with the probability of punishment theory of punitive awards.

n9 Landes & Posner, supra note 7; Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 7.

n10 Craswell extends the discussion of penalty multiples in market relationships to when buyers are risk averse. Schwartz argues that punitive damages are unnecessary when contracts can internalize the cost of contractual breach, but claims a role for punitive awards when fewer than 100 percent of damaged parties sue to protect their interest. Unlike these arguments, our discussion implies that reputational guarantees efficiently enforce performance even when the probability of enforcement is less than 100 percent. For example, if the cost of bringing suit to enforce performance increases, the reputational investment and product price necessary to achieve a similar level of quality assurance will both have to increase. See Richard Craswell, Damage Multipliers in Market Relationships, 25 J. Legal Stud. 463 (1996); and Alan Schwartz, The Myth That Promisees Prefer Supracompensatory Remedies: An Analysis of Contracting for Damage Measures, 100 Yale L. J. 369 (1990).

n11 Benjamin Klein, Why Hold-Ups Occur: The Self-Enforcing Range of Contractual Relationships, 34 Econ. Inquiry 444 (1996); John R. Lott, Jr., Brand Names, Ignorance, and Quality Guaranteeing Premiums, 20 Applied Econ. 165 (1988).

n12 Michael R. Darby & Eli Karni, Free Competition and the Optimal Amount of Fraud, 16 J. Law & Econ. 87 (1973); Jonathan M. Karpoff & John R. Lott, Jr., The Reputational Penalty Firms Bear from Committing Criminal Fraud, 36 J. Law & Econ. 757 (1993); and John R. Lott, Jr., The Optimal Level of Criminal Fines in the Presence of Reputation, 17 Managerial & Decision Econ. 363 (1996).

n13 Karpoff & Lott, supra note 12.

n14 Our notion of an innovation in fraud technology is different from the external effect that occurs when others learn that a fraud has been committed. Third parties might change their behavior when they learn of a fraudulent action. For example, they might increase their own due diligence on entering contracts after learning of someone else's breach of contract. The information about the breach of contract, however, represents an external benefit, not a cost, because it allows the third parties to correct their previously mistaken beliefs regarding the true underlying probability of being defrauded.

n15 Karpoff & Lott, supra note 12, at 762-65.

n16 Benjamin Klein & Keith B. Leffler, The Role of Market Forces in Assuring Contractual Performance, 89 J. Pol. Econ. 615 (1981).

n17 Note 2 supra.

REV_00261945

n18 Dean v. Chrysler, Verdictum Juris Press, No. SF782213 (June 30, 1986, to August 1, 1986).

n19 Boroff & Boroff (her husband) v. BIC Corp & Munford, Inc., d/b/a Majik Market Stores, 90 Fla. Jury Verdict Rep. 2 (February 1990).

n20 Delong v. Chevron USA Inc. & Carlson, Jury Verdicts Wkly., No. 89447 (April 24, 1986).

n21 Trans Meridian, Inc. v. Amstar Corp., Jury Verdicts Wkly., No. C85-5389 (October 1, 1986).

n22 Talbot v. AMF Corp., Jury Verdicts Wkly., No. CV 84-3614 (October 27, 1986).

n23 Long et al. v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., Jury Verdicts Wkly., No. 329896 (January 17, 1986); Grossman v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., Verdictum Juris Press, No. 886-91c (April 22, 1986).

n24 Staps et al. v. Alcon Lab., Inc., LRP Publications case no. 82-1867 (September 19, 1986).

n25 Allen et al. v. Suburban Water Sys., Confidential Rep. for Attorneys, No. VC 006 498 (December 21, 1993).

n26 Doss & Garrett v. Disneyland, Jury Verdicts Wkly., No. 40-93-83 (February 25, 1986).

n27 Sunstein, Kahneman, & Schkade, supra note 3; Eisenberg et al., supra note 5; and Polinsky, supra note 6.

n28 Kahle and Walkling report that CRSP and Compustat SIC classifications frequently do not coincide. To minimize noise from inconsistent classifications, we use CRSP codes when available. See Kathleen M. Kahle & Ralph A. Walkling, The Impact of Industry Classifications on Financial Research, 31 J. Fin. & Quantitative Analysis 309 (1996).

n29 We also conducted several tests to examine the sensitivity of these results to alternative model specifications. For example, we included variables that indicate whether the incident involved a death or personal injury. The coefficients on these variables, however, are statistically insignificant, and their inclusion does not affect the overall explanatory power of the regressions.

n30 Eisenberg et al., supra note 5.

n31 Polinsky, supra note 6. Sunstein, Kahneman, and Schkade argue that Eisenberg et al. get a high R<2> because they regress the punitive award on the natural log of the compensatory award, rather than on the compensatory award itself. Restricting the relationship between the punitive and compensatory awards to be linear, however, has little effect on the estimated coefficients or any of our models' explanatory powers. Thus, it does not appear to be the case, as Sunstein, Kahneman, and Schkade argue, that the punitive awards are unpredictable because monetary damages are unbounded. See Sunstein, Kahneman, & Schkade, supra note 3, at 5 n.21.

n32 Gary S. Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, 76 J. Pol. Econ. 169 (1968).

n33 In an investigation of punitive awards arising from personal injury lawsuits, Pontiff also finds that punitive awards are not easily explained. In one model, however, he is able to explain 20 percent of the variation in the log of one plus the punitive award using detailed descriptions of the type of injury involved. Pontiff also finds that the probability of being sued is positively related to firm size, although (and in contrast to our findings) the award amount is unrelated to firm size. See Jeffrey Pontiff, Damages in Corporate Lawsuits: The Impact of Deep Pockets (Working paper, Univ. Washington 1998).

REV_00261946

n34 The reasoning in the Honda Motor case was based on peculiarities in Oregon law that are not applicable to other states. BMW of North America v. Gore was the first direct attempt by the Court to limit these damages, although even here the Court remained vague about what constitutes excessive punitive awards.

n35 Calculating the test statistic using raw returns yields results that are qualitatively similar to those reported here. A possible extension of these tests would be to calculate expected index returns conditional on such other factors as interest rates.

n36 Wayne H. Mikkelson & M. Megan Partch, Withdrawn Security Offerings, 23 J. Fin. & Quantitative Analysis 119 (1988).

n37 Many states passed laws limiting punitive damages following the 1994 elections, thus weakening any overall impact of changes in federal law and decreasing the likelihood that our test will uncover significant share value effects.

n38 The legislation was written to apply only to cases filed after the law went into effect. Nonetheless, these results suggest that the investors regarded the legislation as having value consequences for firms with pending lawsuits as well.

n39 See Arnold R. Cowan, Nonparametric Event Study Tests, 2 Rev. Quantitative Fin. & Acct. 343 (1992).

n40 Polinsky, supra note 6.

n41 Karpoff & Lott, supra note 12.

n42 Jonathan M. Karpoff, D. Scott Lee, & Valaria P. Vendrzyk, Defense Procurement Fraud, Penalties, and Contractor Influence, 107 J. Pol. Econ. (in press, 1999).

n43 For comparison, in Karpoff & Lott, supra note 12, we find that the reputational loss accounts for up to 94 percent of the market value loss for firms committing frauds. Karpoff, Lott, and Rankine, in contrast, find that the reputational losses from environmental violations are negligible. See Jonathan M. Karpoff, John R. Lott, Jr., & Graeme Rankine, Environmental Violations, Legal Penalties, and Reputation Costs (Working paper, Univ. Washington 1998).

n44 Thus, the exclusion of these cases does not materially influence the median values reported in Table 14. Among the excluded extreme values, the largest in absolute value is -1,097. (In these tests, a negative loss value implies that the firm's market value of equity increased during the 2-day announcement period.)

n45 The median change in the market value of equity is also more negative for large firms than for small firms, reflecting the larger base from which the changes are calculated.

n46 Sunstein, Kahneman, & Schkade, supra note 3; Polinsky, supra note 6.

n47 Karpoff & Lott, supra note 12.

n48 Karpoff, Lott, & Rankine, supra note 43. $

REV_00261947

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:07 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

of contract, [11] frauds, [12] or other types of actions that can trigger punitive lawsuits. To restate the point, the wealth-maximizing probability of breach of contract or fraud is not zero: at some point, the costs of further reducing the probability exceed the expected benefits. In the absence of external costs, the optimal amount of quality assurance is reached without resort to punitive awards.

A role for extra penalties, such as punitive damage awards, exists when the action imposes costs on third parties. The most obvious example of this involves environmental damages. As we have pointed out elsewhere, [13] another example is an innovation that decreases the cost of delivering subpar [*533] results in a contractual relationship. For example, true innovations in committing fraud alter the underlying probability of third parties' being defrauded because potential defrauders also learn the innovation. [14]

B. Substitution of Punitive Damages for Private Quality Assurance

Since private mechanisms do not completely eliminate the occurrence of contractual breach or fraud, why not use punitive damages to deter all problems of contractual breach or fraud? One reason is that a policy of extremely high penalties imposes costs on all parties to a contract, not just the party that may commit the breach.

To see this, consider first the effects of an increase in legal sanctions, such as punitive damages, when they are perfect substitutes for reputation in deterring contractual breach or fraud. In this case, an increase in legal penalties will have no effect on the incidence of fraud. The increase will simply reduce customer reliance on reputation as a guarantor of promises.

It is unlikely, however, that third-party-imposed penalties are perfect substitutes for reputation. An increase in these penalties therefore will not cause a completely offsetting decrease in reputational investments, resulting in an overall increase in firms' expected penalties from subpar contractual performance. This will motivate firms to decrease the undesirable incidents. But if there are no externalities for the extra penalties to internalize, the penalty will also increase costs, harming consumers and dissipating wealth.

In previous work, we point out two reasons that reputation and third-party-imposed penalties are not perfect substitutes. [15] First, court-imposed penalties are limited to cases where evidence can be provided to a third party, while reputational losses rely on enforcement by the contracting parties (for example, customers). Second, as Klein and Leffler argue, reputation not only produces deterrence but also takes the form of sunk investments that produce additional services for customers. [16] Thus, an increase in third-party-imposed penalties will result in smaller than dollar-for-dollar reductions in reputational investments.

To the extent that punitive damages are large and variable, they impose [*534] an additional cost on firms. The notion that "to play the game, you have to bet the corporation" [17] implies that punitive awards can be arbitrarily large, with the potential to cause defendant companies financial distress. To avoid such distress and the costs that it brings, firms may alter their capital structures or investment policies. That is, they might consider not just the penalty's expected value but also such higher moments as its variance and skewness.

To the extent that court-imposed penalties are not perfect substitutes for reputational penalties, civil punitive (or criminal) penalties will increase the total penalty beyond the level that private contracting would reach. This forces the contracting parties to purchase more quality assurance than they desire. A deadweight loss is created as the extra cost of eliminating contractual breaches or frauds exceeds consumers' value of the reduction in probability of such breaches or frauds.

One argument in favor of legal suits is that they allow others to learn about a firm's behavior. Yet, if customers value knowing about these incidents more than it costs to produce this information, firms will try to convince their customers that the customers will learn about incidents when they occur. Even if fines are a more efficient mechanism to punish firms (as they undoubtedly are in some circumstances), penalty clauses could be enforced as part of private arbitration agreements.

REV_00261904

III. DESCRIPTION OF THE PUNITIVE LAWSUIT SAMPLE AND AWARD AMOUNTS

The discussion in Section II implies that the sizes, predictability, and variability of punitive damage awards can have substantial impacts on defendant companies. The rest of this article investigates empirically the sizes, determinants, and valuation impacts of punitive awards assessed against publicly held corporations. To do so, we collected information on lawsuits from 1985 through June 1996 in which plaintiffs sought punitive awards using a search on the key word "punitive" in the Lexis/Nexis library "All Verdicts." This library includes reports primarily from LRP Publications' Jury Verdict Research, Jury Verdict Weekly, and the Association of Trial Lawyers of America. Information on additional cases from 1990 through June 1996 was obtained from the Lexis/Nexis National Law Review library. Each individual case was followed over time using these sources to try to determine whether any awards eventually were reduced on appeal. To be included in the sample, the defendant must be a publicly traded corporation with information available on the 1996 Center for Research in Security [*535] Prices (CRSP) or 1996 Compustat databases. The names of many companies listed in the Lexis/Nexis information do not exactly match the names of companies listed in the CRSP and Compustat databases or are subsidiaries of publicly traded corporations. To ensure an accurate match between the company names as listed in the Lexis/Nexis data and the CRSP and Compustat data, we used Dun and Bradstreet's Million Dollar Directory (1985-96 issues) to identify company and subsidiary names.

This search yielded information on 1,979 lawsuits in which the plaintiffs sought punitive awards from publicly traded companies from January 1985 through June 1996. Table 1 reports the distribution of the sample by year and the central topic of the lawsuit, as reported in the Nexis/Lexis database.

Product liability lawsuits are the most common type, with a total of 374 cases. Such suits allege that products malfunctioned or contained design defects. For example, in 1986 Chrysler paid $ 300,000 in compensatory damages and $ 3 million in punitive damages for "knowingly" producing a defective steering wheel. [18] A 1990 case involved an incident in which a woman set herself on fire with a malfunctioning cigarette lighter. [19]

Frauds, which represent 118 cases, involve claims that the defendant firms cheated on explicit or implicit contracts with suppliers, employees, franchises, or customers. As an example, in 1986 an independent Chevron dealer sued Chevron for fraudulently failing to account for fuel removed from the plaintiff's station and then allegedly punishing the dealer for complaining about this by terminating his dealership. [20]

There are a total of 291 business negligence claims and 147 breach of contract cases. Examples of breach of contract suits include a firm's alleged failure to deliver products as promised [21] and a distributor's claim that a manufacturer took away his market. [22] Insurance claims, which represent 314 cases, typically involve allegations of wrongful denial or incomplete coverage, from fire damage to medical expenses. [23] Employment claims include job discrimination, harassment, and contested dismissals. [*536]

TABLE 1

DESCRIPTION OF THE PUNITIVE AWARD LAWSUIT SAMPLE, 1985-96

Product Liability	Fraud	Business Negligence	Breach of Contract	Insurance Claims

REV_00261905

Panel A: Total Sample
1985	18	11	3	9	23
1986	12	12	9	18	20
1987	26	12	23	15	35
1988	20	7	13	13	19
1989	28	18	17	15	29
1990	50	16	25	14	41
1991	39	9	48	12	45
1992	47	10	44	15	31
1993	46	11	35	13	27
1994	37	6	32	18	21
1995	33	6	31	5	18
1996	18	0	11	0	5
Total	374	118	291	147	314
Panel B: Subsample in Which Defendant Has Data Available on the 1996 CRSP Tapes
Total	255	67	185	80	221
Panel C: Event Study Subsample--Events That Received Press Attention
Total	81	20	62	24	42

NOTE.--Panel A reports the number of lawsuits seeking punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations, January 1985-June 1996, grouped by year and lawsuit type. Cases were identified through the Lexis/Nexis database. To be included in the sample, the defendant firm must be listed on the 1996 Center for the Study of Security Prices (CRSP) or 1996 Compustat databases. Panel B reports on the subset of lawsuits from which data are available only from the 1996 CRSP database. Panel C reports on the subset of lawsuits for which data are available on the 1996 CRSP database and that received press coverage, as reported on Lexis/Nexis. The verdicts for all lawsuits in the sample were handed down between 1985 and June 1996, although the initial press announcements for several lawsuits occurred before 1985. Miscellaneous claims include allegations of wrongful death, premises liability, liability for vehicular accidents, trademark violations, libel, toxic exposure, and civil rights violations.

TABLE 1

DESCRIPTION OF THE PUNITIVE AWARD LAWSUIT SAMPLE, 1985-96

Employment Claims	Asbestos Claims	Vehicular Accidents	Malpractice Claims	Miscellaneous Claims	Total
Panel A: Total Sample

REV_00261906

1985	22	0	6	5	26	123
1986	19	2	7	2	21	122
1987	20	10	6	3	35	185
1988	20	2	12	2	25	133
1989	15	11	10	1	35	179
1990	18	2	17	2	29	214
1991	18	6	12	1	38	228
1992	19	7	8	5	24	210
1993	23	16	11	3	38	223
1994	22	1	6	1	19	163
1995	23	2	11	0	23	152
1996	3	0	4	1	5	47
Total	222	59	110	26	318	1,979
Panel B: Subsample in Which Defendant Has Data Available on the 1996 CRSP Tapes
Total	150	31	60	18	182	1,249
Panel C: Event Study Subsample--Events That Received Press Attention
Total	48	14	10	0	50	351

NOTE.--Panel A reports the number of lawsuits seeking punitive damage awards from publicly traded corporations, January 1985-June 1996, grouped by year and lawsuit type. Cases were identified through the Lexis/Nexis database. To be included in the sample, the defendant firm must be listed on the 1996 Center for the Study of Security Prices (CRSP) or 1996 Compustat databases. Panel B reports on the subset of lawsuits from which data are available only from the 1996 CRSP database. Panel C reports on the subset of lawsuits for which data are available on the 1996 CRSP database and that received press coverage, as reported on Lexis/Nexis. The verdicts for all lawsuits in the sample were handed down between 1985 and June 1996, although the initial press announcements for several lawsuits occurred before 1985. Miscellaneous claims include allegations of wrongful death, premises liability, liability for vehicular accidents, trademark violations, libel, toxic exposure, and civil rights violations.

[*537] We separate out three types of lawsuits based on the medium involved. In 59 cases, punitive awards were sought for health-related concerns allegedly related to asbestos exposure. In 110 cases, punitive awards were sought because of injury that involved a vehicle driven by the defendant company's employee. And in 26 cases, plaintiffs alleged that the defendant company or its employees committed medical malpractice. In one such case, for example, a pharmaceutical company was sued for failure to warn of a medication's risks. [24]

REV_00261907

The 318 cases classified as miscellaneous include claims of premises liability, civil rights violations, unfair competition, wrongful death, and toxic torts. Examples include a 1993 case involving a chlorine gas leak [25] and a 1986 case in which plaintiffs objected to Disneyland's request that police detain them for intoxicated behavior. [26]

The overall number of punitive lawsuits in the sample increases from 1985 to the early 1990s and then declines in 1994 and 1995. Most of the growth from 1985 to 1990 is driven by product liability, insurance, and business negligence cases.

Panel B in Table 1 reports on a subset of the total sample for which the defendant firms are listed on the 1996 CRSP database. Tests that require data on the market value of the firm's equity or stock returns are conducted using firms from this subsample. Panel C of Table 1 contains information on the number of cases that also received press coverage. These cases are used in Section VIII to examine the share value effects of punitive lawsuits on defendant companies.

Table 2 reports summary statistics on the sizes of the compensatory and punitive awards for each type of punitive lawsuit. We also partition the sample into cases that resulted in jury verdict findings for plaintiffs, defendant verdicts, and settlements.

The most striking finding in Table 2 is that punitive and compensatory awards in settlements are so small relative to the penalties obtained in plaintiff verdicts. The mean punitive award in settlements is never more than 17 percent of the mean punitive award in plaintiff verdicts, and in seven categories punitive damages are never awarded in settlements. The median punitive award for settlements is zero for all the categories. It is possible that settlements do not properly distinguish between punitive and compensatory awards. Even so, the mean total settlement is less than 20 percent of the [*538]
[*539]

TABLE 2

SUMMARY OF AWARD AMOUNTS (in $ millions)

DEFENSE VERDICTS

LAWSUIT TOPIC	Compensatory Award	Punitive Award	Total Award
Product liability		n = 42
Mean	.000	.000	.000
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.000	.000	.000
SD	.000	.000	.000
Fraud		n = 29
Mean	.020	.000	.020
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.294	.000	.294
SD	.076	.000	.076
Business negligence		n = 6
Mean	.138	.001	.139
Median	.000	.000	.000
Maximum	.830	.005	.835
SD	.339	.002	.341
Breach of contract		n = 35
Mean	.000	.000	.000

REV_00261908

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 839, **

Copyright (c) 1993 Southern California Law Review
University of Southern California

January, 1993

66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 839

LENGTH: 23220 words

NOTE: PUNITIVE DAMAGES: A MISPLACED REMEDY: PUNITIVE DAMAGES: A MISPLACED REMEDY.

E. JEFFREY GRUBE *

* Class of 1993, University of Southern California Law Center. A.B. 1988, University of California (Irvine). The author gratefully acknowledges the assistance and insight of Dean Scott Bice throughout the preparation of this Note. I also thank Douglas Richardson for reading a cumbersome early draft. This Note is dedicated to Cynthia and David.

SUMMARY:
... Awarding punitive damages to civil plaintiffs "has been vigorously criticized throughout [this] Nation's history." ... Some authors and states view the primary purpose of punitive damages as compensation of plaintiffs, but most consider it to be deterrence of defendants. ... Perhaps the finder of fact who, under a scheme awarding punitive damages to society, has a personal stake in the punitive damages award will be less objective: "If jurors realized that any punitive damage award were to be returned to public use, the size of awards would not simply skyrocket. ... Because plaintiffs still get part of the punitive damages award, it is clear that the ABA proposal only partially accepts the windfall theory. ... This approach eliminates the plaintiff's windfall, a result with which this Note agrees, but it also seems to eliminate plaintiffs' incentive to have their attorneys argue the case for punitive damages. ... If all litigation costs would be paid under the decoupling proposal, then plaintiffs would have a good incentive to have their attorneys argue for punitive damages. ... The fallacy of this is that the most widely accepted justification for punitive damages is deterrence, not compensation. ... Defendants will still be assessed punitive damages, thus achieving deterrence, plaintiffs will not receive windfall recoveries, and society will be the winner.

The terms "punitive," "vindictive," or "exemplary" damages, and "smart-money" have been interchangeably applied to a class of money damages awarded in tort actions beyond what is needed to "compensate" the plaintiff for his injuries. [1] awards than under this Note's proposal (assuming that decoupling does indeed involve remunerating plaintiffs for litigation costs, including the costs of the underlying suit). This Note supports paying plaintiffs' attorneys a fee to cover only their costs incurred in arguing for punitive damages. Although the State might wish to pay attorneys the difference between their costs in arguing the underlying suit and the amount of plaintiffs' fees when the value of the underlying case is disproportionately low compared with punitive liability, [120] in no case would plaintiffs pay no fee. Therefore, because the State would pay a lower portion of attorneys' total costs under this Note's proposal, the State would keep a larger portion of punitive damages awards.

[T]he essential idea of such damages being punitive, why is the jury not instructed to

REV_00261949

Overall, decoupling is a viable alternative to this Note's proposal. Both proposals argue that defendants should continue to pay punitive damages as before, that plaintiffs' windfall recoveries should be eliminated, that someone should be paid for attorney's costs incurred in litigating the punitive damages issue, and that the remainder of punitive [*865] damages awards should go to the State. The advantage of decoupling is that it leaves plaintiffs in the picture, thus avoiding potential conflicts of interest when the plaintiff's attorney has an interest in punitive damages and the plaintiff does not. [121] The advantages of this Note's proposal are that it (1) avoids making an exception to the American rule [122] and (2) results in the State recovering a greater portion of punitive damages awards.

3. Regulatory Agencies

Alternative advocates for punitive damages include various regulatory agencies, such as the Federal Aviation Administration, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Environmental Protection Agency, and state agencies, such as state insurance commissions. [123] Judges could refer potential cases of punitive liability to these agencies for prosecution. [124] The FAA could prosecute cases involving airline manufacturer defendants, and the EPA could prosecute cases of alleged dumping of toxic wastes. If no currently existing agency seems appropriate for a particular type of conduct, then prosecution could be assigned to a new agency created solely to review punitive liability in cases unsuited to prosecution by other agencies.

Using regulatory agencies as punitive damages advocates has many benefits. The first is expertise. Industry standards and custom play a big part in determining what constitutes outrageous conduct. Because regulatory agencies have specialized knowledge of industry standards, their expert witness costs may be lower than in traditional litigation. This expertise could also lead to greater accuracy, which is very important to [*866] efficient deterrence. [125] Another benefit related to accuracy is consistency. Because each agency would have exclusive jurisdiction over specific types of punitive damages claims, each agency could monitor consistency more effectively than can court systems with general jurisdiction. Moreover, regulatory sanctions could be used as an alternative to punitive damages when compensatory damages and criminal fines are inadequate to deter undesirable conduct. [126] Finally, administrative agencies can enforce conduct even when no lawsuit is filed. [127] Whereas courts are constrained to decide only those matters brought to them, administrative agencies can proactively perform inspections and seek out improper conduct. They can also follow tips from persons injured enough to make a phone call but not enough to file a lawsuit.

The major problem with this alternative, however, is that it requires a third party to become familiar with the case, whereas plaintiffs' attorneys are already familiar with its every aspect. Furthermore, courts would be delegating tasks to agencies that those agencies should already be performing -- investigating, fining, and regulating improper industry behavior -- but which they are not performing well enough. [128] Increasing the size of our already gargantuan administrative bureaucracy to incorporate the role punitive damages now play is an unappealing option, and sufficiently increasing the efficiency of currently existing agencies may be hopeless. Paying plaintiffs' attorneys a fee to argue punitive damages could be implemented without such bureaucratic expansion and seems to be the more economical and less disruptive alternative.

REV_00261958

IV. POTENTIAL PROBLEMS

The overwhelming majority of states still award 100% of punitive damages awards to civil plaintiffs, [129] even though all but the few that award punitive damages as compensation agree that plaintiffs have no [*867] inherent right to punitive damages and that punitive damages are a windfall. [130] The compensation rationale for awarding punitive damages to plaintiffs could be addressed by expanding compensatory damages, and the private attorney general rationale could be addressed by paying plaintiffs' attorneys to argue the case for punitive damages. These changes, however, may invoke substantial controversy.

A. CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTIONS

The most critical potential problem is that awarding punitive damages to the State may be declared unconstitutional. This problem exists whether or not plaintiffs' attorneys are involved in advocating punitive damages. Potential constitutional challenges may be based on the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment (as incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment), the Double Jeopardy and Takings clauses of the Fifth Amendment (as similarly incorporated), and the Due Process clauses (both substantive and procedural) of the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments.

1. Excessive Fines and Double Jeopardy

Although the Supreme Court held in Browning-Ferris Industries v. Kelco Disposal, Inc. that the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment poses no threat to punitive damages, [131] the Court specifically limited its holding to cases in which punitive damages are awarded to civil plaintiffs: "[W]e now decide only that [the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment] does not constrain an award of [punitive] damages in a civil suit when the government neither has prosecuted the action nor has any right to receive a share of the damages awarded." [132] Therefore, the question of whether the Excessive Fines Clause constrains an award of punitive damages when the government does receive a share of the damages award was left open.

a. McBride v. General Motors: A Georgia district court in McBride v. General Motors [133] answered in the affirmative the question [*868] left undecided in Browning-Ferris. McBride is the first federal case to challenge the constitutionality of a statute prescribing that a portion of punitive damages go to a state entity. The plaintiffs initially filed a products liability lawsuit in a Georgia court against GM for injuries sustained in an automobile accident. [134] Before the conclusion of that action, the plaintiffs filed a declaratory judgment action in U.S. District Court asking that the following portion of Georgia's Tort Reform Act dealing with punitive damages be declared unconstitutional:

Seventy-five percent of any amounts awarded . . . as punitive damages [in a tort case in which the cause of action arises from products liability], less a proportionate part of the costs of litigation, including reasonable attorney's fees, all as determined by the trial judge, shall be paid into the treasury of the state . . . . [135]

The district court held the statute unconstitutional under the Due Process and Equal Protection clauses of the Georgia and the U.S. constitutions, the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment, and the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment. [136] The due process and equal protection holdings were based on the finding that the defendant offered no rational explanation of why Georgia's statute applied only to products liability actions and not other tort actions, thus depriving product liability plaintiffs of a portion of their punitive damages recoveries not similarly taken from plaintiffs suing under different causes of action. [137] Because the due process and equal protection holdings pertained specifically to Georgia's statute, however, they are not relevant to the general constitutionality of awarding punitive damages to the State rather than to private plaintiffs.

REV_00261959

The excessive fines and double jeopardy holdings in McBride, on the other hand, were based on this more general concern. The court held that the statute in question converts the civil nature of the prior Georgia punitive damages statute into a statute where fines are being made for the benefit of the State, contrary to the constitutional prohibitions as to excessive fines and contrary to the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. [138]

The court further held that "there can be no legitimate purpose for a state to involve itself in the area of civil damage litigation between private [*869] parties wherein punitive damages are a legitimate item of recovery, where the State, through the legislative process, preempts for itself a share of the award." [139] The court based these holdings largely on the inference from Browning-Ferris that punitive damages might be unconstitutional under the Excessive Fines Clause if a state has a right to receive a share of them. [140]

The problem with the court's holding in McBride is that it concludes that the statute is unconstitutional under these clauses without substantiating this conclusion, except by referencing the open question in Browning-Ferris and by stating that such a statute changes the character of the action from civil to something else. [141] The comment in Browning-Ferris was not a statement of substantive law; rather, it was a declination to broaden the Court's holding. The McBride court could have properly argued that its holding was not inconsistent with the Browning-Ferris dictum, but not that Browning-Ferris stated a legal conclusion substantiating the McBride holding. Furthermore, the McBride court had little justification or reason to find that awarding a portion of the award to the State would alter the civil status of the action. [142] This is the only explanation given by the court as to why awarding punitive damages to the State violates the Double Jeopardy Clause. [143] If changing the system did in fact transmute the punitive damages hearing into a criminal proceeding, then it would potentially violate the Double Jeopardy Clause in those cases also prosecuted criminally. [144] The court, however, did not say this; it did not specify into what the civil nature of the action was transformed. Thus, the excessive fines and double jeopardy holdings of McBride lack adequate substantiation. [145]

b. Burke v. Deere & Co.: A different federal district court in a more recent case came to a contrary conclusion about a slightly different [*870] statute. The court in Burke v. Deere & Co. [146] considered the constitutionality of Iowa's punitive damages statute. The case arose on motions by the defendants for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial after the defendants were charged with $ 50 million in punitive damages. [147] Among other arguments, the defendants challenged Iowa's statute on double jeopardy and excessive fines grounds. [148] The statute stated, in relevant part, that if the defendant's conduct was not directed specifically at the plaintiff, then "after payment of all applicable costs and fees, an amount not to exceed twenty-five percent of the punitive or exemplary damages awarded may be ordered paid to the claimant, with the remainder of the award to be ordered paid into a civil reparations trust fund." [149]

The Burke court held that the statute was not unconstitutional. [150] The court distinguished McBride's holding regarding Georgia's statute on the ground that, unlike Georgia's statute, the Iowa statute did not give the State of Iowa an interest in the punitive damages award. [151] The court cited Browning-Ferris for the proposition that "[a] clear distinction can be made between funds that are to be placed into the state treasury and those funds that are to be placed into a civil reparations trust fund to be administered by the courts." [152] The court also rejected the defendant's Double Jeopardy Clause challenge, stating that "Deere fails to put forward any meaningful argument in this area, and this court is unaware of any such compelling law under the circumstances we have before us." [153] This conclusion is directly contrary to that of the McBride court. Hence, based on the subtle distinction that Georgia's statute awarded the funds to the state treasury, while Iowa's statute awarded the funds to a "civil reparations trust fund," the Burke court departed from the McBride holding.

REV_00261960

The problem is that the Burke court, like the court in McBride, failed to adequately support its conclusions. The courts came to opposite conclusions, but neither court gave good reasons why it held as it did. The Burke holding, though, makes more sense in that it preserves the legal status quo. If punitive damages are to be rendered unconstitutional [*871] simply because the money goes to the State or a state fund, then good reasons should be articulated for so holding. Without good reasons, such punitive damages statutes should be deemed constitutional. No court of appeals has yet decided this issue.

The Excessive Fines and Double Jeopardy clauses were enacted to protect private citizens from excessive government wrath. Defendants, not plaintiffs, are the ones being fined for punitive damages, and defendants are the ones who might be subject to criminal sanctions in addition to punitive damages. Why, then, are these clauses of our Constitution being applied to protect civil plaintiffs? This is the precise effect of the McBride holding: The court declared the Georgia statute unconstitutional because the state received a portion of the award, not because the defendants were fined more than they would have been if the plaintiffs were to receive the money, nor because the defendants were subjected to any extra jeopardy beyond what would have been the case had they been required to pay punitive damages to the plaintiffs. The fact that the State, rather than plaintiffs, receives the money is merely incidental and should be irrelevant to the defendants -- those persons intended to be protected by the Fifth and Eighth amendments as applied to punitive damages. Therefore, if punitive damages statutes are constitutional when defendants must pay plaintiffs, it follows logically that they remain constitutional when the recipient of defendants' money changes. [154]

In addition to the illogic of changing the constitutionality of punitive damages based upon the identity of the recipient of the damages award, not all cases will trigger the Double Jeopardy or Excessive Fines clauses. Not all civil defendants subject to punitive damages are prosecuted criminally, and whether the punitive damages fine is "excessive" is a question of degree. Therefore, even if the clauses do apply when the State keeps punitive damages awards, they will not be violated in every case.

2. Substantive Due Process and Takings

Neither the McBride nor the Burke court addressed whether awarding punitive damages to the State rather than to a private plaintiff would be an unconstitutional taking of property from the plaintiff without due [*872] process or just compensation. [155] Two state courts, however, have considered these issues, and, like the two federal courts that considered the excessive fines and double jeopardy arguments, they came to opposite conclusions.

a. Gordon v. State: The Florida District Court of Appeals upheld the following statute in Gordon v. State [156] : "If the cause of action [were] based on personal injury or wrongful death, 60 percent of the [punitive damages] award shall be payable to the Public Medical Assistance Trust Fund . . .; otherwise, 60 percent of the award shall be payable to the General Revenue Fund." [157] The plaintiff challenged the statute after the court ordered him to pay sixty percent of his punitive damages to the state. [158] The court rejected the plaintiff's argument that the statute authorized an unconstitutional taking without due process, [159] basing its holding on the fact that the plaintiff had no "right" to recover punitive damages in the first place:

Unlike the right to compensatory damages, the allowance of punitive damages is based entirely upon considerations of public policy. Accordingly, it is clear that the very existence of an inchoate claim for punitive damages is subject to the plenary authority of the ultimate policy-maker under our system, the legislature. In the exercise of that discretion, it may place conditions upon such a recovery or even abolish it altogether. [160]

REV_00261961

The court also rejected the plaintiff's argument that the statute violated his right to substantive due process. [161] The court held that the statute need bear only a "rational relation to a legitimate legislative interest or objective," [162] and the court identified two such legitimate objectives: (1) punishing defendants for what amounts to a public wrong and thereby deterring similar future conduct and (2) "discourag[ing] punitive damages claims by making them less remunerative to the plaintiff and his attorneys." [163] The Gordon court did not overlook the arguments [*873] in McBride, but rather found the McBride court's "brief discussion" of the issue "completely unpersuasive." [164]

b. Kirk v. Denver Publishing Co.: The Supreme Court of Colorado came to the opposite conclusion. In Kirk v. Denver Publishing Co. [165] it held that the following statute violated the Takings Clause:

One-third of all reasonable [punitive] damages collected pursuant to this section shall be paid into the state general fund. The remaining two-thirds of such damages collected shall be paid to the injured party. Nothing in this subsection . . . shall be construed to give the general fund any interest in the claim for exemplary damages or in the litigation itself at any time prior to payment becoming due. [166]
The plaintiff challenged the Colorado statute on appeal after he was awarded punitive damages at trial, arguing that the state should not receive any portion of the award. [167]

Contrary to the holding in Gordon that plaintiffs have no right to punitive damages, the Kirk court held that "there is no question that under Colorado law a judgment for exemplary damages qualifies as a property interest." [168] The court also held that the statute established an unconstitutional taking of the plaintiff's interest. [169] In short, the court concluded that the legislature had failed to compensate plaintiffs adequately for the one-third punitive damages recovery retained by the state. [170]

The major difference between the Gordon and Kirk holdings is that the Florida court in Gordon rejected the notion that plaintiffs have any vested right in punitive damages, while the Colorado court in Kirk asserted that plaintiffs do have such a right. The overwhelming majority of commentators have agreed with the Gordon court, that plaintiffs do not have a right to punitive damages and that punitive damages are awarded at the discretion of the trier of fact. [171] Gordon seems better grounded in accepted legal theory: If the plaintiff has no vested property right in potential punitive damages, then the State does not "take" the [*874] plaintiff's property for purposes of the Fifth Amendment when it requires that one third of those damages be paid to the State. [172]

3. Procedural Due Process

The U.S. Supreme Court held, in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, [173] that punitive damages awards are not so unfair to the defendant as to implicate the Due Process Clause. Under Haslip, the issue of whether the plaintiff receives the punitive damages award is irrelevant because the defendant could get the same process whether the money goes to the plaintiff or to the State. Even if the issue of who gets the damage award is relevant, the procedures for awarding punitive damages can be altered. If, for example, the issue of punitive damages is addressed in a separate hearing, additional procedural safeguards (that might confuse the jury if the issue of punitive damages were tried together with the underlying case) are possible. If the Constitution mandates that defendants be given additional procedural safeguards, then states can add these safeguards and still award the money to themselves. Under Haslip, however, such additional safeguards are unnecessary.

In general, considering the holdings discussed above, it is unclear whether paying a portion or all of punitive damages awards to the State or a state fund is constitutional. The better arguments, however, seem to be on the side of constitutionality. Plaintiffs have traditionally never had a right to receive punitive damages; therefore the Takings and Substantive Due Process clauses should not apply. Moreover, defendants are put to no more jeopardy nor are required to pay any greater fines when forced to pay the State rather than the plaintiff; therefore, the Double Jeopardy and Excessive Fines clauses should not apply. Finally, extra procedural protections for defendants are likely unnecessary; however, if additional procedures are mandated, these may be implemented, and punitive damages awards may still be paid to the State. These issues have not yet been decided by the Supreme Court or any U.S. court of appeals.

REV_00261962

[*875] B. SETTLEMENTS

"This approach, providing for awards to general or state funds, is unprecedented in our legal system. It will generate difficult problems of application and administration, particularly for the large number of cases that are settled out of court." [174]

1. Settlements Between Plaintiffs and Defendants

Parties often settle their disputes before going to court. With compensatory damages, the parties have an incentive to avoid litigation costs (including the uncertainty of a trial), and plaintiffs are often willing to settle for the amount they expect the court to award in compensation after trial, less expected litigation costs. [175] If punitive damages liability is also at issue, and the punitive damages, if available, would be awarded primarily to the State, then the parties would have an even greater incentive to settle. Defendants would be willing to pay plaintiffs up to their expected combined compensatory and punitive liability, and plaintiffs would be willing to accept any amount beyond their expected compensatory damages. [176] This leaves a large zone for potential settlement of punitive damages claims. If each party understands the incentives of the other, then a compromise settlement would likely occur somewhere in the middle. [177] For example, if the defendant estimates punitive liability at $ 1 million, and if the plaintiff could expect no share of the punitive damages recovery after trial (because the money would go to the State, less fees to the plaintiff's attorney), then a likely settlement would be about $ 500,000 for the punitive damages issue. Not only would such settlements create another windfall for plaintiffs (at the State's expense, because absent settlement the State would have received the punitive damages after trial), but if $ 1 million was the proper amount to efficiently deter, the defendant would receive the wrong incentives and thus the deterrence goal of punitive damages would not be fully realized. [178]

But encouraging punitive damages settlements has some positive ramifications. Increased settlement rates would lower the costs of litigation for all parties involved, including court costs incurred by the State, because fewer cases would reach trial. The settlement price paid by [*876] defendants would constitute less-than-efficient deterrence, which would lead to an inefficient level of future precautions, but defendants would still pay more than full compensatory damages to settle. Plaintiffs are not harmed, and defendants are deterred to some extent. Furthermore, if defendants act too outrageously, society is still protected to some extent [179] through the criminal justice system.

Moreover, safeguards could be established. The trier of fact could be informed that many potential punitive damages cases settle. When defendants are finally brought to court -- because not all cases will settle -- judges could assess higher punitive damages than they would if settlements never occurred. [180] Other potential defendants will then have to consider, when deciding how to act, the risk of having to pay higher punitive damages awards if they act improperly. Therefore, even if a particular defendant is never brought to trial, others would be and thus all potential tortfeasors would have incentives to weigh the potential costs of their behavior. [181] As noted earlier, however, defendants forced to bear these excess damages might object. [182]

REV_00261963

Another possible solution is to make the settlement of punitive damages illegal. [183] The claim for punitive damages could be mandated to survive all settlements. Therefore, even if parties elect to settle the underlying suit for compensatory damages, the plaintiff's attorney would still be able to move the court to consider punitive damages afterward. This solves the conflict of interest problem between the plaintiff and the plaintiff's attorney [184] and forces defendants to pay an efficient level of punitive damages. The cost is that fewer cases would be settled, but the gain is efficient deterrence.

2. Conflict of Interest for Plaintiffs' Attorneys

Another problem is that plaintiffs' attorneys may have a conflict of interest when negotiating settlements for plaintiffs. They are sworn to represent the plaintiff, [185] yet they have a personal interest in obtaining [*877] punitive damages through trial because they are paid to be punitive damages advocates. For example, assume that the likely punitive damages award at a posttrial hearing is $ 100,000 and that the plaintiff's attorney could expect $ 20,000 in fees as the punitive damages advocate. Assume further that the defendant is willing to settle with the plaintiff for $ 30,000 more than the plaintiff can expect to be awarded in trial for arguably real yet unprovable damages. In this case, the plaintiff's attorney, in conjunction with his or her client, must choose between settlement (which would give the attorney a contingency percentage, for example, one third of $ 30,000, or $ 10,000) and trial (which would give the attorney an expected $ 20,000 as the punitive damages advocate). The plaintiff's best economic interest would be to settle, but the plaintiff's attorney's best economic interest may be to try the case to verdict.

This conflict, however, may be deceiving. If the plaintiff's attorney's punitive damages fee covers only the attorney's normal fee for trying a case, then the attorney has little incentive to discourage settlements. If the case settles, the attorney need not try the case and will therefore receive $ 10,000 for doing nothing, which is probably better than working for $ 20,000. Even if the attorney would perceive settling as contrary to the attorney's own best interests, the attorney must follow the rules of ethics and do what is in the client's best interest, which would be to settle, or withdraw from the case. [186] Alternatively, if the State makes the settlement of punitive damages claims illegal, as suggested above, [187] then the plaintiff's attorney need not worry about any potential conflict. The attorney need only follow the law.

3. Settlements Between Plaintiffs' Attorneys and Defendants

A problem related to plaintiffs settling their cases before trial is that plaintiffs' attorneys might personally settle the punitive damages claim with defendants. Plaintiffs' attorneys would have an incentive to settle for any amount greater than their fee for proving punitive damages on behalf of society, and defendants would have an incentive to settle for any amount less than the potential award. Because the potential punitive damages award assessed against the defendant will always be higher than the plaintiff's attorney's fee, a mutually beneficial "trade" seems likely. No profit-maximizing plaintiff's attorney or defendant would pass up [*878] such a deal if it were legally and morally permissible. Therefore, no defendants would be required to pay enough, and thus all defendants would be insufficiently deterred. Society would be the loser.

The solution to this problem, as to the problem of settlements between plaintiffs and defendants, is to make such settlements illegal. Absent such a prohibition, defendants would pay off plaintiffs' attorneys, who are supposed to be acting as public servants by prosecuting punitive damages claims for the benefit of society, to settle all cases with significant potential punitive damages liability. Paying such persons money to drop this public service seems intuitively unethical and should be illegal.

REV_00261964

C. REPRESENTATION

When the plaintiff is dismissed from the underlying lawsuit and the attorney moves the court to set a punitive damages hearing, who is the attorney's client? One possible answer is that the attorney no longer has a client and is now acting as a servant of the State [188] -- proving a case for the benefit of society and expecting to be paid for that service. This is analogous to other areas of the law, such as qui tam, antitrust, and RICO actions, where suits are brought by private parties who recover more than compensation for bringing the action -- treble damages, for example. When pursuing punitive damages, the attorney would not act as a representative of the plaintiff, but would act as a public servant and would be paid for doing so.

D. OPPOSITION FROM THE PLAINTIFFS' BAR

On the practical side, the new system suggested in this Note might never be implemented, not because it fails to offer substantial improvements over the current system, but because it would be opposed by special interest groups. The greatest opposition would likely come from the plaintiffs' bar: "The vigor of the plaintiffs' bar, the prevailing sympathetic temperaments of many state and federal judges, the disproportionately heavy representation of plaintiff attorneys in state legislatures and the United States Congress, and the tradition of two hundred years or so will not soon be overcome." [189] This opposition would stem from the expectation that fewer plaintiffs will sue if punitive damages go to the State -- a [*879] realistic expectation that would mean fewer clients for plaintiffs' attorneys. Also, net damage recoveries would be lower for plaintiffs absent the availability of punitive damages, which, in turn, would mean lower contingency fees. Therefore, plaintiffs' attorneys are likely to vigorously oppose any change to the current system that would take punitive damages away from plaintiffs.

The fact that plaintiffs' attorneys would be offered part of the State's punitive damages recovery only partially alleviates this problem. The pool of potential clients would still be diminished because fewer plaintiffs would file suit, and the State might pay less than the attorneys' customary contingency fee.

In order to counter the expected opposition of the plaintiffs' bar, other special interest groups will have to be enlisted to argue for the proposed reforms. A natural candidate for this role is the insurance industry. In fact, insurers have already argued that punitive damages should go to the State:

It has been contended by insurers that if such damages are recoverable at all they should go to the state, and without any charge upon them for attorney's fees. This position is taken, not to produce funds for the public treasury, but to reduce plaintiffs' incentive to seek such damages. The net result would be that some wrongdoers would go unpunished. It is not the loss to the state but the payment by defendants which inspires such suggestions. [190]
This Note advocates awarding punitive damages awards to the State both to produce funds for the public treasury and to eliminate the plaintiffs' windfall.

Realistically, therefore, special interest groups will both oppose and support the proposed reform. The best "general interest group," however, is society as a whole. Society should realize that plaintiffs do not deserve punitive damages and that the money could be put to better use in the hands of the state. Society would benefit from changing the punitive damages system, and the voting public should be capable of seeing this. Hopefully, special interest groups will not succeed in thwarting these generally beneficial reforms.

[*880] V. CONCLUSION

Textbooks often categorize punitive damages as a type of legal "remedy." [191] The fallacy of this is that the most widely accepted justification for punitive damages is deterrence, not compensation. [192] For purposes of deterrence, punitive damages are not really a remedy at all; their design is prospective, not retrospective. If they do serve as a remedy, they remedy harm to society as a whole, [193] not harm to civil plaintiffs who are otherwise compensated to the extent society chooses to compensate them. [194] When paid to civil plaintiffs, punitive damages are a windfall and are to that extent "misplaced."

REV_00261965

I advocate a cleaner system. Let plaintiffs receive just compensation and no more. Plaintiffs' attorneys can argue the case for punitive damages and be paid a reasonable fee for their services -- let the State or a state fund retain the rest. With these slight modifications to current practice, proper incentives should be created for all parties involved. Defendants will still be assessed punitive damages, thus achieving deterrence, plaintiffs will not receive windfall recoveries, and society will be the winner.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 517 (1957).

n2 Lewis Lawrence Smith, Punitive Damages, 32 AM. L. REG. & REV. 517, 518-19 (1893).

n3 Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 58 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting).

n4 "The windfall theory suggests that compensatory damages have evolved into a system of total vindication for injured plaintiffs, covering all the injuries that punitive damages were meant to address." Brian M. English, Note, Oliver v. Raymark: Holding the Line on Punitive Damages, 63 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 63, 71 (1988).

n5 Note, An Economic Analysis of the Plaintiff's Windfall from Punitive Damage Litigation, 105 HARV. L. REV. 1900 (1992); e.g., Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29, 84 (1971) (Marshall, J., dissenting) ("These awards are not to compensate victims; they are only windfalls."); James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 VAND. L. REV. 1117, 1165 (1984) ("Considering the expanded and virtually unlimited access to compensatory damages, punitive damages simply provide a windfall to the plaintiff, penalize the innocent consumers or society, and unnecessarily sap the vitality of the economy upon which society is totally dependant [sic].").

n6 E.g., Pegram v. Stortz, 6 S.E. 485, 497 (W. Va. 1888) ("The weight of reason is, I think, clearly with those who deny that such punitive damages ought ever to be given."); Ernest B. Lageson, The Injustice of Punitive Damages, FOR DEF., July 1986, at 1, 1 ("The threat of punitive awards improperly inflate [sic] civil settlements and verdicts. They are a major contributor to our current crises and should be abolished."); Sales & Cole, supra note 5, at 1118 ("The doctrine of punitive damages truly is an ancient legal concept that inexplicably has evaded commitment to the archives of history."); Steven J. Sensibar, Punitive Damages: A Look at Origins and Legitimacy, 41 FED'N INS. & CORP. COUNS. Q. 375, 386 (1991) ("The concept of punitive damages should not remain a part of the law any longer."); Hugh Evander Willis, Measure of Damages When Property is Wrongfully Taken by a Private Individual, 22 HARV. L. REV. 419, 420 (1909) ("[Punitive damages] are not allowed on any theory of compensation to the injured party, but rather for the purpose of punishing the wrongdoer and as a warning to others. Do such damages have any place in civil actions? The writer thinks not.").

n7 E.g., Bass v. Chicago & N.W. Ry., 42 Wis. 654, 672 (1877) (Ryan, C.J.) ("It is difficult on principle to understand why, when the sufferer by a tort has been fully compensated for his suffering, he should recover anything more. And it is equally difficult to understand why, if the tortfeasor is to be punished by exemplary damages, they should go to the compensated sufferer, and not to the public in whose behalf he is punished."); James E. Duffy, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Doctrine Which Should Be Abolished, in DEFENSE RESEARCH

REV_00261966

INST., THE CASE AGAINST PUNITIVE DAMAGES 4, 9 (1969) ("[P]unitive damages are damages which exceed the amount necessary to compensate the plaintiff for his injury, imposed in the form of a criminal fine (which should be paid to the state, if anyone)."); Hon. Carmon C. Harris, Exemplary Damages to the Public, FOR DEF., May 1983, at 27, 27 ("Instead of the individual plaintiff receiving an exemplary damages award, the award should inure to the benefit of the public through award to the state."); John D. Long, Punitive Damages: An Unsettled Doctrine, 25 DRAKE L. REV. 870, 886 (1976) ("If a punitive award is a punishment by society of the errant defendant, something is to be said for paying the penalty to society rather than to some third party beneficiary."); Randall H. Endo, Recent Developments, Punitive Damages in Hawaii: Curbing Unwarranted Expansion, 13 U. HAW. L. REV. 659, 680 (1991) ("If the true purpose of punitive damages is to deter and punish (and not to increase compensation), then giving most of the money to the state is a logical alternative, and it will test the sincerity of the plaintiff's punitive claim."); Note, supra note 1, at 525 ("Even though it is conceded that exemplary damages properly carry out the punitive function of tort law, it may nevertheless be argued that such damages should go to the state as a 'fine' and not to the plaintiff as a windfall."); David Ira Rosenbaum, Comment, Punitive Damages in Professional Malpractice Cases, 61 TEMP. L.Q. 1431, 1480 (1988) ("Punitive damages, where appropriate, should be paid directly to the state. By giving the state the punitive damage award, the goals of punishment and deterrence could be advanced without giving the plaintiff a windfall.").

n8 AMERICAN BAR ASS'N, REPORT OF THE ACTION COMMISSION TO IMPROVE THE TORT LIABILITY SYSTEM 19 (1987) [hereinafter ABA REPORT OF THE ACTION COMMISSION]; see AMERICAN BAR ASS'N, ABA BLUEPRINT FOR IMPROVING THE CIVIL JUSTICE SYSTEM: A REPORT OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION WORKING GROUP ON CIVIL JUSTICE SYSTEM PROPOSALS 81-85 (1992) [hereinafter ABA BLUEPRINT].

n9 Harold Lee Schwab, The State of Punitive Damages: Constitutional Law, Pretrial Strategy and Trial Techniques, 41 FED'N INS. & CORP. COUNS. Q. 57, 63 (1990) ("[F]ive states, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Hampshire, and Washington, do not allow punitive damages.").

n10 See 2 JAMES D. GHIARDI & JOHN J. KIRCHER, PUNITIVE DAMAGES LAW AND PRACTICE § 21.16 (1989 & Supp. 1992) (listing the states as Florida, Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Missouri, Illinois, Utah, and Oregon). Florida enacted its statute in 1986, FLA. STAT. ANN. § 768.73 (West Supp. 1992); Colorado enacted its statute in 1986, COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-21-102 (West 1989) (held unconstitutional by the Colorado Supreme Court in Kirk v. Denver Publishing Co., 818 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1991), see discussion infra part IV.A.2.b.); Georgia enacted its statute in 1987, GA. CODE ANN. § 51-12-5.1 (Michie Supp. 1992) (held unconstitutional by a U.S. district court in McBride v. General Motors, 737 F. Supp. 1563 (M.D. Ga. 1990), see discussion infra part IV.A.1.a.); Iowa enacted its statute in 1986, IOWA CODE ANN. § 668A.1 (West 1991); Missouri enacted its statute in 1987, MO. ANN. STAT. § 537.675 (West 1991); Illinois enacted its statute in 1986, ILL. ANN. STAT. ch. 110, para. 2-1207 (Smith-Hurd Supp. 1992); Utah enacted its statute in 1989, UTAH CODE ANN. § 78-18-1 (1992); and Oregon enacted its statute in 1987, OR. REV. STAT. § 18.540 (1989). I add to Ghiardi and Kircher's list Kansas, which enacted its statute in 1985, KAN. STAT. ANN. § 60-3402 (1990).

n11 See Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 35 (1983) ("Although there was debate about the theoretical correctness of the punitive damages doctrine in the latter part of the last century, the doctrine was accepted as settled law by nearly all state and federal courts, including this Court."); David L. Walther & Thomas A. Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: King v. Combs, 49 MARQ. L. REV. 369, 380 (1965) ("Arguments have been advanced in favor and against the doctrine in every state, and nearly every state has accepted the concept of exemplary damages to some degree.").

REV_00261967

separate the damages, and give only the compensatory part to the plaintiff and the balance to the county? The plaintiff is surely not entitled to them. [2]

TEXT: [*841]

I. INTRODUCTION

Awarding punitive damages to civil plaintiffs "has been vigorously criticized throughout [this] Nation's history." [3] One criticism, the "windfall theory" of punitive damages, is that punitive damages are an unjust windfall to civil plaintiffs. [4] Many scholars and jurists have made this argument: [5] Some argue that punitive damages should be abolished outright [6] while others argue that the money should go to the State. [7]

[*842] This latter argument was partially endorsed in 1987 by the American Bar Association, when it proposed that a portion of punitive damages be awarded to plaintiffs and plaintiffs' attorneys as compensation for bringing suits to court, with the remainder going to the State. [8] Currently, five states bar all punitive damages, [9] and between 1986 and 1989 at least eight states adopted legislation similar to the ABA's proposal. [10] [*843] The vast majority of jurisdictions, however, continue to award punitive damages exclusively to plaintiffs. [11]

This Note revives the argument that punitive damages should be paid to society rather than to plaintiffs. Plaintiffs have neither a legal nor a moral right to punitive damages, [12] and the law lacks sufficient rationales for paying them such damages. [13] Punitive damages are assessed in addition to compensatory damages, [14] which compensate plaintiffs (to the extent society chooses to compensate them) for harm suffered. [15] Punitive damages are paid to plaintiffs only as an expediency: "The fact that the assessment goes to the plaintiff is incidental, and subservient to the necessity of giving an example to the community, and of punishing the defendant." [16] Society allows plaintiffs to recover punitive damages primarily to create an incentive to prove defendants' punitive liability. [17] This Note argues that this rationale is insufficient -- defendants will still be brought to justice if punitive damages go to society rather than to plaintiffs.

[*844] Although awarding punitive damages to the State is an old proposal, little attention has been given to its inherent problems. [18] Administratively, plaintiffs would have little incentive to bring the issue to a court's attention absent the potential for punitive damages recovery. [19] Constitutionally, awarding punitive damages to the State rather than to plaintiffs could implicate the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment, the Double Jeopardy, Due Process, and Takings clauses of the Fifth Amendment, and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (both substantive and procedural). [20] However, neither the administrative nor the constitutional hurdles are insurmountable.

Part II of this Note acknowledges that punitive damages are a stable institution in the law and argues that, assuming punitive damages will continue to be paid by civil defendants, courts should award such damages to the State or a public fund rather than to civil plaintiffs. Part III suggests that the State might create incentives for advocacy by offering plaintiffs' attorneys a fee, or a portion of the punitive damages recovery, for proving defendants' punitive liability. The State or a public fund should receive the balance of the award, and the plaintiff should receive nothing. Part IV discusses likely objections to this proposal, including potential constitutional challenges and the treatment of settlements. This Note concludes that the benefits of awarding punitive damages to the state are significant and the problems surmountable. The current system [*845] of punitive damages, as it exists in most states, is neither perfect nor a "monstrous heresy." [21] Punitive damages are a valuable though misplaced remedy, whose purposes can better be served by awarding them to the public.

REV_00261950

n12 See Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedures, 69 VA. L. REV. 269, 292 (1983) ("As courts have uniformly held, no plaintiff has a right to punitive damages: the purpose of punitive damages is to vindicate the public interest, not that of a particular plaintiff.").

n13 See infra part II.B.

n14 See Bruce Chapman & Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: Divergence in Search of a Rationale, 40 ALA. L. REV. 741, 745 (1989) ("Punitive, or exemplary, damages are an exception to the general rule that damages are compensatory.").

n15 Spokane Truck & Dray Co. v. Hoefer, 25 P. 1072, 1074 (Wash. 1891) ("Exclusive of punitive damages, the measure of damages as uniformly adopted by the courts and recognized by the law is exceedingly liberal towards the injured party. There is nothing stinted in the rule of compensation."); see infra part II.B.1.b.

n16 Edw. C. Eliot, Exemplary Damages, 20 AM. L. REG. 570, 571 (1881).

n17 See infra part II.B.1.a.

n18 See, e.g., DEFENSE RESEARCH INST., supra note 7, app. (proposing "model legislation" that abolishes punitive damages or, in the alternative, makes defendants pay punitive damages into state treasuries for the benefit of schools). The Defense Research Institute suggests that "[i]f the true purposes of punitive damages are to punish and deter, the change of the ultimate recipient of the funds from the plaintiff to state school funds is logical." Id. Notwithstanding the logic of this position, neither DRI nor the other proponents of paying punitive damages to the state, see sources cited supra note 7, discuss the practical difficulties of such a proposal.

For a checklist of problems involved in paying punitive damages to the state, see 2 GHIARDI & KIRCHER, supra note 10, § 21.16, which states:

Changes which provide for payment of punitive damages to general or state funds are unprecedented in tort cases. The legislation raises several issues which will have to be addressed: (1) Must the state or public agency be made a party to the litigation? (2) Does the public agency have an interest in the litigation and can it intervene in the action? Colorado and Georgia have attempted to head off some of these issues. (3) Can a state or public agency require a claimant to bring a punitive damage claim? (4) Does the claimant's attorney owe any duty to the state or public agency, such as notice? (5) Are the damages which are allocated to such an agency fines, forfeitures, or criminal penalties so as to affect the burden of proof, evidentiary rules, or the availability of insurance coverage?

n19 See Note, supra note 1, at 525-26 ("[I]f exemplary damages were to go to the public treasury, fewer wrongdoers would be punished, since a plaintiff would have no inducement to bring suit if the compensatory damages were likely to be small, or to contribute extra time and expense to establish a claim for exemplary damages once an action has been brought."). This Note addresses the problem by proposing that the government pay plaintiffs' attorneys a fee to argue the case for punitive liability. See infra part III.A.

n20 See infra part IV.A.

n21 See Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1872).

n22 TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, AN UPDATE ON THE LIABILITY CRISIS 52 (1987); see also W. PAGE KEETON ET AL., PROSSER AND KEETON ON THE LAW OF TORTS § 2, at 9 (5th ed. 1984) ("Such damages are given to the plaintiff over and above the full compensation for the injuries, for the purpose of punishing the defendant not to do it again, and of deterring others from following the defendant's example.").

REV_00261968

n23 Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., acknowledges that "augmented awards" are a windfall if awarded to plaintiffs. Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 LA. L. REV. 3, 58 (1990). Galligan goes on to state, however, that "from the pure perspective of deterrence, the windfall concept is irrelevant." Id. This Note proposes that although the identity of the party to whom the money goes is irrelevant to the defendant and to society's deterrence goal, it is not completely irrelevant. Society need not give the money away. Rather, courts can put punitive damages awards to better uses than unjustly enriching plaintiffs. See infra part II.B.3.

n24 Steven Sensibar recently expressed his dissatisfaction with punitive damages in the following dramatic terms: "The entire American economic structure is threatened with extinction due to the predation of its entrepreneurial roots by punitive damages." Sensibar, supra note 6, at 386. Prof. David G. Owen has argued that "the increasing number and size of such awards may fairly raise the concern for the future stability of American industry." David G. Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 6 (1982). Contra Don J. DeBenedictis, Punitives Under Control, A.B.A. J., May 1992, at 38 (reviewing a recent study done by Prof. Michael Rustad of Suffolk University Law School suggesting that punitive damages awards may actually be decreasing).

n25 For years, scholars and jurists have argued that "[r]eason and justice demand the declaration of the unconstitutionality of the doctrine of punitive damages." See Thomas A. Ford, The Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, in DEFENSE RESEARCH INST., supra note 7, at 15, 22. These arguments have been based on (1) the Due Process Clause, see Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 ALA. L. REV. 975, 990 (1989); (2) the Excessive Fines Clause, see Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989); (3) the Double Jeopardy Clause, see Duffy, supra note 7, at 10 (contra Southern Law Times, Exemplary Damages, Where an Act Is Punishable Criminally, 3 KAN. L.J. 369, 372 (1886)); and (4) other constitutional provisions, see David J. Fuller, "Smart Money," 17 W. ST. U. L. REV. 305, 313 (1990) ("In California, there have also been challenges claiming that some punitive awards are in violation of the prohibition of ex post facto laws contained in the United States and California Constitutions."); Brian L. Lahargoue, Comment, The Need for Federal Legislative Reform of Punitive Damages, 20 SW. U. L. REV. 103, 107 (1991) (discussing First Amendment arguments against punitive damages).

n26 See 1 GHIARDI & KIRCHER, supra note 10, § 4.02 (listing the states that accept the compensation rationale); Walther & Plein, supra note 11, at 378 ("Although most states offer punishment as the foundation for punitive damages, some jurisdictions justify punitive damages on a theory of quasi-compensation."); Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1158, 1173 (1966) ("When utilized to permit compensation for otherwise non-compensable losses, the law of punitive damages serves its historical function of expanding the law of compensatory damages.").

n27 See, e.g., Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 582 P.2d 980, 990 n.13 (Cal. 1978) ("The purpose of punitive damages is to punish wrongdoers and thereby deter commission of wrongful acts."); KEETON ET AL., supra note 22, § 2, at 9; Long, supra note 7, at 876 ("In the majority of jurisdictions the principal purpose of punitive damages is to punish flagrant wrongdoers and to deter them and others from engaging in flagrant conduct in the future."). But see Duffy, supra note 7, at 11 ("The vague public policy of granting punitive damages because of a deterrent effect is not supported by any empirical facts.").

Retribution is another rationale sometimes given for punitive damages. See Long, supra note 7, at 877 ("Such awards are said to offer an element of revenge both to the injured party and to society as a whole."). Arguably, though, "[t]he early idea of private vengeance has been supplanted by the criminal law, so that there is no longer any place for it in civil law." Willis, supra note 6, at 420. Even if this rationale is accepted, however, it still fails to support plaintiffs receiving the money. The goal of punishing the defendant does not support paying punitive damages to the plaintiff. See infra part II.B.1.

REV_00261969

n28 Melvin M. Belli, Sr., Punitive Damages: Their History, Their Use and Their Worth in Present-Day Society, 49 UMKC L. REV. 1, 23 (1980) ("Perhaps, now, more than ever, punitive damages' stated purpose of punishment and deterrence has an important role to play in society. Civilization is so complex, industries so large, commodities so varied and complicated, and governments so encumbered, that checkmates are needed, wherever possible, to assure that a conscience is formed where there is no patent responsibility."); David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1265 (1976) ("Punitive or exemplary damages are assessed in addition to compensatory damages to punish the defendant for the commission of an aggravated or outrageous act of misconduct and to deter him and others from such conduct in the future.").

n29 Amelia J. Toy, Comment, Statutory Punitive Damage Caps and the Profit Motive: An Economic Perspective, 40 EMORY L.J. 303, 340 (1991) ("A punitive damage rule that recognizes the role of the profit motive in a potential tortfeasor's decision-making process allows the courts to fashion efficient solutions to the problems they face and, at the same time, teaches the prospective wrongdoer that 'tort does not pay.'").

n30 See David Friedman, An Economic Explanation of Punitive Damages, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1125, 1126 (1989) ("If the tortfeasor pays compensatory damages equal to the full cost imposed on the victim, he bears all the costs of his act and so makes the efficient decision."); Duffy, supra note 7, at 11 ("In most instances, compensatory damages alone are sufficient to deter individuals from such acts."); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 1, 23 (1982) ("Efficiency analysis should begin with the assumption that compensatory damages ordinarily will produce efficient results.").

n31 Society may not want "efficient" outrageous or malicious conduct. Hence, assessing punitive damages in addition to compensatory damages serves to channel conduct away from outrageousness. RICHARD A. POSNER, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF LAW 194 (3d ed. 1986) ("[W]e want to make sure that I am not indifferent between stealing and buying my neighbor's car."). Furthermore, the goal of full compensation may be impossible to achieve. For example, the victim might be dead, see Gary T. Schwartz, Deterrence and Punishment in the Common Law of Punitive Damages: A Comment, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 133, 142 (1982) ("[T]he primary criteria for damages relate to the losses that death imposes on the victim's survivors. No account is given to the value of the victim's life to the victim himself."); or the victim's damages might not be severe enough to warrant incurring the up-front costs of a lawsuit (for example, when the outrageous act causes small amounts of harm to a large number of people). "Clearly in such cases the award of exemplary damages should aim at making the cost of such repetitive anti-social conduct uneconomical." Cox v. Stolworthy, 496 P.2d 682, 690 (Idaho 1972). It should be noted, however, that the class action is another alternative for dealing with minor injuries spread over large groups.

Prof. Robert Cooter has devised a formula for assessing punitive damages to rectify some of these problems -- a formula he calls the "rule of reciprocal":

For example, if 1/2 of tort victims who are entitled to recover actually bring suit, and those who do bring suit recover full, then, under certain conditions, 1/2 of the social costs caused by injurers will be externalized. In these circumstances, the ratio of total damages to compensatory damages paid by intentional wrongdoers should equal 2/1 for the sake of deterrence. In general, the punitive multiple should equal the reciprocal of the enforcement error . . . .

REV_00261970

Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1143, 1148 (1989).

n32 See Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 P. 119, 124 (Colo. 1884) ("Why not remit the punishment of defendant to a criminal forum?"); Sensibar, supra note 6, at 378 ("Punishment is the function of the criminal law, compensation that of the civil law."). But see Walther & Plein, supra note 11, at 382 ("It would seem, however, that if the criminal law has been deficient in the protection of society from wrongdoers, that this deficiency should more rationally be remedied by improving the administration of criminal justice, rather than providing bounties at the expense of the tortfeasor.").

n33 See Ellis, supra note 30, at 1-2 ("[C]ourts have concluded that even the combination of criminal prosecution and civil damage liability produces a suboptimal level of enforcement and have assessed punitive (or exemplary) damages in addition to compensatory damages.").

n34 See Owen, supra note 28, at 1289-90 ("Violations are apt to be especially prevalent, however, when the unlawful activity is profitable for the violator, when violations are difficult to detect or to prove, when violations are 'morally neutral,' when the rules are vague, when enforcement of the rules is infrequent, or when punishment is light."); Vindictive Damages, 4 AM. L.J. 61, 73 (1851) ("The principle argument adduced in favor of vindictive damages bases itself on the necessity that every community is under of affixing some punishment to violations of the law, which, though partaking more or less of the character of crimes, are yet not of importance enough to demand, or too subtle in their nature to admit of criminal prosecution.").

n35 Luther v. Shaw, 147 N.W. 18, 20 (Wis. 1914) ("The [criminal] law must be uniform as to persons and acts, must fix a maximum and minimum punishment on this basis, and cannot always be adjusted to particular circumstances of atrocity which occasionally occur."); see James D. Ghiardi, Punitive Damages -- Legislative Reform, 39 FED'N INS. & CORP. COUNS. Q. 189, 194 (1989) ("The criminal law and consumer fraud statutes do not adequately protect injured parties from or prevent outrageous conduct. Some wrongdoers choose to assume the risk of modest fines and continue their oppressive behavior if changing their conduct would mean a substantial economic loss.").

n36 Kink v. Combs, 135 N.W.2d 789, 798 (Wis. 1965) ("Certainly the consolidation of claims for compensation and punitive damages in one cause of action is in accord with modern principles of avoiding multiple trials.").

n37 "[T]here appears to be a modern trend in both U.S. courts and their respective state legislatures to tighten the standard for awarding punitive damages, limiting them only to the most egregious cases." Guy O. Kornblum, The Current State of Bad Faith and Punitive Damage Litigation in the U.S., 23 TORT & INS. L.J. 812, 840 (1988); see Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 189 ("Since 1986, at least 25 states have enacted some sort of [punitive damages] reform.").

n38 See Ellis, supra note 30, at 51 ("If the applicable legal standard for assessing punitive damages were more certain, subjective predictions of the outcome of litigation would be closer, settlement would be more likely, and litigation costs would decline."); Ellis, supra note 25, at 988 ("[U]ncertainty as to potential liability induces overinvestment in liability avoidance, or worse, suppresses innovation, and results in higher insurance costs for all that are insured.").

n39 Forrest Campbell, Comment, Banker's Life: Justice O'Connor's Solution to the Jury's Standardless Discretion to Award Punitive Damages, 24 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 719, 742 (1989); e.g., COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-21-102(1) (1987) (limiting punitive damages to the amount of compensatory damages, or to three times that amount if the misconduct continues during trial); see also Note, supra note 1, at 530 ("Many courts have found a way to limit the jury's wide discretion by requiring some 'reasonable relationship' between actual and exemplary damages."); CONN. GEN. STAT. § 52-240b (Supp. 1990) (ordering that the court determine the amount of punitive damages in product liability actions, but limiting punitive damages to two times the amount of compensatory damages awarded).

For a critique of these reforms, see Ellis, supra note 30, at 60 ("In fact, [requiring that punitive damages bear a reasonable relationship to compensatory damages] neither provides meaningful guidance to decisionmakers nor increases certainty.").

n40 E.g., Collens v. New Canaan Water Co., 234 A.2d 825, 831-32 (Conn. 1967) (holding that punitive damages may not exceed the amount of plaintiff's expenses of litigation, less taxable costs).

n41 Theodore B. Olson & Theodore J. Boutrous, Jr., Constitutional Restraints on the Doctrine of Punitive Damages, 17 PEPP. L. REV. 907, 924 (1990) ("[N]ine states . . . have enacted statutory limits on the size of punitive damages."); see Wheeler, supra note 12, at 314-20. For a discussion of the states that have enacted caps, see Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 195-96.

For a criticism of this approach, see Jason S. Johnston, Punitive Liability: A New Paradigm of Efficiency in Tort Law, 87 COLUM. L. REV. 1385, 1406 (1987) ("[Punitive damages] caps could severely weaken incentives for safety by taking away the threat of high damages necessary to counteract the incentive-weakening effect of punitive safeguards."); Rosenbaum, supra note 7, at 1476 ("While capping punitive damage awards is another viable approach that has been taken to respond to the liability crisis, this measure may inhibit the goals of punishment and deterrence.").

n42 See Ellis, supra note 25, at 1005 ("[U]nder a traditional legal analysis, punitive damages are more analogous to fines than to damages. The determination of the appropriate amount of a fine is traditionally treated as a question of law, hence an issue for the judge, and not a question of fact for the jury."); Wheeler, supra note 12, at 302 ("Several efforts have been made to place the responsibility for deciding the size of a punitive damages award on the court and not on the jury."); Note, supra note 26, at 1171 ("Since criminal law has apparently recognized that the judge is more competent to [determine the quantity of punishment], it might be preferable to adopt a similar approach for punitive damages . . . .").

n43 E.g., CAL. CIV. CODE § 3294 (West 1992); see Jewell Hargleroad, Comment, Punitive Damages: The Burden of Proof Required by Procedural Due Process, 22 U.S.F. L. REV. 99, 101-02 (1987) ("[T]he intermediate standard of clear and convincing evidence better serves as the standard for imposition of punitive damages."); Rosenbaum, supra note 7, at 1475 ("One of the most frequently considered and adopted reforms dealing with punitive damages requires the plaintiff to prove liability based on a clear and convincing standard."). For a list of the states adopting this evidentiary standard, see Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 191-92.

n44 See Rosenbaum, supra note 7, at 1476. For a discussion of the states that bifurcate trials for the issue of punitive damages, see Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 198.

n45 Cf. Note, supra note 1, at 524-25 ("One method of avoiding excessive punishment [when the defendant is subject to both tort and criminal actions] would be to allow a judge passing criminal sentence to take into consideration any civil penalties to which the offender had already been subjected.").

REV_00261972

n46 See Wheeler, supra note 12, at 322-51 (proposing that criminal procedural safeguards -- all of the Fourth and Fifth amendments and part of the Sixth Amendment -- should be applied to punitive damage trials).

n47 Robert D. Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 S. CAL. L. REV. 79 (1982) (proposing that punitive damages be limited to intentional conduct and only so much as effectively deters that conduct); Dan B. Dobbs, Ending Punishment in "Punitive" Damages: Deterrence-Measured Remedies, 40 ALA. L. REV. 831 (1989) (arguing that deterrence is the only legitimate goal of punitive damages and proposing an alternative, efficient way to measure damages to deter properly).

n48 See supra note 11.

n49 The Court recently held in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip that "[i]n view of [its] consistent history . . . the common-law method for assessing punitive damages is [not] so inherently unfair as to deny due process and be per se unconstitutional." 111 S. Ct. 1032, 1043 (1991). See also Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 263-64 (1989) (holding that the Excessive Fines Clause does not apply to punitive damages awarded to plaintiffs in private suits).

n50 See Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 199 ("Although punitive damages are controversial, they have served a definite purpose in the American system of civil justice."); Johnston, supra note 41, at 1389 ("[P]unitive liability may in fact be an efficient liability rule despite pervasive imperfections in existing tort institutions.").

n51 Walther & Plein, supra note 11, at 373; see Willis, supra note 6, at 422 ("For any legal injury [the plaintiff] has sustained, the party injured is entitled to just compensation, and no more."); see also id. at 382 ("[T]he function of damages in civil law should be to make the injured party whole, not to confer upon him a profit at the expense of punishment to the defendant.").

n52 Long, supra note 7, at 882 ("The plaintiff, as the incidental recipient, generally has no right to punitive damages but rather receives them only if and as they are awarded by the jury (or by the court in the absence of the jury).").

n53 See infra notes 56-57.

n54 See Long, supra note 7, at 875 ("A few states take the position that punitive damages are exclusively compensatory in purpose and are needed to supplement compensatory damages. Precisely why the supplement is needed and why the awards are still labeled as 'punitive' are among the inscrutable matters of the law.").

n55 See infra part III.

n56 Id. at 878; see also Kink v. Combs, 135 N.W.2d 789, 798 (Wis. 1965) ("By allowing punitive damages the self interest of the plaintiff will lead to prosecution of the claim, while the same self interest of the plaintiff would lead him to refrain from instituting a criminal action at his own expense.").

n57 Owen, supra note 28, at 1287-88 ("[T]he prospect of punitive damages recoveries induces plaintiffs to act as 'private attorneys general' and thereby helps to increase the number of wrongdoers who are properly 'brought to justice.' This assistance is important, for many serious misdeeds deserving of punishment are beyond the reach of the criminal law and the public prosecutor.").

n58 See DAN B. DOBBS, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 221 (1973)

REV_00261973

("The use of punitive damages may thus free the legal system from what otherwise would be a complete dependence upon the official bureaucracy for prosecution of crime.").

n59 Neal v. Newburger Co., 123 So. 861, 863 (Miss. 1929) ("Punitive damages are punishing damages, and are awarded to the injured party as a reward for his public service in bringing the wrongdoer to account.").

n60 See Janigan v. Taylor, 344 F.2d 781, 786 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 879 (1965) ("It is more appropriate to give the defrauded party the benefit even of windfalls than to let the fraudulent party keep them."); Katko v. Briney, 183 N.W.2d 657, 662 (Iowa 1971) ("Although not meant to compensate a plaintiff, the result is to increase his recovery. He is the fortuitous beneficiary of such an award simply because there is no one else to receive it.").

n61 KEETON ET AL., supra note 22, § 2, at 14 ("It is generally agreed that punitive damages are a windfall to the plaintiff and not a matter of right, and that it is always within the discretion of the jury or trial judge to withhold them.").

n62 See infra part III.

n63 In fact, the potential for punitive recovery may lead to overly aggressive plaintiffs and *over*deterrence of tortfeasors. Sales & Cole, supra note 5, at 1156 ("A byproduct of the continual success that plaintiffs have experienced in obtaining large punitive damage awards is the now universal practice of plaintiffs alleging and demanding punitive damages in an effort to increase the ultimate recovery from juries, and to compel defendants to settle meritless cases because of the fear that a jury will return an outrageous punitive damage award."); see TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, supra note 22, at 50 ("[P]unitive damage claims have become a kind of legal lottery, where many plaintiffs' attorneys regularly file claims, recognizing that even if in any one lawsuit their probability of success is small, if enough such claims are filed eventually they may hit the jackpot."); Eliot, supra note 16, at 577 ("There would be fewer damage suits filling up the dockets of our courts with useless, or else unrightful litigation, if plaintiffs could recover only what they have suffered . . . .").

Another potential cost is that paying punitive damages to plaintiffs might encourage risk-seeking behavior. Note, supra note 5, at 1908-09. Potential plaintiffs might decide to take fewer safety precautions, or they might actively seek to become victims of torts, knowing that they have the potential for large punitive recoveries. Id. at 1909. This cost, however, is purely speculative.

n64 BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 283 (6th ed. 1990).

n65 See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 349 (1974) ("States have no substantial interest in securing for plaintiffs . . . gratuitous awards of money damages far in excess of any actual injury."); Sales & Cole, supra note 5, at 1118 ("[A]ctual damages currently recoverable compensate plaintiffs more than adequately for every conceivable element of physical, emotional, or imagined injury.").

n66 See supra note 31; Brewer v. Home-Stake Prod. Co., 434 P.2d 828 (Kan. 1967) (discussing the "American rule," whereby attorneys' fees are not generally recoverable); Chapman & Trebilcock, supra note 14, at 763 (There is a "special kind of injury to dignity in being maliciously, outrageously, or vindictively wronged by someone."); Ellis, supra note 30, at 10-11 (noting that litigation expenses are not typically recoverable); Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 194 ("In many instances the compensatory damages awarded do not fully compensate the injured party.").

n67 See Harold See, Punitive Damages: A Supporting Theory, 40 ALA. L. REV. 1227, 1227

REV_00261974

(1989) ("There would be scant disagreement with a policy of awarding damages, in addition to normal compensatory damages, that are even more fully compensatory in nature (to compensate for litigation costs, inconvenience, injury to dignity, or other social harm)."). Contra Vindictive Damages, supra note 34, at 62 ("If a plaintiff can never get more or less than what will actually compensate him, it is plain that the intention or motive of the wrongdoer ought never to be allowed to intervene to affect the amount recovered."); Judith L. White, Comment, Critical Reappraisal of Punitive Damages Encompassing Attorneys' Fees: Normative Analysis and Pragmatic Concerns, 42 BAYLOR L. REV. 737 (1990) (discussing the historical justifications of both punitive damages and the American rule, and concluding that jurisdictions that allow punitive damages as a substitute for attorneys' fees violate the policy behind both systems).

Another argument for fully compensating plaintiffs relates to the private attorney general rationale: A fully compensated plaintiff is more likely to bring suit. Walther & Plein, supra note 11, at 378, 386 ("Punitive damages do provide rough compensation for the costs of litigation, and facilitate the adjudication of controversies which otherwise would be uneconomical to bring into court.").

n68 See Duffy, supra note 7, at 11 ("Assuming, for the sake of argument, that present procedural rules are incomplete in not providing for litigation expenses, the logical remedy would be to amend and improve the rules of procedure, not tamper with the compensatory function of tort damages.").

n69 See Hargleroad, supra note 43, at 129-30 ("Punitive damages, unlike compensatory damages, do not put plaintiff back in the position where he was or make him whole, but instead constitute an outright confiscation to punish the defendant for being 'bad' or 'evil.'").

n70 Note, supra note 26, at 1175.

n71 See supra note 27.

n72 Ellis, supra note 30, at 29.

n73 Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 P. 119, 122 (Colo. 1884) (emphasis added).

n74 Pegram v. Stortz, 6 S.E. 485, 497 (W. Va. 1888) (stating that just as criminal fines go to the state, "the fine inflicted on the offender in order to protect society, and deter the commission of like crimes, should go to the state, and not to the party against whom the wrong is committed"); Harris, supra note 7, at 28 ("Justice demands change to the end that exemplary damages shall inure to the public instead of the individual, who has already been compensated for loss.").

n75 See supra part II.B.1.b.

n76 See infra part III (recommending that plaintiffs' attorneys be paid a fee to argue the case for punitive damages).

n77 See supra part II.B.1.

n78 See supra part II.B.2.

n79 See, e.g., GA. CODE ANN. § 51-12-5.1 (Michie 1991) (providing that a portion of punitive damages in product liability actions must be paid into the state treasury); COLO. REV. STAT. § 13-21-102 (1991) (providing that a portion of punitive damages must go into the state general fund).

REV_00261975

n80 English, supra note 4, at 76 ("The law should be drafted so that the punitive damage award would be used to deal with the harm caused by the defective product that served as the basis for the underlying action.").

n81 See, e.g., IOWA CODE § 668A.1 (1991) (providing that a portion of punitive damages be paid into a "civil reparations trust fund" for the purposes of indigent civil litigation programs or insurance assistance programs); MO. REV. STAT. § 537.675 (1991) (providing that a portion of punitive damages be paid into the "Tort Victims' Compensation Fund").

n82 See, e.g., DEFENSE RESEARCH INST., supra note 7, app. (proposing that punitive damages be paid into the state treasury and credited to the school fund).

n83 See infra part III.A (proposing that punitive damages liability be heard at a separate post-trial hearing).

n84 Note, supra note 1, at 525 ("Awarding exemplary damages to the state might permit the jury to take a more objective view of the defendant's motives and conduct, divorced from sympathy or distaste for the plaintiff.").

n85 Sensibar, supra note 6, at 387.

n86 Harris, supra note 7, at 27.

n87 Id.

n88 Id.

n89 A similar proposal was made by Justice Shores of the Supreme Court of Alabama in Fuller v. Preferred Risk Life Insurance Co., 577 So. 2d 878, 886-887 (Ala. 1991) (Shores, J., concurring). He suggested that courts (absent legislation) have the discretion to order the defendant "to pay part of the award either to the state general fund or to some special fund that serves a public purpose or advances the cause of justice." Id. at 887. He also suggested that "the plaintiff's attorney fees should be based upon the total verdict, and not the reduced amount paid to the plaintiff, since it is due to the attorney's efforts that the public interest has been served." Id.

This Note disagrees with Justice Shores because his proposal seems to put too much discretion with courts. Punitive damages should be legislatively directed to the state. Legislation has the value of public input, and it is more predictable than judicial discretion. Justice Shores' comments are interesting in that they suggest that courts currently have this discretionary power and that legislation is not needed to take punitive damages out of the hands of plaintiffs.

n90 See Wheeler, supra note 12, at 320-22.

n91 See James D. Ghiardi, Punitive Damage Awards: An Expanded Judicial Role, 39 DEF. L.J. 69, 69 (1990) ("It is the responsibility of the trial judge, in the first instance, to determine whether the case is appropriate for punitive damages, i.e. whether the question of punitive damages will be submitted to the jury.").

n92 See generally Owen, supra note 24, at 52-59 (proposing and defending a bifurcated trial for the issue of punitive damages).

n93 Because the plaintiff is not a party to the punitive damages action, forcing the plaintiff to sit through the punitive damages arguments wastes the plaintiff's time. Bifurcating the trial would avoid this waste. Perhaps bifurcation will sacrifice some judicial economy (because the trier of fact must sit through a second hearing), but little evidence needs to be duplicated in the separate hearing because the record from the underlying trial should be fully admissible and the facts are fresh in the memory of the trier of fact.

REV_00261976

n94 See Johnston, supra note 41, at 1439 ("This argument is that the best approach to tort reform is to create two systems to separately pursue the goals of compensation and deterrence, and that punitive liability can achieve part of the deterrence goal.").

n95 I use "cost" in the economic sense. It includes a reasonable return for the attorney's efforts (the attorney's opportunity cost).

n96 If there are enough such victims of a single tort, plaintiffs' attorneys might also file a class action, even absent the potential for punitive damages.

n97 See JACK H. FRIEDENTHAL ET AL., CIVIL PROCEDURE § 6.3 (1985) (explaining the requirements for being a proper party to a lawsuit, including that the plaintiff be a real party in interest and have standing).

n98 See, e.g., Clay Coalson, Note, Nabours v. Longview Savings and Loan Association: Requiring Actual Damages as a Prerequisite to Recovery of Punitive Damages in an Equitable Action, 24 HOUS. L. REV. 621, 621 (1987) ("[T]he Texas Supreme Court ruled that actual damages must be either recovered or proven before punitive damages can be awarded incident to a suit involving an equitable remedy.").

n99 See Kirk v. Denver Pub. Co., 818 P.2d 262, 265 (Colo. 1991) ("[A] claim for exemplary damages is not 'a separate and distinct cause of action,' but rather 'is auxiliary to an underlying claim for actual damages' and thus can be entered only in conjunction with an underlying and successful claim for actual damages assessed against a wrongdoer for a legal wrong to the injured party.") (citing Palmer v. A.H. Robins Co., 684 P.2d 187, 213-14 (Colo. 1984)).

n100 This assumes that the State will have no direct cause of action against defendants for punitive damages. See Ghiardi and Kircher's checklist, supra note 18. This Note so assumes.

n101 Michael J. Saks, Do We Really Know Anything About the Behavior of the Tort Litigation System?, 140 U. PA. L. REV. 1147, 1190-96 ("[L]awyers usually do not accept a case unless they see an acceptable probability of economic success for themselves in doing so.").

n102 See Note, supra note 5, at 1909-10 (arguing that the plaintiff's windfall recovery encourages too much legal effort to be spent pursuing such actions, leading to a misallocation of legal talent and a waste of legal resources).

n103 This is unlike the decoupling proposal, see infra part III.B.2, which proposes that plaintiffs' attorneys be paid entirely out of punitive damages awards, with plaintiffs contributing nothing.

n104 To discourage frivolous suits -- in which both the potential compensatory and the potential punitive recoveries are small -- the fee paid to plaintiffs' attorneys by the state for arguing for punitive damages should be capped by the total amount of punitive damages. Otherwise the state would move to tap other resources to pay the attorneys' fees in cases in which those fees, less what the plaintiff pays in fees, exceed the punitive recovery.

n105 As do criminal fines, punitive damages serve the purpose of general deterrence in addition to special deterrence. When planning their conduct, potential tortfeasors must consider not only punitive damages they may be forced to pay, but also punitive damages similarly situated tortfeasors have paid in the past, which are a good indicator of the

REV_00261977

II. PUNITIVE DAMAGES SHOULD BE AWARDED TO THE STATE OR A PUBLIC FUND, NOT TO CIVIL PLAINTIFFS

"[I]t must always be remembered that punitive damages by their very nature do not serve to compensate plaintiffs. They are a pure windfall, whose only legitimate purpose is to deter truly outrageous and harmful conduct." [22] Given the noncompensatory nature of punitive damages, the question is: Why give plaintiffs the windfall? [23]

A. PUNITIVE DAMAGES REMAIN A FIXTURE IN CIVIL LAW

Punitive damages remain the subject of extensive debate [24] and constitutional scrutiny, [25] yet states continue to assess them against defendants for several reasons. Some authors and states view the primary [*846] purpose of punitive damages as compensation of plaintiffs, [26] but most consider it to be deterrence of defendants. [27] Punitive damages are meant to punish defendants who would not be adequately punished if forced to pay compensatory damages alone. [28] The theory is that if defendants are not forced to pay the full social cost imposed by their conduct, they will not discontinue that conduct, though it is inefficient and unwanted. [29] Although economists have argued that full compensation creates the [*847] proper incentives for defendants, thus rendering punitive damages unnecessary, [30] others have argued that even given "full" compensation, punitive damages still play an important role as a deterrent. [31]

Shifting part of the task of imposing punitive damages to the criminal law from the civil law has also been proposed, [32] but this too might prove inadequate. [33] First, not all tortious acts subject to punitive damages are criminally punishable. [34] Second, criminal sanctions may not be [*848] sufficiently flexible to permit assessment of fines high enough to deter efficiently. [35] Third, assessing punitive damages at the end of a civil trial seems more efficient in terms of judicial economy. [36]

In recent years, many scholars have proposed and states enacted legislation to control punitive damages. [37] Many of these proposals and enactments aim at making the assessment of punitive damages more certain: [38] Some proposals index punitive damages to compensatory damages [39] or costs; [40] some impose punitive damages caps; [41] and others require judges rather than juries to determine the amount of punitive [*849] awards. [42] Other current proposals and enactments aim at making the assessment of punitive damages more fair: Some increase the burden of proof to "clear and convincing evidence"; [43] some bifurcate the trial and try the issue of punitive damages apart from the underlying case; [44] some impose punitive damages only when the State has chosen not to impose criminal sanctions; [45] and others add procedural protections for defendants that would otherwise be accorded them only in criminal prosecutions. [46] Another type of proposal, not yet officially enacted by any state, aims at making the assessment of punitive damages more efficient by assessing punitive damages only at the appropriate level to deter wrongful conduct efficiently. [47]

[*850] Despite the debate and reforms, punitive damages continue to be assessed in the overwhelming majority of states, [48] and they have consistently survived constitutional scrutiny. [49] This Note assumes that punitive damages will remain a part of civil damages and that they are justified as necessary to deter outrageous and malicious tortfeasors. [50] The practice of awarding punitive damages to plaintiffs, however, should stop.

B. WHY THE STATE, NOT CIVIL PLAINTIFFS, SHOULD BE AWARDED PUNITIVE DAMAGES

1. Plaintiffs Have No Right to Punitive Damages

Deterrence alone does not justify paying punitive damages to civil plaintiffs rather than to someone else -- deterrence can be achieved regardless of the parties to whom punitive potential punitive damages awards likely to be imposed.

REV_00261951

n106 See supra note 31 (discussing Prof. Cooter's "rule of reciprocal"). It should be noted that the defendants who pay the increased punitive damages might object on excessive fines grounds. Defendants might claim that they were sued the very first time they acted outrageously. Defendants might thus argue that it is unfair for them to be punished for the torts of hypothetical unprosecuted tortfeasors.

n107 Even if certain individual tortfeasors are never brought to court, some tortfeasors will be, and the ones that never are still must weigh the chance that they could be brought to court. If punitive penalties are set against those defendants that are brought to court at a level such that the chance (P) of being brought to court (less than 1 but greater than 0) times the amount (Q) of the penalty (correspondingly greater than the harm caused by that defendant on that specific occasion) equals the costs (D) these defendants impose on society (i.e., if $P \times Q = D$), then all tortfeasors will be properly deterred, even those not brought to court. See supra note 31; infra note 180.

n108 ABA REPORT OF THE ACTION COMMISSION, supra note 8, at 19.

n109 See supra note 10.

n110 Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30, 59 (1983) (Rehnquist, J., dissenting) (emphasis added).

n111 Fuller v. Preferred Risk Life Ins. Co., 577 So. 2d 878, 887 (Ala. 1991) (emphasis added).

n112 This Note agrees that plaintiffs who do participate, as in pro se cases, should get a portion of the punitive recovery along with the State. In most cases, though, the plaintiff does not participate, and if a separate hearing is arranged, the plaintiff need not even sit through it; the plaintiff can be dismissed after the case in chief. See supra part III.A. For a discussion of conceptual problems regarding who the attorney's client would be during the punitive damages hearing, see infra part IV.C.

n113 Note, supra note 5, at 1911.

n114 Id. at 1912.

n115 Id. at 1912-14.

n116 See supra note 40; see also Note, supra note 5, at 1914 (discussing the Connecticut rule and how decoupling is a better solution).

n117 See supra note 66. Cf. Herbert M. Kritzer, Searching for Winners in a Loser Pays System, A.B.A. J., Nov. 1992, at 55 (discussing the English rule, whereby the losing party pays the prevailing party's attorney's fees).

n118 The only exception would be if the attorney loses money arguing for the underlying case -- if the state wishes to encourage such suits, then it might choose to pay plaintiffs' attorneys an additional sum to cover losses. See supra text following note 103.

n119 See supra notes 66-68 and accompanying text.

n120 See supra text accompanying notes 100-03.

n121 See infra part IV.B.2.

REV_00261978

n122 See White, supra note 67.

n123 See Kenneth Mann, Punitive Civil Sanctions: The Middleground Between Criminal and Civil Law, 101 YALE L.J. 1795, 1849 (1992) ("As Congress developed new ways to control wrongful behavior, it created new institutional settings for the new powers. The authority of administrative civil sanctions almost always appears in regulatory statutes. Such sanctions, in turn, have come to be one of the main enforcement procedures of administrative agencies."); id. at 1863 ("It is no longer correct to say that administrative agencies only regulate action; administrative agencies also prosecute.").

n124 See Galligan, supra note 23, at 6 n.3 ("Of course a rational system might choose to use an administrative scheme to punish certain wrongdoers or at least to ensure that their conduct does not egregiously fall below certain standards.").

n125 See Long, supra note 7, at 885 ("Still another objection is that, with no meaningful standard available for assessing punitive damages, the size of the award is limited only by the passions and prejudices of the jury and the judicial philosophy of the judges.").

n126 See Wheeler, supra note 12, at 310 ("Regulatory sanctions that did not exist a century ago, such as recalls of unsafe products, may today deter undesirable conduct where the threat of compensatory damages suits and criminal prosecutions would not.").

n127 See BERNARD SCHWARTZ, ADMINISTRATIVE LAW § 2.17 (2d ed. 1984).

n128 This is one reason to keep punitive damages as an aspect of civil damages. If regulatory agencies properly regulated all outrageous conduct, punitive damages wouldn't be needed at all, and the consensus seems to be that punitive damages still are needed. See supra part II.A.

n129 See supra note 11.

n130 See Jones v. Fisher, 166 N.W.2d 175, 183 (Wis. 1969) (Hansen, J., dissenting) ("[W]e do not deal with a matter of plaintiff's rights, but the question of what the public interest requires and what the public policy should permit."); Duffy, supra note 7, at 8 ("Courts almost universally agree that punitive damages are a windfall to the plaintiff, i.e., they are not a matter of right and are awarded or withheld at the discretion of the jury.").

n131 See Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989).

n132 Id. at 264 (emphasis added).

n133 737 F. Supp. 1563 (M.D. Ga. 1990).

n134 Id. at 1565-66.

n135 GA. CODE ANN. § 51-12-5.1(e)(2), quoted in McBride, 737 F. Supp. at 1565.

n136 McBride, 737 F. Supp. at 1579.

n137 See id. at 1569-70, 1576-78.

n138 Id. at 1578.

n139 Id. at 1579.

REV_00261979

n140 See id. at 1577-78.

n141 See id.

n142 See O.W. HOLMES, JR., THE COMMON LAW 44 (Boston, Little, Brown & Co. 1881) ("[T]he general principles of criminal and civil liability are the same . . . .").

n143 For an argument that fines in civil actions do not invoke double jeopardy, see Southern Law Times, supra note 25, at 375 "(And as a civil action does not involve jeopardy, as we have seen above, in the constitutional and generally received sense of that word, there is no constitutional provision prohibiting the awarding of exemplary damages, although the act on which the civil suit is based may also be punishable by a criminal prosecution.").

n144 See U.S. CONST. amend. V ("No person shall . . . be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb . . . .").

n145 This Note makes no comment on whether the due process or equal protection arguments by the McBride court substantiate its holding.

n146 Burke v. Deere & Co., 780 F. Supp. 1225 (S.D. Iowa 1991).

n147 Id. at 1229.

n148 See id. at 1234-35.

n149 IOWA CODE § 668A.1(2)(b), quoted in Burke, 780 F. Supp. at 1242.

n150 See 780 F. Supp. at 1237-43.

n151 Id. at 1242.

n152 Id.

n153 Id.

n154 A counterargument is that defendants might object to paying the State rather than plaintiffs. Paying the State might carry with it more social stigma or moral approbation. If society perceives the payment to be more criminal in nature than civil, then it might hurt the defendant more to pay the State. However, this additional "hurt," if it exists, does not seem to be great enough to invoke the Excessive Fines Clause.

n155 The McBride court discusses the issue of quid pro quo, but only in the context of whether the defendant had standing and whether the act in question was discriminatory, not whether the act violated the Takings Clause. See McBride v. General Motors, 737 F. Supp. 1563, 1575-77 (M.D. Ga. 1990).

n156 585 So. 2d 1033 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1991).

n157 FLA. STAT. ANN. § 768.73(2)(b) (West 1991), quoted in Gordon, 585 So. 2d at 1035 n.1.

n158 Gordon, 585 So. 2d at 1035.

n159 Id.

n160 Id. at 1035-36 (citations omitted).

REV_00261980

n161 Id. at 1036-37.

n162 Id. at 1036.

n163 Id. at 1037.

n164 Id. at 1037 n.9.

n165 Kirk v. Denver Publishing Co., 818 P.2d 262 (Colo. 1991). It is interesting to note that these cases were decided within one month of each other -- Gordon on August 27, 1991, and Kirk on September 23, 1991.

n166 COLO. REV. STAT. ANN. § 13-21-102(4) (West 1991), quoted in Kirk, 818 P.2d at 266.

n167 Kirk, 818 P.2d at 264.

n168 Id. at 267.

n169 Id. at 272.

n170 Id.

n171 See supra notes 12, 16, 51, 52, 61, 69 and accompanying text.

n172 The dissenters in Kirk followed the Gordon majority view and argued that plaintiffs do not have a vested right in punitive damages: "[A] claim for exemplary damages is a statutory right which may be conditioned by the legislature and thus the entire judgment never vested in the plaintiff." Kirk, 818 P.2d at 274 (Rovira, C.J., dissenting).

n173 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 111 S. Ct. 1032 (1991).

n174 Ghiardi, supra note 35, at 197; see TORT POLICY WORKING GROUP, supra note 22, at 82.

n175 Saks, supra note 101, at 1221-22.

n176 See Note, supra note 5, at 1914 (discussing a similar settlement incentive in the "decoupling" proposal).

n177 See id.

n178 See id. at 1915.

n179 See supra notes 32-36 and accompanying text.

n180 See supra notes 31, 107 (discussing variations of Prof. Cooter's "rule of reciprocal").

n181 See Sake, supra note 101, at 1286 ("One obvious solution would be to multiply penalties so that the cost of doing harm discounted by the probability of being held to account for that harm still amounts to a deterrent -- if you are not going to hit often, hit hard."); supra notes 31, 107.

n182 See id.

REV_00261981

n183 See Note, supra note 5, at 1915.

n184 See infra part IV.B.2.

n185 See MODEL RULES OF PROFESSIONAL CONDUCT Rule 1.3 (1983) ("A lawyer shall act with reasonable diligence . . . in representing a client.").

n186 See id. Rule 1.1 (requiring competent representation); id. Rule 1.2(a) ("A lawyer shall abide by a client's decision whether to accept an offer of settlement of a matter."); id. Rule 1.7(b) ("A lawyer shall not represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited . . . by the lawyer's own interests . . . .").

n187 See supra text accompanying note 182.

n188 But see Riewe v. McCormick, 9 N.W. 88, 89-90 (Neb. 1881) ("If it is said that these damages are imposed as a punishment, it is a full and sufficient answer to say that the state inflicts punishment, and not individuals.").

n189 Long, supra note 7, at 889.

n190 Orville Richardson, Punitive Damages: A Common Law Doctrine in Need of Legislative Reform, 16 TRIAL, Mar. 1980, at 31.

n191 See, e.g., DOBBS, supra note 58, § 1.1, at 1 ("There are elements of damages that are not entirely compensatory -- punitive damages for example. . . . [I]t must be recognized that the damages remedy is not wholly compensatory, even though compensation is professedly its main purpose.") (emphasis added).

n192 See id. § 3.9, at 205 ("The main theory in support of the punitive or exemplary award is that it will operate to punish and to set an example that will deter similar conduct in the future.").

n193 See supra part II.B.2.

n194 See supra part II.B.1.b.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:10 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00261982

damages awards are payable. Although courts generally acknowledge that punitive damages "are not available as a matter of right to any plaintiff" [51] and that the trier of fact has complete discretion as to whether it will award punitive damages to the plaintiff, [52] two justifications are generally given for awarding punitive damages to plaintiffs anyway: (1) as an incentive to bring defendants to justice (the "private attorney general" rationale) [53] and (2) as compensation for otherwise uncompensable losses (the "compensation" rationale). [54] Both justifications, however, are flawed. The private attorney general rationale is one of expediency; it does not vest in plaintiffs any "right" to punitive damages. This Note proposes an alternative means to [*851] bring defendants to justice. [55] And the compensation rationale is inappropriate; compensation should be achieved through compensatory damages alone. If some entity must be compensated for the malicious, aggravated, or outrageous conduct of the defendant, it should be society rather than the plaintiff.

a. The private attorney general rationale does not vest in plaintiffs any right to punitive damages: The private attorney general rationale suggests that the "[a]vailability of punitive damages may make it worthwhile for plaintiffs to sue defendants who should be sued but who, in the absence of punitive awards, would not be, because of the trifling nature of the actual damages suffered by the plaintiff." [56] These private attorneys general bring to justice those wrongdoers who would not otherwise be prosecuted, [57] and they relieve an already overburdened criminal justice system. [58] Society pays punitive damages to plaintiffs as an incentive for them to perform this service. [59]

Therefore, plaintiffs are paid punitive damages as a matter of expediency only [60] -- not because they have an inherent right to receive such payments. [61] If society identifies a better "attorney general" [62] or decides that paying plaintiffs to perform this service is too costly, [63] then society [*852] would have no reason or obligation to continue paying punitive damages to plaintiffs.

b. The compensation rationale is inappropriate: "Compensation" has been defined as "[t]hat which is necessary to restore an injured party to his former position." [64] The compensation rationale for punitive damages is inappropriate because plaintiffs should be fully compensated for all damages, special and general, by compensatory damages alone. [65] If plaintiffs are not fully compensated (and for a variety of reasons this may be the case) [66] and it is thought that they should be, [67] then the system of [*853] compensatory damages should be revised: Courts should not hide this recovery in the guise of punitive damages. [68] "Punitive" damages are to punish, not to compensate. [69] "By using punitive damages to increase compensation in cases where punitive damages are otherwise unnecessary, courts would be merely awarding two categories of compensatory damages. It seems preferable to expand the law of compensatory damages . . . ." [70]

2. Although Punitive Damages Are Assessed to Deter, The Extra Harm Inflicted by Defendants' Outrageous Conduct Is Borne by Society Generally, Not by Plaintiffs Alone

Although deterrence appears to be the primary justification for assessing punitive damages, [71] if punitive damages were paid to the State, they would serve to compensate society for societal harm inflicted by defendants' outrageous conduct. "[L]osses to the public caused by breaches of the peace also may be included within the category of societal losses for which compensatory damages provide no remedy. Injuries animated by malice, and even some that result from reckless conduct, may provoke a sense of [societal] outrage . . . ." [72] "Who will undertake to give a valid reason why plaintiff, after being fully paid for all the injury inflicted upon his property, body, reputation, and feelings, should still be compensated, above and beyond, for a wrong committed against the public at large?" [73] If anyone has a compensatory right to punitive damages, it is society. [74]

[*854] 3. Society Could Put Punitive Damages to Better Use

REV_00261952

Assuming that plaintiffs should be compensated for their losses with only compensatory damages, [75] that defendants will still be required to pay for their outrageous conduct, [76] and that plaintiffs have no moral or legal right to punitive damages, [77] then there is no compelling reason to award punitive damages to plaintiffs rather than to society.

Apart from having a direct claim of right to punitive damages, [78] society could put punitive damages awards to better use than allowing individual civil plaintiffs windfall recoveries. For instance, the State could deposit the money into its general treasury. [79] The funds could then be used directly to regulate the misconduct for which the punitive damages were assessed, [80] thus more directly deterring such misconduct, or the funds could be used to relieve the tax burden on all the state's taxpayers. Alternatively, society could create a special fund for a deserving cause -- possibly a cause related to the reason punitive damages were assessed (such as a tort victims' relief fund) [81] or one otherwise needing funds (such as a school fund). [82] The state need not limit those benefiting from punitive damages to one class of citizens -- civil plaintiffs.

4. Juries May Be More Objective

If the issue of punitive damages is heard apart from the plaintiff's underlying claims, [83] the finder of fact can concentrate on the defendant's [*855] conduct without undue sympathy for or against the plaintiff. Perhaps the trier of fact will be more objective under such circumstances. [84]

Some authorities, however, come to the opposite conclusion. Perhaps the finder of fact who, under a scheme awarding punitive damages to society, has a personal stake in the punitive damages award will be less objective: "If jurors realized that any punitive damage award were to be returned to public use, the size of awards would not simply skyrocket. They would follow the Voyager spacecraft out of the solar system." [85]

Others have argued that such a result may be desirable -- permitting higher punitive damages awards may be good. The argument is that juries generally award insufficient punitive damages because they know the money goes to plaintiffs, and juries do not want to give plaintiffs a windfall: "[I]f the jurors know the award is in favor of the State, in the nature of a penalty for punitive conduct, they would be more likely to award exemplary damages in a deserving case." [86] Efficient deterrence requires not only that defendants not be required to pay too much, but also that defendants not be allowed to pay too little.

If the judge rather than the jury determines the amount of punitive damages, the bias arguments (whichever way they go) may have less impact because judges are practiced at being, and are required to be, unbiased. But even if juries are allowed to assess punitive damages, the harm from extravagant jury awards should not be great. States are currently allowed to sue on their own behalf in civil actions (for example, if a reckless driver runs into and damages the state capital building), and juries are allowed to assess the damages. Although allowing the judge to assess punitive damages might correct for jury bias, whether juries would be less biased, more biased, equally biased, or unbiased if punitive damages were awarded to the state is unclear. The bias arguments should not determine whether the state should receive punitive damages awards. Punitive damages should be awarded to society because (1) plaintiffs have no right to punitive damages, (2) society is directly harmed by defendants' outrageous conduct, and (3) society could put punitive damages awards to better use.

[*856] III. THE STATE SHOULD PAY PLAINTIFFS' ATTORNEYS TO ARGUE THE CASE FOR PUNITIVE DAMAGES

One significant problem remains: If plaintiffs do not receive punitive damages awards, who will argue the case for punitive damages? The answer is to pay plaintiffs' attorneys a fee or portion of the award to perform this function for society.

REV_00261953

A. PLAINTIFFS' ATTORNEYS AS PUNITIVE DAMAGES ADVOCATES

Rather than awarding plaintiffs any portion of punitive damages awards, the State should pay plaintiffs' attorneys a fee or compensation for seeking punitive damages. This solution was proposed a decade ago by Judge Carmon C. Harris in a short article entitled Exemplary Damages to the Public. [87] Although Judge Harris did not discuss the administrative and constitutional problems inherent in the proposal, she suggested the following legislation:

Exemplary damages awarded to any party in a civil action shall be paid to the clerk of the Court [to be paid to the state] . . . .

The Court shall fix a reasonable attorney fee for the attorney representing the party recovering the judgment for exemplary damages, which fee shall be paid by the Court Clerk out of the amount paid in satisfaction of the judgment for exemplary damages. [88]
This Note supports Judge Harris' proposal that punitive damages should be awarded to the State (or a state-administered fund), less reasonable fees to be paid to plaintiffs' attorneys. [89]

To implement this solution, courts should bifurcate the trial. [90] The issues of liability and compensatory damages should be decided first, after which the plaintiff should be dismissed from the case. If a plaintiff [*857] wins on the issue of liability, then the plaintiff's attorney may move the court to schedule a hearing at which the parties can present additional evidence and argue the merits of awarding punitive damages. [91] If punitive damages are awarded, the court should award a reasonable fee to the plaintiff's attorney, and the balance should be paid into the state treasury or a special state-administered fund.

Holding a separate punitive damages hearing has several advantages. [92] First, the plaintiff is not a party to the punitive damages issue, so separating the fault and punitive damages issues sacrifices little economy. [93] Furthermore, the issue of liability for punitive damages is different and separate from the issue of compensatory damages. Not only is the standard of fault different (the plaintiff must prove outrageous or malicious behavior to get punitive damages, while proof of mere negligence is generally sufficient to establish tort liability and to get compensatory damages), but so is the measure of damages (punitive damages should be assessed to deter efficiently, while compensatory damages should be assessed to compensate fully). Requiring a separate punitive damages hearing would more clearly sever these issues. [94]

One objection to this proposal, paying plaintiffs' attorneys to argue the case for punitive damages, is that, absent the potential for punitive recovery, those plaintiffs with very low real damages will not initiate costly lawsuits against outrageous tortfeasors. The availability of contingency fee arrangements, however, may rebut this objection in some cases. For plaintiffs with minimal damages, attorneys might be willing to work on a contingency basis if a potential for punitive recovery exists, even if doing so would be uneconomical absent punitive damages. If plaintiffs can file suit without paying attorneys' fees, they might do so even for very low potential compensatory recoveries. For example, assume that [*858] the expected compensatory damages are $ 1500, expected punitive damages are $ 10,000, the attorney's expected costs through trial are $ 1500, and the attorney's total expected costs through a punitive damages hearing are $ 2000. If the attorney does not participate in the punitive damages hearing and has no right to a portion of the punitive damages recovery, then the attorney would take the case only on a 100% contingency basis because otherwise the expected legal costs would exceed the expected compensatory damages. Of course, very few plaintiffs would agree to such an arrangement. Assume, though, that the law allowed the plaintiff's attorney to recover a portion of the potential punitive damages award to cover costs. If the attorney took the case on a one-third contingency basis, the attorney would expect to be paid $ 500 out of compensatory damages (with the plaintiff retaining $ 1000) plus a portion of the punitive damages award, which would have to be at least $ 1500 in order to cover the attorney's total costs. Therefore, the plaintiff would have an incentive to file suit (to receive a net award of $ 1000), and the plaintiff's attorney would have an incentive to argue the plaintiff's case. [95] The defendant is brought to court just as if the plaintiff were paid the punitive damages, [96] yet society has a net gain of the difference between the punitive damages award and the portion of that award paid to the plaintiff's attorney. In this case, that gain is about $ 8500.

REV_00261954

Still, some plaintiffs with very low real damages will not file suit if they cannot anticipate collecting punitive damages personally. Contingency fee arrangements make filing lawsuits easier for some plaintiffs who would otherwise not file, but filings are not entirely costless. Plaintiffs must still spend time and effort in discovery (such as attending depositions or medical examinations), meeting with counsel, reviewing legal documents, and attending court hearings. Even in class action suits, representative plaintiffs are required to participate. [97] Furthermore, many jurisdictions require that plaintiffs prove actual damages before punitives are allowed, [98] and when damages are very low, proving actual damages [*859] may be difficult. If plaintiffs do not file suit, plaintiffs' attorneys will have no forum in which to argue for punitive damages, [99] and some outrageous or malicious tortfeasors will escape without paying damages. [100] It should be noted, however, that cases of very low damages, even if widespread, may not be of the type for which juries would award punitive damages in the first place. Therefore, this problem may be insignificant.

Another issue to consider is the amount of the fee that plaintiffs' attorneys should be paid to argue the case for punitive damages. If the fee paid plaintiffs' attorneys is limited to compensation for their time and effort in arguing the issue of punitive damages, the attorney in the above hypothetical would be paid only $ 500 for the extra efforts involved in arguing the punitive damages claim. Nothing gives the attorney an incentive to accept the plaintiff's case in the first place because, again assuming a one-third contingency fee arrangement, the attorney would recover only $ 1000 after spending a total of $ 2000. If the attorney expects to lose money arguing for the underlying case (that is, if the attorney's expected fee from the plaintiff is less than expected costs through trial), the profit-maximizing attorney will not accept the case even if society offers to compensate the attorney's costs incurred in arguing for punitive damages. [101] Though the benefit of this is that fewer cases would be brought to court, thereby saving court costs, [102] the detriment is that fewer defendants would be brought to court to pay for the harm they have caused. One way to balance these considerations is to pay the plaintiff's attorney the difference between the attorney's total costs and the fees paid directly by the plaintiff (which, to deter abuse, might have to be set by statute, perhaps at a one-third contingency), as suggested in the above hypothetical. This scheme would enable all plaintiffs who suffer harm from outrageous conduct to afford legal fees, thus [*860] bringing more tortfeasors to court, yet plaintiffs would still have to contribute toward the cost of litigation. [103] Society would benefit both from the increased deterrence of outrageous conduct and from receiving more punitive damages awards. [104]

A criticism of the above approach is that it does not consider that sometimes juries (and judges) decline to award punitive damages; sometimes plaintiffs' attorneys lose at the punitive damages hearing, even if the arguments in favor of punitive damages are not frivolous. If plaintiffs' attorneys are paid only the amount of their costs and only if they win, they will argue for punitive damages only when the chance of winning is 100%. Otherwise, their expected recovery (which equals the amount of recovery (C) times the probability of recovering (P)) would be lower than their expected costs (C). In other words, if P is less than 100%, then $P \times C < C$. Because the chance of winning punitive damages is always less than 100% (because the issue is always subject to the discretion of the trier of fact), plaintiffs' attorneys would never argue the issue, and defendants would never have to pay punitive damages. Therefore, when society determines the amount of the plaintiff's attorney's costs in punitive damages cases, some factor must be built in to cover the cost of uncertainty (for example, attorneys could be awarded double costs), or society could pay plaintiff's attorneys every time they argue for punitive damages, whether they win or lose. To deter abuse of this latter method, the State could require plaintiffs' attorneys to get approval from the judge on motion before being allowed to argue for punitive damages. The former proposal seems more desirable because it would avoid the need for the state to tap funds from other sources to pay those plaintiffs' attorneys who lose at the punitive damages hearing. The State can set the uncertainty cost based on the incentives society wishes to give plaintiffs' attorneys. If the factor is set low, only suits with a high probability of success will be brought for punitive damages. If it is set high, then more suits will be brought. After experience under such a system, the State can change the factor and adjust the incentives.

REV_00261955

Even if this proposal would prevent some cases from being filed that would be brought to court if plaintiffs were paid punitive damages, there [*861] is another way to create the proper incentives for defendants: When tortfeasors (or others like them) are finally brought to court, [105] as they probably will be if they continue to act outrageously, judges can make them pay an amount greater than they would otherwise pay if they had always been brought to court, thus creating the proper incentives. [106] The risk of being subject to additional punitive damages should counterbalance the decreased risk of being brought to court. [107] An added benefit of bringing defendants to court less often is saved litigation costs, both for the parties and for the court system. Efficient deterrence can still be achieved if courts assess punitive damages in the proper amount.

In conclusion, paying plaintiffs' attorneys a fee out of punitive damages awards to encourage them to argue for such awards is a viable solution to the problem of advocacy. Society can encourage plaintiffs and plaintiffs' attorneys to bring more or fewer defendants who are subject to punitive liability to court by adjusting the fee paid to plaintiffs' attorneys. Society will no longer have an incentive to pay plaintiffs to be our private attorneys general, and the bulk of punitive damages awards can be used to benefit society generally.

B. OTHER PROPOSALS

1. The ABA Proposal

The American Bar Association has proposed a compromise solution to the windfall problem: "After deducting costs and expenses, the court should determine what is a reasonable portion of the punitive damages award to compensate the plaintiff and counsel for bringing the action and prosecuting the punitive damages claim, with the balance of that award [*862] allocated to public purposes." [108] Such legislation has been enacted in several states. [109] The most important benefit of such reform is that the State gets a significant portion of punitive damages without any extra work.

Because plaintiffs still get part of the punitive damages award, it is clear that the ABA proposal only partially accepts the windfall theory. The windfall argument is that "[p]unitive damages are generally seen as a windfall to plaintiffs, who are entitled to receive full compensation for their injuries -- but no more." [110] Assuming that plaintiffs are fully compensated (to the extent society chooses to compensate them) with compensatory damages, recovering even a portion of punitive damages is a windfall. "[I]t is due to the attorney's efforts that the public interest has been served" [111] -- not the plaintiff's efforts. [112] Awarding the plaintiff any part of the punitive recovery is a pure windfall, while awarding it to the plaintiff's attorney is not.

From a practical standpoint, the ABA proposal is more costly to the State than merely paying the plaintiff's attorney to argue for punitive damages, as suggested herein. Any portion of a punitive damages award that the plaintiff retains after attorney's fees directly lowers the amount retained by the state. For example, if an attorney's cost to argue for punitive damages is $ 5000, the State would have to award the plaintiff with a one-third contingency arrangement $ 15,000 in order to award the attorney $ 5000. Therefore, if a portion of the punitive damages award goes to the plaintiff, that portion would have to be much greater ($ 15,000) than if a portion of the award goes only to the plaintiff's attorney (where $ 5000 would be a sufficient incentive for the attorney to argue for punitive damages). A similar analysis applies if plaintiffs' attorneys are paid a flat fee or if the fee is based on the attorneys' time expended. In any event, if the plaintiff is paid the fee rather than the plaintiff's attorney, the fee will have to be higher so that the plaintiff can receive a premium after paying a portion of the award to counsel. Without the premium, plaintiffs would have no incentive to have their attorneys argue [*863] for punitive damages. The State would therefore save money by paying only plaintiffs' attorneys, and plaintiffs would not receive a windfall.

REV_00261956

2. Decoupling

A recent Harvard Law Review note proposes that courts "decouple" defendants' liability from plaintiffs' awards, thereby permitting courts to attack the problems of deterring defendants and of compensating plaintiffs separately. [113] Defendants would be required to pay the same amount of punitive damages as they would under the current system, but plaintiffs would recover only compensatory damages plus the costs of litigation, with the State retaining the balance. [114] Decoupling would thus eliminate the plaintiff's windfall and the problems associated with it, and yet would allow the courts to assess a sufficiently high penalty to deter defendants adequately. [115]

This approach eliminates the plaintiff's windfall, a result with which this Note agrees, but it also seems to eliminate plaintiffs' incentive to have their attorneys argue the case for punitive damages. Plaintiffs would have no incentive to sponsor litigation that has a net return of zero. If a plaintiff would recover compensatory damages without paying counsel to argue for punitive damages or spending the time and effort involved in litigation, then that plaintiff would have no incentive to have an attorney argue for punitive damages because the attorney would recover only litigation costs. If the State pays the same amount to the attorney directly, then the attorney would have an incentive to argue for punitive damages because the attorney would recover a fee for doing so. Therefore, the better solution is to pay plaintiffs' attorneys directly.

The foregoing critique, however, assumes that only the extra litigation costs involved in arguing for punitive damages would be awarded to the plaintiff under a decoupling scheme. If all litigation costs would be paid under the decoupling proposal, then plaintiffs would have a good incentive to have their attorneys argue for punitive damages. This solution would be consistent with the "Connecticut rule," which limits the plaintiff's punitive damages recovery to the costs of litigation. [116] Yet, [*864] unlike the Connecticut rule, defendants would be required to pay plaintiffs punitive damages in addition to litigation costs, with the state retaining the balance. This solution, however, would be contrary to the "American rule," which requires that the parties to a lawsuit pay their own litigation costs. [117] Perhaps awarding litigation costs only when punitive liability is proven is justifiable; perhaps the American rule makes less sense when defendants act outrageously. If full compensation is the concern, however, plaintiffs should be awarded litigation costs in all suits -- whether or not punitive liability is proven.

This Note avoids the debate over the American rule by proposing that plaintiffs' attorneys be paid directly only for their costs in arguing the case for punitive damages. [118] The effort involved is that of the attorney, and the plaintiff need not participate. Whether or not plaintiffs should recover litigation costs for the underlying suit when punitive liability is proven should be the subject of further discussion, [119] the outcome of which, however, does not affect this Note's proposal.

Decoupling would also result in the State recovering a smaller share of punitive damages

REV_00261957

20 of 100 DOCUMENTS

Copyright (c) 1997 New York Law School Law Review
New York Law School Law Review

1997

41 N.Y.L. Sch. L. Rev. 431

LENGTH: 10247 words

THE FEDERALIST SOCIETY: CONFERENCE: CIVIL JUSTICE AND THE LITIGATION PROCESS: DO THE MERITS AND THE SEARCH FOR TRUTH MATTER ANYMORE?: CONFERENCE DIALOGUE: DAY ONE: LUNCHEON DEBATE: CIVIL JUSTICE AND THE PLAINTIFFS' BAR

The Honorable Edward R. Becker, Moderator, * Theodore Olson  & Philip Corboy ***

* Judge, United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

 Attorney, Litigation Department of the Washington, D.C., office of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher. Mr. Olson is also the President of the Washington, D.C., Chapter of the Lawyers Division of the Federalist Society and a member of the legal advisory committees for the National Legal Center for the Public Interest, the Washington Legal Foundation, and the Center for Individual Rights.

 Founding partner of Corboy & Demetrio. Mr. Corboy has served as President of the Chicago Bar Association and the Illinois Trial Lawyers Association, as well as a member of the American Bar Association's House of Delegates and Chairman of its Section of Litigation.

SUMMARY:
... THE HONORABLE EDWARD BECKER: This program confronts the overarching question of whether the tort system is working and whether it serves the search for truth. ... In California, the top contribution rate was $ 225,000 per year. ... However, if you do not like the civil justice system that they are supporting, and the polls tell us that up as much as seventy-five to eighty-five percent of the people in this country want a change in the tort system, then you need to change the current scheme. ... "Why are you still a Democrat?" ... Its membership includes the Product Liability Coordinating Policy Committee, which has a budget of $ 3 million a year for the tort reform debate. ... It showed that the pro-tort reform political action committees contributed $ 22 million to the United States Senate. ... Corporate America is doing pretty well, despite this tort system. ... Now there is nothing wrong with wanting more money, but the simple fact of the matter is that there is nothing wrong with the tort system. ... The Republican legislators in the federal government want to federalize the tort system, but they do not want to make a federal question out of it. ... I have a chart that shows punitive damage awards affirmed on appeal over a seven-year period, 1987 to 1993, in Georgia, Mississippi, Tennessee and Alabama. ...

TEXT:

[*431] I. OPENING

THE HONORABLE EDWARD BECKER: This program confronts the overarching question of whether the tort system is working and whether it serves the search for truth. This Debate, entitled "Civil Justice and the Plaintiff's Bar," should help to crystalize these issues. It will be a real treat, I promise you, for we are fortunate to have as our presenters two of America's very best lawyers, Ted Olson and Phil Corboy.

Our first speaker will be Ted Olson, a partner in the Washington office of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, who is unquestionably one of the nation's premier appellate litigators. During the last term of the Supreme Court, Mr. Olson argued three cases, which must be some kind of a record for a lawyer in private practice. He argued the Stacy Koon case, n1 now the leading case on review of departures under the sentencing

I have a chart that shows punitive damage awards affirmed on appeal over a seven-year period, 1987 to 1993, in Georgia, Mississippi, Tennessee and Alabama. The total amount in that period was $ 7 million in Georgia, $ 3 million in Mississippi, $ 5 million in Tennessee, and $ 101 million in Alabama. n81 I suspect that if there is a possibility for a plaintiff to bring the lawsuit in any one of the four states, the plaintiff would be crazy not to bring the case in Alabama. This is probably why the BMW cases n82 were being brought in Alabama and not in the neighboring states.

Again, as far as the settlement figure, it is very difficult to get empirical data. I am sure that in Barbour County, Alabama, n83 where practically everybody has either been a punitive damage plaintiff or is related to someone who has been, and where fifty-two percent of the cases brought are by the same law firm, the immense jury awards affect a settlement in every single case.

[*451] MR. CORBOY: The potential for recovery stimulates a settlement somewhere in the range of ten or fifteen percent of the time if the lawyer knows what he is doing. If the lawyer does not know what he is doing, the case is going to go to trial, and they are going to lose or have a ninety percent chance of losing. Obviously, the settlement climate or the jury verdict climate has something to do with the amount of settlements in any jurisdiction.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 See Koon v. United States, 116 S. Ct. 2035 (1996).

n2 See United States v. Virginia, 116 S. Ct. 2264 (1996).

n3 See Gasperini v. Center for Humanities, Inc., 116 S. Ct. 2211 (1996).

n4 See Theodore B. Olson, The Parasitic Destruction of America's Civil Justice System, 47 SMU L. REV. 359 (1994).

n5 The Tylenol litigation commenced in 1982, after seven people in the Chicago area were killed after ingesting cyanide-laced Tylenol capsules. Johnson & Johnson settled the lawsuits for an undisclosed amount in May 1991, on the day that jury selection was set to begin for trial at Cook County Circuit Court in Illinois. Philip H. Corboy was co-counsel for the families of the victims. See Lourdes Lee Valeriano, Johnson & Johnson Settles Suits Tied to Tylenol Deaths, WALL ST. J., May 14, 1991, at B6; Andrew Blum & Randall Samborn, Tylenol Settlement Revives Secrecy War, NAT'L L.J., May 27, 1991, at 3.

n6 See In re Air Crash Disaster at Sioux City, 631 N.E.2d 1302 (Ill. App. Ct. 1994).

n7 See, e.g., Philip H. Corboy, Cross-examination: Walking the Line Between Proper Prejudice and Unethical Conduct, 10 AM. J. TRIAL ADVOC. 1 (1986); Philip H. Corboy & Susan J. Schwartz, Going the Distance: How to Perfect the Trial Record and Win on Appeal, A.B.A. J., Apr. 1990, at 80; Philip Corboy, No: It's Already Covered, A.B.A. J., Jan. 1992, at 35; Philip H. Corboy, The Not-So-Quiet Revolution: Rebuilding Barriers to Jury Trial in the Proposed Restatement (Third) of Torts: Products Liability, 61 TENN. L. REV. 1043 (1994); Philip H. Corboy, Vicarious Liability for Punitive Damages: The Effort to Constitutionalize "Tort Reform," 2 SETON HALL CONST. L.J. 5 (1991); Philip H. Corboy, "Reform" and Constitutional Change, LITIG., Fall 1993, at 22.

n8 See Leslie Spencer, America's Third Political Party?, FORBES, Oct. 24, 1994, at 60.

n9 See id.

n10 See id.

n11 See id.

n12 See AMERICAN TORT REFORM ASS'N, CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS TO CONGRESSIONAL CANDIDATES BY PLAINTIFFS' LAWYER INDUSTRY: 1989-1994, at 2 (1995) [hereinafter 1995 ATRA REPORT] (explaining that plaintiffs' lawyers contributed $ 30,939,319 for federal races while the five largest labor unions (AFSCME, Teamsters, United Auto Workers, National Education Association, AFL-CIO) in total contributed $ 29,727,165).

n13 See Spencer, supra note 8.

n14 See 1995 ATRA REPORT, supra note 12, at 5 (listing all Democrats with the exception of Republican Sen. Charles Tanksley of Georgia).

n15 See AMERICAN TORT REFORM ASS'N, "AMERICA'S THIRD POLITICAL PARTY;" A STUDY OF POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS BY THE PLAINTIFF'S LAWYER INDUSTRY 10 (1994) (listing the average contribution rate of $ 147,763 for a five year period).

n16 See id. at 12.

n17 See id.

n18 See id. at 11 (listing the average contribution rate of $ 228,799 for a five year period).

n19 See id. at 13.

n20 See id.

n21 See Ruth Marcus, Study Traces Sources of Record Fund-Raising by Clinton and Dole, WASH. POST, Aug. 23, 1996, at A9.

n22 See id.

n23 Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Pub. L. No. 104-67, 109 Stat. 737 (to be codified in scattered sections of 15 U.S.C.).

n24 See id.; see also Norman B. Arnoff, The Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, N.Y. L.J., Oct. 8, 1996, at 3.

n25 See Common Sense Legal Standards Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 956, 104th Cong. (1995); see also 142 CONG. REC. H4425 (daily ed. May 6, 1996) (veto message from President Clinton).

n26 See Brigid McMenamin, The Best-Paid Lawyers, FORBES, Nov. 6, 1995, at 145.

n27 See id. at 168.

n28 See id. at 162, 166 (listing Philip Corboy at number 10 and Thomas Demetrio at number 17).

n29 See McMenamin, supra note 26, at 145; Spencer, supra note 8, at 60.

n30 See McMenamin, supra note 26, at 165.

n31 See id.

n32 See McDonald's Settles Lawsuit over Burn from Coffee, WALL ST. J., Dec. 2, 1994, at B6.

n33 See Parker v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 629 So. 2d. 1026 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1993).

n34 See BMW of N. Am., Inc., v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n35 See JAMES KAKALIK & NICHOLAS PACE, COSTS AND COMPENSATION PAID IN TORT LITIGATION vii (1986) (noting that of the $ 29 to $ 36 billion in total expenditures nationwide for tort litigation terminated in state and federal courts of general jurisdiction in 1985, an estimated $ 16 to $ 19 billion was spent for various costs of the tort litigation system, not including the net compensation paid to plaintiffs).

n36 See id. at x fig.s.1.

n37 See Martha Middleton, A Changing Landscape, A.B.A. J., Aug. 1995, at 60 (quoting a representative of the ABA who called any federal litigation curtailing product liability "an unwise and unnecessary intrusion of massive proportions").

n38 See Leslie Spencer, The Tort Tax, FORBES, Feb. 17, 1992, at 40, 42.

n39 See id. at 40-42 (discussing the direct and indirect costs of the tort system).

n40 See id. at 40.

n41 See Dr. Gore and Mr. Slick, WALL ST. J., Oct. 11, 1995, at A14 (noting punitive damages of $ 409,385).

n42 See id. (noting punitive damages of $ 90,366,527 for the years 1989-93).

n43 See Brief Amicus Curiae in Support of Petitioner, BMW of N. Am., Inc., v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996) (No. 94-896) (citing S. TURNER, WASHINGTON LEGAL FOUND., PUNITIVE DAMAGES EXPLOSION: FACT OR FICTION B-7 (1992)).

n44 See id.

n45 See George L. Priest, Punitive Damages Reform: The Case of Alabama, 56 LA. L. REV. 825, 828 (1996).

n46 See id. at 829.

n47 See Spencer Abraham & Mitch McConnell, The Next Steps in Real Tort Reform, WASH. TIMES, May 3, 1995, at A17.

n48 See Lawyer on the Front Lines in Battle over Tort Reform, USA TODAY, Dec. 12, 1995, at 2A.

n49 See Lyle Denniston, In Attacking Lawyers, Bush and Quayle Enter Culture War, BALTIMORE SUN, Sept. 6, 1992, at 51 (describing the Manhattan Institution for Policy Research as a vocal critic of personal injury lawsuits).

n50 For Peter Huber's participation in The Federalist Society Conference, see Peter Huber, Whose Gore Is Stalked?, 41 N.Y.L. SCH. L. REV. 419 (1997).

n51 See Denniston, supra note 49 (describing Mr. Huber as a critic of challenges to the tort system); see also PETER HUBER, GALLILEO'S REVENGE, JUNK SCIENCE IN THE COURTROOM (1991); PETER HUBER, LIABILITY: THE LEGAL REVOLUTION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES (1988); Peter Huber, A Preemptive Strike Against the Tort Bar, FORBES, July 6, 1992, at 104; Peter Huber, Malpractice Law-A Defective Product, FORBES, Apr. 16, 1990, at 154.

n52 See Glenn Collins, A Tobacco Case's Legal Buccaneers, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 6, 1995, at D1; Marcia Coyle, New Jury Verdict Role for Courts, NAT'L L.J., July 8, 1996, at A22; Anthony Ramirez, Consumer Crusader Feels a Chill in Washington, N.Y. TIMES., Dec. 31, 1995, § 3, at 10.

n53 See Accounts Change a Rule, N.Y. TIMES, Jan. 16, 1992, at D6 (noting an AICPA rule change which "could make it harder to sue accountants for wrongdoing").

n54 See H.B. 20, P.A. 89-7, 85th Gen. Assembly, 1995 Ill. Legis. Serv. 224 (West). The Civil Justice Reform Amendments, which, in part, limit punitive damages to three times economic damages, create $ 500,000 caps on noneconomic damages and abolish joint liability when one or more defendants cannot pay a judgment. See id.

n55 See 1995 ATRA REPORT, supra note 12, at 1 (noting that "between January, 1989 and December, 1994, individual plaintiff's lawyer contributions reviewed to all Congressional candidates totaled $ 18,066,433 . . . This figure, combined with ATLA PAC receipts of $ 12,872,886 over the same period . . . comes to $ 30,939,319 in total contributions from plaintiff's lawyers for Federal races.").

n56 See id. at 4 (listing the "Top 50 Plaintiff's Lawyer Contributions," including $ 199,600 from the law firm of Corboy & Demetrio of Illinois).

n57 See Federal Election Commission's Individual Contributions Report, Aug. 2, 1996, at 1, available in LEXIS, Cmpgn Library, Memfin File. For the 1995-96 election cycle, as of Aug. 2, 1996, Shuster's campaign received $ 451,876 from 664 listed individuals, of which approximately 46%, or approximately 304 individuals, were from outside Shuster's home state of Pennsylvania. See id. The total includes some individuals who are listed twice, including two $ 1000 contributions from Theodore B. Olson. See id.

n58 See id.

n59 See Douglas Martin, That Upside-Down High Will Be Only a Memory; Monkey Bars Fall to Safety

Pressures, N.Y. TIMES, Apr. 11, 1996, at B1.

n60 See Fred Musante, Liability Costs Curb Recreation, N.Y. TIMES, Sept. 22, 1996, § 13 (Conn.), at 1.

n61 See Tamar Lewin, Fears, Suits and Regulations Stall Contraceptive Advances, N.Y. TIMES, Dec. 27, 1995, at A1.

n62 See Abraham & McConnell, supra note 47.

n63 See generally Joel E. Smith, Annotation, Recovery of Exemplary or Punitive Damages From Municipal Corporation, 1 A.L.R. 448 (4th ed. 1996) (discussing treatment in various jurisdictions and noting generally that "while courts have not favored the recovery of punitive damages against a municipal corporation" the presence of a statute expressly authorizing or denying recovery is a controlling factor).

n64 See Edward Felsenthal, Punitive Awards Are Called Modest, Rare, WALL ST. J., June 17, 1996, at B4.

n65 See id.

n66 See Center for Responsive Politics, Press Release, Liability Amendments Benefit Health Care Industries 1 (May 2, 1995) (on file with the New York Law School Law Review) (noting that over five years ATLA contributed $ 930,750 to Senate candidates, while interests that "would gain if amendments to the products liability bill" became law, including health care professions, institutions, service providers and pharmaceutical and medical device manufacturers contributed more than $ 11,540,688 over the same period).

n67 See 1995 Calendar Year Summary and Index of Malpractice Trials, COOK COUNTY JURY VERDICT REP. (1996) (on file with the New York Law School Law Review) (noting a defendant winning percentage of 67.3% for physicians and hospitals).

n68 See Diana Griego Erwin, Life is Not Without Risks, L.A. DAILY J., Aug. 29, 1994, at 6.

n69 See Robert A. Clifford, Justice System Corrects its Outrages, CHI. TRIB., Sept. 29, 1994, at 24; McDonald's Makes Out-of-Court Settlement in Hot-Coffee Case, CHI. TRIB., Dec. 2, 1994, at B1.

n70 See Erwin, supra note 68, at 6.

n71 See Clifford, supra note 69, at 24.

n72 Mr. Barry Nace is a well known plaintiffs' attorney and former president of the American Trial Lawyers Association of America. See Barry Nace, Science and Civil Justice: A Recent Oxymoron, 41 N.Y.L. SCH. L. REV. 393 (1997) n73 See Neil A. Lewis, House G.O.P. Quits Tort Reform Plan, N.Y. TIMES, Mar. 7, 1996, at A1 (calling the plan "a sweeping overhaul of the nation's civil litigation system" and noting that it would, for the first time, set nationwide standards "in both state and Federal courts").

n74 See Quotes, A.B.A. J., Dec. 1, 1988, at 26. West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals Justice Richard Neely was quoted: "As long as I am allowed to redistribute wealth from out-of-state companies to injured in-state plaintiffs, I shall continue to do so. Not only is my sleep enhanced when I give someone else's money away, but so is my job security, because the in-state plaintiffs, their families and their friends will re-elect me." Id.

n75 See BMW of N. Am., Inc., v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n76 See id. at 1593.

n77 See Jack Marshall, The Lawyer's Role in the Structured Settlement Era: Duties, Rules, and Perils, 43 FEDLAW 10 (1996) (noting that "attorneys deal in settlements; 95 percent of all cases are settled").

n78 See FLA. STAT. ANN. § 57.105 (West 1996) (providing for an award of attorney fees only when "the court finds that there was a complete absence of a justiciable issue of either law or fact raised by the losing party"); see also Phillip H. Snaith, Attorney's Fees Under Florida Statute 57.105: Caselaw Development, 10 NOVA L. REV. 156, 173 (1985) (noting that the primary purpose for the statute was to deter unfounded litigation; however, "since it has itself presented such fertile ground for litigation, it has not yet achieved this end").

n79 See supra notes 41-42 and accompanying text.

n80 See ALA. CODE § 6-11-20 (1996) (limiting punitive damages in civil cases to wrongful death tort actions).

n81 See Life Ins. Co. of Georgia v. Johnson, 684 So. 2d 685, 714 app. A (Ala. 1996).

n82 See BMW of N. Am., Inc., v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n83 See supra notes 45-46 and accompanying text.

guidelines; the VMI case, n2 the male-only admissions policy case; and the Gasperini case, n3 dealing with appellate review of jury verdicts for excessiveness in diversity cases. These three cases represent only the tip of the iceberg of Mr. Olson's appellate practice. His vita contains a dazzling list of important cases, before the Supreme Court and other appellate courts, of incredible breadth.

Mr. Olson is a graduate of the law school of Boalt Hall, Berkeley, California. He served from 1981 to 1984 as the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Office of Legal Counsel, which made him the [*432] executive branch's principal legal adviser, with a major role in formulating the branch's position on constitutional issues.

Ted Olson has also been a leader in the movement for tort reform. The title of his essay in the January 1994 issue of the SMU Law Review was, "The Parasitic Destruction of America's Civil Justice System." n4

I think it needs words like that to bring out the noted "shrinking violet," the very shy Chicago lawyer who is our other luncheon speaker, Phil Corboy. Mr. Corboy is one of America's most successful, most colorful, and if you represent an insurance company or defendant, most feared plaintiffs' trial lawyers.

Mr. Corboy is probably best known to the public for his role in representing plaintiffs in the Tylenol n5 and the Iowa DC-10 crash cases, n6 but his record of jury verdicts and out-of-court settlements is also dazzling. He has been called by a leader of the Chicago bar, the ultimate personal injury lawyer and the "best of the best" in his field. We really have two of the "best of the best" in this debate today.

Mr. Corboy is a graduate of Loyola Law School, a former head of the Litigation Section of the American Bar Association (ABA), and a former president of the Chicago Bar Association and the Illinois Trial Lawyers Association. He has written countless articles in his field n7 and is a leader in the movement opposing tort reform.

[*433] II. MAIN ARGUMENTS

THEODORE OLSON: We are going to talk today about the participation by lawyers, particularly plaintiffs' trial lawyers, in the political process. I would like to give you some numbers. One study, based on Federal Election Commission and state filings records, of trial lawyer political contributions for candidates for state and local offices in Texas, Alabama, and California -- three hot-bed states for the tort movement -- showed $ 17.3 million in contributions by trial lawyers to state and local candidates. n8 Ninety-five percent of the fund went to Democratic candidates. n9 The study also estimates that $ 60 million in contributions were made nationwide by plaintiffs' trial lawyers. n10 Compare that with $ 5 million from the AFL-CIO. n11 In fact, the plaintiffs' trial bar contributed to political candidates more than the five largest labor unions combined. n12 Forbes magazine referred to the plaintiffs' bar as "America's third political party." n13

The top ten federal Senate and House candidate recipients of trial lawyer money were all Democrats. n14 Of the top fifteen contributing lawyers to political candidates for Alabama state offices -- and bear in mind that in Alabama judges are political candidates -- each contributed on average $ 30,000 per year. n15 That is a lot of money per year. Within those top fifteen contributors, for a five-year period in Alabama, the top [*434] lawyer contributed $ 322,000 per year, n16 the fifteenth highest contributor gave $ 36,000. n17

In Texas, among the top fifteen contributors, the average lawyer contribution to state candidates was $ 46,000 per year. n18 In California, the top contribution rate was $ 225,000 per year. n19 These are just for the state candidates. The leader was William Lerach, who that year made $ 800,000 in campaign contributions. n20 As I said, in many of these states, the recipients of those political contributions are judges.

At the presidential level, the Washington Post reported earlier this year that lawyers had made more contributions to President Clinton's campaign fund than retired persons, business services, and the real estate industry combined. n21 At that time, the lawyers had contributed forty percent of the contributions received by the top ten contributing groups in the re-election campaign for President Clinton. n22

Now, I hasten to say that all of those contributions were not necessarily from plaintiffs' trial lawyers, because the collectors of those statistics did not differentiate between law firms on the defense side and law firms on the plaintiffs' side; but, obviously, lawyers have a large role in contributing to the political process.

In 1992, trial lawyers put out letters and fund-raising materials stating that if you contribute to Clinton's campaign fund, there will be no tort reform at the federal level, and if a law is passed by the House and Senate, you can be assured that if you contribute to President Clinton, he will veto such legislation. President Clinton delivered on that promise this year and last year when he vetoed the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, n23 which was recommended and supported by the Chairman of his [*435] own party. However, the bill passed over his veto. n24 President Clinton also vetoed the product liability bill, n25 which was not passed over his veto.

Some trial lawyer money, of course, does go to Republican candidates. That is why it was impossible to get cloture, and it was impossible to override the veto of the product liability bill.

Trial lawyers are the largest contributors to political campaigns in this country, and they usually have one objective in mind. On the other hand, other contributors to the campaign process commonly have multiple objectives. For example, corporate money may be interested in bills that have to do with the labor laws, environmental laws, or export controls and things of that nature. A corporation or corporate executive who participates in the political process has a wealth of issues on the table in which they are interested and they may come back again and again for different things; therefore, their influence is diluted. However, when trial lawyers go to a member of the Senate or the House of Representatives, that trial lawyer is able to say, "I have never asked you for anything else, just vote against this bill, don't let the tort reform laws be changed at the national level." That is a very, very potent message when you talk about this amount of money.

Now there is nothing inherently wrong of course with making campaign contributions; it is legal. Everybody does it to promote their own self-interest. The law allows it. Why should not plaintiffs' lawyers invest a portion of the income they derive from the system to keep the goose laying the golden eggs? After all, that system has been very good to the trial lawyers.

Forbes now publishes a list of the nation's twenty-five top earning trial lawyers. In 1994, first place was occupied by Texas lawyer Joseph Jamail, whose income for 1994 was listed at $ 90 million. n26 Michael Jordan, eat your heart out. The person who was twenty-fifth on the list of trial lawyers came in at $ 4 million. n27 Mr. Corboy and one of his partners were on that list, but I will not get into those numbers; he can if he wants to. n28

I compared the top twenty-five lawyers on the income list with the top fifty lawyers on this contribution list. You will be surprised by the results. [*436] The same people making the most amount of money are making the most contributions. n29 Mr. Lerach, for example, was number thirteen in the top twenty-five earners at $ 10 million, n30 and he also gave $ 800,000 to political candidates who oppose tort reform. n31 That is a pretty good return on your investment.

Now there is nothing wrong with these lawyers taking advantage of a system that promotes this sort of behavior. We have evolved a civil justice system in this country that puts enormous incentives out there for people to sue. Mr. Corboy and his colleagues would be derelict in their duty to their clients, and themselves (and their college age children), if they did not participate in this process. As long as Congress, state legislatures, and the courts encourage redistribution of wealth through the tort system and encourage juries to make legislative judgments by sending messages to distant corporate treasuries regarding how hot to brew coffee, n32 how fast to deliver pizza, n33 and how to paint a BMW, n34 then these cases are going to be brought. If the juries continue to bring in judgments based upon an out-of-town corporation's net worth, the punitive damages and the judgments are going to remain big, and those will be the incentives.

Statistics show that less than fifty percent of the tort system goes to benefit the person who may have been victimized. n35 The lion's share goes to the plaintiffs' lawyers. n36 However, to be completely fair, the plaintiffs' lawyers are not the only ones profiting from this system; there are other beneficiaries. We have a cottage industry of professional expert witnesses in this country -- I guess "mansion industry" is perhaps a better phrase -- that would not exist if we did not have this tort system. There are also law firms that defend these cases. My colleagues often tell me to stop attempting to reform the civil justice system because we are all [*437] making a great deal of money. Most of the lawyers are benefitting from this system. That is why, in my judgment, the American Bar Association is so opposed to virtually any kind of meaningful tort reform. n37 And let us not forget the insurance companies, the in-house lawyers, and so forth.

I think of it as tithing. It is not contribution to get into heaven, but a contribution to stay there. So you have to ask yourself, is it fair to criticize trial lawyers for lawfully supporting a system that is good for them and good for the country? Perhaps not, but criticism is warranted if the system is, indeed, bad for the country.

Let me just say a few words about the system. Our tort system, according to most estimates, costs our economy five times what it costs Japan, Germany, or the United Kingdom. n38 The tort tax costs this country an estimated $ 300 billion, although some people say $ 100 billion, depending upon what you count. n39 It is difficult to get exact numbers, but we know the amount is huge. One can compare the numbers to the Gross National Product (GNP) and see that, over the past twenty or thirty years, the tort tax has grown at a much faster rate than the GNP. n40 For example, punitive damages in Alabama from 1974 to 1978, which were affirmed on appeal, were over $ 400,000. n41 Jump ahead fifteen years, and in a comparable four-year interval, the figure jumps to more than $ 90 million. n42 Moreover, in Texas, between 1968 and 1971, business punitive damage verdicts affirmed on appeal were $ 85,000. n43 Twenty years later, that figure jumped to $ 127 million. n44

I could go on about statistics, but let me give you a few more specific examples. Take a look at Barbour County, Alabama. Almost eighty percent of the tort cases filed in that county seek punitive damages. n45 Moreover, in Alabama as a whole, punitive damages affirmed by the [*438] Supreme Court of Alabama from 1987 through the first half of 1994 equalled $ 53.2 million -- thirteen dollars per capita. n46

My submission is not that there is anything wrong with the trial bar participating in the political process. Our system permits it to occur, and if you like this system, then nothing should be done about it. However, if you do not like the civil justice system that they are supporting, and the polls tell us that up as much as seventy-five to eighty-five percent of the people in this country want a change in the tort system, n47 then you need to change the current scheme. But, as long as the legislators are beholden to those people who ask that one request, and who may have been the largest contributor to their election, there will be no such change.

PHILIP CORBOY: Judge Becker missed something: he did not tell you that I am a Democrat. That might be surprising since I come from Cook County, Illinois. I am of that type of background where you are born a Democrat, and even if you become wealthy enough to become a Republican, you stay a Democrat.

There are people in our town who really believe that the following discussion took place between college roommates who met each other long after they got out of college. The more successful of the two, a Republican, said to his pal, "Are you still a Democrat?"

"Of course I'm a Democrat," he replied.

"Why are you still a Democrat?"

He said, "Well, my father was a Democrat, my grandfather was a Democrat, and my great-grandfather was a Democrat, and that's why I am a Democrat."

"Well, that sounds silly. If your father was a horse thief, grandfather was a horse thief, and your great-grandfather was a horse thief, would you be a horse thief?"

He said, "Of course not, I'd be a Republican."

So whenever I get into a discussion like this, I love it if the other guy tells me that I am greedy, an ambulance chaser, and a tassle-toed squeezer. I have been called all of those. I started law school fifty years ago this month, and I tried my first lawsuit on November 11, 1950. I remember that because it was Armistice Day, and I did not have to go to work, so I had another day to get ready for the trial.

I have been trying lawsuits ever since. I represent people who are quadriplegic or blind, whose spouses are dead, whose fathers are dead, and whose mothers are dead. Some of them are in vegetative states. Every one of those people has recognized the contribution that I have [*439] supplied to their wherewithal. I assure you, if there is anybody in this room who loses a wife, loses a husband, loses a leg, loses an eye, or loses a life, they are going to call me, or somebody like me, whether they are a Republican or Democrat.

I have been antagonistic to the changes sought for the simple reason that it would take away people's rights. The term "tort reform" is a euphemism for tort "deform"; it is a euphemism for "pro-defendant system." There is not one area in the anticipated tort legislation -- national, local, or state -- which in any way gives rights to people. They all take rights away from people; they all diminish the right to recover for pain, suffering, disability, disfigurement, et cetera.

I got a telephone message as I was leaving the office the other day. It was from a man named Mr. Nash. The call was about a USA Today article he received in the mail. n48 Here is what Mr. Nash said, "So pleased to hear that Mr. Corboy is continuing the fight against caps in tort reform. I am a former client who was badly burned and lost my wife. If it weren't for Mr. Corboy, I don't know how I would have raised my kids. Thank you." Believe me, I do not remember Mr. Nash.

It is difficult arguing with Mr. Olson. He is a decent man. It is difficult because he is courteous; it is difficult because he is gentle. But, the simple fact of the matter is he is wrong.

If you have a case, and I learned this from the first case I tried, that is tough on the law, you talk about the facts. If you have a case that is tough on the facts, you talk about the law. If you have a case that is tough on the law and the facts, you talk about the other lawyer. Now, I do not know why this is such an issue when it is conceded that lawyers of all stripes, of all branches of our system, have contributed to the present Administration. I assume that they had a lot of reasons to do it. It might be a gender thing or an age thing. This is an age where there are an awful lot of people shy of fifty who would like to see somebody shy of fifty in the presidential office. But, whatever it is, the people that are interested in tort reform are not Mom and Pop school-people. There are several groups labeled "coalitions" that have tort reformers as their primary members. One of them is the Manhattan Institution, n49 in which Peter Huber, n50 who has a tremendous ability to persuade, is very [*440] active. n51 Its membership includes the Product Liability Coordinating Policy Committee, which has a budget of $ 3 million a year for the tort reform debate. It has the civil justice reform group and membership of forty general counsel from the nation's largest corporations. One of its greatest spokesmen is our speaker today, Mr. Olson. I am not so sure he appreciates it, but Mr. Olson is defined by many articles and media people as a lobbyist for the anti-tort people. n52 There is also the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, who are in the anti-tort business, but I do not know why. n53

Most lobbyists that I have met are very honest, very competent, and very capable. Their job is to raise money for the people they represent and to persuade legislators and sometimes members of the executive branch. What I am suggesting is that these people represent Corporate America, and Corporate America is organized money, and there is nothing wrong with money being organized. There is nothing wrong with people, whose pocketbooks might be affected, being anti-tort. However, that is because they have never been hurt; as soon as they are hurt, they hire people like me.

I have represented everybody in this world that you can think of, from bank presidents to prostitutes, Catholic priests to Rabbis, executives to state senators -- you name it. I have represented everyone, college professors, law professors, and doctors. However, I recently fired a client -- a Republican state senator. He came to me when he was hurt. His case, a medical malpractice case, was against the medical school where I attended law school, Loyola. I represented him because I believed he was the victim of a tort.

On March 9, 1995, he and all of the other Republicans in our state legislature passed -- had the Governor sign -- the most draconian tort reform [*441] bill in the country. n54 Name any diminution of plaintiff's rights, and we have got it: a $ 500,000 cap on compensatory damages, a $ 250,000 cap on punitive damages, joint civil liability gone, no product liability suits can be filed without an expert's expert opinion that the product is faulty, and a twelve-year statute repose. I hope that a year from now we can come back and tell you that the law has been found unconstitutional. I am certainly not sitting back and waiting; we are fighting it. So far, we have won in three trial courts, and it will probably go before the supreme court of our state very soon. Hopefully, then, it will become a federal problem again; in the meantime, we are laboring under it.

This state senator also voted for tort reform in a way that was only prospective. But, when he went for the bill, he did not make it at all retroactive. He made sure he was protected and then took away from the populace, from the citizenry, the opportunity to seek compensatory damages. Future damages are limited to $ 500,000, but he stands to receive $ 2 to $ 2.5 million if he wins his lawsuit.

The American Tort Reform Association (ATRA) showed that trial lawyers gave $ 30 million in contributions in a five year period. n55 According to ATRA, my firm gave $ 200,000. Although that sounds like a lot of money, it is over a five year period. n56 We have thirty lawyers in our firm, so that amounts to $ 500 per person, or $ 125 per year per attorney. I cannot really say that this is going to sway the President of the United States or even a state legislator.

Therefore, you are right. The ability and the responsibility of those of us who believe that you are entitled to contribute, not to personal coffers but to campaign funds, is certainly in direct relationship to how we feel. There is a spokeswoman for Philip Morris who said that we give to people who think the way we think. If this were not true, I certainly would not have given any money at all to any legislator in the country. I have even contributed to people I do not know, most of them Democrats. However, two of them were not Democrats; one was a man named John [*442] Fox of Pennsylvania, and the other was Henry Hyde, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

In any event, there is a fellow named Bud Shuster of the Ninth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, who in the last election received contributions totalling $ 109,250 from 205 people. n57 It does not sound like much, only $ 532 per person, but ninety-three of those people came from out of state. This is a man that is legislating in the state of Pennsylvania. One of the people that contributed $ 2000 to his campaign is a fellow by the name of Ted Olson, a lawyer from Washington, D.C. n58 I do not know how many Ted Olsons there are in Washington, D.C., but Bud Shuster is an ardent tort reformer who has been a legislator for twenty-four years. He is on the Infrastructure and Transportation Committee, yet he acquires money from all over the country from people who are interested in his vote for tort reform.

Now, I do not suggest for one moment that there is anything wrong with people supplying money to legislators who think the way they do. It is an absolute cover-up. With luck, I will continue to contribute money to Democrats for a long time.

III. REBUTTALS

MR. OLSON: Okay, it was me, but I did not contribute to Bud Shuster because of the tort issue. I did so because he is a good friend of mine.

We are, however, in agreement on one thing, that there is nothing wrong with making political contributions to people who support the kind of causes that you support. I am not advocating a change that would prevent people from contributing to their political candidates.

I merely think that the American people need to know how much power is being exercised by a relatively small number of people to preserve the status quo, because contrary to what Mr. Corboy says, it is not just big corporations that support tort reform. In fact, big corporations, although they try to get involved, are very ineffective at contributing to political candidates because the officers of big corporations have many legislative interests. Their interests are spread across the [*443] board from environmental issues, to labor issues, to taxes. The civil justice system is just one small thing.

It is very difficult to raise any money from corporate executives because they are not in the same income bracket as plaintiffs' lawyers; they do not get their names listed in Forbes unless they are CEOs. The important thing is that people across the country -- and I have seen what I regard as legitimate polls that say people that are liberal, conservative, old, young, Democrats, Republicans, labor, management, stockholders and so forth -- are disturbed by the civil justice system.

I would hire Mr. Corboy too if I was injured. I would hire Mr. Corboy to see how much I could get in the way of punitive damages if I spilled a cup of coffee on myself, too. Why not? That is like a ticket to the lottery.

Mr. Corboy operates from the presumption that this legislation is taking away people's rights because it affects their ability to get large punitive damages or one hundred percent liability from someone who is one percent at fault, and that the system does not have any other victims. The defendants in those cases are people, they have rights. The stockholders have rights; they innocently invest in companies and wind up paying the punitive damages. The municipalities that get sued for punitive damages, and the taxpayers who pay those punitive damage awards and excessive verdicts, have rights.

There is some room for improvement in the system to protect all of the people in this country. If you focus on one victim in one case and say he or she should get $ 70 million in order to punish the stockholders of that company, who may be school teachers or retired persons who simply invested in that corporation, it does not make any sense to me. My point here is not to criticize the trial lawyers; my point is to make sure that the people of this country know what the facts are, so that they can exercise their judgment if they believe the tort system in this country does not work.

The other problem not mentioned by Mr. Corboy is that our tort system is causing it to become difficult to get certain types of products. You do not see diving boards in municipal swimming pools anymore. It is trivial, but I think it is symptomatic, that in New York they have taken all of the jungle gyms out of the playgrounds because of tort claims. n59 Connecticut municipalities are closing parks and bike trails because of the liability crisis. n60 There are products that are used for implants, heart valves, and other uses that are becoming less and less available because [*444] of the tort crisis. One New York Times headline, in December 1995, reflected the fact that most of the money for research in new birth control methods is tied up because of the litigation frenzy associated with any kind of birth control. n61

Mr. Corboy immediately segued from that into an attack upon the people who oppose the tort system as it presently exists, instead of dealing with the fact that many people, irrespective of their point of view, believe that the tort system should be changed. The American people -- something like eighty-three percent according to a recent poll -- believe that our current tort system has major problems and needs serious improvement. n62 That is clearly a system that needs correction, and if the people of this country know who has the biggest stake in keeping it the way it is, it will help them vote or put pressure on their legislators to change it.

MR. CORBOY: I am going to ask a rhetorical question. I hope I am right. I do not know of any municipality in this country that can be sued for punitive damages. Think about that and answer it yourself. I do not know any state that can be sued for punitive damages. They are immune. n63

Let us talk about the suggestion that punitive damages are a terrible blight. Take a look at the law article in the Wall Street Journal, which is not exactly a plaintiff's house organ, in which they found that punitive damage awards to be modest and very rare. n64 Where did the study come from? It was from the National Center for State Courts at Cornell University. n65 They came to the conclusion that punitive damages are a very rare thing. The American Tort Reform Association and its siblings and offspring, the Manhattan Institute, make the studies.

Right now there is a young fellow from my firm who is running for the state legislature. The job pays $ 45,000 a year, so I do not know how he is going to live. However, the Republican Party took a poll and bragged afterwards that the people in that jurisdiction believed that a Republican should be elected. The poll question was as follows: "Would [*445] you vote for a clean-cut, nice young man whose father was a policeman who just died and who has contributed much to the community, or would you vote for an ambulance-chasing lawyer who works for one of the largest law firms in Chicago, and who does nothing but take a third of the clients' monies?"

Studies prove exactly what you want them to prove. Maybe the statistic that I am about to tell you is wrong too, but it came from the Center for Responsive Politics. It showed that the pro-tort reform political action committees contributed $ 22 million to the United States Senate. The American Trial Lawyers Association of America contributed $ 930,000. n66

Trial lawyers do a pretty good job for corporate America. They do a wonderful job when they are representing organized money. For example, they convinced juries in sixty-five percent of the malpractice cases in Illinois that patients should not recover from doctors. n67

Corporate America has a pretty good thing, and it is suggesting that jurors do not know what they are doing, judges do not know what they are doing, appellate court judges do not know what they are doing, supreme court judges do not know what they are doing -- everyone is wrong. Everybody is wrong except Corporate America. I looked at the stock market this morning, which is pretty high. Corporate America is doing pretty well, despite this tort system.

What is it that is in need of change? This need comes from Corporate America's desire for more money. They want more money for their shareholders and, therefore, for their executives. Now there is nothing wrong with wanting more money, but the simple fact of the matter is that there is nothing wrong with the tort system.

Every once in awhile, there is an aberrational result. Take the McDonald's case for example. n68 It is a perfect example of how the system works. The woman was found twenty percent negligent, so they [*446] cut her verdict twenty percent immediately. n69 That is a pretty good system. Why? Because she had a cup of coffee between her legs, and she opened the cup of coffee and the scalding coffee burned her. n70 I wonder if you would suggest that third degree burns over a seventy-nine year old woman's thighs was a lottery. I do not know how much you would pay for that, but I certainly would not pay one dollar, $ 250,000, $ 500,000 or $ 2 million. The court cut the punitive damages to $ 480,000 and then Corporate America settled the case. n71 Now, they did not settle the case because they thought they were going to win on appeal. Additionally, the suit did not put McDonald's out of business; they have served another billion and a half hamburgers since then. So I respectfully suggest there is nothing wrong with the system that a little bit more understanding could not help.

I assure you again that if somebody in this room is hurt, they will go to Barry Nace, n72 and Barry Nace would do exactly what I would do for you: try to get you the most money that you are entitled to. When I say, "most money," that is a pejorative term. What I mean is to get what you are entitled to for your injuries, no more and no less, without the interference of the federal government telling you what you should do in your state.

IV. AUDIENCE DISCUSSION

JUDGE BECKER: I told you that you were in for a treat, and I was right. We will open the floor for questions to either or both of our debaters.

QUESTION: Should these questions not be properly left to the state legislatures rather than the federal government?

MR. CORBOY: Well, I am a Madisonian Federalist. I believe we should have a federal government, but one that keeps its hands off of the states' rights. Yes, I come from a state right now where, as soon as the Republican legislature was taken away by the electorate and the Chief Executive Office of our state was given to the Republicans, a tort system [*447] was implemented that is going to change the mores of our community. They believe that the laws of Illinois, even though they are draconian, are what the people in Illinois want. I do not have any idea what the laws in Alabama are, although I would like to have some cases down there. I have no idea what the laws of Texas are, although I just had a case in Texas. The tort system is indigenous to the state in which the tort either takes place or, because of venue laws, where a defendant can be sued.

The Republican legislators in the federal government want to federalize the tort system, but they do not want to make a federal question out of it. n73 You know, if you are not given the right to go to the federal court, cases will stay in the state courts but they will be saddled with federal law. Now, I do not know what the federal government's purpose is in having a federalization and still have the litigation remain in the state.

MR. OLSON: One good thing that has come from this debate over federal legislation to correct the excesses of certain aspects of the tort system is that we have discovered a whole new class of people that were never historically Federalists but all of a sudden have found states rights. The plaintiffs' trial bar is now a lot more interested in states rights. I think that it is important to understand, for example, that out of state corporations are regularly being punished in Alabama for doing business there. The former Chief Justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court put it well when he said, "I sleep well at night when I am able to redistribute money from an out of state corporate treasury to the citizens of my state who vote in my election." n74

What we have in the excesses of the tort system are efforts by one state to control its own products and how things are done in the state, distorted by what is happening someplace else. In the Supreme Court decision this last term involving BMW, n75 the state of Alabama had decided to punish BMW because it sold cars under certain legal standards that were enacted by other states. Essentially, Alabama was attempting [*448] to punish BMW for perfectly lawful conduct elsewhere. n76 The framers of our Constitution expected Congress to regulate interstate commerce to prevent the states from using their power to abuse and discriminate in just this manner.

QUESTION: I am addressing this to Mr. Corboy. I teach law at George Mason and will give you a hypothetical question. A client comes to you who has a case in which you estimate that the injuries would be worth $ 25 million if you could get a jury verdict. However, also based on your experience and your associates' research, you believe there is only a ten percent chance of winning -- a very weak case -- but, on the other hand, you are a very experienced trial lawyer with great rhetorical skills. You might be able to persuade the jury. With only a ten percent chance of winning, the economic value of the case is $ 2.5 million, and your cut is at least $ 800,000 or maybe a little less after expenses. My question is: do you take this case and, if so, do we have a sound court system involving "loser pays" rules that would encourage attorneys to take cases with high economic values that are essentially speculative?

MR. CORBOY: Sure I would take the case. There is a person that has been injured and there is a viable defendant, whether vicariously or with money in its bank, who has to respond to the judicial system. Ninety-six percent of the cases in this country are settled, n77 and my guess is that this case would be one of them. However, if it were settled in my office, we would not charge $ 800,000. It is that simple.

Most lawyers I think, at least the ones I have come in contact with, have the responsibility of making sure that equity results. I have had exactly one case in my life that was settled for $ 25 million, and the fee was not one-third of $ 25 million, believe me. The lawyers that I know would certainly reduce the fee commensurate with what they believed an equitable percentage would be. My guess is they would charge one-half of one-third or, perhaps, twenty percent.

The reference to "loser pays" is a hot idea today, but it is dead in Florida. n78 Florida tried it, but insurance companies found that, when [*449] they won a lawsuit, they were unable to collect the legal fees back from the plaintiff. Most plaintiffs cannot afford their own lawyer, let alone pay the expenses of the insurance company's lawyer. On the other hand, when the plaintiff won the insurance companies had to pay the plaintiff's legal fees, so "loser pays" died. The legislation was taken off the books the next session. "Loser pays" does not work because plaintiffs do not have the money to pay when they lose.

MR. OLSON: I want to respond to something that Mr. Corboy said earlier about punitive damages against municipalities. The fact is that, unless I am mistaken, in most jurisdictions you can recover punitive damages from municipalities. The case that stands out most in my mind involved East St. Louis, Illinois, where an individual was drunk, put in the jail, and then injured by fellow prisoners. He won a large punitive damage verdict.

JUDGE BECKER: Why are plaintiffs' fee arrangements not disclosed to jurors and what would be the effect if you unbundled the fee from the award?

MR. OLSON: I suppose the plaintiffs' lawyers would say you should also disclose the defense lawyer's arrangements for his fees. What would happen if you unbundled and allowed the recovery of attorney's fees in these cases? I do not know what the effect would be. I suspect that it would result in smaller attorney's fees. I do not know what a jury is thinking when it awards the kind of verdicts that Mr. Corboy has been successful in recovering.

MR. CORBOY: It certainly would not be one-sided. I see no relevancy in suggesting that the jury should know that my opponent is getting $ 500 an hour. This is not a proper way to prejudice the jury. It is a function of all lawyers to prejudice the jury in their favor. Let us use whatever word we want, but that is our function. However, there are rules that you must follow. Judges do not allow you to improperly prejudice the jury, but it would seem to me that disclosing the amount of the fee would be discourteous to a defendant, and I say that in a very mild fashion.

If the plaintiff was entitled to a $ 100,000 recovery, and a twenty-five percent rule applied that was disclosed to the jury, they may add twenty-five percent to the $ 100,000. It does not seem right for the plaintiff or the defendant to characterize the fees of the lawyer as being too much, and [*450] then assert that since the defendant can afford $ 500 or $ 100 an hour, he should receive more than he is entitled. I do not think it is a relevant inquiry of the jury.

QUESTION: Would that experiment in Florida have been more successful if the plaintiff and the plaintiff's lawyer were jointly and severally liable for the attorney's fee award.

MR. CORBOY: What about the defendant's lawyer? Why discriminate against the plaintiff's lawyer? "Loser pays" means the loser pays. Why should not the defense lawyer, if your logic has any validity, also be responsible on a fee basis? I do not see the relevancy. Incidentally, ninety-six percent of the cases are settled. We are talking about four percent of the cases in which shifting of fees may be a potent way of settling more cases.

MR. OLSON: The figures that I was using excluded wrongful death cases. n79 Alabama is the only state in the United States that uses punitive damages as the method of recovery in wrongful death cases, n80 but we took those cases out of the figures.

n66 See, e.g., Sharpe v. Brice, 96 Eng. Rep. 557 (C.P. 1774); Bruce v. Rawlins, 95 Eng. Rep. 934 (C.P. 1770); Beardmore v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 790 (C.P. 1764); Huckle v. Money, 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763); Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763).

n67 See, e.g., Sears v. Lyons, 171 Eng. Rep. 658 (K.B. 1818); Merest v. Harvey, 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814).

n68 See, e.g., Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 96 Eng. Rep. 549 (C.P. 1774).

n69 Pitt-Rivers, Honour and Social Status, in HONOUR AND SHAME: THE VALUES OF A MEDITERRANEAN SOCIETY 19, 21 (J. Peristiany ed. 1966).

n70 2 F. POLLOCK & F. MAITLAND, THE HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 537 (2d ed. 1909).

n71 Id. at 537-38 (footnotes omitted) (emphasis in original). Although Scots law retained overt compensation for insults under the rubric of solatium, such compensation largely disappeared from English law during the middle ages, a phenomenon that has puzzled legal historians. Beckerman, Adding Insult to Injuria: Affronts to Honor and the Origins of Trespass, in ON THE LAWS AND CUSTOMS OF ENGLAND 159, 178-81 (M. Arnold, T. Green, S. Scully & D. White eds. 1981).

n72 95 Eng. Rep. 794 (C.P. 1764).

n73 Id. at 795.

n74 97 Eng. Rep. 1130 (K.B. 1766).

n75 Id. at 1130.

n76 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769).

n77 Id. at 909.

n78 95 Eng. Rep. 934 (C.P. 1770).

n79 Id. at 934.

n80 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

n81 Id. at 768.

n82 Pitt-Rivers, supra note 69, at 26. The role of insult also explains why breach of promise to marry was the only contract action in which punitive damages were allowed. See A. OGUS, supra note 64, at 24, 29 & n.5.

n83 171 Eng. Rep. 658 (K.B. 1818).

n84 Id. at 658.

n85 172 Eng. Rep. 687 (Horsham Assizes 1830).

n86 Id. at 687. See also James v. Campbell, 172 Eng. Rep. 1015, 1016 (Westminster Assizes 1832), an action for assault and battery where the jury was instructed: "If you think, . . . that the defendant struck the plaintiff, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict, whether it was done intentionally or not. But the intention is material in considering the amount of the damages."

REV_00261997

Its authority does not, however, appear to be based on double-jeopardy considerations as in a criminal proceeding.

n171 See, e.g., Fountila v. Carter, 571 F.2d 487, 491 (9th Cir. 1978); Simpson v. Weeks, 570 F.2d 240, 243 (8th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 443 U.S. 911 (1979); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 8, at 641-42. But see supra note 6 (cases expanding scope of punitive damage liability). For examples of appellate deference to jury discretion in punitive damage cases, see Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 712-13, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 414-15 (1967); Durham v. Pekrul, 104 Wis. 2d 339, 349, 311 N.W.2d 615, 620 (1981). Professor Owen suggests that the "hands off" attitude toward jury discretion in awarding punitive damages in products liability cases may be changing. Owen, supra note 6, at 50-59.

n172 See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 819, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 388 (1981). Questions of credibility and weight of the evidence are resolved in favor of upholding the jury's verdict. The modern trend, moreover, is to admit evidence making the existence of a fact more probable in any degree. See, e.g., FED. R. EVID. 401 and advisory committee note, 402. But see Grimshaw, 119 Cal. App. 3d at 792, 174 Cal. Rptr. at 371 (exclusion of evidence proffered by defendant upheld).

n173 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 655-56 (5th Cir. 1981), modified, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1982); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 823, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 391 (1981). As Professor Owen has pointed out, the problem is further complicated from a fairness standpoint by changes in the standards that occur over time. Owen, supra note 6, at 13-14. Vagueness of standards has led some courts to adopt a higher evidentiary threshold (clear and convincing) as a means of reducing jury discretion. See, e.g., Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 851 (2d Cir. 1967)(adopting a "clear, unequivocal and convincing" standard for punitive damage awards in strict liability cases); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 300 & n.23, 294 N.W.2d 437, 458 & n.23 (1980) (requiring "clear and convincing evidence" of "outrageous" conduct).

n174 See supra text accompanying notes 19-26. But see Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981) and cases cited therein, which hold that the standards "reckless indifference toward the safety of . . . customers" and "maliciously or wantonly" were sufficiently specific "to meet a void-for-vagueness challenge."

n175 One cannot expect a perfect correlation between an intended standard and its actual implementation because of the "inherent ambiguity of language and the limitations of human foresight and knowledge." Ehrlich & Posner, An Economic Analysis of Legal Rulemaking, 3 J. LEGAL STUD. 257, 268 (1974).

n176 Friendly, The Fifth Amendment Tomorrow: The Case for Constitutional Change, 37 U. CINN. L. REV. 671, 694 (1968). The notion appeared in legal literature at least as early as the fifteenth century. See J. FORTESQUE, DE LAUDIBUS LEGUM ANGLIE 65 (S. Chimes trans. 1949). Cf. Ellis, Vox Populi v. Suprema Lexi: A Comment on the Testimonial Privilege of the Fifth Amendment, 55 IOWA L. REV. 829, 845-46 (1970) (discussing fifth amendment rationale of protecting the innocent); Wittman, supra note 23, at 253 (Rules of procedure and the balance between the number of innocents found guilty and the number of guilty found innocent are influenced by a concern with just punishments.). The principle of equal treatment is also offended if, as is probable, some actors receive disproportionately greater punishment than others for the same or a lesser offense. See infra text accompanying notes 234-36.

n177 Reducing the number of false positive decisions even at the cost of increasing the number of false negative decisions in criminal cases may be efficient and fair, but for reasons that are not strictly applicable in the punitive damage context. If an "innocent" person is sentenced to death or a term of imprisonment, there is a deadweight loss because society is deprived of that person's productivity. P. ARANSON, supra note 28, at 530-31 (1981); R. POSNER, supra note 3, at § 7.2, at 169. See also Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, in ESSAYS IN THE ECONOMICS OF CRIME AND PUNISHMENT 24-25 (G. Becker & W. Landes eds. 1974) (imprisonment produces some social loss because society does not receive some of the "payment" made by offenders). That analysis does not, however, explain procedural biases favoring defendants where the penalty is a fine, which does not produce a deadweight loss. See R. POSNER, supra note 3, at §§ 7.2, 21.3, at 168-69, 433-34.

REV_00262006

n178 Cf. Tullock, Two Kinds of Legal Efficiency, 8 HOFSTRA L. REV. 659, 660 (1980) (bias in favor of the impecunious person and against the party with "deep pockets," sometimes has been adopted by judges and juries in order to redistribute wealth). Any redistributional inclinations on the part of juries are likely to be exacerbated by the introduction of defendants' wealth in connection with punitive damage claims. See infra text accompanying notes 259-65. Plaintiffs' lawyers often take advantage of that fact. See Ellis, supra note 8, at 1061-62; Riley, supra note 6, at 26. But cf. Schwartz, Economics, Wealth Distribution, and Justice, 1979 WISC. L. REV. 799, 803 n.17 (even when a defendant is rich, the loss ultimately may fall on purchasers).

n179 See Owen, supra note 6, at 11; Wheeler, Products Liability, Nat'l L.J., Oct. 6, 1980, at 27, 30, col. 1; Harris, Why the Pinto Jury Felt Ford Deserved $ 125 Million Penalty, Wall St. J., Feb. 14, 1978, at 1, col. 4. Cf. Goldstein, Commercial Callousness: The Ford Pinto Litigation, 5 IOWA TR. LAW. 17, 17 (1980) (Ford's cost-benefit analysis with regard to the fuel tank placement cited as a factor influencing the jury's decision in Grimshaw) (Judge Goldstein presided at the Grimshaw trial); Kelman, Cost-Benefit Analysis: An Ethical Critique, REGULATION, Jan./Feb. 1981, at 33 ("In the areas of environmental, safety, and health regulation, there may be many instances where a certain decision might be right even though its benefits do not outweigh its costs.").

n180 See G. TULLOCK, TRIALS ON TRIAL 83-84 (1980); Jury Verdict Research, Inc., Corporate Defendants -- Liability, in 8 PERSONAL INJURY VALUATION HANDBOOKS 5251 (1981) (finding that juries are more likely to find defendant liable if it is a corporation); Owen, supra note 6, at 11 & n.56.

n181 See Jury Says Penthouse Magazine Libeled a Former Miss Wyoming, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1981, at 18, col. 4.

n182 See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974) ("[J]uries assess punitive damages in wholly unpredictable amounts bearing no necessary relation to the actual harm caused. And they remain free to use their discretion selectively to punish expressions of unpopular view.").

n183 See supra notes 179-81.

n184 Cf. C. CLARK & H. SHULMAN, A STUDY OF LAW ADMINISTRATION IN CONNECTICUT 41 (1927) (combined study of the New Haven trial court during 1919-32 and the Waterbury trial court during 1919-28 showed that plaintiffs won 83% of cases); Friedman & Percival, A Tale of Two Courts: Litigation in Alameda and San Benito Counties, 10 LAW & SOC'Y REV. 267, 287 (1976) (study of two California courts -- one rural and one urban -- concluded that in 1970 plaintiffs won 97% and 96% of the judgments respectively and 76% and 85%, respectively, of the contested cases); Owen, supra note 6, at 11-12 (discussing jurors' natural bias for injured individuals and against "big business").

REV_00262007

The possibility of error affects compensatory and punitive damages differently. There is a symmetry between the plaintiff and the defendant as to compensatory damages, in that an error in favor of one party undeservedly punishes the other -- deserving plaintiffs who are not compensated are forced to bear the loss that initially fell upon them. See Wittman, supra note 23, at 253. On the other hand, an error in the defendant's favor on the issue of punitive damages leaves plaintiffs less wealthy, but does not deprive them of deserved compensation.

n185 Cf. Quinton, supra note 17, at 62 ("[T]hat utility is the morally necessary or sufficient condition, or both, of punishment are perfectly reputable moral attitudes."); Wittman, supra note 23, at 250-51 ("In many cases, punishing the innocent might even increase deterrence.").

n186 See Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 264-67.

n187 See id. at 264.

n188 See supra notes 178-84 and accompanying text.

n189 In addition, as plaintiffs' lawyers are well aware, seeking punitive damages, even when unsuccessful, may increase the amount of compensatory damages awarded to the plaintiff (which will be assessed against the defendant). See Riley, supra note 6, at 26. Courts have tended to ignore this factor. See, e.g., Kuper v. Chicago & N.W. Transp. Co., 290 N.W.2d 903, 909 (Iowa 1980) (rejecting argument that defendant was prejudiced on issue of liability by submission on punitive damage issue). But cf. Vanskike v. ACF Indus., Inc., 665 F.2d 188, 210 (8th Cir. 1981) (closing argument inviting jury to punish defendant where submission of punitive damage issue not justified by evidence resulted in excessive compensatory award, requiring reversal and remand for new trial on the issue of damages), cert. denied, 102 S. Ct. 1632 (1982).

n190 Landes & Posner, Adjudication as a Private Good, 8 J. LEGAL STUD. 235, 260, 281 (1979); Priest, supra note 184, at 403.

n191 Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 264-65; Landes & Posner, supra note 190, at 283.

n192 See Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 265 (increase in settlement rate should reduce the total cost of dispute resolution). Cf. Brazil, Civil Discovery: Lawyers' Views of Its Effectiveness, Its Principal Problems and Abuses, 1980 AM. B. FOUND. RESEARCH J. 787, 870-71 (more discovery abuses in complex cases).

n193 Cf. Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 262-64 (vague legal standards discourage socially beneficial activity that is perceived by the actor to fall within the penumbra of the standards).

n194 Cf. id. at 263 ("chilling" effects must be compared with reduction in socially undesirable behavior when assessing a criminal statute); Wittman, supra note 23, at 254 n.9 (punishing the innocent "may reduce the amount of optimal behavior").

n195 There seems to be a general consensus that most people are risk averse most of the time. See G. TULLOCK, supra note 146, at 28; Leubsdorf, Remedies for Uncertainty, 61 B.U.L. REV. 132, 150 (1981); Schaefer, Uncertainty and the Law of Damages, 19 WM. & MARY L. REV. 719, 720 & n.5 (1978). Investors and managers who make decisions for firms appear to be particularly risk averse. See M. BAILEY, REDUCING RISKS TO LIFE 29 (1980) (investors); Swalm, Utility Theory -- Insights Into Risk Taking, 44 HARV. BUS. REV., Nov.-Dec. 1966, at 123, 134 (managers). See also Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 262

REV_00262008

("plausible assumption" that people who engage in socially desirable activities are generally risk averse).

n196 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981).

n197 655 F.2d 650 (5th Cir. 1981).

n198 U.S. DEP'T OF TRANSP., NATIONAL HIGHWAY TRAFFIC SAFETY ADMIN., THE CAR BOOK 20, 23 (1980) (average fatality rate is 3.5 per 10,000 collisions for subcompact cars and 1.5 per 10,000 collisions for large cars).

n199 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 656 (5th Cir. 1981) (substantial evidence presented that crashability of Honda AN 600 could have been improved), modified, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1982); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 775-76, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 360-61 (1981) (citing numerous design changes that could have been made to improve the integrity of Ford Pinto gas tanks); Owen, supra note 6, at 24-25 (design engineers must employ cost-benefit analysis because additional safety measures are always available).

n200 Consumers express their preferences for small cars, in the face of widespread information regarding the greater likelihood of death or serious injury associated with them. See, e.g., N.Y. Times, Mar. 8, 1980, at 6, col. 1 (increasing number of traffic deaths attributed to growing number of small cars); Holsendolph, Most Small Autos Fail U.S. Crash Test, N.Y. Times, Aug. 20, 1980, at B8, col. 1 (ten of twelve small car models failed to protect passengers in 35 MPH crash test). See also Opre, Jeeps: Drivers are the Danger, OUTDOOR LIFE, OCT. 1981, at 30, 30 (Insurance Institute of Highway Safety conclusion that small cars fare less well in road wrecks described as "obvious" to most people).

n201 See Schwartz & Tullock, supra note 34, at 76-77.

n202 Cf. Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 31 (discussing probability of apprehension).

n203 Design changes induced by punitive damage liability will also shift demand downward because the resulting product will be different from that for which consumers have expressed their preference.

n204 See supra note 200.

n205 For example, in Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981), a small arms manufacturer was held liable for punitive damages when the plaintiff's pistol misfired. Id. at 46-47. And in Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981), a plaintiff was awarded punitive damages when a helmet manufactured by the defendant caved in during football practice, causing serious injury. Id. at 439-41.

n206 For example, in Pring v. Penthouse Magazine, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1981, at 18, col. 4, id. Mar. 28, 1981, at 9, col. 2, id. Apr. 5, 1981, at 8E, col. 3 (D. Wyo. 1981), rev'd, No. 81-1480, slip op. (10th Cir. Nov. 5, 1982), a defendant was assessed $ 25 million in punitive damages by a jury (later reduced to $ 12.5 million by the trial court) for libeling a former Miss Wyoming when it published a story about a "fictional" Miss Wyoming. However, the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit held, without reaching the issue of punitive damages, that liability for defamation was not warranted. Pring v. Penthouse Magazine, No. 81-1480, slip op. (10th Cir. Nov. 5, 1982).

n207 For example, in Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 485 F. Supp. 566 (W.D. Okla. 1979), rev'd in part, 667 F.2d 908 (10th Cir. 1981), a defendant was assessed $ 10 million in punitive damages for allowing plutonium to be stolen from its plant. The Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit held, however, that punitive damages could not be awarded because of federal preemption in the field of atomic energy development. 667 F.2d at 922-23.

REV_00262009

n208 See supra note 164.

n209 See Landes & Posner, supra note 190, at 283.

n210 See, e.g., Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 271, 294 N.W.2d 437, 444 (1980); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908 & comment b (1979).

n211 See, e.g., Owen, supra note 6, at 21; Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1366-69.

n212 See Ellis, supra note 8, at 1023. Professor Owen's criticisms of "outrageous" as a description of the quality of conduct meriting punitive damages are well taken. See Owen, supra note 6, at 47; Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1369. What is puzzling is his belief that the word "flagrant" avoids the problems. See supra text accompanying notes 210-11.

n213 See supra notes 149-66 and accompanying text.

n214 See, e.g., Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 300 & n.23, 294 N.W.2d 437, 458 & n.23 (1980) (requiring "clear and convincing evidence" of "outrageous" conduct). An alternative approach is to allow the judge to determine whether punitive damages are appropriate, and if so, in what amount. See, e.g., Owen, supra note 6, at 52-53. Cf. CONN. GEN. STAT. ANN. § 52-240b (West Supp. 1982) ("If the trier of fact determines that punitive damages should be awarded, the court shall determine the amount of such damages not to exceed an amount equal to twice the damages awarded to the plaintiff.").

n215 Cf. Note, supra note 19, at 94-95 (one factor that affects the Supreme Court's decision to invalidate or uphold a statute containing vague terms is the willingness of trial judges to control juries). But cf. Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 120 n.9 (1979) (noting that the "actual malice" that must be present in defamation cases involving public officials or public figures warrants an inquiry into the defendant's state of mind and, therefore, may not readily lend itself to summary disposition). In Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 294 N.W.2d 437 (1980), the court adopted a "clear and convincing" evidentiary standard, but nevertheless remanded the case for trial. On the other hand, the difference in the appellate courts' analysis of similar evidence in Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967) (punitive assessment set aside), and Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398 (1967) (punitive assessment upheld), may be attributable in part to the different standards of proof used by the two courts. The Roginsky court required clear and convincing evidence, while the Toole court required a mere preponderance.

n216 See supra text accompanying notes 103-48.

n217 This, of course, assumes that the "illicit" satisfaction obtained by the wrongdoer from the act of injuring another is not counted in the efficiency calculus. See supra text accompanying note 146.

n218 See supra text accompanying notes 115-48.

n219 Cf. Ehrlich & Posner, supra note 175, at 273 ("We should expect the proportion of overinclusive rules to be higher in areas where either the sanction is simple damages or transaction costs are low than in areas where either the sanction is a punitive one or transaction costs are high, other things being equal.") (emphasis in original). Ehrlich and Posner reason that this result occurs because the social losses of overinclusiveness are lower under the former circumstances.

REV_00262010

n220 Connecticut and Michigan are exceptions. In Connecticut, punitive damages are limited to "an amount which will serve to compensate the plaintiff to the extent of his expenses of litigation, less taxable costs." Triangle Sheet Metal Works, Inc. v. Silver, 154 Conn. 116, 127, 222 A.2d 220, 225 (1966). In Michigan, punitive damages are only awarded to compensate emotional distress or other intangible loss resulting from tortious conduct. Kewin v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 409 Mich. 401, 419-21, 295 N.W.2d 50, 55 (1980).

n221 CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (6th ed. 1977) (quoted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A, at § 1.4(b)(2)). Similar instructions are given in several other states. See, e.g., COLORADO JURY INSTRUCTIONS 2D: CIVIL § 5.3 (1980) (jury may award "a reasonable sum"); COUNCIL OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES OF GEORGIA, SUGGESTED PATTERN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL CASES 91 (1980) ("the measure of such damages is your enlightened conscience as an impartial jury"); IOWA UNIFORM JURY INSTRUCTIONS No. 3.21 (1979) ("such an amount and such only as you shall find the plaintiff entitled to receive in addition to his actual damages").

In 1981, California revised its jury instruction on punitive damages. The amount assessed is still left "to the jury's sound discretion, exercised without passion or prejudice." COMMITTEE ON STANDARD JURY INSTRUCTIONS, CIVIL, OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIFORNIA, CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (6th ed. 1977 & Supp. 1981). But additional guidance is now provided:

In arriving at any award of punitive damages, you are to consider the following:

(1) The reprehensibility of the conduct of the defendant,

(2) The amount of punitive damages which will have a deterrent effect on the defendant in the light of defendant's financial condition,

(3) That the punitive damages must bear a reasonable relation to the actual damages. Id.

n222 ILLINOIS PATTERN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 35.01 (2d ed. 1973) (quoted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A, at § 1.4(E). Cf. Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] 1 All E.R. 367, 411 (H.L.):

In a case in which exemplary damages are appropriate, a jury should be directed that if, but only if, the sum which they have in mind to award as compensation (which may of course be a sum aggravated by the way in which the defendant has behaved to the plaintiff) is inadequate to punish him for his outrageous conduct, to mark their disapproval of such conduct and to deter him from repeating it, then they can award some larger sum.

n223 See, e.g., COMMITTEE ON STANDARD JURY INSTRUCTIONS, CIVIL, OF THE SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA, CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (Supp. 1981).

n224 See, e.g., id; WISCONSIN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL -- PART II § 1707 (1962) (quoted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A, at § 1.4(J)).

n225 There are some exceptions. For example, Georgia's pattern instructions add "compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff" as a basis for a punitive damage award. 1 COUNCIL OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES OF GEORGIA, SUGGESTED PATTERN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL 91 (1980). See also GA. CODE ANN. § 105-2002 (1968 & Supp. 1981) (additional damages may be awarded in cases involving aggravated circumstances "to deter the wrongdoer . . . or as compensation for the wounded feelings of the plaintiff"). California's revised jury instruction also provides additional guidance. See supra note 221.

REV_00262011

n226 But see RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908 (1979) ("In assessing punitive damages, the trier of fact can properly consider the character of the defendant's act, the nature and extent of the harm to the plaintiff that the defendant caused or intended to cause and the wealth of the defendant.").

n227 See, e.g., Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc. 378 F.2d 832, 834 n.3 (2d Cir. 1967) (citing products liability cases involving the same drug in which jury decisions ranged from verdicts for defendants to punitive damage awards for $ 500,000 and $ 850,000; in Roginsky the jury had assessed $ 100,000 in punitive damages). Jury Verdict Research, Inc., Punitive Damages, in 6 PERSONAL INJURY VALUATION HANDBOOKS 831-32 (1981).

n228 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 654-58 (5th Cir. 1981) ($ 5 million verdict upheld); Pring v. Penthouse Magazine, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1981, at 18, col. 4, id. Mar. 28, 1981, at 9, col. 2, id. Apr. 5, 1981, at 8E, col. 3 (D. Wyo. 1981) ($ 25 million verdict), rev'd on other grounds, No. 81-1480, slip op. (10th Cir. Nov. 5, 1982); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 821-24, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 389-91 (1981) (affirming trial court decision to reduce $ 125 million verdict to $ 3.5 million). In several other cases, large punitive damage awards were set aside. See, e.g., Silkwood v. Kerr-McGee Corp., 667 F.2d 908, 921-23 (10th Cir. 1981) ($ 10 million punitive damage assessment set aside on federal preemption grounds); Ashland Oil Co. v. BiPetro, Inc., Nat'l L.J., Nov. 24, 1980, at 10, col. 1 (S.D. Ill. 1980) ($ 300 million verdict set aside by trial judge).

n229 See K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 10.5 (Iowa may be the only state not to allow remittitur of punitive damage verdicts).

n230 See, e.g., Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 48 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980); Hulstein v. Meilman Food Indus. Inc., 293 N.W.2d 889, 892 (S.D. 1980).

n231 For an example of this circular reasoning, see Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 48-49 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). As Professor Owen points out, it is paradoxical that the jury's "passion and prejudice" can render defective an assessment that is premised on a finding of "outrageous" behavior, which implies that the jury should be "outraged." Owen, supra note 6, at 47.

n232 See, e.g., Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 50 (Alaska 1979) (Burke, J. dissenting), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981) (jury's punitive damage assessment substantially reduced, although based on additional manufacturing costs of safer revolver); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 821-24 & 821 n.17, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 390-91 & 390 n.17 (1981) (jury's assessment of $ 125 million in punitive damages, although based on Ford's savings from adoption of less safe design, reduced by judge to $ 3.5 million). See also Harris, supra note 179, at 1, col. 4 (jury in Ford Pinto case based punitive damage award on the amount Ford saved by not installing safety features plus an increment to make the assessment punitive).

n233 See, e.g., Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980) ($ 1 million award upheld under passion and prejudice standard), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980).

REV_00262012

n234 See supra text accompanying notes 178-82. See also IBEW v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 50 n.14 (1979) ("[I]t cannot be ignored that punitive damages may be employed to punish unpopular defendants."); Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974):

In most jurisdictions jury discretion over the amounts awarded [as punitive damages] is limited only by the gentle rule that they not be excessive. Consequently, juries assess punitive damages in wholly unpredictable amounts bearing no necessary relation to the actual harm caused. And they remain free to use their discretion selectively to punish expressions of unpopular views.

n235 See supra notes 19-28 and accompanying text.

n236 The analysis in the previous Section suggests that the impact is asymmetrical. See supra text accompanying notes 176-84. Thus more "innocent" persons are assessed excessive penalties and fewer "guilty" are underpenalized. This asymmetry may be diminished or even eliminated, however, by the willingness of courts to reduce "excessive" punitive damage assessments.

n237 Denzau, Litigation Expenditures As Private Determinants of Judicial Decisions: A Comment, 8 J. LEGAL STUD. 295, 297 (1979). Cf. Brazil, Civil Discovery: Lawyers' Views of Its Effectiveness, Its Principal Problems and Abuses, 1980 A.B. FOUND. RESEARCH J., 787, 833, 870-71 (substantially greater abuse of discovery process perceived by lawyers whose median case size was $ 1 million or more than by lawyers whose median case size was $ 25,000 or less); Brazil, Views from the Front Lines: Observations by Chicago Lawyers About the System of Civil Discovery, 1980 A.B. FOUND. RESEARCH J. 217, 229-30 (more strategic behavior in discovery stage of larger cases); INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, PRODUCT LIABILITY CLOSED CLAIM SURVEY: A TECHNICAL ANALYSIS OF SURVEY RESULTS 13 (1977) (loss adjustment expense is function of size of claim and stage of legal system at which it is resolved).

n238 If insurance is available, the upper bound on an assessment becomes the defendant's net worth plus the available insurance. See Vilkin, Class Certified Over Its Objection, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 8, 1982, at 20, col. 2. In theory, the amount claimed by the plaintiff in the ad damnum clause of the complaint should represent an upward bound on the assessment. But that amount is entirely in the control of the plaintiff. Moreover, it does not always act as a limitation. But see Burk Royalty Co. v. Walls, 596 S.W.2d 932, 937-38 (Tex. Civ. App. 1980) (improper to allow plaintiff to amend complaint after jury renders verdict for primitive damages in amount claimed in ad damnum).

n239 See Lauter, Younger v. Kansas City Bar, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 8, 1982, at 1, col. 1 (anecdotal evidence of the attraction of specialized legal resources to cases with large punitive damage potential). The problem is exacerbated by the use of the defendant's wealth as a factor in determining the size of punitive damage assessments. See infra text accompanying notes 259-65.

n240 The diversion of resources from cases involving less wealthy defendants whose conduct merits punitive damages is likely to be a shortrun phenomenon, because additional resources (primarily in the form of lawyers and other experts with specialized skills in recovering punitive damages) will be attracted to the "punitive damages industry." In the long run, therefore, all defendants with sufficient wealth equal to the cost of extracting it from them through punitive damage assessments, and whose conduct arguably merits such assessments, will face punitive damage claims.

n241 See supra text accompanying notes 163-66.

REV_00262013

n242 D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 210-11; W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 14.

n243 See, e.g., K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A, at § 1.4 (selected pattern jury instructions). But see G. DOUTHWAITE, JURY INSTRUCTIONS ON DAMAGES IN TORT ACTIONS 90 (1981) (recommending instruction that punitive damages "should not be totally disproportionate to the compensatory damages."). The amended California jury instruction now charges the jury to "consider," inter alia, "[t]hat the punitive damages must bear a reasonable relation to the actual damages." See supra note 221.

n244 See, e.g., Ogilvie v. Fotomat Corp., 641 F.2d 581, 586-87 (8th Cir. 1981); Biundo v. Old Equity Life Ins. Co., 662 F.2d 1297, 1300 (9th Cir. 1981); Goldstein, supra note 179, at 17 (Judge Goldstein reduced the punitive damage award in Grimshaw "because it did not bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages awarded.").

n245 See, e.g., Exodus 22:9 ("For all manner of trespass [to goods] . . . whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbor.").

n246 See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. § 15 (1976) (the treble damage provision of Section 4 of the Clayton Act).

n247 See, e.g., Owen, supra note 6, at 48 (proportionality is a control device for excessive punitive damage awards).

n248 For example, three times the special damages is often used as a rule of thumb for settling personal injury claims. See H. ROSS, SETTLED OUT OF COURT 108 (1970).

n249 See Allen, Retribution in a Modern Penal Law: The Principle of Aggravated Harm, 25 BUFFALO L. REV. 1, 6-8 (1975) (discussing effect of aggravated harm under New York penal law).

n250 See, e.g., S. KADISH & M. PAULSON, supra note 19, at 326-29 (exploring theories for punishing attempts less severely than completed crimes).

n251 See, e.g., H. L. A. HART, supra note 24, at 130-31 (the distinction in punishment between attempts and completed crimes is morally unjustified).

n252 See supra text accompanying notes 39-42.

n253 See Owen, supra note 6, at 54 n.268 (punitive damages are sought in almost every products liability case); Riley, supra note 6, at 26 ("As a general rule, whenever you have a defendant who is wealthy or has liability insurance with high limits . . . the plaintiff should ordinarily seek punitive damages.").

n254 For example, marketing an appliance capable of causing serious physical injury if it malfunctions.

n255 For example, marketing bottles of water in which, it is asserted, the feet of Christ were bathed by Mary Magdelene, at $ 10 per bottle.

n256 Amos v. Prom, Inc., 115 F. Supp. 127, 131 (N.D. Iowa 1953); Zhadan v. Downtown Los Angeles Motor Distribs., Inc., 100 Cal. App. 3d 821, 836-37, 161 Cal. Rptr. 225, 234 (1979); D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 211; Note, Required Relation of Actual to Exemplary Damage, 25 BAYLOR L. REV. 127, 129 (1973).

n257 See, e.g., K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 10.3(D), at 714-16; 6 PERSONAL INJURY

REV_00262014

VALUATION HANDBOOKS, supra note 227, at 831-32. But see Owen, supra note 6, at 48 (ratio approved on appeal in serious injury or death cases rarely has exceeded 1.5:1 or 2:1).

n258 For an example, see Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38 (Alaska 1979) ("The punitive damage award . . . appears to be so out of proportion to the amount of actual damages as to suggest that the jury's award was the result of passion or prejudice."), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981). See also D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 211 (courts use the ratio rule as a "handy expression for the idea that a punitive award . . . is excessive."); J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at § 5.39, at 113 ("[W]hat the reviewing court actually does is to substitute its judgment for that of the trier of fact . . . ."); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 14 (proportionality test "has meant little more than that under the particular circumstances . . . courts do not like the size of some verdicts").

n259 D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 210. See also W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 14 (a defendant's wealth "may be received as bearing on the question of the amount which will adequately punish him for his conduct."); RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908(2) & comment e (1977) (trier of fact may consider defendant's wealth in assessing punitive damages). Some of the pattern jury instructions make specific reference to a defendant's wealth as a factor that the jury may take into account. See, e.g., ARKANSAS MODEL JURY INSTRUCTION: CIVIL § 2217 (2d ed. 1974). reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4(A); WISCONSIN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL -- PART II § 1707 (1962), reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4(J).

n260 See K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 3.5(c)(1); J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at § 5.36, at 105. By a parity of reasoning, a younger defendant in a criminal case should receive a longer prison sentence than an otherwise similarly situated older defendant so as to equilibrate the disutility from losing the enjoyment of a portion of their remaining lives. Cf. Aranson, The Simple Analytics of Sentencing, in POLICY ANALYSIS AND DEDUCTIVE REASONING 33, 39-41 (G. Tullock & R. Wagner eds. 1978) (sentencing younger offenders for longer periods than older offenders may be cost-effective because of greater expected recidivism rate of the former class).

n261 Some authors have suggested that utility curves are not uniformly convex. See, e.g., Friedman & Savage, The Utility Analysis of Choices Involving Risk, 56 J. POL. ECON. 279, 303-04 (1948).

n262 Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 HARV. L. REV. 1173, 1191 (1931). Of course, plaintiffs can be expected to take advantage of such inclinations. For example, in Hall v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 252 N.W.2d 421 (Iowa 1977), the plaintiff's counsel stated in his closing argument: "[Y]ou are not going to find a smaller sparrow than Thomas Hall and he can come into this court house on equal footing with Montgomery Wards merchandising company with one billion six hundred ninety some million dollars worth of money . . . ." Appendix to Appellant's Brief at 32, Hall v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 252 N.W.2d 421 (Iowa 1977) (copy on file with Southern California Law Review). Concern about the prejudicial effect of information regarding the relative wealth of defendants has served as the principal basis for excluding evidence of whether individual defendants are insured. See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 83, at 549.

n263 See Riley, supra note 6, at 26 ("evidence of the defendant's wealth should add to the size of what the actual damage would otherwise be, in addition to resulting in a separate award for punitive damages").

n264 See supra text accompanying notes 252-53.

n265 D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 218-19; J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra

REV_00262015

n87 Cf. O. W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 3 (1881): "Vengeance imparts a feeling of blame, and an opinion, however distorted by passion, that a wrong has been done. . . . [E] ven a dog distinguishes between being stumbled over and being kicked."

n88 Pitt-Rivers, supra note 69, at 26.

n89 See 2 W. HOLDSWORTH, HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 416-18 (3d ed. 1923).

n90 Pitt-Rivers, supra note 69, at 30.

n91 de Libellis Famosis, 5 Co. Rep. f.125a (1607) (emphasis in original).

n92 5 W. HOLDSWORTH, HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 211-12 (1924).

n93 Id. at 209.

n94 Id. at 209-10 (citation omitted).

n95 95 Eng. Rep. 794 (C.P. 1764).

n96 Id. at 795.

n97 Id.

n98 Merest v. Harvey, 128 Eng. Rep. 761, 761 (C.P. 1814).

n99 Id.

n100 The principal exceptions were the cases where agents of the Secretary of State were held liable for punitive damages after obeying the Secretary's instructions to carry out searches under general warrants. See, e.g., Wilkes v. Wood, 98 Eng. Rep. 489, 498-99 (C.P. 1763) (discussing the power of the Secretary of State and his agents to perform searches under general warrants).

n101 Jeremy Bentham was the notable exception. See J. BENTHAM, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PRINCIPLES OF MORALS AND LEGISLATION 165 (J. Burns & H.L.A. Hart eds. 1970) (objective of punishment is to prevent offenses at the least expense). See also Hewlett v. Crutchley, 128 Eng. Rep. 696 (K.B. 1813), an action for malicious prosecution in which plaintiff recovered £ 2000. Lord Mansfield percipiently observed in that case that the test for excessiveness was whether a rational person would place himself in plaintiff's position for such an amount. Id. at 698.

n102 In modern English law, a distinction is made between "aggravated" and "exemplary" damages. The former are deemed compensation for injury to plaintiff's dignity and pride; the latter are viewed as punitive in purpose. See Cassell & Co. Ltd. v. Broome [1972] A.C. 1027, 1029 (H.L.); Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] A.C. 1129, 1221 (H.L., per Lord Devlin). See generally 12 HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND 470-71, 474-75 (4th ed. 1975) (discussing the criteria for awarding aggravated and exemplary damages).

n103 See D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 205; W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 9-10; K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 2.6.

n104 See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at 9.

n105 See, e.g., Broussard v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 625 F.2d 1242, 1244 (5th Cir.

REV_00261998

note 8, at § 5.36, at 105.

n266 Prosser asserts that the majority of states adhere to the respondeat superior rule. See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 12. This statement appears to have misled some courts and scholars. See, e.g., Northrup v. Miles Homes, Inc., 204 N.W.2d 850, 858 (Iowa 1973); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1300-01. A count of the authorities cited by Prosser in support of his statement, however, indicates that there is an equal split among jurisdictions. See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 12 nn.91 & 93; Ellis, supra note 8, at 1041 n.246. Nevertheless, Prosser's misleading statement may be on its way to becoming a self-fulfilling prophecy. See J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at ch. 5, at 140-43 (21 states now follow respondeat superior; 19 follow "complicity rule").

n267 The term "complicity rule" apparently was coined by Professor Morris. See Morris, Punitive Damages in Personal Injury Cases, 21 OHIO ST. L.J. 216, 221 (1969). The rule is followed by the Restatement. See RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909 (1977). Accord RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF AGENCY § 217 C (1958).

n268 See, e.g., D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 214-15 (discussing the disagreement among courts and scholars over the fairness of assessing punitive damages against vicariously liable employers); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1299-1301 ("The logic and fairness of assessing punitive damages against a corporation for the misconduct of its employees has long been questioned by both courts and theorists.").

n269 See, e.g., Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 711-13, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 414-15 (1967) (corporation held liable for punitive damages under "complicity rule" where associate director of research in charge of defendant's Biological Science Division was wrongdoer). See also Pilon, Corporations and Rights: On Treating Corporate People Justly, 13 GA. L. REV. 1245, 1309-13 (1979) (arguing against holding corporate entities liable for the torts of corporate agents).

Courts appear to be more sensitive to the vicarious nature of punitive damage liability for acts of public officials, and more reluctant to impose it against employers who are not business corporations. See, e.g., City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 267 (1981) ("Damages awarded for punitive purposes . . . are not sensibly assessed against the governmental entity itself.") (emphasis in original); IBEW v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 50-51 (1979) (allowing punitive damage claims against unions would hurt employees by depleting union treasuries); Shiman v. Frank, 625 F.2d 80, 103 (6th Cir. 1980) (courts should be slow to award punitive damages against union locals because union members end up paying them); Rowen v. Le Mars Mut. Ins. Co. of Iowa, 282 N.W.2d 639, 662 (Iowa 1979) (punitive damages against a mutual insurance company set aside because "[t]he loss will fall on innocent policyholders" (emphasis in original)). See also Ellis, supra note 8, at 1066 (describing the inequities and inconsistencies of vicarious punitive damage liability).

Where an employer in persona authorizes or ratifies a wrongful act or recklessly employs a wrongdoing employee, punitive damages may be imposed, not under a theory of vicarious liability, but based upon the employer's independent wrongful act.

n270 See P. ATIYAH, ACCIDENTS, COMPENSATION AND THE LAW 255 (3d ed. 1980); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 69, at 458.

n271 See Williams, The Aims of the Law of Tort, 4 CURRENT LEGAL PROBS., 137, 158 (1951) ("All efforts to find a satisfactory reason for vicarious liability have failed; yet, mysteriously, the principle retains its hold upon our affections." (citations omitted)). See also Pilon, supra note 269, at 1310 ("Respondeat superior has always been easier to live with than to justify." (emphasis in original) (citation omitted)).

REV_00262016

n272 See T. BATY, supra note 10, at 146-48. But see P. ATIYAH, supra note 10, at 15-22 (some element of truth in most of the traditional justifications for vicarious liability).

n273 P. ATIYAH, supra note 270, at 255-57.

n274 Id. at 257.

n275 See P. ATIYAH, supra note 10, at 22-27; G. CALABRESI, THE COSTS OF ACCIDENTS 50-54 (1970); J. FLEMING, INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF TORTS 8-10 (1967); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 69, at 459.

n276 CALIFORNIA CITIZENS COMMISSION ON TORT REFORM, RIGHTING THE LIABILITY BALANCE 27-28 (1977) (quoted in M. FRANKLIN, INJURIES AND REMEDIES: CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORT LAW AND ALTERNATIVES 388-89 (2d ed. 1979)); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 69, at 459.

n277 P. ATIYAH, supra note 270, at 254.

n278 See supra text accompanying notes 39-42.

n279 See, e.g., City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 267 (1981) ("[A]n award of punitive damages against a municipality 'punishes' only the taxpayers, who took no part in the commission of the tort.").

n280 See supra text accompanying notes 117-43.

n281 See supra text accompanying notes 259-65.

n282 See, e.g., City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 270 (1981) ("Because evidence of a tortfeasor's wealth is traditionally admissible as a measure of the amount of punitive damages that should be awarded, the unlimited taxing power of a [vicariously liable] municipality may have a prejudicial impact on the jury, in effect encouraging it to impose a sizable award." (citations omitted)).

n283 See supra text accompanying notes 109-10.

n284 See Pilon, supra note 269, at 1309.

n285 See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 267 (1981).

n286 How the loss is distributed among the various groups is a function of the elasticity of demand faced by the firm, and that factor is wholly unrelated to the question of whether the owners deserve to be punished.

n287 The conventional view is that vicarious liability is morally unjustifiable when it results in punishment. P. FITZGERALD, CRIMINAL LAW AND PUNISHMENT 112 (1962). See also Allen, The Morality of Means: Three Problems in Criminal Sanctions, 42 U. PITT. L. REV. 737, 748 (1981) ("A form of criminal liability that admits the possibility of a guilt incapable of being avoided by the absence of criminal knowledge or purpose or by conscientious adherence to the most rigorous standards of diligence is, in the words of Montaigne, 'a malicious justice' . . . ."). Feinberg, Collective Responsibility, in DOING AND DESERVING 222, 230-31 (1970) ("The criminal punishment of superiors for actions done entirely on their own by subordinates . . . would be a barbarous regression in normal times." (emphasis in original)).

REV_00262017

n288 Cf. Allen, supra note 287, at 745 ("One of the most striking things about the history of strict and vicarious liability in American criminal law is that, despite their firm entrenchment in wide areas of our penal practice, virtually no reasoned literature has arisen in support of these doctrines." (citations omitted)). One argument that is offered to justify vicarious punitive damages is that the employer (e.g., corporate shareholders) may have benefited from the employee's wrongful act. See D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 215; Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1304-05. But that argument is inapplicable in situations where an employee's conduct has not benefitted or indeed has harmed the employer. It also fails to account for the possibility that any gain realized may have been capitalized and hence captured by persons who are no longer owners. See, e.g., Wussow v. Commercial Mechanisms, Inc., 97 Wis. 2d 136, 154-56, 293 N.W.2d 897, 906-07 (1980) (punitive damages assessed against successor corporation for acts of dissolved corporation).

n289 Even states that, on policy grounds, do not allow punitive damages to be insured recognize an exception where vicarious liability is imposed. See infra text accompanying notes 307 & 327. This pattern suggests ambivalence toward the theoretical justifications offered for vicarious punitive damages.

n290 Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1302. Cf. P. FITZGERALD, supra note 287, at 112 ("To punish one man for another's crime is often a most powerful deterrent."); Allen, supra note 287, at 747 ("Ultimately, the defense of strict liability is made to rest on the argument of deterrence . . . .").

n291 See supra text accompanying notes 115-48.

n292 But cf. W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 12 & n.95 (employee's abuse of a passenger in Goddard v. Grand Trunk Ry. of Canada, 57 Me. 202, 212-13, 224 (1869), called the "classic diatribe" justifying vicarious punitive damages on deterrence grounds). Nor is it ordinarily in the interest of a business firm to employ persons who recklessly mishandle customers' property as in Western Coach Corp. v. Vaughn, 9 Ariz. App. 336, 412 P.2d 117 (1969).

n293 There are cases in which punitive damages were assessed against both the wrongdoing employee and the vicariously liable employer. See, e.g., City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 253 (1981) (although reversed on appeal, trial court held city and employees liable for punitive damages); Shimman v. Frank, 625 F.2d 80, 101-03 (6th Cir. 1980) (punitive damages assessed against union local and its members). Such cases are exceptions to the general practice of assessing punitive damages against employers alone. See, e.g., Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgage Corp., 631 F.2d 1344, 1348 (8th Cir. 1980); Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 693, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 403 (1967); Northrup v. Miles Homes, Inc., 204 N.W.2d 850, 855 (Iowa 1973).

n294 See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 268 (1981) (indemnification against officials may be unavailable to municipalities under local law); P. ATIYAH, supra note 270, at 259.

n295 See, e.g., City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 268 (1981) (public officials are unlikely to be able to pay punitive damages imposed against a municipality); Fisher v. City of Miami, 172 So. 2d 455, 457 (Fla. 1965) (punitive damages assessed against a municipality would not deter employees, who are unlikely to be able to pay any individual judgment assessed).

n296 For example, in Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgages Corp., 631 F.2d 1344 (8th Cir. 1980), the wrongful act occurred in May 1975. Id. at 1348. Judgment was entered in 1978 and affirmed on appeal in 1980. In the cases involving the distribution and sale of MER/29, a drug that caused its users to develop cataracts, the wrongful acts occurred from 1959 to 1961, but final determination of the punitive damage issues did not occur until 1967. See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 844-49 (2d Cir. 1967); Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 694, 695-701, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 403, 404-08 (1967).

REV_00262018

n297 See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 12; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 909 comment b (1977); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1300-01.

n298 Imposing vicarious punitive damage liability for the acts of employees increases the relative cost of labor and, therefore, may change the optimum combination of capital and labor. See generally A. ALCHIAN & W. ALLEN, UNIVERSITY ECONOMICS 388-93 (3d ed. 1972) (discussing the infinite combinations of labor and capital that can be used to produce any good).

n299 The expansion of the doctrine of "negligent entrustment" may render this alternative less attractive. See Buschlen v. Ford Motor Co., 310 N.W.2d 8, 10-11 (Mich. App. 1981) (finished product manufacturer who supplies component manufacturer and who "knows or has reason to know" that equipment is being used in an unsafe manner is subject to liability), vacated and remanded for reconsideration, 322 N.W.2d 710 (1982).

n300 Insurance may be either self-insurance or formal insurance coverage purchased from a seller of insurance.

n301 Cf. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1305-06 (discussing the bureaucratization of the corporate decisionmaking process).

n302 See, e.g., Armstrong v. Republic Realty Mortgage Corp., 631 F.2d 1344, 1351-53 (8th Cir. 1980) (corporation assessed punitive damages for the acts of a single identified agent); Western Coach Corp. v. Vaughn, 9 Ariz. App. 336, 339, 452 P.2d 117, 120 (1969) (conduct of identified truck driver and manager showed sufficient evidence of reckless indifference to the interests of others to warrant punitive damages against corporation).

n303 For example, in the MER/29 cases, the identity of those employees whose acts formed the basis for the corporation's punitive damage liability seems to have been discovered without great difficulty. See Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 695-701, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 403-08 (1967) (researchers and developer of MER/29 readily identified).

n304 See supra text accompanying notes 237-40.

n305 See Dayton Hudson Corp. v. American Mut. Liab. Inc. Co., 621 P.2d 1155, 1157 (Okla. 1980); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 12-13. See generally J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at §§ 7.12, 7.13 (cases allowing insurance against punitive damage liability and cases denying its validity).

n306 See, e.g., Northwestern Nat'l Casualty Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432, 441-42 (5th Cir. 1962) (leading case holding that punitive damages may not be insured against because a "delinquent driver must not be allowed to receive a windfall at the expense of the purchasers of insurance"); Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. Village of Hempstead, 48 N.Y.2d 218, 228 & n.16, 397 N.E.2d 737, 744 & n.16, 422 N.Y.S.2d 47, 53-54 & n.16 (1979) (public policy precludes insurability of punitive damages imposed under Civil Rights Act; question reserved as to other cases).

n307 Dayton Hudson Corp. v. American Mut. Liab. Ins. Co., 621 P.2d 1155, 1160 (Okla.

REV_00262019

1980); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1313 n.276.

n308 For example, through portfolio diversification.

n309 R. KEETON, BASIC TEXT IN INSURANCE LAW 6-7 (1971); R. RIEGEL, J. MILLER & C. WILLIAMS, INSURANCE PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICES: PROPERTY AND LIABILITY 25, 28-32 (6th ed. 1976); Stellwagen, A Rational Basis for Buying Insurance, in AMERICAN MANAGEMENT ASSOCIATION, THE GROWING JOB OF RISK MANAGEMENT 125, 128 (1962).

n310 Hammond, Risk-Spreading Through Underwriting and the Insurance Institution, in SOCIETAL RISK ASSESSMENTS: HOW SAFE IS SAFE ENOUGH? 147, 149 (R. Schwing & W. Albers eds. 1980).

n311 See G. TULLOCK, supra note 146, at 111-12. See also J. FLEMING, supra note 275, at 14 ("Indemnity insurance has inevitably drained off whatever direct admonitory effect might once have attached to an adverse judgment.").

n312 R. KEETON, supra note 309, at 232-33. See M. FRANKLIN, supra note 276, at 727-33.

n313 C. GREGORY, supra note 125, at 783-85.

n314 R. KEETON, supra note 309, at 534-35.

n315 See, e.g., Rowland v. Christian, 69 Cal. 2d 108, 112-13, 70 Cal. Rptr. 97, 100, 443 P.2d 561, 564 (1968) (en banc) (availability of insurance was one factor considered in court's departure from common law distinction between trespassers, licensees, and invitees in determining the standard of care for property owners).

n316 The shape of the curve suggests an inverse relationship between the size and number of claims. See ALL-INDUSTRY RESEARCH ADVISORY COMMITTEE, 2 AUTOMOBILE INJURIES AND THEIR COMPENSATION IN THE UNITED STATES 57 (1979).

n317 See R. KEETON, supra note 309, at 557. Defense costs add approximately 35% to the payment of claims for bodily injury and 48% to the payment of claims for property damage. INSURANCE SERVICES OFFICE, PRODUCT LIABILITY CLOSED CLAIM SURVEY: A TECHNICAL ANALYSIS OF SURVEY RESULTS 13 (1977).

n318 See Hammond, supra note 310, at 152 (uncertain outcomes make insurance more expensive).

n319 Id. at 161-62, 163-64.

n320 P. ATIYAH, supra note 270, at 565; J. FLEMING, supra note 275, at 14; Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1310.

n321 See supra text accompanying notes 109-10.

n322 Diamond, Insurance Theoretic Aspects of Workers' Compensation, in NATURAL RESOURCES, UNCERTAINTY, AND GENERAL EQUILIBRIUM SYSTEMS 67, 73 (A. Blinder & P. Friedman eds. 1977). See also G. TULLOCK, supra note 146, at 111-12, 127 (purchase of insurance may cause a reduction in risk avoidance activities).

n323 See supra notes 260-61 and accompanying text.

n324 See, e.g., Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 647, 383

REV_00262020

S.W.2d 1, 5 (1964).

n325 Hartford Accident & Indem. Co. v. Village of Hempstead, 48 N.Y.2d 218, 228, 397 N.E.2d 737, 744, 422 N.Y.S.2d 47, 54 (1979).

n326 Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 279 Or. 199, 209-10, 567 P.2d 1013, 1018 (1977).

n327 E.g., Dayton Hudson Corp. v. American Mut. Liab. Ins. Co., 621 P.2d 1155, 1160 n.19 (Okla. 1980).

n328 See, e.g., Price v. Hartford Accident & Indem. Co., 108 Ariz. 485, 487, 502 P.2d 522, 524 (1972); Cieslewicz v. Mutual Service Casualty Ins. Co., 84 Wis. 2d 91, 104, 267 N.W.2d 595, 601 (1978).

n329 Wrongdoing injurers will be "punished" with higher future rates only under policies providing for "experience rating," which are not universal. See NEW YORK INSURANCE DEPARTMENT, AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE . . . FOR WHOSE BENEFIT? 48 n.96 (1970). See also R. KEETON, supra note 309, at 566 (even merit rating systems rely more on involvement than on determinations of fault).

n330 Indeed, the sum of higher future premiums is not likely to equal the amount of the assessment. Insurance premiums are based on predictions of future loss. Hence, a past damage assessment against an insured affects that insured's future premiums only insofar as it is viewed by the insurance industry as indicative of a greater likelihood of similar future assessments against that insured. A past assessment is unlikely to lead an insurance company to predict that the probability of future similar losses approaches unity. As each new policy period passes without a similar claim, the effect of a past assessment becomes even more attenuated. A large damage assessment against one insured, however, does increase the likelihood of a similar assessment against some member of the relevant class of policyholders and thus leads to an increase in the premium rate for the entire class. See Hammond, supra note 310, at 163-64. See also Northwestern Nat'l Casualty Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432, 442 (5th Cir. 1962) (punitive damage insurance would allow a delinquent driver to transfer his penalty to the driving public).

n331 Insurance effectively increases the wealth of the defendant and, hence, raises the upper boundary of assessments. See supra text accompanying note 238. It is instructive that some trial lawyers have used the presence of insurance for compensatory damages as a deterrence argument for imposing punitive damages, while others have vigorously argued in favor of allowing punitive damage insurance. Compare S. SPEISER, LAWSUIT 358 (1980) (plaintiff's attorneys argued that Grimshaw was the "clearest case for punitive damages," because Ford had insurance covering $ 200,000 for death cases and $ 67,000 for injury cases) with Morrissy, Punitive Damages -- Insurability, 1981 TRIAL LAW. GUIDE 257, 265 (criticizing an Illinois court for failing to consider that large punitive damage awards may bankrupt millions of automobile drivers if punitive damage insurance is denied) and Riley, Punitive Damages: The Doctrine of Just Enrichment, 27 DRAKE L. REV. 195, 243 (1977-78) (punitive damage insurance should only be denied in cases involving malice or an intentional harm).

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1,AT 34
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:56 PM EDT

REV_00262021

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262022

1980); Amoco Pipeline Co. v. Montgomery, 487 F. Supp. 1268, 1272 (W.D. Okla. 1980); D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 205; W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 9.

n106 See, e.g., Holden v. Construction Mach. Co., 202 N.W.2d 348, 359 (Iowa 1972).

n107 See, e.g., Boyes v. Evans, 14 Cal. App. 2d 472, 480, 58 P.2d 922, 926 (1936); CAL. CIV. CODE § 3294 (West 1970 & Supp. 1981).

n108 See, e.g., Amoco Pipeline Co. v. Montgomery, 487 F. Supp. 1268, 1272 (5th Cir. 1980) (punitive damage award is within the discretion of the trier of fact); STANDARDIZED JURY INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA § 215 (Rev. Ed. 1968) (quoted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § A 1.4, at 736 (award of punitive damages entirely within discretion of jury); K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 3.4(A), at 56 ("It is within the discretion of the jury to refuse to award punitive damages even when fraud or malice on the part of the defendant has been shown.") (citations omitted). Pattern jury instructions generally use the verb "may" when discussing the jury's award of punitive damages. See G. DOUTHWAITE, JURY INSTRUCTIONS ON DAMAGES IN TORT ACTIONS 76 (1981); K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § A1.4. But the instruction proposed in M. AVERY & D. RUDOFSKY, POLICE MISCONDUCT, LAW AND LITIGATION 13-14 (1980) (published for the National Lawyers Guild) would instruct the jury that if it finds the factual prerequisites to exist, it "should award punitive damages" (emphasis added).

n109 This definition accords with the lay understanding of "malice." See, e.g., WEBSTER'S THIRD NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY 1367 (P. Grove ed. 1976); WEBSTER'S NEW COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY 690 (H. Woolf ed. 1980); 6 OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY 83-84 (J. Murray, H. Bradley, W. Craigie, C. Onions eds. 1933). It corresponds to the meaning originally attributed to malice by the law. See Ormsby, Malice in the Law of Torts, 8 LAW Q. REV. 140, 149 (1892). And it is also consistent with one meaning attributed to malice by modern courts. See, e.g., Western Decor & Furnishings Indus., Inc. v. Bank of Am., 91 Cal. App. 3d 293, 309, 154 Cal. Rptr. 287, 296 (1979). Malice has been given a variety of other meanings by the law as well. See infra notes 150-54 and accompanying text.

n110 This definition is consistent with that adopted by the Restatement (Second) of Torts, RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS §§ 282 comment e, 500 (1965), the Model Penal Code, MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.02(2)(c) (Proposed Official Draft 1962), and some statutes. See, e.g., N.Y. Penal Law § 15.05(3) (McKinney 1975). Cf. Conway v. O'Brien, 111 F.2d 611, 612 (2d Cir. 1940) (in which Judge Learned Hand similarly defined the term "gross negligence"), rev'd, 312 U.S. 492 (1941); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 34, at 185 (defining wilfull, wanton, and reckless behavior in similar terms). As here defined, the term "reckless conduct" would be applicable to many cases decided under other rubrics, such as fraud or oppression.

n111 See supra notes 11-30 and accompanying text.

n112 For example, acts such as truthful but harmful disclosure of an official's misdeeds, informing on a law breaker, or initiating prosecution of a felon who has harmed the initiator, may be motivated by a desire to harm another, but the social benefits from such acts override any culpability attributable to the actor's mental state.

n113 That notice could, of course, be supplied by statute.

n114 Cf. O. W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 107 (1881) (under a "moral standard that would take . . . personal characteristics into account," a defendant could not be held negligent if he exercised his best judgment); Edgerton, Negligence, Inadvertence, and Indifference: The Relation of Mental States to Negligence, 39 HARV. L. REV. 849, 857 (1926) (under law of negligence, defendants' conduct is not reasonably safe unless they act as safely as a normal person, even though they may be subnormal).

REV_00261999

n115 See United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169, 173 (2d Cir. 1947). See also Brown, Toward an Economic Theory of Liability, 2 J. LEGAL STUD. 323, 332-35 (1973) (discussing ambiguities in the hand formula); Posner, A Theory of Negligence, 1 J. LEGAL STUD. 29, 32-33 (1972) (citing Hand's formulation as a precursor to economic theories of negligence); Tullock, supra note 33, at 51 (1981) (discussing the choice of institutional structures that satisfy the efficiency requirements of the Hand Formula). The Hand formula produces an efficient result because it replicates the result that parties would reach in a bargain, but for the presence of prohibitive transaction costs. The acts of potential victims also affect the likelihood of injury, a factor that is taken into account by legal concepts such as consent, contributory negligence, and assumption of risk. For purposes of this analysis, it is assumed that the victim has pursued an optimum level of avoidance.

n116 See Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. LEGAL STUD. 1, 1-6 (1980) (because of ambiguity in legal definition of negligence, strict liability may be efficient); Tullock, supra note 33, at 55 (discussing relative efficiency of strict liability and negligence).

n117 Some courts have assumed that, because a defendant has engaged in reckless conduct, the expectation of compensatory damages necessarily provides an insufficient level of deterrence. See, e.g., Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980). But that assumption ignores the educational function served by liability determinations and attendant compensatory damage awards, especially in areas of the law in which standards of liability are changing. Cf. Owen, supra note 6, 13-14 (discussing changes in social values regarding safety and corporate responsibility).

n118 See Becker & Stigler, supra note 1, at 1.

n119 See, e.g., Syester v. Banta, 257 Iowa 613, 616-17, 133 N.W.2d 666, 668-69 (1965) (68-year-old widow induced to purchase 4,057 hours of dance instruction by representations that she could become a professional dancer).

n120 For example, a financial institution may not prosecute all cases of embezzlement for fear of raising doubts as to its own security in the eyes of actual or potential customers. In addition, the elements of the offense are often difficult to prove. See generally S. KADISH & M. PAULSEN, supra note 19, at 682-703 (discussing the elements of misappropriation of property lawfully obtained).

n121 See, e.g., State v. Koonce, 89 N.J. Super. 169, 172-74, 214 A.2d 428, 429-30 (App. Div. 1965).

n122 Murder is omitted from the list because, in most states, punitive damages are not available for wrongful death. See, e.g., Robert v. Ford Motor Co., 73 A.D.2d 1025, 1026, 424 N.Y.S.2d 747, 749 (1980). But see Berenger v. Frink, 314 N.W.2d 388, 391 (Iowa 1982) (punitive damages claim survives death of injured party). According to Redden, only seven states allow punitive damages for wrongful death. K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at § 1.1, at 5. But see J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at § 5.19, at 56 n.5 (citing 18 states where punitive damages are awarded for wrongful death).

n123 In addition, the expected damage liability may be less than the expected loss in such cases because of the perpetrator's lack of wealth and, hence, effective immunity from civil liability. See Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 31.

n124 In cases involving violent intentional torts, however, the threat of criminal sanctions may offset any disparity between expected loss and expected liability for damages.

n125 See, e.g., Dillon v. Legg, 68 Cal. 2d 728, 730-31, 69 Cal. Rptr. 72, 74, 441 P.2d 912, 914 (1968) (en banc); C. GREGORY, H. KALVEN & R. EPSTEIN, CASES AND MATERIALS ON TORTS 933-34 (3rd ed. 1977) [hereinafter cited as C. GREGORY]; W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 12; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 46 (1965).

n126 See supra text accompanying notes 69-99.

n127 See, e.g., Kewin v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 409 Mich. 401, 420, 295 N.W.2d 50, 55 (1980) (analogy drawn between mental distress damages and exemplary damages). Cf. Hayes-Albion Corp. v. Kuberski, 108 Mich. App. 642, 656-57, 311 N.W.2d 122, 129 (1981) (elements of damage "incapable of ascertainment" in trade secret case can be used as a "measure of exemplary damages"). In Georgia, punitive damages may be assessed either to deter wrongdoing or as compensation for a plaintiff's wounded feelings. GA. CODE ANN. § 105-2002 (1968). But they may not be assessed for both purposes in the same case. Westview Cemetary, Inc. v. Blanchard, 234 Ga. 540, 543-44, 216 S.E.2d 776, 779 (1975).

n128 See, e.g., Fenslage v. Dawkins, 629 F.2d 1107, 1110 (5th Cir. 1980) (exemplary damages allowed, although plaintiff suffered only mental anguish damages); Meyer v. Nottger, 241 N.W.2d 911, 921-22 (Iowa 1976) (exemplary damages may be awarded for breach of contract resulting in mental anguish if the defendant acted with "a willful or reckless disregard of another's rights").

n129 See, e.g., American Export Lines, Inc. v. Alvez, 446 U.S. 274, 284-86 (1980) (recovery for loss of consortium extended to maritime jurisprudence); Weitl v. Moes, 311 N.W.2d 259, 261-70 (Iowa 1981) (child may recover damages for loss of parental consortium if injury to parent causes "a significant disruption or dimunition of the parent-child relationship"). See also Bulloch v. United States, 487 F. Supp. 1078, 1087 (D.N.J. 1980) (marital relationship not prerequisite to action for loss of consortium in New Jersey). But see Chiesa v. Rowe, 486 F. Supp. 236, 238-39 (W.D. Mich. 1980) (marital relationship prerequisite to action for loss of consortium in Michigan).

n130 See, e.g., U.S. DEP'T OF JUSTICE, JUSTICE ASSISTANCE NEWS, VOL. 2, No. 10, Elderly Limit Activities Due to Fear of Crime, 1, 1 (Dec. 1981/Jan. 1982) (75% of elderly people deliberately limit their activities because of fear of crime); Meislin, Fear of Crime is Now Woven into Fabric of New York Life, N.Y. Times, Jan. 31, 1982, § 1, at 1, col. 1 (discussing costs incurred by citizens to reduce their likelihood of being crime victims). Cf. R. NOZICK, supra note 11, at 65-71 (prohibition of certain acts is justified if those acts create fear, even in those who know they will be fully compensated for their losses).

n131 Because most criminal offenders are judgment proof, private enforcement through tort remedies is ineffective and public enforcers have a de facto monopoly. Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 31.

n132 See supra notes 36, 87-99 and accompanying text.

n133 Cf. King, The Insurability of Punitive Damages: A New Solution to an Old Problem, 16 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 345, 354 n.39 (1980) (punitive damages as a means of avoiding extrajudicial revenge not a modern justification).

n134 See supra note 36 and accompanying text.

n135 But see Scott v. Plante, 641 F.2d 117, 135 (3d Cir. 1981) (one purpose of punitive damages is the "discouragement of private retribution"), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 102 S. Ct. 3474, 73 L.Ed. 2d 1362 (1982). See also Richardson, Punitive Damages: A Common Law Doctrine in Need of Legislative Reform, TRIAL, Mar. 1980, at 30:

Although violent retaliation may no longer be a significant threat in modern times where the offender is a corporation, it occasionally appears where an individual is responsible for an "outrageous act."

REV_00262001

. . . We should not too readily reject the notion that court action and civil punishment supplement the criminal law in affording a peaceful method of purging angry responses to illegal harm.

n136 There are also a number of extralegal inducements not to engage in self-help, including the possibility of triggering retaliation by the original aggressor, with resulting further harm to the victim, damage to reputation, and other social sanctions.

n137 For example, prosecutors may exercise their discretion not to commence a criminal action. The objectives of prosecutors and wrongdoing state employees may be congruent and not well served by sanctions that tend to dull the zeal of law enforcement personnel. Moreover, when a civil action for (compensatory) damages is underway against an official, the prosecutor may consider a separate criminal prosecution to be a waste of judicial resources. Cf. Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] 1 All E.R. 367, 410 (exemplary damages available under English law for "oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional action by the servants of the government"); Ellis, supra note 8, at 1050-51 (if punitive damages are appropriate against private persons in order to effectuate goals of punishment and deterrence, they are even more appropriate against state employees, who are less likely to be criminally prosecuted).

n138 See R. POSNER, supra note 3, at § 6.12, at 143; Landes & Posner, An Economic Theory of Intentional Torts, 1 INT'L J.L. & ECON. 127, 135-36 (1981).

n139 For example, it is difficult to measure the losses associated with intentional infliction of emotional distress, malicious prosecution, false imprisonment, the mishandling of bodies, and offensive intrusions.

n140 See, e.g., Seffert v. Los Angeles Transit Lines, 56 Cal. 2d 498, 508-09, 364 P.2d 337, 343-44, 15 Cal. Rptr. 161, 167-68 (1961) (no fixed standards for valuing nonpecuniary losses such as pain, suffering, and humiliation); C. GREGORY, supra note 125, at 634-71 (discussing the recoverable elements of damages). Wrongful death is an area of the law in which the measurement of loss in pecuniary terms presents intractable difficulties. See, e.g., Mishan, Evaluation of Life and Limb: A Theoretical Approach, 79 J. POL. ECON. 687, 691-701 (1971) (constructing a theory of valuation for wrongful death based on the Pareto principle); POSNER, supra note 3, at § 6.14 (discussing the valuation problem in an ex ante context and suggesting that defendants pay a risk premium for dangerous conduct). Most jurisdictions do not allow punitive damages for wrongful death. See supra note 122.

n141 Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 348-50 (1974).

n142 C. McCORMICK, HANDBOOK ON THE LAW OF DAMAGES §§ 25-27, at 97-104 (1935).

n143 Courts today usually take the position that uncertainty in determining damages will not bar recovery once liability and injury are proven. See. e.g., Godwin v. Ace Iron & Metal Co., 376 Mich. 360, 368, 137 N.W.2d 151, 156 (1965).

n144 See Holdaway v. Hall, 29 Utah 2d 77, 78, 505 P.2d 295, 295 (1973). Because they are awarded to the plaintiff, punitive damages assessed in such cases may in fact induce breaches of the peace. If, for example, Mal's girlfriend taunted him into hitting her, she would have a chance of recovering not only compensatory damages, but punitive damages as well. Hence, the cost to her of flaunting her infidelity is lowered.

n145 See, e.g., Tiberi v. Petrella, 60 N.J. Super. 513, 516-17, 159 A.2d 439, 441 (1960).

REV_00262002

n146 See Landes & Posner, supra note 138, at 133. The position taken by Landes and Posner follows Stigler's division of offenses into "production" (property) and "consumption" (nonproperty) crimes. Stigler, supra note 1, at 529. Stigler recognizes, however, that society has branded the utility that the offender gains from an offense such as murder, rape, or arson as "illicit." Id. at 527. Accord G. TULLOCK, THE LOGIC OF THE LAW 243 (1971) ("[W]ithout some kind of interpersonal comparison of utilities, we cannot say that laws prohibiting people from using force and violence against other persons solely for the purpose of working injury are undesirable.").

n147 Cf. Polinsky, supra note 1, at 109 ("individual will engage in the activity if his realized private gain exceeds the expected fine").

n148 In cases of purposeful injury to another, there may be an alternative explanation for punitive damages that is consistent with efficiency considerations. If a victim is an unidentified member of a large group that is put at risk, the risk of loss to any one individual being quite small, each individual within the group presumably is willing to accept the risk, ex ante, for an amount equal to the person's expected loss (the gravity of loss times the risk). Where, however, the risk of loss, ex ante, is directed at a specific individual, as is usually the case in intentional torts, the victim may demand a risk premium to reflect the fact that the victim's risk of loss is quite high. This analysis is applicable in situations where the gravity of the loss is great. It has been applied thus far only in the context of risk of death. Cf. Schultz, Ethics, Economics and the Value of Safety, in SOCIETAL RISK ASSESSMENT: HOW SAFE IS SAFE ENOUGH? 217, 224 (R. Schwing & W. Albers eds. 1980) ("As the probability of death approaches unity, compensation approaches infinity."); Cohen, Toward an Economic Theory of the Measurement of Damages in a Wrongful Death Action 23-24 (1981) (unpublished manuscript) ("When the risk of death increases from 1/10,000 to 1/10, the potential victim will require considerably more than 1,000 times as great a premium to accept this risk. . . . The diminishing marginal utility of wealth is the cause of this change in the valuation of life.").

n149 See, e.g., D. DOBBS, supra note 10, at § 3.9, at 204-07 (discussing exceptions to the rule that punitive damages are awarded because of the defendant's culpable state of mind); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 9-10 (criticizing the "conscious disregard" standard employed in products liability cases); Owen, supra note 6, at 21-23 (discussing the elasticity of the mental state requirement); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1283 & n.135 (discussing vagueness of punitive damages criteria).

n150 See, e.g., Wanis v. Zwennes, 364 A.2d 1193, 1195 (D.C. 1976); Sandler v. Lawn-A-Mat Chem. & Equip. Corp., 141 N.J. Super. 437, 448, 358 A.2d 805, 811 (1976).

n151 See, e.g., Giltner v. Stark, 219 N.W. 2d 700, 708 (Iowa 1974) (legal malice found when defendant's acts demonstrate an utter disregard for consequences); Rubeck v. Huffman, 54 Ohio St. 2d 20, 23, 374 N.E.2d 411, 413 (1978) (malice can be "inferred from conduct and surrounding circumstances"). But see Toole v. Richardson-Merrell Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 713, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 415 (1967) ("malice in fact . . . may be established by a showing that the defendant's wrongful conduct was wilful, intentional, and done in reckless disregard of its possible results," conflating the distinction between "actual malice" and malice "implied in law").

n152 Y.B. Pasch. 17 Edw. 4, f. 2a, pl. 2 (1477) (per Brian, C.J.).

n153 See, e.g., Amos v. Prom, Inc. 115 F. Supp. 127, 136-37 (N.D. Iowa 1953) (malice can be inferred when defendant acts illegally or improperly without justification).

n154 Thus, Prosser includes within the definition of "malice" the "deliberate wrongful act known to be injurious to another," but excludes the "'legal malice' implied in such torts as defamation." W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 10 n.65. See also Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Herring, 267 Ark. 201, 207, 589 S.W.2d 584, 588 (1979) (jury instruction that punitive damages may be assessed if the defendant acted in reckless disregard of consequences from which malice may be inferred, formulated for negligence cases and not appropriate in intentional tort (conversion) cases).

REV_00262003

n155 See, e.g., Baltimore Transit Co. v. Faulkner, 179 Md. 598, 602, 20 A.2d 485, 488 (1941) (defining wanton as extreme recklessness); Mandolidis v. Elkins Indus., Inc., 246 S.E.2d 907, 913 (W. Va. 1978) (gross negligence distinguished from "willful, wanton, and reckless misconduct," which "requires a subjective realization of the risk of bodily injury created by the activity and as such does not constitute any form of negligence").

n156 See, e.g., First Nat'l Bank of Des Plaines v. Amco Eng'g Co., 32 Ill. App. 3d 451, 455, 335 N.E.2d 591, 594 (1975) (defining "aggravating circumstances" to include "wilful, wanton, malicious or oppressive conduct").

n157 See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 10.

n158 See, e.g., Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1378 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc) (Texas law allows punitive damages upon a showing of gross negligence); Broussard v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 625 F.2d 1242, 1244 (5th Cir. 1980) (exemplary damages can be assessed in Texas if a defendant acts with "entire want of care"), vacated, 665 F.2d 1387 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc); Sebastian v. Wood, 246 Iowa 94, 106-07, 66 N.W.2d 841, 848 (1954) (Iowa law allows punitive damages in cases of gross negligence or legal malice); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435, 440 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981) (Texas law allows punitive damages for gross negligence or a knowledgable indifference inferred from the defendant's actions); W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 10.

n159 W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 10.

n160 Wilson v. Brett, 152 Eng. Rep. 737, 739 (Ex. Ch. 1842).

n161 "Damned negligent" is the characterization adopted by one of the leading tort casebooks. See C. GREGORY, supra note 125, at 134-35. But see Conway v. O'Brien, 111 F.2d 611, 612 (2d Cir. 1940) (burden of avoidance must be so slight compared to risk that "some opprobrium or reproach attaches to" actor for act to qualify as "gross negligence"), rev'd, 312 U.S. 492 (1941).

n162 See, e.g., Amoco Pipeline Co. v. Montgomery, 487 F. Supp. 1268, 1272 (W.D. Okla. 1980) (under Oklahoma law, gross negligence, when used as a standard for punitive damage liability, is "indicated by reckless disregard for the rights or property of others"); Colligan v. Fera, 76 Misc. 2d 22, 24, 349 N.Y.S.2d 306, 309 (N.Y. Civ. Ct. 1973) (punitive damages available in cases of "gross, willful, and wanton negligence"). Cf. Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 665 F.2d 1367, 1371-74 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc) (claims of gross negligence should be measured by "conscious indifrerence" standard); Broussard v. Southern Pac. Transp. Co., 625 F.2d 1242, 1243 (5th Cir. 1980) (evidence of slight care will not establish unavailability of gross negligence), vacated, 665 F.2d 1387 (5th Cir. 1982) (en banc). But see Lucchesi v. Kent County Road Comm'n, 109 Mich. App. 254, 259, 312 N.W.2d 86, 89 (1981) ("unfortunate use of gross negligence and wilful and wanton misconduct as synonyms").

n163 See, e.g., Mandolidis v. Elkins Indus; Inc., 246 S.E.2d 907, 913-14 (W. Va. 1978) (recklessness requires knowledge and appreciation of the high degree of risk of physical harm). See also Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435, 440 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981) (gross distinguished from ordinary negligence by defendant's knowledge of peril); J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, supra note 8, at § 5.03, at 14 (driving while intoxicated is reckless conduct because defendant knew, or should have known, of the strong possibility that harm would result); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 8, at 652 (punitive damages properly awarded when "defendant had or should have had a subjective perception of the risks involved").

REV_00262004

n164 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., 655 F.2d 650, 657 (5th Cir. 1981), modified, 670 F.2d 21 (5th Cir. 1982); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46 (Alaska 1979), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 808, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 381 (1981); Rinker v. Ford Motor Co., 567 S.W.2d 655, 668 (Mo. 1978); Rawlings Sporting Goods Co. v. Daniels, 619 S.W.2d 435, 439 (Tex. Civ. App. 1981).

n165 See, e.g., Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 46 (Alaska 1979) (rejecting defendant's argument "that punitive damages have no place in a strict liability case"), modified and remanded, 615 P.2d 621 (Alaska 1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981).

n166 See, e.g., Amos v. Prom, Inc., 115 F.Supp. 127, 136 (N.D. Iowa 1953) (malice may be inferred from other facts in punitive damages cases). "Aggravated circumstances" (or "circumstances of aggravation") is perhaps the least discriminating term used to designate the basis for punitive damages, since "to aggravate" means both "to exacerbate" and "to annoy."

n167 Pattern jury instructions from a number of states are included in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4. See also 1 COUNCIL OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES OF GEORGIA, SUGGESTED PATTERN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL 90-92 (1980) (Punitive damages may be assessed "when the circumstances are such as to show an entire want of care, and an indifference to consequences."); 1 SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON UNIFORM COURT INSTRUCTIONS OF THE IOWA BAR ASSOCIATION, IOWA UNIFORM JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL NO. 3.21 (1982) (punitive damages may be awarded when a defendant acted "in such a manner and under such circumstances as to show heedlessness and an utter disregard and abandon as to what result may flow from the doing of an act or from the manner in which it is done."); Owen, supra note 6, at 21-22 (discussing the inadequacy of the jury instructions in Grimshaw).

n168 See, e.g., STANDARDIZED JURY INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA § 215 (rev. ed. 1968), reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4, at 736. A study of jury comprehension of judicial instructions found that lists of words having the same or similar meanings were a major obstacle. Charrow & Charrow, Making Legal Language Understandable: A Psycholinguistic Study of Jury Instructions, 79 COLUM. L. REV. 1306, 1326 (1979). See also id. at 1366 ("Word Lists" in Table 9).

n169 California, Virginia, and Wisconsin include definitions of malice in their pattern instructions, and California defines oppression and fraud as well. See CALIFORNIA JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 14.71 (6th ed. 1977), reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4, at 735; VIRGINIA MODEL JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL § 13.21 (1979), reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4, at 740; WISCONSIN JURY INSTRUCTIONS: CIVIL-PART II § 1707 (1962), reprinted in K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at appendix A § 1.4, at 741. The "technical vocabulary of the law" was also found by the Charrow study to be a major source of juror misunderstanding. Charrow & Charrow, supra note 168, at 1324. See also id. at 1366 ("Problematic Lexical Items" in Table 9). Cf. Clary Ins. Agency v. Doyle, 620 P.2d 194, 202 (Alaska 1980) (after deliberating for several hours, jury requested definition of "reckless indifference" and was told: "'Recklessness' is more than ordinary negligence, more than want of ordinary care, and is a wanton or heedless indifference to consequences.").

n170 See W. PROSSER, supra note 10, at § 2, at 13. The jury's role in denying punitive damages is analogous to its role in returning a "not guilty" verdict in a criminal prosecution.

REV_00262005

REV_00262023

[Tort Reform Articles] [2]

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 58
Folder 15

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*113 Harv. L. Rev. 1783, **

Copyright (c) 2000 The Harvard Law Review Association
Harvard Law Review

May, 2000

113 Harv. L. Rev. 1783

LENGTH: 14780 words

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE LAW -- THE PATHS OF CIVIL LITIGATION III. Problems and Proposals in Punitive Damages Reform

SUMMARY:
... As the modern lawsuit grows more complex and as large classes of plaintiff-victims bring suits against companies and even industries, the threat of punitive damages looms larger over defendants. ... The idea that an injurer must have notice of its potential liability for a harmful act was the driving motivation behind the important 1996 Supreme Court decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, which overturned a punitive award of $ 2 million as violative of the Due Process Clause. ... Finally, some states have attempted to reduce the apparent irrationality of punitive damage awards by bifurcating the litigation pro-cess into a liability stage and a damages stage. ... Thus, not only would courts have to consistently apply a multiplier to cover the current enforcement gap, legislatures would also have to allow plaintiffs acting as private attorneys general to recover for the costs to common property or future generations in order to achieve deterrence based on the full social harm the injurer causes. ... Culpability might remain a factor, however, for punitive damages against defendants - whether individuals or corporations - who were reckless or intended to cause injury. ... Currently, only a slight majority of states allow defendants to insure against the risk of punitive liability. ...

TEXT:
[*1783]

As the modern lawsuit grows more complex and as large classes of plaintiff-victims bring suits against companies and even industries, n1 the threat of punitive damages looms larger over defendants. Of course, punitive damages are not awarded in all cases, n2 and they are increasingly remitted by trial judges. n3 When awarded, however, they can be both spectacular and devastating - attracting popular n4 and academic n5 attention. Recent punitive jury awards include a $ 223.82 million legal malpractice award, n6 a $ 114.5 million products liability award, n7 and at least a dozen more verdicts between $ 20 million and $ 100 million. n8 These examples do not represent the ceiling for awards in unique cases: a California jury awarded a plaintiff almost $ 5 billion in a 1999 products liability case against General Motors, n9 and a Hawaii [*1784] jury awarded a plaintiff more than $ 20 billion. n10 Punitive damages are also unpredictable; juries sometimes award more than a plaintiff claims, and judges today adjust the size of jury verdicts more routinely than in the past. n11

In its current state, the doctrine of punitive damages has a questionable logical basis, is difficult to apply, and is unpredictable. This Part presents the irrational state of the law of punitive damages and suggests a modest program of reform. Section A describes the growing problem with punitive damages awards. Section B analyzes the most recent forays

Similarly, wealth considerations are inconsistent with the retributive goals of the law in other areas; criminal penalties, both monetary and non-monetary, do not increase with the defendant's wealth.

Although these suggestions promote efficiency and theoretical coherence, enhancing the rationality and symmetry of punitive damages, proposals for reform from outside the deterrence theory school augment their strength. The most obvious first step in promoting predictability and rationality is for judges instead of juries to make the primary determination of punitive awards. n117 One of the foundational inconsistencies of the doctrine of punitive damages is that punitive amounts are determined by juries while the reasons for awards are given by judges - reasons which may not be the real reasons behind the award. n118 In addition, jurors with consistent reasons or equal levels of moral condemnation may not attach consistent valuations to those reasons. n119 A judge-imposed sanction on defendants that a jury has found punitively liable would also bypass the failure of juries to take into account the necessities of corporate risk and decisionmaking. This failure manifests itself in an intuition that corporations should not "treat people like statistics" - and in the psychological bias against [*1803] corporations that has been documented in jury determinations of corporate culpability. n120 Accordingly, juries incentivize defendants toward an inefficient zero level of risk in their activities and products. To enhance the rationality of the judge's award, a panel of experts or even an independent agency might provide useful aid in assessing any cost-benefit analysis conducted ex ante by the defendant. n121 Judicial damages determinations may not represent a radical departure from current practice, as many awards are remitted by the trial judge or on appeal, n122 but would be an important step in shaping a more predictable and therefore a more effective deterrent standard for punitive liability. n123

The extension of this procedural concern is that, if punitive damages are to continue to have a retributive purpose, the procedures for their determination should be similar to those used in the criminal context, perhaps entrusting the decision to seek punitive damages to public prosecutors and turning over all damages to the state. n124 This proposal probably goes too far, n125 but it has two virtues. First, greater [*1804] procedural safeguards for punitive liability, such as a "clear and convincing" standard, n126 would curb some of the criticism that punitive damages allow criminal liability under civil standards. Second, the development of a widespread or even national punitive liability rule (for example, a stringent requirement about intent) to replace the existing system of interrelated and varying standards would alleviate both predictability concerns and the cross-jurisdictional problem. n127 Finally, acknowledging the public role and purpose of punitive damages - through state collection of punitive damages or statutory standards for judges to administer as a matter of law - would give the institution of punitive damages a clearer role in civil litigation. n128

E. Conclusion

In the short run, these changes would probably reduce the overall level of punitive awards. In a sense, this is the answer that the Supreme Court and many commentators have given to the question of how to deal with punitive damages distortions; the Gore standard, for example, created new standards under which to reduce damage awards. Removing considerations of wealth and culpability and placing punitive power in the hands of judges would probably have the effect of at least curbing the highest awards. The effect of these reforms, ideally, would be that defendants would be better able to determine the desired level of safety ex ante, avoiding some of the enforcement problems created by litigation ex post. More abstractly, these changes [*1805] raise the question: Is the legal community willing to sacrifice some tort enforcement for greater punitive damages rationality?

If compensatory damages - which seem easier rationally to predict than punitive damages n129 - can take the place of some of the enforcement lost through punitive damages reform, then a general reduction in the amount of punitive damages awarded is not necessarily a bad idea. Although the idea that punitive damages should fill the enforcement gap is most developed in law and economics scholarship, the rationale exists even in the case law. n130 If the litigation system itself can be structured better to fill the enforcement gap, courts might be open to phasing out large extracompensatory awards. It is worth asking, therefore, whether other techniques of litigation that are part of the new shape of lawsuits could fulfill those deterrent and punitive purposes more effectively than punitive damages.

REV_00262033

Two potential alternatives exist that could close the enforcement gap by encouraging more awards of compensatory damages, providing deterrence without some of the troubling theoretical inconsistencies associated with punitive damages. For example, wider acceptance of a subrogation technique would allow insurers to pay victims directly for their injuries in the proper amount, then sue the defendants for the whole. This technique would place plaintiffs and defendants on a more even playing field by allowing an experienced market player to make one major investment in litigating the claims arising from a given accident. n131 A wider latitude for class action certification might also reduce the number of cases in the courts, the number of uncompensated victims, and the size of the enforcement gap. n132 In particular, institutional class representatives would have the resources to manage both common claims and differences between class members, the time differential between the appearance of various claims, and the substantive demands of mass tort litigation. Subrogation and class actions both reduce the cost per claim of litigating multi-victim accidents and allow more plaintiffs to prosecute their claims, closing the enforcement gap.

A potentially more difficult task is to find a logical and effective way to replace the retributive value of punitive damages. This approach [*1806] assumes that, given full deterrence and compensation for victims, further retribution would still be desirable. This proposition is questionable, n133 but some alternatives to punitive damages may yet exist in this area. For example, regulatory penalties might ultimately replace the law enforcement or deterrent aspects of punitive damages. n134 The same regulatory agencies that make enforcement decisions about safety regulations might also decide whether violations are so severe as to deserve punitive liability in addition to regulatory penalties. n135 Such a suggestion adds an element of expertise to Murphy's suggestion that a state actor have responsibility for requesting punitive liability. n136

With these more systemic long-term possibilities in view, a modest program of incremental change such as that suggested above can reduce the law's reliance on punitive damages to meet the goals of deterrence and punishment. To be most effective, however, legislative bodies in each state must define the purposes of punitive damages and the desired level of deterrence. Perhaps with centralized, national data from an expert agency, states would be able to justify their particular regimes as effective in fulfilling those purposes while minimizing distortive effects. This process of definition and justification would reduce the sometimes irrational nature of punitive damages, the Court's main target in Gore, and would also solidify the theoretical framework for punitive damages. Such a project could be accomplished in time, transforming punitive damages from one of the most vilified elements of the litigation process into a useful and rational adjunct to compensatory damages.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See supra Part II; supra Part IV.

n2. A detailed empirical survey of punitive damage awards in 45 of the most populous U.S. counties found that punitive damages are awarded in less than 10% of jury trials. See Theodore Eisenberg, John Goerdt, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman & Martin Wells, The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623, 632-35 (1997). The median punitive award was $ 50,000, but because of high-end awards, the mean punitive award was $ 534,000. See id. at 634 tbl.1.

REV_00262034

n3. See, e.g., Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 22, 1999, at C16. In most cases, remittitur is not a simple reduction of the award (which would substitute the discretion of the court for that of the jury), but rather a grant of a new trial if the plaintiff does not agree to accept a lower award than that determined by the jury. See generally Johansen v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 170 F.3d 1320, 1327-29 (11th Cir. 1999) (discussing this aspect of the remittitur process).

n4. A recent high-profile products liability case, for example, was brought against McDonald's by a customer who spilled her McDonald's coffee, burning herself, and received an award of $ 2.9 million. See Liebeck v. McDonald's Restaurants, P.T.S., Inc., No. CV-93-02419, 1995 WL 360309 (D.N.M. Aug. 18, 1994).

n5. See infra pp. 1785-86, 1787-88.

n6. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 (discussing Piscitelli v. Friedenberg, No. 707862 (Cal. Super. Ct., San Diego County, Jan. 14, 1998)).

n7. See Margaret Cronin Fisk, 7,600 Volts Equals $ 114M Verdict, Nat'l L.J., Nov. 22, 1999, at A10 (discussing the post-verdict settlement in Aultman v. Duncan Mfg., No. CV-96-077 (Ala. Cir. Ct., Hale County, Oct. 29, 1999) and describing its terms).

n8. See generally Margaret Cronin Fisk, Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1999, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 28, 1999, at C4; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3.

n9. See GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, Prod. Liab. Daily (BNA) D6 (Aug. 17, 1999), available in Westlaw, BNA-PLD File.

n10. The plaintiff in this case brought suit in Hawaii state court, claiming that the Marcos family of the Philippines imprisoned and tortured him after he discovered a cache of gold hidden by Japan in the Phillippines during World War II. See Roxas v. Marcos, 969 P.2d 1209, 1218-33 (Haw. 1998). The Hawaii Supreme Court reduced the verdict to $ 6 million, finding that the jury award was too speculative. See id. at 1275.

n11. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 ("Judges hacked away at large jury awards at an unprecedented pace in 1998.").

n12. Deterrence theory seeks to minimize social harm by deterring harmful conduct to the point at which the expected benefits lost by the prevented conduct equal the expected harm it will cause. See infra p. 1795.

n13. Commentators once criticized punitive damages for failing to fit neatly into the system of compensation represented by tort law or into the retributive purposes of criminal law. For example, the highest court of New Hampshire once called punitive damages "an unsightly and unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry of the body of law." Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1872).

n14. See, e.g., W. Kip Viscusi, The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations in Environmental and Safety Torts, 87 Geo. L.J. 285, 322-27 (1998).

n15. See, e.g., GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, supra note 9 (quoting the plaintiff's attorney's defense of the $ 4.8 billion punitive award: "How else do you punish a huge corporation with a daily revenue of $ 440 million and cash on hand amounting to more than $ 12 billion?").

n16. Richard W. Murphy, Superbifurcation: Making Room for State Prosecution in the Punitive n17. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 42 (1991) (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Justice O'Connor added that, in her view, "common-law procedures for awarding punitive damages fall into the latter category." Id.

REV_00262035

Damages Process, 76 N.C. L. Rev. 463, 468 (1998).

n18. The word "distortion" is used here to describe any pernicious effects or unnecessary costs that the regime of punitive damages has on the legal system that might disappear if other mechanisms replaced it.

n19. See David G. Owen, A Punitive Damages Overview: Functions, Problems, and Reform, 39 Vill. L. Rev. 363, 378-79 (1994) (arguing that punitive damages may serve as compensation for unrecompensable injuries and litigation costs). But see Allen v. R & H Oil & Gas Co., 63 F.3d 1326, 1332 n.10 (5th Cir. 1995) (noting that few states recognize a compensatory function for punitive damages).

n20. The term "private attorney general" refers to a plaintiff who is given a cause of action by the state not primarily to enable the plaintiff to seek redress for individual injuries, but to facilitate the enforcement of public policy.

n21. See Owen, supra note 19, at 375-77.

n22. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 322-27.

n23. See, e.g., Thomas Koenig, The Shadow Effect of Punitive Damages on Settlements, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 169, 173. This perspective causes controversy not only because of its empirical claim, but also because some of its critics perceive it as serving a corporate agenda at the expense of social welfare. See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 9-14 (1990) (describing the politicization of the punitive damages debate). Punitive damages usually apply only to torts that are intentional ("really mean") or grossly negligent ("really stupid"), TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 419 S.E.2d 870, 887 (W. Va. 1992), but some of the largest awards are levied against corporations for accidents that occur in the course of their business. The perceived advantage that corporate defendants enjoy in the justice system justifies this phenomenon to some. Corporate defendants, however, fight punitive damages not only in the courtroom, but also in the pages of academic journals. See, e.g., Elizabeth Amon, Exxon Bankrolls Critics of Punitives, Then It Cites the Research in Appeal of $ 5.3B Valdez Award, Nat'l L.J., May 5, 1999, at A1 (describing Exxon's sponsorship of the research of Professors Sunstein and Viscusi).

n24. See generally, e.g., Bruce Chapman & Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: Divergence in Search of a Rationale, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 741 (1989); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1 (1982); Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 La. L. Rev. 3 (1990); A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 869 (1998); infra pp. 1795-96.

n25. See, e.g., Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 878-81; Viscusi, supra note 14, at 322-27.

n26. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n27. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 537.

n28. See, e.g., Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 975, 991-99 (1989).

REV_00262036

n29. Compare Koenig, supra note 23, at 172 (noting that additional settlement pressure may exist when parties negotiate settlements according to their perceptions of the populist views of juries), with A. Mitchell Polinsky, Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and Rational? A Comment on Eisenberg et al., 26 J. Legal Stud. 663, 665 (1997) (arguing that settlement amounts mirror trial awards and thus pose no greater threat to defendants).

n30. See Koenig, supra note 23, at 208.

n31. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 625.

n32. See David Luban, A Flawed Case Against Punitive Damages, 87 Geo. L.J. 359, 365 (1998).

n33. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 651-52.

n34. See Polinsky, supra note 29; see also E. Berton Spence, Punitive Damages in Alabama After BMW v. Gore: Are Outcomes Any More Predictable?, 59 Ala. Law. 314, 314-15 (1998) (finding that punitive damage awards were no more predictable after the redefinition of excessiveness review).

n35. See Cass R. Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman & David Schkade, Assessing Punitive Damages (with Notes on Cognition and Valuation in Law), 107 Yale L.J. 2071 (1998).

n36. Id. at 2074.

n37. See infra pp. 1796-97.

n38. 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n39. In Browning-Ferris Industries. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989), the Court held that the Excessive Fines Clause applies only when part of a damages award is to be paid to the state. See id. at 264; see also infra note 74. Pacific Mutual Life Insurance. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991), applied the Due Process Clause to the excessiveness review of punitive damages, upholding vicarious punitive liability for up to four times the amount of a compensatory award. See id. at 23-24. The due process inquiry depended on states' historical reliance on punitive damages, see id. at 17, and on procedural safeguards used by the state court to ensure the fairness of the award, see id. at 19-20. In TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993), the Court sustained a punitive award of $ 10 million on compensatory damages of $ 19,000, calling into question the existence of "excessiveness" standards at all. See id. at 446, 466. To add more procedural certainty to the propriety of a given award, the Court also ruled that judicial review must be available for awards of punitive damages. See Honda Motor Corp. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 435 (1994).

n40. Gore, 517 U.S. at 564.

n41. See id. at 567.

n42. Id. at 585-86.

n43. See id. at 585.

n44. See id. at 574-75.

n45. See id.

REV_00262037

n46. See id. at 582-83.

n47. 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n48. 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n49. The ratio of punitive damages to actual compensatory damages upheld in TXO was higher than 10:1, but the Court held that the relevant ratio in this case was the much lower ratio of punitive damages to potential compensatory damages. See id. at 462. On this basis, the Court noted that a ratio of up to 10:1 would not be presumptively unconstitutional. See id.

n50. See Gore, 517 U.S. at 585-86.

n51. Id. at 606 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

n52. Compare Continental Trend Resources, Inc. v. Oxy USA, Inc., 101 F.3d 634, 643 (10th Cir. 1996) (holding that courts must give plaintiffs the choice between remittitur and a new trial), and Lee v. Edwards, 101 F.3d 805, 813 (2d Cir. 1996) (same), with Johansen v. Combustion Eng'g, Inc., 170 F.3d 1320, 1331-32 (11th Cir. 1999) (holding that courts may simply reduce awards on constitutional grounds without giving plaintiffs a choice).

n53. 97 F.3d 914 (7th Cir. 1996).

n54. See id. at 920. Although he relied on Gore and found that the punitive award of $ 22,500 was consistent with Gore's two "numerical" guideposts (the ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages and comparable awards for similar conduct), Judge Posner questioned the ratio guidepost, stating that "the smaller the compensatory damages, the higher the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages has to be in order to fulfill the objectives of awarding punitive damages." Id. at 919. Posner's remark echoes the deterrence theorists' concern over the enforcement gap. See infra pp. 1795-96.

n55. 101 F.3d 805 (2d Cir. 1996).

n56. See id. at 813.

n57. 101 F.3d 634 (10th Cir. 1996).

n58. See id. at 641.

n59. See Lee, 101 F.3d at 813.

n60. See Jordan v. Shaw Indus., Inc., 131 F.3d 134, 1997 WL 734029, at *5 (4th Cir. 1997).

n61. BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 583 (1996) (quoting TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 481 (1993) (O'Connor, J., dissenting)).

n62. Parsons v. First Investors Corp., 122 F.3d 525, 530 (8th Cir. 1997).

n63. Riley v. Kurtz, No. 98-1077, 1999 WL 801560, at *8 (6th Cir. 1999).

n64. See Gore, 517 U.S. at 574 ("Elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment, but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose.").

REV_00262038

n65. Inter Med. Supplies, Ltd. v. EBI Med. Sys., Inc., 181 F.3d 446, 468 (3d Cir. 1999).

n66. See Owen, supra note 19, at 384-85 ("Vague standards ...provide[] ...flexibility to achieve justice on the individual facts.").

n67. Punitive damages are a state law problem insofar as the law of punitive damages is state doctrine. However, to treat the problem on a state-by-state basis ignores some of the most salient justifications for the use of punitive damages, which require national change. See infra p. 1794.

n68. For example, in Wilson v. IBP, Inc., 558 N.W.2d 132, 148 (Iowa 1996), the Iowa Supreme Court combined the various excessiveness factors of Gore, Haslip, and several state cases and balanced them against one another. In the Alabama cases of McKowan v. Bentley, No. 1971357, 1999 WL 667290, at *7 (Ala. Aug. 27, 1999), and Cherokee Electric Cooperative v. Cochran, 706 So. 2d 1188, 1194 (Ala. 1997), the Alabama Supreme Court held that the state practice of awarding punitive damages only in wrongful death actions overcame Gore's requirement that punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to compensatory damages "because a state can make homicide expensive." Id. at 1194. In addition, various courts have elided the due process "notice" guideposts of Gore by embracing the notion that extremely reprehensible conduct can diminish the importance of the other two factors. See, e.g., Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp. v. Malone, 972 S.W.2d 35, 52 (Tex. 1998).

n69. See, e.g., Routh Wrecker Serv., Inc. v. Washington, 980 S.W.2d 240, 244 (Ark. 1998) (explaining that the state test of excessiveness, whether the award "shocked the conscience" of the trial court, should be considered prior to the Gore guideposts and applying both the state and federal tests in turn).

n70. For example, the South Carolina Court of Appeals noted that "although punitive damages have received increasing academic criticism in recent years ...the doctrine's viability is unchallenged in South Carolina's jurisprudence." Clark v. Cantrell, 504 S.E.2d 605, 609 & n.2 (S.C. Ct. App. 1998) (citing Owen, supra note 19, and Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24). In a few cases, however, academic discussion has reinforced state decisions. See, e.g., Jones v. Shaffer, 573 So .2d 740, 744 (Miss. 1990) (citing Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law (1987), to justify a compensatory use of punitive damages). The slight notice of academic theories by state courts is surprising in light of Justice Breyer's observation in Gore that a state's reliance on a "constraining "economic' theory" might be a factor favoring deference in federal court excessiveness review. BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 594 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring).

n71. See, e.g., N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. 507:16 (1986). Other states prohibit punitive damages for certain types of cases. For a complete list of state statutes in effect in 1996 concerning punitive damages, see Gore, 517 U.S. at 614 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting).

n72. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-102 (1997); Conn. Gen. Stat. 52-240b (1997).

n73. See, e.g., Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1 (Supp. 1999); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994). Other states use lower caps in cases in which compensatory awards are low. See, e.g., Nev. Rev. Stat. 42.005 (1999).

n74. See, e.g., Iowa Code 668A.1 (1998); Utah Code Ann. 78-18-1 (1996). Although these laws may implicate the Excessive Fines clause of the Constitution, because they involve payment to the state, several courts have upheld them against such challenges. See, e.g., Fust v. Missouri, 947 S.W.2d 424 (Mo. 1997); see also Sonja Larsen, Annotation, Validity,

REV_00262039

Construction, and Application of Statutes Requiring that Percentage of Punitive Damages Awards Be Paid Directly to State or Court-Administered Fund, 16 A.L.R.5th 129 (1993).

n75. People injured in states with punitive damages caps or bans further subsidize these taxpayer redistributions because they suffer from injury at the same rate as people in states that allow punitive damages, see Viscusi, supra note 14, at 288-90, but they cannot recover as much for their injuries.

n76. See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code 3295 (West 1997); Mo. Rev. Stat. 510.263 (Supp. 1999).

n77. Murphy, supra note 16, at 472.

n78. Bifurcation is also an option in federal trials, though it is not mandatory. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(b).

n79. See Koenig, supra note 23, at 208.

n80. This literature is extensive, and the authors document it thoroughly. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 876 n.12, 877 n.14. Among the major works they cite are Darryl Biggar, A Model of Punitive Damages in Tort, 15 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 1 (1995); Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143 (1989); and Ellis, supra note 24.

n81. See generally Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24.

n82. See id. at 874-75.

n83. The ideas summarized in this paragraph have been developed over the course of more than a quarter-century of law and economics scholarship. See, e.g., Guido Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents: A Legal and Economic Analysis (1970); William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law (1987); Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law (2d ed. 1972); Shavell, supra note 70; Gary S. Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, 76 J. Pol. Econ. 169 (1968).

n84. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 874.

n85. See id. at 905-10.

n86. See id. at 874-75.

n87. See id. at 874. To use their simple example, suppose an injurer causes $ 100,000 worth of harm to each of its victims, and the probability of the injurer being caught and held legally responsible is one in four. The total damages should thus be $ 400,000 to each victim who successfully sues: a punitive award of $ 300,000 in addition to the compensatory award of $ 100,000. Such an award will cause the injurer to pay for the total social injury caused, despite the existence of a 75% enforcement gap. See id. at 874-75.

n88. See id. at 905-10.

n89. For example, if a state permits compensation for emotional distress in addition to injuries, this policy represents a judgment that the conduct of the injurer was more reprehensible than conduct for which no such compensation is allowed. It might be argued that culpability should be measured by potential harm, an approach approved by the Supreme Court in TXO. See TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 462 (1993). Polinsky and Shavell reject this argument, contending that a potential defendant will structure his conduct to account for probable compensatory and punitive damages, so the ex post award of only actual damages has no effect on deterrence. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 914-17.

REV_00262040

n90. If, for example, a doctor leaves a surgical tool inside a patient, compensatory damages will on average be quite high (because most plaintiffs will sue and win), and punitive damages are therefore unnecessary. See Polinsky and Shavell, supra note 24, at 906. The same logic, the authors claim, applies to mass torts such as the Exxon Valdez oil spill. See id. at 903-04.

n91. See id. at 910-14.

n92. Id. at 911.

n93. See id. at 933.

n94. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 288-90.

n95. Id. at 334.

n96. See generally id. There is a flaw in Viscusi's argument caused by the cross-jurisdictional problem, see supra p. 1794, which limits the effectiveness of state reforms. Because corporations are likely to adjust their level of safety to the national average of liability instead of customizing their products and behavior for each state, there should not be variations in the accident rate between states with varying levels of liability. National corporations can minimize costs by allowing the same number of accidents in each jurisdiction (using an optimal average level of safety) and paying different amounts in different states when held liable for those accidents. See also Luban, supra note 32, at 363-64.

n97. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 335 (noting the possibility of regulatory enforcement of corporate safety requirements).

n98. Indeed, in their empirical study, Professor Eisenberg and his colleagues found no evidence to suggest that punitive damages are awarded against corporations more frequently than against individuals. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 646. They did, however, find that the amount of punitive awards is generally higher against businesses. See id. at 649.

n99. This problem, at least, is a limitation of Polinsky and Shavell's specific formulation of the model. It might be possible to construct a system in which a multiplier not only aggregated unenforced claims, but also forced injurers to internalize the entire cost of accidents; this system would, however, require extraordinary efforts at valuation by legislatures and unprecedented cooperation among judges. Even if such costs could be measured and agreed upon, the necessary systematic recalibration of measurements of individual harm by reference to social harm would be impossible. For a documentation of the practical problems of legislative valuation as a determinant of social harm, see Luban, supra note 32, at 375-77 (citing the Occupational Safety and Health Act, 29 U.S.C. 666(e) (1994), which "treats serial homicide as a misdemeanor," as an example of a law that cannot represent Congress's considered judgment about the value of deterrence).

n100. In addition, this system would create distributional problems. Because early awards are high, there is more incentive for anyone with a colorable claim of injury to sue; in turn, less "enforcement gap" damages are available to each plaintiff. These competing incentives might arrive at some equilibrium, but one in which damages to compensate plaintiffs with lower expected damages would be transferred in the form of punitive damages to those plaintiffs with higher expected damages (and therefore enough incentive to bring suit). Payment of punitive damages into state funds would exacerbate this problem by reducing the plaintiff's claim value, pricing more of the claimants with lower expected damages out of litigation.

REV_00262041

n101. See, e.g., Fisk, supra note 8; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3; Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1997, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 23, 1998, at C2.

n102. See, e.g., Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46 (finding that the potential for punitive liability affects settlement amounts).

n103. See, e.g., Fisk, supra note 8; Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3; Verdicts: The Big Numbers of 1997, supra note 101.

n104. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46.

n105. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 903-04 (discussing the case of the Exxon Valdez).

n106. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 2, at 644-46.

n107. See, e.g., GM's Challenge to $ 4.9 Billion Judgment Set for August 26 Hearing in California, supra note 9 (products liability).

n108. See, e.g., Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3 (legal malpractice).

n109. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 905-10.

n110. Recklessness in such cases might be defined as the failure to perform any cost-benefit analysis at all or by creating some other standard, see infra note 127.

n111. Punitive awards in cases involving intentional injuries have generally been less controversial than in other cases. This acceptance of punitive damages may result from the fact that intentional torts look the most like "aggravated wrongs" for which the retributive function of punitive damages is most appropriate. See Owen, supra note 19, at 375-77; see also William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, An Economic Theory of Intentional Torts, 1 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 127, 127-39 (1981) (explaining that economic analysis is relevant to deterring the intentional behavior of tortfeasors).

n112. See Robert G. Schloerb, Richard L. Blatt, Robert W. Hammesfahr & Lori S. Nu-gent, Punitive Damages: A Guide to the Insurability of Punitive Damages in the United States and its Territories 39 (1988); Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 931 & n.193.

n113. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 933 (noting that the fear of a large judgment is a greater deterrent to a risk-averse defendant than a stream of well-calibrated insurance premiums).

n114. This feature of insurance has a distributional benefit as well as a deterrent benefit, as it forces an entire industry that engages in a risky activity to pay for that activity, instead of placing the entire burden on the single defendant who is "struck by lightning" when a jury award is assessed. Furthermore, the distribution might be across an "industry" of risk takers comprising individuals. Shifting the burden of cost-benefit analysis to the insurance industry lessens the critique, see supra p. 1797, that some of those individuals might not be acting rationally at the time of an accident.

n115. See Polinsky & Shavell, supra note 24, at 910-14.

n116. See id. The idea that wealth need not play a part in punitive damage awards has into the field by the courts, and section C discusses academic reform proposals. Section D argues that deterrence theory n12 can provide a foundation for bringing more rationality and consistency to punitive damages.

REV_00262042

A. The Problem with Punitive Damages

Criticism of punitive damages is widespread, but critics express widely divergent views on precisely what is wrong with them. Once attacked on formal grounds, n13 opponents today criticize them for failing to supplement the other elements of the civil justice system effectively. These opponents believe that punitive damages threaten productive members of society with insolvency simply to satisfy the public's indignation upon seeing the innocent harmed. n14 To advocates, punitive damages are the only way for society to express that indignation in a way that a corporation will understand: n15 by checking the power of corporate America, punitive damages prevent the public from "driving repainted, exploding Ford Pintos while washing down [*1785] unsafe drugs with scalding coffee." n16 Moderates see the virtues of punitive damages but also fear their misapplication. As Justice O'Connor has written: "Punitive damages are a powerful weapon. Imposed wisely and with restraint, they have the potential to advance legitimate state interests. Imposed indiscriminately, however, they have a devastating potential for harm." n17

Many complaints concerning punitive damages share a common theme: because the practical and theoretical boundaries of punitive damages are undefined, especially as established by jury awards, such awards act as distortions n18 on the legal system. These distortions may exist because it is hard to identify a role that punitive damages uniquely play in the justice system. Punitive damages compensate victims for certain losses that standard compensatory awards do not cover; n19 they act as punishment for bad acts, empowering private attorneys general n20 to seek retribution where criminal sanctions prove impracticable; n21 and they supplement the important deterrent functions of both tort and criminal law. This lack of a unique role opens punitive damages to the criticism that another, perhaps existing, feature of the legal system could replace them. Developments in punitive damages in the last several years are attempts to cure some of these distortions.

Some punitive damages reformers believe that the purpose of damages is to induce potential defendants to take a socially optimal level of care, not to deter harmful conduct completely. Traditional tort reformers, therefore, argue that punitive damages, by painting a target on the chests of the companies with the deepest pockets, stifle innovation and harm shareholders. n22 The winners are individual plaintiffs who were "lucky" enough to be injured; the losers are defendants and [*1786] the general public, as defendants pass the cost of punitive liability along to consumers through higher prices for products and services. n23

Law and economics scholars and deterrence theorists espouse a related view: n24 the potential for enormous punitive awards distorts the traditional tort mechanisms of compensation (or insurance) and deterrence by introducing irrelevant factors into calculations of the cost of harmful conduct. Punitive damages make injurers pay for much more than the harm they cause, in effect overdeterring some kinds of conduct and discouraging some socially beneficial activity. n25 In other words, punitive damages make ex ante calculations of potential liability almost impossible.

The notice that is important to deterrence theorists for economic reasons is important to courts for the additional reason that predictability is an important rule of law value - sometimes elevated to the level of a due process requirement. The idea that an injurer must have notice of its potential liability for a harmful act was the driving motivation behind the important 1996 Supreme Court decision in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, n26 which overturned a punitive award of $ 2 million as violative of the Due Process Clause. Punitive damages, however, are sometimes so great that potential defendants cannot anticipate support in the case law. In Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33 (7th Cir. 1996), which was lost in the aftermath of Gore, Judge Posner found that "none of [the purposes served by awarding punitive damages] depends critically on proof that the defendant's income or wealth exceeds some specified level.... Rich people are not famous for being indifferent to money." Id. at 35. He therefore held that a plaintiff could not dispute his award of punitive damages simply because the jury failed to consider the defendant's wealth. See id. at 36.

REV_00262025

n117. In some states, this idea is already in practice. For example, in Kansas, the jury as fact-finder decides whether punitive liability is appropriate, and then the judge determines the proper amount of punitive damages. See Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701 (1994). This suggestion has been made elsewhere. See Paul Mogin, Why Judges, Not Juries, Should Set Punitive Damages, 65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179, 207-23 (1998).

n118. It is true that this situation exists in many areas of civil litigation, but if punitive damages are to have both deterrent and retributive purposes in addition to compensatory purposes, then an analogy may again be drawn to criminal law, in which a jury determines liability (guilt), but a judge conducts the sentencing. "How great were the plaintiff's injuries?" is a question of fact, and "How must the law incentivize rational behavior on the part of the defendant?" is a question of law - and in the latter area, judges have more expertise than juries.

n119. See Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 35, at 2074. Despite this fact, the authors argue that juries should continue to be used in assessing punitive damages, but they recommend changes that would impose some uniformity on the dollar amount that accompanies a given jury's intended level of punishment. See id. at 2121-24. They also acknowledge, however, that "if optimal deterrence is the purpose of the award of punitive damages, the jury system is an extremely bad institution." Id. at 2111.

n120. See, e.g., Viscusi, supra note 14, at 328-30. Viscusi discusses the hindsight bias that produces a "common assumption" in juries that firms "should have anticipated all possible accidents." Id. at 328. He also notes that juries may overestimate the importance of small probabilities, leading them to penalize corporations when risks, acceptable in the abstract, turn into concrete injuries. See id. at 329.

n121. It has been suggested that entrusting expert administrators to determine damages amounts can best eliminate the valuation and risk biases that jury verdicts reflect, removing judges from the equation entirely and bestowing the benefits of "bureaucratic rationality" on the system. See Sunstein, Kahneman & Schkade, supra note 35, at 2124 ("An administratively operated schedule of fines and penalties seems better than juries at producing deterrence, for such a system would reduce the costs of decision and probably reduce the cost of errors as well.").

n122. See Reductions: Verdicts Reduced After Trial, supra note 3.

n123. The bifurcation responses enacted in several states take steps toward this ideal, as the damages portion of a trial is sometimes heard only before a judge, see Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240b (1997); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3702(a) (1994), and as these responses often carry other procedural safeguards such as separate discovery, see, e.g., Ala. Code 6-11-20 (1993); Cal. Civ. Code 3294(a) (1997); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(5) (1999). Importantly, the bifurcated trial is a way to remove some forms of jury bias without removing the jury. Some evidence, such as corporate cost-benefit analyses, which would be relevant to a finding of negligence at the liability phase, might be seen as an indication of "heartlessness" at the damages phase and inflate an award. See Developments in the Law - The Civil Jury, 110 Harv. L. Rev. 1408, 1529-30 (1997). Bifurcation thus can be seen as another important procedural safeguard that advances the rationality goal in awarding punitive damages.

REV_00262043

n124. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 501-03.

n125. This scheme poses several problems, including a reduction in a plaintiff's incentive to sue and the placement of decisions that are essentially regulatory in the office of state prosecutors. A different way of placing the punitive function in state hands would be to entrust punitive enforcement to regulatory agencies, see Viscusi, supra note 14, at 317-20, although this too would essentially remove punitive liability from the realm of civil litigation altogether.

Both of these suggestions would encounter opposition not only from the plaintiff's bar, but also from academics who advocate the virtues of the private attorney general system of tort enforcement. These writers prefer the private attorney general "bounty hunter" to either the bureaucrat or the unchecked corporate sector. Luban, supra note 32, at 366. In this view, the increased incentive to sue created by punitive damages is not a distortion caused by punitive damages, but a valuable way of privately financing law enforcement. See id. at 367.

A compromise would be to divert all punitive awards to the state, encouraging private attorneys to seek punitive damages by paying them fees equal to their lost opportunity cost. This compromise would remove the incentive for plaintiffs to sue for the stars in hopes of a giant windfall, but it would also prevent a large, non-criminal enforcement burden from being placed on the shoulders of public prosecutors. Enforcement decisions, furthermore, might be made by neutral state officials, but the further punitive liability investment in a given claim would be made by the private attorneys who already have a substantial investment in the litigation.

n126. Such a standard has support in both statutory and case law. See, e.g., Watkins v. Ford Motor Co., 190 F.3d 1213, 1217 n.2 (11th Cir. 1999) (citing Ga. Code Ann. 15-12-5.1(b) (1999), which requires clear and convincing evidence of the defendant's intent before imposing punitive liability). But see Honda Motor Corp. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415, 433 (1994) (noting that a clear and convincing standard of liability may not be an adequate safeguard against excessive punitive awards).

n127. In a system of punitive damages based solely on deterrence, for example, such a rule might remove punitive liability for a defendant who is able to show that he conducted a cost-benefit analysis ex ante for the product or activity in question. The strictness of the desired rule could be adjusted by changing the assumptions required in performing the analysis.

n128. This public role might extend to coordinating one punitive award for the defendant's conduct across the entire state - or better yet, nation - instead of subjecting the defendant to repeated punitive awards for the same conduct in every state. See Murphy, supra note 16, at 473, 524-27.

n129. See supra pp. 1787-88.

n130. See, e.g., Nutrivida, Inc. v. Inmuno Vital, Inc., 46 F. Supp. 2d 1310, 1316-17 (S.D. Fla. 1998) (using punitive damages to deter conduct that would be undeterred by compensatory damages); cf. Wilson v. IBP, Inc., 558 N.W.2d 132, 145 (Iowa 1996) (using punitive damages to deter potential harm that might otherwise go undeterred); Bowen v. Caldor, Inc., 710 A.2d 267, 285 (Md. 1998) (same).

n131. Cf. David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 849, 889-92 (1984) (describing the claim investment incentives of plaintiffs' attorneys).

n132. See infra pp. 1809-10.

REV_00262044

n133. It is questionable because of the problems inherent in attempting to punish a corporation for its past conduct - how do you teach a corporation "a lesson," especially when its directors or officers may not have been affiliated with the corporation when the injury occurred? In addition, the "retributive" function of punitive damages might not be necessary if there were a reliable way to fill the enforcement gap; the reason "punishment" must be an object of punitive damages may simply be that compensatory damages will inevitably fall short of the total social harm caused by the injury.

n134. See Viscusi, supra note 14, at 317-20 (describing how government regulation provides incentives for safety).

n135. Independent agencies might use promulgated regulations to adjudicate punitive liability, further enhancing predictability.

n136. See supra p. 1803.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:05 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

them, making it impossible to choose a course of action beforehand.

The power of private attorneys general to impose tort sanctions under a rationale normally protected by state discretion and criminal [*1787] procedural safeguards adds another layer of distortion to both the civil and criminal systems of deterrence and punishment. Punitive damages allow retribution to intrude into the realm of civil litigation, which is troubling because civil standards of proof are lower than criminal standards and the moral culpability of the defendant may be less clear. n27 If it is acknowledged that punitive damages have the purpose of retribution for bad acts, then it is unclear why overzealous and interested "prosecutors" are better suited for such a purpose than criminal prosecutors and the safeguards of the criminal law. n28

Finally, the difficulty of predicting the potential liability for a harmful act pressures defendants to settle cases - especially class actions - in which punitive awards are possible, however unlikely. Some dispute this effect for garden-variety torts, n29 but mass tort cases provide a clear example of the settlement leverage that the threat of a punitive award bestows upon plaintiffs. n30 To some, this pressure for settlement when the plaintiff has very little chance of winning may result in an inflated settlement amount n31 and the appearance of an admission of guilt. To defend the system, plaintiffs' advocates describe a system in which corporations play hardball with plaintiffs who have legitimate claims, wearing them down by threatening to drag out litigation until they settle for a fraction of their claims' worth. n32

The very existence of these problems is in dispute, and the dispute is compounded by the fact that empirical data on punitive damages that can garner the agreement of a wide cross-section of the legal community continues to prove elusive. Professor Eisenberg and his colleagues, for example, argue that not only is there a rational pattern to the award of punitive damages, but that there is also a discernible ratio of punitive to compensatory damages that makes punitive amounts predictable. n33 Professor Polinsky, however, uses this same data to support the proposition that punitive damages are irrational, [*1788] significant, and unpredictable. n34 Another study n35 reveals a distortion arising not from legal standards or processes, but from human psychology. This study concluded that potential jurors "have a great deal of difficulty in mapping such [moral] judgments onto an unbounded scale of dollars. Shared moral judgments but erratic, unpredictable, and arbitrary awards, possibly even meaningless awards, are a potential product of this difficulty." n36 Finally, Professor Viscusi uses data about accidents to argue that punitive damages have no effect on behavior and therefore should be abolished as superfluous. n37 Unfortunately, the empirical uncertainty surrounding punitive damages makes it difficult to support most reform proposals with convincing data.

B. Federal and State Responses to the Punitive Damages Problem

There have been several efforts in recent years to define the legal foundations of punitive damages and to describe ways to apply them intelligently and systematically. However, these responses have not been entirely satisfactory: the Supreme Court offered a possibility for national change that has failed in its implementation, and although states have proposed several interesting solutions, states can only partially alleviate the problem because of their limited jurisdiction.

1. The Supreme Court and BMW v. Gore. - During the 1990s the Supreme Court was quite active in the area of punitive damages, issuing five different rulings, including BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore n38 in 1996. Most of the Court's activity early in the decade concerned how to determine whether a particular punitive award is excessive and therefore in violation of the Excessive Fines Clause of the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. n39 Although the Supreme Court could not possibly, in a [*1789] handful of cases, bring order and uniformity to the various state law doctrines that allow for punitive damages, the Court did articulate a test that would systematically reduce some of the highest awards. The Court's rulings, however, failed to reform punitive damages law (or to stem the tide of criticism), and the apportionment of punitive damages seems no more evenhanded or principled at the end of the decade than it was at the beginning. The Court's rulings were inadequate in two significant respects: first, they failed to articulate a coherent rationale for punitive damages or describe constitutionally permissible limits on the purpose of punitive liability; and second, their standards for determining "excessiveness" are subject to almost infinite discretion and make the outcome of the individual case no more predictable than it was before.

REV_00262026

The most important theme to emerge from the Court's recent punitive damages cases was that the Due Process Clause limits the size of punitive damages awards. The plaintiff in Gore, Dr. Ira Gore, had bought a BMW that the dealer had represented to him as new; the car had in fact been repainted and was worth $ 4000 less than Gore was led to believe. The jury awarded Gore the $ 4000 in compensatory damages, plus $ 4 million in punitive damages, which Gore had claimed "would provide an appropriate penalty for selling approximately 1000 cars for [$ 4000] more than they were worth." n40 On BMW's post-trial motion, the Alabama Supreme Court remitted the award to $ 2 million. n41

The Supreme Court struck down the award as unconstitutional, declaring it "grossly excessive" and thus a violation of the Due Process Clause. n42 The Court based its decision on rule of law values, noting that any damages would be excessive if the defendant could not have had notice of them at the time of the conduct. n43 In doing so, the Supreme Court established three "guideposts" for determining the excessiveness of punitive awards: the degree of reprehensibility of the conduct, the disparity between the actual or potential compensatory and punitive damages awarded, and the amounts of punitive awards in comparable cases. n44 Writing for the Court, Justice Stevens reasoned that such considerations would further the legitimate goals of punitive damages: adequate notice both protects the defendant from the quasi- [*1790] criminal, retributive aspects of punitive damages and ensures the proper working of the regime's deterrent function. n45 However, the Court declined to suggest a mathematical bright line for constitutionality, relying on the "reprehensibility" guidepost to limit or justify the fruits of the jury's imagination. n46 Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip n47 and TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. n48 had upheld punitive-compensatory ratios of only 4:1 and 10:1 n49 respectively, and the Court concluded that the 500:1 ratio present in the Gore case did not survive constitutional review. n50

2. The Application of Excessiveness Review in Federal Courts. - Dissenting in Gore, Justice Scalia claimed that the "test" that the Court developed would provide no guidance at all to courts: "These crisscrossing platitudes yield no real answers in no real cases." n51 The development of punitive damages law in the federal courts has confirmed his fears. Eight circuits have applied Gore to determine the excessiveness of punitive awards, with some circuit conflict emerging over procedural aspects of the remittitur process n52 and with mixed results over the substantive meaning of the guideposts.

In most cases, the federal circuit courts' reasoning has some basis in the language of Gore, but their holdings do not necessarily follow from that decision. For example, in Cooper v. Casey, n53 Judge Posner of the Seventh Circuit upheld a 12:1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages (higher than the potential ratio explicitly approved in TXO) because he determined that the moral culpability of the defendant was so high that that particular Gore factor should carry added weight. n54 In several other cases, courts of appeals used factors [*1791] external to the Gore tests to strike down punitive awards that the Supreme Court might have upheld under Gore. In Lee v. Edwards, n55 after finding that the district court's award passed the Gore test, the Second Circuit nonetheless reduced the award on the grounds that the court below had no discretion to allow such a high award. n56 Similarly, the Tenth Circuit in Continental Trend Resources, Inc. v. OXY USA, Inc. n57 found that the Gore guideposts supported a large punitive award, but the court nevertheless refused to uphold an award that it found to be unnecessarily large for purposes of deterrence. n58

REV_00262027

An additional problem is that, because Gore failed to articulate a bright-line rule, courts have used precedent to expand the permissible ratio of punitive to compensatory awards far beyond those sanctioned in Haslip and TXO and even beyond the ratio struck down in Gore. The punitive award in Lee was $ 75,000, which represented a ratio of punitive to compensatory damages of 75,000:1 because the compensatory award was nominal. n59 Relying on this precedent, the Fourth Circuit upheld ratios of up to 488:1, despite the fact that the compensatory damages awarded were actual, not nominal. n60 This decision suggests that, despite the "suspicious judicial eyebrow" that the Supreme Court raised at the 500:1 ratio in Gore, n61 judges continue to use precedent to expand the outer limits of the permissible ratio.

Finally, two circuits seem to have given up trying to apply the Gore guideposts as stated and instead have glossed the Supreme Court's opinion to create a test for unconstitutional excessiveness that is easier to apply (though arguably no more determinative). The Eighth Circuit described Gore as a constitutional test to determine whether an award is so disproportionate to a state's interests in punitive damages as to be in a "zone of arbitrariness." n62 Similarly, the Sixth Circuit interpreted the Gore test as asking whether the disparity between the punitive and compensatory awards "shocks the conscience." n63

These cases suggest that the Gore standards provide little direction for litigants. The result is that meaningful notice of potential liability, [*1792] perhaps the key element in the due process analysis of Gore, n64 is lost among the guideposts. As the Third Circuit stated, "the Supreme Court has instructed as to the analysis but has provided nothing concrete as to the amount" that might be excessive. n65 The larger implication is that the potential for a constitutional limit on punitive awards - which could provide a foundation for reducing the pressures they place on the civil litigation system - has gone unrealized. Although a general limit on punitive damages could reduce settlement pressures, provide greater procedural safeguards for defendants, or approach a goal of optimal deterrence, federal punitive damages law ensures none of these things to litigants; remittitur as a matter of law is not guaranteed. Perhaps these wildly divergent applications of Gore represent a triumph of justice in the individual case. n66 However, this benefit may come at the cost of judges' abusing their discretion in contravention of the rule of law values that the Supreme Court intended that Gore protect.

3. State Responses to Punitive Damages. - Some of the most extensive reforms of punitive damages have occurred in state law, and insofar as punitive damages are a "state law problem," n67 these state responses represent a good start. Many recent state court cases in which the excessiveness of punitive damages has been litigated have combined the Gore standard with existing state law. This approach has led to unrecognizable permutations of Gore in a few cases, n68 but in others, courts merely applied state-law excessiveness review before conducting a Gore analysis. n69 State courts have also occasionally taken [*1793] notice of academic treatments of punitive damages, but these discussions have rarely had a determinative impact on the outcome of cases. n70

In most states, however, the primary locus of punitive damages reform is not the judiciary, but the legislature. State legislatures have attempted a variety of approaches that reduce the size of the permissible punitive award or the plaintiff's incentive to seek it. A few states have severely limited the availability of punitive damages to specific statutory circumstances. n71

Perhaps the most common response among other states is to cap each punitive award at a given dollar amount or at a fixed ratio to the compensatory award. Eleven states have punitive damages caps that range from one to five times the amount of compensatory damages, n72 while others provide for absolute caps, ranging from $ 300,000 to $ 5 million. n73 The effect of such requirements is to lower the incentive for plaintiffs to litigate unmeritorious claims and reduce the burden on state industry that punitive damages represent. Another, more subtle way of altering plaintiffs' incentives and rectifying distributional problems is to require the payment of punitive damages into state funds. Thirteen states now have laws allowing a percentage of many punitive awards to be paid to the state treasury or to a state-administered victims' compensation fund. n74 In doing so, the state essentially [*1794] redistributes punitive damages from the plaintiffs who win the punitive damages lottery to either the state taxpayers as a whole or to those victims who did not have a large enough claim to pay for litigation. n75

REV_00262028

Finally, some states have attempted to reduce the apparent irrationality of punitive damage awards by bifurcating the litigation pro-cess into a liability stage and a damages stage. Usually upon the defendant's request, trials in twelve states n76 must be bifurcated to separate the determination whether punitive liability is appropriate from the consideration of the amount of the award. Because certain evidence concerning the extent of the injury may not be available to sway the jury's sympathies at the initial phase, a plaintiff is less able to "play the jury lottery" n77 and must invest more in litigation costs to seek a large jury verdict. n78

These reforms are a beneficial first step, and the limitation of punitive amounts in particular may help defendants take better account of potential punitive liability in settlements as well as in litigation. n79 However, because defendants are unlikely to customize mass-produced goods to the liability rules of different states, punitive damages are most likely to induce change in potential defendants' national business. This phenomenon may blunt the impact in each state of that state's individual reforms. Because national corporate defendants can cost-effectively make only limited changes in their state-to-state business, the national average level of punitive liability is probably more likely to to influence behavior than the level in any particular state. At least in cases involving national corporations, the defendant will calculate its potential liability across all relevant jurisdictions and will adjust its behavior accordingly. This cross-jurisdictional problem heightens the necessity for definitive national reform of punitive damages. In contrast, the system resulting from state reforms is ad hoc: while it may be an improvement in practice, it is not necessarily more theoretically consistent or even rational. Although the states are currently the most effective reformers of punitive damages doctrine, the concomitant problems of coordination and scope make the absence of a national statement about excessiveness even more conspicuous.

[*1795]

C. Deterrence Theory and the Rational Choice Proposals

Recent academic literature concerning punitive damages falls into two categories: rational choice theory discussions of the punitive damages regime and empirical studies that support or refute various reform efforts. One provocative and ambitious solution to the punitive damages distortion problem comes from the field of law and economics. Professors Polinsky and Shavell build on the twenty-year-old rational choice literature on punitive damages n80 in an attempt to bring order to the field of punitive damages. n81 They define the legitimate objectives of punitive damages and radically change the calculation of punitive damages to match these objectives. Polinsky and Shavell argue that the best justification for punitive damages is to fill the enforcement gap created by the tort system through the use of an award multiplier formula that considers the likelihood that a tortfeasor will escape liability. n82

The foundation for this argument is deterrence theory, one of the pillars of the law and economics movement. The tort system, this argument begins, serves two purposes: to compensate victims for individual harms and to deter injurers from perpetuating social harms. In a perfectly operating system, all victims of harm would receive compensation, thus forcing injurers to internalize the costs of their actions and encouraging them to cease behavior that causes net social harm. By punishing too rarely or in insufficient amounts, damages might fail to deter socially harmful behavior. But if imposed too often or in excessive amounts, damages can overdeter by increasing the cost of net-beneficial behavior. n83 Out of this background, Polinsky and Shavell argue that the true purpose of punitive damages is to fill the enforcement gap - to serve as a proxy for the compensatory damages not awarded to victims because not all tortious acts result in judgments against injurers. n84 Punitive damages should force the full cost of tortious behavior into the injurer's calculus. "Punishment," from this perspective, [*1796] is irrelevant; the goal of "punishment" is merely another way to state the goal of deterrence. n85 Polinsky and Shavell recommend that, when considering awards of punitive damages, judges should derive a multiplier from the chance that the harmful conduct would not have been caught and litigated. n86 Judges should apply this multiplier to compensatory awards to determine the proper level of punitive damages. n87

REV_00262029

Several implications flow from this analysis. First, the authors argue that the reprehensibility of the defendant's action is irrelevant to the determination of the award. n88 Instead, the reprehensibility of the injurer's conduct should be "measured" by the amount the plaintiff is allowed to recover n89 and the likelihood that the injurer will escape liability. n90 The multiplier will deter the conduct that should be deterred regardless of the defendant's moral culpability. Second, the wealth of the defendant should be irrelevant in determining a punitive award. n91 It does not matter whether a corporation is wealthy; if compensatory damages (multiplied to cover the enforcement gap) make one particular harmful activity unprofitable, the corporation will stop the activity. Consideration of wealth is no more than "a tax on corporate size and success." n92 Finally, the scope of state-recognized liability insurance may be expanded to cover punitive liability to lower the costs of paying for accidents. n93

Although acknowledging the importance of Polinsky and Shavell's work, Professor Viscusi offers an alternative solution: to abolish the institution [*1797] of punitive damages altogether. Based on an empirical study, Viscusi claims that states that prohibit punitive damages have no greater rate of certain kinds of toxic chemical accidents and toxic environmental releases than states that permit punitive damages. n94 Viscusi argues that punitive damages impose costs on corporate activities such as research and development; they are "a dangerous lottery for firms engaged in potentially risky lines of corporate activity." n95 These costs, passed on to the public through higher prices, are greater than the corresponding benefit of fewer accidents. n96 Viscusi proposes to eliminate punitive damages altogether and look for other sources of corporate accident deterrence. n97

The virtue of these scholars' work and of deterrence theory in general is to present a comprehensive framework within which to analyze punitive damages. Their theory takes the desperately needed steps of defining the appropriate goals of punitive damages; striking a balance between punishment, deterrence, and compensation; and providing a complete system for producing the desired results. Given that a major critique of jury verdicts is their supposed irrationality, a rational system to determine the proper size of punitive awards is attractive. Yet there are problems with their theory that cause it to fall short as a response to the problem of punitive damages distortions.

It should be noted first that this particular iteration of deterrence theory suffers from many of the same problems that affect law and economics in general. For example, it proceeds on the assumption that all potential injurers will conduct an ex ante cost-benefit analysis each time that they act. Although many of the largest awards are in cases of products liability and mass tort, in which corporations might be expected to conduct such an analysis and to account for the possibility of punitive damages, such rational calculation may not always be realistic for an individual doctor who faces the prospect of punitive malpractice liability. n98 A second problem (shared by other rational [*1798] choice proposals) is the global coordination problem. Although tort law in a perfectly working market might force injurers to internalize the costs of the injuries that they cause, the internalized costs are still only those recognized by the legal system as compensable to someone. n99 Thus, not only would courts have to consistently apply a multiplier to cover the current enforcement gap, legislatures would also have to allow plaintiffs acting as private attorneys general to recover for the costs to common property or future generations in order to achieve deterrence based on the full social harm the injurer causes.

In addition to these large-scale problems, Polinsky and Shavell's proposal presents several other theoretical difficulties that prevent it from being an optimal solution to the problem of punitive damages distortions. For example, the fewer the number of plaintiffs who sue for damages in a particular case, the more damages each would receive as their share of the overall award. Plaintiffs who sue early, before many suits are brought, are therefore likely to receive higher awards. The success of early plaintiffs will raise the expected award for those potential plaintiffs who have waited to see the outcome of early cases before filing claims, but high early awards will also dry up the pool of damages from which later plaintiffs would draw upon proving their case. Thus, a multiplier calculated early will be systematically too large, and plaintiffs who sue later will either end up with nothing (because compensation for their injuries has already been paid to other plaintiffs in the form of punitive damages) or will force the defendant to pay again (which would be double counting, producing overdeterrence). n100

[*1799] Another problem is the effect of punitive damages on settlements. One reason that many settlements are large, despite a low chance of plaintiff victory, is the possibility that juries might award irrationally large punitive damages. n101 If punitive damages have an effect on settlements, n102 the enforcement gap theory either breaks down or becomes even more complex: settlements compensate for some unknown percentage of the enforcement gap. The multiplier therefore would have to take into account not only prior and prospective judgments against the injurer, but also all settled claims. Otherwise the defendant would face too much liability - paying for its action both in settlements and in court.

Finally, there are problems of implementation. Even assuming that damages could perfectly eliminate the enforcement gap, any such system would demand fantastic feats of prediction and calculation from judges. Determining the multiplier in each particular case would also require much more information than is probably available to assess the size of the enforcement gap and the damages necessary to close it. The empirical data concerning punitive awards and their effect on defendants are not currently sophisticated enough to support the kind of calculations necessary to put a deterrence theory regime into practice. The problems of implementation might therefore dull some of the luster of a theoretically integrated approach to punitive damages. In addition, the practical effect of Polinsky and Shavell's program would probably be greater than they imagine; although the most notorious punitive awards are extremely large, n103 punitive awards are relatively rare and often less than compensatory damages awarded in the same cases. n104 Polinsky and Shavell could achieve their goal of reducing the biggest and most publicized awards, n105 but they would explode the number of cases in which punitive damages were awarded and probably also increase the size of the awards. Perhaps this result would advance the goal of deterrence, but it is almost certainly not what most deterrence theorists envision.

D. Suggestions for Reform of Punitive Damages

Judicial responses to the problems posed by punitive damages are generally incremental but incoherent; in contrast, deterrence theorists' [*1800] responses are theoretically complete but too radical to be practicable. The suggestions that follow are an attempt to synthesize the strengths of the Gore approach and of deterrence theory into a modest proposal for the reform of punitive damages; this proposal reduces the distortions that punitive damages cause by selectively applying them where their value can be best realized. Punitive damages should promote the values of efficiency, predictability, and rationality to support goals of due process, optimal deterrence, and equitable compensation. Also, any program of reform should be adaptable to the existing litigation system to maximize the prospects for lasting, integrated change.

REV_00262031

It is important to keep in mind the practical strength of the Supreme Court's approach: it has potential for national change within the context of the existing punitive damages doctrine. Two premises may therefore prevent us from straying too far into the theoretical realm. First, abandoning the notion that punitive damages must fill the entire enforcement gap in every case yields a much less intrusive change to the current system. Second, acknowledging that punitive damages may have a retributive purpose in addition to their deterrent purpose is more compatible with the established case law and enables us to make more rational arguments about how to fulfill this retributive purpose. These premises imply that, for now, a good first step would be to limit punitive damages to cases in which they currently apply under state law - rather than the current practice of applying them in all cases in which there is an enforcement gap. Deterrence theorists might object that such extractions water down the effectiveness of their proposals, but the alternative that they offer would require too great a paradigm shift.

These limitations suggest an initial distinction between two types of cases that currently result in punitive damages. Punitive damages are awarded most often in cases of intentional tort n106 and most notoriously in cases of products liability n107 and malpractice. n108 However, moral culpability should almost never be taken into account in the award of punitive damages n109 when the tortfeasor is a corporation (or other continuing business entity). Especially in products liability or contract cases in which the corporation may have performed a cost-benefit analysis before acting, a finding of culpability is merely an excuse to overdeter. Forcing a defendant to pay compensation for the harm it causes will fulfill the expectations that the defendant had at the time of the injury; punitive damages will only further deter harm if those [*1801] expectations were unrealistically low. Culpability might remain a factor, however, for punitive damages against defendants - whether individuals or corporations - who were reckless n110 or intended to cause injury. n111 Confining culpability considerations to cases in which there is a clearly culpable target and using deterrence considerations in other cases of corporate action is a rough divide; however, it brings greater consistency by matching the different rationales behind punitive damages to the cases in which those rationales apply.

A second feature of the economic model of punitive damages that the legal system should adopt is the proposition that punitive damages should be insurable. Currently, only a slight majority of states allow defendants to insure against the risk of punitive liability. n112 Allowing insurance coverage of punitive damages greatly increases the predictability of the liability costs of a given product or activity. Restricting insurability discourages risk-averse defendants from engaging in potentially beneficial activities. n113 In addition, insurability allows for greater risk management. Insurers may be in a better position than potential defendants to predict the costs of accidents and to distribute those costs across an entire industry of risk takers. n114

Finally, as Polinsky and Shavell's suggest, the wealth of a defendant should be excluded from the consideration of a punitive award. n115 Wealth considerations may serve an expressive function, sending a message to corporations that their wealth will not shield them from breaking the law. However, a defendant's wealth is irrelevant [*1802] to the deterrence rationale of punitive damages. n116 If an injurer has to pay more for a particular course of action than he profits from it - as he would if the amount required for deterrence is well-calculated - he will discontinue the action regardless of how much money he has in the bank.

REV_00262032

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

↶ Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*111 Harv. L. Rev. 869, **

Copyright (c) The Harvard Law Review Association 1998.
Harvard Law Review

February, 1998

111 Harv. L. Rev. 869

LENGTH: 58817 words

ARTICLE: PUNITIVE DAMAGES: AN ECONOMIC ANALYSIS

A. Mitchell Polinsky and Steven Shavell *

* A. Mitchell Polinsky is the Josephine Scott Crocker Professor of Law and Economics, Stanford Law School. Steven Shavell is Professor of Law and Economics, Harvard Law School. Research for this Article was supported by Exxon Corporation. (Exxon is appealing a punitive damages judgment against it in the Exxon Valdez oil spill litigation; we have served as consultants to Exxon in connection with this litigation.) The views expressed below are our own and do not necessarily represent those of Exxon. We received helpful comments on an earlier draft of this Article from Janet Alexander, Daniel Capra, Richard Craswell, Peter Diamond, Aaron Edlin, Jill Fisch, Jesse Fried, Victor Fuchs, Robert Hall, Louis Kaplow, Daniel Klerman, Thomas Krattenmaker, Richard McAdams, Ivan Png, Kenneth Simons, and participants at seminars given at a number of law schools. We also benefited from research assistance from Jennifer Brosnahan, Patrick O'Reilly, Janine Scancarelli, Debra Volland, and Sherri Lynn Wolson.

SUMMARY:
... In this Article, Professors Polinsky and Shavell use economic reasoning to provide a relatively simple set of principles for answering these questions, given the goals of deterrence and punishment. With respect to the deterrence objective, on which their Article focuses, they argue that punitive damages ordinarily should be awarded if, and only if, an injurer has a significant chance of escaping liability for the harm he caused. ... Specifically, punitive damages should equal the harm multiplied by a factor that we will refer to as the punitive damages multiplier: the ratio of the injurer's chance of escaping liability to his chance of being found liable. ... Does it make sense in terms of deterrence to ensure that the defendant's gain is disgorged, or should damages be based solely on harm (abstracting from the issue of the chance of escaping liability)? We conclude in this section that setting damages equal to harm generally results in proper deterrence even when the harm is less than the defendant's gain; a policy of removing the defendant's gain may result in overdeterrence. ... The first is that litigation costs may cause the probability of suit to be low and thus justify a punitive damages award according to the damage formula presented earlier. ...

TEXT:
[*869] [*870]

The imposition of punitive damages is one of the more controversial features of the American

thus, the multiplier is 1/.25, or 4. Because the harm was $ 100,000, this formula will result in total damages imposed on the injurer of $ 400,000. Similarly, if the in- [*890] jurer would be found liable with a one-in-two chance, damages should be $ 200,000 - the $ 100,000 harm multiplied by 2 (= 1/.5). And if the chance of liability is only one in ten, damages should be $ 1,000,000 - the $ 100,000 harm multiplied by 10 (=1/.1). The application of this formula will guarantee that, on average, injurers will pay for the harm they cause, and therefore take proper precautions and appropriately participate in risky activities. [49]

It is important to stress that the level of damages given by the formula is optimal not only because this level remedies problems of underdeterrence, but also because it avoids problems of overdeterrence. The latter problems, described above, [50] would arise if damages were to exceed the optimal amount.

We will refer to the excess of total damages over compensatory damages as punitive damages. Thus, the optimal level of punitive damages from the perspective of deterrence is the level of total damages determined by the formula, less compensatory damages. If an injurer has a one-in-four chance of being found liable for causing a $ 100,000 harm, the formula implies that total damages should be $ 400,000. Because $ 100,000 of this total represents compensatory damages, the $ 300,000 remainder is the optimal amount of punitive damages.

The optimal level of punitive damages also can be described as a multiple of harm or, equivalently, a multiple of compensatory damages. Specifically, punitive damages should equal the harm multiplied by a factor that we will refer to as the punitive damages multiplier: the ratio of the injurer's chance of escaping liability to his chance of being found liable. [51] In the example in the previous paragraph, the injurer has a three-in-four chance of escaping liability and a one-in-four chance of being found liable. The punitive damages multiplier is therefore .75/.25, or 3. Because the harm was $ 100,000, punitive damages should be three times this amount, or $ 300,000.

Although we refer to the excess of total damages over compensatory damages as punitive damages, the adjective "punitive" may sometimes be misleading. This is because extracompensatory damages may [*891] be needed for deterrence purposes in circumstances in which the behavior of the defendant would not call for punishment. As we have explained, the deterrence goal leads us to impose such damages when injurers may escape liability. But injurers might escape liability even when their conduct is not strongly blameworthy. Suppose an injurer accidentally (perhaps even non-negligently) causes harm, but the victim does not sue, either because he is unable to trace the harm to its source or because of the cost of litigation. In other words, non-blameworthy conduct might still call for punitive damages to achieve proper deterrence. [52] Despite a certain inappropriateness, therefore, in using the label "punitive damages" to refer to extracompensatory damages needed for deterrence reasons, we will continue to employ it because it is the common term for extracompensatory damages in private civil litigation. [53]

We have several comments to make about the punitive damages formula presented in this section. First, judges and juries [54] often will be able to apply the formula without difficulty because the formula transparently (if trivially) implies that no punitive damages are needed. In other words, in many situations, it will be obvious that the injurer has virtually no chance of escaping liability - say because the harm occurred openly and the magnitude of the harm is such that the victims almost surely will bring suit. Examples of such situations are when a building collapses as a result of a plainly defective design [55] and when a supertanker runs aground and spills a large quantity of oil on the shoreline, where the oil is observed by many people. [56] In such cases, the proper total damages multiplier is one - that is, total damages should equal harm. Punitive damages are not needed for proper deterrence, and imposing them would result in the problems of overdeterrence discussed above. [57]

REV_00262071

Second, in other circumstances, when the chance of escaping liability is clearly positive, the probability of liability still might be relatively easily calculated. For example, suppose a firm dumps toxic waste at night along an infrequently used road, but is caught as a result of the report of a driver who happened to notice the firm's activities. In such a case, pressure-sensitive recording devices laid across the [*892] road could be used to determine the volume of traffic on the road at night, and the resulting data could be employed to calculate the odds that someone would drive by during a particular interval of time. The reciprocal of this probability could then be used as the total damages multiplier. [58] In general, a careful consideration of the facts in a case often will allow a jury to make a reasonable estimate of the probability of escaping liability. [59] The testimony of expert witnesses also may be helpful in calculating this probability. [60]

Third, circumstances in which the chance of escaping liability is difficult to estimate will inevitably arise. To reduce the decisionmaking burden on jurors, a judge could present them with a table with a limited number of values for the probability, such as 0.1 through 0.9 by increments of one-tenth, from which to choose. [61] Although such a simplification would not directly resolve the problem of determining the probability of detection, it may aid jurors in settling on a single number. [62] Even if jurors make significant errors in estimating the probability, such errors will not necessarily create a serious problem for achieving optimal deterrence: provided that the errors are not systematically biased upwards or downwards, a potential injurer will know that the assessment of juries will be approximately correct on average, which will induce the injurer to behave properly. Another [*893] option is for the legislature to set damages multipliers for separate categories of wrongful conduct, based on rough assessments of the different chances of escaping liability in the various settings. This approach might be desirable if one believes that jury determination of the probabilities, and therefore of the damages multipliers, would be systematically biased. (Such an approach, however, would prevent juries from making use of any information they have about particular cases. [63])

Fourth, it might seem problematic for the application of the multiplier formula that the probability of escaping liability, and thus the multiplier, may depend on the way in which an accident is categorized. For example, consider a spill of dangerous chemicals from a tanker truck on a highway. Such a spill can be categorized either relatively narrowly - one category might be a spill resulting from the rupture of the tank and another category might be a spill resulting from a slow leak of the tank - or relatively broadly - one category encompassing both types of accident. A spill obviously will be much more easily detected if it is the consequence of a rupture than of a slow leak. Thus, if a rupture-caused spill is treated as a separate category, a lower multiplier would be used than if it is treated as an instance of a broader category of spills that includes leaks. How, then, should the categorization of an accident be determined for the purpose of deterrence? Should categorization be narrow, with separate multipliers employed for different types of chemical spills, or be broad, with a single multiplier employed? The answer is, essentially, that narrow definitions of accidents and separate multipliers should be used, other things being equal. Otherwise, incentives to prevent specific types of chemical spills would tend to be distorted. This is because the multiplier used for a specific type of accident would not be tailored to it, but instead would reflect the likelihood of escaping liability for a broader category of accidents. If a single multiplier is employed for all chemical spills, then, because it would exceed one, firms would have excessive incentives to avoid chemical spills for which they would definitely be found liable; thus, they might spend excessively on reinforcing the tanks or on testing the tanks' pressure (say, every fifteen minutes rather than every trip). Further, because the multiplier would be lower than is appropriate for slow leaks that are very likely to escape notice, firms would have inadequate incentives to prevent these spills; for instance, they might not check frequently enough for cracks in difficult-to-inspect parts of the tanks. The general point, then, is that when actors [*894] can take precautions that are particular to a type of accident, the categorization of the accident should be narrow. [64]

REV_00262072

Fifth, an important question about the multiplier formula arises in cases in which the defendant is a firm: should the damages multiplier be based on the probability that the firm will be found liable, or on the generally lower likelihood that the responsible employee will be found liable? The answer is that the firm's probability is the relevant one. Consider a situation in which a firm definitely would be found liable for a harm resulting, say, from an explosion of a chemical storage tank, but the employee whose actions led to the explosion might be difficult to identify. Because the firm will have to pay for the harm for sure, punitive damages are not needed: the firm's product price and its incentives to take precautions will be correct because it will be paying for all of the harm it causes if it pays just compensatory damages. That the particular employee who caused the explosion might not be caught does not alter this point - the employee's escaping responsibility does not free the firm from liability. Were the firm to face puni- [*895] tive damages because of the employee's chance of escaping liability, overdeterrence would result. [65]

Sixth, it should be observed that the award of punitive damages may itself raise the probability of suit, which would reduce the probability that the defendant will escape liability. This effect, when applicable, must be taken into account and will tend to lower the appropriate level of punitive damages. Suppose, for example, that the probability of suit for a $ 100,000 harm for which a party should be liable would be one-third if damages are compensatory, but would rise to one-half if damages are twice compensatory damages, $ 200,000. Suppose also that, if a suit is brought, the plaintiff will definitely prevail. If the damages multiplier is based on the one-third probability of suit, it would call for total damages of $ 300,000. But this level of damages would be too high because the probability of suit increases to one-half (or greater) when damages are $ 300,000: expected damages would be $ 150,000 (or greater), far exceeding the harm. In fact, damages of $ 200,000 would be appropriate because the probability of suit would then be one-half and expected damages would be $ 100,000. In general, a level of damages will exist that, given the resulting probability of suit, will lead to optimal deterrence. [66] Basing punitive damages on the relatively low probability of suit that would occur if only compensatory damages were awarded, however, will tend to lead to excessive damages.

Seventh, it might seem that the analysis in this section would virtually always call for some punitive damages award, because some chance of escaping liability will almost always exist. [67] But such a conclusion ignores a factor that we have not yet mentioned, namely, the costs associated with the use of the legal system. [68] Were every case to involve the calculation of the proper multiplier of harm, a new and potentially costly-to-decide issue would be introduced into litigation. This additional cost suggests that the domain of cases in which the multiplier inquiry is made should be limited. Specifically, our formula should be applied only if the likelihood of escaping liability surpasses some threshold, for that is when the problem of dilution of deterrence [*896] will be significant, making it socially worthwhile to incur the additional litigation costs associated with calculating a corrective multiplier. [69]

Finally, it should be noted that we have assumed that when parties are found liable, they pay for all of the harm that they have caused. In practice, though, parties may escape having to pay for some of the harm. To the extent that this occurs, an argument can be made that the level of damages should be higher than that called for by our multiplier formula, to make up both for the chance of escaping liability altogether and for the chance of not having to pay for the full harm. The most likely circumstance in which the full harm would not be assessed against the defendant arises when a particular component of harm (say, some type of non-pecuniary loss) is excluded from compensatory damages. For reasons explained below, however, we believe that punitive damages should not be raised to make up for an excluded component of harm. [70]

C.

REV_00262073

Consistency of Punitive Damages Law with the Basic Theory of Deterrence

We now will relate our analysis to certain important aspects of legal doctrine concerning punitive damages, and also to legislation imposing caps on punitive damages.

As noted above, [71] one of the two main purposes of punitive damages is deterrence. The courts state, for example, that punitive damages are intended "to deter the wrongdoer and others from committing similar wrongs in the future." [72] Given that achieving proper deterrence is an avowed goal of courts, it follows from the logic of deter- [*897] rence theory that courts should take the punitive damages formula presented above into explicit account. Otherwise, courts cannot responsibly weigh the proper punitive damages amount for achieving deterrence against the proper amount for achieving the other main purpose of punitive damages, punishment. [73]

However, courts' determinations of punitive damages do not reflect in any clear manner the formula that achieves optimal deterrence. Although courts do consider the magnitude of harm in assessing the proper level of punitive damages, they do not use harm as the base to be multiplied by an appropriate damages multiplier. Rather, courts take harm into account in a vague way, through application of the general principle that punitive damages should bear a "reasonable relationship" to compensatory damages. [74] They do not explain what this relationship should be and, even when they identify a ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages that they find excessive, they do not supply a basis for selecting the particular ratio identified. [75] [*898]

As the reader knows, our analysis implies a simple and precise relationship between punitive damages and harm: punitive damages should equal the harm multiplied by what we refer to as the punitive damages multiplier. If punitive damages are to achieve appropriate deterrence, the "reasonable relationship" criterion must be interpreted in this specific way. Any other relationship between punitive damages and compensatory damages will lead to either inadequate or excessive deterrence.

Courts also do not pay systematic attention to the probability of escaping liability, even though this probability is the central element in determining the appropriate damages multiplier for the purpose of achieving proper deterrence. Courts sometimes allude to the possibility of escaping liability, but they rarely recognize its importance with respect to deterrence. For example, in determining the level of punitive damages, courts occasionally consider whether the defendant has attempted to conceal his conduct. [76] Courts usually do so, however, in assessing the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct; [77] they generally do not appreciate that evidence of attempted concealment should influence the calculation of the defendant's chance of escaping liability. Additionally, courts sometimes mention that the cost of litigation should be taken into account "so as to encourage plaintiffs to bring wrongdoers to trial." [78] This factor is obviously related to the injurer's chance of escaping liability because one reason an injurer might not be [*899] found liable is that he is not sued. [79] Thus, courts occasionally refer to considerations that bear on the probability that a defendant would have escaped liability. But they rarely explain in a direct and systematic way how this probability should be used to determine the proper level of damages for deterrence purposes. [80]

Further, courts generally pay insufficient attention to the potential problem of overdeterrence. Judicial opinions mention this issue only infrequently, [81] and none of the lists of factors used by courts in determining punitive damages includes overdeterrence as a consideration. [82] As we have emphasized, [83] however, damages that exceed the level in- [*900] dicated by the formula may result in wasteful precautions and the withdrawal of socially valuable products and services from the marketplace.

Not only do courts usually fail to consider correctly the factors that are relevant to proper deterrence, but they also err in considering a variety of factors that generally are not relevant to deterrence, including the reprehensibility of defendants' conduct and defendants' wealth. We will discuss at some length why these factors ordinarily should not be taken into account if the goal is to promote proper deterrence, [84] but the point we want to make here is that consideration of these factors in awarding punitive damages causes such damages to deviate further from the level given by our formula.

REV_00262074

Some aspects of legislation governing punitive damages are also inconsistent with deterrence theory. Notably, many states have imposed caps of various kinds on punitive damages awards: an absolute ceiling (for example, $ 350,000 in Virginia), a maximum ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages (for example, three times compensatory damages in Florida), or both. [85] Such caps cannot be justified on deterrence grounds because they might preclude the proper award of punitive damages. For example, suppose that the harm caused by an injurer is $ 100,000 and that he has only a one-in-ten chance of being found liable. The optimal level of punitive damages is then $ 900,000, or nine times compensatory damages (because the optimal level of total damages, including compensatory damages, is ten times the harm). This absolute amount and this ratio would exceed punitive damages caps in the majority of states that have them, [86] yet under the circumstances posited, a punitive damages award of this magnitude, and that has this relationship to compensatory damages, is needed for proper deterrence.

Our criticism of caps is not meant to deny that, if jury awards of punitive damages are thought to be systematically excessive, caps might beneficially constrain such awards. [87] But in the absence of systematic bias, caps are inappropriate. [*901]

D.

Punitive Damages Cases

We briefly consider here three prominent punitive damages cases in the light of the deterrence principles discussed above. Our primary objective is to state what deterrence theory suggests about the appropriate level of punitive damages in these cases, given their facts and circumstances, not to analyze the legal doctrines that were applied or developed in them. [88]

1.

BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [89] -

In this case, the plaintiff, Ira Gore, Jr., purchased a new BMW sedan from an Alabama dealer. He subsequently learned that the defendant, BMW of North America, had repainted part of the car because of damage to the car before its arrival in the United States, although BMW had not disclosed this fact. The jury awarded Gore compensatory damages of $ 4000 for diminution in the value of the car, and punitive damages of $ 4 million. The Alabama Supreme Court reduced the punitive award to $ 2 million, but the United States Supreme Court held even this award to be grossly excessive. On reconsideration, the Alabama Supreme Court reduced the punitive award to $ 50,000. [90]

Consider the probability that BMW would escape liability for having sold a repainted car as new. The determination of this probability involves two factors. One is the possibility that BMW would escape notice for having repainted a car, and the other is the likelihood that a purchaser who did discover that his car had been repainted would sue. Gore drove the car for nine months without detecting any abnormalities in the paint on his car. It was only after he took his car to a detail shop that he learned that it had been repainted. It seems reasonable to suppose, therefore, that many purchasers of repainted cars sold as new would never discover that their cars had been repainted.

REV_00262075

Whether an owner who did discover that his car had been repainted would sue depends on the costs to him of suit (time and out-of-pocket expense) and the amount that he could collect. If the harm is as low as the jury found in Gore, $ 4000, it would seem that many owners - or the lawyers they might hire on a contingency fee - would not have a sufficient financial incentive to sue. There may have been a significant chance, therefore, that BMW would have escaped liability if damages were merely compensatory, because of victims' inadequate motive to sue.

In Gore, information that would be useful in estimating the probability of BMW's being found liable was provided. Among the facts [*902] established at trial were that fourteen new BMW cars in Alabama had been repainted, including Gore's, and one prior suit had been brought against BMW by an owner of one of these cars. [91] If none of the other Alabama victims of repainting were to sue, [92] the probability of detection and liability might be thought to be two in fourteen, [93] in which case the total damages should be seven times the $ 4000 harm, or $ 28,000. [94] Of that total, $ 4000 would represent compensatory damages, and $ 24,000 would represent punitive damages. By this reasoning, the $ 2 million punitive award initially approved by the Alabama Supreme Court was grossly excessive, and the reduced award of $ 50,000 was much more reasonable. [95]

2.

Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip. [96] -

This case involved an insurance agent who misappropriated premium payments. The insurance policy in question was a group health plan sold to the municipality of Roosevelt City, Alabama. When Cleopatra Haslip, a city employee, was hospitalized, she apparently did not know that the policy had lapsed because of the agent's misappropriation. When the hospital and her physician sought payment from her, she and other Roosevelt City employees sued the agent and the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company for fraud. [97] The jury awarded her total damages [*903] of $ 1,040,000, of which $ 200,000 appears to have been assessed as compensatory damages and $ 840,000 as punitive damages. [98] The award was affirmed by the trial court, the Alabama Supreme Court, and the United States Supreme Court. [99]

The key issue relating to deterrence in this case is whether a significant chance exists that an insurance company whose agent misappropriates premiums will escape liability for coverage that individuals expected to have. (The focus should be on the company's chance of escaping liability, rather than the agent's, for the reason we explained above. [100]) Obviously, if a policy has been invalidated because of an agent's misappropriation of premium payments, the invalidation will come to the attention of a person who applies for coverage under that policy. If the insurance company does not pay the individual voluntarily, the individual probably would sue the company, provided the amount at stake is large enough.

In the present case, the compensatory damages were, as noted, $ 200,000. However, less than $ 4000 of this amount represented out-of-pocket expenditures, the rest apparently consisting of non-economic losses such as emotional distress. [101] It seems reasonable to suppose that recovery of the $ 4000 out-of-pocket loss is more probable than recovery of the $ 196,000 non-economic loss. If the likelihood of the latter recovery is sufficiently low, an individual probably would not bring a lawsuit. Conversely, if this likelihood is high, a lawsuit would be much more certain. A related consideration is that three other Roosevelt City employees joined Haslip in suing the defendants. Their awards totaled approximately $ 38,000. [102] Clearly, the prospect of obtaining this additional amount would increase the incentive to sue. On balance, therefore, although a suit seems reasonably likely in the circumstances of Haslip, some countervailing considerations might justify a modest punitive damages award, to offset the chance that a lawsuit would not be brought.

REV_00262076

3.

In re The Exxon Valdez. [103] -

In this case, the defendant's supertanker, the Exxon Valdez, ran aground on a reef in Prince William Sound in Alaska, spilling 11 million gallons of oil [104] and polluting over [*904] 1,000 miles of Alaskan coastline. [105] The supertanker's captain, Joseph Hazelwood, had previously been treated for alcohol abuse and, in connection with the accident at issue, was found to have violated regulations governing alcohol consumption. [106] In the private civil litigation against Exxon stemming from the accident, the plaintiffs - various classes of fishermen and Alaskan natives - were awarded several hundred million dollars in compensatory damages [107] and $ 5 billion in punitive damages. [108] The punitive damages award was affirmed by the trial judge and is being appealed. [109]

It seems clear that in the circumstances of the Exxon Valdez accident, there was essentially no chance that the defendant company, Exxon Corporation, could escape liability. An accident of this magnitude obviously would have been noticed. Moreover, because the tanker was stuck on a reef, the identity of the injurer was plain. And given the substantial compensatory damages involved, in the hundreds of millions of dollars, a lawsuit certainly could be expected. Thus, according to our analysis, no punitive damages are needed, or appropriate, in the circumstances of this case because the injurer could not have escaped liability for compensatory damages. (In other contexts involving oil spills - such as the intentional dumping of small amounts of waste oil that is unlikely to be detected or traced to the spiller - some punitive damages would be appropriate. [110])

III.

Deterrence: Extensions of the Basic Theory

In this Part, we will discuss several important doctrinal and policy issues in punitive damages law from the perspective of the deterrence principles developed above. [111] Most of these topics (such as the repre- [*905] hensibility of the defendant's conduct) have received substantial attention in judicial opinions, others (whether the state should receive a portion of a punitive damages award) have been considered primarily in a legislative context, and still others (the status of the plaintiff as a customer or a third party) apparently have not been addressed in either setting.

A.

Reprehensibility of Conduct

The law requires that a defendant be found to have acted in a reprehensible manner - in a way that is egregious, malicious, or undertaken with reckless disregard for the rights of others - before punitive damages can be imposed on him. [112] If a defendant is found to have so acted, the degree of his reprehensibility is often treated as a key factor in determining the level of punitive damages. [113] Indeed, the United States Supreme Court in Gore observed that this factor is "perhaps [the] most important" indicium of the reasonableness of a punitive damages award. [114] The reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct was also one of the factors listed by the Court in Haslip. [115]

Should reprehensibility per se affect the imposition of punitive damages, given the goal of deterrence? [116] In this section, we explain [*906] that it generally should not. [117] However, an important exception to this conclusion occurs when injurers' gains do not count in social welfare, which we believe is often the case when injurers act maliciously. [118] This exception, we will suggest, only possibly applies to individual defendants, and not to corporate defendants.

REV_00262077

As discussed above, [119] under standard assumptions, the imposition of damages equal to harm, appropriately multiplied to reflect the probability of escaping liability, achieves proper deterrence. That a defendant's conduct can be described as reprehensible is in itself irrelevant. Rather, the focus in determining punitive damages should be on the injurer's chance of escaping liability.

Making punitive damages depend on reprehensibility will distort deterrence in two ways. First, excessive damages may be imposed when reprehensible conduct occurs in situations in which an injurer is virtually certain to be found liable. Suppose that a surgeon, through extreme negligence, fails to remove a surgical tool from the body of a patient and that this omission leads to great pain and suffering. If a high probability exists that the surgeon will be sued and found liable because of the magnitude of the patient's harm and the unmistakable error of the surgeon, extracompensatory damages are neither necessary nor appropriate. Similarly, consider a newspaper reporter who, out of reckless disregard for the truth, confuses one firm's safe product with another firm's dangerous product, substantially damaging the former firm's business reputation and profitability. Here, too, we might expect that suit and a finding of liability would be very likely, in which case extracompensatory damages would be excessive. Thus, even for conduct that is reprehensible, if little chance of escaping liability exists, compensatory damages alone will achieve appropriate deterrence, and punitive damages will result in overdeterrence.

One might wonder, though, how overdeterrence of reprehensible acts can occur, because society evidently has an interest in deterring such acts completely. To illustrate that overdeterrence still can occur, consider the example of the surgeon. If the magnitude of damages is very high, we can imagine that, to reduce the chance of leaving a surgical tool in a patient, he might hire another medical professional to monitor his actions or he might dramatically increase the time he [*907] spends on each operation. Even if such responses would succeed in preventing the recurrence of this event, they may be at too great a cost, especially if the likelihood of leaving a surgical tool in a patient is very low anyway. In other words, it might not be socially worthwhile for the surgeon to take the measures needed to eliminate the possibility of his being extremely negligent. Yet a level of liability in excess of that given by the damages formula would improperly encourage him to take these measures. [120]

The problem of overdeterrence also can arise in connection with the reprehensible acts of employees of corporations. Employees obviously cannot be controlled perfectly by a corporation, even though a corporation can improve its ability to prevent employees from committing reprehensible acts by screening them before hiring them and monitoring their conduct afterwards. If damages exceed the level determined by the damages formula, however, the corporations may be led to spend excessively on screening and monitoring efforts in order to forestall reprehensible behavior. [121] This might be true of a newspaper, for instance, if it faced punitive damages for false reporting because of extreme negligence, as in our example of the reporter who confused two firms' products. In response, the newspaper might assign two reporters to every story even if doing so is not socially worthwhile given the cost of this practice and the reduction in risk of reprehensible behavior that would be accomplished.

Not only can attention to reprehensibility result in the imposition of punitive damages that are excessive, but such attention may also lead to the converse problem: the failure to employ punitive damages when they are needed for proper deterrence. This problem will occur if an individual engages in conduct that is harmful, though not reprehensible, and he is likely to escape liability. Suppose that a toxic waste disposal truck develops a leak (say, from rust) that results in waste spilling onto a highway at night, when no one is likely to notice it. The driver of the truck may have performed a proper inspection before de- [*908] parting, and the company may have reasonable maintenance policies. Although the leak is not caused by anyone's reprehensible behavior, substantial extracompensatory damages may be appropriate if the leak is discovered, to offset the significant likelihood that the injurer would not be identified and held responsible for the harm.

REV_00262078

It is clear from the foregoing discussion that the stress courts place on reprehensibility of conduct in considering punitive damages cannot be justified on grounds of deterrence. A minor qualification of this point is that, as we observed earlier, [122] courts treat attempts by the defendant to conceal wrongdoing as a factor that enhances reprehensibility, and thus the level of punitive damages. This response makes rough sense because such behavior clearly reduces the probability of liability. But, as suggested above, the link that courts make between this behavior and punitive damages is vague in nature. [123] We believe that it would be preferable to use evidence of concealment directly to aid in the determination of the chance that the defendant might have escaped liability, rather than as a factor in determining reprehensibility.

Finally, although the reprehensibility of a defendant's conduct should not be used per se as a basis for imposing punitive damages to achieve proper deterrence, such conduct may sometimes provide useful information about the defendant's chance of escaping liability. Everything else being equal, the lower the chance of being found liable, the lower will be an individual's level of care. Therefore, a low care level may suggest a low probability of liability [124] and thus a higher level of punitive damages according to our formula.

Let us now turn to the important exception to our general conclusion about reprehensibility, which, as noted above, arises if injurers' [*909] gains are not counted in social welfare. Suppose that a person, out of spite, punches another individual; his purpose is to cause harm to the victim. Society might well treat the pleasure the injurer obtains from this act as socially illicit, not to be counted in social welfare. [125] If so, the act should be deterred completely because it produces no social gain, only harm. To achieve this goal, damages must exceed the injurer's utility from committing the act. Because the injurer's illicit utility could be greater than the harm suffered by the victim, the level of damages needed for proper deterrence might be in excess of harm. [126] In other words, punitive damages might be socially desirable even if there is no chance that the injurer could have escaped liability.

When are the benefits from harmful conduct likely to be considered socially illicit? We suggest that benefits tend to be treated as illicit when the injurer's utility derives from causing harm itself, as when a person punches another out of spite or defames another to see him suffer. The injurer benefits because the victim suffers harm. Situations with this characteristic fit under the general rubric of maliciousness and would be considered reprehensible. Thus, some reprehensible conduct - malicious conduct - could give rise to gains that are not counted in social welfare, in which case punitive damages may be justified even in the absence of a chance of escaping liability, for the reasons discussed in the previous paragraph.

But many acts that are reprehensible do not seem to be associated with socially illicit utility; they are not undertaken with malice. Consider a person who drives at 60 miles per hour through a residential area in order to arrive at work on time and causes a fatal accident. We would call this act reprehensible because of the driver's wanton disregard for the safety of others. Yet because the purpose of the act is not to cause harm, but rather to arrive at work on time, a perfectly legitimate objective, it does not appear that the utility from the act would be classified as socially illicit. In general, we surmise that reprehensible acts that are not undertaken with the objective of causing [*910] harm, but rather that happen to cause it as a highly likely byproduct, usually are not associated with socially illicit utility. Thus, for these kinds of acts, punitive damages should not be imposed unless the injurer has a significant chance of escaping liability - our usual conclusion. [127]

REV_00262079

Note that because the goal of corporations is to make a profit, rather than to cause harm to others, their gains presumably do count in social welfare. Hence, by the foregoing reasoning, if a corporation engages in conduct labeled as reprehensible, this fact per se should not affect the level of its damages. Rather, its damages should be based on the harm it caused and the chance that it might have escaped liability, with punitive damages awarded only if the latter chance is significant.

In summary, we believe that the reprehensibility of a defendant's conduct generally should not be taken into account for the purpose of determining optimal damages for deterrence. The notable exception to this conclusion occurs when the defendant is an individual whose conduct is motivated by malice and whose gains consequently are not included in social welfare.

B.

Wealth of Defendants

The courts often state that a defendant's financial condition is a relevant factor in setting a punitive damages award, with the understanding that higher punitive damages may be appropriate for defendants with higher wealth. [128] Jury instructions also frequently include the defendant's wealth as a factor that jurors may take into account in determining the level of punitive damages. [129] Not surprisingly, plain- [*911] tiffs tend to emphasize this factor when defendants are wealthy, especially when the defendants are large corporations. [130]

Should defendants with greater wealth pay higher punitive damages? Our main conclusion in this section is that, from the perspective of achieving proper deterrence, a defendant's wealth generally should not be considered when the defendant is a corporation. We also conclude that the wealth criterion frequently should not be considered when the defendant is an individual, although we discuss certain circumstances in which an individual's wealth should be taken into account in imposing punitive damages. [131]

We explained above that, if damages equal harm multiplied by a factor reflecting the chance of escaping liability, defendants, including corporations, would be induced to take optimal precautions and to participate in risky activities to the proper extent. [132] It follows from this basic conclusion that, if damages are raised above the magnitude given by our formula when corporations are relatively wealthy, those corporations will be led to take excessive precautions, will undesirably curtail their activities, and will set prices above the proper level, chilling consumption of their products. In an extreme case, such corporations might even withdraw their products from the marketplace despite the value of the products to society.

An additional point reinforces the conclusion that corporate wealth should not influence punitive damages: imposing punitive damages on the basis of corporate wealth effectively imposes a tax on corporate size and success, thereby discouraging growth and development. This effect can be important in industries in which liability costs are a significant component of total cost (such as in the pharmaceutical and [*912] general aviation aircraft industries). [133] Of course, retarding the natural growth of corporations can have adverse consequences, notably, that society forgoes economies of scale in production and in research and development. It also may mean that the risk of harm increases, because small firms may not have enough at stake to make it worthwhile to them to spend a socially proper amount on precautions.

Our discussion of the inappropriateness of taking corporate wealth into account presumes legal system. Trial and appellate courts have struggled for many years to develop coherent principles for addressing the questions of when punitive damages should be awarded, and at what level. In this Article, Professors Polinsky and Shavell use economic reasoning to provide a relatively simple set of principles for answering these questions, given the goals of deterrence and punishment. With respect to the deterrence objective, on which their Article focuses, they argue that punitive damages ordinarily should be awarded if, and only if, an injurer has a significant chance of escaping liability for the harm he caused. When this condition holds, punitive damages are needed to offset the deterrence-diluting effect of the chance of escaping liability. (They mention as well a deterrence rationale for punitive damages that does not rest on the possibility of escape from liability - that punitive damages may be needed to deprive individuals of the socially illicit gains that they obtain from malicious acts.) Professors Polinsky and Shavell also discuss the tension between the implications of the deterrence objective and present punitive damages law, including the law's emphasis on the reprehensibility of a defendant's conduct and on a defendant's wealth. With respect to the punishment objective, Professors Polinsky and Shavell stress that the imposition of punitive damages on corporations may fail to serve its intended purpose (although the imposition of punitive damages on individual defendants accomplishes punishment in a straightforward manner). Punitive damages against corporations may be ineffective primarily because the payment of punitive damages awards by corporations often does not lead to greater punishment of culpable employees, but instead punishes the corporation's shareholders and customers.

REV_00262080

I.

Introduction

One of the more controversial features of the American legal system is the imposition of punitive damages. Courts have struggled for years to develop a rational set of principles for the imposition of punitive damages, [1] legislative bodies have passed or considered a variety of [*871] statutes to remedy perceived problems with punitive damages, [2] academic commentators have debated the theory behind, and significance of, punitive damages, [3] and the press has expressed strongly divergent [*872] opinions about the merits of punitive damages. [4] [*873]

Our goal in this Article is to develop a coherent and relatively simple set of principles for determining when punitive damages should be awarded and, in circumstances in which they are appropriate, what their level should be. We separately consider two social objectives: deterrence and punishment. [5] Our methodology is economic in the sense that we organize our inquiry around an examination of how rational parties will respond to the threat of punitive damages, and whether their response will promote, or fail to promote, social welfare. [6]

The analysis of the deterrence objective comprises the first and major part of the Article. Our conclusions in this part flow from the basic principle that, to achieve appropriate deterrence, injurers should be made to pay for the harm their conduct generates, not less, not more. If injurers pay less than for the harm they cause, underdeterrence may result - that is, precautions may be inadequate, product prices may be too low, and risk-producing activities may be excessive. Conversely, if injurers are made to pay more than for the harm they cause, wasteful precautions may be taken, product prices may be inappropriately high, and risky but socially beneficial activities may be undesirably curtailed.

It follows from these observations that a crucial question for consideration is whether injurers sometimes escape liability for harms for [*874] which they are responsible. If they do, [7] the level of liability imposed on them when they are found liable needs to exceed that all corporations - large and small - will, if required to pay for the harms they cause, tend to balance correctly the costs of precautions against the resulting reduction in harm. An argument sometimes is made, however, that because bigger corporations are more bureaucratic, they will not adequately respond to liability risks unless the damages imposed on them are especially high. According to this argument, higher damages are needed against large corporations to attract the attention of senior management. [134] This view is mistaken, as we now discuss.

REV_00262063

Although large corporations typically have complicated organizational structures, with senior management at some remove from the level of operations, it does not follow that large corporations will tend to be insufficiently attentive to the reduction of risk. If the cost of a precaution is less than the damages incurred by not taking it, a large firm will want someone employed by it to recognize that fact and take the precaution - because the firm's goal is to maximize profits. A large grocery chain, for example, will want some employee at each of its stores to inspect that store's floor after it is mopped in order to ensure that it is safe. The company will delegate this responsibility to an employee low in the corporate hierarchy, such as an assistant store manager. That this task does not receive the attention of top management, as it might in the case of a firm consisting of only one or two grocery stores, does not mean that the task will be neglected or attended to inadequately. As long as a corporation - large or small - expects to have to pay for the harms it causes, it will have a socially appropriate incentive to reduce the harms. [135] [*913]

Now consider the question of the relevance of wealth for the imposition of punitive damages on individuals. Again, the general arguments we made above imply that punitive damages should not depend on an individual's wealth; rather, punitive damages should depend only on the level of harm and the chance of escaping liability, so that, applying the damages multiplier formula, expected damages equal harm. [136] However, two qualifications to this conclusion suggest that wealth might be relevant in certain circumstances.

The first concerns risk aversion and the unavailability of insurance against punitive damages. We noted above that if potential injurers are risk averse and do not have access to liability insurance, appropriate deterrence will be accomplished with a lower level of damages than if they are risk neutral. [137] Further, the more risk averse an individual is, the lower the optimal level of damages. Assuming that poor individuals are more risk averse than rich ones, [138] the optimal level of punitive damages will be lower for poorer individuals. Equivalently, punitive damages should be higher for wealthier individuals. However, even for the wealthiest individuals, punitive damages should not exceed the level determined by our formula. [139] The relevance of these observations, we reiterate, is limited to situations in which insurance against punitive damages is not available.

The second circumstance in which the level of an individual's wealth may be relevant to the calculation of punitive damages is when the individual's gain from committing the harmful act is socially illicit. We explained above that punitive damages may be needed to offset illicit benefits. [140] To accomplish this, punitive damages generally will have to rise with the wealth of an individual, because the value of money tends to decline with wealth. [141] For example, to offset the utility a rich person would obtain from slandering someone he disliked, we might need to impose $ 10,000 in punitive damages, whereas to deter a person with only modest assets, $ 1000 in punitive damages might suffice. [*914]

We believe that the foregoing point underlies the common intuition that punitive damages should be linked to wealth. However, this point has a very limited scope, applying only to individuals whose benefit from causing harm is socially illicit, which we generally associate with conduct whose goal is to cause harm. Otherwise, the point of the previous paragraph does not apply to individuals. Moreover, the point does not apply to firms because firms are motivated by profits, rather than by a desire to cause harm.

REV_00262081

C.

Potential Harm

In reviewing the appropriateness of a punitive damages award, some courts have considered not only the harm that has actually occurred, but also the harm that might have occurred - the potential harm. [142] According to these courts, the higher the potential harm, the higher the level of punitive damages that can be justified. [143] The United States Supreme Court endorsed this idea in Haslip, as well as in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. [144] Potential harm also served as a basis for the trial court's upholding the $ 5 billion punitive damages verdict in the Exxon Valdez oil spill litigation; the court noted that, although 11 million gallons of oil spilled, another 45 million gallons in the Exxon Valdez could have spilled, making the potential harm much higher. [145]

We conclude, however, that a policy of taking potential harm into account in the determination of punitive damages is undesirable given the goal of deterrence. To explain the reasoning behind this conclusion, it will be convenient first to discuss why damages should be [*915] based on actual rather than potential harm when there is no chance of escaping liability and the issue of punitive damages does not arise.

Consider an example in which an injurer's act will result in either a low or high level of harm, and the injurer does not know in advance which level will occur. Let the two levels of harm be $ 1 million and $ 5 million, which occur with equal probability. This example raises the issue of potential harm because, when a $ 1 million harm occurs, the harm could have been $ 5 million. Note that the injurer's act entails an expected harm of $ 3 million (= (.5 X $ 1 million) + (.5 X $ 5 million)). To achieve proper deterrence, therefore, the injurer's expected damages should equal $ 3 million.

Given our assumption that injurers will be found liable when they cause harm, observe that deterrence will be optimal if damages are always set equal to actual harm. For when an injurer engages in the harmful activity, he will expect to have to pay $ 1 million in damages half of the time and $ 5 million in damages half of the time. Hence, his average damage payment will be $ 3 million or, stated differently, the expected value of his damage payment is $ 3 million (= (.5 X $ 1 million) + (.5 X $ 5 million)). As noted in the previous paragraph, this amount is what is needed for proper deterrence.

Nevertheless, if actual harm turns out to be low, one might wonder why basing damages on actual harm does not result in inadequate deterrence. In our example, if the harm is $ 1 million and the injurer is made to pay this amount, he will be paying relatively little compared to the $ 5 million harm that his act might have caused. (The difference between actual harm and potential harm could be much greater - indeed, a person may act very dangerously but cause no harm, and thus pay no damages, if damages are based on actual harm.) The reason that inadequate deterrence is not a problem, however, should be apparent: when a potential injurer chooses whether to engage in a harmful act, he does not know what the harm - and therefore what his damages - will be. The injurer in our example cannot predict whether his damages will be $ 1 million or $ 5 million. Consequently, he will decide whether to commit the harmful act on the basis of having to pay the average or expected damage amount, which is $ 3 million. It would be a mistake, therefore, to think that he will be inadequately deterred if the actual harm in a particular case turns out to be $ 1 million, and he has to pay only this amount. The possibility that the harm and his damages might have been $ 5 million also will influence his behavior, in an appropriate way.

Now suppose that, instead of basing damages solely on actual harm, courts take potential harm into account by raising damages when the actual harm is unusually low - because it could have been much higher - but do not lower damages when the actual harm is high. (Such an interpretation of how courts use the potential harm factor in practice is plausible, at least in the context of punitive dam- [*916] ages. [146]) The point we want to emphasize is that such a policy imparts a systematic upward bias to the level of damages and results in injurers bearing damages in excess of actual harm. Suppose that damages in the example are raised to $ 3 million when the actual harm is $ 1 million - on the ground that the former amount is the average harm - but that damages are not lowered when the actual harm is $ 5 million. Then the injurer will pay on average $ 4 million ($ 3 million half of the time and $ 5 million half of the time), even though the average harm is $ 3 million. Making injurers pay damages in excess of harm will have the undesirable consequences associated with overdeterrence that we have discussed previously.

REV_00262082

Potential harm could be taken into account in another way, however, that would not cause damages to exceed harm systematically. Specifically, suppose that damages are set equal to the average, or expected, harm regardless of whether the actual harm is below or above this amount. Thus, in the example, damages would be set equal to $ 3 million regardless of whether the actual harm is $ 1 million or $ 5 million. In effect, this policy recognizes both that, when actual harm is low, it could have been higher, and that, when actual harm is high, it could have been lower. Such a policy would result in proper deterrence because the injurer will be paying on average for the harm he causes: each time he commits the harmful act he pays $ 3 million and causes, on average, harm of $ 3 million. Whether this policy would be employed in practice is questionable, however. One might be skeptical that, when the actual harm is high, juries and courts would reduce damages because the harm might have been lower. [147]

Even if a policy of basing damages on average or expected harm were applied consistently, a strong argument exists, based on administrative considerations, for relying solely on actual harm. For the courts to be able to calculate expected harm, they would have to determine each level of harm that could have occurred and its probability of occurrence. Such amounts ordinarily would be far more difficult to establish than the harm that actually did occur. [148] Additionally, the more open-ended scope of inquiry into expected harm seems likely to lead to more disputes between the parties, for it is easier to disagree [*917] about what might have happened, and the odds of it happening, than about what actually did happen. These observations suggest that the courts will bear greater administrative expense, and the parties will bear greater litigation costs, if the goal is to calculate expected harm rather than to ascertain only the actual harm in the instant case. [149]

To summarize, there are two reasons that potential harm generally should not be taken into account in determining damages. First, we envision that the potential harm factor would be used in practice to raise damages when harm is low but not to lower damages when harm is high, thus causing overdeterrence. Second, even if potential harm were considered in the theoretically correct way - by always setting damages equal to average or expected harm - such a policy would require an inquiry into what might have occurred, and is therefore likely to increase the public and private costs of resolving legal disputes. [150]

As noted at the beginning of this section, we assumed for simplicity that the injurer is definitely found liable. The arguments for basing damages on actual harm rather than on potential harm or expected harm are essentially the same if the injurer might escape liability. The discussion then would be framed in terms of a comparison between actual harm, appropriately increased to make up for the chance of escaping liability, and potential harm or expected harm, also so increased. Our point about courts' tendencies to apply the potential harm factor in a way that leads to overdeterrence still holds, as does the point about the greater administrative complexity of determining expected harm. Thus, when the injurer has a significant chance of escaping liability, and punitive damages therefore are needed to achieve proper deterrence, such damages generally should be an appropriate multiple of actual harm, not of expected harm or potential harm. In punitive damages law, potential harm usually should be ignored. [*918]

REV_00262083

D.

Gain of Defendants

When punitive damages are imposed, their level is sometimes influenced by application of the principle that the defendant should not gain from his wrongful conduct. [151] If setting damages equal to harm would not remove the defendant's gain, the argument is that damages should include a sufficient punitive component to offset his gain. The notion that the defendant's gain should be a factor in calculating punitive damages was endorsed by the United States Supreme Court in Haslip. [152]

Does it make sense in terms of deterrence to ensure that the defendant's gain is disgorged, or should damages be based solely on harm (abstracting from the issue of the chance of escaping liability [153])? We conclude in this section that setting damages equal to harm generally results in proper deterrence even when the harm is less than the defendant's gain; a policy of removing the defendant's gain may result in overdeterrence. An exception arises, however, when the defendant's gain is socially illicit, in which case extracting the defendant's gain is desirable. [154]

The question whether punitive damages should be imposed to remove the defendant's gain arises only when his gain exceeds the victim's harm (otherwise, compensatory damages would eliminate the gain). One situation in which gain could exceed harm is when the [*919] level of harm is uncertain and, by chance, turns out to be low - and less than the injurer's gain. [155] Such a situation could occur even though the expected harm exceeds the gain. For example, suppose that a firm would save $ 100,000, and thus would gain that amount, by not purchasing a safety device; that the expected harm from failing to purchase the device is $ 1 million; but that only $ 10,000 in harm occurs. Here the firm's $ 100,000 gain exceeds the unusually low harm of $ 10,000.

Using this example, we first want to show that basing damages on harm will accomplish proper deterrence even though the defendant's gain exceeds the harm: at the time the firm decides whether to buy the $ 100,000 safety device, it does not know what the harm will be. If damages always are set equal to harm and the expected harm is $ 1 million, then the firm's expected damages will be $ 1 million, which of course will induce it to spend $ 100,000 on the safety device. It is not necessary to impose punitive damages just because the harm turns out to be unusually low and below the injurer's gain. (Note that the point of this paragraph is analogous to the point we made above about potential harm. [156])

If the standard policy of imposing damages equal to harm appropriately deters, is there a disadvantage of imposing higher damages - namely, to remove the defendant's gain - when gain turns out to exceed harm? The answer is in the affirmative because overdeterrence may result. Specifically, if damages are set equal to harm when the harm exceeds the injurer's gain, but damages are set equal to gain when gain exceeds harm, then expected damages will exceed the expected harm, resulting in the usual problems of excessive liability.

If damages are set so as to remove gains, an additional reason that overdeterrence may result is that the basis for measuring the injurer's gains might be interpreted too expansively. In the example above, the firm's gains might be construed to be its profits from the entire line of activity that gave rise to the accident (say, the profits from manufacturing automobiles at a particular plant), rather than just the saving from not taking the particular precaution (say, not purchasing a $ 100,000 instrument to test the integrity of the automobiles' brakes). If gains are erroneously measured in this way, a policy of setting damages equal to gain will be even more likely to result in excessive liability. [*920]

REV_00262084

Another circumstance in which a defendant's gain might exceed the victim's harm is when the level of gain is uncertain [157] and, by happenstance, turns out to be high even though the expected gain is low and less than harm. [158] For example, suppose that the cost of re-engineering an assembly line to make production safer ordinarily is $ 200,000, but unforeseen complications could raise the cost to $ 800,000. If the assembly line is modified, harm of $ 500,000 will be avoided. Thus, although the expected gain from forgoing the safety improvements is less than the $ 500,000 harm, [159] the actual gain could be $ 800,000 and greater than the harm. The analysis of this situation is similar to that when the uncertainty concerned harm; again, it can be shown that setting damages equal to harm will create appropriate deterrence and that imposing punitive damages to remove injurers' gains will tend to result in overdeterrence.

Finally, consider the possibility that the injurer's gain is socially illicit, as when a person acts out of malice. We noted above that it is desirable to deter an injurer whose gain is illicit even if his gain exceeds the victim's harm, and that such a goal implies that punitive damages may be needed to offset the injurer's gain. [160] Thus, in the case of socially illicit utility, the notion of using punitive damages to ensure that the defendant's gain is removed is justifiable with respect to the goal of deterrence. As we also observed previously, this justification for removing the defendant's gain does not apply to individuals acting non-maliciously or to corporations.

In sum, then, removing the defendant's gain is potentially appropriate and necessary only when the defendant is an individual who acted maliciously and obtained a socially illicit gain. Otherwise, the usual policy of setting damages equal to harm is desirable for achieving deterrence, and imposing damages so as to remove gains will tend to cause overdeterrence. [161] [*921]

E.

Litigation Costs

Several courts have suggested that the plaintiff's litigation costs should be a factor in the determination of punitive damages, [162] and, as noted previously, some have stated that such costs should be included as a component of punitive damages in order to encourage victims to sue injurers. [163]

Should litigation costs bear on the calculation of punitive damages to achieve proper deterrence? Our answer in this section emphasizes two points. The first is that litigation costs may cause the probability of suit to be low and thus justify a punitive damages award according to the damage formula presented earlier. [164] The second point is that punitive damages generally should not be augmented for the purpose of inducing suits that otherwise might not be brought because of the cost of litigation. Raising the probability of suit is usually unnecessary to achieve proper deterrence, and encouraging suits has the disadvantage of increasing the litigation costs borne by society. Indeed, we argue that a policy adopted in many states of decoupling punitive damages - giving the plaintiff only a fraction of the punitive damages paid by the defendant, with the remainder going to the state - may be desirable because it can reduce the volume of litigation without compromising deterrence. [165]

The first point, that litigation costs may be relevant to the calculation of punitive damages because they influence the probability of suit, and therefore the chance of escaping liability, is one that we have made previously. [166] We observed that, if litigation costs are significant relative to the expected gain from suit, the probability of suit may be low, and this fact may justify imposing punitive damages on the injurer. For example, we suggested that in the circumstances of Gore, litigation costs may have led to a low likelihood of suit because the [*922] harm to the plaintiff was found to be only $ 4000. However, in other circumstances, like those in the Exxon Valdez case, litigation costs are likely to be insignificant in relation to the expected gain from suit, so that the probability of suit may be presumed to be very high. Then, consideration of litigation costs does not provide a basis for imposing punitive damages.

REV_00262085

Note that when punitive damages are justified because of litigation costs, they should not necessarily be set equal to litigation costs. Proper punitive damages are determined by the multiplier formula, which calls for a level of punitive damages that generally differs from litigation costs. For instance, suppose harm is $ 10,000 and the plaintiff's litigation costs are $ 5000 and lead to a twenty-five percent likelihood of suit. Then total damages should be four times the harm, or $ 40,000, and punitive damages should be $ 30,000, not the $ 5000 amount of litigation costs.

Let us now turn to our second point. Because the punitive damages formula is designed to achieve appropriate deterrence when suit does not always occur, it is not necessary to raise punitive damages awards for the specific purpose of raising the probability of suit (provided that at least some suits are brought). [167] If suit occurs only half of the time because of the discouraging effect of litigation costs, total damages according to our formula would be twice the harm, and deterrence will be appropriate; there is no need to increase punitive damages to make suit occur more frequently. Moreover, encouraging lawsuits would increase social costs. Obviously, the greater the number of suits, the higher the legal costs borne by the parties and the administrative costs borne by the court system. [168] Raising damages to induce suits also will cause parties to spend more litigating each suit. [169] Thus, awarding punitive damages to spur suit is socially undesirable, other things being equal. [*923]

The tendency of higher damage awards to increase litigation costs lends appeal to the policy of decoupling punitive damages. As noted above, under this policy, the plaintiff is awarded only a part of the punitive damages judgment paid by the defendant, with the remainder going to the state. [170] Decoupling mitigates the propensity of punitive damages awards to encourage unnecessary litigation, but does not dilute deterrence because defendants' damage payments are unaffected. [171]

Several states have adopted statutes that decouple punitive damages. [172] For example, in Iowa, twenty-five percent of the punitive damages amount paid by the defendant in certain circumstances is given to the plaintiff, and in Kansas, fifty percent is given to the plaintiff. [173] For the reasons stated in the previous paragraph, decoupling schemes of this sort are beneficial.

In summary, the main justification for considering litigation costs is in connection with estimating the chance that a defendant might have escaped liability because he would not be sued. Punitive damages should be awarded to make up for the chance of escaping liability for this reason, but not as a general matter to encourage the bringing of lawsuits. Decoupling punitive damages may allow proper deterrence to be achieved without inducing needless litigation.

F.

Related Private Litigation

A defendant sometimes may be the subject of multiple suits because he engages in the same type of harmful conduct repeatedly, or because he commits a single act that injures many individuals. The circumstances of Gore exemplify the former possibility: a car manufacturer that engages in the practice of repainting damaged cars and selling them as new may be sued by different purchasers of these cars. A case involving the dumping of toxic waste that infiltrates an aquifer illustrates the latter possibility: the dumping, a single act, may give rise [*924] to suits by many different parties who have been harmed. When there have been prior judgments against a defendant for the same conduct, the United States Supreme Court has endorsed the notion that these judgments should be taken into account in mitigation of a punitive damages award against the defendant. [174]

REV_00262086

In this section, we discuss the application of our punitive damages formula when multiple plaintiffs bring suits against the same defendant, and we observe that the formula's implications generally comport with the view that punitive damages should be lowered in the light of other private judgments against a defendant. We also note that multiple punitive damages claims against a defendant for the same or related conduct may result in his paying for more than the harm he caused, and we discuss a mechanism - punitive damages escrow accounts - that can be used to address this problem.

Let us first consider the proper level of punitive damages when multiple suits may be brought because of repeated harmful conduct, as in Gore. Whether prior suits have been brought may be relevant in assessing the probability of suit, and thus in determining the punitive damages multiplier. If few (or no) suits have been brought even though harm had occurred in the past, that fact suggests that the likelihood of suit is low, implying that the multiplier should be high. Conversely, if a large number of prior suits have occurred, the usual inference would be that the likelihood of suit is significant, and therefore the multiplier should be low. Note that these points mean that punitive damages in a particular case should be mitigated on the basis of the number of prior suits. [175]

That few (or no) suits have been brought prior to the instant case does not necessarily mean, however, that there will be a paucity of liti- [*925] gation in the future. For example, publicity about the current suit may engender future suits, or an award of punitive damages in the current suit may stimulate litigation.

Because of the difficulty of predicting the amount of future litigation, courts might mistakenly believe that relatively few suits will be brought, and therefore perceive a greater need for punitive damages than is appropriate. (Although courts also could incorrectly expect that many suits will occur in the future, this error does not give rise to the problem we are about to discuss. [176]) If such a mistake occurs, a defendant may be made to pay more than the harm that he caused. For example, in circumstances like those in Gore, suppose that the court in which the first case is filed believes that only ten percent of similarly harmed car purchasers will sue in the future. The punitive damages formula then would imply that the court should impose total damages on the manufacturer equal to ten times the current plaintiff's harm. If, however, the truth is that much more than ten percent of the other victims will eventually bring suit, the car manufacturer may ultimately pay for more than the harm that it has caused, because of the excessive initial award of punitive damages.

A way to avoid the problem of excessive damages when there are multiple suits is to use escrow accounts for punitive damages. Under this approach, the defendant would pay punitive damages into an escrow account rather than immediately to the plaintiff. [177] If, over time, more plaintiffs bring suits than the court had anticipated, the damage awards to the plaintiffs can be financed from the escrow account rather than charged to the defendant. In this way, the defendant will not be made to pay more in total damages than the harm done. If, at some natural termination date, [178] funds remain in the escrow account, they can be distributed to plaintiffs whose punitive damages awards had been placed in escrow. [179]

Finally, let us turn briefly to the situation in which multiple suits arise because the defendant has committed a single harmful act that injured many individuals (as in the example involving the dumping of [*926] toxic waste). Here, our points are analogous to those discussed above. Again, whether prior suits have been brought may be relevant to evaluating the probability of suit: a greater number of prior suits should raise the estimated likelihood of suit, reduce the punitive damages multiplier, and thereby lead a court to impose lower punitive damages. Similarly, an escrow account for punitive damages can be used to avoid imposing excessive damages on the defendant.

REV_00262087

G.

Related Public Penalties

Another question of interest is whether public penalties that may be imposed for the type of wrongful conduct at issue in a private suit should affect the determination of punitive damages in that suit. Courts have answered this question in two ways. First, some have stated that punitive damages should be reduced to reflect any public penalties that the defendant has paid for the same conduct. [180] Second, the United States Supreme Court has argued in Gore that the level of punitive damages should reflect the level of public penalties that could be imposed for comparable misconduct - the higher the possible public sanctions, the higher punitive damages should be. [181]

How do these positions relate to our conclusions about punitive damages and deterrence? In this section we observe that the view that courts should reduce punitive damages if the defendant has already paid public sanctions has a straightforward justification. However, we [*927] suggest that the view taken in Gore, that potential public penalties should serve as a benchmark for punitive damages, is problematic.

To begin, there is an obvious basis for subtracting any public penalties already incurred by the defendant from the level of punitive damages that otherwise would be appropriate: such a policy is necessary to ensure that the defendant's total payment is the proper amount for the purpose of deterrence. As the reader knows, the defendant's total payment should be such that his expected payment equals the harm done. If punitive damages are not reduced from the amount implied by our formula to reflect public penalties borne by the defendant, the defendant's combined private and public payments would result in his expected payments exceeding the harm done. [182]

Now consider the use of public penalties as a benchmark for setting punitive damages, as suggested in Gore. This role for public penalties makes sense only if their level conveys information relevant to determining the proper amount of punitive damages. The question naturally arises, therefore, whether the level of public penalties implies something about, among other things, the chance of escaping liability. Ostensibly, the answer is yes. For example, suppose that significant public penalties are imposed on restaurants for food poisoning because food poisoning often will not lead to suit. A court reviewing a punitive damages judgment in a case against a restaurant for food poisoning might use this information about the likelihood of suit, inferred from the magnitude of the public penalties, to justify the award. [183]

Nevertheless, we are skeptical whether the information that generally can be inferred from public penalties will be very useful, given the information that courts already will have about a case. In the course of a trial, a court will typically obtain information particular to that case about the defendant's likelihood of escaping liability. For example, a court might learn whether it would be easy to link harm from food poisoning to the defendant's restaurant (the type of poisoning [*928] may or may not make identification straightforward), or whether the magnitude of the harm from the poisoning would be sufficient to induce suit (the poisoning may or may not result in expensive hospitalization and substantial lost wages). In contrast, the information implicit in public sanctions for food poisoning reflects, one presumes, only the average likelihood of liability over the range of cases of food poisoning.

REV_00262088

Further difficulties are involved in inferring useful information from the level of public penalties. Such penalties are influenced in part by political factors - interest group pressures, logrolling, and the like. Consequently, courts would find it hard to determine in any precise way what legislators thought about the likelihood of escaping liability when they set the level of public sanctions. Another complication is that public penalties may themselves be influenced by the possibility of punitive damages awards in private suits: public penalties might be low precisely because legislators believed that punitive damages awards would create effective deterrence. If the courts then constrain such awards on the ground that public penalties for comparable conduct are low, deterrence will tend to be inadequate, because of a kind of circularity - the legislature relying on the courts and the courts relying on the legislature. [184] Because of the possibility of such circularity, the information that courts infer from the level of public penalties may be misleading.

For the foregoing reasons, we believe that courts generally should not use public sanctions as a benchmark in setting punitive damages. Such sanctions should be used, however, as an offset: any public penalties paid for the same conduct at issue in a private suit should reduce the magnitude of punitive damages calculated according to our formula.

H.

Tax Treatment of Punitive Damages

If a defendant bears punitive damages as a result of his engaging in some business or other income-earning activity, he generally can deduct such damages from taxable income, just as he can deduct compensatory damages in those circumstances. [185] But neither punitive nor compensatory damages are deductible if they are incurred as a result of the defendant's engaging in a non-business or personal activity. [186] [*929]

We explain here that these policies are desirable, given the goal of creating appropriate deterrence. [187] In the business context, the essence of the argument for the deductibility of punitive damages is that, were they not deductible, overdeterrence would result because the punitive damages component of liability would be more significant than it should be. Conversely, in the non-business or personal context, if punitive damages were deductible, underdeterrence would result. [188]

To see why damages should be deductible in a business context, consider a simple example in which a harm of $ 10,000 can be prevented by taking a precaution. It is socially desirable that the precaution is taken only if it costs less than $ 10,000. We first will show that if the injurer always will be sued and have to pay $ 10,000 in compensatory damages, precautions will be taken precisely when they should be if the damage payment is deductible. Suppose that the precaution costs $ 8000 and it is not taken. Then the defendant will pay damages of $ 10,000, and if these are deductible at, say, a forty percent tax rate, the defendant will bear after-tax damages of $ 6000. If the defendant does take the precaution, he pays $ 8000 for it, but because this is a deductible expense, the after-tax cost of the precaution is $ 4800. Hence, he will take the precaution. Alternatively, if the precaution costs more than $ 10,000, the defendant is better off paying damages of $ 10,000 and deducting this amount than spending more on the precaution. Thus, the defendant will act optimally.

To put the point differently, because the defendant is able to deduct all of his expenses, whether damages or precautions, he will want to act so as to minimize his after-tax costs and thus will choose the precaution if and only if its cost after taxes is less than the damages the defendant would bear after taxes. Because the tax rate is the same whether applied to deducting precaution costs or damages, the defendant's behavior is equivalent to his choosing the precaution if and only if its cost is less than the damages (putting tax considerations aside), which is the behavior that is desired.

REV_00262089

If damages were not deductible, a business actor might take precautions even when they cost more than the harm. Consider a firm in a forty percent tax bracket that is deciding whether to take a precaution that costs $ 15,000 and would prevent a harm of $ 10,000. The [*930] firm will take the precaution if damages are not deductible: the after-tax cost of the precaution is $ 9000, which is less than the after-tax cost of non-deductible compensatory damages, $ 10,000. This decision is socially undesirable because the cost to society of the precaution is $ 15,000, while the benefit to society is $ 10,000.

The reason that the firm is led to take a socially wasteful precaution is that damages are not deductible, but the precaution cost is, so that the effective cost of the damages to the firm is heightened. Indeed, with a tax rate of forty percent, damages appear to be one-and-two-thirds as important to eliminate as they would be if they were deductible, meaning that the firm would be willing to spend up to $ 16,667 to eliminate a $ 10,000 harm. [189]

The explanation that we have provided for the desirability of allowing compensatory damages to be deducted in a business context applies equally to punitive damages. Punitive damages are just another form of damages that are intended to make the expected damages of injurers equal to the harm they cause. If punitive damages were not deductible, but precaution costs were, overdeterrence would result for essentially the same reason as that discussed above: the non-deductibility of punitive damages would make causing harm more costly to business actors than expenditures to prevent harm, so that such actors would be induced to spend too much to reduce harm. [190] [*931]

The importance of allowing punitive damages to be deductible in a business context may be substantial because the tax rate for corporations and other business actors is relatively high. As we noted, at a tax rate of forty percent, [191] if damages were not deductible, a potential injurer might be induced to spend up to one-and-two-thirds the harm to prevent it. [192] Thus, if the deductibility of punitive damages in a business setting were disallowed, significant overdeterrence could result.

The explanation for why punitive damages should not be deductible in a non-business or personal context is the converse of that for why they should be deductible in a business context. In a non-business or personal setting, the cost of precautions is not deductible. Hence, if punitive damages also are not deductible, a potential injurer will properly balance the cost of precautions against the reduction in harm from taking the precaution. If punitive damages were deductible, a potential injurer would not give sufficient weight to the reduction in harm from taking precautions, resulting in underdeterrence.

I.

Insurability of Punitive Damages

Policies regarding the insurability of punitive damages vary among states. Most states allow punitive damages to be covered by liability insurance, but some do not. [193] [*932]

Should punitive damages be insurable? The basic answer to this question is yes, although we qualify this conclusion below. The reason that it is generally desirable to allow insurance for punitive damages is best understood by recognizing that punitive damages are, according to compensatory damages so that, on average, they will pay for the harm that they cause. This excess liability can be labeled "punitive damages," and failure to impose it would result in inadequate deterrence. In summary, punitive damages ordinarily should be awarded if, and only if, an injurer has a chance of escaping liability for the harm he causes. [8]

REV_00262090

This principle often will have transparent implications for the circumstances in which punitive damages should be awarded in practice. Consider a company that is responsible for trucking toxic waste to a dump site where it will be charged disposal fees. To reduce its fees, suppose the company allows some of the waste to leak onto the highway, because it knows that the leak is unlikely to be noticed and traced to its source. Under our analysis, punitive damages obviously would be called for because of the significant chance that the company will escape liability for the harm it caused. Alternatively, suppose the gross negligence of the firm that is responsible for treating the waste at the dump site leads to a substantial and highly visible spill from the firm's waste storage tanks. Punitive damages would not be appropriate because the firm is unlikely to escape detection and liability for this harm.

When an injurer has a chance of escaping liability, the proper level of total damages to impose on him, if he is found liable, is the harm caused multiplied by the reciprocal of the probability of being found liable. Thus, for example, if the harm is $ 100,000 and there is a twenty-five percent chance that the injurer will be found liable for the harm for which he is legally responsible, the harm should be multiplied by 1/.25, or 4, so total damages should be $ 400,000. Because the injurer will pay this amount every fourth time he generates harm, his average payment will be $ 100,000 (= $ 400,000/4). [9] Thus, on average, the injurer will pay for the harm he causes, and appropriate deterrence will result. Once the proper level of total damages is calculated in this way, punitive damages can be determined by subtracting compensa- [*875] tory damages from the total. In the example, because compensatory damages would equal the harm of $ 100,000, punitive damages would equal $ 300,000 (= $ 400,000 - $ 100,000).

If punitive damages are needed according to this theory, we believe that courts and juries often will be able to obtain enough information about the likelihood of escaping liability to apply the theory reasonably well. We will discuss how our analysis relates to several leading punitive damages cases, [10] and we will provide model jury instructions that can be used to aid jurors in applying the principles that we develop.

We also will relate our analysis of the deterrence rationale for punitive damages to the criteria commonly applied by courts in imposing such damages. Importantly, we will explain that the reprehensibility of a corporate defendant's conduct generally should not be a factor in deciding whether, and to what extent, to impose punitive damages for purposes of promoting deterrence (although the reprehensibility of the conduct of a person who is a defendant may be relevant to punitive damages and deterrence). In addition, we will argue that the wealth of a corporate defendant presumptively should not be taken into account in determining the level of punitive damages (although again the conclusion may be different in the case of a person who is a defendant). We also will consider other aspects of punitive damages policy from the perspective of deterrence, including the appropriateness of caps on punitive damages, the relevance of potential harm for punitive damages, the insurability of punitive damages, and the importance for punitive damages of the distinction between victims who are customers of an injurer and victims who are strangers to the injurer.

One further observation about our analysis of deterrence is worth noting. We ordinarily assume that the benefits that injurers derive from engaging in the conduct that gives rise to harm is included in the calculation of social welfare. We also will discuss, however, the possibility that such benefits should not be included - notably, when a wrongdoer derives pleasure from his victim's suffering. We will explain that, if the injurer's benefits are excluded from social welfare, punitive damages may be needed for proper deterrence even when there is no chance of escaping liability. [11]

REV_00262064

our theory, a way to make defendants pay for the harm they do when they have a chance of escaping liability. Thus, the question whether punitive damages should be insurable is essentially the same as the question whether compensatory damages should be insurable. [194]

Of course, compensatory damages are insurable, but what reason can be given for allowing them to be? Consider this question when liability is strict and harm is entirely monetary. In this case, allowing the purchase of liability insurance is socially desirable. Liability insurance raises the well-being of potential injurers, which is why they choose to buy it, and the availability of such insurance does not affect the welfare of victims, who will be fully compensated anyway. Even if the purchase of liability insurance causes injurers to take less care and thereby increases the frequency of accidents, victims will not be affected because they are fully compensated. [195]

However, if losses are nonmonetary, victims might not be fully compensated, or if the negligence rule applies, might not be compensated at all. [196] Consequently, their welfare would be adversely affected if liability insurance leads to an increase in the frequency of accidents. Nevertheless, it can be shown that such insurance often is socially desirable even then, because the value of the insurance to insureds may exceed the loss of welfare to victims. [197] Further, the victims' losses are mitigated because liability insurers have a financial incentive to structure coverage and premiums to control risks. For example, insurers may make insurance premiums depend on an in- [*933] sured's history of claims, may only offer partial coverage, or may require that the insured take certain steps to reduce risks. As a result, the purchase of liability insurance may not significantly reduce the insured's incentives to exercise precautions.

Moreover, if liability insurance were disallowed, not only would the well-being of potential injurers decrease, but such injurers also might forgo engaging in some socially beneficial activities that pose liability risks. For example, surgeons might refuse to perform certain operations, or general-aviation aircraft companies might cease making planes. Even when services and products continue to be offered, prices would rise to cover the liability risks that such providers would now have to bear directly, and the resulting price increase generally would exceed that which would have resulted from the purchase of liability insurance. [198] Both of these consequences of disallowing liability insurance - the possible withdrawal from certain activities and the increased price of other activities - hurt consumers of the affected products and services. This consideration lends support to the case for allowing the sale of liability insurance.

A major complication in the preceding discussion concerning the desirability of liability insurance arises from the judgment-proof problem. [199] If injurers can avoid having to pay for some of the harm they cause because their assets are limited, they will have a reduced incentive both to take precautions and to moderate their participation in risky activities. (In the extreme case, an injurer with no assets would have no liability-related incentive to reduce risks.) Depending on insurers' ability to control insureds, the sale of liability insurance could either worsen or ameliorate this problem. If insurers are substantially unable to control the risky behavior of insureds because insurers cannot easily observe insureds' risk-taking behavior and link policy features, such as premium rates, to insureds' behavior, liability insurance would tend to exacerbate the judgment-proof problem. It might then be beneficial to forbid the sale of such insurance. Conversely, if insurers can relatively easily observe and control the behavior of insureds, liability insurance could lessen the judgment-proof problem. For in- [*934] stance, insurers might require that a restaurant install fire extinguishers and a sprinkler system to reduce fire risks. In this case, not only might it be desirable to allow the sale of liability insurance, but it might even be beneficial to require its purchase. [200]

We have now explained that, with some qualifications, it is generally desirable to allow potential injurers to purchase liability insurance for compensatory damages. Because punitive damages, by our formula, substitute for compensatory damages when injurers can escape liability, essentially the same arguments support the conclusion that it is generally desirable also to allow the sale of insurance for punitive damages, as the majority of states already do.

REV_00262091

J.

Third Party Versus Consumer Victims

Our analysis of punitive damages has assumed implicitly that the parties harmed by the injurer are "third parties" - that is, parties who have no market or contractual relationship with the defendant. Such was the case, for example, with respect to the fishermen and Alaskan natives whose livelihood was affected by the Exxon Valdez oil spill. In many situations, however, the victims are customers of the defendant, as in Gore, in which the plaintiff was a purchaser of a car made by the defendant. [201]

When determining punitive damages, courts devote little attention to whether the plaintiff was a third party or a consumer. [202] The list of factors in Haslip, for example, does not include this distinction, nor does any other similar list or authoritative source of which we are aware. [203] [*935]

However, the status of victims as third parties or consumers is important to consider, for when victims are consumers, the need for punitive damages is lessened. The reason is that, when individuals might be harmed by the products (or services) they buy, producers will tend to be concerned that customers may not be willing to pay as much for the products or that they may stop purchasing the products altogether. Given that producers have this market-based incentive to be attentive to the risk of harm to their customers, the need for liability in general, and for punitive damages in particular, to control their behavior is diminished. [204] Obviously, this market mechanism cannot operate if the victims are not customers of the defendant - that is, if they are third parties. [205]

The extent to which market forces reduce the need for liability as a deterrent depends on how much customers know about product or service hazards. In some circumstances, customers will not be able to discipline firms effectively because of their lack of knowledge of such risks. [206] Because travelers probably would not know much about the chance of suffering food poisoning from eating at a family-owned restaurant at a turnpike stop, the restaurant would not be likely to fear loss of clientele if food poisoning were to occur. Thus, the threat of liability, including punitive damages, might be desirable to induce the restaurant to reduce this risk. [207]

In many settings, however, consumer information about the dangers of products and services is relatively good. [208] This may be be- [*936] cause the risks have a fairly obvious character, because they have been publicized by the media, [209] or because the customers are repeat purchasers and have learned about them from experience. In such circumstances, the threat of liability would be relatively unimportant in controlling risk. Indeed, if consumer information about risk were perfect, liability to improve product safety would be unnecessary: consumers would reduce their willingness to pay for a firm's product or service by precisely the amount of the expected harm to which the product or service exposed them, which in turn would cause firms to invest in any cost-justified precautions.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that in deciding on punitive damages, courts should take into account whether the victims are third parties or customers and, if the latter, whether market forces are likely to lead sellers to reduce risk properly. A skeptical approach to imposing punitive damages should be adopted when consumers are relatively well-informed about the risk of the seller's product or service. [210]

REV_00262092

K.

Breach of Contract

Although we have been discussing the imposition of punitive damages in situations governed by tort law, punitive damages sometimes can be levied in contractual disputes as well. [211] Indeed, there seems to be an increasing tendency to employ such damages in this context [212] - for example, in employment termination and insurance litigation. [213]

We will explain that the award of punitive damages sometimes can promote the interests of contracting parties - when a non-performing [*937] party has a chance of escaping detection and liability. However, such circumstances do not give rise to the imposition of punitive damages in contract cases in practice, with the result that the interests of contracting parties may be harmed by actual punitive damages policy. [214]

Parties would benefit from the imposition of punitive damages when such damages are necessary to induce the promisor to perform adequately. [215] For example, consider a company that contracts with a city to replace its burned-out streetlights. Suppose that the company would have to pay punitive damages of $ 200, in addition to compensatory damages of $ 50, if the city discovers that a light was not replaced in a timely manner (say, one week after burning out). The reason we can imagine that the parties would want punitive damages in this situation is that they both recognize that the city will not discover most of the lights that burn out and that are not repaired on a timely basis. They realize that setting total damages for breach in excess of the loss from breach will give the repair company a stronger and more appropriate motive to search for and replace burned-out streetlights than would compensatory damages alone. Because the city will be willing to pay more to the company for its better service, both parties to the contract can benefit from imposition of punitive damages. [216] [*938]

Note that the circumstances in this example are analogous to those in the tort settings in which we have said that punitive damages are desirable - namely, when there is a probability that a party will not be found liable if he does harm (in the present context, by committing a breach). Thus, the role of the penalty for breach in the example resembles the role of punitive damages in tort situations - to make up for the chance of escaping liability. [217]

Parties may want punitive damages to be paid for breach in two contexts in which a breaching party may escape liability. The first situation is when the breached-against party does not automatically observe whether performance has occurred, as in the streetlight example. [218] The second situation is when the breached-against party knows that performance has been deficient, but may not be able to prove this in court or lacks a financial incentive to sue. For instance, if an insurance company fabricates a reason for not paying a small claim, the insured may not sue because of the uncertainty of success and the cost of a lawsuit. But because insureds would in principle be willing to pay higher premiums if an insurance company can be deterred from acting in this way, the insurer may benefit from an agreement to pay punitive damages when it is found liable for falsely denying a small claim.

In many circumstances, however, parties will not want damages for breach of contract to exceed the compensatory level because the breach is obvious, the nature of the breach is such that it easily can be proven in court, and the amount at stake is large enough to justify suit. To the degree that courts impose punitive damages in these situa- [*939] tions, such damages will result in excessive and expensive performance (the analogue of overdeterrence), thereby lowering the welfare of the contracting parties.

In conclusion, courts should be cautious about awarding punitive damages for breach of contract. This point is worth noting because the law governing the imposition of punitive damages for breach of contract does not restrict their award to cases in which the likelihood of escaping liability for breach is substantial. [219]

REV_00262093

L.

Components of Harm Not Included in Compensatory Damages

It is often suggested that punitive damages should be awarded to compensate plaintiffs for non-economic and other losses that would not otherwise be incorporated into compensatory damages. [220] Many courts have endorsed this justification for punitive damages. [221]

Although we recognize that awarding punitive damages as a substitute for a missing component of harm has a potential rationale in terms of assuring proper deterrence, we suggest in this section that remedies for missing components of harm would be best pursued through revision of the rules used to calculate compensatory damages.

As the reader knows, our basic analysis of deterrence implies that injurers should have to pay for the entire harm they cause, in order that injurers take appropriate precautions and that prices and participation in risky activities are proper. Thus, if there is a component of [*940] harm that otherwise would be omitted, a policy of including it in the form of punitive damages would seem to be beneficial. [222]

Notwithstanding this point, employing punitive damages as a substitute for missing components of compensatory damages is problematic. Namely, a component of harm might be excluded from compensatory damages because of the difficulties and expense that would be encountered in estimating it. Consider, for example, the pain and suffering experienced by the friends of a person who dies. If this category of harm were included in compensatory awards, the number of claimants in cases of wrongful death could become quite large, and the cost of litigation would also increase as a result of parties contesting the magnitude of their psychological losses. It may be best, then, for the law to exclude from compensatory damages many such speculative, difficult-to-determine elements of harm, even though these elements are real and their omission does undesirably dilute deterrence. [223]

If a component of loss is excluded from compensatory damages for these reasons, it arguably should be excluded from punitive damages as well. The disadvantages of attempting to ascertain the missing component of harm would not be lessened just because it is calculated under a different head of damages. It will be no easier to determine the pain and suffering due to the death of a friend just because this loss is imported into punitive damages. Indeed, the accuracy of measurement of this loss would be expected to be worse because the calculation of punitive damages is not disciplined by the procedures and evidentiary requirements common to the determination of compensatory damages. [224]

Of course, if a component of loss should have been included in compensatory damages despite the costs of doing so, the natural response is to rectify the mistake by incorporating it in compensatory damages. If the component of loss is instead included as part of punitive damages, not only will it be less accurately measured for the reason noted in the previous paragraph, but there will also be another problem: the component will be omitted in the large majority of cases, those in which only compensatory damages are awarded. Specifically, [*941] the component will be omitted in the approximately ninety-four percent of cases in which punitive damages are not awarded. [225]

M.

Economic Loss Versus Personal Injury

REV_00262094

Several courts have expressed the view that the level of punitive damages should depend on whether the plaintiff's harm involved personal injury or was entirely economic. [226] For example, much was made of this distinction in Gore, in which the United States Supreme Court contrasted the "purely economic" harm inflicted by the defendant with instances of "reckless disregard for the health and safety of others," implying that the latter acts should be subject to higher punitive damages. [227]

Does it make sense for punitive damages to be influenced by whether the harm consists of a personal injury, as opposed to an economic loss? The answer is basically no. If the amount that courts award as compensatory damages in personal injury cases is proper, [228] the formula that we have advanced for the determination of punitive damages should apply without modification: the level of compensatory damages for the personal injury should be multiplied by the inverse of the probability of being found liable.

We recognize, however, that the level of compensatory damages awards in personal injury cases may be too low in practice to accomplish proper deterrence. [229] For example, it has been calculated that in [*942] wrongful death cases, the amount that an injurer should pay is between $ 3 million and $ 6 million, [230] whereas actual awards are usually substantially lower. [231] If compensatory damages are too low in personal injury cases, they should be raised appropriately. [232] Punitive damages should not be awarded to correct for inadequate compensatory damages, for reasons analogous to those discussed in the previous section. [233]

N.

Externalization of Risk Through Independent Contractors

An effect of imposing liability that we have not yet discussed is what we will call externalization of risk. By externalization of risk, we mean the ability of potential injurers to avoid liability by hiring independent contractors to undertake risky tasks that they would otherwise perform themselves. The motive to externalize risks results to some extent from the threat of compensatory damages alone, but it is accentuated if punitive damages are awarded. To our knowledge, courts do not consider this factor in the determination of punitive damages. [234]

In this section, we discuss two socially undesirable consequences of externalization of risk. First, the number of accidents that occur tends to be higher because the independent contractors who are engaged generally do not operate as safely as the firms hiring them. Second, [*943] society sacrifices the economic benefits that would have accrued if the firms had carried out certain tasks themselves instead of having them performed by independent contractors. We conclude that when externalization of risk is a relevant factor, it argues for lower punitive damages than would otherwise be appropriate.

Let us amplify on these points. It is well recognized that firms often can avoid liability by hiring independent contractors to undertake risky tasks. [235] For example, a firm that is transporting its toxic waste in its own trucks may be able to hire another company to transport the waste and thereby avoid liability for spills. [236]

However, the incentive of a firm to transfer liability to an independent contractor is more complicated than may at first appear because, if an independent contractor assumes liability by undertaking risky tasks for a firm, the contractor will charge the firm more for performing these tasks. An independent contractor that is hired to haul a firm's toxic waste clearly will charge the firm an amount reflecting its expected damages for spillage of the waste. Thus, the firm might in the end pay for the accident risks it creates even though it hires an independent contractor. It is apparent, therefore, that the firm will want to hire an independent contractor only if the contractor would charge the firm less for assuming liability than the firm would have borne itself.

REV_00262095

In fact, an independent contractor might be willing to charge a firm less. The reason is that an independent contractor might not have assets sufficient to cover the full liability it may incur, so that its effective expected damages would be lower than the firm's - assuming that the firm has sufficient assets to pay the full judgment it would have faced, or at least more assets than the contractor. For example, suppose that potential damages are $ 10 million and that the risk of an accident and liability is five percent. If a firm with assets of $ 10 million undertakes the risky task itself, its expected damages would be $ 500,000 (= 5% X $ 10 million). However, if the firm hires an independent contractor with assets of only $ 1 million, the contractor's expected damages would be $ 50,000 (= 5% X $ 1 million). Hence, the in- [*944] dependent contractor only needs to add $ 50,000 to the price it charges the firm to be compensated for its expected damages. Accordingly, the firm could in effect reduce its expected damages from $ 500,000 to $ 50,000 by hiring the independent contractor. [237]

We have explained that firms might benefit by externalizing their liability risks to independent contractors with assets less than the harm resulting from accidents. It should be emphasized that because firms secure an advantage by dealing with such contractors, they will seek them out and favor them over contractors with greater assets, other things being equal. [238]

The externalization of risk to potentially judgment-proof contractors has an important implication. These contractors will tend to conduct their activities with less care than will actors with more at stake. In the example above, the independent contractor with assets of only $ 1 million clearly will not have as great an incentive to invest in precautions as the firm that could pay $ 10 million. [239] Therefore, the frequency of accidents will increase as a result of the externalization of risk. [240] [*945]

An increase in the number of accidents is not the only socially undesirable consequence of the externalization of risk. The economic advantages firms gain by undertaking certain tasks themselves, rather than contracting with others to perform the tasks, will be lost if firms hire independent contractors to avoid liability. In our example, the advantages that the firm would lose if it hires an independent contractor might include its ability (given its superior knowledge of its own situation) to purchase the most suitable truck for transporting its waste and the opportunity to schedule waste disposal more efficiently. [241]

The two problems caused by the externalization of risk - the increased number of accidents and the loss of economic efficiencies - are exacerbated by the imposition of punitive damages, for such damages increase the desire of firms to externalize their risks. Moreover, the judicial tendency to impose higher punitive damages on wealthier firms [242] has the perverse consequence of increasing the incentive of such firms to externalize risks despite their being more likely to take appropriate precautions (because they are less likely to be judgment-proof). Our conclusion, therefore, is that the increased externalization of risk induced by punitive damages argues for a lower level of punitive damages than would otherwise be appropriate.

O.

Encouraging Market Transactions

In some circumstances a potential injurer can communicate with a potential victim before causing harm, for example, when a firm deliberately infringes on another's copyright, or when an individual regularly trespasses on someone's property. If prior communication is possible, a potential injurer could negotiate in advance with the potential victim to purchase the right to engage in the harm-creating conduct, rather than first causing the harm and then paying damages. The firm contemplating a copyright violation could secure a license to use the copyrighted material, or the trespasser could obtain an easement. Obviously, the greater the level of damages that would be imposed on an injurer who causes harm without having purchased the right to engage in the harm-creating conduct, the greater the incentive to purchase the right. In this sense, punitive damages can be said to encourage market [*946] transactions. To our knowledge, courts rarely mention this effect of imposing punitive damages. [243]

REV_00262096

In this section, we explain that it may be desirable to impose punitive damages in order to encourage market transactions. The reason in essence is that inducing potential injurers to bargain may better lead them to take harm into account and may reduce parties' wasteful efforts to try to take and protect property. Additionally, market exchange may be cheaper than litigation. A qualification to this discussion, however, is that imposing punitive damages when the parties are not easily able to bargain may overdeter injurers. Note that the rationale for punitive damages discussed in this section does not presume that a party who causes harm is able to escape liability with positive probability. In other words, the present rationale is independent of the escaping-liability rationale for punitive damages that has been the focus of our Article. [244]

To elaborate, suppose that compensatory damages alone are employed and that they are underestimated. A potential injurer then might cause harm when doing so is socially undesirable - because the benefit to the injurer might be less than the harm done but greater than the low estimate of compensatory damages. [245] In general, as we observed above, [246] an excessive amount of harm will be caused if damages are too low.

Additional undesirable repercussions, similar to those associated with the theft of property, may arise when compensatory damages are underestimated. If injurers can take property from victims without having to pay for its full value, potential injurers will devote effort to identifying and taking such property, and potential victims will expend effort to prevent their property from being taken. Copyright violators, for example, will devote resources to copying others' protected material, and copyright owners will take steps to stop such illicit copying. Such efforts are socially wasteful. [*947]

The foregoing problems - an excessive amount of harm and wasteful efforts to take and protect property - can be avoided if punitive damages are imposed. If punitive damages are set so that total damages substantially exceed the value of the attractive property, a person who might otherwise simply take the property will instead bargain with its owner, because it would be cheaper to pay an agreed-on price than to pay damages. Consequently, property will be exchanged only if the buyer values it more than the property owner, and the incentive to take and protect property whose value might be underestimated by compensatory damages will be eliminated.

Another possible reason to employ punitive damages in order to encourage market transactions concerns administrative costs. If compensatory damages are used alone, exchange often will be mediated through the legal system by the bringing of a lawsuit; the cost of exchange then will be the cost of litigation (though this cost is frequently reduced because of settlement). But if punitive damages are used in addition, exchange will be much more likely to occur through voluntary transactions, which may be much less costly than litigation.

The arguments that we have discussed in favor of using punitive damages to promote market exchange obviously do not apply if bargaining between parties is not possible or there are substantial impediments to bargaining. Suppose, for instance, that a hiker lost in the mountains discovers an unoccupied cabin. The benefit he would obtain from using the cabin and consuming the food in it presumably would exceed the loss borne by the cabin's owner. But because there is no opportunity for the hiker to bargain with the owner, the effect of punitive damages might be to discourage the hiker from using the cabin. Hence, when parties cannot bargain, it may be better to employ compensatory damages alone (despite the possibility of errors in estimation); punitive damages would tend to overdeter injurers' conduct. Moreover, even if bargaining is feasible, there may be other impediments to efficient exchange - such as bargaining failures due to strategic behavior - that also could justify relying solely on compensatory damages. [247]

REV_00262097

We conclude that punitive damages may sometimes have appeal when it is possible for a potential injurer to communicate with a potential victim before causing harm, in order to encourage market transactions. As we noted above, this rationale for punitive damages, when applicable, is independent of the escaping-liability rationale. [248] [*948]

IV.

Punishment

By the punishment objective we refer to society's goal of imposing appropriate sanctions on blameworthy parties. [249] We equate blameworthiness with the reprehensibility of a party's conduct, that is, with its maliciousness or the extent to which it reflects disregard for the well-being of others. [250] We assume that the punishment objective derives ultimately from the pleasure or satisfaction people obtain from seeing blameworthy parties punished [251] (although our essential conclusions do not depend on this assumption [252]).

When the defendant is an individual, the connection between the imposition of punitive damages and the accomplishment of the punishment objective is conceptually straightforward: if, after assessing the blameworthiness of an individual's act, appropriate punitive damages are levied, the punishment objective is achieved. [253]

However, when the defendant is a firm, the relationship between punitive damages and the punishment objective is more complex. In this regard, we will develop three points. The first is that there are different ways of viewing the objective of punishment: the goal may be to punish firms as entities, that is, independently of whether blameworthy individuals within the firms are penalized; or the goal may be [*949] to punish firms only as a means of punishing culpable individuals in the firms. Our second point is that the imposition of punitive damages on firms may not lead to the punishment of blameworthy individuals within them; thus, the goal of punishing blameworthy employees may not be well promoted by imposing punitive damages on firms. The final point is that the imposition of punitive damages on firms often penalizes individuals who are unlikely to be considered culpable, namely, shareholders and customers. We conclude that, to the extent that the goal is to punish culpable individuals within firms, and not firms as entities, the utility of punitive damages in achieving the punishment objective is significantly attenuated.

Consider the possibility that the punishment objective might be furthered because people obtain satisfaction directly from the punishment of a blameworthy firm as an organization, without regard to whether anyone within the firm behaved inappropriately or is punished. [254] We find this conception of the punishment goal unappealing both because it requires a definition of blameworthiness of a firm that is divorced from the behavior of any individuals who are affiliated with it, and because it necessitates believing that people would, after reflecting on the matter, want to impose a penalty on what ultimately is an artificial legal construct. The notion that individuals would want to punish firms per se strikes us as not entirely different from the idea that individuals would want to punish inanimate objects for causing harm (such as trees that fall on people). [255]

Notwithstanding these reservations, it is possible that individuals do want to personify firms and punish them as entities, and the reader can make up his or her mind about the importance of this way of defining the punishment objective. To the extent that it is important, the [*950] imposition of punitive damages on a blameworthy firm directly promotes the punishment objective, much as it does when the defendant is a culpable individual. [256]

REV_00262098

Now consider the alternative reason for punishing firms - to punish blameworthy individuals within them. Supposing that this is the purpose of punishment, we turn to our second point, about the extent to which the imposition of punitive damages on firms will actually result in the punishment of blameworthy employees. Because firms clearly have an interest in discouraging culpable conduct by their employees that could give rise to punitive damages, they can be expected to seek to control such conduct through the use of internal sanctions, such as demotion or dismissal. However, two considerations suggest that the imposition of punitive damages on firms will lead to less punishment of blameworthy employees than might at first be supposed.

First, culpable employees may not be punished by firms because the firms may have difficulty identifying them. Such individuals may be able to obfuscate their role in decisionmaking or conceal their behavior in a variety of ways. For example, an employee responsible for checking a safety valve on a tank storing dangerous chemicals that subsequently explodes because of a defective valve may claim that he performed the inspection even if he did not, and may place a false entry in his record book attesting to the inspection. A manager whose judgment is impaired by alcohol and who gives oral instructions to a subordinate that lead to an accident may deny ever having told the subordinate to do what the subordinate did. [257]

Second, even if culpable individuals within a firm can be identified and punished by the firm, imposing punitive damages on firms often will have little or no marginal effect on their punishment. That is, the internal sanction imposed on such employees may not be much (if at all) greater as a result of the firm's bearing both punitive and compensatory damages than if the firm had borne compensatory damages alone. When a firm incurs high compensatory damages because of the blameworthy conduct of an identifiable employee, it may want to levy whatever sanctions on him that it can; imposing punitive damages on [*951] the firm then would not result in additional punishment of the employee. [258]

The preceding discussion presupposed that there exist culpable employees in the firm. But in some situations there may not be any. If a significant delay occurs between misconduct and the manifestation of harm and litigation (as was the case, for instance, in connection with the use of asbestos in products), blameworthy individuals may have changed jobs, retired, or died. [259] Also, because decisions in firms often are made by many individuals, it may be that no one individual has the requisite knowledge of risk and of the consequences of his behavior to be considered culpable. One person may decide to put a toxic liquid in a storage tank, believing that the tank can never leak, and another person may leave the tank in a state in which a leak can occur, thinking that the liquid in the tank is not toxic, so that a leak would not cause harm. Here, each decision considered by itself may not be blameworthy because each person believes that what he is doing does not create a risk of a harmful accident. [260]

Let us now consider the third point, concerning how imposing punitive damages on firms often penalizes the firms' shareholders and customers. Shareholders, as residual claimants of a firm's profits, obviously will be made worse off when punitive damages are levied on a firm. [261] Indeed, they usually can be expected to bear a major fraction of the burden of punitive damages. [262] Given that shareholders are punished by punitive damages, the question whether they are blameworthy must be considered. If a shareholder owns a significant fraction of a firm's stock, participated actively in the firm's decisions and acted egregiously, his position would be much like that of a blamewor- [*952] thy employee with decisionmaking power; each would be culpable. But if a shareholder owns a minuscule fraction of the stock of the firm and was a passive investor with no direct involvement in the firm's decisionmaking processes, his degree of blameworthiness would be small, if not nonexistent. [263]

REV_00262099

A firm's customers also will be made worse off as a result of the imposition of punitive damages on the firm if such damages cause the prices of the firm's products or services to rise. Firms may regard punitive damages as an additional cost of doing business - a cost that, with a positive probability, will be borne by them in addition to their ordinary costs. To cover the added cost of punitive damages, firms will tend to raise their prices, which will cause the welfare of their customers to decline. [264] Customers, however, would not ordinarily be considered blameworthy, because they do not exert direct control over the actions of firms that pose risks to other persons. [265] Consequently, to the extent that customers pay higher prices as a result of the imposition of punitive damages on firms, innocent parties are penalized. [266]

We can summarize our discussion of the punishment of firms as follows. The view that a firm should be punished per se - without reference to the punishment of individuals within it - is a possible view, but one that we find problematic. Another view is that the punishment goal is promoted only by punishing blameworthy individuals within firms. We have explained, however, that imposing punitive damages on firms often will not result in the punishment (or at least any additional punishment) of blameworthy employees, so the use of such damages might not advance the punishment goal very much. Moreover, imposing punitive damages frequently will penalize shareholders and customers, parties who are not likely to be considered blameworthy. This adverse consequence of punitive damages must be weighed against the beneficial effects of such damages in furthering the punishment goal.

Having addressed punitive damages and punishment in general terms, we now briefly consider how the reprehensibility of the defen- [*953] dant's conduct and the wealth of the defendant should influence punitive damages with respect to the punishment objective. [267] Regarding reprehensibility, we merely observe that the punishment objective will, by definition, be met if sanctions are imposed on those who have acted reprehensibly. Hence, determining the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct is intrinsic to satisfaction of the punishment objective, and the law's focus on reprehensibility obviously makes sense given this objective. In the case of firms, however, the connection between reprehensibility and punishment may be attenuated for reasons discussed above - the imposition of punitive damages on a firm may not result in the punishment of individuals within the firm who acted reprehensibly.

Concerning defendants' wealth and the appropriate level of damages from the perspective of punishment, consider first the situation when defendants are individuals. In this case, the common belief that punitive damages should be higher for wealthier defendants can be justified. The punishment goal is furthered if a proper punishment is imposed on a culpable individual, which we interpret to mean reducing the individual's utility by a particular amount. To accomplish this, it is generally necessary to assess a higher penalty if the individual is wealthy than if he is poor, because money is worth less to him if he is wealthy. [268]

When the defendant is a firm, the relevance of the defendant's wealth depends on whether the punishment goal is viewed in terms of punishing the firm as an entity or punishing culpable individuals within the firm. Under the first view, the firm's wealth might be thought to be relevant to the proper level of damages for punishment purposes. [269] Under the second view, however, the firm's wealth generally would not be relevant: the level of damages needed to induce a firm to punish its culpable employees ordinarily would not depend on its wealth. A $ 100 million firm and a $ 10 million firm would both be expected to impose the same sanction on an employee for misconduct that resulted in a punitive damages award of a given amount. The reason is that, as we have said, rational firms will develop a policy of [*954] punishing employee misbehavior to lower their liability expenses. This policy should

In our discussion of the second objective of punitive damages - punishment - we focus on the assumption that the underlying goal of society is to penalize especially blameworthy individuals. Achieving this goal is reasonably straightforward if the defendant is a person who has been found to have acted culpably - after all, imposing punitive damages on that person punishes him. But if the defendant is a corporation, imposing punitive damages on it may or may not lead to [*876] the punishment of blameworthy individuals within the corporation, for a variety of reasons that we will discuss. To the extent that such individuals are not punished, imposing punitive damages on the corporation does not advance the punishment goal. Moreover, we will explain that much of the sting from imposing punitive damages on corporations may be borne by individuals who are usually not thought to be culpable, namely, shareholders and customers. In the light of these points, we conclude that the extent to which imposing punitive damages promotes the punishment goal may be significantly different when defendants are corporations from when they are individuals, and that the importance of punitive damages as a form of punishment may be considerably attenuated for corporate defendants.

The plan of our Article is as follows. In Part II, we review the economic theory of deterrence and develop the basic principles determining when punitive damages should be awarded, and at what level. We also apply these principles to certain aspects of punitive damages law and legislation, as well as to several prominent punitive damages cases. Part III relates the basic principles to a number of criteria that are employed by the courts to determine the appropriateness and magnitude of punitive damages awards, and also examines a variety of other factors and policies that bear on punitive damages. Part IV discusses the punishment goal of punitive damages. Part V briefly summarizes our main points. [12] An Appendix contains the model jury instructions for use in awarding punitive damages. [*877]

II.

Deterrence: The Basic Theory

In this Part, we summarize the basic principles of the economic theory of deterrence and explain what these principles imply for the use of punitive damages. By deterrence, we mean what is often called general deterrence, namely, the effect that the prospect of having to pay damages will have on the behavior of similarly situated parties in the future (not just on the behavior of the defendant at hand). [13]

We should add that the basic theory that we are about to review is the standard theory of deterrence, on which economically oriented scholars widely agree. [14] As noted, we will usually make the conven- [*878] tional assumption that the benefits that injurers obtain from engaging in the conduct that gives rise to harm are credited in social welfare. [15] Thus, for example, we will assume that the time saved by a speeding driver, or the cost saved by a company that chooses not to purchase certain pollution control equipment, constitutes a social benefit that is to be weighed against the harm from speeding or polluting. We will consider the implications for punitive damages of the alternative assumption - that the benefits from harmful conduct do not count in social welfare - when we examine the reprehensibility criterion in section III.A.

We first discuss deterrence in a very simple setting in which a party will be sanctioned whenever he causes harm. We then discuss the situation in which parties sometimes escape sanctions for harms for which they are responsible. It is in this latter case, as we indicated above, that damages exceeding harm should be imposed, and punitive damages thus used.

REV_00262065

depend on variables other than the firm's wealth - notably, the damages that the firm will bear as a result of employee misbehavior. [270] To the extent that the internal sanctions that firms impose on culpable employees do not depend on the firm's wealth, the punishment objective will not be advanced by making punitive damages depend on its wealth. [271]

V.

Conclusion

In this Article, we have discussed the two fundamental purposes of punitive damages - deterrence and punishment - and have come to conclusions regarding each objective that we now briefly review.

Our central conclusion about punitive damages and deterrence is conceptually simple. Punitive damages should be imposed when deterrence otherwise would be inadequate because of the possibility that injurers would escape liability. In particular, punitive damages should be set at a level such that the expected damages of defendants equal the harm they have caused, for then their damage payments will, in an average sense, equal the harm. This implies a simple formula for calculating punitive damages, according to which harm is multiplied by a factor reflecting the likelihood of escaping liability. If punitive damages are calculated according to this multiplier formula, precautions will tend to be optimal - neither inadequate nor excessive - as will product prices and the incentive to participate in risky activities. These conclusions about punitive damages, and the importance of the role of the defendant's chance of escaping liability, flow from the standard and well-accepted theory of deterrence. We also discussed a deterrence rationale for punitive damages that is not based on the possibility of escaping liability: that punitive damages may be needed to offset the socially illicit utility that individuals obtain from committing malicious acts. This rationale, as we noted, does not apply to firms.

The theory of deterrence not only yields a multiplier formula for computing punitive damages, but also provides guidance regarding a range of important doctrinal and policy issues concerning punitive damages. Notably, we discussed the point that the reprehensibility of a party's conduct generally should not be a factor in the assessment of punitive damages (except in the case of an individual's malicious act), [*955] as well as the point that the wealth of a defendant usually should not influence punitive damages (subject to the same exception).

A corollary of our analysis is that the imposition of punitive damages when they are not justified on deterrence grounds generally has socially detrimental consequences. These consequences can take the form of excessive precautionary measures and inappropriate discouragement of participation in socially beneficial activities. In the case of firms, the latter effect may manifest itself in the form of undesirably high prices and the withdrawal of products from markets.

With respect to the punishment objective, we observed that the connection between punitive damages and punishment is relatively straightforward if the defendant is an individual, or if the defendant is a firm and the goal is to punish firms as entities (although we found this latter goal problematic). We came to a different conclusion, however, when the defendant is a firm and the objective is to punish culpable employees. Because the imposition of punitive damages on firms may not result in the punishment of blameworthy employees, but often will penalize shareholders and customers - parties who are not likely to be blameworthy - the ability of punitive damages to advance the punishment goal in the case of firms is limited.

We have not yet commented on how the level of punitive damages should be determined when the objectives of deterrence and punishment have different implications for the proper measure of punitive damages. It is evident that the best level of punitive damages should be a compromise between the levels that are optimal when each objective is considered independently. [272] (The quantities of punitive damages that are separately optimal with respect to the two objectives should not be added to each other. [273]) The weights to be used in the [*956] determination of the compromise will reflect the relative importance accorded to the goals of deterrence and punishment.

REV_00262101

Whatever are the weights that policymakers, judges, or juries place on these two goals, we hope that the conceptual framework developed in this Article will aid them in determining the appropriate amount of punitive damages. [*957]

Appendix: Model Jury Instructions

The following model jury instructions encapsulate many of the conclusions of our Article. Three sets of instructions are presented: for individuals who have not committed malicious acts; for individuals who have committed malicious acts; and for firms. With regard to the instructions for firms, we have assumed that the goal of punishment is to penalize blameworthy employees, not to punish firms as entities. (The instructions can be modified to reflect a different assumption.)

* * *

For Individuals Who Have Not Committed Malicious Acts

These instructions apply to defendants who have not committed malicious acts. An act is malicious only if it was done for the purpose of causing harm.

In considering the imposition of punitive damages on the defendant, you should determine three dollar amounts: (A) an amount to accomplish deterrence; (B) an amount to accomplish punishment; (C) a final amount - your punitive damages award - between the first two amounts.

A.

Deterrence

1. Punitive damages fulfill the deterrence objective to the extent that they serve as a message and warning to the defendant and to other similarly situated individuals to take appropriate steps in order to prevent harm in the future. But punitive damages will not fulfill the deterrence objective if they cause individuals to take wasteful steps to prevent harm or if they cause individuals to refrain from engaging in socially desirable activities.

2. Your principal task is to estimate the likelihood that the defendant might have escaped having to pay for the harm for which he or she should be responsible. Thus, for example, if the harm was noticeable and likely to lead to a lawsuit, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively low. But if the harm might not have been attributed to the defendant, or if the defendant tried to conceal his or her harmful conduct, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively high.

3. You should use the Table below to determine the punitive damages multiplier that corresponds to your estimated probability of escaping liability. Then multiply the compensatory damages amount by your punitive damages multiplier. The resulting number is the base punitive damages amount.

REV_00262102

4. The base punitive damages amount should be lowered if the defendant has paid other private judgments or settlements, or public penalties, for the harm at issue in the present case. If the defendant [*958] has made such payments, the base punitive damages amount should be lowered by the amount of these payments.

5. The base punitive damages amount should not be adjusted because of any of the following considerations:

(a) reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct;

(b) net worth or income of the defendant;

(c) potential harm, that is, the harm that might have been caused by the defendant's conduct;

(d) gain or profit that the defendant might have obtained from his or her harmful conduct;

(e) litigation costs borne by the plaintiff;

(f) components of harm that you did not include in compensatory damages;

(g) whether the harm included personal injury.

B.

Punishment

1. Punitive damages fulfill the punishment objective to the extent that they penalize blameworthy defendants for reprehensible behavior. You should determine the amount of punitive damages that you believe will accomplish proper punishment.

2. In considering punishment, keep in mind that the defendant's payment of compensatory damages already punishes the defendant to some extent. The amount of punitive damages that you believe will accomplish proper punishment should be what you think must be added to compensatory damages to accomplish the punishment objective, if any additional damages are necessary.

C.

Determination of Punitive Damages

Punitive damages should be an amount between the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of deterrence and the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of punishment. If you attach greater importance to the deterrence objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote deterrence. If you attach greater importance to the punishment objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote punishment.

REV_00262103

For Individuals Who Have Committed Malicious Acts

These instructions apply to defendants who have committed malicious acts. An act is malicious if it was done for the purpose of causing harm.

In considering the imposition of punitive damages on the defendant, you should determine three dollar amounts: (A) an amount to ac- [*959] complish deterrence; (B) an amount to accomplish punishment; (C) a final amount - your punitive damages award - between the first two amounts.

A.

Deterrence

1. Punitive damages fulfill the deterrence objective to the extent that they serve as a message and warning to the defendant and to other similarly situated individuals not to commit malicious acts in the future. But punitive damages will not fulfill the deterrence objective if they cause individuals to take wasteful steps to avoid possible liability or if they cause individuals to refrain from engaging in socially desirable activities.

2. Your principal task is to estimate the likelihood that the defendant might have escaped having to pay for the harm for which he or she should be responsible. Thus, for example, if the harm was noticeable and likely to lead to a lawsuit, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively low. But if the harm might not have been attributed to the defendant, or if the defendant tried to conceal his or her harmful conduct, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively high.

3. You should use the Table below to determine the punitive damages multiplier that corresponds to your estimated probability of escaping liability. Then determine the amount that you believe is equivalent to the gain that the defendant obtained from his or her conduct. Multiply this amount by your punitive damages multiplier. The resulting number is the base punitive damages amount.

4. The base punitive damages amount should be lowered if the defendant has paid other private judgments or settlements, or public penalties, for the harm at issue in the present case. If the defendant has made such payments, the base punitive damages amount should be lowered by the amount of these payments.

5. The base punitive damages amount should not be adjusted because of any of the following considerations:

(a) potential harm, that is, the harm that might have been caused by the defendant's conduct;

(b) litigation costs borne by the plaintiff;

(c) components of harm that you did not include in compensatory damages.

B.

Punishment

REV_00262104

1. Punitive damages fulfill the punishment objective to the extent that they penalize blameworthy defendants for reprehensible behavior. You should determine the amount of punitive damages that you believe will accomplish proper punishment. [*960]

2. In considering punishment, keep in mind that the defendant's payment of compensatory damages already punishes the defendant to some extent. The amount of punitive damages that you believe will accomplish proper punishment should be what you think must be added to compensatory damages to accomplish the punishment objective, if any additional damages are necessary.

C.

Determination of Punitive Damages

Punitive damages should be an amount between the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of deterrence and the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of punishment. If you attach greater importance to the deterrence objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote deterrence. If you attach greater importance to the punishment objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote punishment.

For Firms

In considering the imposition of punitive damages on the defendant, you should determine three dollar amounts: (A) an amount to accomplish deterrence; (B) an amount to accomplish punishment; (C) a final amount - your punitive damages award - between the first two amounts.

A.

Deterrence

1. Punitive damages fulfill the deterrence objective to the extent that they serve as a message and warning to the defendant and to other similarly situated firms to take appropriate steps to prevent harm in the future. But punitive damages will not fulfill the deterrence objective if they cause firms to take wasteful steps to prevent harm, if they cause the prices of products and services to rise excessively, or if they cause firms to withdraw socially valuable products or services from the market.

2. To achieve the deterrence objective, your principal task is to estimate the likelihood that the defendant might have escaped having to pay for the harm for which it should be responsible. Thus, for example, if the harm was noticeable and likely to lead to a lawsuit, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively low. But if the harm might not have been attributed to the defendant, or if the defendant tried to conceal its harmful conduct, your estimate of the likelihood of escaping liability would be relatively high.

3. You should use the Table below to determine the punitive damages multiplier that corresponds to your estimated probability of [*961] escaping liability. Then multiply the compensatory damages amount by your punitive damages multiplier. The resulting number is the base punitive damages amount.

REV_00262105

4. The base punitive damages amount should be lowered if the defendant has paid other private judgments or settlements, or public penalties, for the harm at issue in the present case. If the defendant has made such payments, the base punitive damages amount should be lowered by the amount of these payments.

5. The base punitive damages amount also may be lowered if the plaintiff was a customer of the defendant. If the plaintiff was a customer and you believe that customers are, or will become, aware of accidents of the type at issue in this case, the base punitive damages amount should be lowered. The more knowledgeable customers are, the more the base punitive damages amount should be lowered.

6. The base punitive damages amount should not be adjusted because of any of the following considerations:

(a) reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct;

(b) net worth, revenues, or profits of the defendant;

(c) potential harm, that is, the harm that might have been caused by the defendant's conduct;

(d) gain or profit that the defendant might have obtained from its harmful conduct;

(e) litigation costs borne by the plaintiff;

(f) components of harm that you did not include in compensatory damages;

(g) whether the harm included personal injury.

B.

Punishment

1. Punitive damages fulfill the punishment objective to the extent that they cause defendants to penalize their blameworthy employees for reprehensible behavior.

2. In considering punishment, you should keep in mind that the defendant's payment of compensatory damages already may lead to the punishment of blameworthy employees to some extent.

3. In considering how well the imposition of punitive damages will fulfill the punishment objective, you should also bear the following in mind:

(a) the extent to which you believe blameworthy employees can be identified and penalized by the defendant. The easier this identification is, the higher should be the level of punitive damages.

(b) the extent to which you believe that innocent parties will suffer as a result of the imposition of punitive damages on the defendant; such parties might include shareholders as well as customers, who may have to pay higher prices for the defendant's products or services. The more likely it is that innocent parties will be punished, the lower should be the level of punitive damages. [*962]

REV_00262106

4. In the light of these considerations, you should determine the amount of punitive damages that you believe will accomplish proper punishment.

C.

Determination of Punitive Damages

Punitive damages should be an amount between the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of deterrence and the amount that you found appropriate for the purpose of punishment. If you attach greater importance to the deterrence objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote deterrence. If you attach greater importance to the punishment objective, punitive damages should be closer to the amount that you found best to promote punishment.

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

FOOTNOTES:

n1. The United States Supreme Court's struggle to develop coherent principles in this area is exemplified by the skeptical views expressed by various Justices on the rationality of punitive damages. Most recently, in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996), Justice Scalia, in a pointed dissent, described the Court's guideposts for assessing punitive damages as "providing no real guidance at all." Id. at 1613 (Scalia, J., dissenting); see also TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 475 (1993) (O'Connor, J., dissenting) ("The lack of clear guidance heightens the risk that arbitrariness, passion, or bias will replace dispassionate deliberation as the basis for the jury's verdict."); id. at 466-67 (Kennedy, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) (arguing that the Court's vague formulation of a "reasonableness" standard for punitive damages awards is unsatisfactory and that "this type of review, far from imposing meaningful, law-like restraints on jury excess, could become as fickle as the process it is designed to superintend. Furthermore, it might give the illusion of judicial certainty where none in fact exists.") (internal quotation marks omitted); Browning-Ferris Indus., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 281 (1989) (Brennan, J., concurring) ("Without statutory (or at least common-law) standards for the determination of how large an award of punitive damages is appropriate in a given case, juries are left largely to themselves in making this important, and potentially devastating, decision."). Justice Brennan also noted that the instructions typically given to jurors, which advise them to consider the character and wealth of the defendant and the nature of the defendant's conduct, provide guidance that is "scarcely better than no guidance at all." Id.

n2. The statutes to which we are referring are generally aimed at reducing the number of punitive damages claims and the level of punitive damages awards. Notably, many states have enacted legislation imposing limits on the magnitude of punitive damages awards. Another type of statutory reform implemented by several states is the payment of a fraction of punitive damages to a state agency rather than to the plaintiff. Such legislation obviously reduces the incentive to bring suit for punitive damages (but does not impose a ceiling on defendants' payments). For a list of current and proposed statutes on punitive damages caps and payment of punitive damages to state agencies, see Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1618-20 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting); Richard L. Blatt, Robert W. Hammesfahr & Lori S. Nugent, Punitive Damages: A State-By-State Guide to Law and Practice (1991). Also, one state has passed legislation requiring post-trial review of punitive damages awards. See Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(7)(c) (1996).

REV_00262107

Additionally, as part of its tort reform efforts, Congress has considered legislation curbing punitive damages. Several bills have been proposed limiting punitive damages recovery to cases in which the plaintiff can demonstrate by "clear and convincing" evidence that the defendant displayed a conscious indifference to safety. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. 201(a) (1995); H.R. 955, 104th Cong. 8(a), (c) (1995); H.R. 917, 104th Cong. 6(c)(1) (1995). Most of the bills have proposed some sort of cap on punitive damages in civil cases, usually $ 250,000 or three times the plaintiff's economic injury, whichever is greater. See H.R. 956, 104th Cong. 201(b) (1995); H.R. 955, 104th Cong. 8(b) (1995); H.R. 917, 104th Cong. 6(c) (2) (1995); H.R. 10, 104th Cong. 103(c)(2) (1995). The proposed tort reform legislation is reviewed in Note, "Common Sense" Legislation: The Birth of Neoclassical Tort Reform, 109 Harv. L. Rev. 1765, 1769-82 (1996); see also Neil A. Lewis, Senate, 61-37, Approves Narrow Punitive-Damages Curb, N.Y. Times, May 11, 1995, at B10 (reporting that the House of Representatives voted to limit punitive damages to the greater of $ 250,000 or three times the economic damages, and that the Senate voted for a narrower proposal that would limit punitive damages only in products liability cases to $ 250,000 or twice the amount of economic damages and pain and suffering damages).

↑n3. With respect to the theory of punitive damages, commentators have disagreed, for instance, about the relevance of the wealth of the defendant. Compare, e.g., Michael Rustad & Thomas Koenig, The Historical Continuity of Punitive Damages Awards: Reforming the Tort Reformers, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1269, 1317-18 (1993) (endorsing the scaling of punitive damages to defendants' wealth because larger sanctions are required to influence the rich than the poor), with Kenneth S. Abraham & John C. Jeffries, Jr., Punitive Damages and the Rule of Law: The Role of Defendant's Wealth, 18 J. Legal Stud. 415, 415 (1989) (concluding that a "defendant's wealth is irrelevant to the goal of deterring socially undesirable conduct and is an improper consideration in assessing the basis for retribution"), and Clarence Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1173, 1191 (1931) (noting that evidence of a defendant's wealth, "instead of aiding the jury to assess a proper verdict, may prejudice them against the defendant and prevent an impartial judgment"). Additionally, commentators emphasize different goals in their consideration of punitive damages. Compare, e.g., Thomas C. Galligan, Jr., Augmented Awards: The Efficient Evolution of Punitive Damages, 51 La. L. Rev. 3, 6-14 (1990) (proposing a system of extracompensatory damages based solely on deterrence), and Dan B. Dobbs, Ending Punishment in "Punitive" Damages: Deterrence-Measured Remedies, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 831, 853-63 (1989) (same), with Marc Galanter & David Luban, Poetic Justice: Punitive Damages and Legal Pluralism, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1393, 1432-40, 1447-51 (1993) (discussing both punishment and deterrence goals), and David G. Owen, The Moral Foundations of Punitive Damages, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 705, 713 (1989) (same), and Jacqueline Perczek, Note, On Efficiency, Punishment, Deterrence, and Fairness: A Survey of Punitive Damages Law and a Proposed Jury Instruction, 27 Suffolk U. L. Rev. 825, 856-64 (1993) (same).

The empirical importance of punitive damages is also the subject of dispute among academic commentators. A number of commentators suggest that punitive damages are widespread and problematic. See, e.g., Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 975, 975-77, 987-88 (1989) (arguing that "courts ... have continued to uphold ever larger awards in cases in which defendants' conduct falls far short of the intentionally injurious behavior that traditionally characterized punitive damages cases") (footnote omitted); Peter Huber, No-Fault Punishment, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1037, 1037-47 (1989) ("As the new tort revolution has taken hold, courts and juries have developed an even sharper, and for plaintiffs more lucrative, sense of outrage."); John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 139 (1986) (arguing that "punitive damages are out of control"); see also Erik Moller, Nicholas M. Pace & Stephen J. Carroll, Punitive Damages in Financial Injury Jury Verdicts 25-27 (Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp., No. MR-888-ICJ, 1997) (finding that, in lawsuits concerning financial injury, the percentage of verdicts in which punitive damages were awarded fell between the period 1985-1989 and the period 1990-1994, but that the average award and the portion of all damages represented by punitive damages rose); Mark Peterson, Syam Sarma & Michael Shanley, Punitive Damages: Empirical Findings 65 (Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp., No. R-3311-ICJ, 1987) (concluding that punitive damages awards for business/contract cases are increasing, while punitive damages awards for personal injury cases are stable). Others suggest that the fraction of cases in which punitive damages are awarded is not significant. See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 61-62 (1990) (concluding that the magnitude of the punitive damages problem is overstated by reformers); William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, New Light on Punitive Damages, Regulation, Sept.-Oct. 1986, at 33, 33 (suggesting that "the incidence of punitive-damage awards may be exaggerated"); Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damages in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1, 24 (1992) (concluding that there are very few punitive damages awards in product liability cases). These and other studies are reviewed by Marc Galanter, Real World Torts: An Antidote to Anecdote, 55 Md. L. Rev. 1093, 1126-40 (1996). The most thorough, recent empirical study of punitive damages also emphasizes this point. See Theodore Eisenberg, John Goerdt, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman & Martin T. Wells, The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623, 623-25, 633 (1997). But see A. Mitchell Polinsky, Are Punitive Damages Really Insignificant, Predictable, and Rational? A Comment on Eisenberg et al., 26 J. Legal Stud. 663, 664-71 (1997) (explaining in part that the study by Eisenberg et al. may understate the significance of punitive damages by ignoring the effects of such damages on settlements).

REV_00262108

n4. Compare Curtailing Civil Justice, N.Y. Times, Apr. 8, 1995, at 22 (noting that "punitive damages are often the best deterrent to destructive corporate behavior" and arguing against arbitrarily low limits on awards), and Editorial, St. Petersburg Times, May 23, 1996, at 14A ("Punitive damages clearly have a place in society. They are designed to punish and awaken."), and Long Shadow of the Exxon Valdez, N.Y. Times, Sept. 21, 1994, at A22 ("The jury ... clearly understood that only a sizable civil penalty would accomplish the purpose for which punitive damages are designed: to penalize flagrant wrongdoing and deter others from similar gross negligence."), with Trial Lawyers' Triumph, Wash. Post, Mar. 19, 1996, at A16 (stating that "legislation is needed because punitive damages are wildly unpredictable, so arbitrary as to be unfair"), and Sue? Just Say No, Wall St. J., Sept. 28, 1994, at A18 (noting that punitive damages suits "have widespread, silent costs in frivolous filings being "settled out' and legitimate business activities curtailed for fear of exposure to jury risk"), and No Paint, No Gain, Economist, May 25, 1996, at 67 (arguing that the current punitive damages system yields "bizarre" and excessive awards that keep useful products off the United States market and chill research and development of new products).

n5. Deterrence and punishment are traditionally said to be the goals of punitive damages. See City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 266-67 (1981) ("Punitive damages ... are ... intended to ... punish the tortfeasor whose wrongful action was intentional or malicious, and to deter him and others from similar extreme conduct."); Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323, 350 (1974) ("[Punitive damages] are ... private fines levied by civil juries to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence.").

n6. The concept of rationality in individual decisionmaking is discussed, for example, in Amartya Sen, Rational Behaviour, in 4 The New Palgrave: A Dictionary of Economics 68-76 (John Eatwell, Murray Milgate & Peter Newman eds., 1987). The notion of social welfare is reviewed, for instance, in David M. Kreps, A Course in Microeconomic Theory 149-82 (1990), and Amartya Sen, Social Choice, in 4 The New Palgrave: A Dictionary of Economics, supra, at 382-93. Social welfare is determined by the well-being of individuals. Thus, social welfare generally rises if individuals' well-being rises, and falls if individuals' well-being falls. In particular, social welfare reflects the deterrence objective of punitive damages, for the avoidance of harm preserves the well-being of persons; and social welfare reflects the punishment objective of punitive damages, for the punishment of wrongdoers may be desired by individuals. We should add that, from the viewpoint of economics, no objective basis exists for saying that a specific formulation of social welfare (such as utilitarianism, which defines social welfare as the sum of individuals' utilities) is correct. Any measure of social welfare can be studied to determine what social policies or legal rules are best with respect to that measure. However, certain relatively simple measures of social welfare are often investigated for analytical convenience.

REV_00262109

n7. We discuss below several reasons that injurers might be able to escape liability: the difficulty of detecting harm, the inability to identify the injurer, problems in proving that the injurer is liable even if he can be identified, and the plaintiff's failure to sue because of the costs of litigation. See infra p. 888.

n8. We say "ordinarily" because we discuss circumstances in which it might not be desirable or necessary to impose punitive damages even if a chance exists of escaping liability (punitive damages might not be desirable when the probability of escaping liability is low, see infra pp. 895-96, and they might not be necessary when harm occurs to purchasers of products, see infra section III.J). We also discuss reasons that punitive damages might be desirable even if there is no chance of escaping liability (specifically, when the injurer's act is malicious, see infra p. 875 and section III.A).

n9. We are presuming here that the injurer engages in repetitive conduct. Our point, however, applies even if the injurer commits the harmful act only once. It is still true then that the probability-discounted or "expected" value of what he pays is $ 100,000. See infra note 46.

n10. See infra section II.D.

n11. See infra section III.A.

n12. Our article builds on many other contributions. The general point that, to achieve proper deterrence, sanctions must be inflated if injurers can escape liability dates at least from Bentham, see Jeremy Bentham, Principles of Penal Law, in 1 The Works of Jeremy Bentham 365, 401-02 (John Bowring ed., 1962) (1838-43), and has been applied to the subject of punitive damages by many commentators. The first explicit references to the factor of escaping liability as a justification for punitive damages apparently are Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 77-78 (1st ed. 1972), and Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 25-26 (1982). This justification for punitive damages has been developed most thoroughly by Robert D. Cooter, Punitive Damages for Deterrence: When and How Much?, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1143, 1149-66 (1989) [hereinafter Cooter, Deterrence].

In addition to the works cited in the previous paragraph, there are many others in which punitive damages are considered using economic analysis. Those in print include Darryl Biggar, A Model of Punitive Damages in Tort, 15 Int'l Rev. Law & Econ. 1 (1995); James Boyd & Daniel E. Ingberman, Noncompensatory Damages and Potential Insolvency, 23 J. Legal Stud. 895 (1994); Bruce Chapman & Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: Divergence in Search of a Rationale, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 741 (1989); Robert D. Cooter, Economic Analysis of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 79 (1982) [hereinafter Cooter, Economic Analysis]; Richard Craswell, Damage Multipliers in Market Relationships, 25 J. Legal Stud. 463 (1996); Andrew F. Daughety & Jennifer F. Reinganum, Everybody Out of the Pool: Products Liability, Punitive Damages and Competition, 12 J.L. Econ. & Org. 410 (1997) [hereinafter Daughety & Reinganum, Products Liability]; David Friedman, An Economic Explanation of Punitive Damages, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1125 (1989); Galligan, supra note 3; David D. Haddock, Fred S. McChesney & Menahem Spiegel, An Ordinary Economic Rationale for Extraordinary Legal Sanctions, 78 Cal. L. Rev. 1 (1990); Jason S. Johnston, Punitive Liability: A New Paradigm of Efficiency in Tort Law, 87 Colum. L. Rev. 1385 (1987); Marcel Kahan & Bruce Tuckman, Special Levies on Punitive Damages: Decoupling, Agency Problems, and Litigation

REV_00262110

A.

Optimal Damages When the Defendant Is Found Liable with Certainty

The central point that we want to explain here is that, if a defendant will definitely be found liable for the harm for which he is responsible, the proper magnitude of damages is equal to the harm the defendant has caused. [16] If damages are either lower or higher than the harm, various socially undesirable consequences will result, as described below. We first illustrate these points when liability is strict - [*879] an injurer is supposed to be liable for any harm caused [17] - and then when liability is fault-based (in which case our conclusions are somewhat qualified). We assume for the purpose of this discussion that harm is properly measured. [18]

There are a number of reasons why it is best for damages to equal harm under strict liability. One concerns the level of precautions taken by parties when engaging in their activities. We interpret the term "precautions" very generally. For example, it can refer to safety devices - such as valves to release excess pressure on tanks used to store dangerous chemicals - or to the actions of individuals that reduce harm - such as inspecting the brakes of trucks. Additionally, and importantly, precautions include the variety of ways in which firms monitor and screen their employees - such as an airline testing its pilots for their use of controlled substances. Any action that reduces the risk or the level of harm constitutes a precaution under our interpretation.

If damages equal harm, potential injurers will in theory have socially correct incentives to take precautions. Specifically, they will be induced to spend money on precautions if the expenditure is socially worthwhile in the sense that the expenditure reduces the harm by a greater amount. Suppose, for example, that by spending $ 50,000 on a precaution, a firm can prevent a harm of $ 100,000. It is socially desirable that such a precaution be taken. If the level of liability is equal to the harm of $ 100,000, a firm will be led to spend $ 50,000 to prevent harm. But if the level of liability is less than $ 100,000, a firm might not take precautions when it should. For instance, if the level of liability is only $ 30,000, then a firm would not take the precaution costing $ 50,000, even though this precaution is socially desirable. [19]

Conversely, if damages exceed harm, firms might be led to take socially excessive precautions. A socially excessive precaution is one that costs more than the reduction of harm produced by it. In the previous example, suppose that the precaution costs $ 250,000 instead of $ 50,000. Such a precaution would be socially excessive because it would be wasteful to spend $ 250,000 to avoid a harm of $ 100,000. Yet if damages exceed harm, a firm might be led to take the precaution. Assume, for instance, that punitive damages of $ 200,000 are added to the compensatory damages of $ 100,000, so that the firm's total damages will be $ 300,000 if it does not take the precaution. Because the [*880] cost of the precaution is $ 250,000, the firm will be led to take it, even though the precaution is socially wasteful.

Although the notion of excessive spending on precautions might seem counterintuitive to the reader, it is quite real, and often recognized as such. For example, commentators frequently make reference to "defensive medicine," by which is meant physicians' wasteful use of tests and diagnostic procedures in response to the threat of liability. [20] On reflection, it is not difficult to imagine that excessive expenditures could be made on safety precautions in almost any context. Consider, for instance, how much could be spent on cement traffic dividers for city streets (suppose that all streets had dividers), on additional personnel to monitor employees' safety practices at oil refineries (each employee at a refinery could be accompanied by another watching over his activities), or on sensors to detect switching problems on railroad tracks (a costly sensor might be installed on every switch on every

REV_00262066

Expenditures, 15 Int'l Rev. Law & Econ. 175 (1995); William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, An Economic Theory of Intentional Torts, 1 Int'l Rev. Law & Econ. 127 (1981); George L. Priest, Insurability and Punitive Damages, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1009 (1989) [hereinafter Priest, Insurability]; George L. Priest, Punitive Damages and Enterprise Liability, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 123 (1982); Paul H. Rubin, John E. Calfee & Mark F. Grady, BMW v Gore: Mitigating The Punitive Economics of Punitive Damages, 5 Sup. Ct. Econ. Rev. 179 (1997).

Recent unpublished articles include James Boyd & Daniel E. Ingberman, Do Punitive Damages Promote Deterrence? (Mar. 20, 1996) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Harvard Law School Library); Andrew F. Daughety & Jennifer F. Reinganum, Settlement, Deterrence and the Economics of Punitive Damages Reform (Mar. 1997) (Department of Economics & Business Administration, Vanderbilt University Working Paper No. 97-W04) [hereinafter Daughety & Reinganum, Settlement]; Peter Diamond, Efficiency Effects of Punitive Damages (Sept. 1997) (Department of Economics, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Working Paper No. 97-17) [hereinafter Diamond, Efficiency Effects]; Peter Diamond, Integrating Punishment and Efficiency Concerns in Punitive Damages for Reckless Disregard of Risks to Others (Oct. 1997) (Department of Economics, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Working Paper No. 97-19) [hereinafter Diamond, Punishment and Efficiency]; Keith N. Hylton, Punitive Damages and the Economic Theory of Penalties (Dec. 1997) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Harvard Law School Library); Alan O. Sykes, Constitutionalizing Punitive Damages (Dec. 1997) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Harvard Law School Library).

Our treatment of deterrence and punitive damages is more comprehensive than that of these earlier economically oriented articles, and our analysis of certain issues that have been considered previously differs from what has been written. Moreover, our examination of punishment and punitive damages is substantially different from what is found in the literature on punitive damages. We discuss the relationship between our Article and some of the preceding literature in notes 14, 48, 95, 118, 131, 165, 183, 194, 205, 207, 220, 244, and 272.

↑n13. General deterrence may be contrasted with specific deterrence, which is the effect that the imposition of a sanction on a party will have on that party's future behavior. See generally Bentham, supra note 12, at 396 (contrasting particular and general deterrence); Herbert L. Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction 39-48 (1968) (discussing special and general deterrence as justifications for criminal punishment).

↑n14. The theory of deterrence - the elaboration of the effect on rational actors of the possible imposition of sanctions for violations of law - was first articulated in detail by Jeremy Bentham, see Bentham, supra note 12, at 365-580, and has been developed intensively in the last several decades, stimulated largely by an important article by Gary S. Becker, Crime and Punishment: An Economic Approach, 76 J. Pol. Econ. 169 (1968). This literature is synthesized and surveyed in, for example, R.A. Carr-Hill & N.H. Stern, Crime, the Police and Criminal Statistics (1979); William A. Luksetich & Michael D. White, Crime and Public Policy (1982); David J. Pyle, The Economics of Crime and Law Enforcement (1983). For a collection of more recent contributions, up to 1992, see Bibliography of Law and Economics 504-26 (Boudewijn Bouckaert & Gerrit De Geest eds., 1992).

Beginning with Guido Calabresi, The Costs of Accidents (1970), many writers have applied the general theory of deterrence to the subject of tort liability. For an integrated presentation of this literature, see William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law (1987), and Steven Shavell, Economic Analysis of Accident Law (1987).

↑n15. This assumption is consistent with a standard definition of social welfare employed in deterrence theory, in which social welfare equals the benefits that parties obtain from their activities, less various costs (including the expense of precautions taken to avoid harm, the harm that does occur, and any costs associated with the use of the legal system).

REV_00262111

Note that this definition of social welfare does not incorporate the compensation of victims as a social benefit, even though most individuals consider compensation to be a social goal. Accounting for the compensation goal in measuring social welfare would be relatively straightforward, but doing so is unnecessary for our purposes for several reasons. First, and most importantly, punitive damages are generally extracompensatory; thus, whether or not they are paid typically does not affect fulfillment of the compensation objective. Second, victims often have insurance - so-called "first-party" insurance - that compensates them for their losses, at least partially, so that the extent to which it is necessary to rely on the liability system to achieve the compensation goal may be limited. Third, the insurance system is generally a much less expensive way to achieve compensation than the liability system. See, e.g., Don Dewees, David Duff & Michael Trebilcock, Exploring the Domain of Accident Law: Taking the Facts Seriously 421-24 (1996) (summarizing empirical findings concerning the relative cost of the insurance system and the liability system in providing compensation to accident victims).

n16. Readers familiar with the economic logic supporting this claim may want to proceed directly to section II.B.

n17. For ease of analysis, we will presume that issues of contributory negligence do not arise.

n18. We discuss below the possibility that compensatory damages do not correctly reflect the harm that actually occurred. See infra section III.L. We also observe that the total social harm caused by an adverse event includes litigation costs. See infra note 168. For simplicity, we will not take this refinement into account in Part II.

n19. In this example, and in those in the remainder of the Article, we consider relatively simple fact situations. The principles that these examples illustrate apply to more complicated and realistic circumstances.

n20. Some studies show this to be an important phenomenon. See, e.g., Daniel Kessler & Mark McClellan, Do Doctors Practice Defensive Medicine?, 111 Q.J. Econ. 353, 386 (1996) (finding that malpractice "reforms that directly limit liability ... reduce hospital expenditures by 5 to 9 percent" with no "consequential differences in mortality or the occurrence of serious complications"); Roger A. Reynolds, John A. Rizzo & Martin L. Gonzalez, The Cost of Medical Professional Liability, 257 JAMA 2776-81 (1987) (finding that defensive medicine has generated substantial costs). Other studies, however, have not found support for the notion of defensive medicine. See, e.g., Laura-Mae Baldwin, L. Gary Hart, Michael Lloyd, Meredith Fordyce & Roger A. Rosenblatt, Defensive Medicine and Obstetrics, 274 JAMA 1606, 1609 (1995) (finding no evidence of "an association between the malpractice claims experience or exposure of individual physicians and an increase in the use of prenatal resources or cesarean deliveries for the care of low-risk obstetric patients").

n21. For example, the Federal Railroad Administration has studied proposals for sensor systems to prevent derailments on railroad bridges, but it concluded that they would cost as much as $ 40,000 per bridge to install. Overall, the cost could be billions of dollars for installation and $ 60 million more per year for operation and maintenance. See Richard Perez-Pe<tild n>a, Rail Accident Stirs Debate About Sensors, N.Y. Times, Nov. 29, 1996, at B1. The Federal Railroad Administration determined that the cost was too high because of the low frequency of railroad accidents that occur on bridges. See id.

n22. This proposition assumes that individuals are risk neutral. We discuss the meaning of this assumption, and the justification for making it below. See infra pp. 886-87.

REV_00262112

n23. For example, if a harm of $ 10,000 occurs with a probability of 20%, the expected harm is $ 2000 (= 20% X $ 10,000). This expected harm also can be interpreted as the average harm per instance of some conduct that, each time it occurs, has a 20% chance of causing a $ 10,000 harm. More generally, the expected harm is the sum of products of each possible magnitude of harm and its probability. Thus, if there is a 20% chance of a $ 10,000 harm, as well as a 5% chance of a $ 30,000 harm, the expected harm is $ 3500 (= (20% X $ 10,000) + (5% X $ 30,000)).

n24. An example may clarify this point. Suppose that 3% of the applicants for employment at a firm are "rotten apples" who will misbehave on the job and cause a $ 100,000 accident; that by spending $ 500 per applicant on investigating the applicant's background it is possible to detect one-third of the rotten apples; that by instead spending $ 4000 per applicant on more intensive screening, it is possible to detect two-thirds of the rotten apples; but that it is impossible to detect the remaining one-third of the rotten apples. In this example, it is socially desirable for the firm to spend $ 500 per applicant on screening. A firm spending this much would have a 1% chance of detecting a rotten apple (because one-third of the 3% of rotten apples in the applicant pool are identified) and of thereby avoiding a $ 100,000 harm. In other words, it would reduce the expected harm by $ 1000 (= 1% X $ 100,000) per applicant screened in this way. It is not socially worthwhile, however, to spend $ 4000 per applicant, because spending this higher amount would reduce the expected harm by only $ 2000 (= 2% X $ 100,000) per applicant. Significantly, whichever amount is spent, there will still be at least a 1% chance of employee misconduct.

n25. In the example in the previous footnote, the occurrence of employee misconduct does not necessarily imply that the employer's screening activity was improper because, under the best available screening process, at least 1% of the rotten apples will remain undetected.

n26. The distinction between level of activity and level of care to be explained here was first emphasized by Steven Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. Legal Stud. 1 (1980).

n27. See, e.g., Kenneth A. Small & Camilla Kazimi, On the Costs of Air Pollution from Motor Vehicles, 29 J. Transp. Econ. & Pol'y 7, 27 (1995) (demonstrating that an additional tax of about 50% on the price of gasoline would be required to account for air pollution costs).

n28. See James J. MacKenzie, Roger C. Dower, & Donald D.T. Chen, The Going Rate: What It Really Costs To Drive 5 (1992) ("The net effect of [federal and state] policies is to make driving seem cheaper than it really is and to encourage the excessive use of automobiles and trucks.").

n29. A number of articles have discussed the withdrawal of products from the marketplace in response to actual or prospective liability costs (including liability insurance premiums). See Dewees, Duff & Trebilcock, supra note 15, at 241-42 (1996) (discussing the reduction of vaccine manufacturing because of the expansion of liability); W. Kip Viscusi, Reforming Products Liability 8 (1991) (noting product liability litigation has forced some companies to stop producing private airplanes); Louis Lasagna, The Chilling Effect of Product Liability on New Drug Development, in The Liability Maze: The Impact of Liability Law on Safety and Innovation 334, 337-41 (Peter W. Huber & Robert E. Litan eds., 1991) (describing the litigation that led to the voluntary withdrawal of the anti-morning sickness drug, Bendectin); Robert Martin, General Aviation Manufacturing: An Industry Under Siege, in The Liability Maze: The Impact of Liability Law on Safety and Innovation, supra, at 478, 478 (concluding that product liability litigation "threatens the very existence" of the corporate and private airplane industry). These discussions do not address the question whether the reduction in productive activity was due to the imposition of damages exceeding harm. However, if, as some commentators believe, product liability is socially excessive, see, e.g., Peter W. Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences 9-11 (1988) (arguing that the sharp increases in tort awards in the 1980s have led to the curtailment of socially beneficial activities such as vaccinations, ambulance services, and waste cleanup), such reductions in the availability of products may be partially attributable to excessive damages.

REV_00262113

n30. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 282 (1965) ("Negligence is ... conduct which falls below the standard established by law for the protection of others against unreasonable risk of harm." (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)); Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts, 31, at 169 (Dan B. Dobbs, Robert E. Keeton, W. Page Keeton & David G. Owen eds., 5th ed. 1984) ("Negligence is not necessarily the absence of solicitude for those who may be adversely affected by one's actions but is instead behavior which should be recognized as involving unreasonable danger to others.").

n31. Judge Learned Hand's algebraic formula for determining the due care standard encapsulates the economic interpretation of the negligence rule. In his opinion in United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F.2d 169 (2d Cir. 1947), Judge Hand said that a party is negligent if he fails to take a precaution when the burden of the precaution is less than the reduction of the expected loss occasioned by taking the precaution - in other words, if B < PL, where B is the burden of taking the precaution, P is the probability of the loss if the precaution is not taken, and L is the magnitude of the loss. See id. at 173. For further development of this idea, see, for example, John Prather Brown, Toward an Economic Theory of Liability, 2 J. Legal Stud. 323 (1973). See also William M. Landes and Richard A. Posner, The Positive Economic Theory of Tort Law, 15 Ga. L. Rev. 851, 892-903 (1981) (arguing that judicial practice is consistent with the economic interpretation of the negligence rule).

n32. Note that damages must be sufficiently less than the harm before the party would find it worthwhile to act negligently. If damages exceeded the $ 50,000 cost of the precaution, the party would be induced to take the precaution even if damages were less than the harm of $ 100,000.

n33. Although parties will generally reduce the chance of being found negligent by mistake by taking greater care, they will not necessarily take more care than they would if there were no mistakes in the determination of negligence. The reason is that, to the extent that there is a random component in the assessment of care, the exercise of greater care will be only partially rewarded. For instance, if half the time a party's care is not observed and courts make a guess about its level, increasing the level of care would benefit the party only half the time. The condition under which parties will take greater care is, roughly, that the assessment of care is not too imprecise. For details, see John E. Calfee & Richard Craswell, Some Effects of Uncertainty on Compliance with Legal Standards, 70 Va. L. Rev. 965 (1984), and Richard Craswell and John E. Calfee, Deterrence and Uncertain Legal Standards, 2 J.L. Econ. & Org. 279 (1986). See also Shavell, supra note 14, at 93-99 (arguing that injurers will exercise more than due care in the presence of errors in the assessment of their level of care). But see Mark F. Grady, A New Positive Economic Theory of Negligence, 92 Yale L.J. 799, 817-21 (1983) (showing that, under a different but plausible interpretation of the negligence rule, mistakes will not cause parties to take excessive care); Marcel Kahan, Causation and Incentives To Take Care Under the Negligence Rule, 18 J. Legal Stud. 427, 437-39 (1989) (same).

n34. The result that the negligence rule leads to socially excessive participation in risky activities was originally developed in Shavell, cited above in note 26. See also A. Mitchell Polinsky, Strict Liability vs. Negligence in a Market Setting, 70 Am. Econ. Rev. 363 (1980) (demonstrating the result in market settings).

n35. The point of this paragraph may be clarified by a numerical illustration. Suppose that taking proper precautions would cost an individual $ 100 each time he engages in an activity and would reduce to 1/2% the risk of an accident that would cause harm of $ 100,000. Assuming that the individual would take the precautions in order to avoid liability for negligence, he will engage in the activity whenever the benefit to him exceeds the $ 100 cost of precautions. However, each time he engages in the activity, he causes total social costs of $ 600: the $ 100 cost of precautions, plus the expected harm of $ 500 (= 1/2% X $ 100,000). Consequently, from society's perspective, he should engage in the activity only if his benefit exceeds $ 600. If his benefit lies between $ 100 and $ 600, however, he will engage in the activity even though doing so is socially undesirable.

REV_00262114

n36. More precisely, expected damages could exceed harm for two reasons. First, a party who caused harm but who was not negligent might be found negligent by mistake and made to pay such a high level of damages that, on average, he will pay for more than the harm he caused. Second, a party who did not cause harm might mistakenly be found both to be the cause of harm and to be negligent. Obviously, any damages imposed on such a party are excessive and will chill participation in activities in which such mistakes occur.

n37. Some lower levels of damages also will properly induce parties to take precautions provided that these levels still exceed the cost of precautions. See supra note 32.

n38. This assumption is made mostly for convenience and does not affect our main point that the benchmark level of damages - the level that would be appropriate for deterrence if injurers were definitely found liable - should be inflated using a specific multiplier formula if injurers can sometimes escape liability. If the benchmark level of damages is different from harm, this benchmark quantum, whatever its magnitude, should be inflated by the multiplier we give below in order for deterrence to be appropriate when injurers can escape liability. See infra section II.B.

n39. A risk-neutral injurer would be indifferent between paying certain damages of, say, $ 10,000, and facing a risky situation in which he will have to pay either nothing or $ 20,000 with equal probability, because the risky situation involves an expected payment of $ 10,000 (= 50% X $ 20,000). See generally Robert S. Pindyck & Daniel L. Rubinfeld, Microeconomics 146 (3d ed. 1995) (discussing the concept of risk neutrality).

n40. A risk-averse injurer would prefer to pay certain damages of $ 10,000 than to face a risky situation in which he will have to pay either nothing or $ 20,000 with equal probability, even though the risky situation involves an expected payment of $ 10,000. See generally id. (discussing risk aversion).

n41. This result is demonstrated in Shavell, cited above in note 14, at 218-21, and Steven Shavell, On Liability and Insurance, 13 Bell J. Econ. 120, 124-26 (1982). The optimal level of damages depends on the degree of risk aversion of injurers and on whether victims are insured or, if not, how risk averse they are.

n42. In Part III, we will discuss two situations in which this assumption is not appropriate. One is, as we have noted, when behavior is malicious; then optimal damages may exceed harm. See infra section III.A. The second situation is when victims of harm are customers of the defendant and are relatively well informed about risk, in which case it may not be necessary to impose damages equal to harm to achieve optimal deterrence. See infra section III.J.

n43. This conclusion is formally demonstrated in Shavell, cited above in note 14, at 222-27, and Shavell, cited above in note 41, at 126-30. It should seem intuitively plausible if injurers purchase full coverage against liability, for then their risk aversion is irrelevant. If injurers do not purchase full coverage (suppose there is coinsurance or a deductible), the conclusion is not obvious because injurers do bear residual risk, but it is true nonetheless for reasons explained in the sources cited in this note.

n44. The point that diversified shareholders will want a firm to be operated in an approximately risk-neutral manner is well-accepted in the economic literature concerning corporate finance. See, e.g., Richard A. Brealey & Stewart C. Myers, Principles of Corporate Finance 148-49 (4th ed. 1991). The reason shareholders desire that firms operate in a risk-neutral manner is, roughly speaking, that each shareholder, holding a diversified portfolio, will not worry about the riskiness of any particular firm in which he has ownership rights; thus, he will vote to have the firm maximize its expected return. The result that the optimal level of damages equals harm when shareholders want the firm to act in a risk-neutral way follows directly from reasoning in Harry A. Newman & David W. Wright, Strict Liability in a Principal-Agent Model, 10 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 219 (1990). This result holds even though employees of firms will generally be risk averse and cannot be controlled perfectly by shareholders. (The point of this footnote may not apply if the wealth of the owners of a particular firm depends in a significant way on the profitability of that firm, as would often be the case for privately held firms owned by relatively few individuals.)

REV_00262115

n45. Consider, for example, the following evidence. The likelihood of obtaining compensation for medical negligence has been found to be about 6%. See Harvard Medical Practice Study, Patients, Doctors, and Lawyers: Medical Injury, Malpractice Litigation, and Patient Compensation in New York 7-1 (1990). The average probability that an oil spill in excess of 10,000 gallons will be detected and traced to its source is approximately 60%. See Mark A. Cohen, Optimal Enforcement Strategy To Prevent Oil Spills: An Application of a Principal-Agent Model with Moral Hazard, 30 J.L. & Econ. 23, 44-45 (1987). The average probability of the detection of fraud is estimated to be 30%. See Jonathan M. Karpoff & John R. Lott, Jr., The Reputational Penalty Firms Bear from Committing Criminal Fraud, 36 J.L. & Econ. 757, 789-90 (1993).

We should also note that parties may sometimes be found liable for harms for which they are not responsible. Although we do not consider this possibility in our analysis, were we to do so, it would often lower the level of damages that otherwise would be optimal.

n46. If the injurer does not engage in an activity repeatedly, but, say, only once, the injurer obviously will not pay for the harm done, even approximately: he either will pay $ 400,000 in this one instance (more than the $ 100,000 harm he caused) or will escape liability altogether. However, the injurer's expected damages - the damages he will have to pay if he is found liable, multiplied by the probability of being found liable - equal the harm of $ 100,000 (because he has a one-in-four chance of being found liable and made to pay $ 400,000).

n47. See supra section II.A.

n48. It may be helpful to state this formula algebraically. If H is the harm and P is the probability of being found liable, then the injurer should pay H X 1/P - that is, H/P - when he is found liable. Thus, the injurer's expected damages will be P X (H/P) = H. The earliest reference to this formula (although in words) apparently is in Jeremy Bentham, An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation, in The Utilitarians 173 (1961) (1789). For other references to this formula, see Robert Cooter & Thomas Ulen, Law and Economics 391-92 (1st ed. 1988); Posner, cited above in note 12, at 77; and Shavell, cited above in note 14, at 148, 161-62.

n49. Two qualifications should be mentioned. First, total damages should be less than the amount given by the formula in this paragraph if injurers are risk averse and cannot obtain liability insurance. This conclusion follows from our discussion above. See supra pp. 886-87. Second, if an injurer's subjective belief about the probability of being found liable differs from the true probability, the former should in principle be used in the formula. For simplicity, we assume in this Article that parties are aware of the actual probability of being found liable.

n50. See supra section II.A.

REV_00262116

n51. To see that this level of damages is the correct one, recall from note 48, above, that the proper level of total damages is H/P, where H is the magnitude of harm and P is the probability that the injurer will be found liable. This amount would comprise a payment of H in compensatory damages and (H/P) - H in punitive damages. The punitive payment can be rewritten as[(1 - P)/P]H. The term in brackets is the punitive damages multiplier to which we refer in the text.

n52. We will elaborate on this point when we discuss the reprehensibility criterion in the context of deterrence. See infra section III.A.

n53. For essentially the reasons we have given, Galligan prefers the term "augmented awards" to "punitive damages." See Galligan, supra note 3, at 12-13.

n54. For simplicity, we sometimes will refer hereafter to courts, when we mean both courts and juries.

n55. Consider, for example, the collapse of two pedestrian skywalks at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City in 1981. See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 97 F.R.D. 380 (W.D. Mo. 1983). The defendants in that case agreed not to contest liability. See id. at 389.

n56. See infra pp. 903-04 (discussing the Exxon Valdez oil spill litigation).

n57. See supra section II.A.

n58. Some estimate also would have to be made of the probability that a driver who observed suspicious behavior would report it. Obviously, the lower this probability, the higher the proper damages multiplier. (If this consideration is ignored because of the difficulty of estimating the probability, the multiplier discussed in the text would be a lower bound for the ideal multiplier.)

n59. We discuss a number of punitive damages cases below and explain how the facts in those cases bear on determining the appropriate damages multiplier. See infra section II.D.

n60. It should be noted that juries are often required to consider and determine probabilities in contexts other than those discussed here, for example in assessing negligence. In deciding whether a person is negligent, a jury must ascertain how much an additional precaution would lower the probability of harm. If the reduction in the probability, multiplied by the harm, exceeds the cost of the precaution, it is negligent not to have taken it. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 291 (1965) ("Where an act is one which a reasonable man would recognize as involving a risk of harm to another, the risk is unreasonable and the act is negligent if the risk is of such magnitude as to outweigh what the law regards as the utility of the act or of the particular manner in which it is done."). Thus, when a jury considers whether the failure to install a safety device was negligent, it must determine how much the device would have lowered the accident probability. No reason exists to believe that juries would have more difficulty in appraising probabilities in the context of calculating punitive damages than in the context of determining negligence, which is not thought to be especially problematic. However, some evidence suggests that individuals do have problems with estimating probabilities in many circumstances. See, e.g., Judgment Under Uncertainty: Heuristics and Biases 3-20 (Daniel Kahneman, Paul Slovic & Amos Tversky eds., 1982) (documenting the manner in which people rely on heuristics to facilitate the assessment of probability).

n61. Such a table is provided below. See infra Appendix.

n62. A byproduct of restricting attention to a limited number of probabilities is that this prevents the jury from picking a damages multiplier above a certain value - for example, the damages multiplier cannot exceed 10 if the lowest probability offered is 0.1. We discuss caps on punitive damages below and point out that they cannot be justified as a matter of principle. See infra p. 900.

REV_00262117

n63. Juries could be given limited discretion to use such information if legislatures select a range for the punitive damages multiplier rather than a specific multiplier.

n64. If, however, all precautions are general rather than specific to a kind of accident, it does not matter whether accidents are categorized narrowly. Failing to categorize narrowly will not distort which type of precaution is taken if there are no specific types of precaution to take.

To illustrate, suppose that there is one type of precaution and two kinds of accident, A and B; that the two kinds of accident are equally likely to occur; that each would cause harm of $ 10,000; that if A occurs, no likelihood of escaping liability exists; and that if B occurs, the likelihood of escaping liability is 50%. Under these assumptions, we will show that an injurer's expected damages if an accident occurs will equal the harm of $ 10,000 regardless of whether accidents are categorized narrowly or broadly. If the categorization is narrow, the multiplier for an accident of type A will be 1, and the multiplier for an accident of type B will be 2. Thus, if an accident of type A occurs, the injurer's expected damages will be $ 10,000 because he will definitely pay $ 10,000; and if an accident of type B occurs, his expected damages will also be $ 10,000 because he will pay $ 20,000 with a probability of 50%. If the categorization is broad, including both kinds of accident, the multiplier will be 1.3333 because the probability of being found liable for an accident of some type is 75% (the average of 100% and 50%). Hence, damages when the injurer is found liable will be $ 13,333 (= 1.3333 X $ 10,000). The injurer's expected damages for an accident will again be $ 10,000, comprising a 50% chance that a type A accident will occur, in which case the injurer will definitely be found liable for $ 13,333, plus a 50% chance that a type B accident will occur, in which case the injurer will be found liable for $ 13,333 with a 50% probability (in other words, [50% X (100% X $ 13,333)] + [50% X (50% X $ 13,333)] = $ 10,000). Accordingly, whichever categorization is used to determine the multiplier, the injurer's incentives will be correct, and no issue of distortion of the types of precaution taken will arise because, by hypothesis, only one type exists.

If there were two separate types of precaution, one reducing the frequency of type A accidents and the other reducing the frequency of type B accidents, then under the broad categorization, with a multiplier of 1.3333, a potential injurer would take an excessive degree of care to reduce type A accidents and too little care to reduce type B accidents. (We note, however, that the following point can be demonstrated: if the single multiplier used under the broad categorization is always adjusted to reflect the relative likelihoods of type A and type B accidents - they would not necessarily be equally likely when there are different types of precaution - use of a single multiplier would not distort incentives to take different types of precaution. Nevertheless, making such an adjustment would be administratively difficult, to say the least.)

n65. Although punitive damages should not be imposed on the firm, the firm may want, in effect, to impose punitive internal sanctions on its employees in order to deter them from acting in ways that cause harm. Additionally, the greater the likelihood that employees would escape such sanctions, the more the firm may want to spend on its monitoring and screening efforts.

n66. To state matters formally, let D be damages and let P(D) be the probability of suit, which rises as D rises and which is less than one. The claim in the text is that there exists a D such that P(D)D = H, where H is the harm. Because the function P(D)D is continuous in D, there must exist such a D between H and H/P(H) because P(H)H < H and P(H/P(H))[H/P(H)] > P(H)[H/P(H)] = H (the asserted D is unique because P(D)D is strictly rising in D). We comment further on the connection between damages and the probability of suit below. See infra section III.E.

REV_00262118

n67. See David G. Owen, Civil Punishment and the Public Good, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 103, 113 (1982).

n68. We discuss this consideration in more detail below. See infra section III.E.

n69. Actually, this statement oversimplifies matters. To decide when it is worthwhile to calculate a damages multiplier, one would in principle need to take into account not just the probability of escaping liability, but also the magnitude of the harm and the costs of precautions. For even if the probability of escaping liability is high, if the harm is very low or if the costs of additional precautions are very high, it may not be worthwhile to incur the additional litigation costs in order to determine the proper damages multiplier.

Additionally, if the determination of punitive damages is not done on a case-by-case basis, it might be desirable to award punitive damages even when the probability of escaping liability is low. Suppose a fixed multiplier is applied in all cases in which the probability is small but positive. Then no additional litigation costs would be associated with calculating the multiplier in each case; and if the fixed multiplier is set appropriately, incentives will be improved overall relative to what they would be if no multiplier were employed.

n70. See infra section III.L.

n71. See supra p. 873.

n72. Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 222 (Ala. 1989). The United States Supreme Court has endorsed the criteria for evaluating punitive damages discussed in this case. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 20-24 (1991). For further support for the proposition that deterrence is one of the central purposes of punitive damages, see also the cases cited above in note 5. Indeed, in Maine, deterrence is the only justification for punitive damages. See Foss v. Maine Turnpike Auth., 309 A.2d 339, 345 (Me. 1973) (citing Allen v. Rossi, 146 A. 692, 694 (Me. 1929)).

n73. How the deterrence goal and the punishment goal should be reconciled when they are in conflict is discussed below. See infra Part V and Appendix.

n74. 1 Linda L. Schlueter & Kenneth R. Redden, Punitive Damages 6.1(C), at 334 (3d ed. 1995). "As a general rule, the punitive damages award must bear a reasonable relation to the amount of actual damages awarded." Id. The United States Supreme Court has endorsed the reasonable-relationship notion in its decisions. See, e.g., BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1601 (1996) (stating that "the principle that exemplary damages must bear a "reasonable relationship' to compensatory damages has a long pedigree," and citing cases dating from 1852); Haslip, 499 U.S. at 21-22 (endorsing Alabama's criteria for the post-verdict review of punitive damages, which include "whether there is a reasonable relationship between the punitive damages award and the harm likely to result from the defendant's conduct as well as the harm that actually has occurred," and stating that the "review ensures that punitive damages awards ... have some understandable relationship to compensatory damages").

n75. The United States Supreme Court has recently presented three "guideposts" for determining whether a punitive damages award is excessive. See Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1598. "The second [of these guideposts,] and perhaps [the] most commonly cited indicium of an unreasonable or excessive punitive damages award is its ratio to the actual harm inflicted on the plaintiff." Id. at 1601. The Court, however, rejects the possibility that excessiveness can be determined by "a simple mathematical formula, even one that compares actual and potential damages to the punitive award." Id. at 1602 (citing TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 458 (1993)). In his concurrence in Gore, Justice Breyer points to problems with the reasonable-relationship standard, arguing that, at least as it is interpreted by the Alabama courts, it "does little to guide a determination of what counts as a "reasonable' relationship .... To find a "reasonable relationship' between purely economic harm totaling $ 56,000, without significant evidence of future repetition, and a punitive award of $ 2 million is to empty the "reasonable relationship' test of meaningful content." Id. at 1606 (Breyer, J., concurring).

REV_00262119

Courts often make statements of the following sort: "Although there is no fixed ratio by which to determine the propriety of a punitive damage award, punitive damages should bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages awarded." Little v. Stuyvesant Life Ins. Co., 136 Cal. Rptr. 653, 663 (Cal. Ct. App. 1977). The Little court followed that sentence with the observation that "here, the ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages is in excess of 14 to 1 and in dollar amount the punitive damage award exceeds the compensatory award by almost two and a third million dollars," and the court relied on these facts, among others, in concluding that the punitive damages award in the case was excessive. Id. at 664.

In an important early article on punitive damages, Clarence Morris criticized approaches like that of the Little court:

Courts often insist that "punitive damages must bear some relation to actual damages," and attempt to test verdicts in terms of mathematical ratios. The opinions contain statements to the effect that a verdict for punitive damages x times as great as the actual damages is clearly excessive....

This test is probably more often a rationalization of results than a means of obtaining them. The proper ratio between actual damages and punitive damages is placed at a figure which supports the judge's view of the verdict ....

Clarence Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1173, 1180 (1931).

n76. See, e.g., Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223 (considering concealment and cover-up in determining degree of reprehensibility, which influences the level of punitive damages); Gamble v. Stevenson, 406 S.E.2d 350, 354 (S.C. 1991) (establishing "defendant's awareness or concealment" as one factor to consider in the post-trial review of jury awards of punitive damages).

n77. See, e.g., Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223; see also Garnes v. Fleming Landfill, Inc., 413 S.E.2d 897, 909 (W. Va. 1991) (stating that, in determining the reprehensibility of defendant's conduct, the jury should consider "whether he attempted to conceal or cover up his actions or the harm caused by them").

n78. Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223; see also Garnes, 413 S.E.2d at 909 (instructing trial courts to consider the costs of litigation in reviewing punitive damages awards, because "we want to encourage plaintiffs to bring wrongdoers to trial"). In the same vein, a Texas Court of Appeals affirmed an award of $ 4500 in exemplary damages, in an action for invasion of privacy from telephone harassment, when actual damages were $ 2 and attorney fees were $ 4462.52. See Donnel v. Lara, 703 S.W.2d 257, 258, 262 (Tex. App. 1985), superseded by Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.004 (West 1997). The court noted that the plaintiffs "had obligated themselves to pay reasonable attorney fees as a necessary prerequisite for obtaining relief through the courts," and held that "the amount exemplified an accurate application of the purposes for exemplary damages - to punish and deter similar wrongs in track). [21]

REV_00262120

In our numerical examples, we have discussed precautions as if they would completely eliminate the risk of harm. However, everything we have said applies to situations in which precautions reduce, but do not eliminate, the risk of harm. In particular, the proper magnitude of damages continues to be the harm the defendant has caused. [22] This level of damages again induces potential injurers to take appropriate precautions, but the determination of appropriate precautions now involves a comparison of the cost of the precaution with the reduction in the expected harm that results if the precaution is [*881] taken, where expected harm refers to the harm multiplied by the probability of its occurrence. [23]

Note that, even when proper precautions are exercised, some accidents will occur because of residual, hard-to-eliminate risks. For example, even the safest automobile tire may blow out and cause an accident. That a blowout occurs does not necessarily mean that the manufacturer took inadequate precautions in the design and manufacture of the tire. Likewise, even if employers screen and monitor employees with appropriate vigilance, occasional employee misbehavior will still occur, possibly egregious in character. [24] It is important to stress that such misbehavior does not necessarily signal a lack of proper oversight by the employer. [25]

Let us now turn to a second reason that it is best for damages to equal harm. This reason concerns the extent to which individuals and firms participate in risky activities - what we will refer to as their level of activity. [26] A party's level of activity affects the magnitude of expected harm, whatever precautions the party takes when engaging in the activity. For example, the more miles a person drives - his level of activity - the greater the number of accidents that he is likely to cause, whatever his level of care when he drives. (Of course, the more care he takes when driving, the lower will be the expected number of accidents per mile driven.) Similarly, the more units of a risky product a firm produces and sells - its level of activity - the greater the number of accidents that will be caused by the product, whatever are its safety features. [*882]

If damages equal harm, potential injurers will have the socially correct incentives to engage in risky activities. In particular, they will engage in an activity if and only if the benefit they derive exceeds the additional harm caused by their decision to engage in it. If damages equal harm, an individual will tend to participate in an activity such as hunting if and only if the benefit he obtains from this activity exceeds the expected accident costs that hunting imposes on others. Likewise, a firm will produce a product if and only if the product's value, as reflected in the willingness of customers to pay for it, exceeds the full costs of its production, including accident losses. Specifically, if damages equal harm, the cost of production will include the harm. To cover its costs, a firm will have to sell its product at a higher price - a price that reflects the average harm caused per unit of output. Therefore, consumers will only buy the product if they value it more highly than its full cost of production, including the harm. Their consumption of the product will therefore be socially correct. In other words, the fact that the product price will rise in response to the firm's liability costs is desirable because, if damages equal harm, this price increase appropriately discourages consumers of the product from, in effect, causing an excessive number of accidents by consuming too much of the product.

It follows that, if damages are less than harm, parties will engage in activities to an excessive extent - that is, they will engage in activities even when the benefits are outweighed by the harms caused. Conversely, if damages exceed harm, parties may be led to curtail their activities to an inappropriate extent - to refrain from engaging in them even when the benefits exceed the harms caused. In particular, a firm might be induced to withdraw its product from the marketplace even though consumers place a higher value on the product than its full cost of production, which includes the average harm caused by the product.

REV_00262067

the future." Id. at 262.

n79. See supra p. 888.

n80. A few courts have explicitly recognized the importance of the defendant's chance of escaping liability. See, e.g., Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33, 35 (7th Cir. 1996) (Posner, C.J.). In that case, the court noted:

When a tortious act is concealable, a judgment equal to the harm done by the act will underdeter. Suppose a person who goes around assaulting other people is caught only half the time. Then in comparing the costs, in the form of anticipated damages, of the assaults with the benefits to him, he will discount the costs (but not the benefits, because they are realized in every assault) by 50 percent, and so in deciding whether to commit the next assault he will not be confronted by the full social cost of his activity.

Id.; see also Zazu Designs v. L'Oreal, S.A., 979 F.2d 499, 508 (7th Cir. 1992) (Easterbrook, J.) ("Punitive damages are appropriate when some wrongful conduct evades detection; a multiplier then both compensates and deters.")

In FDIC v. W.R. Grace & Co., 877 F.2d 614 (7th Cir. 1989) (Posner, J.), the court stated:

The most straightforward rationale for punitive damages ... is that they are necessary to deter torts or crimes that are concealable. Suppose the average defrauder is brought to book only half the time. To confront him with a sanction that will make fraud worthless to him and thus deter him, it is necessary that when he is caught he be made to pay twice as much as his profits.

Id. at 623; see also BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1602 (1996) (Stevens, J.) ("A higher ratio [of punitive damages to compensatory damages] may also be justified in cases in which the injury is hard to detect ...."). Justice Breyer's concurrence in Gore mentions economic theories of punitive damages that focus on ensuring that a wrongdoer pays for the total cost of the harm caused. See id. at 1607 (Breyer, J., concurring). He correctly interprets these theories as permitting juries "to calculate punitive damages by making a rough estimate of global harm [and] dividing that estimate by a similarly rough estimate of the number of successful lawsuits that would likely be brought." Id.

n81. One exception is Justice Breyer's concurrence in Gore, in which he observes that damages greater than the total harm caused will ""over-deter' by leading potential defendants to spend more to prevent the activity that causes the economic harm, say, through employee training, than the cost of the harm itself." Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1607-08 (Breyer, J., concurring); see also Jones v. Reagan, 696 F.2d 551, 554 (7th Cir. 1983) (Posner, J.) ("If considerations of deterrence are to be brought to center stage, the potential for overdeterrence must also be considered ...."); Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839-41 (2d Cir. 1967) (Friendly, J.) (noting that allowing multiple punitive damages awards for negligence in the manufacture of goods gives rise to the danger of "overkill" and "needless" deterrence).

n82. For example, the Green Oil factors, which were endorsed by the United States Supreme Court in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip, 491 U.S. 1, 21-22 (1991), fail to mention overdeterrence. See Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223-24. Nor do state statutes outlining the factors to be considered in awarding punitive damages include the danger of overdeterrence. See Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3701(b) (1994); Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.20 subd. 3 (West 1988); Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(7)(b) (1995); Or. Rev. Stat. 30.925(2) (1995).

n83. See supra section II.A.

REV_00262121

n84. See infra Part III.

n85. See Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1618-19 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (surveying state caps on punitive damage awards).

n86. Justice Ginsburg lists 16 states in which caps on punitive damages have been enacted or proposed. In 13 of those states (Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Maryland, Nevada, New Jersey, North Dakota, Texas, and Virginia), the award described in the text would exceed the cap. See id.

n87. See, e.g., Dan Quayle, Civil Justice Reform, 41 Am. U. L. Rev. 559, 564-65 (1992) (arguing that "the current approach to punitive damages will continue to generate disproportionately high awards in a random and capricious manner" and that one aspect of reform should be to limit the amount of punitive damages to "the full amount of compensatory damages").

n88. We have commented on the legal doctrine governing punitive damages to some degree above in section II.C and will discuss it more extensively below in Part III.

n89. 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996).

n90. See Alabama Court Slashes Punitive Award in Case Involving Repainted BMW Car, Wall St. J., May 12, 1997, at B10.

n91. See Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1593. The other plaintiff, Thomas Yates, was awarded $ 4600 in compensatory damages but nothing in punitive damages. See Yates v. BMW of N. Am., Inc., 642 So. 2d 937, 938 (Ala. Civ. App.), cert. quashed, 642 So. 2d 937 (Ala. 1993). It should be noted that in the entire United States, BMW had sold 983 cars as new after repainting. See Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1593. In this example, we are restricting our attention to the subset of cars sold in Alabama because the Alabama Supreme Court, in reviewing Gore, limited consideration in this way. It essentially makes no difference whether the multiplier is calculated separately for each state or instead is calculated for the entire country (based on appropriate national statistics, such as the figure of 983 cars in Gore). Under either method, a firm's expected damage payments would equal the harm caused nationally.

n92. In fact, other suits were brought. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 646 So. 2d 619, 626 n.4 (Ala. 1994) (listing the 25 cases brought by Gore's attorney against BMW for similar conduct). The assumption in the text that only two suits were brought is made for illustrative purposes.

n93. In general, the proper approach to calculating the probability of liability would be to use all available information about the likelihood of detection and suit. Such information might include, for example, information about the frequency of suit against BMW under similar circumstances in other states, the frequency with which car owners take their cars to detail shops, and the likelihood of lawyers taking cases with higher or lower stakes.

n94. In fact, the calculation of the multiplier may be more complicated because the award of punitive damages will itself affect the probability of suit. As we observed above, total damages should be such that the probability of suit induced by that award of damages results in expected damages equal to harm. See supra p. 895. Therefore, if an award of $ 28,000 would induce more than two plaintiffs to sue, the proper multiplier might be less than seven.

n95. For another economically oriented discussion of Gore, see Rubin, Calfee & Grady, cited above in note 12. Their discussion, however, does not emphasize the point that we make here.

REV_00262122

n96. 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n97. See id. at 4-5. In fact, the insurance policy that lapsed was not Pacific Mutual Life's policy, but rather the policy of another company, Union Fidelity Life Insurance Company, which the agent was also representing. See id. However, premiums for the Union policy were collected through Pacific Mutual Life's Birmingham office. See id. at 5. Pacific Mutual Life was sued for fraud under a theory of respondeat superior. See id. at 6.

n98. Although it was not entirely clear how the jury apportioned the total award between compensatory and punitive damages, the United States Supreme Court presumed that not more than $ 200,000 of the total represented compensatory damages and not less than $ 840,000 represented punitive damages. Id. at 7 n.2.

n99. See Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, No. CV-82-2453 (Ala. Cir. Ct. Jefferson County 1987); Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 553 So. 2d 537, 543 (Ala. 1989); Haslip, 499 U.S. at 24.

n100. See supra pp. 894-95.

n101. Haslip's out-of-pocket expenses were "less than $ 4,000." Id.

n102. The jury awarded compensatory damages for the other respondents in the following amounts: Hargrove $ 10,288; Craig $ 12,400; and Calhoun $ 15,290. See id. at 7.

n103. No. A89-0095-CV (D. Alaska Sept. 24, 1996).

n104. See, e.g., Charles McCoy, Exxon Corp.'s Settlement Gets Court Approval, Wall St. J., Oct. 9, 1991, at A3.

n105. See Fishermen Block Tankers, Wash. Post, Aug. 22, 1993, at A9 (noting that the Exxon Valdez "polluted thousands of miles of coastline").

n106. See Seth Mydans, Captain in Alaska Oil Spill Loses License for Nine Months, N.Y. Times, July 26, 1990, at A12 (noting that an administrative law judge for the Coast Guard found Hazelwood guilty of consuming alcohol within four hours of sailing and that Hazelwood had pleaded no contest to the charge); A Question Recurs: Was Hazelwood Drunk?, N.Y. Times, Feb. 25, 1990, at 29.

n107. The jury awarded $ 287 million as compensation for fishing losses. See In re The Exxon Valdez, No. A89-0095-CV, 1995 WL 527988, at *5 (D. Alaska Jan. 27, 1995). The court noted that, including other verdicts and settlements, the dollar amount of harm caused by the spill was between $ 288.7 million and $ 418.7 million (including the $ 287 million verdict). See id.

n108. See Caleb Solomon, Exxon Is Told To Pay $ 5 Billion for Valdez Spill, Wall St. J., Sept. 19, 1994, at A3.

n109. In June 1997, Exxon appealed the $ 5 billion punitive damages award entered against it in the Exxon Valdez case. See Exxon Corp. Submits Brief Outlining Valdez Appeal, Wall St. J., June 20, 1997, at A4.

n110. Punitive damages would be appropriate, for example, in the circumstances described in Matthew L. Wald, Royal Caribbean Cruise Line Indicted on Charges of Dumping Oil, N.Y. Times, Dec. 20, 1996, at A26 (cruise line indicted for "routinely dumping waste oil from five of its ships for years and falsifying its log books to hide its activities").

REV_00262123

n111. See supra Part II.

n112. See 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, at 264 ("In order to receive punitive damages, a plaintiff must show that the defendant acted with malice, either actual or legal."); see also Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P.2d 566, 570 (Haw. 1989) (noting that punitive damages "are awarded only when the egregious nature of the defendant's conduct makes such a remedy appropriate"); Barnhouse v. Hawkeye State Bank, 406 N.W.2d 181, 184 (Iowa 1987) ("An award of punitive damages is appropriate when a party acts with actual or legal malice.") (citations omitted); Nappe v. Anschelewitz, Barr, Ansell & Bonello, 477 A.2d 1224, 1230 (N.J. 1984) ("To warrant a punitive award, the defendant's conduct must have been wantonly reckless or malicious.") (citations omitted); Hood v. Fulkerson, 699 P.2d 608, 611 (N.M. 1985) ("[Punitive damages] may be awarded only when the conduct of the wrongdoer may be said to be maliciously intentional, fraudulent, oppressive, or committed recklessly or with a wanton disregard to the plaintiffs' rights." (quoting Loucks v. Albuquerque Nat'l Bank, 418 P.2d 191, 199 (N.M. 1966) (internal quotation marks omitted))).

n113. See, e.g., Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223 (Ala. 1989) ("The degree of reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct should be considered" when "determining whether the jury award of punitive damages is excessive or inadequate"), endorsed in Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21 (1991); Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 582 P.2d 980, 990 (Cal. 1978) (stating that, among factors to consider in assessing punitive damages is "the particular nature of the defendant's acts in light of the whole record; clearly, different acts may be of varying degrees of reprehensibility, and the more reprehensible the act, the greater the appropriate punishment, assuming all other factors are equal."); McNeill v. Allen, 534 P.2d 813, 820 (Colo. Ct. App. 1975) ("The purpose of punishment and deterrence may best be served by relatively higher or relatively lower exemplary damages according to the nature of the wrongful conduct.") (citation omitted); Ultimate Chem. Co. v. Surface Transp. Int'l, Inc., 658 P.2d 1008, 1012 (Kan. 1983) (listing among the factors to consider in assessing punitive damages "the nature, extent, and enormity of the wrong").

n114. BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1599 (1996).

n115. See supra note 113.

n116. As previously noted, we discuss below the significance of the reprehensibility criterion to the punishment goal of punitive damages. See infra pp. 952-953.

n117. For the most part, other commentators who have considered punitive damages in terms of the deterrence goal have agreed that the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct is not a relevant factor. See, e.g., Dobbs, supra note 3, at 860-63; Galligan, supra note 3, at 62-64.

n118. In their respective discussions of punitive damages, Dorsey Ellis and Robert Cooter also find that the reprehensibility of a defendant's conduct is relevant to deterrence when injurers' gains do not count in social welfare - that is, when their gains are socially illicit. See Cooter, Economic Analysis, supra note 12, at 86-89; Ellis, supra note 12, at 31-33. For more formal treatments of illicit utility, also in the context of punitive damages, see Shavell, supra note 14, at 146, 159-61; Diamond, Efficiency Effects, supra note 12, at 8-12.

n119. See supra Part II.

n120. If, unlike in the example we have been discussing, a reprehensible act is purely intentional, overdeterrence cannot occur. Suppose a surgeon intentionally left a surgical tool in the patient. (Although this example may seem unbelievable, we use it to contrast the conclusion in this footnote with that in the text.) Threatening the surgeon with punitive damages in addition to compensatory damages would further discourage the surgeon from intentionally leaving the surgical tool in a patient. Overdeterrence could not occur. But if the surgeon's act was the result of his failure to take adequate precautions - that is, if his act was accidental - the imposition of punitive damages can affect the level of care he exercises. As we explained in the text, this level of care can be excessive.

REV_00262124

n121. For example, in the illustration of a firm's screening decision in note 24, above, if damages exceed the amount determined by the damages formula, the firm might be led to spend $ 4000 per applicant on screening, which would be socially excessive given the assumed benefit from this level of screening. On the point that the imposition of punitive damages may lead corporations to spend excessively in order to forestall reprehensible behavior by their employees, see Daniel R. Fischel & Alan O. Sykes, Corporate Crime, 25 J. Legal Stud. 319, 348 (1996).

n122. See supra section II.C.

n123. See supra pp. 898-99. For example, in Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218 (Ala. 1989), because reference to concealment occurs in the context of the reprehensibility criterion, see id. at 223, it is difficult to infer how such behavior should affect punitive damages. This difficulty is partially due to the Green Oil court's failure to discuss how the degree of reprehensibility should affect the level of punitive damages. See id. at 223-24. Additionally, Green Oil offers no guidance concerning how evidence of concealment should affect the degree of reprehensibility, including how much weight concealment should be given in relation to the other factors mentioned that bear on the degree of reprehensibility (such as the duration of the conduct). See id. Thus, although Green Oil suggests that concealment should be a basis for raising the level of punitive damages, the extent to which punitive damages should be raised is unclear.

n124. For example, consider a firm that believes that any pollution that it generates will be very difficult to detect. Such a firm might not invest in any pollution control equipment - and thus its conduct would be considered reprehensible. In contrast, an otherwise identical firm that believes that its pollution will be detected with a high probability would make reasonable investments in pollution control equipment - its conduct would not be reprehensible. Consequently, if a court does not have direct information about a firm's chance of escaping liability, the court might be able to infer from a firm's level of investment in pollution control equipment - that is, from whether its conduct was reprehensible or not - whether the firm faced a low or high chance of escaping liability.

n125. We believe that the notion of socially illicit utility reflects how people often would characterize the utility that individuals derive from certain reprehensible acts (such as rape). But because no theoretical basis exists for determining which categories of utility are socially illicit, we are not suggesting below that particular categories of utility are necessarily socially illicit. Which categories of utility from wrongful conduct are socially illicit is an empirical question, determined by what society wants to count in social welfare. The notion of socially illicit utility has been considered by some commentators in the context of punitive damages. See sources cited supra note 118. It also has been mentioned in the economic literature on law enforcement. See, e.g., George J. Stigler, The Optimum Enforcement of Laws, 78 J. Pol. Econ. 526, 527 (1970).

n126. For example, suppose an individual obtains a utility gain worth $ 2000 to him from maliciously hitting someone in the nose, and that the harm to the victim is equivalent to $ 500 (because $ 500 would fully compensate the victim for his pain and medical costs). Then, even if the injurer would definitely be found liable, punitive damages of at least $ 1500 would be required to deter him. (Clearly, if there is a chance that he can escape liability, the punitive damages amount would have to be higher.)

REV_00262125

n127. We do not mean to suggest that an injurer's gain necessarily counts in social welfare if his conduct is undertaken without malice. It may well be that the utility from certain types of non-malicious reprehensible conduct also would be treated as socially illicit. Consider, for example, a person who gets pleasure from "joyriding" on city streets (driving on them at high speed for fun). Our conclusions regarding the appropriateness of punitive damages for malicious conduct would apply to any category of conduct in which an injurer's gain does not count in social welfare.

n128. See, e.g., Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 222 ("The defendant's financial position is ... a consideration essential to a post-judgment critique of a punitive damages award." (citation omitted)). The United States Supreme Court endorsed the Green Oil approach of including the defendant's financial position as one factor to consider in determining whether an award of punitive damages is excessive or inadequate. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 22 (1991). Other state court decisions have endorsed the consideration of wealth in punitive damages assessments. See, e.g., Neal v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 582 P.2d 980, 990 (Cal. 1978) ("Also to be considered is the wealth of the particular defendant; obviously, the function of deterrence ... will not be served if the wealth of the defendant allows him to absorb the award with little or no discomfort."); Ultimate Chem. Co. v. Surface Transp. Int'l, Inc., 658 P.2d 1008, 1012 (Kan. 1983) (stating that among the factors to consider in assessing punitive damages is the "defendant's financial condition").

n129. See, e.g., Ark. Model Jury Instructions 2217 (West Supp. 1995); Cal. Jury Instructions: Civil 14.71 (8th ed. 1994); Wis. Jury Instructions: Civil 1707.1 (1995).

n130. For example, in the Exxon Valdez case, Exxon's wealth was "virtually the exclusive focus of plaintiffs' Phase III [punitive damages] case." In re The Exxon Valdez, No. A89-0095-CV, 1995 WL 527988, at *7 (D. Alaska Jan. 27, 1995). The evidence of Exxon's wealth introduced by the plaintiffs included Exxon's 1990 Annual Report, which claimed that "Exxon's consistently strong earnings performance has enabled the company to achieve and maintain a position of extraordinary financial strength and flexibility. For example, over the past ten years, Exxon's internal cash generation from operations amounted to more than $ 100 billion." Id. at *8 n.16.

n131. Our conclusions about punitive damages and wealth are similar to those of other economically oriented writers on punitive damages. See Abraham & Jeffries, supra note 3, at 415 ("In our view, the defendant's wealth is irrelevant to the goal of deterring socially undesirable conduct ...."); Chapman & Trebilcock, supra note 12, at 824 ("In the case of economic wrongs, the conventional economic theory of deterrence ... suggests no role for corporate wealth in structuring an optimal deterrence regime ...." (footnote omitted)); Cooter, Deterrence, supra note 12, at 1177 (stating that the total assets or wealth of the defendant "is typically inappropriate to deterrence of economically self-interested decisionmakers"); Galligan, supra note 3, at 65 ("Considering the defendant's wealth has simply no articulable efficiency justification."); Gary T. Schwartz, Deterrence and Punishment in the Common Law of Punitive Damages: A Comment, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 133, 140 (1982) ("The wealth of the defendant bears no obvious relationship to deterrence goals ...." (internal quotation marks omitted)).

n132. See supra Part II.

n133. See supra note 29 (describing industries in which productive activity may have declined as a result of liability costs).

n134. Sometimes this view is expressed as a need to send a message to headquarters. See, e.g., Browning-Ferris Indus., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 261 (1989) ("Kelco's attorney urged the jury to return an award of punitive damages, asking the jurors to "deliver a message to Houston [BFI's headquarters].'" (quoting trial transcript)).

REV_00262126

n135. Although we have just emphasized the point that large corporations will take appropriate steps to reduce risk through the delegation of risk-reduction responsibilities, we are not claiming that large corporations will necessarily take the same precautions that small corporations do. They may take different precautions - perhaps greater, perhaps not - as a result of their different organizational and decisionmaking structures. But the precautions taken by large corporations will still be socially appropriate because of the basic principle that parties will behave properly if they are made to pay for the harms their actions cause.

n136. See supra section II.B.

n137. See supra pp. 886-87.

n138. This proposition means, for example, that a poor person would be more averse to a 50% chance of losing $ 100 than a rich person.

n139. The explanation for this claim is that the bearing of risk by uninsured risk-averse individuals makes it socially desirable to reduce damages from the level implied by our formula. See pp. 886-87. Thus, although damages should rise with wealth for the reasons just discussed, the highest level of damages - imposed on the wealthiest individuals, who are presumed to be the least risk averse - should still not exceed the level called for by our formula.

n140. See supra section III.A.

n141. That the value of a dollar declines with the level of wealth is a standard assumption of economists, reflecting the view that individuals first fulfill their most important needs and desires, then spend on successively less important things. See, e.g., Pindyck & Rubinfeld, supra note 39, at 144-45.

n142. See, e.g., Bemer Aviation, Inc. v. Hughes Helicopter, Inc., 621 F. Supp. 290, 300 (E.D. Pa. 1985), aff'd, 802 F.2d 445 (3d Cir. 1986) (stating that, in assessing an award of punitive damages, juries may consider "the potential harm that a defendant's conduct poses"); Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223 (Ala. 1989); Levine v. Knowles, 197 So. 2d 329, 331 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1967) ("The seriousness of the probable result of the defendant's conduct ... is the yardstick for determining the advisability of discouraging such behavior in the future, rather than the seriousness of the damage actually caused.").

n143. The first of the seven Green Oil factors for evaluating punitive damages awards states:

Punitive damages should bear a reasonable relationship to the harm that is likely to occur from the defendant's conduct as well as to the harm that actually has occurred. If the actual or likely harm is slight, the damages should be relatively small. If grievous, the damages should be much greater.

Green Oil, 539 So. 2d at 223 (quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 505 So. 2d 1050, 1062 (Ala. 1987) (Houston, J., concurring specially)).

n144. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21-22 (1991) (endorsing the Green Oil factors); see also TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 460 (1993) ("It is appropriate to consider the magnitude of the potential harm that the defendant's conduct would have caused ....").

n145. "The evidence established that the Exxon Valdez spilled 11,000,000 gallons of crude oil, approximately one-fifth of its cargo. Had the remaining 45,000,000 gallons of oil spilled, the disaster and harm would have been many times greater." In re The Exxon Valdez, No. A89-0095-CV, 1995 WL 527988, at *6 (D. Alaska Jan. 27, 1995).

REV_00262127

n146. For example, Judge Holland observed that more oil might have spilled from the Exxon Valdez, see supra note 145, but he did not mention the possibility that less might have spilled.

n147. To illustrate, imagine the response to the Union Carbide Company if, in the Bhopal disaster in which 4,000 people were killed and thousands of others were injured, see Kenneth J. Cooper, Slums Sprawl in Shadow of Bhopal Gas Leak, Wash. Post, June 27, 1996, at A19, Union Carbide had argued that damages should be reduced because a gas leak of the kind that occurred ordinarily would be expected to kill and injure a much smaller number of people. See also supra note 146 (discussing related issues in the Exxon Valdez case).

n148. In some cases, however, it might be easier to calculate expected or average harm than the particular harm in the case at hand. For example, it might be easier to determine the average value of the contents of a house that burned down than to ascertain the actual value of the contents (because much of the contents may have been consumed in the fire).

n149. This conclusion also would apply if courts attempt to take potential harm into account in some other, less sophisticated, way than by calculating the expected harm.

n150. We have discussed what we believe to be the main arguments bearing on the desirability of taking potential harm into account in calculating damages, but there are other considerations, some of which reinforce our conclusions and some of which do not. Among these additional points, we note two. The first point, which supports our conclusion, is that if damages are based on potential harm rather than on actual harm, the incentive to limit actual harm will be dulled. For example, an oil company would have less incentive to curtail the leakage of oil from a grounded tanker if damages are based on the total amount of oil in the vessel rather than on the amount that actually leaks. The second point, which favors basing punitive damages on potential harm, is that such a policy can reduce the dilution of incentives because of the judgment-proof problem. Specifically, because consideration of potential harm in determining damages means that parties will pay larger amounts than otherwise when actual harm is low, their not being able to pay higher damages when actual harm is high (because of the judgment-proof problem) will tend to be counteracted.

n151. The third Green Oil factor states: "If the wrongful conduct was profitable to the defendant, the punitive damages should remove the profit and should be in excess of the profit, so that the defendant recognizes a loss." Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223 (Ala. 1989) (quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 505 So. 2d 1050, 1062 (Ala. 1987) (Houston, J., concurring)) (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Estate of Hartz v. Nelson, 437 N.W.2d 749, 755-56 (Minn. Ct. App. 1989) (noting that, under Minn. Stat. 549.20 (1994), punitive damages should be measured, in part, by "the profitability of the misconduct to the defendant"); Tindall v. Konitz Contracting, Inc., 783 P.2d 1376, 1382-83 (Mont. 1989) (noting that, under Mont. Code Ann. 27-1-221(7)(b)(iv) (1997), the awarder of punitive damages must consider "the profitability of the defendant's wrongdoing, if applicable").

n152. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 21-22 (1991) (citing favorably the third Green Oil factor).

n153. The arguments that we make in this section do not depend on whether a defendant might escape liability. See infra note 161. Thus, for convenience, we assume here that defendants never escape liability.

REV_00262128

n154. Although there has been some scholarly discussion regarding whether to base liability on harm or gain, the points developed in this literature differ from the points that we present here. Our focus, as the reader will see, is on a measure of damages equal to the greater of gain or harm. Previous literature studies the measure of damages equal to the gain and compares it to the measure of damages equal to the harm. See Richard S. Gruner, Just Punishment and Adequate Deterrence for Organizational Misconduct: Scaling Economic Penalties Under the New Corporate Sentencing Guidelines, 66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 225, 234-66 (1992); Jeffrey S. Parker, Criminal Sentencing Policy for Organizations: The Unifying Approach of Optimal Penalties, 26 Am. Crim. L. Rev. 513, 552-81 (1989); A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Should Liability Be Based on the Harm to the Victim or the Gain to the Injurer?, 10 J. L. Econ. & Org. 427 (1994); Donald Wittman, Liability for Harm or Restitution for Benefit?, 13 J. Legal Stud. 57 (1984); Donald Wittman, Should Compensation Be Based on Costs or Benefits?, 5 Int'l Rev. Law & Econ. 173 (1985).

n155. If both harm and gain were certain, it would be unlikely that the gain would exceed the harm in a punitive damages case: if the gain is known to exceed the harm, the act would likely be regarded as socially desirable, or at least not one calling for imposition of punitive damages. Hence, we here consider the possibility that harm is uncertain, and below that gain is uncertain. See infra p. 920.

n156. See supra section III.C.

n157. For simplicity, we assume now that harm is certain.

n158. If the expected gain exceeded the harm, imposition of punitive damages would be unlikely.

n159. This statement will be true if the $ 200,000 cost of re-engineering the assembly line is more likely than the $ 800,000 cost, which is what we mean by saying that the cost ordinarily is the lower amount. For then the expected cost will be less than $ 500,000, which is equivalent to saying that the expected gain from not re-engineering the assembly line is less than $ 500,000.

n160. See supra section III.A.

n161. We suggested above in note 153 that the arguments in this section apply without substantial modification to situations in which defendants might escape liability. To illustrate, consider the initial point that imposing damages equal to harm, whatever its magnitude, will cause expected damages to equal expected harm. The analogue of this point when defendants can escape liability is that imposing damages according to our multiplier formula will result in expected damages equal to expected harm, essentially for the reasons given in the text.

n162. See, e.g., Ultimate Chem. Co. v. Surface Transp. Int'l, Inc., 658 P.2d 1008, 1012 (Kan. 1983) ("A jury may also consider ... the probable litigation expenses."); Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 512 A.2d 466, 482 (N.J. 1986) (explaining that "the plaintiff's litigation expenses" is a factor to be considered in determining the size of a punitive damages award).

n163. See supra note 78.

n164. See supra section II.B.

n165. A number of articles on the economics of litigation are relevant to the conclusions that we reach in this section. On the general topic of how to structure the legal system given that litigation is costly, see A. Mitchell Polinsky & Yeon-Koo Che, Decoupling Liability: Optimal Incentives for Care and Litigation, 22 RAND J. Econ. 562 (1991); A. Mitchell Polinsky &

REV_00262129

Daniel L. Rubinfeld, The Welfare Implications of Costly Litigation for the Level of Liability, 17 J. Legal Stud. 151 (1988); Steven Shavell, The Fundamental Divergence Between the Private and the Social Motive To Use the Legal System, 26 J. Legal Stud. 575 (1997) [hereinafter Shavell, Divergence]; Steven Shavell, The Social Versus the Private Incentive To Bring Suit in a Costly Legal System, 11 J. Legal Stud. 333 (1982). See also Friedman, supra note 12 (suggesting that punitive damages may beneficially lower litigation costs by discouraging harmful behavior); Kahan & Tuckman, supra note 12 (addressing specifically the decoupling of punitive damages).

n166. See supra section II.B.

n167. If no suits are brought, deterrence obviously cannot be achieved. But if a positive probability of suit exists, deterrence will be optimal if damages are set according to our formula. There are two reasons, however, that the probability of suit should not be too low, or equivalently, that the level of punitive damages implied by our formula should not be too high. One reason is that high damages impose risk, which lowers social welfare to the extent that parties are risk averse. See generally A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, The Optimal Tradeoff Between the Probability and Magnitude of Fines, 69 Am. Econ. Rev. 880, 884-85 (1979) (demonstrating that risk aversion may make moderate sanctions optimal). The other reason is that high damages might exceed the assets of injurers, rendering the damages ineffective as a deterrent. Assuming that the likelihood of suit is great enough so that neither of these reasons is important, our point is that there is no need for it to be higher in order to accomplish proper deterrence.

n168. Indeed, because litigation is costly, the full social harm due to an accident is the direct harm plus the costs associated with use of the legal system. Hence, for the injurer to have correct incentives, he should, in principle, pay damages equal to the direct harm plus these additional costs. See Shavell, Divergence, supra note 165, at 588. As noted previously, we have ignored this refinement in the text for simplicity. See supra note 18.

n169. This intuitively plausible proposition has been confirmed in research undertaken by scholars at the Institute for Civil Justice at the RAND Corporation. See James S. Kakalik, Patricia A. Ebener, William L.F. Felstiner, Gus W. Haggstrom & Michael G. Shanley, Variation in Asbestos Litigation Compensation and Expenses 86-91 (Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp., No. R-3132-ICJ, 1984).

n170. When we use the term "decoupling," we presume that the defendant pays more than the plaintiff receives, even though, as a logical matter, the plaintiff could be awarded more than the defendant pays.

n171. Because some of the damages paid by defendants go to the state, plaintiffs' incentives to sue will lessen. However, the punitive damages amount determined by our formula will automatically rise to reflect any decrease in the probability of suit. Thus, the expected damages borne by defendants will not decline if our formula for punitive damages is applied.

n172. See generally BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1619 app. (1996) (Ginsburg, J., dissenting) (listing state provisions that allocate a portion of punitive damages awards to state agencies). Although the statutes that describe these allocation arrangements do not use the term "decoupling," this term is employed in some of the economic literature analyzing litigation. See, e.g., Polinsky & Che, supra note 165, at 562.

n173. See Iowa Code Ann. 668A.1(2)(b) (West 1987); Kan. Stat. Ann. 60-3402(e) (1994).

n174. The seventh Green Oil factor states: "If there have been other civil actions against the same defendant, based on the same conduct, this should be taken into account in

REV_00262130

The preceding possibilities - engaging excessively or inadequately in activities that cause harm - are realistic. For instance, some studies indicate that much of the harm from automobile pollution is not reflected in the price of gasoline or automobiles. [27] Hence, individuals will tend to drive too much. [28] Conversely, some evidence suggests that manufacturers of certain socially desirable products - for example, [*883] childhood vaccines - may have stopped selling their products because of the prospect of damages exceeding harm. [29]

We have now explained the fundamental reasons that damages should equal harm under strict liability. We next discuss why we assume that damages should equal harm under the negligence rule.

By definition of the negligence rule, if a potential injurer fails to take proper precautions - does not meet the negligence standard - he is said to be negligent and must pay damages. [30] The economic interpretation of the proper negligence standard involves comparing the cost of taking the precaution with the expected reduction in harm that results from taking it: if the former amount is less than the latter, the precaution should be taken and the failure to do so is negligent. [31] It would be negligent not to take a precaution costing $ 50,000 that would prevent a harm of $ 100,000. [*884]

Under the negligence rule, if damages equal harm, potential injurers will be led to comply with the negligence standard (assuming that it is chosen properly) and thus to take appropriate precautions. If a precaution costing $ 50,000 would prevent a harm of $ 100,000, the threat of having to pay damages of $ 100,000 for not taking the precaution would induce a party to spend $ 50,000 on the precaution. However, if damages are less than harm, the negligence standard might not be met and underdeterrence would result. In the example, if damages are only $ 40,000 (even though harm is $ 100,000), the party would not be led to take the precaution costing $ 50,000. [32] Conversely, if damages exceed harm, a potential injurer will have a stronger motive to meet the negligence standard than if damages equal harm. If damages are $ 200,000 (even though harm is $ 100,000), a party will have a greater incentive to spend $ 50,000 on the precaution than if damages are $ 100,000. But he will not take more precautions than are required to meet the negligence standard, assuming that the negligence determination is not erroneous. In the absence of errors, a party has no incentive to do more than satisfy the negligence standard, even if the damages that would be imposed if negligence is found far exceed the harm, because there is no chance that such damages will be imposed against him.

Realistically, however, errors will occur in the negligence determination, which suggests that damages exceeding harm could lead to excessive precautions. For several reasons, parties attempting to act non-negligently may be found liable under the negligence rule. Notably, they may inaccurately assess what the negligence standard is, or courts may inaccurately observe the parties' behavior and find them negligent when they were not. Because of the risk of mistakes, parties may well have an incentive to take greater precautions than they otherwise would have, in order to reduce the chance that they will incorrectly be found negligent. [33] If, as a result, they take socially excessive precau- [*885] tions, raising the level of damages imposed on them will only exacerbate this problem.

Next, consider the relationship between damages and the level of activity under the negligence rule. In this regard, observe that, in the absence of mistakes, the negligence rule may result in parties participating in risky activities to a socially excessive extent. [34] This excessive participation results because, once a party takes the precautions required by the negligence standard, he will not be found liable for any harms that he causes. For example, a person who drives with reasonable care will not be found negligent, and therefore will not have to pay for any harm caused by his driving; consequently, he will drive more than is socially desirable. Or a manufacturer that takes appropriate care in the design of its product mitigation of the punitive damages award." Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 224 (Ala. 1989) (quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 505 So. 2d 1050, 1062 (Ala. 1987) (Houston, J., concurring specially). The United States Supreme Court endorsed the Green Oil test in Haslip. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 22 (1991). This factor is echoed in the Restatement:

REV_00262068

Another factor that may affect the amount of punitive damages is the existence of multiple claims by numerous persons affected by the wrongdoer's conduct. It seems appropriate to take into consideration both the punitive damages that have been awarded in prior suits and those that may be granted in the future, with greater weight being given to the prior awards.

Restatement (Second) of Torts 908 cmt. e (1979). However, when the harm that originates from the defendant's conduct is repetitive, as in Gore, it is not clear whether prior judgments against the defendant would be taken into account. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1607 (1996) (Breyer, J., concurring) (noting that the existence of prior actions was not a factor in Gore).

n175. It is not just the number of prior suits that matters to the punitive damages multiplier in a case. The magnitude of the awards in prior suits matters as well. The higher the prior awards, everything else being equal, the lower punitive damages should be in the case in question, because the goal of deterrence is to make the injurer's payments equal to the total harm.

n176. If courts overestimate the likelihood of suit in the future, punitive damages will be lower than they should be in the case at hand. This problem can be corrected, however, by raising punitive damages in future cases. See infra note 179.

n177. See Margaret I. Lyle, Note, Mass Tort Claims and the Corporate Tortfeasor: Bankruptcy Reorganization and Legislative Compensation Versus the Common-Law Tort System, 61 Tex. L. Rev. 1297, 1349 n.250 (1983) (suggesting that a court might order "an equitable stay on collection of a punitive damage award for a number of years if it seems likely that the collection of too many of these awards early in the litigation of a mass tort might deprive later plaintiffs of compensatory damages").

n178. For example, a termination date might be the expiration of the statute of limitations period for the bringing of suits.

n179. Conversely, if the funds in the escrow account are exhausted before the termination date, a defendant could be made to pay additional punitive damages so that his total payments over time to the escrow account equal the total harm caused.

n180. The sixth Green Oil factor states: "If criminal sanctions have been imposed on the defendant for his conduct, this should be taken into account in mitigation of the punitive damages award." Green Oil Co. v. Hornsby, 539 So. 2d 218, 223-24 (Ala. 1989) (quoting Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 505 So. 2d 1050, 1062 (Ala. 1987) (Houston, J., concurring specially)). The United States Supreme Court has endorsed the use of this factor. See Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 22 (1991).

n181. In Gore, the Court expressed this as follows: "Comparing the punitive damages award and the civil or criminal penalties that could be imposed for comparable misconduct provides a third indicium of excessiveness." BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1603 (1996).

Lower courts have applied this standard. For example, in Lee v. Edwards, 101 F.3d 805 (2d Cir. 1996), the court found that punitive damages of $ 200,000 awarded by the jury in a 1983 claim were excessive. See id. at 813. In reducing the award to $ 75,000 (if plaintiff agreed to remittitur), the court noted the plaintiff's assertion that the defendant's conduct "could have exposed him to a charge of making a false statement"; if convicted, the defendant "would have faced imprisonment of up to one year and/or a fine of up to $ 2,000." Id. at 811. The court noted that although imprisonment is "a serious sanction, ... the maximum fine of $ 2,000 gives little warning that the offense could entail a $ 200,000 civil award." Id. The award of $ 75,000 was justified in part because the defendant was a police officer and therefore on "notice as to the gravity of misconduct under color of his official authority." Id. Also, in Management Computer Services, Inc. v. Hawkins, Ash, Baptie & Co., 557 N.W.2d 67 (Wis. 1996), involving the unauthorized copying and use of computer software, the court reduced a punitive damages award from $ 1.75 million to $ 650,000. See id. at 83. As part of its Gore analysis, the court noted that the defendant's wrongdoing resulted in damages of $ 65,000 to the plaintiff, and that "the potential criminal penalty for copying computer programs if the damage is greater than $ 2,500 is a fine not exceeding $ 10,000." Id. at 82-83.

REV_00262131

n182. This statement presumes for simplicity that the outcomes of the private and the public suits are identical - they either both succeed or they both fail. Otherwise, the proper adjustment of the amount implied by our formula does not necessarily involve simply subtracting the amount paid as a public penalty. To illustrate, consider the following example. Suppose that the harm suffered by the victim is $ 5000 and that the injurer has a 10% chance of being found liable as a result of a private suit. Suppose also that the government will impose a $ 1000 fine on the injurer with certainty. (It is not essential to this example that the fine is certain, only that it is imposed with a higher probability than the private plaintiff's probability of prevailing against the defendant.) Let A be the amount awarded to the private plaintiff if he prevails, with A set such that the defendant's combined expected public and private payments equal the harm caused. In other words, A is set such that $ 1000 + .1A = $ 5000. Solving for A yields $ 40,000 as the proper private award. If instead our formula were applied and the public penalty were simply subtracted from the amount implied by our formula, the private award would be $ 49,000: the $ 50,000 award implied by our formula (= $ 5000/.1), less the $ 1000 public penalty.

n183. The point of this paragraph - that public penalties can serve as useful guidelines for the setting of punitive damages - is discussed by Cooter, Deterrence, cited above in note 12, at 1179-80.

n184. A different type of circularity could result in excessive deterrence. Suppose the legislature sets public penalties at high levels because it expects inadequate use of punitive damages. If the courts then impose substantial punitive damages because public penalties are high, deterrence could be excessive.

n185. See 2 Stuart M. Speiser, Charles F. Krause & Alfred W. Gans, The American Law of Torts 8:64, at 297 (Supp. 1997); Robert W. Wood, Taxation of Damage Awards and Settlement Payments P 6.292, at 6-14 to 6-15 (1991 & Supp. 1996).

n186. See Wood, supra note 185, P 6.6, at 6-31.

n187. Because our focus is on properly deterring potential injurers, we do not consider the tax treatment of plaintiffs' receipts of punitive damages awards. However, whether punitive damages are taxable income to the recipient may affect a plaintiff's incentive to sue. In this indirect way, the tax treatment of the receipt of punitive damages might affect deterrence.

n188. See I.P.L. Png & Eric M. Zolt, Efficient Deterrence and the Tax Treatment of Monetary Sanctions, 9 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 209, 209 (1989) (noting the different possible tax treatments of monetary sanctions and arguing that, to avoid overdeterrence, monetary sanctions should be deductible or the amount of the sanction should be adjusted to account for the offender's tax rate); Eric M. Zolt, Deterrence Via Taxation: A Critical Analysis of Tax Penalty Provisions, 37 UCLA L. Rev. 343, 364-68 (1989) (expanding on the analysis presented in the Png & Zolt article).

REV_00262132

n189. To demonstrate this point, let C be the cost of the precaution, H the harm, and T the tax rate. Ideally, the precaution should be taken if C < H. If both the precaution cost and damages are deductible, the firm will take the precaution if (1 - T)C < (1 - T)H, which is equivalent to C < H. But if damages are not deductible, the firm will take the precaution if (1 - T)C < H, which is equivalent to C < H/(1 - T). Thus, if H = $ 10,000 and T = .4, the firm would be willing to spend up to $ 10,000/(1 - .4) = $ 16,667 to eliminate the harm. In other words, for every dollar of harm, the firm would be induced to spend up to $ 1/(1 - .4) = $ 1.67 to eliminate it. Hence, damages appear to be one-and-two-thirds more important to eliminate than they would be if they were deductible.

Note that the logic of our discussion in the text implies that, if damages were not deductible but were reduced appropriately, the firm could be induced to take optimal precautions. If the tax rate is 40% and the harm is $ 10,000, reducing damages to $ 6000 and not allowing damages to be deductible would be equivalent to keeping damages at $ 10,000 but allowing their deductibility. Reducing damages by the precise amount that would be necessary to avoid distortions is functionally equivalent to allowing deductibility. But a policy of allowing deductibility may be preferable on administrative grounds because it obviates the need to determine the defendant's marginal tax bracket in order to calculate damages properly.

n190. For instance, in the example that we considered in which the harm is $ 10,000, suppose that the defendant is caught one time out of three, so that a third of the time he pays $ 30,000, consisting of $ 10,000 in compensatory damages and $ 20,000 in punitive damages. If the punitive damages component is not deductible and the defendant is in a 40% tax bracket, his after-tax liability cost if a judgment is rendered against him is $ 26,000 (the sum of an after-tax cost of $ 6000 associated with the compensatory damages component and an after-tax cost of $ 20,000 associated with the punitive damages component). Because there is a one-third chance that he will bear this amount, his expected after-tax liability cost is $ 8667 (that is, $ 26,000 divided by 3). Because his precaution expenditures are deductible and he is in a 40% tax bracket, he would be willing to spend up to one-and-two-thirds of this amount in order to avoid this liability cost. In other words, he would be willing to spend up to $ 14,445 (= (5/3) X $ 8667). But the harm is only $ 10,000, so many instances could arise in which he will be induced to spend substantially more than $ 10,000 in order to avoid imposing a harm of $ 10,000 - a socially wasteful outcome caused by the non-deductibility of punitive damages.

n191. Under the federal tax code, taxable corporate income in excess of $ 75,000, but not in excess of $ 10 million, is taxed at a 34% rate. See 26 U.S.C. 11(b)(1)(C) (1994). Taxable corporate income in excess of $ 10 million is taxed at a 35% rate. See id. 11(b)(1)(D). The use of a 40% tax rate as an illustration in the text is reasonable in light of the additional state income taxes that corporations often have to pay. See, e.g., Cal. Rev. & Tax. Code 23151(e) (West Supp. 1997) (8.84% of net income for 1997 and beyond); 35 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/201(b)(7), (d) (West 1996) (7.3% of net income); N.Y. Tax Law 210.1(a) (McKinney 1986 & Supp. 1997) (9% of net income).

n192. The explanation for why the injurer would be induced to spend up to one-and-two-thirds of the harm now is complicated by the fact that the fraction of total damages that is accounted for by punitive damages - and therefore the portion of total damages that is not deductible - depends on the chance of escaping liability. In note 190, above, we showed that, if the chance of catching the injurer is one in three, he would be induced to spend $ 14,445 in order to prevent a harm of $ 10,000 - that is, 1.44 times the harm. By similar logic, it can be demonstrated that if the chance of detection is sufficiently small - so that nearly all of the damages paid by the injurer are punitive damages and not deductible - the injurer will be induced to spend up to 1.67 times the harm to prevent it.

REV_00262133

n193. A majority of jurisdictions follow the approach exemplified in Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Insurance Co., 383 S.W.2d 1 (Tenn. 1964), under which punitive damages are insurable. See id. at 5; see also Ellis, supra note 12, at 71 (noting that most, though not all, courts have held that punitive damages are insurable). In general, however, insureds cannot indemnify themselves against punitive damages assessed for intentional misconduct. See, e.g., Harrell v. Travelers Indem. Co., 567 P.2d 1013, 1017-19 (Or. 1977) (en banc). A minority of jurisdictions follow the approach taken in Northwestern Nat'l Cas. Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432 (5th Cir. 1962), under which insurance coverage of punitive damages is disallowed because it would violate public policy (on the ground that such coverage would permit wrongdoers to escape punishment and also would compromise deterrence). See id. at 442. Even these jurisdictions, however, generally allow insurance coverage of punitive damages in cases of vicarious liability. See, e.g., Ohio Cas. Ins. Co. v. Welfare Fin. Co., 75 F.2d 58, 59-60 (8th Cir. 1934). For further discussion of the insurability of punitive damages, and summaries of the relevant law among the states, see generally Robert G. Schloerb, Richard L. Blatt, Robert W. Hammesfahr & Lori S. Nugent, Punitive Damages: A Guide to the Insurability of Punitive Damages in the United States and Its Territories 32-46, 61-308 (1988); 2 Schlueter & Redden, cited above in note 74, 17.2, at 233-47; 2 Speiser, Krause & Gans, cited above in note 185, 8:54, at 907.

n194. For economically oriented discussion of the question of the social desirability of liability insurance for punitive damages, see Chapman & Trebilcock, cited above in note 12, at 821-22; Cooter, Deterrence, cited above in note 12, at 1182-85; Ellis, cited above in note 12, at 71-76; and Priest, Insurability, cited above in note 12, at 1011-14.

n195. The argument in this paragraph is based on Shavell, cited above in note 41, which first formally analyzed the social desirability of liability insurance. See also Shavell, supra note 14, at 206-27 (extending the argument). These references show that, in the standard model of accidents, both injurers and victims will be made better off if the sale of liability insurance is permitted.

n196. Victims might not be fully compensated if their losses are nonmonetary because, among other reasons, full compensation may be impossible (for instance, if the loss is of a person's life). Victims may not be compensated at all under the negligence rule because the injurer may not have been negligent.

n197. See Shavell, supra note 14, at 251-52.

n198. To illustrate, suppose that a risk-averse firm with direct production costs of $ 20 per unit purchases liability insurance whose premium equals the expected damages of $ 10 per unit of the product sold. In a competitive environment, the price of the product will equal $ 30, including the $ 10 liability insurance cost. If the firm cannot purchase liability insurance, the price it charges must not only compensate it for the $ 10 in expected damages it bears directly, but also for being subject to risk - something it does not like, being risk averse. Thus, the price of the product would have to exceed $ 30 for the firm to be willing to sell it.

n199. Before discussing this complication, we want to observe that a common view is that, if there is a chance that injurers will be unable to pay for harm, liability insurance is socially desirable because it enhances the ability of victims to collect damages from injurers. We do not consider this reason for liability insurance to be a strong one; as we have noted previously, we believe that first-party insurance is a superior way to provide compensation to victims because it is administratively cheaper than the tort system. See supra note 15.

n200. The conclusions of this paragraph are based on an economic analysis of the judgment-proof problem and insurance in Steven Shavell, The Judgment Proof Problem, 6

REV_00262134

Int'l Rev. Law & Econ. 45 (1986), which is distilled in Shavell, cited above in note 14, at 240-43.

n201. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1593 (1996); see also Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Harris, 630 So. 2d 1018, 1022 (Ala. 1994) (customer harmed from self-installed gas water heater); Moore v. Jewel Tea Co., 253 N.E.2d 636, 639 (Ill. App. Ct. 1969) (customer harmed when unopened can of drain cleaner exploded), aff'd, 263 N.E.2d 103 (Ill. 1970); Leibeck v. McDonald's Corp., No. CV-93-2419 (N.M. Dist. Ct. 1994) (customer burned by hot coffee).

n202. This difference is not emphasized, for example, in any of the major United States Supreme Court cases on punitive damages. See Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1589; Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991); Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989). The Gore Court, however, mentioned the market relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant as a factor that would lessen the need for affirmative disclosure requirements "because the self-interest of those involved in the automobile trade in developing and maintaining the goodwill of their customers will motivate them to make voluntary disclosures or to refrain from selling cars that do not comply with self-imposed standards." Gore, 116 S. Ct. at 1596.

n203. The Restatement (Second) of Torts does not mention this distinction explicitly, nor do commentators. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 908-909 (1977); James D. Ghiardi & John J. Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice (1985), Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74. This distinction is also absent from cases that provide factors for the jury to consider in determining the amount of punitive damages. See, e.g., Estate of Hartz v. Nelson, 437 N.W.2d 749, 755-56 (Minn. Ct. App. 1989); Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 512 A.2d 466, 481-82 (N.J. 1986).

n204. To the extent that liability is unnecessary to promote product safety, imposing liability would be redundant and the costs associated with litigation would be socially wasteful.

n205. Craswell discusses the role of damages multipliers in market relationships, although he does not emphasize the point that we do - that producers have a market-based incentive to be attentive to the risk of harm to their customers. See Craswell, supra note 12.

n206. For the view that consumers are not well informed about product risks, see Howard Latin, "Good" Warnings, Bad Products, and Cognitive Limitations, 41 UCLA L. Rev. 1193, 1234 (1994). Latin argues that knowledge of "the great majority of product risks cannot be available to product users." Id.

n207. Daughety and Reinganum study the role of punitive damages in reducing product risks when consumers do not have direct information about the risks. See Daughety & Reinganum, Products Liability, supra note 12; Daughety & Reinganum, Settlement, supra note 12.

n208. See Patricia M. Danzon, Comments on Landes and Posner: A Positive Economic Analysis of Products Liability, 14 J. Legal Stud. 569, 572 (1985) (arguing that the cost of obtaining information about product hazards could be low in many circumstances and that the value of such information is high for consumer goods that are purchased repeatedly, durable consumer goods, and producer goods); Alan Schwartz, Proposals for Products Liability Reform: A Theoretical Synthesis, 97 Yale L.J. 353, 380 (1988) (arguing that "evidence drawn from surveys and actual market behavior more strongly supports the view that consumers are informed than the view that they are ignorant"). Even if consumer information about the risks of products and services is not widespread, markets may work reasonably well if a sufficiently large fraction of the population of potential consumers is well-informed. See Alan Schwartz & Louis L. Wilde, Intervening in Markets on the Basis of Imperfect Information: A Legal and Economic Analysis, 127 U. Pa. L. Rev. 630, 637-39 (1979).

REV_00262135

n209. For example, we would expect problems with automobiles, as in Gore, see supra p. 901, to come to the attention of consumers through stories in newspapers, evaluations in Consumer Reports, and the like.

n210. A similar conclusion applies when the victims of accidents are employees, rather than customers. To the degree that employees are aware of workplace risks, they will insist on higher wages (or seek employment elsewhere). Thus, market forces will tend to induce employers to increase workplace safety even in the absence of liability.

n211. Although punitive damages traditionally are not awarded in contract cases, exceptions often are made when the wrongful conduct is also considered to be a tort. See 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 7.2, at 371, 7.3(A), at 377.

n212. See id. 7.0, at 369 ("Over the last twenty years, the courts have broken down the traditional doctrinal barriers between contracts and torts. The result is a growing list of exceptions to the general rule and a growing recognition of punitive damages within the law of contracts."); see also Mark Pennington, Punitive Damages for Breach of Contract: A Core Sample from the Decisions of the Last Ten Years, 42 Ark. L. Rev. 31, 46-60 (1989) (noting departures from the traditional rule against awarding punitive damages for breach of contract); John A. Sebert, Jr., Punitive and Nonpecuniary Damages in Actions Based upon Contract: Toward Achieving the Objective of Full Compensation, 33 UCLA L. Rev. 1565, 1600-47 (1986) (noting a trend toward allowing punitive damages in contract cases).

n213. See 2 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 13.3(B), at 118 (discussing punitive damages in the employment context); id. 17.3(A), at 247-49, 17.4(A), at 266 (discussing punitive damages in insurance cases with respect to contract theories).

n214. Several commentators have discussed the general economic role of punitive damages in breach of contract disputes. See, e.g., Daniel A. Farber, Reassessing the Economic Efficiency of Compensatory Damages for Breach of Contract, 66 Va. L. Rev. 1443 (1980); Barry Perlstein, Crossing the Contract-Tort Boundary: An Economic Argument for the Imposition of Extracompensatory Damages for Opportunistic Breach of Contract, 58 Brook. L. Rev. 877 (1992); Alan Schwartz, The Myth That Promisees Prefer Supracompensatory Remedies: An Analysis of Contracting for Damage Measures, 100 Yale L.J. 369, 370-72, 395-405 (1990).

n215. The argument that we are about to make, that parties might benefit from imposition of punitive damages, also means that they might benefit from including a penalty clause in their contract - that is, an extracompensatory level of damages for breach. In practice, however, provisions detailing the damages paid in the event of breach - liquidated damage clauses - are not enforced by courts if they are determined to exceed compensatory damages. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts 356 (1979) (stating that a liquidated damages clause will be enforced if the contract specifies "an amount that is reasonable in the light of the anticipated or actual loss caused by the breach and the difficulties of proof of loss," but "[a] term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages is unenforceable on grounds of public policy as a penalty"); see also U.C.C. 2-718(1) (1996) (allowing for liquidated damages provisions but rendering them void if unreasonably large).

n216. To illustrate, suppose that: (a) each light will definitely fail at some time during the year; (b) the value to the city of timely repair of a light is $ 50; (c) the cost to the contractor of assuring timely repair is $ 25; (d) the cost to the contractor of less-than-timely repairs is $

REV_00262136

5 (the contractor does not have to check lights as frequently); (e) the likelihood that the city detects a breach (the contractor's failure to repair a light on a timely basis) is 20%; (f) the city's payment to the contractor is $ 35 per light per year; and (g) the damages for breach are compensatory, equal to $ 50 (the value of timely repair).

Note that the contractor will not be induced to spend an extra $ 20 - $ 25 instead of $ 5 - to assure timely repair, because the extra cost to assure timely repair, $ 20, exceeds the expected damages per light of $ 10 (= 20% X $ 50). Thus, the contractor's profit per light will be $ 20 - the city's payment of $ 35, less the $ 5 cost of repairs and the $ 10 expected damage payment. The city's total cost per light is $ 75 - its $ 35 payment to the contractor, plus its $ 50 loss of value as a result of the contractor's failure to repair the light on a timely basis, less the $ 10 it receives in expected damage payments.

We want to show that both parties can benefit if punitive damages of $ 200 are also imposed for breach, so that total damages now are $ 250. Given this level of total damages, the contractor will assure timely repair because the expected damages of $ 50 (= 20% X $ 250) exceed the extra cost of assuring timely repair, $ 20. Consequently, no breach will occur, and no damages will actually be paid. Because timely repair is assured, the city will be willing to pay the contractor more. Suppose the payment is raised to $ 55 per light. Then the contractor's profits per light will be $ 30 ($ 55 less the $ 25 cost of repair), so he will be better off (because his profits had been $ 20 per light). The city's cost per light now will be $ 55 (just the fee), so it will be better off too (because its cost had been $ 75).

The source of the mutual benefit for the parties is the threat of $ 200 in punitive damages, which induces the contractor to create a $ 50 benefit for the city at only an extra $ 20 cost to itself. This enables the city to make a payment sufficiently higher to make the contractor better off and still leave itself better off.

n217. We should distinguish the present discussion from that in the previous section, which concerned injured parties who were customers. There we assumed that buyers' knowledge of product risks might induce sellers to take appropriate precautions. Here we are not making the analogous assumption. In our present example, we did not consider the possibility that the contractor would repair street lights on a timely basis out of a concern that his business reputation might otherwise suffer. Rather, we implicitly assumed that the prospect of damages for breach of contract is needed to motivate the contractor to repair lights on a timely basis.

n218. More generally, whenever a party buys a large quantity of a product and does not inspect every unit to determine whether the product complies with the specifications in the contract, a problem of detecting a breach can arise.

n219. For example, courts have awarded punitive damages in contract cases in which there exists a "special relationship between the parties." 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 7.3 (A), at 388 (internal quotation marks omitted). These relationships include: "bank and depositor, employer and employee, franchiser and franchisee, lawyer and client, public utility and customer, and security broker and customer." Id. 7.3(A), at 386 (footnotes omitted). The courts argue that punitive damages are appropriate because one party has greater bargaining power. See id. 7.3(A), at 385. But this superior position, in and of itself, does not suggest that the party with the upper hand will escape liability for a breach of contract.

n220. See Chapman & Trebilcock, supra note 12, at 768-69 (suggesting that punitive damages serve as a means of compensating for dignitary loss); Ellis, supra note 12, at 3 (noting that compensating victims for otherwise uncompensable losses and paying the plaintiff's legal fees are reasons often cited by legal commentators and courts for imposing punitive damages); Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages in Iowa Law: A Critical Assessment, 66 Iowa L. Rev. 1003, 1007, 1010 (1981) (noting the use of punitive damages as compensation for nonpecuniary harms); Galligan, supra note 3, at 40-83 (emphasizing that compensatory damages generally should be augmented to reflect otherwise missing elements of harm); David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1257, 1295-96 (1976) ("Punitive damages do indeed play an important - even if usually residual - compensatory role.").

REV_00262137

n221. See 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 2.2, at 27. For example, in Connecticut, "exemplary damages cannot exceed plaintiff's expenses, and therefore, in fact and effect are considered compensatory." Id. 2.2, at 27 n.1 (citing Doroszka v. Lavine, 150 A. 692, 692-93 (Conn. 1930), and Craney v. Donovan, 102 A. 640, 641 (Conn. 1917)). In Michigan, "exemplary damages are granted to compensate the plaintiff and not to punish the defendant." Id. (citing Oppenhuizen v. Wennersten, 139 N.W.2d 765, 770 (Mich. Ct. App. 1966)).

n222. More precisely, the principle would be to include a multiple of the missing component, with the multiplier determined by the defendant's chance of escaping liability.

n223. The costs of estimating such elements of harm on a case-by-case basis could be largely avoided, however, if courts were to use a table listing standard values of the missing components. This method would be an inexpensive (essentially costless) way to include missing components of damages, and it would be preferable to excluding them.

n224. Juries are given broad discretion over the award of punitive damages. See 1 Ghiardi & Kircher, supra note 203, 5.38, at 132 ("It is a generally accepted rule that once a court determines that the evidence merits submission of the punitive damages issue to the jury, it is entirely within the discretion of the jury to determine whether those damages should be awarded and to determine the amount which should be awarded."); 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 6.1(A), at 331 (referring to the jury as "less restricted in awarding punitive damages than in awarding compensatory damages").

n225. See Eisenberg, Goerdt, Ostrom, Rottman & Wells, supra note 3, at 633 (finding that punitive damages are awarded in approximately 6% of the cases in which plaintiffs prevail).

n226. See, e.g., Lightning v. Roadway Express, Inc., 60 F.3d 1551, 1559 (11th Cir. 1995) ("In determining the reasonableness of an award of punitive damages, courts should consider whether ... the misconduct caused personal injury or merely damage to property ...."); Eisert v. Greenberg Roofing & Sheet Metal Co., 314 N.W.2d 226, 229 (Minn. 1982) (stating that the nature of the plaintiff's injury "may reasonably be taken into account in deciding where punitive damages will be allowed .... Where that injury is limited to property damage, the public interest in punishment and deterrence is largely satisfied by the plaintiff's recovery of compensatory damages."); 1 Schlueter & Redden, supra note 74, 9.5(A), at 536 ("Courts distinguish between whether property damage or personal injury was the result of the defendant's wrongdoing.").

n227. BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589, 1599 (1996).

n228. In this context, by the proper amount of compensatory damages, we mean the amount of damages that induces a potential injurer to take optimal precautions to prevent personal injury. This amount might not compensate the victim for an injury - indeed, such compensation might be impossible, as in the case of loss of life. Thus, the term "compensatory damages" may be a misnomer when applied to personal injuries, but we employ it because it is used to describe the usual level of damages.

n229. Notably, compensatory damages in wrongful death cases are generally calculated as a survivor's financial loss. See Charles T. McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Damages 93-106, at 335-74 (1935). This amount usually will not lead to proper deterrence. For example, if a child or a non-working spouse is killed, the financial loss will be low, but the event will be one for which expensive preventive measures are justified to reduce risk. Such measures may not be taken if damages are based solely on the financial loss. For discussion of this and related points about the distinction between optimal compensation for non-monetary losses and optimal deterrence, see Shavell, supra note 14, at 228-35; Philip J. Cook & Daniel A. Graham, The Demand for Insurance and Protection: The Case of Irreplaceable Commodities, 91 Q.J. Econ. 143, 144-55 (1977); and A. Michael Spence, Consumer Misperceptions, Product Failure, and Producer Liability, 64 Rev. Econ. Stud. 561, 563-71 (1977).

REV_00262138

n230. See Viscusi, supra note 29, at 108 (using the observed risk-dollar tradeoff of blue-collar workers to calculate that the implicit value of life is between $ 3 million and $ 6 million); Michael J. Moore & W. Kip Viscusi, The Quality-Adjusted Value of Life, 26 Econ. Inquiry 369, 386 (1988) (finding an implicit value of life of $ 6 million).

n231. See, e.g., James S. Kakalik, Elizabeth M. King, Michael Trayner, Patricia A. Ebner & Larry Picus, Costs and Compensation Paid in Aviation Accident Litigation (Institute for Civil Justice, RAND Corp., No. R-3421-ICJ, 1988). In this study of 25 major airline accidents occurring between 1970 and 1984, see id. at 4, the authors calculated that the average compensation for airline accident deaths was $ 321,300 from 1970 to 1976, and $ 408,500 from 1977 to 1982 (measured in constant 1986 dollars), see id. at 20. See also Randall R. Bovbjerg, Frank A. Sloan & James F. Blumstein, Valuing Life and Limb in Tort: Scheduling "Pain and Suffering", 83 Nw. U. L. Rev. 908, 920-23 (1989) (surveying Florida and Kansas City jury verdicts and finding the median loss of life award to be $ 620,000, and the mean loss of life award to be $ 1,224,000).

n232. We here presume that problems of implementation, or considerations of cost, do not subvert this recommendation. If they do, a table of standard values for different types of personal injuries could be used instead. See supra note 223.

n233. Although the conclusion of this section is that, given the goal of deterrence, the award of punitive damages should not depend on whether the plaintiff's harm involved personal injury, the conclusion might be different with respect to the punishment objective. Notably, when personal injury occurs, members of society may well experience a stronger desire to see the defendant punished than when the harm caused by the defendant is purely economic.

n234. For example, the issue of externalizing risk is not mentioned in any of the recent major Supreme Court cases discussing punitive damages. See BMW of N. Am., Inc. v. Gore, 116 S. Ct. 1589 (1996); Honda Motor Co. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994); TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993); Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1 (1991); Browning-Ferris Indus., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257 (1989).

n235. See Restatement (Second) of Torts 409 (1965) ("Employer of an independent contractor is not liable for physical harm caused to another by an act or omission of the contractor or his servants."); Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts, supra note 30, 71, at 509 ("For the torts of an independent contractor, ... it has long been said to be the general rule that there is no vicarious liability upon the employer.").

n236. However, this strategy may not always work. For example, in Kenney v. Scientific, Inc., 497 A.2d 1310 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1985), the court held the defendant liable for an independent contractor's transportation of toxic waste. See id. at 1323-24. The court stated that "[a] company which creates the Frankenstein monster of abnormally dangerous waste should not expect to be relieved of accountability for the depredations of its creature merely because the company entrusts the monster's care to another, even an independent contractor." Id. at 1320-21. Notwithstanding such exceptions, we will address situations in which it is possible to shift liability by hiring an independent contractor.

REV_00262139

n237. The point of this example holds even if the firm does not have assets sufficient to pay for the full $ 10 million in damages; as long as its assets exceed those of the independent contractor, a potential gain to the firm still exists from externalizing the risk to the contractor. For instance, suppose that the firm has assets of only $ 5 million. Its expected liability would then be $ 250,000(= 5% X $ 5 million), which still exceeds the independent contractor's expected liability of $ 50,000. Thus, the firm will continue to have an incentive to externalize its risk. (The general condition for when it will be advantageous to the firm to use an independent contractor to externalize its risk is twofold: the contractor's assets must be less than the firm's, and there must exist a positive probability that the judgment will exceed the contractor's assets.)

n238. Evidence from the oil industry is consistent with the view that firms have an incentive to externalize some of their liability risks to less well-capitalized independent contractors. For example, after the Exxon Valdez oil spill, Shell shifted some responsibility for the transport of oil from its own tanker fleet to vessels owned by independent contractors. See William J. Cook, An Easy Way Out of This Mess, U.S. News & World Rep., June 25, 1990, at 15; Caleb Solomon & Joann S. Lublin, Tanker Fire Raises Serious Questions About Liabilities in Oil Spills Off U.S., Wall St. J., June 12, 1990, at A3. Such contractors, who might own just a few supertankers (or even only one), generally are vastly smaller than the major oil companies. See Eric Nalder, Oil Firms Trying to Shield Assets from Liability for Costly Spills, Seattle Times, Sept. 26, 1991, at A6 (stating that the assets of independent transporters "are about 25 times smaller than the holdings of the oil giants"). One can think of many other industries, including those involved in the transport or disposal of hazardous materials, in which risks can be externalized to independent contractors that are much smaller than the firms that hire them.

n239. For instance, consider a safety device that would reduce the magnitude of harm from an accident from $ 10 million to $ 5 million. This device would be of value to the firm if the firm is exposed to liability, because it would reduce the firm's expected damages by half; however, the device would be of no value to the independent contractor, for the contractor is only capable of paying $ 1 million. Similarly, consider a safety device that reduces the likelihood of a $ 10 million accident by 1%. This device will be worth $ 100,000 to the firm (= 1% X $ 10 million), so the firm will pay up to $ 100,000 for the device, but it will be worth only $ 10,000 to the independent contractor (= 1% X $ 1 million), so that the contractor might not buy the device when the firm would have.

n240. In the oil industry, for example, it is plausible that tankers owned by independent contractors are more prone to accidents than tankers owned by large oil companies. Compare Cook, supra note 238, at 15 (describing independent tankers as "clunkers" operating under "lax standards" with "badly trained crews"), with Daniel Southerland, Mobilizing the Fleet: Oil Giant Hopes Emphasis on Tanker Safety Also Will Produce Profits, Wash. Post, June 23, 1996, at H1 (emphasizing the high safety standards maintained by Mobil's shipping subsidiary).

n241. For a discussion of the advantages of performing tasks within a firm, rather than delegating them to independent contractors, see, for example, R.H. Coase, The Nature of the Firm, 4 Economica 386, 390-92 (1937); Oliver Hart, Firms, Contracts, and Financial Structure 1-92 (1995); and Jean Tirole, The Theory of Industrial Organization 15-60 (1988).

n242. See supra pp. 910-11.

n243. The only reference to this effect of which we are aware is in Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33 (7th Cir. 1996), in which Chief Judge Posner noted in dictum that "punitive damages are necessary in some cases to make sure that people channel transactions through the market when the costs of voluntary transactions are low." Id. at 34.

REV_00262140

will not be liable under a negligence rule for harms that result if its product nonetheless turns out to be flawed; as a result, too much of the product will tend to be produced. [35]

However, because non-negligent parties sometimes will be found liable by mistake, they will sometimes bear damages. In principle, this erroneous imposition of liability could mitigate the problem that the negligence rule may induce parties to participate in risky activities to an excessive degree. However, finding parties negligent by mistake may result in their bearing damages in excess of the harm they have caused, [36] and thereby discourage their participation in the activity to an inappropriate extent. This effect, if it occurs, will be exacerbated by raising the level of damages.

This discussion of the negligence rule shows that the optimal level of damages is not as easily determined as under the strict liability rule. [*886] Under strict liability, we concluded that damages should equal harm. Under the negligence rule, we have observed that, in the absence of mistakes, damages equal to harm will appropriately encourage parties to take precautions, but so will higher levels of damages. [37] In the presence of mistakes, the optimal level of damages under the negligence rule is difficult to ascertain, although it is clear from what we have said that if damages are set too high, parties will tend to be induced to take excessive precautions; moreover, they will not participate in their activities to an appropriate degree. In the light of the preceding points, and recognizing that there is not a simple, theoretically correct answer to the question of what level of damages is optimal under the negligence rule, we will assume for the purpose of our analysis that optimal damages under the negligence rule equal harm. [38]

This concludes our review of the implications of deterrence theory for the optimal level of damages under the rules of strict liability and negligence when injurers will be found liable with certainty. Because damages should equal harm under the strict liability rule, and because we assume that damages should equal harm under the negligence rule for the reasons given, we generally will not distinguish between the rules in our subsequent discussion.

In passing, we want to note that the principal conclusion reached in this section - that damages should equal harm - depends on how potential injurers respond to risk. We have implicitly assumed that they are risk neutral. This means that, in considering situations of risk, parties care only about the expected value of a risky situation - that is, the magnitude of a potential loss or gain multiplied by the probability of the loss or gain occurring. [39] If injurers are risk averse (they dislike uncertainty itself) [40] and cannot purchase liability insurance, the optimal level of damages tends to be lower than the harm: setting damages below the harm reduces the imposition of risk on in- [*887] jurers, and damages do not need to be as great as the harm to induce injurers to behave appropriately. [41]

Notwithstanding this last point, we will usually assume in our subsequent analysis that, when injurers are found liable for sure, the level of damages that is optimal with respect to deterrence is equal to harm, [42] for two reasons. First, even if parties are risk averse, if they can purchase liability insurance, it can be shown that the optimal level of damages still equals harm. [43] Second, it can be demonstrated that publicly held firms should be treated as approximately risk neutral - implying that damages should equal harm - if their shareholders have well-diversified portfolios, which often, if not usually, will be the case. [44]

B.

Optimal Damages When the Defendant Can Sometimes Escape Liability

The main point that we will develop in this section is that if a defendant can sometimes escape liability for the harm for which he is responsible, the proper magnitude of damages is the harm the defendant has caused, multiplied by a factor reflecting the probability of his n244. The point that inducing market transactions may better lead potential injurers to take harm into account was made by Guido Calabresi and A. Douglas Melamed. See Guido Calabresi & A. Douglas Melamed, Property Rules, Liability Rules, and Inalienability: One View of the Cathedral, 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1089, 1115-24 (1972). This point has been developed by others. See Biggar, supra note 12; Haddock, McChesney & Spiegel, supra note 12; Louis Kaplow & Steven Shavell, Property Rules Versus Liability Rules: An Economic Analysis, 109 Harv. L. Rev. 713 (1996); Landes & Posner, supra note 12.

REV_00262069

n245. In these circumstances, a potential victim would have an incentive to pay a potential injurer not to cause harm. Such a payment might not occur, however. For example, if there are many potential injurers, paying one not to cause harm would not forestall others from causing harm. See Kaplow & Shavell, supra note 244, at 722.

n246. See supra p. 879.

n247. For example, suppose a seller holds out for a high price and ultimately refuses to sell to a potential buyer who places a much greater value on the item at issue. In such circumstances, it may be better to set damages equal to harm and allow the "buyer" to take the item and pay damages than to encourage bargaining. See Calabresi & Melamed, supra note 244, at 1106-07.

n248. If there is a probability of escaping liability, the punitive damages amount that is appropriate for the purpose of encouraging market transactions should itself be inflated according to the multiplier formula that we developed above. See supra section II.B.

n249. See George P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law 6.3.2, at 417 (1978) ("The offender is duty-bound to suffer punishment, for his offense creates an imbalance of benefits and burdens in the society as a whole." (citing Herbert Morris, On Guilt and Innocence 34-36 (1976))); Walter Moberly, The Ethics of Punishment 95 (1968) (stating that, under a retributive theory, "punishment should serve both to express and to deepen the horror with which certain types of action ought to be regarded"); Herbert L. Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction 37 (1968) ("The retributive view [of punishment] rests on the idea that it is right for the wicked to be punished: because man is responsible for his actions, he ought to receive his just deserts."); C.L. Ten, Crime, Guilt, and Punishment: A Philosophical Introduction 2 (1987) ("Punishment involves the infliction of some unpleasantness on the offender ...made to express disapproval or condemnation of the offender's conduct which is a breach of what is regarded as a desirable and obligatory standard of conduct.").

n250. It is not necessary for our purposes to settle on a more refined definition of blameworthiness or culpability.

n251. A formal interpretation of this assumption is that an individual's utility depends on, and increases with, the magnitude of a variable that measures the extent to which a party who committed a reprehensible act is appropriately punished. (To describe this variable - call it V - more precisely, let S denote the level of the actual sanction, let R be the reprehensibility of the act, and let S(R) represent the ideal punishment given R. Then V is higher the closer S is to S(R).) Because social welfare depends on individual welfare, social welfare is advanced by punishing reprehensible parties appropriately.

The relationship between the punishment objective and the deterrence objective is discussed below. See infra notes 272-273 and accompanying text.

n252. It will be evident that, for the most part, our arguments will also hold if the punishment objective derives its force not from individual pleasure and satisfaction at seeing blameworthy parties punished, but from an abstract philosophical principle calling for retribution.

REV_00262141

n253. A qualification to this statement concerns liability insurance. If the punished party is insured, the degree to which he is punished depends on the extent to which his coverage is incomplete (because of, for example, deductibles or coinsurance) and the possibility that his premiums will rise in the future.

n254. A number of authors have discussed the punishment rationale in relation to corporations as entities. See, e.g., Albert W. Alschuler, Ancient Law and the Punishment of Corporations: Of Frankpledge and Deodand, 71 B.U. L. Rev. 307, 312 (1991) (arguing that corporate criminal responsibility is the unwise result of a "superstitious" hatred of the inanimate corporation); V.S. Khanna, Corporate Criminal Liability: What Purpose Does It Serve?, 109 Harv. L. Rev. 1477, 1494 n.91 (1996) (describing "the notion that society has a retributive need so great that it must punish nonhuman entities and label them criminal" as "implausible"); Developments in the Law - Corporate Crime: Regulating Corporate Behavior Through Criminal Sanctions, 92 Harv. L. Rev. 1227, 1237 (1979) ("Even though deterrence clearly plays a critical role in the justification of corporate criminal sanctions, the argument that retribution cannot be involved is unconvincing."). As Christopher Stone notes:

Corporate penalties often impose losses in circumstances when no one appears blameworthy .... True, we allow some of these same innocents to suffer ... when corporate agents wrongfully break a contract or commit a tort .... But it seems one thing to make a blameless investor help absorb ordinary damages ... and quite another thing to reduce his investment further by imposing a penalty.

n255. hristopher D. Stone, The Place of Enterprise Liability in the Control of Corporate Conduct, 90 Yale L.J. 1, 27 (1980).[su' ']For a similar reaction to the idea of corporate punishment, see Alschuler, cited above in note 254, at 312-13.

n256. Because the punishment objective is, according to our approach, derived from the desire of individuals to punish culpable parties, the importance of the view that corporations per se should be punished is an empirical matter, dependent on how many individuals hold this position and how strongly. We would not be surprised to find that many individuals firmly believe that it is proper to punish corporations as entities, but we also suspect that, were these individuals to consider seriously the distinction between that goal and the goal of punishing only culpable employees, they would soften, if not reverse, their position.

n257. Although firms may have difficulty identifying culpable employees for the reasons discussed in this paragraph, imposition of punitive damages might induce firms to take additional steps to discover such individuals. If punitive damages have this effect, their imposition could help to satisfy the punishment objective.

n258. It may be worth elaborating on this point. If employees are risk neutral (which we assume here for simplicity), a firm would seek to make an employee pay for any damages he caused the firm to bear; such a practice would make the employee's incentives to prevent harm correct from the firm's perspective. Thus, if damages are $ 1000, the employee would pay this amount to the firm. But because an employee's assets are limited, the firm's ability to punish an employee will be exhausted as soon as the judgment against the firm exceeds the employee's assets. Thus, if the employee's assets are $ 10,000, no marginal effect of higher damages will occur once the total damages exceed $ 10,000. (The situation just described ignores other possible responses of the firm to higher damages. For example, firms might increase their efforts to detect employee misconduct and thereby increase the expected punishment of employees. But our basic point would still apply.)

n259. However, individuals who have changed jobs or retired might be subject to punishment by their former employer because the employer might be able to sue them for acts done when employed.

REV_00262142

n260. Of course, some other person within the firm may have been responsible for directing the flow of information, but that person also may not have acted culpably.

n261. Other stakeholders of the firm also will suffer, such as unsecured creditors who are less likely to be repaid if the firm's assets are diminished because of the payment of punitive damages.

n262. Because blameworthy employees generally will bear only a small part of a punitive damages judgment (on account of their limited assets), shareholders and customers will suffer the major part. Under certain circumstances, moreover, customers will not bear much of the burden of punitive damages. See infra note 264.

n263. If one does believe that each shareholder is slightly blameworthy, the fact that each bears a small portion of punitive damages might be thought to be desirable.

n264. If, however, a particular firm bears punitive damages for a reason not generally applicable to other firms in its industry, these other firms would not have a reason to raise their prices. Consequently, the firm paying the punitive damages would not be able to raise the price of its products (because consumers would purchase from the other firms).

n265. However, it might be thought that customers are partially blameworthy for harms caused by firms because, in the absence of customer interest in firms' products, production and harms would not occur.

n266. For a complementary discussion of the effects of corporate sanctions on a firm's shareholders, bondholders, employees, and customers, see John C. Coffee, Jr., "No Soul to Damn: No Body to Kick": An Unscandalized Inquiry into the Problem of Corporate Punishment, 79 Mich. L. Rev. 386, 401-02 (1981). Coffee observes that "the costs of [corporate] deterrence tend to spill over onto parties who cannot be characterized as culpable." Id.

n267. We will not, however, re-examine the other topics in Part III in relation to punishment. For the most part, what can be said about these topics is clear. Consider, for example, the issue of the tax deductibility of punitive damages. Allowing punitive damages to be deductible would reduce their sting, and so might be undesirable in terms of accomplishing the punishment objective. Likewise, allowing liability insurance coverage against punitive damages also might be undesirable from the perspective of punishment.

n268. We mentioned this point above. See supra note 138 and accompanying text. How much the penalty must rise will be determined by the rate at which the marginal utility of money declines with wealth for the individual. In particular, there is no reason to believe that the proper penalty for purposes of punishment would be proportional to wealth.

n269. We say "might" because the first view is not well articulated, and therefore it is unclear what this view would imply about the proper relationship between the level of punitive damages and a corporation's wealth.

n270. The reasoning behind this statement is essentially that used above when we explained that a firm's wealth will not affect its incentive to invest in safety precautions. See supra section III.B.

n271. We have not addressed in this Part the institutional question of who should determine the proper level of damages for purposes of promoting the punishment goal of punitive damages. For an interesting empirical examination and discussion of this question, see Cass R. Sunstein, Daniel Kahneman & David Schkade, Assessing Punitive Damages (With Notes on Cognition and Valuation in Law), 107 Yale L.J. (forthcoming May 1998).

REV_00262143

n272. For example, suppose that the level of damages that is best with respect to deterrence is $ 1 million and that the amount that is best with respect to punishment is $ 2 million. The optimal amount, taking account of both objectives, must be between $ 1 and $ 2 million. As damages are increased from $ 1 million to $ 2 million, overdeterrence occurs, but punishment is better promoted. It is optimal to stop raising damages when the marginal social loss from overdeterrence begins to outweigh the marginal social gain from better punishment. (To complete the explanation, observe that optimal damages cannot be less than $ 1 million or more than $ 2 million: were damages less than $ 1 million, the outcome would be worse with respect to both the deterrence and the punishment goals than if damages were $ 1 million; and were damages in excess of $ 2 million, the outcome would be worse with respect to both goals than if damages were $ 2 million.) For further discussion regarding the choice of the level of punitive damages that best balances the deterrence and punishment goals, see Diamond, Punishment and Efficiency, supra note 12, at 11-14.

n273. In essence, the amounts should not be added because the punitive damages amount that is proper for the purpose of deterrence also punishes, and the punitive damages amount that is proper for the purpose of punishment also deters.

It is easy to see in the example in the preceding note that it would not be correct to add the $ 1 million amount that is best for deterrence to the $ 2 million amount that is best for punishment and impose damages of $ 3 million. To amplify on what we stated parenthetically in that note, if damages of $ 2 million are best with respect to punishment, then damages of $ 3 million would punish excessively and thus would be worse than damages of $ 2 million; that is, damages of $ 2 million are superior to $ 3 million in terms of punishment. Also, damages of $ 2 million are superior to damages of $ 3 million in terms of deterrence, for $ 3 million overdeters more than $ 2 million overdeters. Hence, damages of $ 3 million cannot be optimal: damages of $ 2 million are superior from the perspectives of both punishment and deterrence (and, as we argued in the preceding note, the optimal level of damages must be between $ 1 million and $ 2 million).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:05 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

escaping liability. As we will explain, use of such a multiplier will make defendants pay on average for harm actually done and thus will lead [*888] to socially desirable behavior in terms of precautions and participation in risky activities.

There are several reasons that injurers sometimes escape liability for harms for which they should be liable. First, the victim may have difficulty determining that the harm was the result of some party's act - as opposed to simply being the result of nature, of bad luck. For instance, an individual may develop a form of cancer that could have been caused by exposure to a naturally occurring carcinogen, such as radon gas, but which was in fact caused by exposure to a manmade carcinogen that was released by the injurer.

Second, even if the victim knows that he was injured by some party's conduct, he may have difficulty proving who caused the harm. The owner of a parked car that was damaged might know that it had been struck by another vehicle, but not be able to identify the injurer. Those living near a polluted lake might know both that pollution is responsible for an unusually high rate of disease in their neighborhood and who the polluters are, but not be able to establish causation in court.

Third, even if the victim knows both that he was wrongfully injured and who injured him, he might not sue the injurer. A person will tend not to bring a suit if the legal cost and the value of the time and effort he would have to devote to the suit exceed the expected gain. The decision to forgo suit will often occur when the harm the victim has suffered is relatively small or the likelihood of establishing causation is low. (Additionally, a victim might not sue if he has a distaste for the legal process.)

For one or more of the above reasons, injurers will sometimes be able to escape liability for harms for which they should be held responsible. [45] The consequences of this possibility are clear: if damages merely equal harm, injurers' incentives to take precautions will be inadequate and their incentive to participate in risky activities will be excessive. Suppose that there is only a one-in-four chance that an injurer will be found liable for a $ 100,000 harm, for which he would have to pay damages of $ 100,000. On average, then, the injurer will [*889] pay $ 25,000 when he causes the harm - only a fraction of the harm caused. If the harm could have been prevented each time by taking a $ 50,000 precaution, the injurer will not have an adequate incentive to take the precaution, because the precaution cost will exceed his average liability cost by a substantial margin. Moreover, because the injurer will pay only $ 25,000 on average for a $ 100,000 harm, he will engage in the risky activity to an excessive degree. If the injurer is a firm, the price of its product will rise by an amount reflecting only one-quarter of the harm caused, leading consumers of the product to buy more of it, and thereby cause more harm, than is socially desirable.

To remedy these problems of underdeterrence, damages that are imposed in those instances in which injurers are found liable should be raised sufficiently so that injurers' average damages will equal the harm they cause. In the example in the preceding paragraph, in which the chance of being found liable for having caused a $ 100,000 harm is only one in four, damages should be raised to $ 400,000. Then, on average, the injurer will pay $ 100,000 when he causes the harm - on average, every four times he causes harm, he will be found liable once for $ 400,000. Equivalently, his total damages will tend to equal the total amount of harm that he has caused. [46] As we emphasized above, [47] making injurers liable for the harm they cause will induce them to take proper precautions and participate appropriately in risky activities.

This discussion suggests a simple formula for assuring that injurers will pay for the harms they cause: the total damages imposed on an injurer should equal the harm multiplied by the reciprocal of the probability that the injurer will be found liable when he ought to be. [48] We will refer to this multiplier as the total damages multiplier. In the example in the preceding paragraph, the probability that the injurer would be found liable was one in four, or .25;

REV_00262070

Harvard Journal of Law & Public Policy
Spring, 1996

Syposium - Group Rights, Victim Status, and the Law The Eighth Annual Federalist Society Lawyers Convention
Panal I: Victimology, Regulation, and the Transformation of the Common Law

*667 HOPE FOR THE TORT SYSTEM: CONGRESSIONAL PROPSALS FOR REFORM

Christopher Cox [FNa1]

Copyright © 1996 by the Harvard Society for Law & Public Policy, Inc.;

Christopher Cox

The tort system, as it operates today, envisions a trip through the supermarket or to the car dealership as a walk through a mine field, where seemingly ordinary American businessmen and women are out to kill and maim--not just inadvertently or negligently, but intentionally. It posits a rigid dichotomy between the wholly culpable and evil, on the one hand, and the literally irresponsible victims.

The result is a radically dysfunctional tort system that invites and receives public contempt. It cruelly cheats both genuine victims and innocent defendants. The Rand Corporation recently concluded, "[T]he emerging data suggest that the tort liability system serves too many people it shouldn't serve, or at least pays them too much, doesn't serve enough of the people it should serve, and doesn't serve many well enough." [FN1] Former Attorney General William P. Barr wrote in a letter to Congress last year: "Our civil justice system is slow, expensive, uncertain, and capricious." [FN2] Fifty percent of all liability expenses go to attorneys and transaction costs, not the victims. A recent study estimated that the American tort system generated $152 billion in direct--not indirect--costs in 1994 alone. [FN3]

The indirect costs are even worse. Tort liability accounts for over ninety- five percent of the cost of some childhood vaccines. [FN4] The D.C. area Girl Scouts have to sell 87,000 boxes of cookies 668 each year to pay for the cost of their liability insurance. [FN5] And one out of every four obstetricians reduces or eliminates care to high-risk women for fear of being sued. [FN6]

The most tragic result is our loss of liberty. We are a liberty-loving people. We do not want the government to go through our papers, to kick down our front door, or to rummage through our belongings, so we have very strict rules about what the government can do in the investigation of even the most serious crimes. [FN7] In civil cases, however, the state casually delegates to individual lawyers those very powers through our discovery process. [FN8] The people wielding this power could be the business competitors or the personal enemies of the defendant. They are not prosecutors carefully selected and appointed, but nonetheless they exercise state power when they strip opposing litigants of their liberty in this most personal way.

The House of Representatives's tort reform proposals [FN9] are designed to start the process of restoring the word justice in our civil justice system. Most of our proposals are built on pure common sense. For example, in the products liability area, blameless sellers should not be held responsible for the manufacturer's conduct, and so our bill would limit the seller's liability to those cases in which the seller failed to exercise reasonable 669 care and thereby proximately caused the harm. [FN10] Our bill would provide a defense to product liability if the claimant's drug or alcohol use was more than fifty percent responsible for the accident. [FN11] Moreover, if a jury finds a defendant one percent liable, he should not have to pay one hundred percent of the damages, and thus our bill would abolish joint and several liability in favor of a fair-share rule. [FN12] Finally, our bill would restrict somewhat the use of junk science [FN13] to bolster the causation requirement in tort law. [FN14]

Further needed reforms must await more ambitious legislative proposals. For example, even when a defendant gets to the end of what might be a five, six, or seven-year long process and is completely exonerated of liability, that defendant still loses because of all the transaction costs. We hope to change that eventually, but the legal reform legislation we have introduced is--after all--just a start. [FN15]

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

REV_00262145

If we are to have effective tort reform, people must stop looking for a riskless society. We must accept that life involves risk and that losses should not be recoverable from a bystander on the flawed premise that "someone" must always pay, even for accidents. And we must remove the blinders that have made us treat the tort system as the best, or even the only, means to manage and compensate risk. When all one has is a hammer, every problem looks like a nail. We will be unable to reform our current system profoundly until we realize we have many tools besides the court system and tort law to deal with risk and injuries in our society. We have deformed the tort system profoundly by treating it as the sole answer to these problems. As a result, all 670 too often the motto above the courthouse door should be the admonition from Dante's Inferno: "Abandon hope all ye who enter here." [FN16] I hope that very soon we can restore the old motto: "Equal Justice Under Law."

[FNa1]. Member, U.S. House of Representatives (R.-Cal.).

[FN1]. Metaphors, and Facts, About Litigation Trends, FACTS & TRENDS, Spring 1995, at 7.

[FN2]. 141 CONG. REC. H2873-01 (daily ed. Mar. 8, 1995) (statement of Rep. Henry Hyde (R.-Ill.) (quoting former Attorney General Barr).

[FN3]. See TILLINGHAST TOWERS PERRIN, TORT COST TRENDS: AN INTERNATIONAL PERSPECTIVE 3 (1995).

[FN4]. See Richard L. Manning, Changing Rules in Tort Law and the Market for Childhood Vaccines, 37 J.L. & ECON. 247, 273 (1994) (finding that approximately 96 percent of the wholesale price of the vaccine against diphtheria, pertussis, and tetanus goes toward litigation costs).

[FN5]. See 141 CONG. REC. H2735-04 (daily ed. Mar. 7, 1995) (statement of Rep. Good-latte).

[FN6]. See 1 INST. FOR MEDICINE, MEDICAL PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY AND THE DELIVERY OF OBSTETRICAL CARE 40, 74 (1989). An obstetrician has a 70 percent chance of being sued during his career. See id. at 2.

[FN7]. See, e.g., U.S. CONST. amend. IV ("The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated ....").

[FN8]. For example, the federal standards for discovery are remarkably broad:

Parties may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action, whether it relates to the claim or defense of the party seeking discovery or to the claim or defense of any other party, including the existence, description, nature, custody, condition, and location of any books, documents, or other tangible things and the identity and location of persons having knowledge of any discoverable matter. The information sought need not be admissible at the trial if the information sought appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

FED. R. CIV. P. 26(b)(1).

[FN9]. The Contract With America's Common Sense Legal Reform Act was introduced at the beginning of the 104th Congress as three separate bills. See Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 1058, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995); Attorney Accountability Act of 1995, H.R. 988, 104th Cong, 1st Sess. (1995); Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 956, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995).

[FN10]. See Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995, supra note 9, § 103.

[FN11]. See id. § 104.

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

[FN12]. See id. § 110.

[FN13]. See Attorney Accountability Act of 1995, supra note 9, § 3.

[FN14]. The above reforms were contained in the Contract legal reform legislation as originally introduced. The conference report on legal reform as finally adopted this year modified these provisions. Passed by the House on March 29, 1996 by a vote of 259-158, the conference report included both the protection for product sellers and drug-alcohol defense. It did not include provision dealing with "junk science." The report prohibits joint liability for noneconomic loss, allocating liability in direct proportion to the percentage of responsibility. These reforms apply to product liability cases, not to all tort actions. See Common Sense Product Liability and Legal Reform Act of 1995, supra note 9.

[FN15]. Under the Contract legislation, a full-recovery rule providing that a prevailing party would be reimbursed for all of his fees and expenses was adopted, but solely in diversity cases.

[FN16]. DANTE ALIGHIERI, THE DIVINE COMEDY canto III, 1. 9 (1320).

END OF DOCUMENT

Copr. © West 2001 No Claim to Orig. U.S. Govt. Works

2 of 100 DOCUMENTS

Copyright (c) The Harvard Law Review Association 1996.
Harvard Law Review

May, 1996

109 Harv. L. Rev. 1765

LENGTH: 11466 words

NOTES; "COMMON SENSE" LEGISLATION: THE BIRTH OF NEOCLASSICAL TORT REFORM

SUMMARY:
... Recent federal and state tort reform resembles a political juggernaut crushing virtually all obstacles in its path. ... I. The Era of Classical Tort Reform ... Classical reformers wish to lower or abolish noneconomic and punitive damages, and to abolish joint and several liability. ... Tenet Nine of the Contract with America called for a variety of tort reforms including, inter alia, the institution of punitive damage limitations, reformation of the products liability laws, and adoption of the British rule of attorney fee-shifting. ... Common Sense tort reform would benefit from abandoning the classical goal of curtailing punitive damages and instead focusing on improving the current punitive damage system with the help of the insights of modernist legal scholars. ... The doctrine of joint and several liability originated in British common law and was initially applied in cases in which multiple tortfeasors committed a "shared tort" by breaching a common duty or injuring a plaintiff in concert. ... Classical tort reformers called "joint and several liability the "deep-pocket theory' because it encourages plaintiffs to seek out defendants of minimal culpability but maximum financial ability and add them to the suit to bankroll the expected judgment." ... Even during the age of classical tort reform, many scholars praised joint and several liability as encouraging settlement. ...

TEXT:
[*1765]

Recent federal and state tort reform resembles a political juggernaut crushing virtually all obstacles in its path. Notorious tort cases have attracted public scorn, n1 creating a political atmosphere receptive to reform proposals. The Republican Party has attempted to capitalize on this atmosphere at the state level and, since the 1994 elections, at the federal level as well. Its success in the states has been considerable. n2 Republican success at the federal level, however, has been more limited. Although "Common Sense" legal reform bills flew through the House of Representatives, the Senate amended the bills, which now face the threat of a Presidential veto. n3 The disagreement between the two chambers of Congress and the President belies the apparently strong popular consensus over the content of tort reform.

This Note explores the nature and source of this consensus. Tort law commentators have conducted the war over the nature and desirability of tort reform largely in economic terms. n4 Positivists such as Richard Posner contend that existing law is largely efficient, n5 while normativists such as Steven Shavell argue that changes would make the law more efficient. n6 Tort law scholars generally share a strong faith that their arguments will influence the national debate on tort [*1766] reform. One prominent law and economics scholar, George Priest, concludes that the force of his school's scholarship has made tort reform inevitable. n7

This Note argues that these scholars have overestimated the influence of legal scholarship on tort reform. Despite groundbreaking academic analyses of joint liability, punitive damages, and other aspects of the tort system, the 1995 "Common Sense" federal tort reforms embody essentially the changes urged by legal scholars more than twenty years ago. While academics no longer call for the wholesale eradication of noneconomic damages or joint and several liability, legislators do. Rather than speculate about the impetus behind current federal tort reforms, this Note attempts to show that both federal and state tort reform would benefit from incorporating the insights of modern legal scholars.

n32. See, e.g., Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.6309 (West 1987) (allowing for automatic periodic payments when judgments exceed a fixed amount).

n33. These fee-shifting provisions allowed the judge to award fees only to the defendant in cases in which a suit was brought in bad faith or in order to harass the defendant. See, e.g., Fla. Stat. Ann. 57.105 (West 1994 & Supp. 1996); Haw. Rev. Stat. 607-14.5 (1988).

n34. See, e.g., Mich. Comp. Laws Ann. 600.4951-4969 (West 1987).

n35. See James A. Henderson, Jr. & Aaron D. Twerski, Products Liability: Problems and Process 859-62 (2d ed. 1992) (describing state tort reform proposals from 1986 to 1991).

n36. See Carl Tobias, Common Sense and Other Legal Reforms, 48 Vand. L. Rev. 699, 700 (1995).

n37. See Kramer, supra note 1, at 8.

n38. H.R. 917, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995). The bill was sponsored by Representative Michael Oxley of Ohio and introduced in the House on February 13, 1995. House Bill 917 has been reported in the House, but no action has been taken on it since March 1, 1995. See 141 Cong. Rec. H2486 (daily ed. Mar. 1, 1995).

n39. H.R. 955, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995). The bill was introduced on February 15, 1995, by Illinois Representative Henry Hyde. On the same day, House Bill 955 was referred to the House Judiciary Committee, where it has remained to date. See 141 Cong. Rec. H1849 (daily ed. Feb. 15, 1995).

n40. H.R. 10, 104th Cong., 1st Session (1995). The bill was introduced by Representative Henry Hyde on March 22, 1995. House Bill 10 had an impressive 150 co-sponsors when it was initially introduced. House Bill 956 now encompasses the majority of Title I of House Bill 10.

n41. H.R. 956, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995). The bill was introduced by Representative Henry Hyde on February 15, 1995. See 141 Cong. Rec. H1849.

n42. H.R. 956 2(a); H.R. 955 8(A), (C); H.R. 917 6(c)(1).

n43. See H.R. 956 201(b); H.R. 10 (C), (D); H.R. 955 8(B); H.R. 917 6(c)(2).

n44. See H.R. 956 109; H.R. 10 (C), (D); see also H.R. 955 6 (eliminating such liability for damages generally); H.R. 917 5(c) (eliminating liability for noneconomic damages only).

n45. See H.R. 956 107; H.R. 917 4.

n46. See H.R. 10 103. The bills contain other miscellaneous provisions limiting defendants' liability. Some would provide manufacturers with a complete defense if the accident was more than 50% attributable to the plaintiff's use of alcohol or drugs. See H.R. 956 105; H.R. 955 5; H.R. 917 7(a). Others would create a two-year statute of limitations for most products liability actions, see H.R. 917 8(a), and bar most claims not filed within fifteen years of the delivery of a "capital good" to its first purchaser, see H.R. 956 109; H.R. 955 7; H.R. 917 8(b).

n47. See H.R. 10 202, 204 (addressing frivolous securities litigation); H.R. 917 12.

n48. See H.R. 10 101 (proposing the adoption of the English rule in federal civil diversity litigation).

The goals of reducing defendant liability and deterring frivolous litigation have been somewhat controversial in both chambers of Congress. For example, the Common Sense Legal Standards Reform Act of 1995 (House Resolution 956) was amended several times in the House before going to the Senate, where it was again amended numerous times. Amendments added in the Senate include the Snowe amendment to limit the amount of punitive damages that may be recovered in a health care liability action. See 141 Cong. Rec. S5940 (daily ed. May 2, 1995).

Moreover, a number of other amendments relating to the punitive damages provision were proposed but rejected by the House, including the Furse amendment, which would have stricken the clear and convincing burden of proof requirement, see 141 Cong. Rec. H2940 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 1995), the Hoke amendment, which would have required that 75% of punitive damage awards in civil cases exceeding $ 250,000 be forfeited to the treasury of the state in which the action was brought, see 141 Cong. Rec. H2951 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 1995), and a motion to raise the cap on punitive damages to $ 1 million, see 141 Cong. Rec. H3026 (daily ed. Mar. 10, 1995). The two Houses have had considerable difficulty in reconciling the differing versions of the bill. See 141 Cong. Rec. S17,674 (daily ed. Mar. 9, 1995).

n49. This section of the Note analyzes the Common Sense tort reform efforts at reducing defendant liability and frivolous lawsuits. See supra pp. 1769-70. In discussing reforms that reduce defendants' liability, this Note will focus solely on the proposals to cap punitive damages and eliminate joint and several liability, because these proposals are considered most important by commentators, see, e.g., Manzer, supra note 25, at 628, and at least the former has become an important point of contention between the President and Congress, see supra note 3.

n50. Precursors to punitive damages existed in the Code of Hammurabi as early as 2000 B.C. See James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117, 1119 (1984).

n51. See id. at 1126.

n52. See James D. Ghiardi & John J. Kircher, Punitive Damages: Law and Practice 2.02, at 4-5 (1995).

n53. See id. 2.06, at 13-14.

n54. Some commentators argue that, because the majority of jurisdictions allow manufacturers to insure against punitive damage claims, punitive damages no longer serve a significant deterrent purpose. See, e.g., Sales & Cole, supra note 50, at 1163. This view seems to overlook the possibility that insurers may (1) require manufacturers to take certain precautions in order to qualify for coverage, (2) raise premiums of manufacturers who are hit with punitive damage claims, or (3) deny coverage to manufacturers who are repetitively held liable for punitive damages.

n55. See Bruce Chapman & Michael Trebilcock, Punitive Damages: In Search of a Rationale, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 741, 742-43 (1992).

n56. See, e.g., Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Punitive Damages, Due Process, and the Jury, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 975, 988 (1989).

n57. See Lucian A. Bebchuk, Suing Solely to Extract a Settlement Offer, 17 J. Legal Stud. 437, 448 (1988); David Rosenberg & Steven A. Shavell, A Model in Which Suits Are Brought for Their Nuisance Value, 5 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 3, 3-6 (1985).

n58. See Tort Policy Working Group, Report of the Tort Policy Working Group on the Causes, Extent, and Policy Implications of the Current Crisis in Insurance Availability and Affordability 66-69 (1986).

n59. See Dickinson R. Debevoise, A Trial Judge's View of Tort Reform, 25 Seton Hall L. Rev. 853, 855-57 (1994) (noting anecdotal evidence that HMOs suffer large punitive damage awards).

n60. See, e.g., A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven A. Shavell, Should Employees Be Subject to Fines and Imprisonment Given the Existence of Corporate Liability?, 13 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 239, 240 (1993).

n61. See William M. Landes & Richard R. Posner, New Light on Punitive Damages, Register, Oct. 1986, at 33.

n62. If liability is routinely imposed for damage actually caused, the price of the product will rise to include an efficient "risk premium" that reflects the expected accident costs of the product's use. Adding liability for punitive damages will result in the inclusion of an additional (inefficient) price premium that reflects the expected cost of punitive damages. See generally A. Mitchell Polinsky, An Introduction to Law and Economics 94-104 (2d ed. 1989) (discussing how legal liability leads to product price premiums).

n63. Note that the Common Sense reforms do not address this critique, because they raise the scienter requirement for punitive damages to a recklessness standard. See supra p. 1769.

n64. Darryl Biggar, A Model of Punitive Damages in Tort, 15 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 1, 1 (1995).

n65. See William M. Landes & Richard R. Posner, The Economic Structure of Tort Law 15 (1987).

n66. See U.S. Gen. Accounting Office, Report to the Chairman, Subcomm. on Commerce, Consumer Protection, and Competitiveness, Comm. on Energy and Commerce, House of Representatives, Product Liability, Verdicts and Case Resolution in Five States, GAO/HRD-88-89, at 2 (Sept. 1989).

n67. See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 28-31 (1990).

n68. Id. at 43.

n69. Michael Rustad, In Defense of Punitive Damage Awards in Products Liability: Testing Tort Anecdotes with Empirical Data, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1, 45 (1992).

n70. The Rand Corporation studied two counties in California and found that, in one county, the average punitive damage award jumped 1500% percent between 1980 and 1984. See American Tort Reform Ass'n, Punitive Damages Update, Relevant Studies on Tort Reform/Punitive Damages (Apr. 12, 1989). But a study with such a small sample size cannot overshadow the numerous larger studies revealing contradictory results.

n71. See generally Janie L. Shores, A Suggestion for Limited Tort Reform: Allocation of Punitive Damage Awards to Eliminate Windfalls, 44 Ala. L. Rev. 61, 87 (1992) ("Capping punitive awards at a specific monetary level is an inefficient way to deter harmful misconduct, because each defendant's economic situation is different.").

n72. See, e.g., id. at 90-92. Most scholars suggest that the state would receive the plaintiff's forfeited award. Nonetheless, nothing requires that the state be the recipient of the forfeited funds, and state-received punitive damage awards may be subject to constitutional scrutiny under the Excessive Fines Clause. See Browning-Ferris Indus. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 264 (1989). A superior alternative has been adopted by states that "give money to such things as health plans, rehabilitation services, [and] insurance assistance programs." James A. Breslo, Comment, Taking the Punitive Damage Windfall Away from the Plaintiff: An Analysis, 86 Nw. U. L. Rev. 1130, 1139-40 (1992).

n73. See Breslo, supra note 72, at 1140.

n74. Under a forfeiture plan, plaintiffs will still have an advantage in bargaining, because defendants will have an incentive to settle to avoid possible state-sought punitive damages. See id. at 1158-66. However, this advantage will be weaker than under the current system, because plaintiffs will not be able to control the state decision whether to pursue a punitive claim.

n75. See E. Jeffrey Grube, Punitive Damages, A Misplaced Remedy, 66 S. Cal. L. Rev. 839, 856 (1993); Breslo, supra note 72, at 1148-49.

n76. See Andrew Von Hirsch, The Sentencing Commission and Its Guidelines 3-5 (1987).

n77. See Jonathan Kagan, Comment, Toward a Uniform Application of Punishment: Using the Federal Sentencing Guidelines as a Model for Punitive Damage Reform, 40 UCLA L. Rev. 753, 783-85 (1993).

n78. See W. Page Keeton, Prosser, Prosser and Keeton on the Law of Torts 52, at 351 (5th ed. 1984).

n79. For a more detailed summary of the development of joint and several liability doctrine, see John W. Wade, Should Joint and Several Liability of Multiple Tortfeasors Be Abolished?, 10 Am. J. Trial Advoc. 193, 194-98 (1986).

n80. See James J. Scheske, The Reform of Joint and Several Liability Theory, 54 J. Air L. & Com. 627, 631 (1988).

n81. See, e.g., American Motorcycle Ass'n v. Superior Court, 578 P.2d 899, 904-05 (Cal. 1978).

n82. Paul Bargren, Comment, Joint and Several Liability: Protection for Plaintiffs, 1994 Wis. L. Rev. 453, 471.

n83. Id. at 456.

n84. See, e.g., Aaron D. Twerski, The Joint Tortfeasor Legislative Revolt: A Rational Response to the Critics, 22 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 1125, 1133 (1989) (complaining that shifting losses to a joint tortfeasor treats the tortfeasor as a "whipping boy").

n85. See, e.g., Scheske, supra note 80, at 650.

n86. See Basil L. Bradley, Why Tort Reform Was Needed in Washington, 22 Gonz. L. Rev. 3, 12 (1986).

n87. See Richard K. Willard, Troubling Trends in Our Civil Justice System and the Need for Tort Reform, 34 Fed. B. News & J. 116, 118 (1987).

n88. See, e.g., Frank H. Easterbrook, William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, Contribution Among Antitrust Defendants: A Legal and Economic Analysis, 23 J.L. & Econ. 331, 358 (1980).

n89. Suppose a plaintiff suffers a $ 1000 harm that was jointly caused by two defendants and has a 50% chance of winning at trial against either defendant. In the absence of several liability, each defendant will settle for up to $ 250 (half of their share of the expected joint loss at trial). But with joint and several liability, if one defendant settles for $ 250, the remaining defendant faces a 50% chance of paying the remaining $ 750, and therefore will pay up to $ 375. Each defendant thus has an incentive to rush to settlement. See John J. Donahue III, The Effect of Joint and Several Liability on the Settlement Rate, 23 J. Legal Stud. 543, 545-46 (1994).

n90. Two of the foremost legal experts on joint and several liability note:

<BQ2>The central conclusion of our analysis is that the comparison of the settlement-inducing properties of joint-and-several liability and nonjoint liability depends critically on the correlation of the plaintiff's probabilities of success. When these probabilities are independent, joint-and-several liability unambiguously discourages settlements .... When, in contrast, these probabilities are perfectly correlated, joint-and-several liability ... encourages settlement when the litigation costs are low but may discourage settlements when these costs are high.</BQ2>Lewis A. Kornhauser & Richard L. Revesz, Evaluating the Effects of Alternative Superfund Liability Rules, in Analyzing Superfund: Economics, Science and Law 115, 130 (Richard L. Revesz & Richard Stewart eds., 1995).

n91. See id. The deterrent effect of liability rules is not always indeterminate, however. Kornhauser and Revesz note that "negligence ... does not necessarily provide the right incentives when it is coupled with nonjoint liability." Id. at 122. They also argue that both joint and nonjoint liability can lead to underdeterrence when coupled with strict liability; this claim undercuts the classical argument that joint and several liability should be eliminated in order to prevent defendants from overinvesting in care. See id. at 116.

n92. See Kathryn E. Spier, A Note on Joint and Several Liability: Insolvency, Settlement, and Incentives, 23 J. Legal Stud. 559, 560 (1994) (noting that, "while out-of-court settlement is ... desirable because it minimizes the private and public costs of litigation," it is likely that "the excessive value that the plaintiff derives from settlement will induce the defendants to overinvest in precautions ex ante").

n93. See Bargren, supra note 82, at 473-74. One Wisconsin study of 834 personal injury jury verdicts showed that joint and several liability played a role in only 1.6% of these cases. See id. at 473. That joint and several liability is not an important doctrine makes intuitive sense because joint liability only makes a practical difference if a potential defendant is insolvent or cannot be joined to the trial for some reason. See Wade, supra note 79, at 211.

n94. See Philip A. Talmadge & N. Clifford Petersen, In Search of a Proper Balance, 22 Gonz. L. Rev. 259, 264-65 (1986).

n95. Cf. Manzer, supra note 25, at 648 ("By eliminating joint and several liability, legislatures have eliminated an element of an actor's expected accident costs.").

n96. See id. at 649. There are counter-arguments to this point of view. Large corporations may fear systematic liability for the harms of numerous small, short-lived corporations and, as a result, be discouraged from engaging in socially desirable activities.

n97. Bargren, supra note 82, at 476.

n98. "In the tort system, there is a dollar of administrative costs" for every dollar that reaches the plaintiff. Kramer, supra note 1, at 9.

n99. Critics argue that the absence of a market for nonpecuniary loss insurance indicates that people do not value such insurance. See George L. Priest, Can Absolute Manufacturer Liability Be Defended?, 9 Yale J. on Reg. 237, 243 (1992). However, there are other factors that may explain why such a system did not develop, such as the legal constraints and social norms against providing insurance for nonpecuniary losses. See Steven P. Croley & Jon D. Hanson, The Nonpecuniary Costs of Accidents: Pain-and-Suffering Damages in Tort Law, 108 Harv. L. Rev. 1785, 1851-56 (1995). Another explanatory factor may be that insurers seeking to provide nonpecuniary loss insurance would face heightened dangers of moral hazard because of special information asymmetries present in this context. See id. at 1848-51.

n100. Unlike market-provided insurance, nonpecuniary loss insurance provided by the tort system would not violate social norms and legal constraints. See id. at 1906-14. The tort system's use of civil juries to evaluate plaintiff claims also alleviates the market problem of insureds who possess asymmetric information. See id. at 1900-06.

n101. Wade, supra note 79, at 198.

n102. Id.

n103. See Bebchuk, supra note 57, at 448.

n104. Gregory E. Maggs & Michael D. Weiss, Progress on Attorney's Fees: Expanding the "Loser Pays" Rule in Texas, 30 Hous. L. Rev. 1915, 1918 (1994).

n105. Originally, Rule 11 was seldom used by courts. See William W. Schwarzer, Rule 11: Entering a New Era, 28 Loy. L.A. L. Rev. 7, 7 (1994). In 1983, as a result of rising discontent over frivolous lawsuits, Rule 11 was amended to ensure that sanctions would be imposed often enough to act as a serious deterrent. Cf. Fed. R. Civ. P. 11, Proposed Amendment to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, Advisory Committee's Note, reprinted in 97 F.R.D. 165, 198 (1983) ("The new language is intended to reduce the reluctance of courts to impose sanctions.").

n106. See John Leubsdorf, Toward a History of the American Rule on Attorney Fee Recovery, 47 Law & Contemp. Probs. 9, 9 (1984).

n107. See H.R. 10, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. 101 (1995).

n108. See Thomas D. Rowe, Jr., The Legal Theory of Attorney Fee Shifting, 1982 Duke L.J. 651, 651.

n109. As some commentators note, the primary benefit of the British rule is that it "can discourage parties from participating in meritless lawsuits ... by increasing the cost of losing." Maggs & Weiss, supra note 104, at 1926.

n110. See id. Reformists who favor the British rule note that the rule will also solve the problem of defendants with valid defense claims being driven out of business by unmanageable insurance premiums or astronomical legal expenses. See id. at 1918.

n111. See, e.g., Richard A. Posner, Economic Analysis of Law 564-74 (4th ed. 1992); Steven A. Shavell, Suit, Settlement, and Trial, 11 J. Legal Stud. 55, 59 (1982).

n112. See Shavell, supra note 111, at 62-68.

n113. John J. Donahue III, Opting for the British Rule, 104 Harv. L. Rev. 1093, 1099 (1991).

n114. See, e.g., Thomas J. Miceli, Do Contingency Fees Promote Excessive Litigation?, 23 J. Legal Stud. 211, 213 (1994).

n115. The expected judgment increases by 0.1 x $ 5000, or $ 500.

n116. The likelihood that the plaintiff will pay the additional $ 550 decreases by the additional 10% chance that the plaintiff will prevail and be reimbursed by the defendant. Therefore, the expected cost of the additional legal fees (0.9 x $ 550) is $ 495.

n117. See Ronald Braeutigam, Bruce Owen & John Panzer, An Economic Analysis of Alternative Fee Shifting Systems, 47 Law & Contemp. Probs. 173-85 (1984).

n118. See, e.g., Linda Babcock, Henry S. Farber, Cynthia Fobian & Eldar Shafir, Forming Beliefs About Adjudicated Outcomes, 15 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 289, 300 (1995).

n119. See Keith N. Hylton, Fee Shifting and Incentives to Comply with the Law, 46 Vand. L. Rev. 1069, 1072 (1993).

n120. Scholars have shown that the British rule cannot be justified in terms of economic efficiency or deterrence. See Clinton F. Beckner III & Avery Katz, The Incentive Effects of Litigation Fee Shifting When Standards are Uncertain, 15 Int'l Rev. L. & Econ. 205, 207 (1995) ("Just as there is no good theoretical reason to think the British rule generally reduces litigation costs, there is also no good theoretical reason to think it promotes efficient primary behavior.").

n121. See Hylton, supra note 119, at 1089-91. Because one-way fee shifting would encourage plaintiffs to sue, it is not politically popular at present. This fact supports this Note's proposition that legal scholarship and political popularity are not in sync.

n122. Id. at 1071.

n123. Donahue, supra note 113, at 1101.

n124. See id. at 1116-18.

n125. The strength of this argument is somewhat undercut by the fact that parties in England could, but apparently do not contract to the American system. There are two possible explanations for their failure to do so. First, there may be barriers to contracting around the default fee-shifting rules in both countries, in which case the failure of Americans to include the British rule in their contracts does not necessarily show strong support for the American rule. Second, because of differences in the American and British systems, each country may already have the most efficient system for its particular circumstances. This market evidence does not, however, undermine the claim that plaintiffs would prefer a one-way fee-shifting rule in their favor, because defendants have no incentive to agree to such contracts.

Part I of this Note considers the genesis of the first tort reform efforts and describes the "progressive" and "classical" schools of traditional tort reform scholarship. Part II describes the recent history of tort reform, focusing on "Common Sense" tort reform legislation at the federal level. Part III describes the "modernist" tort reform movement in recent legal scholarship. This Note then argues that modernist insights could improve "Common Sense" tort reform.

I. The Era of Classical Tort Reform

The idea of fundamental reform of the civil justice system has roots in the Progressive Era of legal scholarship, which followed World War I. n8 Reform-minded commentators in the Progressive Era criticized the tort system for inadequately compensating plaintiffs and advocated a more insurance-minded alternative, such as workers' compensation or a no-fault regime. n9 Because "through the first half of the twentieth century, the tort system tended to protect the interests of defendants," n10 progressive tort reformers sought to enable plaintiffs to prevail more easily. n11 Progressive reformists' hallmark concern for plaintiff compensation dominated tort reform ideas until the late 1960s [*1767] and led to important developments, such as the growth of strict liability at the state level. n12

Subsequently, progressive tort reform fell into disfavor. Some scholars have suggested that this decline was the result of three separate torts crises. n13 The first crisis occurred in the medical industry in the late 1960s, when health care providers steeply increased premiums, ostensibly because of an increase in negligence claims brought by patients. n14 The second came in the late 1970s, when rising liability premiums led to manufacturer concern. n15 Lastly, a general tort crisis erupted in the 1980s when insurance companies responded to continued financial losses by cancelling or refusing to re-issue policies held by high-risk policyholders. n16 Common law torts attracted the lion's share of the blame for the situation, and the public began to associate lawsuits with hindering commerce. n17

Academia mirrored big business's discontent with the perceived excesses of tort law. Most notably, the progressive idea that tort law should focus on plaintiff compensation fell into disfavor, n18 as did notions that tort law should serve corrective justice. n19 Instead, law and economics commentators argued that the primary, if not sole, function of tort law was to deter undesirable behavior. n20 If a tort liability rule would not deter potential tortfeasors from engaging in risky activities, these commentators argued for its repeal.

"Classical" tort reform, as defined in this Note, sees itself as an effort to correct the excesses of Progressive Era reform. n21 Classical tort reformers call for the elimination of legal rules that are particularly expensive for defendants. In areas in which liability is perceived as levying a "tort tax," such as products liability and medical malpractice, classical reformers suggest increasing scienter requirements or re [*1768] pealing liability altogether. n22 Classical reformers wish to lower or abolish noneconomic and punitive damages, n23 and to abolish joint and several liability. n24 Critics could dub classical reform "baby-with-the-bathwater" reform, because it is not aimed at reforming common law rules, but at repealing them either in whole or in part. n25 Critics claim that such classical reform "is fueled by the economic self-interest of those who perceive themselves as adversely affected by the tort system." n26

Classical tort reform legislation reflected the crises that spawned it. In the 1970s, in response to the first tort crisis, at least "forty-three states and two territories legislatively modified one or more significant aspects of [their] common law" to limit the potential malpractice liability of health care providers. n27 The second wave of classical tort reforms sought to eliminate pro-plaintiff common law rules across the board, rather than for particular sectors and industries. n28 The most widely adopted tort reforms eliminated joint and several liability and imposed caps on noneconomic damages, n29 especially punitive damages. n30 Several states reestablished sovereign immunity doctrines. n31 Others allowed defendants to pay damage awards periodically, rather than in a lump sum. n32 Some states directly penalized plaintiffs that brought "frivolous" lawsuits, n33 and others mandated alternative forms of dispute resolution. n34 By 1991 nearly all fifty states had enacted some form of tort reform. n35 [*1769]

II. The "Common Sense" Tort Reforms

When the Republican Party gained control of both houses of Congress in 1994, the momentum of tort reform shifted from the state to the federal level. Legal reform was a critical component of the Contract with America, the House Republicans' 1994 platform. n36 Tenet Nine of the Contract with America called for a variety of tort reforms including, inter alia, the institution of punitive damage limitations, reformation of the products liability laws, and adoption of the British rule of attorney fee-shifting. n37 In the first one hundred days after the new Congress was seated, the Republicans attempted to live up to their contract by introducing four Common Sense reform bills designed to reform the legal system: the Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act, n38 the Common Sense Product Liability Reform Act of 1995, n39 the Common Sense Legal Reforms Act of 1995, n40 and the Common Sense Legal Standards Reform Act of 1995, n41 collectively referred to as the "Common Sense reform bills."

Broadly speaking, the reforms these bills propose fall into one of two categories. First, many of the bills contain provisions designed to limit or eliminate the liability of defendants in certain areas. For example, several bills would allow a plaintiff to recover punitive damages only if the plaintiff could show clear and convincing evidence that the harm was a result of conduct evincing conscious indifference to safety ("actual malice"). n42 Almost all of the bills would cap punitive damages at some level, typically at the greater of $ 250,000 or three times the plaintiff's economic injury. n43 The bills would eliminate either joint or several liability of multiple defendants. n44 If a product liability plaintiff misused the allegedly defective product, the Common Sense bills generally would reduce the liability of the manufacturer by [*1770] a proportion equal to the percentage of the harm caused by the misuse. n45 Some of the bills would set federal liability standards. n46

Second, all of the tort reform bills share a desire to deter frivolous litigation. Some of the bills would allow sanctions to be directly imposed on plaintiffs that file frivolous suits. n47 Others would adopt the British fee-shifting rule and routinely award fees to the prevailing party. n48

III. The Failures of Neoclassical Tort Reform

The Common Sense tort reform bills are best understood as "neoclassical." The bills share the major elements of the classical tort reform movement: a strong pro-defendant leaning, the goal of eliminating pro-plaintiff common law rules, and in many cases, the desire to award special protections to particular sectors of the economy. Yet in some ways, the Common Sense reforms have advanced beyond their classical ancestors: they urge less radical reform and show more sympathy for plaintiffs' rights. n49

Although the neoclassical reforms embodied in the Common Sense reform bills represent a moderate improvement over their classical pre [*1771] cursors, the bills nonetheless fail to take into account many recent advances in law and economics tort scholarship. The newest wave of academic reformers - modernist tort scholars - recognize that, although many of the pro-plaintiff common law rules adopted in the Progressive Era have defects, these rules serve important insurance and deterrence functions. Modernist tort scholars advocate modifying but retaining the existing rules to serve the goals of tort law better. To clarify the difference between neoclassical and modernist reform, the following sections explore both classical critiques of the tort system and modernist responses. The Common Sense tort reform bills suffer from serious defects that Congress could rectify by shifting from a neoclassical to a modernist approach to tort reform.

A. Punitive Damages

The practice of awarding punitive damages for torts has ancient origins. n50 Whatever the rationale in ancient times, punitive damages have been justified throughout American history on punishment and deterrence grounds. n51 Pre-classical tort doctrine held that it was just and right to impose punitive damages to "punish" guilty tortfeasors n52 and that punitive damages would teach the defendant a lesson, so that the tort would not be repeated in the future. n53

However, the traditional justifications for punitive damages came under rigorous attack in the years following the tort crises. First, for different (and even opposing) reasons, commentators argued that punitive damages either would not result in optimal deterrence or would not deter at all. n54 Some classical reformers argued that punitive damages could not be used to create optimal deterrence because tort law serves a variety of disparate and often conflicting goals. n55 Different classical reformers maintained that punitive damages would lead to overdeterrence, because manufacturers act overly cautiously in the face of uncertain levels of liability. n56 Second, critics charged that punitive [*1772] damages lead to excessive litigation and windfall gains for plaintiffs, encouraging plaintiffs to pursue litigation by making settlement more likely as defendants seek to avoid the increased costs and uncertainty of trial. n57 Third, punitive damages were blamed for reducing the availability and increasing the cost of insurance. n58 Finally, many blamed punitive damages for producing unjustifiable awards and forcing otherwise viable industries out of business. n59

One of the most scathing critiques of punitive damages arose from law and economics scholars, who argued that, to reach the socially efficient level of deterrence, each tortfeasor must be held liable for a dollar amount exactly equal to the social harm caused by the tort - the total economic and noneconomic damages suffered by all potential plaintiffs. n60 If each potential plaintiff brings suit and receives an amount equal to the actual economic damages he or she has suffered, efficient deterrence will be obtained. On the other hand, adding punitive damages on top of actual damages will result in tortfeasors taking a supra-optimal level of care - overdeterrence - unless an insufficient number of plaintiffs bring suit or the tortfeasor escapes detection. n61 In addition to making inefficiently high investments in care, tortfeasors who manufacture products will also pass on at least some of the costs of punitive damages to consumers in the form of higher prices. n62 From these observations, it follows that neither the wealth of a corporation nor the egregiousness of corporate behavior should affect the level of punitive damages, n63 because relying on these factors divorces the level of punitive damages from the amount of harm caused by the tort; only if punitive damages equal social harm will optimal deterrence result. In short, "simple economic models of tort law [*1773] demonstrate that ordinary compensatory damages are sufficient to induce the injurer to take the socially efficient level of care." n64

The response of neoclassical reformers to these critiques of the punitive damage system is to urge its emasculation. By setting damage caps and raising plaintiffs' burden of proof with respect to damages, neoclassical reformers seek to minimize the use of punitive damages in the tort system. But capping punitive damages is a nonsensical response to many of the concerns that led to the tort crisis. Modernist law and economics scholars have developed better, less drastic solutions to the alleged punitive damages problem.

First, modern scholars question the assumption that, as an empirical matter, excessive punitive damages are a problematic facet of the tort system. A study by the RAND Institute for Civil Justice shows that the frequency and magnitude of punitive damage awards changed little in the period from 1962 to 1987. n65 The General Accounting Office examined data from five states in the years from 1983 to 1985 and concluded that punitive damage awards were neither frequent nor excessively large. n66 A comprehensive study by legal scholars that analyzed 25,627 civil jury verdicts in eleven states found that plaintiffs received punitive damages in only 4.9% of these verdicts n67 and that, even when punitive damages were awarded, "the amount was generally modest." n68 A fourth study, which looked at 355 punitive damage awards, further supports the finding that "median punitive damage awards ... are quite modest." n69 Although earlier studies did show slightly greater use of punitive damages, n70 the lion's share of the empirical evidence no longer supports the claim that runaway punitive damages are widespread, and may point in the opposite direction.

Even if punitive damage awards are sufficiently large or frequent to warrant legal concern, damage caps are an ineffective answer to the classical charges. For example, the cap proposed by the Common [*1774] Sense legislation - the greater of $ 250,000 or three times a plaintiff's economic damages - would not prevent runaway damage awards from forcing viable companies out of business; small businesses - perhaps the backbone of American industry - would still buckle under the weight of quarter-of-a-million-dollar damage verdicts. Furthermore, even with the damage cap, even large corporations would still face insolvency in cases in which the plaintiff's economic damages are high, such as environmental disaster or mass toxic tort suits. n71 To the extent that punitive damages currently correct for the tort system's inability to hold all tortfeasors accountable, a cap may result in underdeterrence.

Common Sense tort reform would benefit from abandoning the classical goal of curtailing punitive damages and instead focusing on improving the current punitive damage system with the help of the insights of modernist legal scholars. For example, recent scholarship suggests that requiring civil plaintiffs to forfeit punitive damage awards to a third party would curtail the negative incentive effects of punitive damages. n72 Plaintiffs will be less interested in bringing punitive damage claims if they do not benefit from them. n73 Forfeiture would solve the problem of plaintiffs bringing meritless suits and receiving a windfall to which they are not entitled. n74 Because plaintiffs would have no incentive to pursue punitive damage awards, these damages would be sought by state-appointed attorneys in separate proceedings. n75 The state could pursue those claims only when punitive damages would have a beneficial effect. The state could base its decision to seek punitive damages on factors such as the likelihood that the tortfeasor would evade detection, thus allowing punitive damages to serve a beneficial deterrent purpose.

A second beneficial modernist reform proposal is to adopt structured guidelines for punitive damage awards. When the federal gov [*1775] ernment was concerned with ensuring consistency in punishment in the criminal justice system, it adopted the Federal Sentencing Guidelines. n76 One scholar suggests that a similar system be imposed in the tort context to ensure consistency in punitive damage awards. n77 To create a uniform system of guidelines, Congress would examine certain types of torts and decide how often defendants escape detection, plaintiffs fail to bring suit, or the tort causes harm not covered by compensatory damages. Congress would then establish a range of punitive damages - perhaps based on a multiplier of the plaintiff's actual harm - that a jury could impose. Punitive damage guidelines set in this way would alleviate both the problem of juries awarding excessive verdicts when the defendant has deep pockets, and the problem of potential tort defendants overinvesting in preventative measures in the face of uncertain liability. Punitive damage guidelines are also superior to damage caps because they are narrowly tailored to the social harm caused by particular torts; the guidelines are related to the defendant's conduct in a way that reflects the deterrence purposes of punitive damages - ensuring that tortfeasors are liable for the entire amount of social harm caused by the tort.

Tort reform that incorporated the modernist insights would not simply cap punitive damages at a set level, but rather establish guidelines to govern the use of punitive damages and require that these damages be forfeited to the state. The Common Sense reform bills' reliance on the old mantle of a straightforward cap reflects the modernist school's failure to influence the national debate.

B. Joint and Several Liability

The doctrine of joint and several liability originated in British common law and was initially applied in cases in which multiple tortfeasors committed a "shared tort" by breaching a common duty or injuring a plaintiff in concert. n78 The doctrine was adopted in America through a complex and convoluted process that stretched the doctrine far beyond its British origins. n79 Today, joint and several liability allows a plaintiff to sue a single defendant and recover full damages for harm caused by multiple tortfeasors. The Progressive Era tort reformers championed joint and several liability because it spread losses [*1776] among defendants rather than plaintiffs n80 and ensured that plaintiffs received full compensation for their injuries. n81 The arguments of the progressive reformers were successful; as recently as 1973, "joint and several liability was universally applied in every state." n82

As the tort crises waxed, scholarly scrutiny of joint and several liability increased. Classical tort reformers called "joint and several liability the "deep-pocket theory' because it encourages plaintiffs to seek out defendants of minimal culpability but maximum financial ability and add them to the suit to bankroll the expected judgment." n83 Classical reformers stressed that it was normatively unfair to hold a single defendant fully liable when that defendant was only remotely involved in causing the harm. n84 Other scholars argued that joint and several liability had malevolent effects on the insurance industry. n85 They claimed that, for insurance to function properly, insurers must be able to predict potential liability accurately ex ante. n86 Because joint and several liability reduced the insurer's ability to predict a policyholder's tort liability exposure reliably, insurance costs rose. n87

Most modernist tort scholarship views joint and several liability more favorably. Even during the age of classical tort reform, many scholars praised joint and several liability as encouraging settlement. n88 They argued that in cases in which all trial outcomes were identical, the plaintiff would settle with some defendants for less than their pro rata share, because as long as one defendant remains, the plaintiff can sue the remaining defendant for the rest of the uncompensated damages. n89 Despite this conventional wisdom, more recent modernist writers argue that the effect of joint and several liability on settlement [*1777] rates is impossible to predict ex ante and therefore should be ignored in deciding whether to retain such liability. n90 These writers claim that the same proposition also holds true for the effect of joint and several liability on deterrence. n91 One commentator argues that, while joint and several liability increases the likelihood of settlement, it can also lead to excessive deterrence. n92 As a result, whether joint and several liability is beneficial from a societal perspective remains unclear.

Other modernist writers are more supportive of joint and several liability. First, several recent studies show that joint and several liability is seldom used and, therefore, unworthy of constant attention and criticism. n93 Further, some commentators argue that the elimination of joint and several liability would actually lead to increased insurance rates and transaction costs, because nonjoint liability necessitates the impleader of additional parties, requires more proceedings, and results in longer court delays. n94 From a deterrence perspective, modernist writers use simple economic theory to caution against eliminating joint and several liability. In the absence of joint and several liability, potential tortfeasors as a group will discount their legal liability for committing a tort by the probability that they will become insolvent before having to pay a judgment. n95 For example, if a firm [*1778] has a ten percent chance of becoming insolvent before the legal system forces it to pay the $ 10,000 cost of potential harm, the firm will take only liability-avoiding precautions that cost less than $ 9,000, ceteris paribus. With joint and several liability, firms must also consider the potential liability they may face for other joint tortfeasors who become insolvent. If each of several tortfeasors could cause a $ 10,000 harm and has a ten percent chance of becoming insolvent, the expected liability for each firm is $ 10,000, equal to the cost of the social harm, and optimal for deterrence purposes. Joint and several liability may roughly counterbalance the underdeterence that results from the possibility that a firm will go insolvent before paying a tort judgment, and may produce better deterrence. n96

New scholarship also suggests that joint and several liability can serve important insurance purposes. In the absence of joint and several liability, the plaintiff bears the risk that tortfeasors will later become insolvent. Because individuals are generally risk averse, social utility can be increased by ensuring that losses are spread throughout society, rather than left with a single victim. Joint and several liability tends to shift losses to deep-pocket defendants who "can generally spread throughout society any extra damages the joint and several liability rule requires." n97

Nonetheless, critics charge that using joint and several liability to further the insurance goal of spreading pecuniary losses involves unnecessarily high administrative costs n98 and that market sources of insurance may be cheaper for these kinds of losses. This argument does not hold true for nonpecuniary losses; tort liability can still serve an important insurance purpose by ensuring that plaintiffs are more fully compensated for their nonpecuniary losses and by spreading these costs throughout society. n99 Indeed, tort law may be uniquely suited to provide nonpecuniary loss insurance. n100 If so, eliminating joint and several liability will make achieving this objective more difficult. [*1779]

Even if joint and several liability has faults, these faults can be remedied by modifying the doctrine to make it fairer to defendants. For example, when there are multiple tortfeasors, juries could be required to find the defendants' "individual percentages of fault." n101 Each defendant would then be liable for this percentage of the harm. Moreover, one modernist scholar suggests, "if any defendant's equitable share is uncollectible, it should be divided among all the other parties at fault, whether plaintiff or defendant, according to their fault percentages." n102 This system would answer the classical claim that joint and several liability forces defendants who have committed minimal wrongs to shoulder the entire burden of the plaintiff's damages. It also requires potential joint tortfeasors as a group to internalize costs imposed by the tort that would otherwise have been externalized when an individual tortfeasor became insolvent.

Thus, at the very least, modernist literature cautions against repealing joint and several liability en masse and provides some affirmative support for maintaining it. Yet the Common Sense reform bills do not reflect the moderation of this scholarship.

C. Discouraging Frivolous Lawsuits

In the age of progressive tort reform, the problem of "frivolous lawsuits" did not attract much attention. Because the existing common law rules were pro-defendant, commentators felt that meritless suits were unlikely to survive pretrial screening mechanisms or lead to settlement. As reforms liberalized the common law, plaintiffs were able to bring suits of more questionable merit. Classical tort reformers suggested that plaintiffs with no real claims were bringing suit in the hopes that the defendants would settle in order to avoid legal fees or the threat of a large damage award at the hands of an unduly plaintiff-sympathetic jury. n103 Insurance premiums, they claimed, had "consequently risen to unmanageable heights." n104 As concern over the insurance crisis grew, classical reformists urged legal reform to discourage or punish plaintiffs directly for bringing frivolous lawsuits. Classical reformists focused first on Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which allows sanctions to be imposed on parties who file frivolous motions or lawsuits. n105 [*1780]

Since 1994, tort reform designed to minimize frivolous lawsuits has taken a slightly different - neoclassical - form. Rather than impose penalties directly on plaintiffs, the proposals would shift attorney's fees - a more reciprocal solution. Currently, most tort suits are governed by the American rule: each party is responsible for his or her own attorney's fees. n106 The Common Sense bills would adopt the British rule: n107 the loser in a civil lawsuit pays for part or all of the winner's attorney's fees. n108 The British rule is neither directly biased in favor of defendants nor focused on deterring frivolous lawsuits. Unlike Rule 11, the British rule requires the losing party to pay even if that party had a meritorious but unsuccessful claim. The rule is neoclassical, however, because its primary intended effect is to discourage plaintiffs from bringing claims that they are likely to lose. n109 It also decreases defendants' incentives to settle frivolous cases to avoid the costs of trial, by ensuring that these costs will be born by losing plaintiffs. n110

Although the Common Sense reform acts thus enjoy neoclassical support, they once again ignore the valuable insights of modernist tort scholars. For example, recent law and economics scholarship has shown that the British rule may actually increase the administrative costs of the judicial system. n111 A primary reason that parties settle cases is to avoid litigation and trial costs. n112 Under the British rule, when parties are optimistic about the merits of their cases, they "perceive the size of the [cost savings of settlement] to shrink because they expect to win, thereby avoiding all litigation costs." n113 When both parties are optimistic, settlement is less likely. If fewer cases settle under the British rule, society will have to pay for more trials, and the administrative costs of the tort system will increase.

The British rule might also increase the administrative costs of the tort system by encouraging overinvestment in attorneys' fees. Most legal scholars agree that, to some degree, the likelihood that a party [*1781] will prevail at trial rises with the amount and quality of the legal assistance it secures. n114 Assume, for example, that a plaintiff suffers $ 5000 worth of injuries and knows that, if she invests an extra $ 550 in legal fees, her chances of prevailing will increase by ten percent. Under the American rule, the plaintiff will not make such an investment, because the increase in legal cost, $ 550, is greater than the expected increase in the judgment, $ 500. n115 Under the British rule, the plaintiff will make the investment; the plaintiff's expected judgment is still $ 500, but the expected cost of the additional legal fees is only $ 495. n116 Attorney's fees will be higher under the British rule because in deciding how much to spend, each party will discount the expected cost of legal fees by the likelihood of prevailing at trial. n117 An additional inefficiency may stem from the fact that fee shifting increases the "stakes" of the trial for the parties. If parties are risk averse, they would prefer to have as little wealth as possible riding on the uncertain outcome of the trial. n118 By raising the stakes of the "gamble" of trial, the British rule lowers the utility of these risk-averse parties.

Some modernist scholars argue that both the British and American rules are inferior to a one-way fee shifting rule for deterrence reasons. Under the American rule, the expectation that legal fees will be substantial may dissuade plaintiffs with meritorious cases from bringing suit. A potential defendant who knows that the victim's litigation costs will exceed his or her potential recovery - the cost of the harm imposed by the defendant's actions - may confidently predict that the victim will not sue. Self-interested defendants in this position will choose to ignore potential tort liability and to forego precautionary measures even when their cost is less than the expected potential liability. n119 The British rule does not solve this problem, because while plaintiffs do not pay costs if victorious, a victim may still be reluctant to bring suit because the victim fears the possibility of paying a victorious defendant's legal fees. n120 A one-way fee-shifting rule in favor of [*1782] plaintiffs does not suffer from this defect. One-way fee-shifting would alleviate the problem by reducing plaintiffs' litigation costs in meritorious cases without penalizing them for unsuccessfully pursuing a legal remedy. n121 As one modernist tort scholar has noted, "fee shifting [solely] in favor of prevailing plaintiffs generates the greatest incentive to comply with the law." n122

Lastly, recently discovered market evidence seems to provide little empirical support for the claim that the British rule benefits all parties. Litigating parties that believe that the British rule is beneficial, "can simply agree through private contract to litigate their dispute under a fee-shifting arrangement." n123 The virtual nonexistence of such contracts n124 provides circumstantial evidence that both parties do not consider the British rule advantageous. n125

IV. Conclusion

This Note has analyzed progressive, classical, and modernist legal scholarship on tort reform. Analyzing recent federal tort reform efforts in light of these three distinct schools of thought reveals that, while the Common Sense bills receive the widespread support of big business, the proposals they embody rest on outdated and disfavored legal arguments. Common Sense tort reform is little more than a revived version of the classical tort movement of the 1970s and 1980s. That this neoclassical reform is couched in rhetoric that is less anti-plaintiff cannot disguise the fact that it has not advanced with the progress of legal scholarship. The tort reform movement as a whole, and the Common Sense tort reform bills in particular, would benefit from incorporating the insights of modernist tort scholars. These scholars have shown that wholesale elimination of all of the Progressive Era's pro-plaintiff common law tort rules is not necessary or desirable. Rather, these rules should be modified to alleviate the tort crisis without sacrificing deterrence or insurance benefits.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. National attention has recently focused on cases "such as the $ 2.7 million award to a woman injured by hot McDonald's coffee, or the $ 1 million award to a psychic who claimed a CAT scan robbed her of her ESP." Elsa F. Kramer, Tort Reform: Does It Make "Common Sense" for Indiana?, Res Gestae, Feb. 1995, at 8, 8.

n2. In March 1995, when Illinois enacted the Civil Justice Reform Act, which limits recovery for noneconomic damages and eliminates joint and several liability, it joined more than thirty states that have enacted tort reform legislation since the mid-1980s. See Stephen J. O'Neil, A New Day: The Civil Justice Reform Amendments of 1995, CBA Rec., May 1995, at 18. In the last 10 years, 33 states have abolished or modified rules on joint and several liability, and 30 states have reformed laws on punitive damages. See id.

n3. The most comprehensive of the federal tort reform proposals, the Common Sense Legal Standards Reform Act of 1995, H.R. 956, 104th Cong., 1st Sess. (1995), passed the House, an amended version passed the Senate, but the bill still awaits conference between the two Houses to resolve the differences. See 141 Cong. Rec. S17,674 (daily ed. Nov. 28, 1995) (statement of Sen. Pressler). A more limited proposal, which focuses primarily on products liability, recently passed the Senate, but President Clinton has threatened to veto the bill so long as it contains caps on punitive damages. See Senate Votes to Limit Punitive Damage Awards, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Mar. 22, 1996, at 1A. Critics have accused the President of playing election-year politics and threatening to veto the bill in order to gain the support of trial lawyers, who oppose such damage caps. See id.

n4. One commentator argues that there have been "no articles of importance within the last five years written about modern tort law that have not addressed ... functional economic analysis." George L. Priest, The Inevitability of Tort Reform, 26 Val. U. L. Rev. 701, 704-05 (1992).

n5. See, e.g., William M. Landes & Richard A. Posner, A Positive Economic Analysis of Products Liability, 14 J. Legal Stud. 535, 535 (1985).

n6. See, e.g., Steven A. Shavell, Strict Liability Versus Negligence, 9 J. Legal Stud. 1, 23-25 (1981).

n7. See Priest, supra note 4, at 705-07. One hopes that these scholars are at least partially correct about the impact of legal scholarship on legislation passed by Congress. The alternatives to scholarship-driven legislation are often less savory: if legislation is not shaped powerfully by scholarship, special interest groups, factions, the media, or big business may fill the void.

n8. See generally Lawrence M. Friedman & Jack Ladinski, Social Change and the Law of Industrial Accidents, 67 Colum. L. Rev. 50, 69-79 (1967) (discussing the development of worker's compensation at the height of the Progressive Era).

n9. See Robert L. Rabin, The Politics of Tort Reform, 26 Val. U. L. Rev. 709, 710-11 (1992).

n10. Joseph A. Page, Deforming Tort Reform, 78 Geo. L.J. 649, 651 (1990). Before the Progressive Era, the legal regime afforded strong protection to tortfeasors, and the "general principle of our law [was] that loss from accident must lie where it falls." Oliver W. Holmes, Jr., The Common Law 94 (Sheldon M. Novick ed., Dover Publications 1991) (1881).

n11. See Steven P. Croley & Jon D. Hanson, Rescuing the Revolution: The Revived Case for Enterprise Liability, 91 Mich. L. Rev. 683, 695-703, 706-12 (1993).

n12. See id. at 706-12.

n13. See Page, supra note 10, at 649-50.

n14. See id. at 649.

n15. See James A. Henderson, Products Liability Law: The Need for Statutory Reform, 56 N.C. L. Rev. 623, 624 (1978).

n16. See, e.g., U.S. Attorney Gen. Policy Working Group, Extent and Policy Implications of the Current Crisis in Insurance Availability and Affordability 6-15 (1986).

n17. Some scholars suggest, however, that tort law was merely the scapegoat used to cover up a crisis caused by insurers' bad business decisions. Insurance companies overextended themselves by relying on high interest rate investments during the 1970s, these scholars contend, and when these rates fell in 1984, the industry was forced to raise premiums in response. See Brenda Trollin, Controlling Liability Insurance Costs, 11 State Legis. Rep., May 1986, at 1, 1, reprinted in National Conference of State Legislatures, Resolving the Liability Insurance Crisis (1986).

n18. See, e.g., Steven A. Shavell, An Economic Analysis of Accident Law 231 (1987).

n19. See Guido Calabresi & A. Douglas Melamed, Property Rules, Liability Rules, and Inalienability: One View of the Cathedral, 85 Harv. L. Rev. 1089, 1093-98 (1972).

n20. See, e.g., Shavell, supra note 18, at 298.

n21. See Page, supra note 10, at 654.

n22. Peter W. Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences 4, 11 (1988).

n23. See id. at 79-80.

n24. See id. at 115-16, 121-22.

n25. Classical tort reform also differs from progressive reform in that it focuses on the legislative, rather than the judicial arena. See Page, supra note 10, at 654-55. Indeed, prior to 1970, "legislatures rarely initiated major changes in tort law." Nancy L. Manzer, Note, Tort Reform Legislation: A Systematic Evaluation of Caps on Damages and Limitations on Joint and Several Liability, 73 Cornell L. Rev. 628, 633 (1988).

n26. Page, supra note 10, at 654.

n27. Peter A. Bell, Legislative Intrusions into the Common Law of Medical Malpractice, 35 Syracuse L. Rev. 939, 943 (1984).

n28. See Manzer, supra note 25, at 633.

n29. See id. at 633-34.

n30. See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. 13-21-102, -102.5 (1989); Minn. Stat. Ann. 549.191 (West 1988 & Supp. 1995).

n31. See, e.g., Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 51, 155 (West 1988 & Supp. 1996) (immunizing state from liability for failure to provide police or fire protection).

Counsel's Office, White House
KOVACS/AUER, BN277

CLOSED - PRA

SUBJECT FILES

TESTIMONY BY ROSE: [CRS REQUEST FOR CONGRESS]

CLOSED - PRA [FOLDER 1]

2099-0216-S [1]

OA/NARA #: 2166 / 2077
9696

Box: _____
Folder _____

REV_00262163

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
001	Letter	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS - From: Robert Byrd	2	03/15/2002		P5;
002	Letter	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS - From: Robert Byrd	2	03/15/2002		P5;
003	Letter	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS - From: Robert Byrd	2	03/15/2002		P5;
004	Fax Cover Sheet	Office of Homeland Security - To: Brett Kavanaugh - From: Edward McNally	1	04/11/2002		P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Testimony by Ridge: [CRS Report for Congress] [Folder 1]

FRC ID:
9696

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advise between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

REV_00262164

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
005	Letter	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS - From: Robert Byrd	2	03/15/2002		P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Testimony by Ridge: [CRS Report for Congress] [Folder 1]

FRC ID:
9696

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advise between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

Counsel's Office, White House
KAVANAUGH, BRETT

CLOSED - PRA

SUBJECT FILES

TESTIMONY BY RIDGE: [CRS NEAM FOR CONGRESS]

CLOSED - PRA [Folder 2]

2014-0216-F [1]

OA/NARA #: 2166 / 2077
1696

Box: _____
Folder: _____

REV_00262166

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
001	Letter	Dear Senator Stevens and Senator Byrd - From: Andrew H. Card, Jr.	2	03/2002		P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Testimony by Ridge: |CRS Report for Congress| |Folder 2|

FRC ID:
9696

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - |44 U.S.C. 2204(a)|

P1 National Security Classified Information |(a)(1) of the PRA|
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office |(a)(2) of the PRA|
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute |(a)(3) of the PRA|
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information |(a)(4) of the PRA|
P5 Release would disclose confidential advise between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors |a)(5) of the PRA|
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy |(a)(6) of the PRA|

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - |5 U.S.C. 552(b)|

b(1) National security classified information |(b)(1) of the FOIA|
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency |(b)(2) of the FOIA|
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute |(b)(3) of the FOIA|
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information |(b)(4) of the FOIA|
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy |(b)(6) of the FOIA|
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes |(b)(7) of the FOIA|
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions |(b)(8) of the FOIA|
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells |(b)(9) of the FOIA|

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

Counsel's Office, White House
KAVANAUGH, BRETT

CLOSED - PRA

SUBJECT FILES

TESTIMONY BY RIDER; TESTIMONY ON LIMITED HOUSE OFFICIALS EXECUTIVE RIDER

CLOSED - PRA

2014-0216-F [1]

OA/NARA #: 2166 / 2077
9646

Box _____
Folder _____

REV_00262168

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
001	Memorandum	Immunity to Congressional Subpoena - To: Wendy Grubbs, Julie Nichols - From: Edward E. McNally	1	02/27/2002		P5;
002	Memorandum	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS	7	09/16/1999		P5;
003	Memorandum	Dear Mr. President - To: POTUS	7	09/16/1999		P5;
004	Email	Ridge subpoena matter - To: Brett M. Kavanaugh - From: Paul P. Colborn	2	03/18/2002		P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Testimony by Ridge: Testimony on White House Officials Governor Ridge

FRC ID:
9696

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advise between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
005	Talking Points	Talking Points - Request for Governor Ridge to Testify	2	N.D.		P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Counsel's Office, White House

SERIES:
Kavanaugh, Brett - Subject Files

FOLDER TITLE:
Testimony by Ridge: Testimony on White House Officials Governor Ridge

FRC ID:
9696

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advise between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

REV_00262171

Records Management, White House Office of (ORM)
CONFIDENTIAL FILES

JL003 (CRIME)

CLOSED - PRA

557292

NSC #: 39313

Box

Folder

CLOSED - PRA

Withdrawn/Redacted Material
The George W. Bush Library

DOCUMENT NO.	FORM	SUBJECT/TITLE	PAGES	DATE	CLASSIFICATION	RESTRICTION(S)
001b	Memorandum	[Memorandum] - To: POTUS - From: John Gordon	3	07/11/2003	Secret	P1/b1;
001e	Routing Memo	Federal Preparedness for Anthrax Attack - To: VPOTUS, et al - From: Staff Secretary	1	07/07/2003		P5;
001f	Memorandum	[Memorandum] - To: POTUS - From: John Gordon	3	07/08/2003	Unmarked	P1/b1; P5;

COLLECTION TITLE:
Records Management, White House Office of

SERIES:
Confidential Files - JL003 (Crime)

FOLDER TITLE:
551292

FRC ID:
39313

RESTRICTION CODES

Presidential Records Act - [44 U.S.C. 2204(a)]

P1 National Security Classified Information [(a)(1) of the PRA]
P2 Relating to the appointment to Federal office [(a)(2) of the PRA]
P3 Release would violate a Federal statute [(a)(3) of the PRA]
P4 Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information [(a)(4) of the PRA]
P5 Release would disclose confidential advice between the President and his advisors, or between such advisors [a)(5) of the PRA]
P6 Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(a)(6) of the PRA]

PRM. Personal record misfile defined in accordance with 44 U.S.C. 2201(3).

Deed of Gift Restrictions

A. Closed by Executive Order 13526 governing access to national security information.
B. Closed by statute or by the agency which originated the document.
C. Closed in accordance with restrictions contained in donor's deed of gift.

Freedom of Information Act - [5 U.S.C. 552(b)]

b(1) National security classified information [(b)(1) of the FOIA]
b(2) Release would disclose internal personnel rules and practices of an agency [(b)(2) of the FOIA]
b(3) Release would violate a Federal statute [(b)(3) of the FOIA]
b(4) Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential or financial information [(b)(4) of the FOIA]
b(6) Release would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of personal privacy [(b)(6) of the FOIA]
b(7) Release would disclose information compiled for law enforcement purposes [(b)(7) of the FOIA]
b(8) Release would disclose information concerning the regulation of financial institutions [(b)(8) of the FOIA]
b(9) Release would disclose geological or geophysical information concerning wells [(b)(9) of the FOIA]

Records Not Subject to FOIA

Court Sealed - The document is withheld under a court seal and is not subject to the Freedom of Information Act.

This document was prepared on Thursday, July 19, 2018

REV_00262172

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [3]

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 59
Folder 1

REV_00262173

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "mass torts" and ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*95 Colum. L. Rev. 1343, **

Copyright (c) 1995 The Columbia Law Review
Columbia Law Review

October, 1995

95 Colum. L. Rev. 1343

LENGTH: 80245 words

ARTICLE: CLASS WARS: THE DILEMMA OF THE MASS TORT CLASS ACTION

John C. Coffee, Jr. *

* Adolf A. Berle Professor of Law at Columbia University School of Law. The author testified as an expert witness for objectors at the settlement hearings in Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994), the largest of the mass tort asbestos class actions, but did so on a pro bono basis, declining all fees. Much of the information in this Article comes from interviews with plaintiffs' attorneys or objectors. The author has not received any remuneration in connection with any of the cases (or from any of the participants therein) discussed in this Article. This may seem an overly long disclaimer, but as the author will discuss elsewhere, others writing in this area have provided far too little disclosure of their very substantial entanglements with the parties.

SUMMARY:
... Recent developments in class action practice bear witness to this phenomenon: during the 1990s, evolution has given way to mutation. ... Starting with the admitted fact that the Ness, Motley firm (one of the two firms serving as lead counsel in the class action) settled its client cases for $ 138,077,100, the objectors computed that if the clients in these inventory settlements had recovered the maximum average payment that a similarly situated class member would receive under the Georgine class action, they would have received only $ 89,660,000. ... Unlike corporations that have opted for bankruptcy when faced with a mass tort class action, Dow Corning seemed intent on preserving the mass tort class action settlement; indeed, its tactical aim seems in part to have been to lock claimants within it by eliminating any incentive to opt out. ... Although the class was initially certified as an opt out settlement class, the settling parties reconsidered their position once Georgine, Ahearn, and other recent cases had shown them the feasibility of resolving personal injury claims through the vehicle of a mass tort class action. ...

TEXT:
[*1343] [*1344]

Introduction

Legal change - like organic evolution - can occur at varying paces. [1] Long periods of gradual evolution are sometimes punctuated by brief moments of rapid, irregular change. Recent

3. Concentration and Collusion. - A characteristic style of mass tort litigation also developed during the 1980s. An important aspect of this style was the high level of concentration within the plaintiffs' bar specializing in these cases. Less than fifty law firms appear to specialize in asbestos litigation, and a handful dominate the field. [73] Some thirty firms represented the majority of the Dalkon Shield claimants. [74] A closer look at the Dalkon Shield litigation reveals still another facet of this picture: individual attorneys acquire large case inventories. Of the approximately 44,000 most seriously injured victims of the Dalkon Shield (a defective intrauterine birth control device which was implanted in approximately 2.2 million American women), [75] one survey found the following levels of client concentration: some six attorneys represented 8039 claimants (or on average 1340 each), [76] and another forty-three attorneys represented some 13,174 claimants (with each attorney handling between 100 and 1000 cases - or, on average, over 300 cases each). [77] As one expert in asbestos litigation has generalized, "typically an extremely small number of firms represents massive numbers of plaintiffs; it would not be unusual for a single lawyer with four associates to represent over a thousand clients." [78]

To sum up, attorneys specializing in the mass tort field tend to accumulate a large inventory of clients with similar claims; they do so partly by direct advertising and partly through referrals from other attorneys. [*1365] More importantly, they also tend to deal in inventories, settling their cases not on an individual basis, but on an inventory-wide basis with a particular defendant. [79] Here, different styles exist, with some plaintiffs' law firms being characterized as "boutique firms" that screen clients carefully and bring actions only on behalf of severely injured claimants for high damages, and other firms being known as "wholesalers" who seek to represent a large number of claimants but invest little in individual case preparation. [80] In either case, however, litigation decisions are made by attorneys in terms of their impact on the entire portfolio of claims in the firm's inventory. [81] After all, even a boutique firm may invest heavily in scientific evidence for an individual case and take it to trial largely to establish the market value of other cases in its inventory.

The concentration within the plaintiffs' bar is more than matched on the defendants' side. In early cases, a defective product or toxic substance was typically produced by a single manufacturer (for example, A.H. Robins Co. made the Dalkon Shield; Richardson-Merrell manufactured Bendectin; and Dow Corning was the first and by far the largest manufacturer of silicone breast implants. n82) Even in the case of asbestos, where an industry of about thirty firms manufactured asbestos products, the producer of the asbestos products used at a particular site could usually be identified. Thus, litigation could focus on a principal defendat - and negotiations would be with a single defense counsel. As asbestos litigation developed during the 1980s, asbestos-producing defendants organized into a consortium to pursue common defense and settlement strategies, united behind a single counsel. [83] In practice, therefore, mass tort litigation is reduced to battles between repeat players who have litigated and negotiated settlements in similar cases many times in the past.

During the 1980s, this concentration and familiarity among the litigants was for the first time matched by a corresponding consolidation at the judicial level, as mass tort cases came to be transferred (at least for [*1366] discovery purposes) before a single judge. Either as a result of bankruptcy proceedings (which act as a stay of pending litigation against the insolvent firm) or a transfer order by the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation (JPML), huge numbers of related mass tort claims came under the control of individual judges. For example, Judge Robert Merhige of the Eastern District of Virginia oversaw the resolution of some 195,000 Dalkon Shield claims, [84] and Judge Jack Weinstein of the Eastern District of New York handled proceedings which resolved over 240,000 Agent Orange claims. [85] In 1991, when the JPML transferred all pending asbestos claims in federal court to Judge Charles Wiener, some 27,000 actions, many of which had been litigated elsewhere for years, were transferred overnight to the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. [86] This pattern of universal transfer contrasts sharply with the pattern in securities or antitrust litigation. There, although a trial judge may have substantial experience with a particular cause of action, no court has plaintiffs in its hand.

n385. 417 U.S. 156, 17778 (1974).

n386. See, e.g., In re Copley Pharmaceutical, Inc., "Albuterol" Prods. Liab. Litig., 161 F.R.D. 456, 460 (D. Wyo. 1995) (finding that consideration of merits of plaintiffs' claims is "expressly prohibited" when deciding whether to decertify class).

n387. Eisen, 417 U.S. at 177.

n388. See supra text accompanying notes 52, 5862.

n389. Indeed, this is the most common type of mass tort class action that has been actually certified. See, e.g., In re School Asbestos Litig., 789 F.2d 996, 1008 (3d Cir.) (certifying limited class action that contemplated "individual damages suits"), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 852 (1986); Castano v. American Tobacco Co., No. 94-1044, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2005, at *41 (E.D. La. Feb. 17, 1995) (partial class certified with court specifically excluding individualized issues of injury-in-fact, proximate cause, reliance, affirmative defenses, and compensatory damages as unsuitable for class treatment); Copley Pharmaceutical, "Albuterol" Products Liab. Litig., 161 F.R.D. at 458 (partial class action with court excluding issues of causation, injury, and damages as not suitable for class treatment); Jenkins v. Raymark Industries, Inc., 109 F.R.D. 269, 27980 (E.D. Tex. 1985) (certifying a limited class action on liability and related issues, but excluding all individualized issues in the case, such as exposure, causation, injury and compensatory damages, which would instead be tried later), aff'd, 782 F.2d 468, 47072 (5th Cir. 1986); Delgazzo v. Kenny, 628 A.2d 1080, 1091 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1991) (certifying limited class, but excluding issues of failure to cure, reliance, and damages). In contrast, very few decisions have certified a nationwide class of personal injury claims for all purposes. The leading example (and arguably the only non-bankruptcy example in which appellate courts have not reversed certification) is In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 100 F.R.D. 718 (E.D.N.Y. 1983), mandamus denied sub nom. In re Diamond Shamrock Chems. Co., 725 F.2d 858 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1067 (1984). A unique fact about the Agent Orange class action was the existence of a common defense to all individual or class claims (the military contractor defense). See In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 818 F.2d 145, 166 (2d Cir. 1987) (quoting Diamond Shamrock, 725 F.2d at 860 and citing the existence of this defense as the "cardinal fact" about the case), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1004 (1988).

n390. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1303 (7th Cir. 1995).

n391. See Arthur Young & Co. v. United States Dist. Court, 549 F.2d 686 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 298 (1977). In some limited circumstances, the Seventh Amendment has been held to require trial of all issues before a single jury. See Gasoline Prods. v. Champlin Refining Co., 283 U.S. 494 (1931). The right to a unitary jury trial is not, however, an absolute one and truly applies only when the issues proposed to be bifurcated are "so interwoven ... that the [one] cannot be submitted to the jury independently of the [other] without confusion and uncertainty which would amount to a denial of a fair trial." Arthur Young, 549 F.2d at 693 (citing United Air Lines v. Wiener, 286 F.2d 302, 306 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 366 U.S. 924 (1961)). Later cases have upheld the power of a trial judge to certify the class only with respect to certain issues, reserving the other issues for a separate determination. See In re United States Fin. Sec. Litig., 609 F.2d 411 (9th Cir. 1979).

n392. This could either benefit or hurt the individual plaintiff. It would mean that artificial occupational exposure standards (such as a 10-year exposure rule) could not bar the plaintiff from proving individual causation, but it would also allow defendants to demonstrate that subsequent scientific discoveries disproved that, for example, silicone gel breast implants were related to specific illnesses. In effect, the policy here is not to blind the court with out-of-date scientific assumptions.

REV_00262273

n393. By one estimate, plaintiffs actually receive only 39% of every dollar expended on asbestos litigation, with the remainder being consumed by the transaction costs of both sides. See supra note 15.

n394. In August 1995, New York Life Insurance Company reached a class action settlement with its policyholders that was uniquely structured to provide both class relief and individualized damages for those class members who wished to opt to pursue a special ADR alternative before an arbitration forum established pursuant to the settlement. See Notice of Class Action, Proposed Settlement, Settlement Hearing, and Right to Appear at 48, Willson v. New York Life Ins. Co., No. 94/127804 (N.Y. Sup. Ct., N.Y. County Aug. 1995) (on file with the Columbia Law Review); Michael Quint, New York Life in Accord on Class Action Settlement, N.Y. Times, Aug. 15, 1995, at D2. All class members will be entitled to certain class relief (basically low-interest rate loans), but those class members who were dissatisfied with this relief could either opt out of the class action during an initial opt out period and sue individually or pursue an arbitration remedy that was elaborately designed by the settlement agreement and that provides for the award of monetary damages within specified ranges according to defined criteria. The New York Life settlement does not involve a future claimant class and does place clear boundaries on the damages that can be awarded (unlike the structure here proposed), but it is an innovative, thoughtful model.

n395. This Article, however, does argue that the current adequacy of representation standard should bar an attorney from serving as class counsel where he or she has reached roughly contemporaneous inventory settlements with the defendants or certain other settlements that are linked to his or her prospective service as class counsel. See infra notes 401403 and accompanying text.

n396. See Deborah L. Rhode, Class Conflicts in Class Actions, 34 Stan. L. Rev. 1183, 1183 (1982).

n397. See supra text accompanying notes 108113, 172214.

n398. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 31819 (E.D. Pa. 1994). Georgine relies on a labor law decision in which a labor union was permitted to represent the whole class, and subclassing was rejected. See Clark Equip. Co. v. International Union, Allied Indus. Workers, 803 F.2d 878, 880 (6th Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 934 (1987). Suffice it to say that this is a very different context.

The Supreme Court has held "the burden of constructing subclasses ... is upon the [party seeking class certification] and it is he who is required to submit proposals to the court." United States Parole Comm'n v. Geraghty, 445 U.S. 388, 408 (1980).

n399. In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litig., 643 F.2d 195, 211 n.25 (5th Cir. 1981).

n400. See In re Chicken Antitrust Litig., 669 F.2d 228, 23638 (5th Cir. Unit B 1982) (upholding interclass sharing with a subclass of plaintiffs who lacked standing where each subclass had adequate representation).

n401. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(4).

n402. Obviously, such an overbroad rule would disqualify any attorney experienced in the field. In the context of a settlement class action, however, it is critical to bar the defendants from selecting such an attorney as the plaintiffs' representative with whom to negotiate the settlement.

REV_00262274

n403. In Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc. 157 F.R.D. 246, 298 (E.D. Pa. 1994), the settling parties took the position that future claimants were not similarly situated to present claimants and thus that they need not receive similar compensation. Their ethics expert, Professor John P. Freeman, argued (and the court explicitly agreed) that the fact that many claimants had received cash compensation under the inventory settlements whereas persons with similar injuries would not receive cash compensation under the class action, did not create a conflict of interest for the plaintiffs' attorneys representing both because the two classes of clients had "different expectations." Specifically, the present claimants had "a realistic expectation" that their cases would be resolved within the tort system and future claimants did not. Id. at 298. In truth, it seems hopelessly metaphysical to talk of the expectations of future claimants when most do not know that they have been injured. However, to the extent that future claimants have lesser expectations, this defines the problem, rather than solves it, because they are accurately expecting inferior treatment under the class action. In contrast, future claimants in individual actions will predictably do better than present claimants because the one clear pattern is that recoveries in mass tort cases rise steadily over time.

n404. See id. at 318.

n405. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d 721, 745 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993).

n406. See, e.g., In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 996 F.2d 1425, 1435 (2d Cir. 1993) (noting that providing an opt out right to a person "unaware of an injury would probably do no good"), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1125 (1994).

n407. See Arthur R. Miller & David Crump, Jurisdiction and Choice of Law In Multistate Class Actions After Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 96 Yale L.J. 1, 39 (1986).

n408. 472 U.S. 797 (1985).

n409. Agent Orange, 996 F.2d at 1435 (quoting 1 Newberg & Conte, supra note 96, 1.23, at 1-56).

n410. The decision describes the benefits from the right to opt out as "conjectural at best." Id.

n411. See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797 (1985); Brown v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 982 F.2d 386, 392 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. dismissed, 114 S. Ct. 1359 (1994). For an overview, see Miller & Crump, supra note 407, at 3857.

n412. See, e.g., Thomas D. Rowe, Jr., Jurisdiction and Transfer Proposals for Complex Litigation, 10 Rev. Litig. 325, 360 n.141 (1991) (asserting that Shutts mandates a right to opt out only for "known plaintiffs" who lack minimum contacts with the forum).

n413. See Trangsrud, Mass Trials, supra note 4, at 7476.

n414. See American Bar Ass'n Section of Litig., Report and Recommendations of the Special Committee on Class Action Improvements, 110 F.R.D. 195, 202 (1986); Baughman, supra note 2, at 23941; Friedman, supra note 6, at 745.

n415. See supra text accompanying notes 254264.

n416. Relatively few such litigants succeed in being able to transfer back to the original jurisdiction in which they filed the action. See supra note 183.

REV_00262275

n417. Professor Trangsrud has made the case for consolidation in preference to a class action, and this position closely resembles an opt in system. See Trangsrud, Joinder Alternatives, supra note 4, at 83149.

n418. See Friedman, supra note 6, at 751.

n419. See id.; see also John E. Kennedy, Class Actions: The Right to Opt Out, 25 Ariz. L. Rev. 3, 72 (1983) (citing studies showing failure of significant numbers of plaintiffs to opt out of Rule 23(b)(3) actions).

n420. 143 F.R.D. 141 (S.D. Ohio 1992), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993).

n421. See id. at 147.

n422. Id. at 150.

n423. See id.

n424. In addition, certain class members who qualified for valve replacement surgery but declined it were also permitted to sue on a delayed basis for emotional injury. See id.

n425. In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709, 745 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 959 (1989).

n426. Walters v. National Ass'n of Radiation Survivors, 473 U.S. 305, 320 (1985); see also Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 34344 (1976) (noting that due process is flexible and calling for those procedural protections demanded by the particular situation).

n427. See Walters, 473 U.S. at 32021.

n428. See supra text accompanying notes 108113.

n429. There is, of course, a Seventh Amendment objection to limiting the opting out plaintiff to an arbitration remedy and thus precluding any right to a jury trial. Here the doctrinal answer might be that because there is no recognized constitutional right to a delayed opt out right, there is also no constitutional right to a jury trial at this stage. In effect, the class member is simply being accorded a privilege to seek a better award in arbitration, and the court is relying upon that privilege to find that the proposed class action satisfies the "superiority" standard applicable to a Rule 23(b)(3) class action.

n430. An obvious analogy exists to another area of group decisionmaking: namely, the supermajority requirement for fundamental changes (such as mergers, liquidations and related events) in the corporation codes of many states. Although today only a minority of the states (including New York, see N. Y. Bus. Corp. Law 903(a)(2) (Consol. 1983)) still require a supermajority approval, it used to be a universal requirement. See Ronald J. Gilson & Bernard S. Black, The Law and Finance of Corporate Acquisitions 64243 (2d ed. 1995). For a history of the shift from the unanimous shareholder consent rule of the 19th century to the rule in force in most jurisdictions today (and the efficiency implications of different voting rules), see William Carney, Fundamental Corporate Changes, Minority Shareholders and Business Purposes, 1980 Am. B. Found. Res. J. 69.

n431. In terms of its incentive effects, a delayed right to opt out should encourage defendants to (1) insert more cells into a settlement grid, thereby increasing the differentiation among class memebers; and (2) tilt the monetary relief toward the more seriously injured claimants. These conclusions follow because small claimants (i.e. those with lesser injuries) have less incentive to opt out because they (and their attorneys) face high transaction costs and considerable docket delay in pursuing individual cases. For example, assume in an asbestos class action that the ratio of asbestosis victims (i.e., a lesser injury) to lung cancer victims is 10:1. In the absence of a delayed right to opt out, the settlement grid might provide that the former cases would receive $ 10,000 each and the latter $ 100,000. Under a delayed opt out system, it would instead be in the interest of the defendants to move to a settlement grid that awarded the former claimants only $ 5000 and the latter $ 150,000; under both formulas, defendants make the same aggregate payouts, but there is a reduced risk that "high stakes" claims will opt out under the second formula. Also, defendants might seek to differentiate asbestosis claimants into multiple categories, awarding some only $ 4000 or $ 3000 and others $ 6000 or $ 7000 - again to deter opting out by those with stronger claims. Normatively, this implication that the worst injured will receive higher awards (at the expense of the less injured) seems desirable. Of course, the more that claims are differentiated in this fashion, the greater the need becomes for subclasses and separate representation.

REV_00262276

n432. 472 U.S. 797 (1985).

n433. Id. at 811 n.3 (emphasis added).

n434. 996 F.2d 1425 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1125 (1994).

n435. Id. at 1435.

n436. Id. at 1437.

n437. For the argument that notice and a right to opt out should be constitutionally required when present and future claimants are disparately treated or when prospects for success are stronger, see Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 14669, 17683).

n438. See supra notes 115 and 300 and accompanying text.

n439. Such a proposal has been made by the Manhattan Institute. See Peter Passell, Windfall Fees in Injury Cases Under Assault, N.Y. Times, Feb. 11, 1994, at A1, B18. For a critique, see John C. Coffee, Jr., Regulating Plaintiffs' Attorneys, N.Y. L.J., Sept. 22, 1994, at 5, 6.

n440. The danger that unofficial preliminary negotiations could degenerate into lawyer-shopping has long been understood by appellate courts, even if they have done little to prevent it. See Ace Heating & Plumbing Co. v. Crane Co., 453 F.2d 30, 33 (3d Cir. 1971) (quoted supra at note 128).

n441. For this observation, see In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 790 n.10 (3d Cir. 1995); see also Moore v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 47, 48 (1971) (dismissing action for lack of Art. III case or controversy where both parties sought to uphold constitutionality of anti-busing law); United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 302, 305 (1943) (dismissing action where plaintiff instituted a "friendly suit" at defendant's request); Teamsters Local 513 v. Wojcik, 325 F. Supp. 989, 99192 (E.D. Pa. 1971) (denying declaratory relief for lack of actual controversy where both parties sought the same determination and where no specific conclusive relief existed).

n442. See In re Ford Motor Co. Bronco II Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CA MDL-991, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3507, at *31 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 1995).

n443. See General Motors, 55 F.3d at 81819; Bloyed v. General Motors Corp., 881 S.W.2d 422, 433 (Tex. Ct. App. 1994).

REV_00262277

n444. See supra note 286 and accompanying text.

n445. The court could, for example, advertise the position by requesting applications to be filed with it. Judge Vaughan Walker has used this procedure in conducting auctions for the position of lead counsel. See In re Oracle Sec. Litig., 131 F.R.D. 688, 697 (N.D. Cal. 1990). Although auctions pose additional issues, there seems no inherent reason why an attorney must have already filed an action to be chosen lead counsel in a class action.

n446. See supra text accompanying notes 248249.

n447. See supra text accompanying notes 192214.

n448. For example, ATLA had a Breast Implants Litigation Group (BILG) that began to meet shortly after the FDA's 1992 decision to impose a moratorium on the cosmetic use of implants. In October 1993, over 300 attorneys belonging to BILG met to discuss developments in the class action and whether to recommend that clients opt out from it. See Andrew Blum, Some Grumble Over Implant Pact, But Approval is Expected, Nat'l L.J., Oct. 18, 1993, at 3, 52. Meetings on such a scale suggest at least that active monitoring is feasible.

n449. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 160 F.R.D. 478, 518 (E.D. Pa. 1995).

n450. In the Silicone Gel litigation, Judge Pointer circulated a comment form to class members in 1994. He reported that "less than 1/3 of 1% of those to whom notices were sent and only slightly more than 1% of those who have already registered under the settlement" voiced negative comments. In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *14 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). In absolute terms, some 7800 persons in the United States and 6500 persons outside the United States opted out as of the initial opt out period, but this came to less than 5% of putative class members. See id. at *16. In general, the rate of opting out tends to be low. See Willging et al., supra note 14, at 5051 (finding in their survey of two federal districts that not more than one to two percent of class members appeared to opt out in any case in their survey).

n451. This is particularly true in those circuits (most notably the Seventh Circuit) where recent precedents suggest that a mass tort class action for personal injuries may not be certified. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 12961304 (7th Cir. 1995); Malcolm v. National Gypsum Co., 995 F.2d 346, 350 (2d Cir. 1993).

n452. See 2 Newberg & Conte, supra note 96, 11.27, at 11-53 ("There is no doubt that the use of a temporary settlement class tends to short-circuit the class certification process if the class settlement is approved.").

n453. See, e.g., Bowling v. Pfizer, Inc., 143 F.R.D. 141, 160 (S.D. Ohio 1992) (noting "egalitarian" nature of distributing costs among those who share same risk of injury), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993).

n454. See In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 792800 (3d Cir. 1995).

n455. Baby Neal v. Casey, 43 F.3d 48, 56 (3d Cir. 1994).

n456. The analogy in the corporate setting would be if an acquiring firm could negotiate a merger with a minority of the board of directors after the majority had turned it down.

n457. My colleague, Professor Mark Roe, has detailed a variety of ways in which overhanging contingent tort liabilities can bring about the firm's operational collapse. See

REV_00262278

Mark J. Roe, Bankruptcy and Mass Tort, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 846, 85662 (1984). He focuses in particular upon: (1) blocked access to the capital markets; (2) the slow liquidation of the firm; (3) the incentive to undertake high risk, negative present value investments; (4) the barrier to efficient mergers; and (5) the diversion of managerial time.

n458. See supra notes 254264 and accompanying text.

n459. For a representative example of this mode of analysis, see Christopher F. Edley, Jr. & Paul C. Weiler, Asbestos: A Multi-Billion-Dollar Crisis, 30 Harv. J. on Legis. 383, 396 (1993). For a critique of this view, see Siliciano, supra note 18 (manuscript at 1316).

n460. See Roe, supra note 457, at 85064; Smith, supra note 61, at 37278. Interestingly, the best documented criticism of Chapter 11 is that it provides too much protection to corporate debtors, allowing them to remain in reorganization for too long and thus delay their creditors. See Lynn M. LoPucki, The Trouble with Chapter 11, 1993 Wis. L. Rev. 729, 74549. While this may reduce the value of the recovery to tort creditors, it reduces the injury and disruption to other constituencies and certainly does not support the claim that bankruptcy means operational cessation.

n461. See Roe, supra note 457, at 85051. For a fuller discussion of the normative foundations of bankruptcy law, see Thomas H. Jackson, Bankruptcy, Non-Bankruptcy Entitlements and the Creditors' Bargain, 91 Yale L.J. 857 (1982). The absolute priority rule is today reflected in the Bankruptcy Code's requirements for confirmation of a plan of reorganization. See 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2) (1994). These provisions prohibit confirmation of a plan that permits a junior class to participate in the distribution unless the claims of all senior classes are paid in full.

n462. For the sharp increase in Fibreboard's stock price on the announcement of its settlement, see supra notes 231233 and accompanying text. In Hayden, the primary defendant also claimed to be on the edge of insolvency. See supra note 272.

n463. The direct costs of corporate reorganization have been estimated at 2.8% of the issuer's assets. See Lawrence A. Weiss, Bankruptcy Resolution: Direct Costs and Violation of Priority of Claims, 27 J. Fin. Econ. 285, 289 (1990). For the typical costs in mass tort litigation, see supra note 15.

n464. The contrast alluded to in the text is that between the Johns-Manville re-organization and the Ahearn settlement. For a fuller discussion of the Johns-Manville experience, see Harvey J. Kesner, Future Asbestos Related Litigants as Holders of Statutory Claims under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code and Their Place in the Johns-Manville Reorganization, 62 Am. Bankr. L.J. 69 (1988).

n465. See supra text accompanying notes 187214.

n466. The Third Circuit has acknowledged this inherent danger in the use of settlement classes. See In re General Motors Pick-up Truck Fuel Tanks Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 787 (3d Cir. 1995).

n467. For this conclusion, see Georgene M. Vairo, The Dalkon Shield Claimants Trust: Paradigm Lost (or Found)?, 61 Fordham L. Rev. 617, 65160 (1992).

n468. For this assessment, see Siliciano, supra note 18 (manuscript at 1415). In terms of its capacity for debtor rehabilitation, the bankruptcy reorganization has distinct advantages: First, the corporation can obtain low-cost, federally-guaranteed debtor-in-possession financing in bankruptcy, but not in a class action. Second, the reorganization plan need not involve any cash payment to the tort creditors, but can (as in Johns-Manville) transfer a majority block of its stock to a settlement fund (to be sold or managed by the fund's trustees for the benefit of the tort creditors). Thus, bankruptcy reorganizations need not involve any drain on the firm's cash flow. Third, management is not automatically removed under Chapter 11. Rather, the presumption is the reverse: namely, that Chapter 11 allows the debtor-in-possession to retain management and control of the debtor's business operations unless a party can prove that appointment of a trustee is warranted. See In re Ionosphere Clubs, Inc., 113 B.R. 164, 167 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1990). Chapter 11 does, however, threaten the incumbent management that has proved inferior, and this may be the real reason for its unpopularity. See Lynn M. LoPucki & William C. Whitford, Patterns in the Bankruptcy Reorganization of Large, Publicly Held Companies, 78 Cornell L. Rev. 597, 61011 (1993) (in 70% of the large reorganization cases studied, there was a change of CEO during the pendency of the Chapter 11 proceeding).

REV_00262279

n469. Bankruptcy fee awards tend to be lower than in class actions, in part because there is less contingency risk. In turn, this means that more can go to the creditors. One of the motivating factors that induced Johns-Manville to elect Chapter 11 was its sense "that too little was going to the victims." Kesner, supra note 464, at 72 n.10. It believed that the bankruptcy court or the settlement trust could more easily restrict excessive contingency fees. Of course, class action courts have also attempted to do this - but with the negative consequence of encouraging opt outs. See supra note 300. To state the obvious, plaintiffs' attorneys cannot opt out of bankruptcy proceedings.

n470. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

n471. Many today would doubt that corporations should receive greater limited liability. See, e.g., Henry Hansmann & Reinier Kraakman, Toward Unlimited Shareholder Liability for Corporate Torts, 100 Yale L.J. 1879 (1991) (favoring unlimited shareholder liability for corporate torts); Christopher D. Stone, The Place of Enterprise Liability in the Control of Corporate Conduct, 90 Yale L.J. 1, 65 (1980) (limited liability for involuntary debts undermines deterrence).

n472. See, e.g., Mullenix, supra note 11; Rosenberg, supra note 8; Sherman, supra note 11.

n473. See, e.g., Baughman, supra note 2, at 23241; Friedman, supra note 6, at 75663; see also Bruce H. Nielson, Was the 1966 Advisory Committee Right?: Suggested Revisions of Rule 23 to Allow More Frequent Use of Class Actions in Mass Tort Litigation, 25 Harv. J. on Legis. 461, 490 (1988) (proposing an amendment to Rule 23(b)(1) requiring mandatory classes "when the court deems class action treatment necessary to protect the rights of potential claimants").

n474. See Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 10405). I should indicate that I believe Professor Koniak's outrage to be justified and eloquent. This still leaves open, however, the question of what reforms will work.

n475. See supra notes 283289 and accompanying text.

n476. In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1304 (7th Cir. 1995).

n477. See Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 10846, 190202).

n478. Such proposals are now being considered. See Bone, supra note 24, at 8386.

n479. Cases, such as In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768 (3d Cir. 1995), provide some basis for optimism, particularly in the Third Circuit panel's clear recognition of the powerful "hydraulic pressures confronted by courts adjudicating very large and complex actions" that can "erode the protections afforded by [Rule 23] almost entirely." Id. at 799.

REV_00262280

n480. This Article has argued that the litigant autonomy interest most deserving protection is the right of the "high stakes" plaintiff to secure an individualized damages determination. This could be realized by "limited" class actions in which the individualized determination was made by a state court or an arbitration forum or through delayed opt out rights (in the case of future claimant classes). Conversely, the litigant autonomy interests least capable of protection and most susceptible to constraint are the individual litigant's desire to receive punitive damages and to obtain an individual jury trial.

n481. Legal rules that more equitably allocate cases hold particular promise. When the JPML decided to transfer all pending asbestos personal injury litigation to a single forum, it chose the Eastern District of Pennsylvania in part because "more asbestos personal injury or wrongful death actions [were] pending in that district than any other." In re Asbestos Prods. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp. 415, 42223 (J.P.M.L. 1991). This may be the most perverse and counterproductive criterion to use (if one is concerned about the danger of non-adversarial settlements) because it ensures that the settlement process will be supervised by a judge who is under more pressure than any other to achieve a settlement at all costs.

n482. Independent of their impact on average settlement values, reforms that increase litigant autonomy can be defended on grounds of natural justice. This topic is beyond the scope of this Article.

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "mass torts" and ("punitive damages" /5 "jury trial" and "seventh amendment") (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, September 27, 2002 - 4:04 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262281

ever had all pending securities or antitrust actions consolidated before it.

Nor would any trial court have the same incentive to achieve a global resolution of all pending securities or antitrust actions. Around 300 securities class actions have been filed annually in federal court over recent years. Although often criticized as "strike suits" or "frivolous," such actions do not amount to a significant burden on the federal docket and amount to approximately ten percent of the class actions filed in federal court each year. [87] In contrast, mass tort filings impose a far larger burden, and, as discussed later, decisions made by the JPML to consolidate all such pending actions before a single judge were clearly made with the hope of inducing a global resolution.

These circumstances supply the preconditions for collusion between defendants and a favored plaintiffs' counsel: repeat players, a single fo [*1367] rum in which the court is eager to achieve a global settlement, and "passive" future claimants. But how is collusion actually implemented? Here, it is critical to distinguish between the traditional techniques (which have long been observed in corporate and securities litigation) and the new techniques that have developed in mass tort litigation.

C. The "Old" Collusion

Collusion within the class action context essentially requires an agreement - actual or implicit - by which the defendants receive a "cheaper" than arm's length settlement and the plaintiffs' attorneys receive in some form an above-market attorneys' fee. The mechanics of such an agreement varies with the litigation context. In the corporate and securities litigation settings, the standard means has been the nonpecuniary settlement: the plaintiff sues for money damages, but the final settlement awards only therapeutic relief - new bylaws, additional disclosure to shareholders, and other frequently cosmetic changes. [88] In return for this bloodless settlement, defendants either pay the plaintiffs' attorneys' fees themselves or agree not to contest the plaintiffs' attorneys' application for court-awarded fees from the corporation. [89] In the latter case, the plaintiff shareholder class suffers twice: first, by the abandonment of their claim for money damages, and second, by the payment of a fee by their corporation to a plaintiffs' attorney who has not performed any valuable service.

In the mass tort and antitrust contexts, a variation on the nonpecuniary settlement (known informally as a "scrip settlement") has become popular, involving discount coupons or certificates granting the injured class the right to buy the defendant's product at a discount. [90] Often, the discount is no greater than what an individual plaintiff could receive for a volume purchase, or for a cash sale, or for using a particular credit card, [*1368] and typically restrictions are placed on its transferability. In the General Motors "side-saddle" fuel tank case (a mass tort product liability case), the Third Circuit remanded a settlement under which the plaintiff class would receive a scrip certificate in the face amount of $ 1000, which would be redeemable against a purchase of a GM light duty truck (worth possibly $ 20,000 at retail - or a five percent discount). [91] The Third Circuit panel was concerned not only with the low percentage value of the coupon (i.e., five percent), but also with the restrictions on its transfer, the infrequency of pickup truck purchases by most class members, and the possibility of an inequitable distribution that primarily benefitted major car fleet owners. [92] But such a settlement is predictable, because it maximizes the interests of the defendants, the plaintiffs' attorneys, and the few class members (i.e., the car fleet owners) with sufficiently large economic interests to undertake to monitor the litigation and protest. Ultimately, if the GM settlement had passed judicial scrutiny, the plaintiffs' attorneys would have been able to multiply the $ 1000 certificate received by each class member by the 5.7 million customers in the class (who had previously purchased GM trucks with "side-saddle" tanks that were alleged to explode on minor collisions) and claim that they had thereby created a $ 5.7 billion benefit for the class (upon which "fund" their attorneys' fees could be based). [93]

REV_00262184

Another recent variation, known as a "cy pres settlement," involves making a payment in kind of goods or services, not to the plaintiff class but to a third party (often a charity) for the indirect benefit of the class. A 1994 case, In re Matzo Food Products Litigation, [94] illustrates this pattern. Convicted under the Sherman Antitrust Act for fixing the prices of matzo and matzo products, B. Manischewitz Co. was sued in a class action brought by several grocery stores on behalf of all retail stores. Under a quickly negotiated settlement agreement, Manischewitz agreed (1) to create a "Food Products Fund," consisting of matzo products that would be distributed to specific charities for a four-year period; and (2) to pay plaintiffs' attorneys between $ 450,000 and $ 500,000. [95] The cynically disposed might see this settlement as an excellent way of simultaneously disposing of both stale matzos and a difficult litigation.

[*1369] Although the Matzo Food Products court was unable to swallow this settlement, other courts have regularly accepted similar cy pres settlements. [96] It may at first seem puzzling that they do so, but several linked factors probably explain this pattern. First, judicial time is a scarce commodity, which courts struggle to allocate sensibly to high priority matters. "Small claimant" class actions are seldom regarded by courts as among their priorities. Securities class actions, for example, almost never get to trial. One important reason for this phenomenon is that trial judges refuse to give them priority on their trial calendar. Yet, unless the "small claimant" class action can somehow be resolved, it will drag on, consuming scarce judicial time. Indeed, such actions can be prolific generators of motions and discovery disputes (whether because plaintiffs sometimes exploit their "nuisance value" or because defendants with deeper financial pockets sometimes believe they can exhaust the plaintiffs' attorneys' financial resources and force a cheap settlement). As a result, courts are eager to see such cases settled and may tend not to examine the basis for settlement with the same skepticism they might bring to cases or matters they deem more important.

Second, most of the cases in which dubious nonpecuniary consideration has been the primary basis for settlement have been "small claimant" class actions. Even if the plaintiffs received a monetary recovery, that recovery would be spread so thinly over a broad plaintiffs' class as to produce little or no meaningful benefit to any individual class member. Usually, these cases have involved either property damage (not personal injuries) or antitrust violations causing small losses to a nationwide class of victims.

Third, the trial court has a limited range of options: basically, it can reject the settlement, or it can approve the settlement but then award only very modest attorneys' fees, thereby signaling its lack of confidence in the outcome. [97] Because the action will still linger on if the settlement [*1370] is rejected, the second option imposes less of a burden on the court. But, over time, a small fee award may in turn only encourage underinvestment by plaintiffs' attorneys in such cases. That is, the low cost plaintiffs' attorney (whom defendants scorn as a "strike suiter") may still be able to earn a positive economic return on such cases - but only if the attorney radically reduces the investment in the case and offers defendants a low cost settlement, which is cheaper to them than further litigation.

In any event, the best and bottom line generalization here is not that courts are incapable of detecting the signs of collusion, but that they will not invest scarce judicial time in monitoring "small claimant" class actions; thus they approve some dubious settlements as the lesser evil when dismissal on the merits is not possible. [98]

One "old" form of collusion is not limited to the "small claimant" class action. It involves what this Article will call a "reverse auction," namely a jurisdictional competition among different teams of plaintiffs' attorneys in different actions that involve the same underlying allegations.

REV_00262185

The first team to settle with the defendants in effect precludes the others (who may have originated the action and litigated it with sufficient skill and zeal that the defendants were eager to settle with someone else). A recent recurring scenario involves an inactively litigated action in state court being brought and settled so as to preclude a decision in a more aggressively litigated federal action. Indeed, several recent cases have upheld releases granted in connection with settlements in state courts as a bar to a federal class action - even where the federal action raised principally federal law claims, which the state court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to adjudicate. [99] Conversely, an important new Ninth Circuit decision has taken the opposite position and refused to grant preclusive effect to such a state court settlement where the federal claims were clearly independent and unrelated to the state claims. [100]

For the moment, the doctrinal tension among these cases is less important than understanding the transactional pattern. Assume a meritorious class action raising federal claims (for example, securities fraud) is brought in federal court and plaintiffs decline to settle it on terms that are attractive to the defendants. At this point, a parallel or "shadow" ac [*1371] tion parroting some of the factual allegations in the federal action may be filed in a state court. Because federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, [101] a state court cannot adjudicate the federal law issues. Although claim preclusion of the federal claims is thus not possible, issue preclusion poses a grayer question. In principle, issue preclusion applies only to those issues that could have been litigated in the action, but an adverse judgment in the state court on claims that were essentially counterparts to the federal claims would probably bar federal adjudication of claims over which a federal court had exclusive jurisdiction. [102] Thus, if the collusive plaintiff were to draft a complaint that simply parrots the disclosure issues in an earlier filed federal action and were to file this copycat action in state court, the settlement of the state action would seemingly have preclusive effect on the previously filed federal action, notwithstanding exclusive federal jurisdiction over securities fraud claims, at least when the state court had subject matter jurisdiction over a corresponding state cause of action that relied on the same operative facts.

Now comes the final twist: assume that incident to the state court settlement, the class representative in the state class action grants a release covering all possible claims that the class members then hold against the defendants. The Third and First Circuits have recently said that the effect of such a release is broader than an adverse judgment in the state action. [103] Such a release, they have said, can bar all claims that the plaintiff could have asserted against the defendants in any forum (at least if the state court settlement does not violate the Due Process Clause).

The practical impact of this approach is that it allows the defendants to pick and choose the plaintiff team with which they will deal. Indeed, it signals to the unscrupulous plaintiffs' attorney that by filing a parallel, shadow action in state court, it can underbid the original plaintiffs' attorney team that researched, prepared and filed the action. [104] The net re [*1372] sult is that defendants can seek the lowest bidder from among these rival groups and negotiate with each simultaneously. Much in this scenario resembles game theory's classic "prisoner's dilemma," where the theoretical outcome is that the two prisoners, unable to agree upon a binding deal between themselves, will reach a suboptimal outcome. [105]

In overview, the critical factor essential to collusion is competition among teams of plaintiffs' attorneys that the defendants can exploit. Here, it happens because the parallel action in state court cannot be consolidated by the JPML with the federal action or actions. Once rival plaintiff teams are in competition with each other, and each is able to agree to a binding settlement of a nationwide class action, [106] the "reverse auction" can begin. No explicit agreement among the participants is needed; all that is necessary is that each team of plaintiffs' attorneys sees that it can be divested of any participation in the action unless it reaches a settlement with the defendants first. Already, there have been indications that such an auction, once unique to the corporate and securities arena, is developing in mass tort cases as well. [107] Such "reverse auctions" [*1373] can occur in other ways, but examining these techniques requires that we first focus on the special dynamics of mass tort litigation.

REV_00262186

D. The "New" Collusion

1. Inventory Settlements. - At least potentially, courts can respond to signs of collusion (or, more precisely, "non-adversarial" settlements) by reducing the plaintiffs' attorneys' fee award (which in virtually every jurisdiction must be approved by the court in the case of a class action). But in the mass tort context, this may be a particularly ineffective weapon.

To understand its ineffectiveness, one must remember that the mass tort plaintiffs' attorney typically has an inventory of cases that the attorney represents on an individual basis. Often, the inventory may exceed several thousand cases. Normally, the individual cases in this inventory will move slowly through the litigation pipeline and settle only once a trial date has been set. [108] Thus, the plaintiffs' attorney's tactical goal is to expedite cases, pushing them through the pipeline to the eve of trial (and predictable settlement). Conversely, defendants in the mass tort setting are concerned less about existing cases than future claimants, who may dwarf the number of present claimants because of the long latency period associated with mass torts.

Given these different concerns, the possibilities for a deal between the two sides should become evident at this point: both sides have an incentive to trade a settlement of the plaintiffs' attorney's entire inventory (on terms favorable to the attorney) for a global settlement in a class action of all future claims (on terms favorable to the defendants). The advantages to the plaintiffs' attorney of such a trade are several: First, because plaintiffs' attorneys are almost invariably compensated on a contingency basis by their individual clients, the plaintiffs' attorney can expect to receive a substantial fraction (usually around thirty percent but sometimes more) out of the aggregate amount received by the clients from such an inventory settlement. [109] Second, the inventory settlement telescopes into one year payments that might be delayed for many years. Thus, it gains the attorney the time value of money over this period. Third, some cases that go to trial might lose, and other cases might be too weak on the merits to justify a settlement offer or to dare to take to trial (and thereby risk the attorney's credibility with the court). However, such cases can be included within the inventory settlement (which will typically encompass even unfiled cases so long as some medical evidence supporting the condition exists).

In return for the inventory settlement, the plaintiffs' attorney will be expected to serve as class counsel in a class action brought as a "settlement class" against the same defendants. By definition, a settlement class [*1374] "action" cannot go to trial, and thus defendants need not fear litigation in the event that the two sides have a subsequent falling out. The critical step in this trade requires a special definition of the class: it must consist only of future claimants. Otherwise, if the proposed class covered present claimants, it would look suspicious that the attorneys representing the class had just settled similarly situated cases on a superior basis. This incongruity is avoided by defining the class as consisting of those persons having claims against the defendants with respect to the particular product, process, accident or incident at issue who have not filed suit prior to the date the class action is filed. [110] Under this approach, the inventory settlements can be effected shortly before the class action is filed.

REV_00262187

To ensure that the plaintiffs' attorneys do not "welch" on their deal by settling their inventory cases and then refusing to file the "future claims" class action, the defendants may also require the plaintiffs' attorneys to sign an agreement that they will not in the future represent claimants against the defendants with regard to the same mass tort. Such an agreement (which raises serious ethical problems) [111] is, however, probably not essential. Because the plaintiffs' attorneys are disposing of all their existing clients in the inventory settlements, they have no other current clients to represent and thus have every incentive to serve as class counsel in the proposed "future claims" class action because it holds out the promise of an additional fee award (as class counsel). On self-interested economic grounds, plaintiffs' attorneys would decline such a trade of the class counsel position for an agreement not to sue the same defendants in the future only if they believed they could solicit new clients and earn contingency fees from such cases greater than the joint payoff from the class action and the inventory settlement. But in "mature" mass tort cases, the competition for clients may be stiff, thus making such a trade preferable. [112]

If one accepts the premise that an inventory settlement can be used as an inducement to the plaintiffs' attorney to enter into a non-adversarial settlement of a class action that disadvantages the class members, it follows logically that the person most susceptible to such an inducement will be the plaintiffs' attorney with the largest inventory of present claimants. Indeed, the more the plaintiffs' attorney maintains a high volume, low quality inventory of cases, the more the attorney may welcome a non-adversarial resolution of cases. In actual practice, defendants do seem to [*1375] have targeted plaintiffs' attorneys who fit this profile of high volume "wholesalers." [113]

2. Double-Dipping. - Even in the absence of a separate inventory settlement, a plaintiffs' attorney can favor a mass tort class action for self-interested reasons when the clients' interests would be better served by opting out. This is because one perverse and important characteristic of the mass tort class action is that it permits the attorney to receive two fees: one as class counsel and another as the legal representative of individuals filing claims under it. This feature is in sharp contrast to securities and antitrust class actions, where plaintiffs' counsel has very few (if any) individual clients. The initial fee will be the class action fee award, which will be set by the court. It will generally be equal to a percentage of the recovery that is reasonably predictable in advance. [114] To be sure, if the court doubts the value of the settlement, it may reduce the fee award. However, the second fee, which is paid by the individual client, is not generally controlled by the court and may be grossly disproportionate to the services actually rendered by the attorney at this stage. [115] Individual tort victims tend not to be legally sophisticated and may often sign standard contingency fee contracts that award the attorney as much as forty per [*1376] cent of the recovery received by the victim. Once liability has been established by the class action settlement, the individual attorney often has little more to do than to file a claim establishing the client's eligibility. Typically, this filing can be done by a paralegal in a few hours. In this setting, commentators have argued that contingency fees are unjustified because the attorney is no longer exposed to any contingency or risk in the case. [116]

In some recent mass tort class actions in which there was no separate inventory settlement, the attorneys' fees that individual law firms expected to receive from their clients alone approached the size of the largest class action fee awards. [117] The size of such contingency fees seems unconscionable in light of the limited work to be performed once liability has been established. Generally, the mass tort class action will establish an independent "claims resolution facility" which requires only that individuals or their representatives present the necessary medical documentation and evidence of work history to receive compensation. [118]

The mass tort claims resolution facility itself presents still another area where the plaintiffs' attorney may have a sharp conflict of interest. Traditionally, defendants and their counsel have not been involved in the claim allocation process and have been largely indifferent as to how a settlement was distributed so long as they received a release from further liability. [119] For plaintiffs and their attorneys, however, the issues associated with the design of such claims facilities are often fundamental. Should the settlement fund be distributed on a first-come, first-served basis? Or should payments be prorated or otherwise paid in deferred installments to ensure that the fund remains adequate to compensate future claimants? From a self-interested perspective, plaintiffs' attorneys have little reason to hold back settlement funds for future claimants and considerable reason to prefer a first-come, first-served approach. The latter approach affords them early payment both for existing clients and new clients that they are well positioned to solicit because of their role as class counsel. As a result, this desire for an early payout heightens the possibility that the settlement fund will be exhausted before future claimants are compensated.

REV_00262188

3. Eligibility Restrictions and Illusory Benefits. - Even if a self-interested plaintiffs' attorney is willing to enter into a "cheap" settlement, a problem [*1377] remains: the court must approve the proposed settlement. In a mass tort case involving serious physical injuries or illness, this can be a significant hurdle. Few, if any, courts would approve a settlement that accorded desperately ill plaintiffs only nominal consideration. For example, if the sole producer of a carcinogenic product offered only $ 5000 compensation to plaintiffs suffering from a form of cancer likely to have been caused by its product, there would likely be a public outcry (and an appeal) if the court accepted such a settlement that seemingly placed a $ 5000 price tag on human life.

Accordingly, in order to structure a "cheap" settlement in a mass tort case, the parties must do more than simply agree on compensation levels below the amount that parties at arm's length would negotiate. Various tactics to this end are possible. One is to impose rigorous eligibility criteria that would disqualify many or most within the plaintiff class - but in a manner that is not self-evident to the court or to other third parties. For example, severely restrictive eligibility criteria can be imposed [120] (i.e., a ten-year occupational exposure, without an employment break, to asbestos). Or, in a mass tort property damage case, various losses that might have been caused by factors other than the defective product can be broadly and generically excluded from the settlement's coverage. [121] In classes likely to be dominated by future claimants, another approach is to provide for a very low inflation factor. [122] Thus, as illnesses and injuries inevitably arise over a thirty-year (or longer) period, the later claimants will find their claims being released for compensation that is clearly inadequate by then-prevailing standards. Finally, the parties can simply underestimate the number and character of the claims likely to be filed against the settlement fund. Given the multi-decade latency periods of many mass torts, this is easy to do even with the best of intentions, but in the common case where the defendants agree only to make a lump-sum settlement, the result of such underestimation is to reduce radically the benefits that future claimants will receive. Because projections of future claims are both expensive to prepare and susceptible to manipulation, [*1378] plaintiffs' attorneys will be inclined to rely on data prepared by defendants and thus need not engage in anything resembling active collusion. As a result, acquiesence by plaintiffs' attorneys in an underfunded settlement may be the gravest danger that future claimants face.

There are no doubt justifications for some occupational exposure criteria and for some exclusions from coverage, and by definition projections will sometimes miss the mark. The critical point, however, is that these are issues that the parties uniquely understand, but which the court approving the settlement may only dimly perceive. Put more simply, complex damages, eligibility, and causation issues tend to arise more commonly and in more complex variations in mass tort cases than they do in ordinary commercial class action litigation. As a result, when the plaintiffs' attorney is subject to a conflict of interest, the parties may find it easier to blind even a well-motivated court to their proposed settlement's impact because a higher level of expertise is necessary to evaluate the settlement.

REV_00262189

4. Settlement Classes. - Nothing better facilitates collusion than the ability on the part of the defendants to choose the counsel who will represent the plaintiff class. To be sure, even if so chosen, plaintiffs' counsel could behave responsibly. But the dynamics for collusion are set in motion when such a selection process is possible.

Surprisingly, this practice is today not only possible but rapidly becoming common. [123] The new procedure involves negotiations between defendants and plaintiffs' attorneys prior to certification of the class action [124] - and, in some particularly dramatic cases, prior even to the filing of the class action. [125] Obviously, this approach allows the defendants to test out settlement terms (potentially with several teams of plaintiffs' attorneys) before any action is filed. Then, when and if an agreement is reached, the action will be filed as a "settlement class." Originally, the term "settlement class" seems to have meant only that in certifying the class "for settlement purposes," the court would defer any decision as to whether the proposed class actually satisfied Rule 23's certification criteria until after negotiations produced (or failed to produce) a settle [*1379] ment. [126] Under this approach, defendants waived no rights and could still object if the negotiations failed. Some recent decisions and the developing practice seem, however, to conflate the issue of class certification with that of settlement adequacy: if the settlement seems fair, then the court assumes that the class can be certified (on the apparent theory that the predominant common issue for purposes of Rule 23 is the fairness of the settlement). [127]

From the defendants' perspective, any attempt to reach an agreement by means of a settlement class is a "no lose" proposition: if defendants can obtain agreement from plaintiffs' attorneys and the court to a favorable settlement, the technique advances their interests; if they cannot, they are no worse off and can still object to any attempt by plaintiffs to obtain final class certification. More importantly, at least at the pre-filing stage, the plaintiffs' attorneys with whom the defendants are negotiating are always aware that if they do not reach agreement, the defense attorneys can move on and try their luck with a new team of plaintiffs' attorneys. Indeed, this is the critical difference between the evolving "settlement class action" procedure and negotiations between the parties in a conventional class action. In the latter context, if the defendants rebuff plaintiffs' counsel, the plaintiffs' team can litigate to a judgment. In the settlement class action, however, the plaintiffs' attorney has only a commission to settle and not to litigate. Such a plaintiffs' attorney has little more than a right of first refusal on the terms offered by the defendants. As this attorney must be painfully aware, a failure to exercise that option implies only that the option may pass to whomever is next in line. Thus, the bottom line is that the availability of the settlement class action tends to reduce the plaintiffs' attorney's negotiating leverage.

Courts have long been aware of the potential for lawyer-shopping that exists in informal settlement negotiations. [128] The original Manual [*1380] for Complex Litigation strongly discouraged the use of a settlement class action, pointing to the dangers that plaintiffs' counsel would not be able to live up to its fiduciary responsibility in such a conflict-laden context. [129] During the 1980s, however, courts gradually retreated from the Manual's original per se rule. In Weinberger v. Kendrick, [130] Judge Henry Friendly acknowledged the dangers latent in any settlement reached before the class was certified, but reasoned that the court could "scrutinize the fairness of the settlement with even more than usual care." [131]

Recognizing these dangers, some decisions accepted the settlement class only when all class members were treated identically and the prospects for conflicts among them seemed minimal. [132] This is clearly not the case in the mass tort context. Here, substantial variation in the type and severity of injury is the norm, not the exception. In part for this reason, some courts of appeals in the early to mid-1980s reversed certifications of mass tort settlement class actions. [133]

REV_00262190

The major turning point in judicial attitudes toward the settlement class action came in 1989 in the Dalkon Shield mass tort litigation. Rather than viewing a settlement class as presumptively suspicious, the Fourth Circuit instead saw the existence of a tentative settlement as a positive factor: "If not a ground for certification per se, certainly settlement should be a factor, and an important factor, to be considered when determining certification." [134]

In force until this year, the Manual for Complex Litigation (Second) still urged "great caution" in certifying a settlement class action. [135] It explained:

In such situations, the fairness of the settlement may be very difficult to assess. No one may know how many members are in the class, how large their potential claims are, what the strength and [*1381] weakness of the parties' positions are, or how much the class members will benefit under the settlement. Lacking this information, the court should be wary of presenting the settlement to the class. [136]

These words are particularly true in the case of mass torts, where the future claimants' problem dwarfs the problem of evaluating fairness in ordinary class actions. Nonetheless, the new Manual for Complex Litigation (Third) relaxes standards still further by first noting that cost and time savings have lead courts to "permit the use of settlement classes and the negotiation of settlement before class certification," and then expressing the mild caution that "settlements involving settlement classes ... [require] closer judicial scrutiny than approval of settlements where class certification has been litigated." [137] In short, the progression from the first to the third Manual reveals a dilution in the tenor of its warnings about settlement classes, which is concomitant with the growing percentage of the federal civil docket that mass torts represent.

When courts first accepted settlement class actions, the normal pattern was that parties litigated actively for a period of months or longer, sparring over discovery and related motions - until reaching a tentative agreement on a settlement. In contrast, the newer pattern has involved a settlement reached after little or no active litigation (and sometimes before the complaint is filed). [138]

Judicial attitudes toward the settlement class action have divided in one important respect. Some courts have found it necessary only to determine that the settlement is fair and adequate, dispensing with, or relaxing the standard for, the specific findings required by Rule 23. [139] Conversely, the Third Circuit has insisted upon the same findings in a settlement class action as in one certified for trial. [140] This relaxed atti [*1382] tude of some courts toward settlement classes contrasts with their generally harsher attitude toward certification of mass tort class actions when the defendant objects. [141] For plaintiffs, this disparity increases the pressure to settle. For defendants, the current state of the law represents the best of both worlds: uncertainty as to whether a "hostile" class action can be certified, but receptivity toward settlement classes.

5. Restricting Opt Outs: Mandatory Classes and the Limited Fund Theory. - Probably the most aggressive tactic that has been attempted recently in connection with a "friendly" mass tort settlement is the certification of a "mandatory" class action from which class members may not opt out. Normally, a class action seeking money damages must be certified pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(3), [142] and in such a case, class members have an express right to opt out. [143]

REV_00262191

Because "small claimants" have little incentive to opt out and because future claimants have little ability to do so, a "mandatory" class action principally impacts "high stakes" present claimants who would otherwise pursue individual actions. In reality, certification of a Rule 23 (b)(1)(B) mandatory class is a protection for defendants against the "danger" that high stakes individual claimants, dissatisfied with the terms of the settlement class, will opt out. If this were to happen, defendants would lose the benefit of the settlement because they might have to pay twice: once to the claims resolution facility established by the settlement, and again to individual claimants who opt out. [144] Yet, the existence of [*1383] substantial opt outs may be the best evidence that the original settlement was inadequate (and possibly collusive).

Attempts to obtain certification of a mandatory class action under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) usually seek to rely on the justification that, absent pooling and proration among all claimants, the defendant's limited assets soon will be exhausted to the prejudice of future claimants, who will not receive compensation. There are at least two short answers to this justification: First, bankruptcy handles this pooling function much better, and with superior safeguards and procedures, than does the class action. [145] In particular, claimants in bankruptcy are protected by the "absolute priority" rule, which precludes the debtor's shareholders from participating in the reorganized company until all creditors have been paid in full. [146] Second, the prediction that one's assets are insufficient to handle future claims is easily made, particularly by self-interested defendants. When the court accepts this claim, the defendant may be able to escape with a settlement that scales back its tort liability, whereas in bankruptcy, it would be forced to transfer virtually all its equity to its creditors. [147] Until recently, possibly for these reasons in part, attempts to certify a "limited fund" class action have generally been reversed on appeal. [148]

Other techniques for restricting opt outs also have been used recently. If a large number of class members do opt out, defendants may claim that the objectors to the settlement misinformed them about the litigation and request the court to invalidate all existing requests to opt out from the class. If they are successful, a second notice and opt out period will be provided, but the impact may be to exhaust and demoralize the objecting attorneys who labored to canvass their individual clients. In addition, the court can require that a disclosure statement be circulated informing the class members that in the determination of the court they have been misinformed by materially misleading communications earlier provided to them. For example, in Georgine v. Amchem Products, [*1384] Inc., [149] Judge Reed both invalidated some 236,323 individual opt outs and refused to permit plaintiffs' attorneys to execute forms on behalf of their individual clients.

Although plaintiffs' attorneys specializing in individual trial work have self-interested reasons to advise their clients to opt out, the better remedy might be to permit the settling parties to try to lure these opt outs to opt back in. [150] Otherwise, the draconian remedy of en masse invalidation seems capable of confusing clients and exhausting individual plaintiffs' attorneys.

6. Initial Summary. - Part I has made a depressingly simple point: conflicts of interest permeate the mass tort field. These conflicts are not only between attorney and client, but between present claimants and future claimants. Because of the inevitable heterogeneity among class members in personal injury class actions and also because of the uniquely exposed position of future claimants, the conflict problem is probably more intense and aggravated in mass torts than in other areas of class action or high volume litigation. Yet these conflicts largely have been ignored in the recent commentary on mass torts, obscured behind a mist of rhetoric about public law approaches and the need to protect the federal developments in class action practice bear witness to this phenomenon: during the 1990s, evolution has given way to mutation. At least with respect to mass torts, the development of the class action had been slow and halting. Well into the 1980s, federal courts uniformly resisted attempts to certify such mass tort class actions, largely out of concern that the interests of the individual litigant would be submerged within any large-scale proceeding. [2] By the [*1345] end of the 1980s, however, the tide began to turn in favor of class certification, as the advocates of aggregative techniques increasingly gained the upper hand over the defenders of individual litigant autonomy. Already, some have described this transition as a paradigm shift, signaling a fundamental movement away from the traditional bipolar organization of litigation to a new, more collectivized structure. [3]

REV_00262192

While acknowledging this transition, others have expressed normative reservations about it. [4] Their concerns have focused largely on "process values": in particular, whether the shift from an intellectual rationale based on "individual rights" to one focused on "group interests" abandons the "deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court." [5] So framed, the debate may seem to pose the usual [*1346] clash between efficiency and fairness, between those concerned with the high public and private costs of duplicative litigation and those committed to an individual's right to control litigation involving important personal interests. [6]

The problem with this supposed tradeoff is that it distorts the "real world" of mass tort litigation by making unwarranted assumptions. In fact, the dilemma in mass tort reform arises precisely because neither efficiency nor fairness, taken alone, is easily realizable. On the one hand, the efficiency claims made for the mass tort class action are problematic because, as this Article will argue, claim aggregation through class actions systematically tends to disfavor certain identifiable, but underrepresented, classes of tort victims. On the other hand, litigant autonomy in the mass tort context may be an illusory goal. Without discounting the urgency or uniqueness of the ethical issues that arise in mass tort class actions, [7] this Article recognizes that individual plaintiffs have weak to nonexistent control over their attorneys across the mass tort context for reasons that are inherent to the economics of mass tort litigation. Accordingly, proposals for the return to a traditional system of individual case litigation are apt to be as quixotic as they are costly.

All that is certain about mass tort litigation is that it places a heavy burden on the federal courts, while producing often modest and delayed benefits to plaintiffs. As a result, "a consensus has now emerged calling for substantial modifications in traditional court processes to improve the efficiency and equity of the mass claims resolution process." [8] This consensus, however, unites strange bedfellows. For some academics, the seductive appeal of a "public law" vision of litigation, stressing communitarian values and alternative modes of dispute resolution, has led them to reject the traditional bipolar model of litigation in favor of a more bureaucratic, problem-solving model in which courts negotiate and impose a solution. [9] For "law and economics"-oriented academics, aggregation [*1347] makes sense because of the high costs of individual civil litigation. [10] Proceduralists and judges in turn often favor consolidation and class resolution of mass torts over the "old" individual case system because of the growing burden on the federal judiciary. [11] The one common denominator in this new genre is that the vast majority of commentators agree that there is a crisis, one characterized by high costs and unjustified fees, threatening recurrent corporate bankruptcies, and requiring some form of radical remedy or another. [12]

Unfortunately, this consensus frames the mass tort dilemma, rather than resolves it. Easy as it is to point out that mass tort litigation involves high transaction costs, one must move on to the inevitable next question: "compared to what?" Here, the costs (both private and public) of alternative approaches must be evaluated in terms of their likely actual operation, not their utopian potential. To date, few have done so. In the race to a new system of group litigation in which lawyers represent "interests," rather than individuals, few in particular have looked for the perverse incentives that almost inevitably arise at such junctures when docket from inundation.

REV_00262175

Even if courts wanted to monitor these conflicts closely, it is doubtful that they currently have the tools to do so. Attempts to estimate the impact of inflation a half-century away or to project the number of future claims likely to arise are little more than a stab in the dark. Yet, as will be seen next, there is very little evidence that courts want to engage in such monitoring.

II. Case Studies in Mass Tort Class Actions

Context counts. Critics invariably overgeneralize by treating all mass tort cases alike. Not only does the behavior of the parties differ from context to context, but judicial behavior in particular seems to change, depending in large measure on the degree of pressure that a generic type of litigation places on the court. This section will focus on three distinct subcontexts: (1) asbestos litigation; (2) silicone gel breast implants; (3) mass disaster litigation; and (4) mass tort property damage litigation.

A. Asbestos Litigation

1. Background. - Although, like a massive, unending river, asbestos litigation has flowed through the courts, it at least had a definable start [*1385] ing point: the Fifth Circuit's holding in 1973 that asbestos manufacturers could be held strictly liable for injuries resulting from asbestos exposure. [151] By 1992, less than twenty years later, an estimated 200,000 personal injury claims, each typically naming multiple defendants, had been filed or were pending nationwide. [152] Yet, even this number may represent only the tip of the proverbial iceberg. By some estimates, upwards of twenty-one million Americans have been exposed to asbestos in a manner that risks serious health problems, [153] and estimates as high as an additional 250,000 to 500,000 deaths from asbestos exposure have been responsibly made. [154] Nor has the pace of case filings begun to slacken. By 1990, the rate of case filings was increasing at an exponential pace. [155]

Because asbestos cases tended to be geographically concentrated (basically in eastern and Gulf coastal areas where shipyards, which once used asbestos abundantly, were located), federal courts there first began to experiment with aggregative processing techniques in asbestos litigation. The most innovative and successful experiment was that employed by Judge Robert Parker of the Eastern District of Texas. Faced with over 2000 aggregated claims, Judge Parker selected 160 representative cases and tried them in three phased stages before three juries. [156] In Phase I, the first jury ruled basically on the question of liability; in Phase II, two new juries were presented evidence on plaintiffs' exposure to defendants' products. Finally, in Phase III, the same two juries considered contributory negligence issues [157] and then, sitting separately, awarded damages for two different groups of claimants. The actual individual plaintiffs received the verdict that the jury awarded them, but the awards in these representative cases were then averaged and the other claimants, whose cases were not tried, received the average amount for their subgroup. The result conserved both judicial time and the notoriously expensive [*1386] transaction costs of asbestos litigation. [158] All this was accomplished through consolidation of cases and without the use of the class action format.

REV_00262193

Subsequently, Judge Parker's consolidation and sampling approach was replicated on an even larger scale in a Baltimore trial that covered some 8500 cases. [159] Although commentators applauded this consolidation approach for its ability to distinguish among categories of injury (and thus avoid the gross distortions when inventories of cases are settled based on often arbitrary allocation formulas), [160] neither defendants nor mass tort practitioners have shown any enthusiasm for this approach. [161] Trial lawyers prefer to pursue punitive damages in individual actions, and the defendants (who appealed Judge Parker's decision to use sampling techniques) appear to prefer the delay and negotiating leverage that a congested docket affords them. [162]

2. The Bankruptcy Alternative. - Beginning in the early 1980s, a number of asbestos producers, including Johns-Manville Corporation, the industry's largest firm, sought the protection of bankruptcy to obtain relief from cascading asbestos claims. [163] According to the Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist, eleven out of the twenty-five major asbestos manufacturers had sought bankruptcy protection by 1991. [164] At the time, these bankruptcies were controversial within the bankruptcy bar because of their "novel premise that the corporation was entitled to bankruptcy protection not because it was insolvent, but because continuing trends in asbestos litigation made a bankruptcy reorganization the best way to manage the payment of present and future claims." [165] That asbestos producers sought bankruptcy reorganization should not have been surprising. Facing a future of seem [*1387] ingly endless, repetitive, and expensive individual cases, these defendants understandably wanted a quick fix that would resolve all asbestos liabilities in one proceeding. The hope was that a transfer of assets could be made to a mass tort bankruptcy trust, which could then use low-cost arbitration procedures to resolve eligibility and damage issues among the claimants. In addition, asbestos defendants undoubtedly hoped that under this arrangement their shareholders could retain a significant share of their equity, because that had become the standard outcome in other bankruptcy reorganizations. [166]

That bankruptcy reorganization would prove more advantageous to defendants than litigation quickly proved an unfounded hope. Johns-Manville Corporation transferred eighty percent of its ownership to its bankruptcy trust. [167] Yet, even this contribution proved inadequate. Funded with nearly $ 5 billion in assets, the Manville Personal Injury Settlement Trust opened in 1988. Two years later, it was effectively insolvent. [168] Although it had been estimated that some 83,000 to 100,000 claims would be filed during the life of the Trust (extending well into the twenty-first century), 240,000 claims were in fact filed by the end of 1994, and several hundred thousand more claims were expected to be filed. [169]

From a public policy perspective, the principal lesson from the Manville reorganization is that, unless restricted, present claimants will deplete virtually any settlement fund in short order, leaving future claimants empty-handed. Yet, ironically, future claimants receive both more substantive protection (i.e., the absolute priority rule) and considerably more procedural protection in bankruptcy than they enjoy today in class action settlements. [170] Thus, although the bankruptcy experience under [*1388] lines the vulnerability of future claimants, it also suggests that a bankruptcy proceeding may be a superior alternative to a class action.

For defendants, the practical lesson from the Johns-Manville experience with mass tort bankruptcy is that it is neither cheap nor final. When the Manville Trust became insolvent, Judge Jack Weinstein engineered a class action to restructure and increase the payments to the Manville Trust from the newly organized Manville Corporation. [171] Absent finality, the attractions of mass tort bankruptcy thus looked minimal to the corporate planner, and so the search turned to other alternatives.

REV_00262194

3. The Return of the Asbestos Class Action. - During the mid-1980s, the asbestos industry pinned its hopes primarily on alternative modes of dispute resolution. The Asbestos Claims Facility, an industry-wide consortium, and its descendant, the Center for Claims Resolution (CCR), [172] sought during this period to encourage expeditious resolutions of claims in order to avoid the expense of litigation. Its premise was that because over sixty percent of asbestos-related expenses went to attorneys' fees and costs, early settlement could economize on this component. [173] Yet, the more claims they settled, the more plaintiffs' attorneys invested in search activities to discover new claimants. From the defendants' perspective, informal resolution also brought about a deterioration in the quality of claims, as individuals without visible symptoms or incapacity, but with a telltale pleural thickening on their pulmonary walls, increasingly predominated within the claimant population. [174] Attempts by defendants to establish "pleural registries," which deferred payment to unimpaired asbestos claimants while preserving their tort claims if their [*1389] injuries worsened, proved unsuccessful. [175] Not surprisingly, few asbestos victims preferred deferral to an immediate cash payment (with the right in most jurisdictions to bring a later suit if their condition deteriorated).

Meanwhile, pressure for change was building within the judiciary. In 1990, an informal network of ten federal district judges attempted to establish an "ad hoc nationwide coordinating committee" to resolve the asbestos case load crisis through case consolidation and management. [176] Although the Sixth Circuit refused to accept this unauthorized innovation, [177] the judges' joint action led to further developments. In March 1991, the Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation, appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist in 1990, released its report, which concluded that "this litigation impasse cannot be broken except by aggregate or class proceedings." [178] It recommended that Congress create "a national system for resolving asbestos claims which at the very least permits consolidating all asbestos claims in a single forum." [179]

Based on this hint that nationwide consolidation was now appropriate, eight federal district judges with heavy asbestos caseloads petitioned the JPML in 1991 to consolidate all asbestos personal injury cases in the federal system in a single forum. [180] Despite having refused a similar request on five previous occasions, [181] the JPML decided now to go with the flow, curiously emphasizing the risk of further bankruptcies if it did not do so. [182]

By an order dated July 29, 1991, the JPML transferred all pending personal injury asbestos cases to Judge Charles R. Weiner of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. [183] Two days later, on August 1, 1991, Judge [*1390] Robert Parker, Chair of the Judicial Conference's subcommittee with responsibility for asbestos litigation and a former member of the Ad Hoc Committee appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist, [184] wrote to Judge Weiner and, in the course of a generally hortatory letter, outlined the task before him:

We now have an opportunity to prove that the federal courts are not impotent. It is incumbent upon us to establish that we are viable as an institution and that we can provide modern solutions for modern problems. If we fail to rise to the task, I fear far reaching consequences.

I deeply believe we are not irrelevant - that we do have a role in our society that is greater than refereeing one-on-one litigation in an expensive and cumbersome manner ....

REV_00262195

I view your role as one of the commanding generals. You are the Eisenhower of this D-Day operation. The rest of us are colonels prepared to take orders in this joint effort.... The magnitude of this assignment is unprecedented in federal court history.

I would encourage you to at all times maintain a focus on the problem as a whole and not let the lawyers mire you into individual or small group considerations. If you let them, they can dominate your time to the point of rendering the transferee judge ineffective as far as the overall solution is concerned. Case management as applied to individual cases or consolidated groups simply will not work on this problem.

I would encourage you to be reluctant to grant exemptions to transfer. The fact that some judge may have X number of cases scheduled to go to trial two months or six months from now and on that basis (contrary to the MDL Order) gains an exemption from this process, in my judgment, is counterproductive. I think we have to continually focus on the larger problem. This focus will produce dynamics that should work toward the larger solution. [185]

[*1391] Clearly, this letter contemplated that Judge Weiner would stay all pending asbestos litigation, granting very few "special hardship" transfers back to the court from which individual cases were transferred. In blunt terms, Judge Parker advised that pressure must be kept on one side (the plaintiffs' attorneys) to induce a global settlement. So admonished, Judge Weiner did indeed slow the pace of asbestos litigation in the federal courts - to the point that fewer than one dozen asbestos cases in federal court appear to have been tried to a verdict or fully settled between the July 29, 1991 transfer date and July 1992. [186]

More importantly, the Parker/Weiner correspondence indicates that asbestos litigation had transcended the usual bilateral context of private litigation and had become a public policy concern in which the judiciary was determined to play a proactive role. The consolidation of asbestos litigation was then the culmination of a coordinated campaign by federal district judges to pressure plaintiffs (and their attorneys) to enter into global settlement discussions with defendants. In short order, nationwide defendants' and plaintiffs' asbestos steering committees were formed, and, throughout the remainder of 1991, exploratory talks continued between the two sides.

Contemporaneously with these developments, defendants' behavior toward pending asbestos cases changed sharply. Because without Judge Weiner's consent plaintiffs could no longer proceed to trial in federal court, defendants (and particularly the largest industry consortium - the CCR) began to stonewall, resisting any individual settlements. Despite repeated requests from plaintiffs' attorneys to allow a transfer of their cases back to their original jurisdictions, Judge Weiner remained adamant. Gradually, his message became clear: no individual settlements would occur outside a global resolution of all asbestos claims. Because many asbestos victims were desperately ill and dying, this tactic greatly increased the pressure on the plaintiffs' steering committee. Nonetheless, in November 1991, the plaintiffs' steering committee rejected the defendants' steering committee's offer of a global settlement. In truth, this rejection should not have been surprising. With respect to asbestos litigation, the plaintiffs' bar has always been split between "litigators" and "settlers" - those attorneys with a "high quality" clientele having serious injuries and those with a massive, but diverse, inventory of cases. Divisions on the plaintiffs' steering committee appear to have mirrored those within the plaintiffs' bar.

What happened next, however, was surprising. Recognizing that the plaintiffs' steering committee had been split over whether to accept their proposals, the CCR decided to approach the two co-Chairmen of the [*1392] plaintiffs' steering committee, Gene Locks and Ron Motley, [187] and attempt to negotiate a separate settlement with their firms covering all future personal injury claimants in the United States who had been exposed to asbestos. Although it is speculative to guess why the CCR targeted these two law firms, both controlled large inventories of asbestos cases and would benefit greatly from an inventory settlement of them. [188] In any event, the CCR, which had previously indicated its unwillingness to settle inventories with plaintiffs' firms in light of Judge Weiner's stay order, entered into negotiations with these two law firms to settle their entire inventory of asbestos cases. Ultimately, these inventory negotiations resulted in the CCR defendants agreeing to settle claims held by the 14,000 clients of these two firms for a total of just over $ 215 million. [189] Because the court never permitted discovery of either attorney, the contingent fees that both firms stood to receive is not known, but on the standard assumption of a one-third contingency fee, the participating law firms would have received over $ 71 million. Nor would this be their only benefit from the litigation. The CCR also agreed to pay any attorneys' fees that the court decided to award to class counsel. [190] In return, Messrs. Locks and Motley agreed that even if the class action settlement fell through, they would not file new claims against the CCR defendants that did not meet the highly restrictive medical criteria for compensation included in the proposed class action settlement. [191]

REV_00262196

[*1393] 4. The Georgine Class Action. [192] - The next step was even more extraordinary: On January 15, 1993, the two sides simultaneously filed the complaint, the answer, a joint motion for class certification, and the 106-page Stipulation of Settlement in Georgine v. Amchem Products, Inc. in federal district court in Philadelphia. Uniquely, the case was over before it had begun - a comprehensive settlement without discovery, motions, or preliminary litigation of any kind. As might be expected under such circumstances, the parties jointly moved the court "for conditional certification of a class action for the purposes of settlement." [193]

The parties' speed was matched by that of the court. On February 1, 1993, two weeks after the complaint's filing, Judge Weiner conditionally certified the proposed class - without bothering to hold a hearing, hear evidence, or require notice to class members. [194] At the same time, Judge Weiner did, however, appoint another judge, District Judge Lowell A. Reed Jr., to conduct hearings on the fairness of the proposed settlement. [195]

After extensive hearings and much discovery (but not of the two lead counsel), Judge Reed issued an order in August 1994 that both certified the class action under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(3) and approved the proposed settlement as fair and adequate. [196] In addition, the court enjoined all class members from "initiating or maintaining any asbestos-related personal injury or death claim(s) or lawsuit(s) against any CCR defendant" in any court, state or federal, except as expressly permitted by the Stipulation of Settlement. [197]

The substantive terms of the Georgine settlement are as surprising as the process by which it was reached. The settlement was carefully framed to catch only future claimants, but to catch all of them. Specifically, the class was defined to include all persons ... who have been exposed in the United States or its territories ..., either occupationally or through occupational exposure of a spouse or household member, to asbestos ... for which one or more of the defendants may bear legal liability and who ... have not, as of January 15, 1993, filed a lawsuit for [*1394] asbestos-related personal injury or damage ... against the defendant(s)." [198]

This definition obligingly allowed the asbestos plaintiffs' bar to continue to litigate or to settle their existing cases and thereby predictably minimized opposition to the settlement among them. By and large, this strategy worked, as the plaintiffs' bar protested, but only a few plaintiffs' firms undertook the substantial costs of objecting to the settlement. Faced with the federal court's stay order and sensing the strong desire of the court to approve the settlement, most saw little alternative (even if the settlement were rejected) and so grudgingly settled their inventory of cases with the CCR defendants.

Nonetheless, grounds for objections to the settlement are glaringly obvious. First, the substantive terms of the class action settlement clash sharply with the contemporaneous inventory settlements reached by the same plaintiffs' attorneys. Under the inventory settlements, all claimants received compensation (even in the case of lesser injuries), but under the class action only the most seriously injured of asbestos victims will receive compensation - and only then under constraints that could delay actual receipt indefinitely. Essentially, the class action settlement created an insurance system covering all future claims, but provided compensation only for those claims that matured into incapacitating illnesses. Moreover, the settlement processed all future claims through a claim review process managed directly by the CCR defendants, in which the claimants would have to prove both a specific medical condition that was compensable under the settlement and occupational exposure to the asbestos products of a member of the CCR, based on criteria far stricter than that required by tort law. For example, in the case of lung cancer, occupational exposure to asbestos of between eight and fifteen years (depending on the victim's job classification) would be required and such exposure must have occurred "at least twelve ... years prior to manifestation of the lung cancer." [199] Clearly, either lesser periods of exposure or a more recent commencement of exposure would ordinarily suffice in the normal tort system if the claimant were suffering from any of the various cancers or pleural illnesses normally associated with asbestos. In fact, objectors to the settlement presented medical testimony that approximately half the claims that are filed in the tort system, and paid by the CCR in the tort system, would not qualify for payment under the exposure and medical criteria set forth in the Stipulation of Settlement. [200] Dr. Christine Oliver of the Harvard Medical School also testified that up to [*1395] fifty percent of the victims that she diagnoses with asbestos-related lung cancer would not satisfy the settlement's medical criteria. [201]

As with other mass tort settlements, Georgine worked off a grid system, which specified a limited range of damages that the CCR would award for the various asbestos diseases recognized by the Stipulation of Settlement: [202]

[See table in original]

The key figure here is the floor on the average range; although actual awards could go higher or lower, CCR was not obligated to pay more than this lower figure on average to victims who satisfied the medical and exposure criteria (i.e., $ 5800 to a person with confirmed asbestosis that reduced his lung capacity by, hypothetically, seventy percent). [203]

The limited compensation payable under Georgine comes into clearer focus when its settlement grid is contrasted with the Johns-Manville settlement approved by United States District Court Judge Jack Weinstein: [204] [*1396]

[See table in original]

In sharp contrast to Georgine (which justifies the lack of compensation to victims without cancer or disabling asbestosis on the ground that they have sustained only minor injuries), the Johns-Manville settlement recognizes the reality of asbestosis disease and permits a maximum recovery for it of $ 300,000, which amount exceeds the highest recovery possible for a malignant cancer (i.e., $ 200,000) under Georgine. Comparing the two tables, one sees that, in the ordinary case, a disabled victim of asbestosis will receive $ 50,000 under the

REV_00262198

Johns-Manville settlement but only between $ 5800 and $ 7500 under Georgine.

Of course, any contrast between the Georgine and Johns-Manville settlement values must acknowledge that Johns-Manville was a much larger defendant than any of the CCR members and probably represented a greater share of the asbestos industry than they did in the aggregate. Unlike the twenty CCR defendants, however, Johns-Manville was bankrupt and needed to repay financial and trade creditors as well as tort victims. In this light, the contrast between a mass tort class action (Georgine) and mass tort bankruptcy (Johns-Manville) provides a roadmap for the solvent corporation that suggests that the class action route will enable it to escape much of its tort liability without risking the loss of corporate control that is often incident to a bankruptcy reorganization.

The Georgine settlement also imposed strict limitations on the number of qualifying claims that may be paid in any year. [205] Known as "case flow maximums," these limitations were specified for individual disease categories. Thus, in year one, the CCR defendants were required to pay no more than 700 lung cancer cases, 700 mesothelioma cases, and 200 "other cancer" cases. [206] If more qualifying claims are filed, a queue results, and claimants may be required to wait for years (and possibly [*1397] never be paid). For example, between 1989 and 1993, CCR appears to have in fact paid about 25,000 claims a year. [207] If this rate were to continue, a substantial backlog of cases would soon result. Faced with indefinite delays, some victims might soon be forced to accept private settlements well below even the judicially approved levels.

To sum up, the Georgine settlement first screens out most persons who would normally receive compensation in the tort system (and who did in fact receive compensation under the inventory settlements paid by the same defendants), and then, for those who do qualify for compensation, it imposes "case flow maximums" under which plaintiff victims could face a long and uncertain wait; finally, the compensation offered falls well below the typical recoveries in the tort system. The contrast between the recoveries afforded present claimants in the tort system and those offered future claimants under the Georgine settlement is dramatically illustrated by evidence that the objectors to the settlement presented at the fairness hearing. [208] Starting with the admitted fact that the Ness, Motley firm (one of the two firms serving as lead counsel in the class action) settled its client cases for $ 138,077,100, [209] the objectors computed that if the clients in these inventory settlements had recovered the maximum average payment that a similarly situated class member would receive under the Georgine class action, they would have received only $ 89,660,000. So viewed, the difference of $ 48,417,100 represents a fifty-four percent premium that the individual clients in the inventory settlements received over the maximum average payment under the class action. [210]

This disparity between the inventory settlements and the class action settlements pales, however, in comparison to the disparity between claim [*1398] ants with malignant conditions and those without. Ultimately, class counsel in Georgine simply waived compensation for most class members with non-malignant conditions in return for cash payments to those class members with serious malignant conditions. The rationale for this extraordinary act of waiving the rights of some clients to benefit other clients was that "exposed" class members could not predict their future injuries and would prefer to waive compensation for "minor" injuries and reserve it for major life-threatening illnesses. But is this true? Would an individual with a normally compensable injury waive compensation in order to receive greater compensation in the possible (but unlikely) event that the condition would worsen into a very serious or fatal injury? Economically, the assumption that individuals would voluntarily make such a choice is the equivalent of predicting that individuals would insure only for catastrophic illness and would waive any compensatory recovery for lesser injuries in favor of an exclusive focus on death and disability. As an empirical matter, this seems a very shaky prediction. [211]

REV_00262199

Normatively, it is even more suspect. Although a legislature or some politically accountable body might decide to provide compensation to only the worst off on paternalistic grounds, a private attorney, acting as class counsel, seemingly has no entitlement to abandon the interests of one group of clients to benefit another. Indeed, the very fact that such trade-offs could be reached highlights the need for subclasses and separate representation of different categories of claimants. Determined not to impede a global resolution, however, the district court rationalized each of these conflicts: subclasses were not needed, the non-malignant future claimants were dealt with fairly because they might receive cash compensation if their injuries worsened, and the differential between the amounts paid in inventory settlements and the class members was irrelevant. [212]

[*1399] Finally, in terms of its discrimination against future claimants, the most revealing deficiency in the Georgine settlement was its failure to contain any adjustment for inflation. Under the settlement, the amounts to be received by future claimants are fixed for the first ten years, regardless of increases in the cost of living. Thereafter, payment ranges may be increased in the eleventh year, up to twenty percent, but only if the parties negotiate new values (or if binding arbitration establishes new values in the event that the parties cannot agree). Historically, however, consumer prices have increased at a much faster rate. [213] Even the Georgine court conceded that the CCR defendants had failed to produce evidence that rebutted the objectors on this point. [214]

In overview, Georgine's failure to deal responsibly with the issue of inflation reminds us that the interests of future claimants are not homogenous. Some will become ill early; others only after a long latency period. If adjustments are not made for inflation, future claimants will be treated very differently under a settlement that purports to make equal payments to each. In addition, the late-maturing claimant also bears the considerable risk that the number of claims made will exceed that projected, with the result that the case flow maximums in the Georgine settlement will have been exceeded in the interim.

5. Ahearn v. Fibreboard. - Georgine might be dismissed as an aberration - if it were not swiftly followed by other class actions that replicated its techniques. Ahearn v. Fibreboard Corp., [215] filed months after Georgine but negotiated contemporaneously with it, was also designed as a future claims class action with the class again being defined to exclude all persons with pending claims against Fibreboard.

Ahearn is both similar to and different from Georgine in important ways that require a closer analysis. Long a wholly-owned subsidiary of the [*1400] Louisiana Pacific Corporation, Fibreboard was spun off by its parent as an independent publicly owned company in 1988 at a point when its potential insolvency as the result of asbestos liabilities was already a clear and present danger. [216] By that time, over 50,000 asbestos-related actions had been filed against Fibreboard and the number has since soared to approximately 200,000. [217] Following the transfer by the JPML of all asbestos-related personal injury litigation to Judge Weiner in 1991, [218] Fibreboard, like the CCR defendants, unsuccessfully sought to negotiate a global settlement of all its asbestos-related cases with the nationwide plaintiffs' steering committee. [219]

For Fibreboard, a global settlement was particularly urgent, because already it had unpaid obligations in excess of $ 1 billion for asbestos cases that it had settled earlier, and it was experiencing difficulty in convincing its insurers to pay these claims. Faced with asbestos liabilities well in excess of its net worth, Fibreboard began a complex three-party negotiation with its insurers and several selected plaintiffs' attorneys. With the collapse in the spring of 1992 of efforts by all asbestos defendants to reach a global settlement with the plaintiffs' steering committee, Fibreboard began negotiations with the Ness, Motley firm to reach a settlement covering simply itself. By December 1992, Fibreboard and Ness, Motley reached an inventory settlement covering "approximately 20,000 existing asbestos personal injury claims." [220] Pursuant to this agreement, Ness, Motley agreed to recommend the settlement provisions to future claimants that it represented. [221] Eventually, by August 6, 1993, this settlement agreement was extended to cover some 45,000 pending asbestos-related personal injury claims against Fibreboard. [222]

REV_00262200

On August 9, 1993, at the same time that this massive inventory settlement was reached, United States District Judge Robert Parker, the same judge who earlier had recommended to Judge Weiner that he force a global settlement on plaintiffs in Georgine, [223] appointed the Ness, Motley firm along with two other attorneys "to act as negotiating counsel [*1401] on behalf of ... a class of future claimants." [224] Less than three weeks later, on August 27, 1993, Fibreboard and these newly-appointed class counsel informed the court that they had reached an agreement in principle covering all future claims. The actual class action was filed on September 9, 1993, and on that same date, Judge Parker certified, for settlement purposes only, a future class of persons with asbestos-related personal injuries who had not asserted such claims against Fibreboard prior to August 27, 1993 (the date the agreement in principle was reached). [225]

In short, as in Georgine, the same plaintiffs' law firm simultaneously represented both present claimants in an inventory settlement and future claimants in a class action. The official class action notice estimated that the total number of present claimants represented by Ness, Motley in the inventory settlement "may exceed 50,000," in which case, it said, the aggregate amount of the present claims represented by Ness, Motley would approximate $ 500 million. [226] This notice also estimated that plaintiffs' counsel would receive on average contingent fees equal to "approximately one-third of the payout to such present claimants," thus implying that plaintiffs' counsel stood to receive approximately $ 167 million under these settlements. [227] More importantly, most of these inventory settlements were effectively made contingent upon the approval of the class action settlement. [228] As a result, class counsel had a strong interest in approval of the class action settlement, even if it was not in the best interests of the future claimants.

In fairness, the Ahearn settlement received close judicial supervision and did not involve the same glaring disparities as in Georgine between the terms received by the present claimants and those applicable to future claimants. [229] Nevertheless, the substantive terms of the Ahearn settle [*1402] ment were extraordinary for the limited cash contribution they required of Fibreboard. Under the settlement, Fibreboard's two principal insurers will deposit $ 1.525 billion into a trust fund for future claimants, to which Fibreboard will add a mere $ 10 million. This token contribution might be understandable if Fibreboard were otherwise insolvent, but, apart from its asbestos liabilities, Fibreboard appears to be a thriving company. The guardian ad litem appointed by the court to protect the future claimants concluded that Fibreboard's value (once its asbestos liabilities were stripped away) might be as high as $ 250 to $ 300 million, and other expert testimony placed it in the range of $ 230 to $ 240 million. [230] If we assume Fibreboard has a net worth of $ 250 million, then its $ 10 million contribution represents only four percent of this net worth.

Probably the most dramatic evidence of the impact of this settlement on Fibreboard was the reaction of its stock price to its announcement. During 1992, Fibreboard's common stock fluctuated from a low of 2 1/8 per share to a high of 9 3/8. [231] This depressed value no doubt reflected the overhang of asbestos liabilities. But as the possibility of a settlement increased, Fibreboard's stock price climbed, and, during the month the settlement was announced, it soared, running up from 11 7/8 to a high of 22 7/8. [232] By the end of the year, Fibreboard's stock price reached a high of 35 5/8 - nearly three hundred percent above its highest closing price in the month before the settlement. [233]

Such a dramatic stock price movement suggests that there has been a wealth transfer: Fibreboard's shareholders have gained, and its tort creditors (and insurers) have lost. More importantly, this stock price reaction contrasts sharply with what would have happened in a mass tort bankruptcy, where tort claimants sometimes receive eighty to ninety percent of the stock of the reorganized entity. [234] Instead, Fibreboard and its [*1403] shareholders escaped with only a $ 10 million contribution to the class action settlement.

REV_00262201

The even more controversial aspect of Ahearn was, however, Judge Parker's decision to certify the class as a mandatory class under Rule 23(b)(1)(B). [235] Finding that defendant's insurance proceeds (which were obtained in a much-contested parallel settlement with Fibreboard's insurers) constituted a "limited fund," which would be exhausted before all individual claimants could be satisfied, the court certified the action as a mandatory class, which has the practical effect of denying class members the right to opt out. [236] Although it remains an unresolved question whether the right to opt out from a class action that primarily seeks a money judgment can be effectively extinguished in this fashion, [237] the curious and unique feature of Ahearn is that the company itself remained highly solvent and yet contributed only a trivial proportion of its own assets to the settlement fund. [238]

Effectively, Ahearn reveals the settlement technique in Georgine pushed one critical step further so that a not-yet bankrupt corporation can limit its liabilities to its insurance policies (at least with the help of cooperative plaintiffs' attorneys). Although pooling a defendant's assets when they are inadequate to satisfy all its creditors makes sense, Ahearn permits the defendant to limit tort creditors to an asset pool to which it makes virtually no contribution. In turn, a consequence of deeming the corporation's insurance policies to create a "limited fund" is that it creates a perverse incentive to underinsure. That is, under Ahearn's rule, a defendant may choose to purchase less liability insurance than it otherwise would, because there is an advantage to inadequate insurance reserves: namely that they can constitute a "limited fund" and justify a mandatory, non-opt out class action. In allowing Fibreboard to escape [*1404] with only a $ 10 million contribution to the class action settlement, the Ahearn court effectively placed Fibreboard's shareholders ahead of its tort creditors - a result altogether different than the result in mass tort bankruptcies (such as Johns-Manville) where the tort creditors received the vast majority of the corporation's equity value. [239]

In fairness, the non-opt out provision in the Ahearn settlement probably was demanded by Fibreboard's insurers, who seemed to have been unwilling to settle absent some mechanism for achieving global peace. Understandably, their fear was that they could be held liable twice (i.e., once to class members and then again to opt outs). But the insurers' fears hardly justified granting Fibreboard equivalent immunity from future claimants, particularly when the Ahearn settlement fund may well be inadequate to cover all future claimants. [240] Paradoxically, while the Ahearn settlement grants certainty and repose to the shareholders of the corporate defendant, it imposes risk and uncertainty on its tort creditors, who are exposed to cutbacks and potentially lengthy queues depending upon the number of future claims. In this light, in marked contrast to mass tort bankruptcies, the mass tort class action can be used to reverse the historic legal relationship between debt and equity - perversely shifting risk from diversified and logically risk neutral shareholders to non-diversified and normally risk averse tort creditors.

B. Silicone Gel Breast Implants Litigation

The Silicone Gel breast implants litigation [241] stands in sharp contrast to asbestos mass tort litigation in several respects. Unlike asbestos (the oldest and most "mature" of mass torts), breast implant litigation was a new form of tort litigation, in which outcomes and settlement values were not yet easily predicted. From a procedural perspective, the settlement process in the Silicone Gel litigation provides a commendable example of a mass tort litigation that client control over attorneys is weakened. No opening generalization about the modern class action is sounder than the assertion that it has long been a context in which opportunistic behavior has been common and high agency costs have prevailed. [13] If not actually collusive, non-adversarial [*1348] settlements have all too frequently advanced only the interests of plaintiffs' attorneys, not those of the class members. A second generalization may be more controversial but also rests on an empirical foundation: courts have little ability or incentive to resist the settlements that the parties in class action litigation reach. [14] Thus, if the court's most powerful sword (namely, its authority to reject the settlement in a class action) will typically remain in its scabbard, the quest for accountability must look to other weapons and remedies.

REV_00262202

Still, the possibility of opportunistic behavior and collusive settlements is not, standing alone, a sufficient basis for rejecting mass tort class actions. In truth, individual tort litigation is notoriously expensive [15] and [*1349] arguably threatens to inundate the federal docket. [16] Mass tort class actions could then be a more effective system, at least viewed in terms of their ability to deliver compensation to victims, even if they are characterized by much self-interested attorney behavior and a resulting high rate of suspicious settlements.

Against this backdrop, this Article does not propose to eliminate mass tort class actions, but rather to restructure them by placing prudential limits on the problems that courts can competently handle. A balance must be struck between pragmatism and idealism, and, to do so, this Article will offer what it terms a "constrained autonomy" model for reconciling group litigation with individual rights. It does so because, whatever the plight of mass tort victims, there is today more reason to believe that group litigation and a public law approach aggravates, rather than alleviates, their problems. [17] The mass tort class action occupies a polar position at the extreme end of the continuum in terms of its relative vulnerability to abuse and exploitation. Although agency costs are inevitably high in all class actions, the mass tort class action is uniquely vulnerable to the danger of collusion and thus needs special safeguards. Increasingly, defense counsel have come to understand that the mass tort class action can be utilized to obtain cheap settlements that pay little attention to the interests of certain structurally underrepresented classes of claimants.

Other scholars have begun to note this dark underside to the mass tort class action, [18] but none has yet placed it in its fuller context. Originally, the class action was viewed by both sides as the plaintiffs' weapon, a technique for extorting settlements even in non-meritorious cases. [19] Throughout the 1980s, corporate defendants vigorously resisted the use of the mass tort class action, preferring even the alternative of a bank [*1350] ruptcy reorganization. [20] But with the 1990s, their perception of the class action has changed dramatically. Defendants have not only adopted the class action as their preferred means of resolving their mass tort liabilities, but have also actually begun to solicit plaintiffs' attorneys to bring such class actions (as a condition of settling other pending litigation between them). [21] Behind this transition lies defendants' discovery of a variety of procedures for minimizing their tort liabilities. Collectively, these amount to a new legal technology, the impact of which uniquely disadvantages future claimants. Most importantly, these techniques can be implemented only through the use of a mass tort class action.

In overview, this transformation is of historic significance: once a sword for plaintiffs, the modern class action is in some contexts increasingly becoming a shield for defendants. [22] Rather than serving as a vehicle by which small claimants can aggregate their claims in order to make litigation economically feasible (and thereby also gain negotiating leverage vis-a-vis defendants), the mass tort class action now often provides a means by which unsuspecting future claimants suffer the extinction of their claims even before they learn of their injury.

Why is this happening? The one safe generalization about mass tort class actions is that the traditional safeguards used by courts to guard against collusive settlements have little value or relevance here. Three basic factors explain the unique vulnerability of the mass tort class was structured reasonably and supervised intensively by the federal court. Settled at approximately $ 4.23 billion, the settlement hardly seems collusive; indeed, it is the "man bites dog" story that [*1405] shows that mass tort class actions need not necessarily result in non-adversarial, low cost settlements. [242] Yet ultimately, the Silicone Gel experience teaches pessimism, not optimism, because it provides an object lesson in the fragility of mass tort settlements - at least when present claimants are able to opt out. Finally, from a judicial management perspective, the breast implant litigation is a prime example of an "immature" mass tort, one that lacks an extensive history of outcomes in individual cases. In part for this reason, the parties cannot reliably estimate even the number of present claimants, much less anticipate future claims. The result has been a disaster for all sides, which underscores the dangers of certifying an "immature" mass tort class action. [243]

REV_00262176

Breast implant litigation is a recent phenomenon, which increased dramatically in volume following the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) January 5, 1992 ruling that placed a temporary moratorium on the use of breast implants for cosmetic purposes. [244] As in other mass tort areas, a bitter conflict rapidly developed between the personal injury trial bar and the class action specialists who quickly appeared on the scene. Within weeks of the FDA's ruling, Stanley Chesley of Cincinnati, a well-known but controversial class action plaintiffs' attorney, filed a nationwide negligence class action in his home jurisdiction (the Southern District of Ohio), which was quickly certified as a class action by the district court without a hearing. [245] Rival plaintiffs' attorneys specializing in individual trial work publicly predicted an impending sellout. [246]

But one did not materialize. Although the rival factions of plaintiffs' attorneys each asked the JPML to consolidate all breast implant litigation in a forum favorable to their side (Ohio or California), the Panel declined. Instead, realizing the level of acrimony within the plaintiffs' bar, the Panel consolidated all breast implant actions in a neutral forum that [*1406] no litigant had suggested (the Northern District of Alabama) before Judge Sam Pointer, who was widely recognized as a leading expert among trial judges on class action procedures. [247]

Judge Pointer wisely decided to appoint a seventeen-member plaintiffs' steering committee to direct all pre-trial activity. Carefully balancing the membership on this committee to reflect all the principal factions (who had already engaged in a heated public debate), Judge Pointer appointed three co-chairmen, diplomatically dividing power between Stanley Chesley and representatives of the personal injury trial bar. [248] In addition, procedural safeguards not present in other recent mass tort litigation were followed: special guardians for subclasses were appointed, special opt out and late entry provisions were accepted, and the plaintiffs' steering committee met regularly to monitor the negotiations. [249]

Compared with other mass tort settlements, the breast implant settlement was negotiated in a virtual fishbowl of public disclosure and debate. Once a tentative settlement had been negotiated, a "Statement of Principles," which outlined the proposed settlement, was widely distributed by the plaintiffs' negotiating committee among plaintiffs' lawyers, victims' groups, and potential class members. Victims' groups were also invited by the court to a preliminary hearing on the settlement. [250] When the dust finally settled, a complicated settlement, involving forty different benefit levels, had been negotiated, requiring the defendants to contribute a record total of approximately $ 4.23 billion over a multi-year period. [251]

This contrast between the "cheap" settlements in Georgine and Ahearn and the record settlement in Silicone Gel seemingly suggests that the legal rules and procedures governing the settlement process may matter - and [*1407] greatly. For example, had there been only a two- or three-member team of plaintiffs' attorneys appointed to control the case in Silicone Gel (as in Georgine and Ahearn), the possibility of collusion would have been considerably stronger, and certainly the process of reaching a non-adversarial settlement would have been simpler. Of course, other factors may also help explain the Silicone Gel settlement. For example, because the class was defined to include both present claimants and future claimants (unlike Georgine and Ahearn), highly motivated class members existed to monitor the appointed attorneys. Networks of injured victims also developed to oversee the settlement process and communicate with class members, which is likely to happen only when the class is defined to include "high stakes" plaintiffs with present claims.

Curiously, the plaintiffs' substantive case in Silicone Gel may have been substantially weaker than in the asbestos litigation, because of the absence of clear scientific evidence of the causal relationship between breast implants and specific injuries. [252] That a record settlement resulted against such a backdrop strongly suggests that process differences are a powerful explanatory variable. [253] But this interpretation, although plausible, may be too glib because there is an alternative, darker interpretation of the Silicone Gel settlement.

If the Silicone Gel settlement represents a fair and uncorrupted outcome, it has also proven a fragile and unstable one. In any lump sum settlement, the amount that individual claimants will receive necessarily depends on the number and type of the claims that are filed. When the global settlement was first announced in September 1993, class members were initially informed that they would receive between $ 200,000 and $ 2 million (depending on their generic type of injury and other individual [*1408] factors). [254] Later, these estimates were scaled down to a floor of $ 105,000 and a ceiling of $ 1.4 million, [255] but even these estimates depended on the number of claims actually filed. Thus, to protect class members, an important provision in the settlement agreement specified that class members would receive an additional opportunity to opt out if a higher than anticipated rate of claim filings forced the benefits to be scaled back from these estimated levels.

Sensible as this delayed opt out right was in the case of an "immature" mass tort where predictions of claim filings were necessarily more speculative, it created a material risk for defendants that from the outset placed the settlement under stress. Having agreed to contribute approximately $ 4.23 billion, defendants still faced additional liability in individual actions brought by opt outs. For defendants, this implied that any underestimation of the likely number of claims could set off a chain reaction under which benefits would be scaled down and class members would in consequence opt out in substantial numbers to bring individual actions.

Exactly this scenario appears to have happened. As of the spring of 1995, some 435,000 claimants had filed for eligibility to receive benefits under the settlement, [256] while only 7800 domestic class members and 6500 foreign claimants had opted out. [257] The filing of over 400,000 claims clearly exceeded defendants' expectations and implied that a scaling down of the promised individual benefits would be necessary unless defendants agreed to increase their contributions. In early May 1995, Judge Pointer announced that these claims appeared likely to "substantially exceed" the funds committed by the defendants and asked the parties to negotiate a revised or enriched settlement. [258] Later that summer, the full extent of the necessary scaling back became evident: at best, class members would receive only twelve to sixteen percent of their scheduled benefits, at worst, less than five percent. [259]

For defendants, this development posed a hard choice: if they did not contribute more funds, an unknown, but probably substantial, number of claimants would predictably opt out and commence individual [*1409] actions. Even if they did increase their contribution, some scaling back of benefits might still be necessary if new claims materialized, and any such reduction would predictably trigger opt outs. As a result, defendants had clearly failed to achieve a global peace. Worse yet, preliminary analyses estimated that as much as an additional $ 24 billion contribution would be necessary merely to pay the present claimants. [260]

In response, the principal defendant - Dow Corning - filed for bankruptcy reorganization on May 15, 1995. [261] Although Dow Corning followed in the path of other manufacturers that have elected bankruptcy reorganization to resolve mass tort liabilities, its incentives for electing bankruptcy appear to have been substantially different and novel. Unlike corporations that have opted for bankruptcy when faced with a mass tort class action, Dow Corning seemed intent on preserving the mass tort class action settlement; indeed, its tactical aim seems in part to have been to lock claimants within it by eliminating any incentive to opt out. Because the filing of a bankruptcy petition automatically stays tort litigation against the debtor, [262] opting out gains a claimant little and costs the claimant the right to participate in the settlement (if it remains intact). Once claimants were frozen into the class action, benefits could then be reduced without triggering a major increase in opt outs and hence individual litigation against it. [263] Those who had already opted out would be compensated eventually through the bankruptcy action (possibly with Dow Corning stock), but at the point Dow Corning elected bankruptcy this number seemed insufficient to shift control of Dow Corning away from its parents. [264]

REV_00262204

[*1410] Outside bankruptcy, Dow Corning faced the worst of both worlds: a large class settlement plus individual litigation brought by a substantial, but indeterminate, number of opt outs. Within bankruptcy, Dow Corning was protected from opt outs and could resist pressure to make additional contributions to the class action settlement. More importantly, by combining a class action with a bankruptcy filing, Dow Corning's management achieved objectives that would be impossible under either technique alone. Standing alone, bankruptcy could enable Dow Corning's management to achieve a complete global resolution of its liabilities, but at the possible cost of its management losing control of the company (as Johns-Manville had illustrated). Standing alone, a class action could enable Dow Corning to achieve a cheaper settlement (as Georgine illustrated), but at the cost of remaining vulnerable to opt outs, particularly if benefits were scaled back. Used together, the combination of bankruptcy and a class action effectively converted a standard Rule 23(b)(3) opt out class action into a de facto mandatory class action. Moreover, because few claimants under the class action would thereafter opt out (at least to sue Dow Corning), the bankruptcy reorganization need not shift control of the firm (as prior mass tort bankruptcies have done).

C. Mass Disaster Litigation

The asbestos, Agent Orange, Dalkon Shield, and breast implant litigations were all national events, covered by the media, watched by other judges concerned about their own dockets, and closely followed by several hundred attorneys. Ordinary mass disaster cases occur and are litigated on a much smaller scale. [265] Nonetheless, the concentrated character of the mass tort bar has meant that new techniques learned in the national context have quickly been re-applied in more localized mass tort litigation.

[*1411] A good illustration is supplied by the 1995 settlement of a mass disaster class action, Hayden v. Atochem North America, Inc. [266] The undisputed facts showed egregious environmental violations: basically, an agrichemical plant in Bryan, Texas had exposed the local community to arsenic contamination since the early 1970s, polluting the air, soil, surface water and groundwater. [267] In 1992, a class action seeking only property damages was filed against the current and former owners of the plant as a Rule 23(b)(3) opt out class action. [268] Although the class was initially certified as an opt out settlement class, the settling parties reconsidered their position once Georgine, Ahearn, and other recent cases had shown them the feasibility of resolving personal injury claims through the vehicle of a mass tort class action. In April 1995, the parties reached a revised settlement that converted the case from an opt out class action under Rule 23(b)(3) into a non-opt out class action under Rule 23(b)(2) and extended the settlement to cover personal injuries, including both present and future claims, as well as property damages. [269] To accomplish this critical conversion to a

REV_00262205

Rule 23(b)(2) class action, [270] the parties used a technique that was novel to mass tort cases but well known in labor litigation: they inserted a provision for injunctive relief into the proposed settlement in order to fall outside Rule 23(b)(3). [271] Specifically, the de [*1412] fendants agreed to be enjoined from using the Bryan plant to produce, use, or handle arsenic. [272]

Given that the continued release of arsenic into the surrounding atmosphere almost certainly would violate a variety of federal environmental statutes carrying criminal penalties, this concession amounted to little and ordinarily would not have worked to convert a class action that was predominantly for money damages into a Rule 23(b)(2) class action (from which opting out is not permitted). Most courts have long used a "predominance" test that looks to the primary relief sought in distinguishing Rule 23(b)(2) from Rule 23(b)(3) class actions. [273] Still, plaintiffs characterized their class action as one for medical monitoring (arguably a form of equitable relief) and in fact settled for relatively modest monetary relief: namely, a $ 55 million settlement fund, [274] which amount will in theory both support a medical monitoring program and compensate class members for both property damage and present and future personal injury claims, as well as pay plaintiffs' unusually high attorneys fees. [275] Despite these suspicious signs, the settlement nonetheless received preliminary judicial approval. [276]

[*1413] What makes the Hayden litigation truly shocking, however, is less its attempt to bar opt outs than its willful indifference to future claimants. Although the settlement carefully divided the settlement fund between property claims and personal injury claims, [277] it left the allocation between future and present claimants entirely to the future discretion of a special master. By the settlement's terms, most of the settlement fund will be allocated to a "Personal Injury Fund" that will primarily compensate all class members for the increased risk of injury as a result of their exposure. [278] However, because the latency period for arsenic exposure is up to forty years, [279] and an estimated 26,000 class members are covered by the settlement, [280] it is inevitable that some future claimants will incur actual arsenic-related illnesses in the remote future. Such claims for actual personal injury are defined as "extraordinary claims" by the settlement, and the special master is given substantial discretion in processing and recognizing them. No funds are specifically allocated for future claimants, but the special master is instructed to "make an initial evaluation of all extraordinary claims submitted during the first nine months [of the settlement] and ... create a reserve from the Personal Injury Fund for the payment of extraordinary claims based on extraordinary claim awards." [281] Predictably, the settlement provides that if the fund for personal injury claimants proves inadequate, claims will be scaled back and defendants will have no additional liability. [282]

In overview, such an undefined allocation procedure simply sweeps the difficult problem of future claims estimation under the rug, postponing it until after judicial approval has been secured. If the estimation of future claims is implausibly low, no one is in a position to object (and present claimants receive a higher payment); in contrast, if it is too high, present claimants have a strong incentive to protest. The consequence is [*1414] that substantial corporations escape with a modest lump sum settlement from which class members cannot opt out, while future claimants are left to gamble on the adequacy of a settlement fund that does not even reserve specific amounts for them. Ultimately, the Hayden outcome reflects not only the triumph of defendants over plaintiffs, but also that of present claimants over unrepresented and still unknown future claimants.

D. Mass Tort Product Liability Cases

An instructive contrast to the foregoing mass tort personal injury cases is supplied by the recent experience in mass tort product liability cases. As a generalization, such cases involve the same operative facts as in a personal injury class action, except that they are inherently "small claimant" cases. The class members in such cases have either suffered a decline in the value of a defective product that they purchased or have experienced other property damage because of the product's malfunction. In the typical case, an automobile model is alleged to have a safety defect that resulted in both personal injuries and property damage. Although class actions for personal injuries in such cases are still rare to non-existent, [283] a property damage class action makes comparatively good sense because the interests of the class members are relatively homogenous. Each has suffered relatively equivalent property damages, and use of the class action would obviously economize on costly duplicative litigation.

REV_00262206

The irony, however, is that it is in this property loss context that courts have recently been the most vigilant. Within the last year alone, courts have rejected proposed nationwide class action settlements in cases involving the Ford Bronco II, [284] a General Motors pickup truck with "side-saddle" gas tanks that allegedly exploded in minor collisions, [285] and a defective polybutylene (PB) plumbing system that had been installed in several million American homes. [286]

[*1415] What explains the relatively close scrutiny given these settlements? Possibly their facts were more egregious, [287] but the same pattern of settlement classes and separate inventory settlements was present in both contexts. Thus, plaintiffs' attorneys in these settlements do not appear to [*1416] have been more subject to conflicts of interest than those attorneys representing the class in recent asbestos class actions. In this light, the distinctive feature of property damage class actions was that rejection of the settlement imposed little cost on the court. Little impact on the federal docket was likely if the settlements were disapproved. After all, few individual plaintiffs would bear the litigation costs of suing for the decline in the value of their car or pickup truck because of a safety defect. In contrast, asbestos, breast implant, and Agent Orange cases did have the potential to swamp the federal docket because individual plaintiffs possessed "high stakes" claims and could obtain representation on a contingency fee basis.

Other factors may also explain the difference in judicial reaction. Chief among these factors is the lack of urgency surrounding property damage settlements. In some of these cases, rejection of the settlement has simply led to its renegotiation and enhancement. [288] But even if not, no class member is left impoverished. In the personal injury context, [*1417] however, courts are impelled by the perception that compensation must be expedited to the seriously injured and dying. [289]

Nonetheless, all these factors point toward a common conclusion: In dealing with mass tort personal injury class actions, courts are both more conflicted and pressured. Remove these pressures, and they become more skeptical of class action settlements, which, both procedurally and substantively, seem to be not very different from those that they have approved.

E. A Preliminary Evaluation

What are the early lessons of the recent experience with mass tort class actions? First, recent cases underscore the difficulties inherent in dealing with future claimants. The destabilizing force that caused the Silicone Gel global settlement to unravel was the failure of the parties to estimate accurately the number of claims that would be filed. Given that an estimated 650,000 to 1,000,000 women received silicone implants during the 1970s and

REV_00262207

1980s, [290] it may have understandably surprised defendants that 440,000 claimants (or well over forty percent) filed within months of the settlement's approval. [291] Defendants had estimated that $ 1.2 billion would be sufficient to cover the first round of payments to present claimants, but wound up raising this estimate to $ 24 billion. [292] Moreover, this underestimation could only grow as additional women would predictably file claims in the future upon discovery of illness. Arguably, the inaccuracy of these predictions may have been the consequence of the "immature" status of breast implant litigation. Only seventy-eight identifiable breast implant cases were pending in the federal courts (plus an estimated two hundred "related" actions) at the time the JPML consolidated all breast implant litigation in 1992 before Judge Pointer. [293] Such a limited experience provided insufficient information to estimate the number and types of claims likely to be asserted. [294]

Still, there may be a more basic reason why the parties grossly underestimated the claims likely to be filed: it was in their mutual self-interest to do so. Some $ 1 billion of the $ 4.23 billion Silicone Gel class action was [*1418] reserved for attorneys' fees and expenses, and this fund was to be "divided among a core group of 21 lawyers and thousands of referring attorneys." [295] Receipt of these fees required that the settlement hold together, and this incentive could have induced plaintiffs' attorneys to accept a low estimate of likely claims as to which a more disinterested person would have been more skeptical. [296] To be sure, Silicone Gel is the almost unique case in which there was no hint of impropriety surrounding the settlement process. But for precisely this reason, it suggests that the contingent nature of the plaintiffs' attorneys' fees may leave them without an adequate incentive to contest an underestimate by defendants of likely future claims. Both sides then have reasons to suppress their misgivings about the adequacy of the settlement fund.

For defendants, the practical lesson from the Silicone Gel experience may be a perverse one from a public policy perspective: i.e., never grant a delayed opt out right, because it can expose defendants to double liability under both the class action and individual actions. Indeed, the Silicone Gel experience may confirm defendants in their recent practice of seeking to define the class to include only future claimants (who predictably will not seek to opt out during a brief initial opt out period ending well before their symptoms manifest themselves). To curtail claimant eligibility, defendants may increasingly negotiate individual defendant-by-defendant settlements, rather than industry-wide settlements. [297] Defendants will, however, likely persist in seeking an early resolution of future claims before the typical settlement price spiral that accompanies the evolution of a mass tort. [298] As a result, a dangerous combination seems likely to recur: early certification of a nationwide class action before there has been sufficient experience in individual cases to establish market values coupled with increasing restrictions on the plaintiffs' right to opt out.

[*1419] The Dow Corning bankruptcy also underscores for defendants the potential attractions of bankruptcy and a class action, used in combination, to deter opting out. If employed early enough before a substantial volume of individual litigation has begun outside the class action, bankruptcy need not threaten corporate control. [299]

Another perverse effect of Silicone Gel may be to discourage judicial attempts to limit plaintiffs' attorneys' fees. The settlement approved by Judge Pointer placed an outer twenty-four percent ceiling on legal and administrative costs and suggested that individual contingency fees might be restricted to this same ceiling. [300] The sensible premise to this policy was that because liability had been established under the settlement, the individual attorney should not receive a greater contingency fee. [301] Unconscionable as it may seem that an attorney should receive one-third or more of this riskless recovery under a retainer agreement with the client, the impact of this apparent ceiling may have been to encourage opportunistic opting out by self-interested plaintiffs' attorneys. That is, a plaintiffs' attorney representing an individual client entitled to $ 1,000,000 under the settlement could anticipate a fee of only $ 240,000 under the Silicone Gel settlement's presumed ceiling (assuming a private retainer agreement between the attorney and client under which the attorney was authorized to charge more). If, however, the attorney induced the client to opt out and maintain an individual action, and if that action resulted [*1420] in a verdict or settlement for the same $ 1,000,000, the attorney would now earn $ 400,000 (or perhaps more, depending upon the private retainer agreement between the client and the attorney, which today often provides a forty percent contingent fee). Indeed, the attorney could still do better even if the client did worse (for example, forty percent of an $ 800,000 outcome would be $ 320,000). Unfortunately, sensible fee reform may encourage socially undesirable and inefficient opting out that advances the attorney's interests rather than the client's.

REV_00262208

Conspicuously absent in all these cases has been any effort to deal seriously with the problems of future claimants. Across the board, the issue of inflation has been quietly and uniformly repressed, and the settling parties in recent class actions have not attempted to project the number of future claims (and types of claims) with anything approaching the seriousness of the effort made in recent mass tort bankruptcy cases. [302] Only Ahearn gave any recognition to the special position of future claimants by appointing a guardian ad litem. Still, it is clearly an inadequate response to appoint a special representative after the settlement agreement has been struck.

Beyond the absence of procedural protections for future claimants, the larger question involves what future claimants conceivably gain from these settlements. Ahearn here supplies the best illustration. As with other mass tort class actions, its settlement essentially established an insurance fund to cover future claimants whose injuries mature into a compensable form over a multi-decade period. In Ahearn, this insurance fund consisted of the company's insurance resources (made available after a clearly intense and negotiated settlement with Fibreboard's two principal insurers) plus a trivial $ 10 million contribution by Fibreboard. In return, Fibreboard received future immunity from all asbestos claims. Had the class action settlement not been reached, the same insurance resources would have been potentially available (although Fibreboard might again have had to sue and settle with its insurance carriers to obtain payment) and the future claimants would have also had access to the full economic resources of Fibreboard. Thus, the class members appear to have traded Fibreboard's liability for nothing to which they did not already have a right. The only benefit to class members in this setting is the reduced possibility that the company's insurance resources would have been exhausted by the time their claims matured. That is, "early" future claimants might have depleted these resources to the detriment of "later" future claimants. Although this is not a trivial problem, it could potentially be solved by injunctive relief restricting the payout of insurance resources to early claimants (and thus does not justify a complete release to [*1421] Fibreboard itself in return for a token $ 10 million contribution). Put differently, no reason seems apparent why all future claimants should absolve Fibreboard from liability simply because early future claimants might otherwise exhaust the insurance fund.

In rebuttal, some may argue that a rash of sudden claims in a particular period could have forced Fibreboard into bankruptcy. Bad as bankruptcy might seem for shareholders, Fibreboard's tort creditors would likely have emerged better off from it. Based on the experience in the asbestos bankruptcies, most of the debtors' value in bankruptcy would have been contributed to a mass tort settlement fund. [303] Nor should it be assumed that bankruptcy would have necessarily resulted, as management might have found additional financial resources with which to pay claims. Bankruptcy is easy to threaten, but management will be predictably slow to make good on this threat because bankruptcy also jeopardizes their own continued employment. [304]

Part III. The Search for Remedies

REV_00262209

Potentially, there are a variety of levers by which courts could seek to discourage collusive settlements and protect the underrepresented in mass tort class actions. These range from strict constitutional standards to more modest adjustments in federal rules and certification procedures. What is clear, however, is that the traditional levers used by courts to align the interests of plaintiffs' attorneys and class members work poorly in the mass tort context. For example, the court's primary regulatory tool in the class action context has been its ability to adjust its fee award to reflect the plaintiffs' attorney's success (or lack thereof). [305] But in the mass tort context, the popularity of inventory settlements undercuts this judicial lever and permits potentially corrupting side payments. Moreover, mass tort class actions now produce recoveries exceeding the billion-dollar level. In such a context, even a modest percentage of the recovery may result in a fee award of such a magnitude that it brings the declining marginal utility of money into play. That is, the defendants' willingness to agree to a fee award of, say, $ 80 million (in return for a less than fully adversarial settlement) cannot be as easily overcome by the prospect of an even larger fee recovery if the case were more aggressively litigated.

This Part is organized sequentially. First, it assesses those standards and doctrines that might prevent or discourage a court from certifying a future claims class action. Second, it considers possible standards to govern class certification and the selection of lead counsel. Third, it exam [*1422] ines techniques that would effectively enable class members to opt out of the class action. Fourth, it proposes standards for the "settlement class action." Finally, it discusses the relative merits of bankruptcy and the mass tort class action.

The common premise to this analysis is not that each plaintiff should receive his or her "day in court" in the form of an individual trial. Rather, recognizing that idealism and pragmatism must be balanced, this Part begins from the premise that judicial competence is limited. Because courts cannot anticipate developments over a multi-decade period, judicial attempts to create an insurance system through a class action settlement are likely to go awry, with the result that at least the more distant future claimants will be undercompensated. Some measure of litigant autonomy is thus desirable not only for its own sake, but because group litigation will predictably shortchange future claimants.

To a degree, this may state a justification for benign neglect, for allowing the ordinary litigation system to muddle through imperfectly, but with some cases ending up in a mass tort bankruptcy (where the claimants have greater substantive and procedural rights). However, that option is both politically infeasible and certain to encounter judicial hostility. Thus, this Part proposes a means by which the class action can be combined with arbitration to reduce the logistical burden on courts. Under such a "constrained autonomy" model, the majority of claims are resolved through group litigation, but the "high stakes" claimant and the future claimant are provided with an escape hatch by which to assert their individual claims (albeit in a restricted forum).

A. The Justiciability of Future Claims

The utility of the mass tort class action to the defendant today probably hinges on its ability to resolve future claims. [306] The attractions of the class action over a bankruptcy reorganization to the defendant are obvious: (1) defendants can reach a settlement before the action is filed, whereas in bankruptcy there will typically be uncertainty as of the filing date as to what percentage of the firm's value must be given to the settlement trust set up to benefit victims; (2) the debtor corporation can escape the absolute priority rule and special class voting rules of bankruptcy; [307] (3) bankruptcy courts may reopen the proceeding

REV_00262210

and demand additional allocations from the reorganized corporation when the trust fund approaches insolvency; [308] and (4) the legal status of future [*1423] claims in bankruptcy remains unresolved, with some decisions implying that some future claims cannot be discharged by the bankruptcy court. [309]

Understandable as it is that defendants want litigation closure from the typically spiralling costs of future claims, constitutional limits may constrain the ability of a federal court to provide it. The primary doctrinal obstacle is Article III, Section 2 of the U.S. Constitution, which permits federal courts to exercise jurisdiction only over "cases" and "controversies." Traditionally, this constitutional barrier has been employed to deny subject matter jurisdiction in two quite distinct contexts, both of which have applicability to the mass tort class action. First, numerous cases have held that federal courts may not hear "friendly," "feigned," or collusive lawsuits, in which there is no legitimate dispute between the parties. [310] Such actions both misuse judicial authority (because the court's perception of the facts and legal arguments is distorted by the absence of true adversaries), and confuse judicial decisionmaking. [311] Settlement class actions may sometimes present precisely this form of feigned litigation that violates this norm, but discussion of this issue will be deferred until a later section. [312]

Second, the deeper policy rationale for the "case or controversy" requirement is to preserve the separation of powers by limiting the matters that the judicial branch may address. [313] The traditional rhetoric of the case law says that federal courts may not decide "abstract or hypothetical [*1424] questions." [314] At bottom, this limitation prevents activist judges from making essentially legislative policy judgments as to which they typically have neither expertise nor legitimacy. Accordingly, a plaintiff must have more than an ideological interest in a dispute to have standing, [315] but rather must have a " "personal stake in the outcome of the controversy.' " [316] The Supreme Court has framed a tripartite test for determining when this requisite personal stake exists, which requires that (1) the plaintiff have suffered a concrete injury in fact; (2) the injury is fairly traceable to the challenged conduct; and (3) the injury is likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. [317]

Do future claimants have the requisite "injury-in-fact" to give them standing? In Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, [318] the Court said that an injury in fact had to be "(a) concrete and particularized ... and (b) "actual or imminent, not "conjectural" or "hypothetical." ' " [319] Obviously, one can assert that highly contingent and delayed future claims in mass tort cases are not sufficiently "actual or imminent" to meet this standard. Here, however, it is necessary to refine and break down the somewhat overbroad concept of future claims. [320] In overview, future claimants can be subdivided into three distinct subcategories: (1) persons who have suffered a legally cognizable injury but (for whatever reason) have not yet filed suit; (2) persons who have been exposed to the toxic or defective substance, drug, or product but have not yet manifested injury; [321] and (3) persons who have not yet been exposed or injured but who will be in the future as a result of conduct by the defendants that has already occurred. [322] This last category arises typically when the product or sub [*1425] stance remains in use (contrary to the fact patterns in the asbestos or silicone gel breast implants cases where the product had been withdrawn from the market); this category will predictably loom larger in future cases involving alleged tobacco addiction and injuries from secondary exposure to tobacco smoke. As discussed below, this third category is the one that can be most clearly excluded under a constitutional analysis.

As a practical matter, however, the critical category is the second one: the "exposure only" victims who lack symptoms at the time of the settlement. Defendants have zealously sought to cover such "exposure only" plaintiffs in recent settlement class actions, and indeed probably would not have settled had this category been excluded. For example, in Georgine, the complaint expressly asserted that the "exposure only" plaintiffs had sustained no physical harm as a result of their exposure to asbestos, but sought relief instead for (1) their increased risk of developing asbestos-related disease; (2) their fear and mental anguish at the prospect of developing asbestos-related disease; and (3) their need for medical monitoring and surveillance to detect asbestos-related illness at an early stage. [323] If intangible and contingent injuries such as these, which essentially spring from an increased base expectancy rate of future illness, amount to a concrete injury-in-fact sufficient to confer standing, then it would seem that few meaningful barriers remain. Indeed, on this basis, a settlement class action today might also resolve, consistent with Article III, the future claims of all citizens in the United States who have been exposed to secondary tobacco smoke.

REV_00262211

But what practical lines can be drawn that would find such claims to be non-justiciable? Probably the simplest "bright line" standard would be to look to state law and assert that if a claim, as pleaded, was not cognizable under state law, then it also should not be a sufficient "injury-in-fact" for purposes of Article III. Today, in most state jurisdictions, exposure alone to toxic substances does not give rise to a legally cognizable injury for fear or emotional distress. [324] These decisions have generally held that increased risk of future injury, or fear of such injury, does not constitute an independent ground for the recovery of damages, absent some "direct [*1426] physical injury or impact." [325] Some cases have said that even a "subclinical injury resulting from exposure to asbestos is insufficient to constitute the actual loss or damage to a plaintiff's interest required to sustain a cause of action." [326]

Ironically, the same district court that decided Georgine had earlier found that "exposure only" plaintiffs lacked Article III standing in the absence of an actual asbestos-related injury. [327] Yet, when faced with the Georgine settlement class, the court reversed its prior position. Noting that in Association of Data Processing Service Organizations, Inc. v. Camp, [328] the Supreme Court had liberalized its test for Article III standing, abandoning its former "legal interest" test, which required an examination of the legal merits of plaintiffs' claim in favor of an "injury-in-fact" test, the Georgine district court concluded that the newer "injury-in-fact" test could be satisfied simply by the fact of exposure. [329]

Although the Data Processing decision may well have liberalized the "injury-in-fact" test, it does not follow that mere exposure alone is always sufficient. In particular, the authority relied upon in Georgine can be easily distinguished. Those cases that have found mere exposure sufficient to confer Article III standing have largely arisen in two very different contexts: injunctive actions and bankruptcy proceedings. The leading example of the former context is Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc., [330] in which the Court did find that exposure to a toxin could confer standing to sue to enjoin enforcement of a federal statute. [331] It [*1427] noted that "the emission of non-natural radiation into appellees' environment would also seem a direct and present injury." [332] But injunctive actions stand apart from actions for money judgments because most injunctive actions will unavoidably affect unrepresented future claimants. Thus, for example, an injunction redrawing school boundaries in a desegregation case necessarily and inevitably affects future claimants, many of whom have not yet even been exposed to the unlawful condition or danger. Given that such future claimants will inevitably be affected, it may be appropriate to recognize their standing and unnecessary to provide them a right to opt out. Precisely for this reason, Rule 23 permits non-opt out class actions when the plaintiff seeks relief that will necessarily affect absent parties. [333]

The bankruptcy context is even more distinguishable, for several reasons. First, the Bankruptcy Clause of the U.S. Constitution vests Congress with broad power "to establish ... uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States." [334] Congress thus has broader power here than elsewhere, [335] although the Fifth Amendment imposes some due process limitations even in this context. [336] Despite the differences in congressional authority (and the critical fact that Congress has acted by passing the Bankruptcy Code), the irony is that future claimants currently receive more protection in bankruptcy than in a class action. Today, in bankruptcy, the majority of recent cases have found that a legally cognizable claim in bankruptcy does not arise simply because negligent or reckless conduct by the defendant occurred prior to the time of the filing of the bankruptcy petition. Rather, action:

REV_00262212

First, courts themselves are "conflicted" because of the threat of docket inundation from individual mass tort cases, and thus they may be more willing to countenance doubtful settlements that they probably would not otherwise accept. [23] Indeed, the case studies on which this [*1351] Article will concentrate are ones in which activist judges became deeply involved in the negotiation of the settlement - with disastrous consequences for plaintiffs.

Second, the court's primary tool for regulating plaintiffs' attorneys in class actions - judicial control over plaintiffs' attorneys' fees - is less effective in the mass tort context because defendants can (and do) offer inducements to settle that are largely beyond the court's control.

Third, even when individual class members hold legally meritorious claims for significant damages, client passivity may remain the norm because many (and sometimes virtually all) class members are "future claimants" - that is, persons who have not yet experienced any symptomatic illness or disease, but rather share only a statistically enhanced risk of future illness or injury because of their exposure to a toxic product or process. To the extent that future claimants will remain rationally apathetic about a legal proceeding brought in their name (because they may have a low probability on an individual basis of experiencing actual, compensable injury), defendants have a strong interest in resolving such an action at an early stage well before any such class members experience injury and thus have an incentive to monitor their attorneys' conduct.

One other preliminary distinction needs to be understood about class actions. Although there are gray areas at the margin, class actions divide economically into "small claimant" classes and "large claimant" classes. In the former context, individual claimants lack legal claims that would be economically viable if asserted on an individual basis, while in the latter context most class members can attract competent counsel to represent them in individual actions on a contingency basis. Securities and antitrust class actions in particular tend to be thought of as "small [*1352] claimant" classes, [24] whose members cannot afford to opt out and pursue individual claims. [25] Personal injury class actions, however, are populated by many class members with large individual claims. This distinction between "small claimant" and "large claimant" class actions helps to explain one other initially puzzling feature of class action practice and behavior: sometimes corporate defendants resist class certification vehemently, and sometimes they rush to embrace it (even soliciting the action). Under closer examination, defendants' behavior is consistent and rational. In "small claimant" class actions, defendants tend to resist class certification (because plaintiffs have no realistic alternative), whereas in "large claimant" classes, defendants increasingly prefer class certification for a variety of reasons, including both their desire to avoid repetitive awards of punitive damages and their hope to reach a "reasonable" global settlement with cooperative plaintiffs' attorneys. [26]

[*1353] Against this backdrop, a roadmap of this Article is now in order. Part I initially will examine the development of, and dynamics within, the mass tort class action and then focus on the new technology for collusion that it has fostered. Three techniques - inventory settlements, settlement classes, and the deliberate definition of the class to cover only future claimants - have become standard and deserve special attention. An additional but still doctrinally uncertain tactic is the certification of a mandatory or "non-opt out" class action in an action that is primarily for monetary damages. [27] Use of this technique would be greatly expanded in a new version of Rule 23 that is now before the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules. [28]

Because the case for reform depends on first recognizing how exposed the position of the future claimant is in a mass tort class action, Part II will examine in detail several recent mass tort class actions involving asbestos, breast implants, mass disasters, and defective

REV_00262177

these decisions have held that there must be some pre-petition relationship between the future claimants and the bankrupt entity in order for the future claimants to [*1428] have standing. [337] Some of these decisions also require that the claim was within the "fair contemplation of the parties" at the time of the bankruptcy filing. [338] When the claim was not within the parties' "fair contemplation," they have said, the bankruptcy reorganization will not act as a bar and the future claimant can still sue the reorganized entity years later when the claimant's injury first manifests itself. [339]

To be sure, not all courts have agreed, and some decisions have been more liberal [340] and still others more conservative [341] in defining when a claim arises under the Bankruptcy Code. Nonetheless, this intermediate standard, which requires both the existence of a pre-petition relationship and that the claim be within the parties' "fair contemplation," makes good sense and could easily be applied to govern justiciability in the class action context as well. From a policy perspective, the mass tort class ac [*1429] tion and the mass tort bankruptcy contexts are functional substitutes, and the same limitations should apply in both contexts. [342]

At first glance, the relationship test announced in these bankruptcy cases may seem to impose only modest restrictions. Indeed, cases applying this relationship standard have suggested in dicta that exposure will suffice to establish the requisite relationship. [343] But this does not mean that any form of exposure need suffice. Once one recognizes that a relationship must exist between plaintiff and defendant at the time of the action to satisfy Article III, it follows that not all forms of exposure will suffice to establish this element.

Some distinctions seem obvious. Consider, for example, how the Silicone Gel litigation might have been analyzed under such a standard. A recipient of breast implants has obviously been "exposed" in an intrusive and intimate way through a surgical procedure. This fact should satisfy both the pre-petition relationship standard and the "fair contemplation" standard (particularly in the latter case given the substantial publicity surrounding the health hazards associated with breast implants before the time at which litigation was settled). [344] Similarly, recent mass tort episodes involving the Dalkon Shield or defective heart valves would also meet this standard. [345]

In contrast, in a hypothetical case involving secondary exposure to tobacco smoke or to a toxic pesticide through its release into the air, the same relationship should not be found to exist because those exposed would include not only employees and purchasers of the product, but the potentially limitless class of anyone coincidentally located in the vicinity of the release. [346] The status of asbestos cases under this standard is more [*1430] questionable. On the one hand, because the occupational exposure of many workers was long and sustained, the requisite relationship could be found to exist in their case. On the other hand, virtually every U.S. citizen has been exposed to asbestos. [347] A relationship that every U.S. citizen shares with the defendant is hardly a meaningful relationship, and, if exposure alone gave rise to the requisite Article III "injury-in-fact," there would be universal standing. Such a result - universal standing in all U.S. citizens - seems starkly at odds with the traditional prudential limitation on standing under which federal courts " "limit access to the federal courts to those litigants best suited to assert a particular claim.' " [348]

This Article's contention that Article III should require a significant pre-settlement relationship between the future claimants who will be bound by the settlement and the defendant faces one significant doctrinal obstacle. In In re "Agent Orange" Product Liability Litigation, [349] the Second Circuit rebuffed the attempts of Vietnam veterans who sought to attack collaterally an earlier massive class action settlement of claims relating to "Agent Orange," a toxic defoliant used in the Vietnam War. The veterans claimed that they could not be bound by the earlier settlement, both because they had not received constitutionally adequate notice of the settlement and because they lacked a justiciable claim at the time of the settlement insofar as they had not then manifested any symptoms from their exposure

REV_00262213

(and thus arguably lacked the requisite "injury-in-fact" necessary to have their claims adjudicated). [350] The Second Circuit rejected these claims, relying in part on Duke Power Co. v. Carolina Environmental Study Group, Inc., [351] for its conclusion that the veterans had sustained the necessary "injury-in-fact." Other decisions, however, have been more skeptical as to whether future claimants should be included within a proposed class. [352]

[*1431] So where are we left? On the policy level, the preferable rule may be the more conservative one stated in those bankruptcy decisions that find only claims that have accrued under state law to be cognizable under Article III. [353] In most state jurisdictions, this standard would require some present and recognized injury, thereby excluding the bulk of future claimants. Although this rule has been criticized in the bankruptcy context because it may deny the court the power to reorganize a company that is subject to contingent future claims, this critique has less applicability to the mass tort context, because, as this Article later argues, [354] this is precisely the function that a class action is least capable of successfully performing. Still, on the practical level, the case law on justiciability in class actions may have already gone beyond this point, so that only the Supreme Court would impose such an "accrued state claim" gloss on Article III. Nonetheless, at least outside the Second Circuit, federal courts could and should still look to the broader line of bankruptcy decisions that require both a significant, pre-filing relationship between the parties and that the future injury be then within the plaintiffs' "fair contemplation." Even within the Second Circuit, the degree of exposure remains relevant, and a secondary tobacco smoke or pesticide exposure case is not necessarily controlled by the Agent Orange precedent, which on its facts probably involved a more sustained exposure with clearer recognition by the class members of the possibility of injury. Finally, even Agent Orange does not confer Article III standing on class members who have not yet been exposed at the time of the action's filing.

Still, Georgine and Agent Orange suggest that federal courts will resist any effort at curtailing the justiciability of future claims in mass tort class actions when to do so threatens their ability to control their dockets. Symptomatically, the more restrictive bankruptcy cases arose in a context where courts had greater constitutional authority to define the standard, but less caseload pressure inducing them to be all inclusive. [355] At least [*1432] on policy grounds, there are persuasive reasons why those circuit courts that have not yet faced the issue should apply the bankruptcy standards to the class action context in order to restrict future claims class actions:

First, future claims classes lack the " "concrete adverseness which sharpens the presentation of issues.' " [356] That is, because such a class is inchoate and without existing members having a strong personal stake in the outcome, there will seldom be class members able or willing to monitor their attorneys. Future claims class actions present, then, the extreme example of lawyers operating without clients.

Second, doctrinally, Article III justiciability requires that plaintiffs show "personal injury fairly traceable to the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct and likely to be redressed by the requested relief." [357] Here, a fundamental problem with "exposure only" classes is that appropriate compensation for the injury of exposure is an elusive concept. Any current cash award will inevitably overcompensate those who do not develop more severe subsequent illness and undercompensate those who do. [358] All that reasonably can be done is to establish an insurance fund, but this requires courts to engage in precisely the kind of predictive decisionmaking that strains and usually exceeds their competence. Judge Posner made precisely this point in declining to permit future claimants to participate in a mass tort bankruptcy proceeding, stating that it arguably "would be a quixotic undertaking far beyond the realistic boundaries of judicial competence to make sufficiently generous provision for upwards of a hundred thousand unidentified claimants to justify extinguishing their claims involuntarily." [359] Put simply, to give adequate redress in a future claims class action, the court must both estimate the number and character of the claims that will be received and the likely inflation rate applicable to the future period. Recent experience suggests that courts have limited ability to perform this task. [360] Bad as the performance of [*1433] courts in asbestos cases has been, these cases are the paradigm of a "mature" mass tort case in which courts have some idea about the likely future filing rate and the value of claims in the legal marketplace. The unravelling of the Silicone Gel settlement shows that in the case of an "immature" mass tort, neither the parties nor the court can predict even the rate of case filings during the first year of the settlement. [361] Were the court instead facing a class action dealing with a new carcinogen or a drug with toxic side effects, it would lack any basis upon which to estimate the number of future claimants.

REV_00262214

B. Class Certification and the Future Claimant

Constitutional contentions may be more persuasive when repackaged more narrowly as arguments about the certifiability of a class action under Rule 23. Clearly, mass tort class actions have strained the boundaries of Rule 23, and there are a variety of ways that courts could draw those boundaries more conservatively, in part to avoid constitutional confrontations. Several different theories need to be considered under this heading: (1) that a future claimants class action should not be certified under the language of Rule 23; (2) that a future claimants class action should be certified only when the court finds a probability of success on the merits; and (3) that only a "limited" class action should be certified on the issue of liability, but typically not on the issues of causation or damages. Ultimately, this Article endorses a variant on the third of these options as the approach most likely to protect the future claimant without inundating the federal courts.

1. The Authority of the Class Representative. - Black letter law holds that the named plaintiff in a class action "cannot represent a class of whom they are not a part." [362] This means that the class representative can represent the class "only to the extent of the interests they possess in [*1434] common with members of the class." [363] In short, only a "typical" representative [364] can serve as an adequate representative. [365]

In this light, who constitutes a "typical" and "adequate" representative for a class of future claimants? In Georgine, the complaint listed several "exposure only" plaintiffs and asserted that, although they had suffered no physical harm at that point from their exposure to asbestos, they were entitled to relief for their fear and mental anguish at the prospect of future illness and for their special needs for medical monitoring and surveillance. [366] These allegations would probably be sufficient if the class as a whole were seeking relief only for these psychic injuries. In reality, however, relief is invariably also sought for more serious injuries (lung cancer, asbestosis) that only a portion of the class will later develop.

Thus, the underlying issue surfaces: can the class representative represent a class of future claimants and settle their claims for serious (but future) injuries from which the class representative does not suffer (and probably will not suffer)? The problem here is not simply one of "typicality," but of the necessary limits on the authority of the class representative. Read closely, Judge Friendly's decision in National Super Spuds v. New York Mercantile Exchange [367] suggests that the agent's authority is necessarily bounded by the pleadings. Accordingly, if the pleadings allege that the class representative was injured in one transaction involving a specific set of facts, the class representative lacks authority to settle or compromise claims involving another set of facts. [368] In mass tort cases, as noted above, the pleadings typically allege that the representative of the future claimants is subject to fear, anguish, and an increased risk of illness, but they do not (and cannot) allege that the representative will suffer from more serious illness and disease in the future. Arguably then, the class [*1435] representative cannot settle claims based on predicate facts that are not alleged (i.e., the claimants' future illness).

REV_00262215

Judge Friendly's view in National Super Spuds that an atypical plaintiff cannot meet the "adequacy of representation" standard in Rule 23(a) [369] rests on a sound perception of the conflicts of interest that arise under any contrary rule. In the mass tort context, real conflicts are easy to visualize between a named plaintiff (who may or may not become seriously ill in the future) and those future claimants who do incur serious disease. For example, a class representative who has been exposed to a toxic product but who has only a five percent base expectancy rate of lung cancer as a result may logically prefer a settlement that emphasizes current cash compensation or medical monitoring for all claimants over a substantial cash award to only those who do become seriously ill. Precisely to this degree, such a plaintiff is not an adequate representative for those who do become seriously ill. Inherently, there is a considerable difference between the status of a person exposed to a risk and that of one who has had the risk actually materialize. To ignore this difference is to equate the holder of a lottery ticket with the winner of a lottery.

Of course, much depends here on whether one takes an ex ante or an ex post perspective. From the former perspective, the class members are similarly situated in that they are equally exposed to the risk, and the named plaintiff arguably might be described as an adequate representative. From the ex post perspective, however, the named plaintiff is hardly "typical" of the persons who later become seriously ill. In this context, the problem with the ex ante perspective is that it proves too much. Logically, from an ex ante perspective, the plaintiff need not even have yet been exposed to the toxic substance or defective product. After all, all citizens stand in risk of future exposure to many toxic products (such as asbestos or tobacco smoke), and the fact of exposure may only marginally increase the base expectancy rate of illness for those so exposed (say, from one percent to five percent). The case for an ex post perspective rests on the need for named plaintiffs who have an identity of interests with each major outcome group. [370] At least in a class action that is primarily for monetary relief, a close nexus should be required between the injuries sustained by at least one subclass of named plaintiffs and those to be sustained by the worst-off members of the future claimant class before the named plaintiff is deemed to be an adequate representative under Rule 23(a)(4).

[*1436] Admittedly, this argument that a person subject only to a risk of injury cannot be an adequate or typical representative for the future claimants who in fact suffer severe injuries conflicts with some decisions that have been more permissive on this issue. [371] But these decisions tend to be institutional reform cases seeking primary injunctive relief. Ultimately, mass tort actions for monetary relief are both very different and more problematic in their value for plaintiffs. A person who is an adequate representative for an injunctive action may not be so for a money damages suit. [372] Why? Simply put, injunctive actions do not create the same difficult allocation problems in terms of how the settlement fund is to be distributed.

Although a purist might argue that no named plaintiff can be an adequate representative for at least remote future claimants, a reasonable solution would be to insist on classes having distinct subclasses for present and future claimants. This accomplishes several objectives: (1) current claimants, who typically have high stakes claims, are not likely to be as passive as future claimants and may monitor the negotiations actively; [373] (2) multiple counsel with responsibilities for distinct subclasses may impede collusion; and (3) the future claimants, if properly represented, will have an interest in a serious attempt to estimate the number and character of future claims and the impact of inflation.

2. "Superiority". - Under the language of Rule 23, the most obvious argument by which to restrict the scope of a future claims class action involves the "superiority" test of Rule 23(b)(3), which requires that the court find before certifying the class that "a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." [374] In evaluating this standard, Rule 23 further instructs the court to consider "the interests of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions" and "the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action." [375] As discussed above, these difficulties are likely to be overpowering when mass tort injuries have long latency periods. A rational future claimant would prefer an individual action if it will likely pay him or her more than the class relief. Thus, where the class relief appears to be below the going [*1437] rate in individual actions (as in Georgine), it is difficult to understand why a class member would prefer less to more. In addition, the settlement fund is an inviting target for a host of present claimants and their attorneys, who on a piecemeal basis have repeatedly "raided" such funds in the asbestos context and driven them into insolvency. [376]

REV_00262216

When should a class action resolution be seen as "superior to other available methods" for the resolution of a mass tort episode? One requirement should be that the settlement establish an actuarially reliable insurance fund, which is adequately funded. Here, the first problem is that experts themselves do not agree on the likely number of future claims in most mass torts cases. Even in the case of the "mature" field of asbestos litigation, recent "estimates for mesothelioma deaths range from 15,500 to 300,000, while the estimates of deaths from asbestos-related lung cancer range from 30,758 to 1,440,000." [377] In such an environment, a lump sum settlement under which the defendant deposits a fixed and limited amount based on an estimate of the likely future claims should not be approved. Rather, the settlement should be either open-ended or should at the least provide a continuing opportunity for class members to opt out and sue in individual actions in the event that benefits need to be scaled back. [378]

Next, to determine that an action is "superior to other available methods," the court should be able to find that the individual class members will do at least as well on a net basis as if they pursued individual actions. Here, the fact that the settlement will pay less than individual claimants have historically received should normally preclude a finding of "superiority." [379] Finding that a settlement is "fair and adequate" cannot be a substitute for finding that it is "superior" to other alternatives.

When, then, is the class action likely to satisfy the "superiority" requirement? First, by focusing on the net recovery to class members, the court is entitled to deduct the typically greater contingency fees that attorneys will require in individual actions from the typically greater recovery. Under these circumstances, even a smaller gross recovery in the class [*1438] action can be superior. [380] Second, where there are small claimants, the court arguably can give some weight to their more exposed status insofar as they may be unable to find representation outside the class action. [381] Third, evidence that insurance resources may be exhausted by individual claims, thereby leaving later claimants unpaid, can be relevant, because a class action allows the court to pool limited insurance resources and apply them equitably over the projected period during which future claims will arise. [382] Corporate solvency is much less likely to be an argument favoring the use of the class action, however, because the corporation (and its creditors) always retain the option of using the bankruptcy process to pool limited assets.

3. Probability of Success. - Judge Posner's decision for the Seventh Circuit in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc. [383] can be read to imply that a mass tort class action should not be certified in the absence of a finding that the action has a probability of success on the merits. Indeed, a close reading suggests that Judge Posner might expect the trial court to balance the class action's merit against the impact of its pendency on the defendants. Judge Posner's concern was that even though the defendants in Rhone-Poulenc Rorer had won 92.3% of the previous trials (thirteen out of fourteen), a class action could force them to settle because the jury would "hold the fate of an industry in the palm of its hand." [384]

REV_00262217

Existing case law, however, poses a serious doctrinal obstacle to this approach. Under Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, [385] any consideration of the merits may be prohibited in deciding whether to certify a class. [386] Arguably, Eisen can be distinguished because the Court's real concern in that case was that the trial court had used its merits finding as a substitute for Rule 23's express criteria. To do so, the Court said, "contravenes the Rule by allowing a representative plaintiff to secure the benefits of a class [*1439] action without first satisfying the requirements for it." [387] Clearly, this was not what Judge Posner intended; his approach would seemingly use a merits review as an additional condition, not a sufficient one.

Even if Rule 23 does not today permit such an inquiry, the policy justifications for Judge Posner's approach as an additional condition seem strong. Interestingly, such a test effectively distinguishes between "mature" mass torts and "immature" ones, because early in their evolutionary cycle, new mass torts usually have only limited settlement value and a substantial prospect of defeat at trial. [388] However, in the case of a "mature" mass tort (such as asbestos), the prospect of success has increased to the point of near certainty, and at that point class certification would logically follow. From a policy perspective, this approach makes sense because the consequences of an adverse decision on the liability issue in the case of an "immature" mass tort would be highly unfortunate. Imagine that a trial on the central issue of liability is held in a nationwide class action of a new "immature" mass tort, and defendants win on their claim that there is no causal relationship between their product and the plaintiffs' injuries. A year later, new scientific evidence is discovered which establishes a causal connection. Unfortunately, the adverse decision may preclude the plaintiffs (who include future claimants) from bringing litigation for decades to come. Delaying the certification of the class action until the scientific evidence clearly supports plaintiffs (if indeed that is the outcome) thus may benefit future claimants over the long run.

4. Limited Class Actions. - Any serious effort at a balanced solution to the mass tort crisis must recognize that federal courts can no longer afford every litigant in mass torts cases an individual trial. Yet, mass tort class actions seem systematically to disfavor the plaintiffs, particularly future claimants. Given this statement of the dilemma, the search for reform must seek ways to divert cases out of the federal courts, but in ways that do not penalize tort victims.

One means to this end involves combining the class action with arbitration (and/or other alternative dispute resolution techniques) on the limited issues of damages and individual causation. A series of recent mass tort cases have certified a limited class action for purposes of determining liability, but not for purposes of determining causation or damages. [389] Conversely, in his Rhone-Poulenc Rorer decision, Judge Posner re [*1440] jected this approach, in part because such a bifurcated trial approach, he said, infringed the defendant's Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. [390] This Seventh Amendment objection seems a weak argument, as a series of circuit court decisions have approved the use of successive juries to determine different questions, [391] and Rule 23(c)(4)(A) explicitly contemplates use of such a procedure. If a limited class were certified for purposes only of liability determination after a probability of success finding, it seems doubtful that even the Seventh Circuit would find a Seventh Amendment violation.

As contemplated, the class action would resolve only the issues of liability and generic causation. Each plaintiff would still be required to prove in a separate trial the facts demonstrating individual causation in that plaintiff's case (for example, that the plaintiff was occupationally exposed to asbestos for a sufficient period to cause the claimed injury or illness). Neither damages nor damage ranges would be established by the original verdict or by any settlement. In effect, although there could be a "settlement class" action, it could only establish liability, not the range within which recoveries would be allowed. Effectively, this protects future claimants from settlements that expose them to the ravages of inflation and from disproportionate allocation of the settlement fund to [*1441] other subclasses. Thus, if the settlement were reached in 1995, and a future claimant first became ill in 2010, such claimant would not be limited to a recovery in 1995 dollars, but could establish damages under the social and economic conditions prevailing in 2010. In addition, individual causation should be determined under the scientific standards applicable at the time of the damage determination. [392]

REV_00262218

Advantageous as this proposal may be to courts and to plaintiffs, it may seem doubtful that a defendant would ever willingly accept such an open-ended settlement, which would deny it the right to know at the outset its total liability. Defendants, however, would receive two significant advantages: First, punitive damages could be eliminated as part of the settlement (or they could be fixed at an amount specified in the settlement). Second, and more importantly, the settlement could provide that the damages determination be allocated to an arbitration panel. The arbitration panel would neither be chosen by the defendants nor would it be limited in the amount it could award as compensatory damages; rather, it would apply the contemporary standards at the time of its determination. For the defendant, this approach would result in significant economies in transaction costs, because today transaction costs and legal fees appear to account for more of defendants' total expenditures than do payments to victims. [393] Because arbitration is significantly less costly than civil litigation, defendants would have a substantial incentive to accept such an open-ended procedure (subject, of course, to a right to seek a re-organization in bankruptcy if it proved too costly). Interestingly, sophisticated defendants have recently negotiated substantially this form of settlement to resolve a major nationwide class action with potentially thousands of class members. [394]

[*1442] This proposal does not contemplate that either legislation or the court would require the class representative to accept arbitration. Instead, the Seventh Amendment right of the class members to a jury trial would be voluntarily surrendered by the class representative as part of the settlement, and class counsel accepting such a settlement would have to pass the same basic standards as to the adequacy of its representation as apply today. [395]

Above all, such a compromise makes political sense. Today, mass tort class actions ally the court and the defendants against the plaintiffs (with the plaintiffs' attorney often being an only equivocal champion of the interests of the class) in order to minimize duplicative mass tort trials. This proposal reverses the coalition by showing the court a manageable way to resolve the mass tort dilemma without sacrificing the interests of the future claimant or accepting the inevitability of endlessly repetitive individual trials. Litigant autonomy is retained in its most critical aspect, because the "high stakes" plaintiff is not submerged within the class. To implement this approach, a trial court would need only to signal that it would not certify any large class action under Rule 23(b)(3) unless it could be assured that a fair remedy would be available to individual claimants and that remedy would not prove unmanageable at the damage determination stage. Relatively quickly, both sides would learn (and the court could hint) that settlements incorporating second stage arbitration over the issue of damages would have a much greater likelihood of obtaining certification. Both sides would still have the same self-interested reasons for preferring a class action resolution, but the damages determination would be delayed in each individual case until the time that individual claimants discovered their injuries.

REV_00262219

C. Class Certification and the Adequacy of Representation Standard

Class actions have long been plagued by conflict of interests problems, [396] but the mass tort context exacerbates these conflicts to a unique degree. In particular, two types of conflicts stand out:

First, there are conflicts between the attorney's inventory of individual clients and the class members that the attorney wishes to represent in the class action. The inventory settlements in the asbestos cases present the most obvious illustration of this first type of conflict, because defend [*1443] ants tied the inventory settlements to agreements to accept the proposed settlement of the class action (on terms far less favorable to most class members). [397]

Second, there are multiple conflicts within the class itself: between present claimants and future claimants, between those with serious injuries and those with only "subclinical" injuries, between those with manifested illnesses and those without. The interests of class members also conflict depending upon the state law applicable to their claims: some class members may be entitled to recovery (and punitive damages) under the law of their jurisdiction; others similarly situated, except for a difference in state jurisdictions, may not. Almost inevitably, the settlement transfers wealth between these subclasses.

On an ethical level, probably the most disquieting phenomenon about recent mass tort settlements has been the acceptance of a single attorney acting as the representative of multiple subclasses of plaintiffs. Not only have the interests of these subclasses clearly conflicted, but the class counsel has explicitly traded off the interests of subclasses against each other, obtaining substantial compensation for one subclass in return for a waiver of cash compensation by another. In such multiparty negotiations between the defendants and different subclasses of plaintiffs, even the well-meaning plaintiffs' attorney shifts inevitably from the role of an advocate and adviser for clients to the role of a philosopher king, dispensing largess among his client subjects. In the asbestos cases, the pattern has been the starkest, with the "less" severely injured claimants typically having cash compensation waived on their behalf in order that those more severely injured (usually cancer victims) receive substantial cash compensation. These intra-class trade-offs are, however, an endemic problem that transcends the asbestos context. Any settlement that awards compensation by disease or injury classification creates potential allocation issues: should the compensation for one subclass be raised and correspondingly that for another lowered?

Nonetheless, courts approving mass tort settlements have resisted subclassing, arguing that the use of subclasses is left to the discretion of the trial court and should not be encouraged. [398] Of course, if courts are primarily motivated by the desire to facilitate expeditious settlements (particularly in the mass torts field), this resistance to subclassing should not be surprising, as any competent counsel for a subclass would probably [*1444] object to any wealth transfer that stripped his or her class of compensation in order to benefit another. But a principled defense of current procedures simply has not been made.

Proponents of mass tort class actions can reply that settlements would become impossible if all trade-offs within the plaintiff class became suspect. Still, outside the mass tort context, two general principles have been recognized: (1) The overall adequacy of the settlement cannot "ordinarily redeem a settlement that was bargained by a party who was in a conflict position"; [399] and (2) trade-offs, and even gratuitous transfers from one subclass to another, will not be overturned if each subclass has received adequate representation by an attorney who acts with undivided interests. [400] In short, substantive review has been mild and permissive, provided that each subclass has its own impartial representative.

REV_00262220

What practical rules, then, should govern mass tort class actions? Two distinct types of rules seem most important. Today, in certifying a class under Rule 23, the court must find that "the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class." [401] Adequate representation seems doubtful when the plaintiffs' attorney has entered into an inventory settlement that is in any way contingent upon the attorney's participation in the class action or that otherwise restricts the attorney's discretion to represent other clients in other actions against the same defendants. Even in the absence of an explicit linkage, inventory settlements between the defendants and the plaintiffs' attorney create a danger of collusion because the payout under the inventory settlement may be delayed or subject in some continuing respect to the defendants' control.

This conclusion does not mean that an attorney who has recently settled cases with the defendants should be barred from representing the class. [402] But how broadly should the disqualification be framed? One possibility would be to disqualify an attorney from acting as class counsel only when the inventory settlements appear to be more favorable than the class action's proposed terms; such a disparity would give rise to a presumption that the class has been "sold out." [403]

[*1445] Still, the problem with this narrower approach involves timing. If one waits until the class action settlement has been negotiated and presented to the court for approval to ascertain whether the class can be certified and whether the plaintiffs' attorneys who negotiated the settlement can represent the class, momentum will have already begun to gather behind the settlement. Eager for a docket-clearing settlement, trial courts face a temptation to close their eyes to conflicts and improprieties that they would not tolerate in other contexts. Rather than force the court to choose between sacrificing a possibly adequate settlement and tolerating a conflict of interest, it thus seems preferable to adopt a mildly prophylactic rule that disqualifies any attorney from serving as a lead counsel (for the class or any subclass) if the attorney has negotiated an inventory settlement with the same defendants. The mass tort bar is large and expanding, and it would be a gross overstatement to suggest that such a rule would disqualify all experienced plaintiffs' attorneys.

A second necessary procedural innovation is to require subclasses with separate representation for present and future claimants. Those opposed to subclassing have raised dubious arguments against it. The Georgine court argued that because illness is often progressive (with victims moving from asbestosis to lung cancer), subclassing was unnecessary. [404] In effect, because ex ante future claimants do not know what the severity of their illnesses will be, it argued that they all have a common interest and can be grouped in a single class. Unfortunately, this is no answer to the serious conflicts of interest that can arise between present and future claimants, because the former have every incentive to deplete the trust fund (which is often administered by their own attorneys).

A second unsatisfactory argument against subclasses was suggested by the Second Circuit in the Johns-Manville litigation: subclassing is less important in opt out class actions under Rule 23(b)(3), the court reasoned, presumably because dissatisfied class members are free to exclude themselves from the class. [405] Yet, as the same Second Circuit has emphasized in other decisions, the right to opt out means little in the case of future [*1446] claimants. [406] A procedural protection has little value to those who do not yet know that they will become ill or that they are even within the class of future claimants.

Moreover, the conflicts between subclasses go well beyond their respective entitlements to cash compensation and extend to most other issues as well: the case flow limitations, processing rules, and other payment terms that might enable present claimants to seize a disproportionate share of the settlement fund before future claims fully mature. Recent experience shows that present claimants and their counsel have both the incentive and the ability to understate the number and severity of future claims that will arise in order to justify a higher payment to present claimants. Nor is a guardian ad litem for future claimants an adequate substitute, because a guardian is not in a position to negotiate the settlement's terms. Arm's length negotiation between counsel for present and future claimants is essential to achieve a fair and realistic allocation of the settlement.

REV_00262221

These two proposals - inventory settlements as a disqualifying factor for lead counsel and subclasses with separate counsel for present and future claimants - may lengthen settlement negotiations (as well they should have been lengthened in some recent cases), but they will not bar or seriously discourage settlements. Rather, they will simply give future claimants their vicarious day in court.

D. Redefining the Right to Opt Out

Beyond question, a future claims class action trivializes the right to opt out. But, in turn, an absolute right to opt out invalidates the idea of a mandatory class action. [407] Most commentators doubt that the Supreme Court meant to go this far when it recognized the presumptive right of a class member to opt out as an aspect of due process in Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts. [408] Thus, on the doctrinal level, some compromise seems necessary.

On the policy level, analysis needs to begin with the recognition that persons who have been exposed to a toxic substance, but who have not yet manifested injury, will have little incentive to opt out from a class action that is allegedly brought on their behalf. Ironically, the Second Circuit conceded this point in the Agent Orange case, arguing that the right to opt out meant little in such a context and so could be sacrificed:

In the instant case, society's interest in the efficient and fair resolution of large-scale litigation outweighs the gains from individual notice and opt-out rights, whose benefits here are conjec [*1447] tural at best .... Providing individual notice and opt-out rights to persons who are unaware of an injury would probably do little good. Their rights are better served, we think, by requiring that "fair and just recovery procedures be made available to these claimants," and by ensuring that they receive vigorous and faithful vicarious representation. [409]

The problem with this statement is that it defines the issue too narrowly. Correct as it is that the right to opt out will mean little in a future claims class action, [410] this observation really suggests that the right needs to be redefined, not abandoned. If we assume that the right to opt out is of constitutional magnitude, [411] but also not an absolute right, [412] this implies that the right can be balanced against other considerations. In mass tort cases involving substantial personal injuries to the plaintiffs, litigant autonomy seems a value normally deserving considerable constitutional weight. [413]

Efforts to strike a balance, however, are not easy. Some have suggested that before a plaintiff can opt out of a federal class action, there should be a good cause hearing at which the court would balance the interest of the litigant in seeking to exit the class against those of the class members who would thereby be injured. [414] Unfortunately, the asbestos experience suggests that such a right would be both administratively burdensome and subject to low visibility abuse. Courts would regularly be warned by defendants that if plaintiffs opted out, it would jeopardize the finality of a long-negotiated settlement. The Silicone Gel experience suggests that such threats are not without some basis in fact. [415] The products. From these case studies, an attempt will be made to generalize the procedural tactics that facilitate non-adversarial settlements that disadvantage class members.

REV_00262222

Part III will turn to the search for remedies. Clearly, the most vulnerable and least protected litigant in mass tort litigation is the future claimant. How should such persons be protected? Arguably, federal courts simply lack jurisdiction over such an "exposure only" class because no justiciable "case and controversy" exists for purposes of Article III. Similar arguments have been made under the Bankruptcy Code as to when future claims are dischargeable in bankruptcy, and Part III suggests that a synthesis is necessary to treat future claims similarly in these related contexts. Part III also explores the non-constitutional limitations on the authority of the class representative to settle future claims and suggests that these limitations may preclude the certification of an exclusively future claimant class action. [29]

The future claimant's greatest problem is that the recovery in a mass tort class action can be easily eroded by the impact of inflation and by the [*1354] possibility that the actual number of claims made against the settlement fund exceeds that projected. Although courts to date have given little attention to these problems, Part III argues that the "superiority" requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) requires the court to find that a proposed settlement adequately protects the future claimant against those dangers. Such a finding will be difficult to make in lump sum settlements (where the defendant is not responsible if the actual rate of claims exceeds that projected) unless the settlement permits the future claimant to opt out as of the time of the discovery by the claimant of the injury or illness if the real economic benefits will be less than that originally projected. As one means of satisfying the "superiority" requirement, this Article proposes a "limited" class action that combines a mandatory class at the liability stage with an individualized damages determination. However, this right to individualization at the damages stage could be conditioned on restrictions (including the use of an arbitration forum) that save congested federal district courts from inundation. This compromise accomplishes two important things at once: (1) it protects the future claimant; and (2) it spares the courts from endlessly repetitive mass tort trials.

Part III also seeks to redefine the future claimant's right to opt out. Here, a lively debate has begun to surface. Those most anxious to shrink the size of the federal docket have begun to question whether there need be any such right at all. In contrast, Part III will argue that the right to opt out has to be specifically redefined for the mass tort context where long latency periods trivialize the existing right. In the case of future claims, the right should be reformulated as a deferred right, which is triggered by the discovery of the injury. Both the limited class action and the deferred opt out are examples of what this Article will call a "constrained autonomy" model of litigation, which seeks to steer a middle course between the advocates of group litigation and those of individual autonomy. A premise of this approach is that reform must prioritize litigant autonomy interests, protecting those that are most important and compromising those that are not. [30]

The most ethically disturbing problem with the mass tort class action may be its tendency toward "structural collusion." Even in the absence of bad faith, suspect settlements result in large measure because of the defendants' ability to shop for favorable settlement terms, either by contacting multiple plaintiffs' attorneys or by inducing them to compete against each other. At its worst, this process can develop into a reverse auction, with the low bidder among the plaintiffs' attorneys winning the right to settle with the defendant. Here, it is necessary to confront the comparatively new institution of the "settlement" class action. Part III will thus [*1355] consider various approaches that can prevent defendants from choosing plaintiffs' counsel.

Finally, Part III faces the obligation to compare alternatives, rather than simply report imperfections, and contrasts the mass tort class action with the mass tort bankruptcy. In terms of both its fairness to creditors and its ability to rehabilitate a financially strained likely result might be that plaintiffs seeking to opt out would experience the same low success rates as plaintiffs seeking to escape the transferee court following a consolidation order by the JPML. [416] At the other extreme, individual plaintiffs' attorneys may wish to argue that, at least in the case of personal injury litigation, the opt out system should be replaced by a [*1448] system for opting in. [417] Here, the argument would be that in high stakes actions for personal injuries, the class action is presumptively inappropriate and should only be used when individual class members consent. In fact, between 1938 and 1966, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure effectively implemented such a system, because plaintiffs could only become class members in suits now falling within the Rule 23(b)(3) category (i.e., most actions for money judgments) by affirmatively electing to join the suit. [418] But the experience with this approach does not counsel its adoption. Commentators argue that many eligible class members simply would not, for whatever reason, take the affirmative step necessary to opt in. [419]

REV_00262178

If so, a more promising option might be to permit opting out, but also to restrict the choice of forum that the exiting plaintiff could elect. At the same time, such a reform could also recognize a delayed right to opt out, which would accrue only once the individual became aware (or, at most, should have become aware) of a serious compensable injury. Under this compromise, even if the class action settlement were approved in 1995, "exposure only" class members who manifested injury in 2010 or 2015 could opt out at that point and pursue individual remedies.

Before such a delayed right is rejected as unacceptable to defendants, it is interesting to note that a delayed right to opt out has actually been structured into some recent mass tort settlements. In Bowling v. Pfizer, Inc., [420] the court approved a class action settlement in a products liability case involving the defective Bjork-Shiley convex/concave heart valve, which had a tendency to fracture while in the recipient because of design and manufacturing defects. Between 50,000 and 100,000 patients had received this heart valve, and some 300 deaths had resulted because of fractures. [421] Given the unique risk of future fracture coupled with the emotional stress from exposure to such a risk, the Bowling settlement provided for a two-stage recovery: First, it gave a modest cash award to all class members for their claims for emotional stress, and, second, it established an "optional guaranteed compensation program." [422] Basically, in the event of a valve fracture, the victim would receive somewhere between $ 500,000 and $ 2,000,000, according to a formula that reflected age, income, and family status. [423] However, class members retained the right to [*1449] reject this formula payment and sue for damages in court or to opt for binding arbitration to determine fair compensatory damages (in which even the defendant would waive all defenses to liability). In short, to the extent that the settlement covered future claimants, it effectively provided for delayed opt outs (either to sue in court or to accept binding arbitration). [424]

The attraction of this approach is that it effectively converts a "future claims" class into an option. Transposed to the asbestos context, it might imply that plaintiffs, on incurring lung cancer a decade into the settlement agreement's life, would have a choice between a specific payment (or a range of payments) and a right to sue in a civil proceeding (or to elect arbitration). Similarly, in a breast implants settlement, a subsequent leakage victim would have a similar choice. In fact, in the A.H. Robins case, the court effectively provided a delayed opt out for the victims of the Dalkon Shield. Every Class A member who was dissatisfied with the settlement offer made to her by the Settlement Trust was given "the right to elect to have her claim settled in a trial with all the procedural rights normally attaching to a jury trial" - minus any right to punitive damages. [425]

Of course, many practices are common and desirable that are not constitutionally required. Yet, as the Supreme Court loves to say, " "due process' is a flexible concept." [426] In any specific context, the process that is due depends on a variety of factors; typically, courts balance the marginal gains from a procedural safeguard against its societal cost. [427] In the mass tort context, the value of the right to opt out and obtain one's day in court may seem both illusory, in a world where individual trial attorneys deal not in cases, but in inventories, [428] and expensive, in terms of its impact on the federal docket. However, the impact on the federal docket is a highly variable consideration. In a litigation context, where the docket burden is substantial (for example, asbestos), the court might limit the right to opt out to: (1) federal districts not experiencing a backlog; (2) state courts; or (3) arbitration panels under procedures by which the opting out litigant has an equal voice in the selection of the panel members. [429]

REV_00262223

[*1450] These procedures, however, still do not answer the defendants' fundamental objection: the value of the settlement to them is undercut if it does not ensure global peace. Clearly, settlements on the current basis will be chilled if plaintiffs with cases having above average value can opt out to pursue individual remedies in any forum. But it is more debatable whether this consequence represents a vice or a virtue. The modern value of the right to opt out may lie more in its utility as a checking mechanism than in its ability to protect litigant autonomy. When sufficient numbers of plaintiffs opt out, the defendants will be exposed to a two-front war (as in the Silicone Gel litigation) and will seek to cancel the settlement.

Given the predictable passivity of most class members, minority vetoes may make sense. [430] In light of them, defendants will predictably learn to write into the settlement agreement a provision allowing them to terminate the settlement if a specified percentage or number of plaintiffs opt out. This in turn gives the plaintiff class a desirable chance to vote with their feet by opting out. The practical net effect might be to torpedo the dubious settlement or force its renegotiation. Although a delayed right to opt out, maturing as of the time of injury recognition, will not produce the same immediate referendum, it poses an even greater economic threat because the defendant cannot back out years after the settlement has become final. In response, defendants will need to structure settlement grids to differentiate more effectively in terms of the legal quality of the claims settled in order to induce those class members with higher value claims not to opt out. [431]

[*1451] Still, is such a desirable right constitutionally necessary? Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts [432] found that due process entitled class members to a right to opt out from the class, but there a nationwide class action had been filed in state court. Shutts's applicability to actions filed in federal courts is less clear, and by its terms the decision's scope may be "limited to those class actions which seek to bind known plaintiffs concerning claims wholly or predominantly for money judgments." [433] Thus, the still unresolved issue is whether Shutts applies to a class action covering unknown future victims (such as those occupationally exposed to asbestos). The Second Circuit has recently answered this question with a highly equivocal "not necessarily." In In re "Agent Orange" Product Liability Litigation, [434] the Second Circuit "declined to extend the Shutts holding into situations" where notice could not reasonably have been given, but it defined this context carefully and narrowly. [435] On the facts of the Agent Orange case, the Second Circuit said due process was not offended for two relatively unique reasons: (1) "the even-handed treatment of both identified and unidentified legitimate claimants in the Agent Orange I settlement;" and (2) their "dim prospects of success." [436] Neither factor is present in the recent asbestos decisions, where present and future claimants were treated very disparately and where liability was never seriously contested. [437]

Even from the defendants' perspective, a delayed right to opt out could be a substitute for fully adequate notice in those cases where notice may be expensive or infeasible. Arguably, Agent Orange only waives the right to opt out in a case involving unknown future victims. In many mass tort class actions, the future claimants come from a large pool of individuals who could (at some expense) be identified and to whom notice could feasibly be given (for example, recipients of breast implants or defective heart valves). Within this context where notice is possible, the right to opt out is in fact often exercised, and due process under Shutts probably requires both notice and a right to opt out. To sum up, of recent mass tort cases, only the asbestos and Agent Orange cases have truly involved [*1452] large classes of unknown and unknowable future victims. Although the Second Circuit has rationalized why a right to opt out need not have been accorded in Agent Orange, this rationale cannot be easily stretched to apply to most other mass torts, including asbestos.

REV_00262224

From a policy perspective, the practical problem with a delayed right to opt out involves the issue of whether we wish to encourage greater discrimination among class members based on the strength of their litigation claims. Predictably, defendants will reduce their settlement offers under a system in which future claimants can opt out. They will anticipate that seriously injured plaintiffs, who expected recoveries in individual actions above the average recovery for their disease category under the settlement, would normally opt out. Because claimants with "low quality" cases would disproportionately remain in the class, rational defendants would respond either by lowering the per claimant ceilings on their proposed settlements or by insisting upon more detailed settlement grids with more precise differentiation in order to prevent individuals with lesser injuries from receiving an average value that was computed with more seriously injured victims in mind.

In this light, for a delayed opt out right to be feasible, there must be some disincentive to discourage excessive, "opportunistic" opting out. Often, the plaintiffs' attorney has an incentive to opt out in order to obtain a higher contingent fee than the same attorney would receive under the settlement. For example, in a controversial, but justified step, Judge Pointer approved a settlement agreement that, in effect, limited contingent fees in the Silicone Gel case to twenty-four percent of the recovery. [438] Unfortunately, this creates a perverse incentive to opt out because attorneys for class members who opt out may receive one-third or higher contingencies - and thus do better financially themselves while their clients may do worse. A first step toward chilling opting out motivated only by the attorney's self-interest would be to limit contingent fees payable by opt outs to the same or lesser percentage received by the class attorneys. Whether federal courts possess authority to regulate the relationship between class members who opt out and their attorneys remains, however, uncertain.

As a legislative matter, the most logical disincentive to discourage opportunistic opting out by plaintiffs' attorneys would be to base the fee award on the amount by which the exiting plaintiff exceeded the class action recovery. Thus, if the class action provided for an award of $ 50,000 for each class member, and the plaintiff who opted out won $ 100,000 at trial, the attorney's fee would be some one third portion of $ 50,000 (or $ 16,667). A more punitive alternative would be to tax some portion of the defendants' costs to a plaintiffs' attorney who failed to ex [*1453] ceed the class action recovery. [439] The real gain here is that such a fee disincentive saves the court's time and thus minimizes social costs by reducing any excessive private incentive to opt out. The plaintiffs' attorney would gain from opting out only if the attorney substantially outperformed the settlement.

E. Settlement Class Actions

The settlement class action is susceptible to at least three distinct problems: (1) defendants may effectively be able to choose the plaintiffs' attorney (or at the least, to avoid negotiating with those plaintiffs' attorneys whom they consider to be intransigent and unreasonable - in short, the persons that plaintiffs, themselves, would be most likely to choose to represent their interests); (2) however chosen, the plaintiffs' attorneys have a limited franchise, cannot threaten credibly to go to trial if a deal is not struck, and thus are effectively negotiating with one arm tied behind their back; [440] and (3) when a settlement is reached prior to the filing of the action, the entire process seems to present a paradigm of the "friendly" or feigned suit that the "case or controversy" requirement has traditionally denied federal courts the power to hear. [441] If the "settlement class" procedure could be applied to labor negotiations, one suspects that the 19941995 baseball strike would have been concluded in a few days. But the results of such a settlement might have been as one-sided as they seem in the asbestos cases.

REV_00262225

These objections to settlement class actions have long been understood and seem so powerful and obvious that one wonders why a court would accept a settlement negotiated in such a suspect fashion. Of course, a partial answer is that courts have frequently not accepted proposed settlements so reached. During the last year alone, for example, the Ford Bronco II settlement, [442] two separate settlements involving [*1454] General Motors pickup trucks (with explosive side-saddle gas tanks), [443] and the polybutylene settlement [444] were rejected by state and federal courts. Only in the asbestos and breast implants areas - where the threat of seemingly unending personal injury litigation overhung the courtroom and was unmistakably on the court's mind - have such settlements been approved (and frankly encouraged).

Although strong arguments against any provisional certification "for purposes of settlement only" can certainly be made, it seems prudent to ask first if there are reforms that could minimize the potential for collusion. Three seem plausible. First, if settlement classes are to be tolerated, a minimal reform would require the court to oversee the selection of the plaintiffs' counsel, after adequate notice was first given to the specialized bar handling the specific mass tort that certification of a settlement class was contemplated. [445] In short, before the parties could link arms and jointly approach the court with a seductive settlement, the court must formally select the counsel with whom defendants are permitted to conduct preliminary negotiations. As discussed earlier, plaintiffs' attorneys who had entered into inventory settlements or similar understandings with defendants would be disqualified. The key to this proposal would be that the settling parties could not approach the court with a proposed settlement and ask to have the plaintiff's attorney named class counsel. Rather, as a means of alternative dispute resolution, defendants could ask the court for a limited period to engage in settlement negotiations with a plaintiffs' attorney to be designated by the court (during which period all related actions might be stayed).

Realistically, however, such a reform, standing alone, could be abused. The trial court bent on settlement (as was the court in Georgine) would know with whom the defendants wanted to negotiate. Attorneys with a reputation for a tough bargaining style would be less likely to be selected. Indeed, under this proposed rule, it is entirely possible that the Georgine court would have deliberately chosen the same lead counsel, precisely in order to ensure a quick settlement.

Thus, a second and supplementary reform involves the use of broad and representative steering committees, deliberately chosen to mirror the composition of the plaintiffs' bar. This approach was more or less followed in the Silicone Gel litigation. [446] Under such an approach, plaintiffs' counsel would be denied authority to present any settlement to the court [*1455] for its approval until it had first received a ratification vote from the broad-based steering committee. Such an approach might prevent some settlements (as in Georgine, where a nationwide plaintiffs' steering committee had earlier refused to approve the settlement offer proposed by the CCR defendants). [447] But that is the point of the reform.

How should the court staff such a steering committee? Most areas of mass tort practice have specialized American Bar Association or American Trial Lawyers Association (ATLA) committees or other ad hoc informal organizations. [448] The problem lies not in identifying a representative committee, but in accepting the risk of paralysis if the steering committee deadlocks. Trial specialists who believe (in good faith and possibly with some justification) that the class action was not designed to handle personal injury tort litigation will predictably oppose class certification. Yet, deadlock is not inevitable, as the Silicone Gel settlement demonstrated. Moreover, if individual actions have been stayed pending a resolution of the class action (as they were in Georgine), the pressure to settle will in time become irresistible. The danger is not that the courts have too little power to induce settlement, but rather that they will use their very considerable powers in a one-sided fashion to pressure only plaintiffs.

REV_00262226

A third proposal might be to preclude certification of a class defined exclusively in terms of future claimants. By definition, future claimants are silent and passive, and thus they cannot monitor their attorneys. Sometimes, however, present claimants can, and in the personal injury context they have a strong incentive to do so. Again, the Silicone Gel litigation provides the better model, because it included both present and future claimants. Of course, present claimants can normally opt out of the action, but this should be a telltale sign. Whereas Judge Reed invalidated several hundred thousand opt outs in Georgine, [449] Judge Pointer encountered no similar problem (at least on any similar scale) in the Silicone Gel litigation, suggesting strongly that the proposed settlement in the latter was perceived to be fairer than in the former. [450]

[*1456] Ultimately, these proposed reforms still dodge the central issue: is the concept of a class certified only for settlement purposes valid? Or does such a limited certification inherently produce weak and one-sided settlements because the plaintiffs forego their right to trial? At the heart of this problem is the anomaly that a class certified by consent for settlement purposes might not be certifiable for litigation purposes. [451] If this is the case, the plaintiffs' attorneys will know (or at least suspect) that they lack negotiating leverage and may accept recoveries far below what the plaintiffs could receive in individual actions. From this diagnosis follows a clear prescription: eliminate the anomaly by not allowing a settlement class to be certified when a "litigation" class action could not be certified. In short, the same certification standards should apply to both settlement class actions and "litigation" class actions.

This reform would not require legislation or rulemaking, but it would restrict a rapidly developing practice. Today, there is a tendency for courts facing a proposed settlement in a settlement class action to ignore the specific criteria specified in Rule 23(a) - i.e., numerosity, typicality, commonality, and adequacy of representation - and to focus instead only on the fairness of the settlement. [452] Some decisions approving pre-certification settlements in settlement class actions have simply identified the "questions of law or fact common to the class" as the adequacy of the settlement. [453] Put simply, this is bootstrapping, because it trivializes the requirements of Rule 23(a) by reading the commonality and typicality requirements out of the Rule.

The better approach would be to apply the requirements of Rule 23(a) consistently in both settlement and litigation class actions. Exactly this approach has been taken this year by the Third Circuit in the General Motors Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank litigation. [454] Although such a requirement may invalidate some settlements, an insistence that the trial court find that the individual elements of Rule 23(a) - numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy of representation - are each satisfied, and a refusal to deem the attractiveness of the settlement as dispositive of these issues will preserve the negotiating leverage of plaintiffs because they will [*1457] be able to reach sustainable settlements only in cases when they had the right to proceed to trial. Under these circumstances where plaintiffs have both options (settlement and trial) open, the parties at least may be truly bargaining in the shadow of the law by discounting the likely results at trial.

Realistically, the Third Circuit's requirements in General Motors will not significantly change current practices. Writing for the Third Circuit in another decision in 1995, Judge Becker (the author of the General Motors decision) found that the commonality requirement in Rule 23(a) would be "satisfied if the named plaintiffs share at least one question of fact or law with the grievances of the prospective class." [455] This is not an onerous requirement. In this light,

General Motors may be more important for its recognition that collusion is a danger than for its substantive holding. A practical response to the settlement class action therefore requires not simply that the doctrinal requirements be the same for both "settlement" and "litigation" classes, but that courts insist that a representatively selected steering committee choose the lead counsel that negotiates with the defendants and ratifies the proposed settlement. The telltale clue that something would go wrong in Georgine came early on when defendants were able to approach the minority faction of the plaintiffs steering committee, after the majority had rejected its proposals. [456]

Ideally, the settlement class action should become a temporary form of alternative dispute resolution with clear time limits. If the parties cannot reach an agreement within, say, a year after judicial selection of lead counsel and a steering committee for plaintiffs, the same action should go forward as a "litigation" class action. Defendants could, of course, then move to dismiss on the grounds that the proposed class flunks the standards of Rule 23(a) or (b), but an objector to the settlement should have the same ability to raise these same issues when the parties seek to certify the settlement class. Only when the rules of the game are the same for both types of class actions can we expect the settlement process to fairly approximate and discount the likely outcome at trial.

F. Bankruptcy Versus the Mass Tort Class Action

The reforms discussed in this Part - in particular, delayed opt outs and restrictions on the certification of future claimant classes - carry potential costs: First, the inability of corporations to resolve their contingent tort liabilities could cripple some firms and lead to their operational collapse. [457] Second, if early resolution of all tort claims is prevented, [*1458] then later plaintiffs may sometimes find that they hold only paper claims against an insolvent firm. For both these reasons, claim pooling and an early resolution can be desirable for both plaintiffs and defendants. Yet, as the Silicone Gel experience underlines, [458] corporate defendants may be reluctant to enter into global settlements that are effectively open-ended because of the possibility of delayed opt outs by future claimants.

Still, if early resolution of mass tort liabilities is desirable, it does not follow that it should be purchased at any price. The real question becomes: What alternative means to this end are feasible? Here, a comparison is necessary between the utility of the mass tort class action and a bankruptcy reorganization. Unfortunately, many commentators have simply taken it as self-evident that corporate bankruptcy carries unacceptably high costs, both for the class members themselves, and other constituencies (such as employees and local communities). [459] Underlying this approach is probably an anthropomorphic fallacy: Bankruptcy tends to be equated with corporate death. In fact, however, Chapter 11 may be a far more flexible instrument by which to rehabilitate a financially strained firm. [460]

Both substantively and procedurally, bankruptcy reorganization has comparative advantages over a mass tort class action as a means of achieving an equitable resolution of mass tort liabilities that is fair to tort creditors. Substantively, bankruptcy reorganizations have long been guided by two basic principles: (1) absolute priority; and (2) temporal equality. [461] The first principle seeks to ensure that creditors are compensated in full (and according to their level of seniority) before stockholders share in the firm's value; the second principle requires that creditors within the same class be treated equally, regardless of when their claims mature. Thus, in the typical bankruptcy, all bondholders of the same level of sen [*1459] iority will receive the same prorated amount, whether their claims matured the day before insolvency, the month after, or are scheduled to mature in a decade.

REV_00262228

Although in practice bankruptcy reorganizations may not always fully comply with these two normative principles, mass tort class action settlements violate both principles openly and egregiously. Absolute priority is not even recognized as a relevant goal in class action settlements. For example, the claim that a "limited fund" justifies a mandatory, non-opt out class action is essentially a claim that the firm is insolvent and cannot fully pay its tort creditors. In the bankruptcy context, the principle of absolute priority would require that tort claimants receive full payment of their provable claims before stockholders could share in the firm's value. But, as the Ahearn and Hayden cases show, the reverse happens in class action settlements: stock values soar, while tort creditors are either scaled back or forced to rely on thinly funded or unspecified settlement funds. [462] Although both class actions and Chapter 11 are costly, [463] the bottom line difference between them is that a corporation filing for a Chapter 11 reorganization can anticipate having to surrender the majority of its equity to a settlement trust and has no hope of escaping with only an assignment of its insurance policies. [464]

The goal of temporal equality is even more systematically violated by mass tort class action settlements. When present claimants receive more in inventory settlements than will future claimants (as happened in Georgine n465), the principle of equality within the class has been breached. Worse, distat future claimants may receive far less in mass tort settlements than those tort claimants whose claims mature earlier, both because inflation may erode their recovery and because the settlement fund may be depleted if the eventual number of claims exceeds those predicted. While the date of maturity does not count in bankruptcy, it will often be critical in class actions resolved through settlement funds.

Procedurally, bankruptcy reorganizations are governed by well-known and largely settled legal rules that give creditors specific voting rights and that recognize distinct subclasses. In contrast, a principal attraction of the mass tort class action is that it permits an end run around [*1460] this known legal regime. Instead, the settling parties can ask the court to serve as a mediation forum where virtually anything goes and formal legal constraints are lacking. [466]

Perhaps the most important advantage of the bankruptcy forum is that it tends to alleviate the conflict of interest overhanging plaintiffs' counsel in a class action. First, the corporation filing for reorganization cannot select the counsel for the various classes of its creditors in bankruptcy (as defendants may be able to do in some "settlement class" actions). Second, while the plaintiffs' attorneys' fee award in a "settlement class" action is subject to the major contingency that the two sides must reach a settlement, this contingency largely vanishes in the case of a bankruptcy reorganization, because once the bankruptcy petition is filed, it becomes a virtual certainty that the reorganization will proceed to some final resolution. The elimination of this contingency is critical, because for plaintiffs' attorneys, the failure to reach a settlement in a mass tort class action spells financial disaster. In bankruptcy, however, this risk is minimized, and as a result the possibility decreases of a collusive deal in which the plaintiffs' attorney trades a reduced settlement for a higher fee award.

Ultimately, the proof is in the pudding. Some mass tort bankruptcies have worked well [467] and have shown that Chapter 11 enables a sophisticated court to preserve the economic viability of a financially strained firm. [468] In addition, bankruptcy courts may find it easier to monitor fees and to restrict the percentage of the award that goes to plaintiffs' attorneys, thus ensuring a greater net recovery to the victims. [469] [*1461] In contrast, no major mass tort class action appears yet to have played to favorable reviews.

This evaluation leads to three definite conclusions: First, the rationale that the corporation's funds are limited should not justify the certification of a non-opt out class action because such a class action appears at present to be an inferior substitute for a bankruptcy reorganization. Second, that delayed opt outs and any procedural tightening of the rules applicable to the mass tort class action may chill some global settlements is an acceptable cost and may even be desirable to the extent that it induces some firms to use instead the superior alternative of a bankruptcy reorganization. Third, the appropriate role of the mass tort class action should be to resolve the tort liabilities of the solvent firm. As long as solvency is assured, the fact that a delayed opt out right may make the settlement potentially open-ended will neither foreclose the corporation's access to the capital markets nor, as a practical matter, result in any other significant inefficiency. In any event, the corporation whose financial situation does worsen can always resort to the bankruptcy alternative.

REV_00262229

In sum, given the long latency periods associated with mass torts and the shot-in-the-dark character of contemporary efforts at epidemiological prediction, open-ended settlements should be a necessary condition before a mass tort class action can truly be found to be "superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." [470]

Conclusion: Toward Constrained Autonomy

Class action developments have given rise to a new legal technology that threatens to strip tort victims of their legal claims, sometimes decades before they even mature. Effectively, this technology has created a jury-rigged substitute for corporate reorganization, but without the safeguards attending that statutory proceeding. If fully exploited, these techniques - particularly the use of mandatory classes, settlement classes and future claimant classes - could create a new, even more protective form of limited liability for corporations. [471] But, curiously, this legal transition has been entirely procedural (that is, the substantive law of torts has [*1462] changed little over the same period), and the entire process has been engineered by courts, not legislatures.

To explain and address this phenomenon, one needs to consider its political context. On the simplest level, recent developments can be viewed as a consequence of changing perceptions of the class action. As individual mass tort cases mounted and the burden on the docket grew, an increasing number of civil procedure scholars began to discover the utility of the mass tort class action. [472] Law review notes, in turn, began to suggest limitations on the right to opt out. [473] Partly in response, judicial attitudes changed. Now with the 1990s, the legal community is witnessing the actual reality of mass tort class actions. Some already find the results sordid. [474] Thus, some will be tempted to urge a return to litigant autonomy and the traditional bipolar model of individual litigation. From this Article's perspective, however, any such return to a traditional model is unlikely because of the impact of mass tort cases on the federal docket.

Politically, mass tort procedural law is the product of the collision of three sets of interests: (1) mass tort victims (and their attorneys, whose interests can admittedly deviate markedly from those of their clients); (2) defendants, who fear exposure to liability and their own legal fees almost equally; and (3) trial courts, for whom the prospect of an unending stream of individual actions clogging their dockets has proved unacceptable. The fairest generalization about recent developments in the mass tort field is that the last two parties in this triad have increasingly, but tentatively, reached a de facto coalition that has protected their own interests at the expense of tort victims.

More generally, the performance of courts in handling mass tort class actions appears to have varied in direct proportion to the amount of docket pressure under which the trial court has perceived itself to be. Faced with suspicious settlements, federal and state courts have rejected doubtful settlements in property damage cases, [475] but, in the far more sensitive mass tort personal injury context, courts have accepted far more suspicious signs of collusion: inventory settlements, settlements classes reached not only before certification but before case filing, classes narrowly defined to include only future claimants, and chilling restrictions on opting out. The generalization that best summarizes these cases is [*1463] that provided by Judge Posner in Rhone-Poulenc Rorer: "The number of asbestos cases was so great as to exert a well-nigh irresistible pressure to bend the normal rules." [476] Once bent, legal rules tend to stay bent, and legal rationalizations tailor-made for the asbestos context will inevitably be cited and, to a considerable extent, followed in other mass tort cases as well.

REV_00262230

As a result, although others have principally focused on the alleged ethical violations of the settling parties, [477] this Article's contention is that the fact of judicial self-interest must be placed at center stage. Its centrality leads to three distinct policy conclusions: First, the least acceptable reform proposals are those that simply increase the discretion of the trial judge. [478] Given such discretion, the right to opt out would soon wither, and litigant autonomy might increasingly become a nostalgic memory.

Second, reformers are best advised to address their proposals to appellate courts and place little hope in legislative reform. In any lobbying contest before the legislature, corporate defendants are far better positioned and equipped to do battle than are public interest representatives on behalf of inchoate future claimants. In contrast, appellate courts are less directly affected by docket congestion and fear less the prospect of mind-numbing tedium from repetitive tort cases. [479]

Third, reformers must recognize the necessity of constraining litigant autonomy. The issue is not whether, but how. Unrestrained advocacy of each citizen's "day in court" is exploited by mass tort defendants to justify settlement practices that would have been unthinkable just decades ago. The more prudent line of defense lies in the proposition that constraints on litigant autonomy should observe the principle of least drastic means. That is, because fundamental due process rights are implicated by attempts to draft the individual litigant to serve as a faceless soldier in group litigation, the least restrictive alternative should be preferred that can realize the social goals sought. [480]

[*1464] To the extent that litigant autonomy can be made to co-exist with reforms that control the growth of the federal docket, [481] federal courts can be expected to preserve and protect the individual litigant's desire to seek an individual recovery. Defendants will predictably resist, but at this point a very different political coalition may form.

Attempts to balance litigant autonomy and group litigation must inevitably face some problematic trade-offs. One such trade-off is the possibility that recognizing a right to exit for litigants with cases of above average litigation strength will reduce the settlement that defendants offer to the remaining class members. In principle, this seems the logical outcome, but there is a countervailing consideration: the right to exit (through delayed opt outs and the ability to contest damages on a de novo basis in some forum) may serve a checking function that deters collusive settlements. Today, the average claimant may lose more in settlement value because the settling parties can engage in various forms of structural collusion than such claimant would lose in settlement value under a legal regime in which claimants with above average cases exercise a right to opt out. [482]

Based on this premise that real reform will require securing the compliance of trial judges who today feel threatened by mass tort individual actions, this Article has proposed three fundamental principles on which procedural reforms should be based.

1. Settlement class actions must be monitored by the only participants with the appropriate incentives to monitor: namely, other plaintiffs' attorneys. Although the first step toward reform is the recognition of the same standards for class certification in the "settlement" class context as in "litigation" class actions, the more important and second step is to deny the defendant the ability to select the plaintiffs' counsel. The use of representative steering committees may be the simplest means by which to minimize the opportunistic discretion of the individual plaintiffs' attorney.

REV_00262231

2. Future claimants are uniquely exposed in class actions. Time and time again, they have lost not only to defendants, but also to present claimants (and their attorneys). On balance, they appear to fare marginally better in bankruptcy proceedings, whereas the corporation's share [*1465] holders fare significantly better in mass tort class actions. Given the limited judicial ability to project either the number and character of future claimants in mass tort cases or the rate of inflation in the distant future, lump sum settlements should be accompanied by a safety valve: some right on the part of the individual litigant to opt out if actual economic benefits are less than projected. In general, open-ended settlements should be preferred, both because the lump sum alternative essentially shifts residual risk from the firm to its tort creditors and because the bankruptcy process performs marginally better when a definitive resolution of the firm's tort liabilities is necessary for its survival.

3. The right to opt out needs to be modified and updated to the extent that "future claims" classes are permitted. A delayed right to opt out, triggered by the discovery of a previously latent mass tort injury or illness, would solve many of the problems of both future claimants and settlement classes.

To sum up, judicial competence is limited. Attempts to peer decades into the future have uniformly failed. In that light, a cautious and conservative definition of what courts can do will protect both tort victims and, in the long run, courts themselves.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Modern evolutionary theory sees evolution as characterized by "punctuated equilibria": long periods of stasis interrupted by events causing rapid change. See Niles Eldredge & Stephen J. Gould, Punctuated Equilibria: An Alternative to Phyletic Gradualism, in Models In Paleobiology 82, 82115 (Thomas J.M. Schopf ed., 1972); Stephen J. Gould, The Panda's Thumb: More Reflections in Natural History 17985 (1980).

n2. See Steve Baughman, Note, Class Actions in the Asbestos Context: Balancing the Due Process Considerations Implicated by the Right to Opt Out, 70 Tex. L. Rev. 211, 21213 (1991) (discussing cases). For a fuller discussion of the case law up to the 1990s, see infra text accompanying notes 3751. Today, however, federal courts appear to be moving from hostility to receptivity, at least with regard to proposed settlements of mass tort class actions. For examples of recent decisions in which courts have certified a mass tort class action for personal injuries, see Ahearn v. Fibreboard Corp., No. 6:93cv526, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11062, at *5 (E.D. Tex. July 27, 1995) (approving settlement of asbestos-related claims under Rule 23(b)(1)(B)); In re Copley Pharmaceutical, Inc., "Albuterol" Prods. Liab. Litig., 161 F.R.D. 456 (D. Wyo. 1995) (denying motion to decertify Rule 23(b)(3) nationwide personal injury class action for drug contamination with unknown effects); Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 160 F.R.D. 544 (E.D. La. 1995) (certifying Rule 23(b)(3) nationwide class action for tobacco-related illnesses); In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994) (certifying class of breast implant recipients); Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (approving settlement of asbestos class action); In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 129 B.R. 710, 911 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1991) (certifying class of beneficiaries of asbestos settlement trust pursuant to Rule 23(b)(1)(B)), vacated on other grounds, 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993). The leading decisions upholding personal injury mass tort class actions when the class members were exposed and/or injured at widely varying times and under widely varying circumstances are In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 959 (1989), and In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 818 F.2d 145, 16367 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S.

REV_00262232

debtor, the latter wins on all counts - except its ability to preserve management in control.

I. A Profile of the Mass Tort Class Action

At the outset, one obvious and inescapable fact about mass tort litigation must be placed at center stage in any public policy analysis: mass tort litigation typically involves seriously injured persons who lack insurance or substantial financial resources. Immediately, this distinguishes mass tort litigation from most other class action contexts-such as securities or antitrust class actions - where the class members tend to be diversified shareholders or substantial economic entities whose injuries are more modest in proportion to their net worth. In these other contexts, commentators largely have agreed that deterrence, not compensation, should be the rationale of the class action, [31] and they have doubted that compensation is likely to be achieved. [32] Insurance and indemnification statutes, they argue, imply a basic circularity, with shareholders paying the cost of insurance against litigation victories by other shareholders. [33]

In the mass tort context, however, the participants at least perceive compensation to be the primary objective. Not only are the victims often seriously injured (as, for example, in asbestos litigation) and financially dependent on a litigation-funded recovery, but deterrence is a much more problematic objective. Because of the long latency periods associated with most mass tort injuries, the defective or toxic product may well have been removed from the market long before the class action is ever brought. [34] As a result, some commentators have argued that neither the goals of deterrence nor corrective justice are realizable in the mass tort [*1356] setting. [35] Others warn that deterrence is a blunt sword and fear that what may in fact be deterred is innovation generally. [36] In any event, the focus of both the courts and the litigants in mass tort cases has been almost wholly preoccupied with victim compensation: how to fund at least minimal recovery for desperately injured individuals. But, as will be seen, it is precisely within these terms that they have been least successful.

A. The Institutional Backdrop

Mass tort actions matured during the 1980s. Tabulating the actions brought during that decade, two respected commentators have noted: "Hundreds of thousands of people sued scores of corporations for losses due to injuries or diseases that they attributed to catastrophic events, pharmaceutical products, medical devices or toxic substances." [37] Those who have sought to explain this phenomenon of mass "claiming" have identified cultural and social factors that may be more important than any legal developments over this period. [38] Whatever the reason, the most important mass torts that arose during this decade - asbestos, Agent Orange, and the Dalkon Shield - each involved nearly 200,000 or more claimants, and collectively they remade both bankruptcy law and the class action. At the beginning of the decade, the mass tort class action was uniformly rejected by appellate courts. By the end of the decade, it was at least provisionally embraced by many.

Some of the reasons for the initial judicial skepticism of the mass tort class action were obvious. First, the Advisory Committee that drafted Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure had suggested that a " "mass accident' ... is ordinarily not appropriate for a class action" be [*1357] cause of the presence in such cases of significant issues (including causation and possible defenses) that would impact upon the individual class members 1004 (1988). Nonetheless, federal courts remain largely unreceptive to mass tort class actions that are not presented to them as pre-arranged settlements in the form of "settlement classes." Attempts to certify a mass tort class action over the objections of defendants still regularly fail. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995) (granting mandamus and reversing certification of nationwide class action of hemophiliacs infected by the AIDS virus); Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d at 721 (modifying district court's certification of asbestos litigation trust claimants); In re Fibreboard Corp., 893 F.2d 706 (5th Cir. 1990) (granting mandamus and reversing certification of class of individuals exposed to asbestos); Kurczi v. Eli Lilly & Co., 160 F.R.D. 667 (E.D. Ohio 1995) (declining to certify class composed of women exposed to DES).

REV_00262179

As a definitional matter, personal injury mass tort class actions need to be distinguished from property damage class actions. The latter have been more frequently certified and inherently tend to involve both greater homogeneity among class members and greater commonality in their factual issues. See, e.g., Central Wesleyan College v. W.R. Grace & Co., 143 F.R.D. 628 (D.S.C. 1992) (conditionally certifying class of some 480 potential class members with friable asbestos in their buildings on eight common issues), aff'd, 6 F.3d 177 (4th Cir. 1993).

n3. See Judith Resnik, From "Cases" to "Litigation," 54 Law & Contemp. Probs., Summer 1991, at 5; Jeffrey W. Stempel, New Paradigm, Normal Science, or Crumbling Construct? Trends in Adjudicatory Procedure and Litigation Reform, 59 Brook. L. Rev. 659 (1994). For a general overview of the modern development of the class action, see Arthur R. Miller, Comment, Of Frankenstein Monsters and Shining Knights: Myth, Reality, and the "Class Action Problem," 92 Harv. L. Rev. 664 (1979).

n4. See Robert G. Bone, Personal and Impersonal Litigative Forms: Reconceiving the History of Adjudicative Representation, 70 B.U. L. Rev. 213, 287304 (1990) (reviewing Stephen C. Yeazell, From Medieval Group Litigation to the Modern Class Action (1987)); Susan P. Koniak, Feasting While the Widow Weeps: Georgine v. Amchem Products, Inc., 80 Cornell L. Rev. (forthcoming 1995) (manuscript at 10405, on file with the Columbia Law Review); Roger H. Trangsrud, Joinder Alternatives in Mass Tort Litigation, 70 Cornell L. Rev. 779, 82022 (1985) [hereinafter Trangsrud, Joinder Alternatives]; Roger H. Trangsrud, Mass Trials in Mass Tort Cases: A Dissent, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 69 [hereinafter Trangsrud, Mass Trials]; Stephen C. Yeazell, Collective Litigation as Collective Action, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 43, 44; see also Richard A. Epstein, The Consolidation of Complex Litigation: A Critical Evaluation of the ALI Proposal, 10 J.L. & Com. 1 (1990) (criticizing ALI proposals for consolidation and claim aggregation).

n5. Martin v. Wilks, 490 U.S. 755, 762 (1989) (quoting 18 Charles A. Wright et al., Federal Practice & Procedure 4449, at 417 (1981)).

n6. Indeed, some have framed the debate in exactly these terms. See Mark W. Friedman, Note, Constrained Individualism in Group Litigation: Requiring Class Members to Make a Good Cause Showing Before Opting Out of a Federal Class Action, 100 Yale L.J. 745, 75961 (1990). Others define the current debate as between "reformers" and "preservationists." See Stempel, supra note 3, at 688. This seems essentially the same debate.

n7. For the best statement of these issues, see Jack B. Weinstein, Ethical Dilemmas in Mass Tort Litigation, 88 Nw. U. L. Rev. 469 (1994).

n8. Deborah R. Hensler, Resolving Mass Toxic Torts: Myths and Realities, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 89, 8990; see also David Rosenberg, The Causal Connection in Mass Exposure Cases: A "Public Law" Vision of the Tort System, 97 Harv. L. Rev. 851, 854 (1984) (advocating a model for handling mass torts that would rely on class actions, use probabilistic determinations of causation, allocate liability proportionately among defendants, and award scheduled damages to class members).

REV_00262233

n9. For the fullest and best statement of this vision, see Rosenberg, supra note 8; see also David Rosenberg, Class Actions for Mass Torts: Doing Individual Justice by Collective Means, 62 Ind. L.J. 561, 56974 (1987) (advocating "public law" tort model); Leon E. Trakman, David Meets Goliath: Consumers Unite Against Big Business, 25 Seton Hall L. Rev. 617, 62840 (1994) (favoring mandatory class actions).

n10. See, e.g., Peter H. Schuck, Agent Orange on Trial 57 (1986); Kenneth S. Abraham, Individual Action and Collective Responsibility: The Dilemma of Mass Tort Reform, 73 Va. L. Rev. 845, 884 (1987); Rosenberg, supra note 9, at 563, passim; see also Robert L. Rabin, Tort System on Trial: The Burden of Mass Toxics Litigation, 98 Yale L.J. 813, 814, 82022 (1989) (book review) (noting the "intolerable consequences of relying on the tort system in mass toxic disaster cases"). Professor Rabin is, however, equally skeptical of the class action as an alternative and prefers non-tort alternatives such as administrative compensation schemes. See id. at 82426. Social insurance systems are beyond the scope of this Article (although bankruptcy proceedings, which are discussed, do represent a non-tort alternative).

n11. See, e.g., Linda S. Mullenix, Class Resolution of the Mass-Tort Case: A Proposed Federal Procedure Act, 64 Tex. L. Rev. 1039 (1986) (recommending statutory change to increase use of mass tort class actions); Jon O. Newman, Comment, Rethinking Fairness: Perspectives on the Litigation Process, 94 Yale L.J. 1643, 164446 (1985) (advocating reforms of litigation system to reduce costs and delay); Alvin B. Rubin, Mass Torts and Litigation Disasters, 20 Ga. L. Rev. 429, 43435 (1986) (describing litigation crisis imposed by mass tort cases and impact on the tort system); Edward F. Sherman, Class Actions and Duplicative Litigation, 62 Ind. L.J. 507, 507 (1987) (advocating use of injunctions against duplicative litigation and restrictions on opt out rights to increase efficiency of class action).

n12. For examples of this genre, see Rabin, supra note 10, at 82022; Rubin, supra note 11, at 43438, 441; Paul C. Weiler & Christopher F. Edley, Jr., Asbestos: A Multi-Billion Dollar Crisis, 30 Harv. J. on Legis. 383, 39295 (1993).

n13. For discussion of the agency costs in class action litigation, see John C. Coffee, Jr., The Regulation of Entrepreneurial Litigation: Balancing Fairness and Efficiency in the Large Class Action, 54 U. Chi. L. Rev. 877, 88389 (1987) [hereinafter Coffee, The Regulation of Entrepreneurial Litigation]; John C. Coffee, Jr., Understanding the Plaintiff's Attorney: The Implications of Economic Theory for Private Enforcement of Law Through Class and Derivative Actions, 86 Colum. L. Rev. 669, 70120 (1986) [hereinafter Coffee, Understanding the Plaintiff's Attorney]; Jonathan R. Macey & Geoffrey P. Miller, The Plaintiffs' Attorney's Role in Class Action and Derivative Litigation: Economic Analysis and Recommendations for Reform, 58 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 1227 (1991).

n14. Few in-depth studies have examined the process by which the fairness and adequacy of a class action settlement is reviewed by the court. However, one recent study by staff members of the Research Division of the Federal Judicial Center provides some revealing insights. Studying all class actions closed between July 1, 1992 and June 30, 1994 in two federal district courts, these researchers found that the rate of settlement approval was very high. In one of the two studied courts (the Eastern District of Pennsylvania), preliminary data indicate that approximately 34 out of 38 proposed class action settlements (or 89%) were approved without changes (and two others were approved with changes); in the other district court (the Northern District of California), 26 out of 30 class actions (87%) were approved without changes, and the remaining four were approved with changes. See Thomas E. Willging et al., Federal Judicial Center, Preliminary Empirical Data on Class Action Activity in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the Northern District of California in Cases Closed Between July 1, 1992 and June 30, 1994 at 5758 (Apr. 1995) (unpublished manuscript on file with the Columbia Law Review). Standing alone, these data could be consistent with either the conclusion that most settlements are fair and reasonable or the conclusion that courts are passive and accepting. Two other preliminary findings in their study, however, point to the latter conclusion. In the cases for which information was available (12 in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and 5 in the Northern District of California), the median length of the fairness hearing on the class action settlement was 38 minutes in the first district and 40 minutes in the second district. See id. at 57. Such expedition seems inconsistent with careful judicial scrutiny of the settlement's fairness. Similarly, in approximately 83 to 84% of the cases studied in the two districts, the court awarded the exact amount of attorneys' fees requested by the plaintiffs' attorneys. See id. at 7982. Again, because such deference in turn invites attorneys to make excessive demands, this finding in particular suggests a pattern of judicial passivity at the settlement stage.

REV_00262234

n15. One much cited estimate, based on asbestos litigation, is that transaction costs consume $ .61 of each asbestos litigation dollar (of which $ .37 is attributable to defendants' litigation costs). The plaintiffs therefore receive only $ .39 from each litigation dollar, and plaintiffs' attorneys only $ .24. See Cimino v. Raymark Indus., 751 F. Supp. 649, 651 (E.D. Tex. 1990); see also Rubin, supra note 11, at 434 (citing Rand study and other studies showing that majority of payments made in product liability cases are for legal services). Even if these factual assumptions are correct, they imply that defendants' litigation expenses ($ .37) exceed plaintiffs' expenses ($ .24) by slightly more than 50%. The impact of these data on the case for mass tort actions is problematic, because "reform" may produce a wealth transfer from plaintiffs to defendants. It cannot safely be assumed that reducing defendants' litigation costs will increase the recoveries to plaintiffs (although it will reduce the deterrent impact, if any, of mass tort litigation). Nor, if corrective justice considerations are taken into account, is it clear that plaintiffs should lose their opportunity to receive individualized damages because of the costs to defendants.

Mass tort litigation is, however, considerably less expensive when sampling techniques and consolidated trials are used, and in such cases there may not be the same reduction in settlement value that seems to accompany the mass tort class action. See infra text accompanying notes 156162.

n16. For data on the impact of mass torts on federal and state dockets, see infra notes 6372 and accompanying text.

n17. Some recent academic voices have also seen the problems with a "public law" vision. See, e.g., Linda S. Mullenix, Mass Tort As Public Law Litigation: Paradigm Misplaced, 88 Nw. U. L. Rev. 579, 58082 (1994).

n18. See Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 104); Mullenix, supra note 17, at 580; John A. Siciliano, Mass Torts: The Case Against a Special Case, 80 Cornell L. Rev. (forthcoming 1995) (manuscript at 1720, on file with the Columbia Law Review).

n19. For the classic statement of this view, see Milton Handler, The Shift from Substantive to Procedural Innovations in Antitrust Suits - The Twenty-Third Annual Antitrust Review, 71 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 89 (1971). This same suspicion of an extortionate motive clearly runs through Judge Posner's decision in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 12971300 (7th Cir. 1995).

n20. See infra text accompanying notes 163171.

n21. That some defendants today seek class certification, preferring class resolution to repetitive individual litigation, is beyond dispute. See David Crump, What Really Happens During Class Certification? A Primer for the First-Time Defense Attorney, 10 Rev. Litig. 1, 89 (1990). Defendants also regularly seek to extend the scope of the class action filed by plaintiffs. A good example is the class action filed over the defective Bjork-Shiley heart valve. Brought as a nationwide class action, defendants insisted that it be extended to a global class action. See Bowling v. Pfizer, Inc., 143 F.R.D. 141, 15455 (S.D. Ohio 1992), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993); Michael Schachner, Global Settlements Draw Praise, Scorn, Bus. Ins., Oct. 10, 1994, at 1, 35. Ordinarily, a defendant has no desire to be sued by additional plaintiffs and fights to define the class narrowly.

REV_00262235

n22. This Article will argue that the mass tort context is the leading such example, but is not the only one. Employment discrimination also represents an area in which individual claims for substantial damages are economically viable, but defendants increasingly prefer a class resolution. See J. Spencer Schuster, Precertification Settlement of Class Actions: Will California Follow the Federal Lead?, 40 Hastings L.J. 863, 865 (1989) (noting trend toward settlement class actions in variety of litigation contexts).

n23. For discussion of the impact of mass tort actions on the federal docket, see infra text accompanying notes 6372. Two distinct claims, however, need to be separated here at the outset.

First, there is the strong possibility that judges frame legal standards with their own self-interest in mind. Several recent procedural commentators have either made or conceded this observation as a starting point for analysis of procedural rules. Compare Jonathan R. Macey, Judicial Preferences, Public Choice, and the Rules of Procedure, 23 J. Legal Stud. 627, 629 (1994) (asserting that judicial behavior in procedural matters is likely to conform to judges' rational self-interest rather than to economic efficiency) with Janet C. Alexander, Judges' Self-Interest and Procedural Rules: Comment on Macey, 23 J. Legal Stud. 647, 64748 (1994) (arguing that although judges' self-interest does play some role, this is not contrary to the public interest). Some judges have come perilously close to admitting that the mass tort litigation crisis is primarily a crisis of mind-numbing boredom, which requires appellate courts to approve the certification of mass tort class actions in order to relieve trial judges of "litigation "re-runs' for those who face a series of identical pending cases." See Spencer Williams, Mass Tort Class Actions: Going, Going, Gone?, 98 F.R.D. 323, 328 (1983).

Second, there is the tougher empirical question of whether courts are in fact being overwhelmed. Although this Article accepts the proposition that no reform will be accepted with regard to mass tort litigation unless it curbs the exponential growth in case filings, there remains some basis for skepticism about this constantly reiterated claim that courts are about to be overwhelmed by mass torts. The judicial system - state and federal - annually disposes of approximately 500,000 automobile accident cases each year, a number exceeding the claimants in any mass tort case, and does so without any seeming sense of crisis. See James S. Kakalik & Nicholas M. Pace, Costs and Compensation Paid in Tort Litigation 14 (1986). However, it is true that mass tort cases tend to be concentrated in specific areas (e.g., along the Eastern seaboard in the case of asbestos litigation), thus maximizing their congestive impact. See infra note 71.

n24. See Robert G. Bone, Rule 23 Redux: Empowering the Federal Class Action, 14 Rev. Litig. 79, 99 (1994).

n25. See Macey & Miller, supra note 13, at 28. This generalization is no longer invariably true given the predominance today of institutional investors (who may hold sizeable stakes). See Elliott J. Weiss & John S. Beckerman, Let the Money Do the Monitoring: How Institutional Investors Can Reduce Agency Costs in Securities Class Actions, 104 Yale L.J. 2053, 208893 (1995). Nonetheless, in my view, institutional investors are likely to continue to prefer passivity (while allowing others to bring and maintain the class action) for extrinsic and reputational reasons. That is, because most institutional investors wish to remain in contact with corporate managements (to receive earnings forecasts and other "soft" information), and some (particularly private pension funds) are deeply conflicted about shareholder activism, the majority will prefer to free ride on the efforts of professional plaintiffs and specialized class action counsel and will not themselves initiate class actions.

n26. Defendants also resist class certification in cases where plaintiffs have not been able consistently to win individual actions. Two examples illustrate this tendency. First, in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995), the Seventh Circuit granted defendants' application for a writ of mandamus, overruling the district court's certification of a nationwide class of hemophiliacs infected by the HIV virus that causes AIDS. The decision seems to have been motivated chiefly by the circuit court's belief that class certification would give the plaintiffs an unjustified leverage over the defendants, chiefly because the plaintiffs were asserting a novel legal theory that had been generally unsuccessful in individual cases; in fact, plaintiffs had lost 13 out of the 14 individual cases that had gone to trial earlier. See id. at 1296. Such a weak track record gave defendants little reason to favor a global settlement.

A second example is furnished by defendants' intense resistance to the certification of a nationwide class action for smoking-related illnesses. See, e.g., Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 160 F.R.D. 544 (E.D. La. 1995); see also Andrew Reidy & Robert Carter, Tobacco Litigation: Looking for Cover, Legal Times (Washington), Mar. 6, 1995, at S37, S38 (discussing efforts by tobacco industry to avoid the potentially vast liability arising from the Castano decision). To date, the only significant award in smoking-related litigation came in Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 893 F.2d 541 (3d Cir. 1990), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 505 U.S. 504 (1992), which the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for trial. See Gary T. Schwartz, Tobacco Liability in the Courts, in Smoking Policy: Law, Politics, & Culture 131, 133, 13640, 14445, 15053 (Robert L. Rabin & Stephen D. Sugarman eds., 1993).

n27. A non-opt out class action may be certifiable under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) if there is a "limited fund." To exploit this technique, defendants have attempted to structure such a "limited fund" by focusing on the insurance policies covering the defendant. See infra notes 142150 and accompanying text.

n28. See Bone, supra note 24, at 8086. The proposed revision of Rule 23 greatly increases the discretion of the trial judge by eliminating the separate class certification categories of Rule 23 in favor of a unitary standard. Today, considerably more rigorous requirements apply in the case of a class action brought under Rule 23(b)(3) to seek a monetary judgment than in the case of actions brought under Rule 23(b)(1) or (b)(2). As a practical matter, the proposed unitary standard will grant discretion to the trial judge to relax the notice requirements and to deny any right to opt out in the case of a class action for a money judgment. For the text of the proposed Rule, see id. at 10912.

n29. As suggested later, an exclusively future claimant class is more likely to be passive than one which includes "high stake" present claimants. Thus, from a policy perspective, requiring the class to consist of present claimants as well as future claimants increases the possibility that some class members will be in a position to monitor their attorneys actively.

n30. Elsewhere, I have argued that the damage determination phase triggers a more important litigant autonomy interest than the liability stage because an opt out right at this stage protects the "high stakes" plaintiff from a settlement that pays such claimant only the median value of all claims. See Coffee, The Regulation of Entrepreneurial Litigation, supra note 13, at 92530.

n31. See Reinier Kraakman et al., When Are Shareholder Suits in Shareholder Interests?, 82 Geo. L.J. 1733, 173941 (1994).

n32. See Roberta Romano, The Shareholder Suit: Litigation Without Foundation?, 7 J. L. Econ. & Organization 55, 84 (1991) (noting that in most shareholder suits, "settlements provide minimal compensation").

REV_00262237

n33. See Dale A. Oesterle, Limits on a Corporation's Protection of its Directors and Officers from Personal Liability, 1983 Wis. L. Rev. 513, 57073.

n34. This was the case in the asbestos, silicone breast implants, and Dalkon Shield class action cases - to give only the examples of the best known recent mass tort class actions. Agent Orange was also infrequently used after the Vietnam War. In the case of asbestos, federal law sharply restricted its use in any products after 1970. See Federal Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, 29 U.S.C. 651678 (1988 & Supp. V 1993). Yet the first important case establishing liability was not until 1973. See Borel v. Fibreboard Paper Prods. Corp., 493 F.2d 1076 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 869 (1974).

n35. See Robert L. Rabin, Some Thoughts on the Efficacy of a Mass Toxics Administrative Compensation Scheme, 52 Md. L. Rev. 951, 962 (1993) ("A system designed to achieve corrective justice goals in two-party accidental harm cases simply cannot be accommodated effectively to the demands of mass tort cases [involving] ... long-latent toxic disorder."); see also Glen O. Robinson, Probabilistic Causation and Compensation for Tortious Risk, 14 J. Leg. Stud. 779, 785 (1985) ("The deterrent value of legal penalties for managerial error depends heavily on the proximity of the penalties to the actions for which they are assessed.").

n36. See Peter Huber, Safety and the Second Best: The Hazards of Public Risk Management in the Courts, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 277, 30520 (1985); see also Peter Huber, Liability: The Legal Revolution and Its Consequences 11 (1988) (claiming that costs associated with legal liability are substantial component of prices paid by consumers for goods and services). But see Mark M. Hager, Civil Compensation and Its Discontents: A Response to Huber, 42 Stan. L. Rev. 539, 54751 (1990) (disputing methodology employed by Peter Huber to reach his estimate of $ 300 billion as annual cost of civil litigation to the U.S. economy).

n37. Deborah R. Hensler & Mark A. Peterson, Understanding Mass Personal Injury Litigation: A Socio-Legal Analysis, 59 Brook. L. Rev. 961, 961 (1993). In truth, the process began before 1980. Between 1961 and 1984, federal court tort filings nearly doubled. See John G. Fleming, The American Tort Process 34 (1988).

n38. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 101926 (discussing impact of mass media, social networks, physician contacts, and availability of plaintiff law firms on "claiming" behavior of ordinary citizens).

n39. Amendments to Rules of Civil Procedure, 39 F.R.D. 69, 103 (1966). The Rule appears to have been chiefly drafted by Professor Benjamin Kaplan, who has explained his reasoning. See Benjamin Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 386, 39193 (1967). Others have suggested that Professor Kaplan's reasoning may not have reflected that of the Advisory Committee as a whole. See Resnik, supra note 3, at 1415.

n40. See, e.g., Harrigan v. United States, 63 F.R.D. 402, 407 (E.D. Pa. 1974) (rejecting class certification for class consisting of all paralyzed veterans injured by negligent urological surgery at Veterans Administration hospitals).

n41. See Baughman, supra note 2, at 213 ("Appellate courts have almost uniformly rejected this approach.").

n42. See In re N. Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 521 F. Supp. 1188 (N.D. Cal.), modified, 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1171 (1983).

n43. See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415 (W.D. Mo.), rev'd, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 988 (1982).

n44. See generally Richard A. Chesley & Kathleen W. Kolodgy, Note, Mass Exposure Torts: An Efficient Solution to a Complex Problem, 54 U. Cin. L. Rev. 467, 48590 (1985) (summarizing decisions).

n45. See Scott O. Wright & Joseph A. Coluss, The Successful Use of the Class Action Device in the Management of the Skywalks Mass Tort Litigation, 52 UMKC L. Rev. 141, 142 (1984).

n46. 782 F.2d 468 (5th Cir. 1986).

n47. Id. at 473.

n48. See In re School Asbestos Litig., 104 F.R.D. 422 (E.D. Pa. 1984), aff'd in part, 789 F.2d 996 (3d Cir.) (reversing non-opt out provision, but allowing a permissive certification of a class action for property damages), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 852 and 479 U.S. 915 (1986).

n49. See In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 818 F.2d 145 (2d Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1004 (1988).

n50. See In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 959 (1989).

n51. Francis E. McGovern, Resolving Mature Mass Tort Litigation, 69 B.U. L. Rev. 659, 660 (1989); see also infra note 71 (discussing concentration of asbestos cases in certain federal districts).

n52. Francis E. McGovern, Toward a Functional Approach for Managing Complex Litigation, 53 U. Chi. L. Rev. 440, 482 (1986) (analyzing the normal cyclical evolution of a mass tort litigation); see generally McGovern, supra note 51 (analyzing and discussing procedural problems peculiar to "mature" mass tort litigation).

n53. The International Sheet Metal Workers Association, a union whose president, Edward Carlough, was originally the lead plaintiff in Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 10 F.3d 189 (3d Cir. 1993) (later restyled Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994), after his ouster as union president), conducted regular x-ray screening of its members for asbestos and related diseases during the late 1980s and early 1990s. For representative examples, see Chris Green, Mobile Unit to Test Workers for Asbestos, State J.-Reg. (Springfield, Ill.), Nov. 20, 1993, at 11, available in Westlaw, STJNLRSI Database; John J. Monahan, Asbestos-test Results Awaited: Older Sheet Metal Workers Screened, Sunday Telegram (Worcester, Mass.), May 16, 1993, at A16, available in Westlaw, ALLNEWS Database; Union Offering Asbestos Tests, Las Vegas Rev.-J., Nov. 12, 1993, at 7B, available in Westlaw, LVRJ Database.

A more extreme example of entrepreneurial litigation is furnished by two Texas plaintiffs' attorneys, who founded the National Texas Workers Litigation Project and equipped vans with x-ray machines and traveled to various plants of one major asbestos producer (Raymark) in order to screen workers. Hiring three doctors to conduct x-ray screening for them, they identified some 6000 plaintiffs in this nationwide solicitation effort - and also incurred considerable judicial displeasure. See Milo Geyelin & Michael J. McCarthy, Judge Chides Lawyers in Asbestos Claims, Wall St. J., June 7, 1990, at B10.

n54. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 96769.

REV_00262239

n55. Several reasons explain why recoveries in standard tort cases tend not to be interdependent. Most importantly, the issues in such two-party cases tend to be extremely fact-specific (e.g., the defendant driver was driving too fast, was drunk, or had worn out brakes). Unless there is a claim that the vehicle was inherently defective (as in the classic example of the Ford Pinto), the imposition of liability will have little impact on other automobile cases involving, say, injuries to pedestrians. Mass tort cases, in contrast, tend to turn on scientific issues of causation, which are common to a broad range of cases. In addition, the parties in standard tort cases are not repeat players, whereas both corporate defendants and plaintiffs' attorneys are in mass tort cases. Information also travels quickly within the small and highly specialized mass tort plaintiffs' bar.

n56. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 966.

n57. As a practical matter, this process generally involves seeking referrals from local personal injury lawyers who turn over their own clients under some fee-splitting arrangement. In some mass torts, direct advertising for injured victims is used. Plaintiffs' attorneys also develop referral networks with doctors and clinics. Eventually, an informal underground railroad develops to refer victims to specific firms.

n58. Attempts to predict the likely number of future asbestos claims against the entire industry have produced widely varying estimates. The one common denominator is that most projections have already proven too low. In 1982, Corning & Company predicted that between 68,000 and 158,000 asbestos-related personal injury claims would be filed from 1983 forward. By 1993, over 200,000 claims had been filed against the Manville Trust alone. In 1992, another expert estimated 210,000 as the most likely number of claims that would be thereafter filed against the Manville Trust, with a range of between 125,000 and 250,000. Subsequently, one team of experts appointed by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein to estimate future claims against the Manville Trust predicted that 560,000 claims would be filed from 1990 forward. In 1994, National Economic Research Associates projected 306,000 claims on the same basis. See Frederick C. Dunbar & Denise A. Neumann, National Economic Research Assoc., Inc., Estimating Future Asbestos Claims: Lessons from the National Gypsum Litigation 3334 (1993) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). In any lump sum settlement, the amount actually received by future claimants depends chiefly on the number of claims made. Thus, if 100,000 claims are projected and 200,000 actually materialize, benefits will likely be reduced by half. Worse, because the underestimation of future claims will not be evident at the outset, early claimants may be paid in full, thus depleting the settlement fund and necessitating an even greater reduction in the payments to later claimants. On this basis, the foregoing wide ranges in estimates of total claims indicate that at least the earlier projections would result in settlements that would drastically undercompensate future claimants.

n59. An expert panel, which was appointed by U.S. District Judge Jack Weinstein (pursuant to Rule 706 of the Federal Rules of Evidence) to evaluate the Manville Trust, has estimated that as many as 450,000 future claimants with asbestos injuries may be expected between 1990 and 2049. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 1005 n.239. Note that this estimate is lower than another projection by the same expert panel, see supra note 58, which difference is apparently the result of different drafts of the experts' report. This panel cautioned, however, that their projection was subject to a 50% margin of error for total claims over this period. See Eric Stallard & Kenneth G. Manton, Projections of Asbestos-Related Personal Injury Claims Against the Manville Personal Injury Settlement Trust, Males 19902049, by Occupation, Date of First Exposure, and Type of Claim 3 (Mar. 8, 1994) (unpublished manuscript, on file with author). After hearing a variety of predictions over the years, Judge Weinstein has been willing to make only the broadest estimates: "My own best estimate of future claims at the moment is somewhere between 300,000 and 600,000 claims into the mid-twenty-first century." See Weinstein, supra note 7, at 510 n.164. Others have noted that in some cases the more complex the projection technique used, the greater the margin for error that must accompany the projection. See Michael A. Stoto, The Accuracy of Population Projections, 78 J. Am. Stat. Ass'n 13, 13, 18 (1983).

REV_00262240

n60. In marked contrast to the serious efforts made to estimate future claimants in the Johns-Manville and National Gypsum bankruptcies, no effort was made to develop any actuarial estimate of future claims in the recent asbestos class actions. In Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994), which was an exclusively future claims class action, this deficiency seems particularly glaring because the settlement itself imposed "case flow maximums" on the number of claims that would be paid in any year, and these case flow maximums were already "less than the annual new case filings against the CCR defendants." Id. at 280. Indeed, the only finding made by the court with regard to the likely number of future claims for specific disease categories was a vague (and questionable) finding "that claims for asbestos-related lung cancer should be on the decline due to the diminished levels of asbestos exposure to the class members in the past few decades." Id. This casual disdain for the number of claims likely to be filed again underscores the vulnerability of future claimants in mass tort class actions.

n61. See Thomas A. Smith, A Capital Markets Approach to Mass Tort Bankruptcy, 104 Yale L.J. 367, 38289 (1994) (discussing underestimation of claims in mass tort bankruptcies).

n62. Decisionmakers tend, social psychologists have found, to give excessive weight to concrete and vivid information relative to more abstract information. See Richard Nisbett & Lee Ross, Human Inference: Strategies and Shortcomings of Social Judgment 5961 (1980); Smith, supra note 61, at 38384. Present claimants may present such vivid information, while future claimants (even though actuarially inevitable) may not. The result is to distort the allocation of funds between present and future claimants.

n63. See Deborah R. Hensler et al., Asbestos in the Courts: The Challenge of Mass Toxic Torts 2429 (1985).

n64. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 961.

n65. See Deborah R. Hensler, Reading the Tort Litigation Tea Leaves: What's Going on in the Civil Liability System?, 16 Just. Sys. J. 139, 147 (1993). By 1991, however, the rate of case filings fell to 57% of new products liability cases. See id.

n66. See Baughman, supra note 2, at 211, 21112 n.4 (citing 100,000 Asbestos Cases Ordered Consolidated, L.A. Times, July 17, 1990, at D2).

n67. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 265 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (citing report prepared by Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist).

n68. The frustrations faced by trial courts in the face of a growing asbestos docket are exemplified by Cimino v. Raymark Indus., 751 F. Supp. 649, 652 (E.D. Tex. 1990). There, Chief Judge Robert Parker observed that if his district court tried asbestos cases at the rate of 30 cases per month, it would take six and one-half years to try all asbestos cases on the existing docket, and at that point the court could anticipate that 5000 new cases would have been filed during the interim. For a very similar estimate in a non-asbestos mass torts case, see In re Bendectin Prods. Liab. Litig., 102 F.R.D. 239, 240 & n.3 (S.D. Ohio) ("disposition of the present Bendectin cases at the trial level alone might require 21,000 trial days or the equivalent of 105 Judge years, i.e., one Judge for 105 years or 105 Judges for one year"), mandamus to vacate certification, 749 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1984).

n69. The leading example in this still-expanding genre was the Judicial Conference's Ad Hoc

REV_00262241

Committee on Asbestos Litigation, which was established by Chief Justice Rehnquist in September 1990 to search for solutions to the asbestos litigation crisis. It found that "what has been a frustrating problem is becoming a disaster of major proportions to both the victims and the producers of asbestos products, which the courts are ill-equipped to meet effectively." Judicial Conference of the United States, Report of the Judicial Conference Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation 2 (Mar. 1991) [hereinafter Asbestos Ad Hoc Committee Report] (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Columbia Law Review), reprinted in Asbestos Litig. Rep., Mar. 14, 1991, at 22698, 22699. Based on this perception of an imminent crisis, the 1991 report recommended a "national asbestos dispute resolution scheme that permits consolidation of all asbestos claims in a single forum." Id. at 3, reprinted in Asbestos Litig. Rep. at 22700. Months after the release of this report, the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation transferred all pending asbestos personal injury litigation to a single forum. See In re Asbestos Prods. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp. 415 (J.P.M.L. 1991).

n70. See infra text accompanying notes 128137.

n71. For example, one study in the mid-1980s found that 40% of all federal asbestos filings in the late 1970s and early 1980s occurred in the districts of Massachusetts, Eastern Texas, and Southern Mississippi. In terms of circuits, the district courts in the First and Fifth Circuits accounted for 52% of all asbestos disease case filings. See Thomas E. Willging, Federal Judicial Center, Trends in Asbestos Litigation 15 (1987).

n72. See supra notes 51 and 71 and accompanying text. The Georgine class action, discussed infra at text accompanying notes 192214, was consolidated in the federal district with the highest concentration of asbestos cases in the country. See infra note 481.

n73. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 966.

n74. See id.

n75. See Morton Mintz, At Any Cost: Corporate Greed, Women, and the Dalkon Shield 4 (1985).

n76. See Georgene M. Vairo, Reinventing Civil Procedure: Will the New Procedural Regime Help Resolve Mass Torts?, 59 Brook. L. Rev. 1065, 1075 n.47 (1993).

n77. See id. There were also 11,443 unrepresented claimants, but only a small minority of the claimants (7101 out of over 44,000) were represented by an attorney having fewer than ten Dalkon Shield claimants.

n78. McGovern, supra note 52, at 479.

n79. This practice of mass settlement of individual cases often results in controversy and may violate ethical norms. See Peter Passell, Challenge to Multimillion-Dollar Settlement Threatens Top Texas Lawyers, N.Y. Times, Mar. 24, 1995, at B6 (discussing evidence, including work sheets, showing that aggregate settlements were negotiated, despite compromise of individual claims and possible ethical violations as a result thereof).

n80. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 104243.

n81. There is also a tendency for plaintiffs' attorneys to file as much of their inventory as possible in the same court. This may clog judicial arteries and slow the progression of the individual case to trial, but it maximizes the plaintiffs' attorney's leverage with the court and certainly inclines the court to favor an aggregate resolution.

REV_00262242

differently. [39] Individual issues and defenses, it was felt, would likely overwhelm the common questions, and eventually disaggregation would become inevitable. Judicial decisions following the 1966 revisions of Rule 23 were quick to take this hint to decline class certification in mass tort cases. [40]

Even when trial courts did certify a mass tort class, they were usually reversed. [41] In 1981, Judge Spencer Williams certified the first Dalkon Shield class action, but in 1982 the Ninth Circuit reversed him. [42] Also in 1981, after the collapse of two skywalks at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City, Missouri, the victims were certified as a class, but again a year later the Eighth Circuit reversed. [43] Other cases at the time encountered a similar fate. [44] In a little noted development, however, the Hyatt Skywalk cases were subsequently settled by means of a non-mandatory settlement class action. [45] In short, the practical message was that a class action could not be certified over the defendants' objections, but it could be utilized with their consent - that is, if a defendant's self-interest lead it to prefer a class action resolution over repetitive individual litigation.

The breakthrough in the attitude of appellate courts to the certification of mass tort class actions came first with asbestos. In 1986, in affirming class certification in an asbestos mass tort case, Jenkins v. Raymark Industries, [46] the Fifth Circuit was explicit about its motivation: "The courts are now being forced to rethink the alternatives and priorities by the current volume of litigation and more frequent mass disasters." [47] [*1358] That same year, the Third Circuit also partially upheld a similar certification in another asbestos class action. [48] A year later, the Second Circuit upheld Judge Weinstein's certification of the Agent Orange class action. [49] Finally, in 1989, in the most emphatic victory for mass tort class certification, the Fourth Circuit approved class action treatment for the Dalkon Shield litigation. [50]

What explains this reversal in judicial attitude? A strong hint is supplied by a curious fact: in the early 1980s, the federal courts first refused to certify class actions in simple "mass accident" cases (like the Skywalk collapse), but several years later certified class actions in far more complicated "mass exposure" cases. By any doctrinal test, class certification is easier to justify in the mass accident setting than in the mass exposure context. In the former context, there is little variation in terms of legal claims among those injured (thus making class treatment more appropriate), while in the latter "mass exposure" cases both the facts and the applicable law vary greatly from case to case. Unlike a single accident (such as a plane crash or a building collapse), mass exposure to a toxic product (such as asbestos, the Dalkon Shield, or Agent Orange) implicates the law of multiple jurisdictions. In a nationwide class, it may involve most state jurisdictions and most major participants in the industry. The hypothesis that best explains this puzzling inconsistency is that the burden on the courts from a failure to certify was far greater in the latter context where individual actions would otherwise proliferate. For example, Jenkins, the first asbestos mass tort class action to be certified, arose in East Texas, an area that one commentator has called "the fertile crescent of asbestos litigation." [51] Put differently, asbestos cases had a characteristic that a mass accident class action did not: unless resolved on a class basis, they threatened to flood the docket within that district.

B. The Dynamics of Mass Tort Litigation

Every litigation context has its own distinctive traits. Mass tort litigation is characterized by several unique features: (1) a predictable evolutionary cycle during which the value and volume of individual claims starts low and then spirals upward; (2) high case interdependency so that litigated outcomes in any mass tort area quickly impact on the n82. See Alison Frankel, From Pioneers to Profits, Am. Law., June 1992, at 82, 84.

REV_00262180

n83. Originally, this group was known as the Asbestos Claims Facility. See Harry H. Wellington, Asbestos: The Private Management of a Public Problem, 33 Clev. St. L. Rev. 375, 38789 (198485). Later, after the bankruptcy of some of its members, a smaller organization, known as the Center for Claims Resolution (CCR) replaced it. The CCR represents 21 firms that are the principal asbestos manufacturers not in bankruptcy. See Lawrence Fitzpatrick, The Center for Claims Resolution, 53 Law & Contemp. Probs., Autumn 1990, at 13, 17.

n84. See Richard B. Sobol, Bending the Law 106 (1991).

n85. See Schuck, supra note 10, at 205.

n86. See In re Asbestos Prods. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp. 415, 416 (J.P.M.L. 1991).

n87. See Private Securities Litigation: Staff Report Prepared at the Direction of Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Chairman, Senate Subcomm. on Securities of the Comm. on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs 64, in Hearings on Abandonment of the Private Right of Action for Aiding and Abetting Securities Fraud/Staff Report on Private Securities Litigation Before the Subcomm. on Securities of the Senate Comm. on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, 103d Cong., 2d Sess. 166, 234 (1994) (reporting that 315, 299, and 268 securities class actions were filed in 1990, 1991, and 1992, respectively, and that these numbers reflected about 10% of all class actions annually filed). According to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, 290 securities class actions were filed nationwide in 1994 and 298 in 1993. See Legislation on Securities Fraud Litigation, 1995: Hearings on H.R. 10 Before the Subcomm. on Telecommunications and Finance of the House Comm. on Commerce, 104th Cong., 1st Sess., Federal News Service, Jan. 19, 1995 (prepared testimony of William S. Lerach), available in LEXIS, News Library, FEDNEW File. Even these figures may overstate the actual number of securities class actions because of the existence of multiple actions against the same defendant. Mr. Lerach further estimated that only 125 corporations have been sued annually over the last several years - "out of over 14,000 public corporations reporting to the SEC." Id.

n88. See John C. Coffee, Jr., The Unfaithful Champion: The Plaintiff as Monitor in Shareholder Litigation, 48 Law & Contemp. Probs., Summer 1985, at 5, 24.

n89. If the plaintiff's action has conferred a "substantial benefit" on the corporation, the traditional corporate law rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to an award of reasonable attorneys' fees. See Bosch v. Meeker Coop. Light & Power Ass'n, 101 N.W.2d 423, 426 (Minn. 1960). Nonpecuniary benefits can be recognized as conferring such a benefit. See, e.g., Fischman v. Wexler, 309 F. Supp. 976, 97879 (D. Del. 1970) ("corporate therapeutics" found to confer such a benefit).

n90. Probably the first case in which this technique was used was In re Cuisinart Food Processor Antitrust Litig., 38 Fed. R. Serv. 2d (Callaghan) 446, 449 (D. Conn. 1983), in which class members received a coupon valued at 50% of a product's list price to purchase one of defendant's products costing up to $ 300. In subsequent cases, the percentage value of the coupon in relation to the product quickly declined. See In re Domestic Air Transp. Antitrust Litig., 148 F.R.D. 297, 308 (N.D. Ga. 1993) (coupon between $ 10 and $ 200 for flights costing between $ 50 and $ 1500); New York v. Nintendo of Am., Inc., 775 F. Supp. 676, 681 (S.D.N.Y. 1991) ($ 5 coupon for video game costing $ 100); see also Barry Meier, Fistfuls of Coupons, N.Y. Times, May 26, 1995, at D1 (describing scrip certificates in class action settlements for a $ 25 rebate in airfares, a $ 400 credit toward a car purchase, and, amazingly, a "free box of Cheerios").

n91. See In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d

REV_00262243

768, 78081 (3d Cir. 1995). For another recent decision rejecting a "scrip settlement," see Buchet v. ITT Consumer Fin. Corp., 845 F. Supp. 684, 697 (D. Minn. 1994).

n92. See General Motors Corp., 55 F.3d at 80610.

n93. See id. at 822.

n94. 156 F.R.D. 600 (D.N.J. 1994).

n95. See id. at 60203. The settlement required Manischewitz to contribute $ 1,800,000 of its food products valued at their retail value to the settlement fund. The court was skeptical, however, of the defendant's valuation because it valued their products at three times their cost to the defendant. Thus, on a cost valuation basis, the charitable contribution would cost Manischewitz only $ 600,000 (before any tax deduction) and yet would yield the plaintiff's attorneys not less than $ 450,000. See id. at 60304.

n96. Indeed, the Matzo Food Products court, itself, noted that cy pres settlements "are, in fact, routinely approved by courts." Id. at 605; see also Superior Beverage Co. v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 827 F. Supp. 477, 47879 (N.D. Ill. 1993) (noting increased judicial flexibility in awarding cy pres settlements); Pray v. Lockheed Aircraft Corp., 644 F. Supp. 1289, 1303 (D.D.C. 1986) (discussing judicial discretion to apply cy press doctrine); 2 Herbert B. Newberg & Alba Conte, Newberg on Class Actions 10.17, at 10-40 to 10-46 (3d ed. 1992) (discussing cy pres settlements and citing cases). Where cy pres settlements result because funds are not claimed by unidentifiable class members (which is the most common fact pattern), the obvious alternative is to increase the recovery to those class members who do appear (and who seldom receive full compensation in any settlement). See id. 10.17, at 10-40 to 10-41.

n97. The Delaware Chancery Court has recently followed the second approach in several cases, approving the settlement but refusing any fee award or radically reducing the fee award sought. See De Angelis v. Salton/Maxim Housewares, Inc., 641 A.2d 834, 836 (Del. Ch. 1993) (approving settlement but denying any fee award), rev'd sub nom. Prezant v. De Angelis, 636 A.2d 915 (Del. 1994); In re MCA, Inc. Shareholders Litig., [1993 Transfer Binder] Fed. Sec. L. Rep. (CCH) 97,749, at 97,57778 (Del. Ch. Feb. 12, 1993) (reducing fee award sharply).

n98. Dismissal of the class action would have been hard to justify in the Matzo Food Products case because the defendant had already been criminally convicted of price fixing. See Matzo Food Prods., 156 F.R.D. at 601.

n99. See, e.g., Grimes v. Vitalink Communications Corp., 17 F.3d 1553 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 480 (1994); Nottingham Partners v. Trans-Lux Corp., 925 F.2d 29 (1st Cir. 1991); Lowenschuss v. Resorts Int'l, Inc., No. 89-1071, 1989 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7407 (E.D. Pa. June 29, 1989), aff'd without opinion, 947 F.2d 936 (3d Cir. 1991).

n100. See Epstein v. MCA, Inc., 50 F.3d 644 (9th Cir.), cert. granted in part, 115 S. Ct. 2576 (1995). Epstein can be distinguished from Grimes and Nottingham Partners on a variety of grounds, including the important fact that in both the latter decisions the plaintiffs appeared in state court to assert their positions. The Ninth Circuit also did not reach a second claim raised by plaintiffs: that the Delaware settlement violated due process because of inadequate representation by the principal class representative.

n101. Section 27 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, 15 U.S.C. 78aa (1994), gives U.S. district courts "exclusive jurisdiction" over suits based on the Securities Exchange Act, or the rules and regulations thereunder (including Rule 10b-5, 17 C.F.R. 240.10b-5 (1994)).

REV_00262244

n102. See Epstein, 50 F.3d at 66364; National Super Spuds, Inc. v. New York Mercantile Exch., 660 F.2d 9, 1718 (2d Cir. 1981).

n103. See supra note 99.

n104. A leading Delaware case, Prezant v. De Angelis, 636 A.2d 915 (Del. 1994) illustrates the basic pattern of a reverse auction. Following the initial public offering of Salton/Maxim Housewares, Inc., certain plaintiffs brought suit in federal court in Illinois for alleged violations of the federal securities laws. Approximately one month later, plaintiff De Angelis filed a federal securities class action in Pennsylvania and, on learning of the pending Illinois action and apparently fearing that his own action would be transferred to the Illinois court, he sought its voluntary dismissal. See id. at 918. Shortly thereafter, the same plaintiff's attorney filed a derivative action in Delaware alleging only state law fraud claims. Meanwhile, negotiations in the Illinois action had broken down after plaintiffs had rejected defendants' settlement offer of $ 1.2 million. See id. Within two weeks of filing the Delaware action, the plaintiff entered into settlement negotiations with the defendants. Without plaintiff seeking discovery or defendants filing a responsive pleading, the action was quickly settled for the comparatively modest sum of $ 1,225,000 (essentially the same offer that the plaintiffs in the Illinois action had refused). After the stipulation of settlement was signed, the complaint was amended to assert federal securities law claims as well in order even more clearly to bar the Illinois action. See id. at 919. Although the Chancery Court approved the settlement, the Delaware Supreme Court rejected it, finding that the plaintiffs were not adequate representatives and that specific findings must be made as to their adequacy. See id. at 925. It also noted that the Delaware plaintiff "could not realistically have hoped to try this case, but only to settle it with the further hope of receiving a fee award." Id. at 919.

This same pattern seems to have recurred in Delaware, but with a different result, in the earlier-discussed MCA litigation. The Delaware Chancery Court approved a settlement, but awarded a minimal attorney's fee because of its clear skepticism about the action's benefit to the corporation. See In re MCA, Inc. Shareholders Litig., [1993 Transfer Binder] Fed. Sec. L. Rep. (CCH) 97,749, 97,57778 (Del. Ch. Feb. 12, 1993). The federal district court found that the settlement of the Delaware action barred a federal securities class action, but the Ninth Circuit reversed, and the entire question is now before the Supreme Court. See Epstein, 50 F.3d at 666.

n105. In the standard example, two individuals, who are factually guilty of a felony, are interrogated by a prosecutor who seeks a confession from each. If neither confesses, the prosecutor will be unable to obtain more than a misdemeanor confession that would result in a one-year sentence for each. If only one confesses, the prosecutor will reward that individual with a plea bargain resulting in a six-month sentence, but the other defendant will receive a ten-year sentence. If both confess, they will each be convicted of a felony and receive five years each. See R. Duncan Luce & Howard Raiffa, Games and Decisions: Introduction and Critical Survey 9497 (1957). Under this structure, it is logical for both prisoners to confess and receive five years each, even though if they both held out they would receive only one-year sentences. Thus, the outcome is Pareto-inferior.

n106. In principle, a nationwide class action can be brought in a state court, although special notice standards and a right to opt out must be recognized. See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 812 (1985).

n107. See infra text accompanying notes 123141.

n108. See McGovern, supra note 51, at 663.

n109. See, e.g., Passell, supra note 79, at B6 (describing an inventory settlement of $ 190 million in which one plaintiffs' attorney firm received $ 65 million).

REV_00262245

n110. For an example of such a class definition that excludes all but future claimants, see Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 319 (E.D. Pa. 1994).

n111. See Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 19295). It should also be emphasized that such an agreement implies that the plaintiffs' attorney cannot reach an objective, disinterested decision as to whether class resolution or individual case-by-case resolution is more in the interest of the class members (because they could not serve as individual counsel).

n112. It should be remembered that there are many asbestos defendants, and the agreement not to sue applies only to the defendants in the particular action. Hence, plaintiffs' attorneys are not truly liquidating their human capital in the field.

n113. See infra text accompanying notes 187191.

n114. Different formulas exist for computing the fee award, but the outcomes under these formulas appear in the main to be similar regardless of the formula used. See William J. Lynk, The Courts and the Plaintiffs' Bar: Awarding the Attorney's Fee in Class-Action Litigation, 23 J. Legal Stud. 185, 209 (1994). In securities class actions, the fee award will vary somewhat among the circuits, but will generally be between 20% and 30% of the recovery. See Paul, Johnson, Alston & Hunt v. Graulty, 886 F.2d 268, 273 (9th Cir. 1989) (25% benchmark fee should normally be followed); In re Oracle Sys. Sec. Litig., 852 F. Supp. 1437, 1451 (N.D. Cal. 1994) (surveying recent studies and finding 30% appropriate); In re Activision Sec. Litig., 723 F. Supp. 1373, 1378 (N.D. Cal. 1989) (benchmark fee award near 30%); In re Warner Communications Sec. Litig., 618 F. Supp. 735, 750 (S.D.N.Y. 1985) (25% fee award is norm); 1 Alba Conte, Attorney Fee Awards 2.08, at 5152 (1993).

n115. See Lester Brickman, Contingent Fees Without Contingencies: Hamlet Without the Prince of Denmark?, 37 UCLA L. Rev. 29, 3132 (1989). In the Silicone Gel breast implants class action the settlement agreement provided that administrative costs and legal fees could not exceed 24% of the total settlement fund. See Tessie Bordon, Settlement Funds Go to Pay Administrative Tab, Houston Post, Nov. 1, 1994, at A11. This settlement was approved with some minor modifications by Judge Sam Pointer. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). Although Judge Pointer did not expressly limit the contingency fees that individual attorneys could charge their clients, the existence of the 24% ceiling coupled with extensive administrative costs for notice and fund management plus the necessity of some separate fee award to class counsel made it mathematically inevitable that contingency fees would have to be reduced (at least if most claimants had secured their own counsel). The settlement also provided that the court could "make appropriate reductions" in contingency fee arrangements, and many plaintiffs' attorneys interpreted this statement to mean that a de facto ceiling would apply. See Mike McKee, Sparring Over $ 1 Billion Pot: Breast-Implant Fund Spawns Angling, Anxiety, Legal Times (Washington), May 9, 1994, at 4. Although this approach was commendable in intent, it may have resulted in a counterproductive incentive for plaintiffs' attorneys to advise their clients to opt out from the class action. See infra note 300 and accompanying text.

n116. See Brickman, supra note 115, at 78.

n117. In March 1995, the author was told by an attorney who requested anonymity but who was participating in the Silicone Gel litigation, see infra text accompanying notes 241264, that some firms in that case had large enough client inventories that they expected to receive upwards of $ 50 million simply from their clients without regard to any court-awarded fee to class counsel.

REV_00262246

n118. See Francis E. McGovern, Forward, Claims Resolution Facilities and the Settlement of Mass Torts, 53 Law & Contemp. Probs., Autumn 1990, at 1, 1. Typically, defendants negotiate a lump sum settlement and thus have no further liability even if the claims actually filed dwarf all projections and require a scaling back of the benefits.

n119. See id. at 4.

n120. For precisely this example, see infra note 286.

n121. Again, for such an example, see infra note 286.

n122. This was a major issue in Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 278 (E.D. Pa. 1994); see also infra notes 213214 and accompanying text (discussing impact of inflation on Georgine settlement). The appropriate inflation factor to use in determining the payments to future claimants is an extremely sensitive determination. In the National Gypsum mass tort bankruptcy, "the court adopted a three to four percent annual inflation rate for future settlement values," rejecting the rate of six to eight percent sought by future claimants. Dunbar & Neumann, supra note 58, at 31. Although the higher rate may better reflect recent national experience, even it probably serves as a poor proxy for determining the increased medical costs that the future claimant will face on becoming ill after a long latency period. The rate of increase in medical costs has recently exceeded the overall inflation rate by a considerable margin. See Mike Causey, HMOs May Be Best Route, Wash. Post, Aug. 18, 1995, at B2 (noting "medical cost increases that typically are double or triple the inflation rate"). A low inflation rate leaves the claimant with an inadequate settlement to pay those costs.

n123. Settlement class actions are not only common, but in some district courts appear to constitute the majority of certified class actions. Preliminary data collected by Federal Judicial Center researchers investigating class action activity in two selected district courts indicated that out of 63 motions for class certification in the Northern District of California during a two-year period, approximately 19 (or 30%) were certified for settlement purposes only; correspondingly, out of 97 motions for class certification in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, approximately 13 (or 13%) resulted in certification for settlement purposes only. See Willging et al., supra note 14, at 2324. Viewed in terms of the total classes that were certified, this data translates into a finding that roughly 54% of N.D. California certified class actions and 26% of E.D. Pennsylvania certified class actions were certified as settlement classes.

n124. See Bowling v. Pfizer, Inc., 143 F.R.D. 141, 160 (S.D. Ohio 1992) (upholding pre-certification settlement), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993).

n125. See Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 26768 (describing negotiation of settlement prior to filing of the class action); infra text accompanying notes 187191.

n126. See Girsh v. Jepson, 521 F.2d 153, 155 n.3 (3d Cir. 1975); Greenfield v. Villager Indus., 483 F.2d 824, 826, 83233 (3d Cir. 1973).

n127. This interpretation, however, plainly misreads Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23. Rule 23(a)(2) requires that for a class to be certified there must be "questions of law or fact common to the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2). If the class is to be certified under Rule 23(b)(3) (as most actions for money damages must be), then these common issues must also "predominate over any questions affecting only individual members." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). Also, Rule 23(b)(3) requires the court to determine that a "class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." Id. By focusing only on the settlement's fairness, a few courts have found the fact of a settlement largely resolves these latter issues of "predominance" and "superiority." See Georgine, 157

REV_00262247

F.R.D. at 316; Bowling, 143 F.R.D. at 160. But see In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768 (3d Cir. 1995), discussed infra note 285 and accompanying text.

n128. Consider, for example, the following judicial statement:

[A] person who unofficially represents the class during settlement negotiations may be under strong pressure to conform to the defendants' wishes. This is so because such an individual, lacking official status, knows that a negotiating defendant may not like his "attitude" and may try to reach a settlement with another member of the class.... Consequently, when the settlement is not negotiated by a court designated class representative the court must be doubly careful in evaluating the fairness of the settlement to plaintiff's class.

Ace Heating & Plumbing Co. v. Crane Co., 453 F.2d 30, 33 (3d Cir. 1971).

n129. See Manual for Complex Litigation 1.46, at 6061 (5th ed. 1982).

n130. 698 F.2d 61 (2d Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 818 (1983). For similar statements, see also Mars Steel v. Continental Ill. Nat'l Bank & Trust, 834 F.2d 677, 681 (7th Cir. 1987) (finding settlement substantively and procedurally fair because the plaintiffs' class would receive the expected value of its claim and notice was adequate); In re Beef Antitrust Litig., 607 F.2d 167, 17477 (5th Cir. 1979) (holding partial settlement fair and reasonable because it was necessary, included all defendants, and reduced the burden on settling plaintiffs), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 905 (1981).

n131. Weinberger, 698 F.2d at 73.

n132. See In re Baldwin-United Corp., 105 F.R.D. 475, 48081 (S.D.N.Y. 1984).

n133. See, e.g., In re Bendectin Prods. Liab. Litig., 749 F.2d 300 (6th Cir. 1984), rev'g 102 F.R.D. 239, 241 (S.D. Ohio 1984). As of 1986, Professor Linda Mullenix observed that "scant authority supports the proposition that a class can be certified for settlement purposes only." Mullenix, supra note 11, at 1039.

n134. In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 709, 740 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 959 (1989).

n135. Manual for Complex Litigation (Second) 30.45, at 243 (1985).

n136. Id.

n137. Manual for Complex Litigation (Third) 30.45, at 243 (1995).

n138. See Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 5 F.3d 707, 711 (3d Cir. 1993); In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 982 F.2d 721, 728 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993); see generally 2 Newberg & Conte, supra note 96, 11.27 (discussing temporary settlement classes).

n139. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *76*77 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994); see also Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 316 (E.D. Pa 1994) (finding that the fairness and adequacy of the settlement is a "predominant issue for purposes of Rule 23(b)(3)"); Bowling v. Pfizer, 143 F.R.D. 141, 160 (S.D. Ohio 1992) (approving settlement, noting "egalitarian fairness" in treating class members alike), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993). In effect, this approach means that if the court believes the settlement is fair, it can also thereby find that the "predominance" and "superiority" requirements of a Rule 23(b)(3) class action are also satisfied; these requirements are the principal doctrinal hurdles for certification of a class action seeking money damages. See infra note 142.

REV_00262248

n140. See In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 778 (3d Cir. 1995). Rule 23(a) requires findings of numerosity, typicality, commonality, and adequacy of representation, and Rule 23(b)(3) requires additional findings of superiority and predominance as to class actions certified under Rule 23(b)(3). See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a), (b)(3).

n141. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995).

n142. Rule 23(b)(3) provides that a class action may be certified if "the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available means for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 (b)(3). In shorthand, these are known as the "predominance" and "superiority" requirements.

n143. Rule 23(c)(2) provides that in any class action maintained under subdivision (b)(3), the court shall "advise each member that ... the court will exclude the member from the class if the member so requests by a specified date." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2). The right to opt out is also protected by the Due Process Clause, but only to an uncertain degree. See Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 812 (1985); Brown v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 982 F.2d 386, 392 (9th Cir. 1992), cert. dismissed, 114 S. Ct. 1359 (1994); infra notes 407439 and accompanying text.

n144. Of course, defendants can (and do) protect themselves against this danger by including a provision in the settlement agreement entitling them to back out if a specific percentage or number of class members chooses to opt out. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 325 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (noting that defendants had chosen not to exercise this right). The Silicone Gel settlement also contained such a provision, and the district court noted, even as of 1994, that the number of opt outs "raises the specter that one or more defendants may elect to withdraw from the settlement in view of the risks and costs of potential litigation with these claimants." In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *17, *23, and *65 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). Such a withdrawal or "walkaway" provision is analogous to the common provision in a merger agreement permitting the acquiring firm to elect to cancel the merger if more than a specified percentage of the stockholders of the acquired firm elect to exercise their statutory right of appraisal.

n145. See infra text accompanying notes 457470.

n146. In principle, the Bankruptcy Code prohibits confirmation of a plan of reorganization that permits a junior class to participate in the distribution unless the claims of all senior classes are paid or satisfied in full. See 11 U.S.C. 1129(b)(2) (1994). In reality, shareholders do obtain a modest share in the reorganized company alongside the former creditors. See Lynn M. LoPucki & William C. Whitford, Bargaining Over Equity's Share in the Bankruptcy Reorganization of Large, Publicly Held Companies, 139 U. Pa. L. Rev. 125, 181 (1990). Still, even if the equity receives 10 to 15% of the reorganized company because of its nuisance value, this pattern contrasts sharply with the Ahearn v. Fibreboard class action, see infra text accompanying notes 215240, where stockholders made no more than a nominal contribution to the class action settlement.

n147. See infra text accompanying notes 163171.

n148. See In re School Asbestos Litig., 789 F.2d 996, 1011 (3d Cir. 1986); In re N. Dist. of

REV_00262249

Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 857 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 459 U.S. 1171 (1983). But see Ahearn v. Fibreboard Corp., No. 6:93cv526, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11062 (E.D. Tex. July 27, 1995) (discussed infra text accompanying notes 215240).

n149. 160 F.R.D. 478, 500-02 (E.D. Pa. 1995).

n150. That is, after the court approved a revised disclosure document, defendants could circulate it to the class members who had previously opted out and request them to cancel their earlier opt out decision. Silence by the class members would leave them in the position of having opted out. This approach divides the logistical burden of canvassing the class members between the two sides.

n151. See Borel v. Fibreboard Paper Prods. Corp., 493 F.2d 1076 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 869 (1974).

n152. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 1004.

n153. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 129 B.R. 710, 736 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1991), vacated on other grounds, 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993).

n154. See id. at 746; see also Steven L. Schultz, Note, In re Joint Eastern & Southern District Asbestos Litigation: Bankrupt and Backlogged - A Proposal for Use of Federal Common Law in Mass Tort Class Actions, 58 Brook. L. Rev. 553, 560 n.39 (1992) (citing estimate of 500,000 likely deaths).

n155. Between 1989 and 1990, the number of asbestos-related personal injury case filings in federal court increased by 66%, from 8230 in 1989 to 13,687 in 1990. See Schultz, supra note 154, at 555 n.9.

n156. See Cimino v. Raymark Indus., Inc., 751 F. Supp. 649 (E.D. Tex. 1990) (consolidating asbestos cases for trial on common issues).

n157. See Michael J. Saks & Peter D. Blanck, Justice Improved: The Unrecognized Benefits of Aggregation and Sampling in the Trial of Mass Torts, 44 Stan. L. Rev. 815, 822 (1992); see also Trangsrud, Mass Trials, supra note 4, at 8082 (criticizing use of multiple phases in mass tort actions).

n158. See supra note 15.

n159. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 1004 n.235, 1054.

n160. See Saks & Blanck, supra note 157, at 82641.

n161. See Hensler & Peterson, supra note 37, at 1054.

n162. In addition, as discussed infra at notes 183191 and accompanying text, defendants benefitted from the decision to consolidate and stay all pending federal asbestos cases in 1990.

n163. At least fifteen major asbestos producers filed for bankruptcy reorganization during this period, beginning with Unarco Industries in July 1982 and Johns-Manville Corporation in August 1982. For a partial list, see Notice of Class Action, Global Settlement and Third-Party Claimant Class Settlement and Hearing at 17, Ahearn v. Fibreboard Corp., No. 6:93cv526, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11062 (E.D. Tex. July 27, 1995) [hereinafter Ahearn Class Action Notice] (on file with the Columbia Law Review). For representative decisions, see In re

REV_00262250

Johns-Manville Corp., 36 B.R. 743 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.), mandamus denied, 749 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1984); In re Amatex Corp., 30 B.R. 309 (Bankr. E.D. Pa. 1983), rev'd, 755 F.2d 1034 (3d Cir. 1985); In re UNR Indus., Inc., 29 B.R. 741 (Bankr. N.D. Ill. 1983), appeal dismissed, 725 F.2d 1111 (7th Cir. 1984).

n164. See Asbestos Ad Hoc Committee Report, supra note 69, at 14, reprinted in Asbestos Litig. Rep. at 22705.

n165. Smith, supra note 61, at 373; see also Frank R. Kennedy, Creative Bankruptcy? Use and Abuse of the Bankruptcy Law - Reflection on Some Recent Cases, 71 Iowa L. Rev. 199, 20210 (1985) (discussing Johns-Manville bankruptcy).

n166. Although the "absolute priority" rule in bankruptcy entitles creditors to be paid in full before shareholders retain any share in the bankrupt entity, the empirical reality is that shareholders possess a nuisance value which they can exploit to obtain participation in the 10 to 15% range in corporate reorganizations. See LoPucki & Whitford, supra note 146, at 17990.

n167. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473, 485 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1995).

n168. See Smith, supra note 61, at 36869.

n169. See Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. at 48586.

n170. For example, while subclasses in a class action are largely discretionary with the trial court, bankruptcy gives far more formal procedural protection to classes of creditors (including the right to a class vote). When a class of creditors votes against a plan of reorganization, the plan may only be approved under the so-called "cram down" provisions of Chapter 11, which basically require the court to find that the absolute priority rule has been complied with and that all members of the dissenting class have been paid in full. See 11 U.S.C. 1129(b) (1994). In contrast, Rule 23 requires neither approval by the class members nor satisfaction of absolute priority. The relatively open-textured liberality of Rule 23 has recently caused it to be viewed as an alternative mechanism by which even corporate bondholders might be forced to accept a reorganization plan that would not satisfy the absolute priority rule. See Richard L. Epling, Are Rule 23 Class Actions A Viable Alternative to the Bankruptcy Code?, 23 Seton Hall L. Rev. 1555, 156869 (1993).

Two recent asbestos mass tort proceedings, one resolved in bankruptcy, the other in a class action, provide a useful contrast. In In re Johns-Manville Corp., 36 B.R. 743, 759 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.), mandamus denied, 749 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1984), the court appointed a special representative for future claimants. In contrast, in Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 31719 (E.D. Pa. 1994), the court found it unnecessary to recognize special subclasses or even to appoint a guardian ad litem. Even if subclasses are recognized, however, there is no provision for a class vote, and the reaction of class members to the settlement is generally discounted by the court.

n171. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 129 B.R. 710 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1991), vacated on other grounds, 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993).

n172. See supra note 83. The CCR was formed in 1988 when the asbestos-related bankruptcy of some major participants in the Asbestos Claims Facility forced the Facility's dissolution. In addition, philosophical differences arose among its members, some of whom wished to take a harder, more adversarial stance toward plaintiffs. See Deborah R. Hensler, A Glass Half Full, a Glass Half Empty: The Use of Alternative Dispute Resolution in Mass n173. For this 60%+ estimate, see supra note 15. In the Johns-Manville bankruptcy, the court estimated the amount of compensation received by victims to be even lower (namely, only 30 cents out of every dollar expended). See Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 129 B.R. at 749.

REV_00262251

Personal Injury Litigation, 73 Tex. L. Rev. 1587, 160809 (1995).

n174. Known as "pleural plaques," such pulmonary calcification or thickening is generally believed to be caused by exposure to asbestos, and may foretell more serious future illness (including cancer), but is not by itself incapacitating. See id. at 73941.

n175. See Hensler, supra note 172, at 1608; see also Fitzpatrick, supra note 83, at 1315.

n176. See Stephen Labaton, 10 Federal Judges Agree on Plan to Consolidate Asbestos Lawsuits, N.Y. Times, Aug. 11, 1990, at 1.

n177. See In re Allied-Signal, Inc., 915 F.2d 190, 191 (6th Cir. 1990).

n178. Asbestos Ad Hoc Committee Report, supra note 69, at 19, reprinted in Asbestos Litig. Rep. at 22708.

n179. Id. at 30, reprinted in Asbestos Litig. Rep. at 22713.

n180. See In re Asbestos Prods. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp 415 (J.P.M.L. 1991).

n181. See id. at 417.

n182. See id. at 42122. As discussed infra, bankruptcy may be a much better system for dealing with future claims. The JPML also, however, appropriately stressed the absurdity of multiple awards of punitive damages to present claimants, which can work to deny recovery to future claimants.

n183. Revealingly, Philadelphia was also the federal district court with the most asbestos cases (5703) then pending on its civil docket. See Lisa Gibbs, Strategy Changes in Asbestos Cases, Miami Rev., Sept. 12, 1991, at 1, available in LEXIS, News Library, ARCNWS File. Thus, the Eastern District of Pennsylvania appears to have been the district court under the greatest pressure to achieve a global settlement. The transfer to the Eastern District of Pennsylvania was pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1407(a) (1988), which permits transfer for pretrial purposes, such as discovery and pretrial motions. In reality, however, it is well understood that relatively few cases are remanded to the transferor court, but are usually settled or resolved by the transferee court. See Chesley & Kolodgy, supra note 44, at 50910 (citing data).

n184. See supra notes 69 and 164 and accompanying text.

n185. Letter from The Honorable Robert M. Parker, Chief Judge, United States District Court, Eastern District of Texas, to The Honorable Charles R. Weiner, United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania 12 (Aug. 1, 1991) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). This letter was also circulated to a number of other federal judges prominent in mass torts litigation, including Judge Jack Weinstein, who filed it with the clerk of the district court for the Eastern District of New York. Both Judges Parker and Weiner had earlier been active in calling for concerted judicial action to resolve the asbestos litigation crisis. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 129 B.R. 710, 74649 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1991) (citing both judges as taking leading roles), vacated on other grounds, 982 F.2d 721 (2d Cir. 1992), modified sub nom. In re Findley, 993 F.2d 7 (2d Cir. 1993). Hence, the JPML was referring all asbestos personal injury cases to a known participant in the prior debate. In quoting this settlement value of other pending cases in that same field; (3) a highly concentrated [*1359] plaintiffs' bar, in which individual practitioners control exceptionally large inventories of cases, sometimes totaling in the tens of thousands; and (4) a capacity to place logistical pressure on individual courts that is simply unequalled by any other form of civil litigation. As discussed below, each of these factors tends to undercut the traditional ideal of litigant autonomy.

REV_00262252

1. The Mass Tort Evolutionary Cycle. - For understandable economic reasons, mass torts (other than mass disaster cases) do not appear overnight, but rather evolve in a predictable cyclical fashion that often involves first slow and then later exponential growth in case volume. Early in the cycle, defendants are more likely to win "because of strategic and informational superiority." [52] Later, however, the odds will shift in the plaintiffs' direction, and eventually a stable equilibrium may be reached. Predictably, as a mass tort begins to "mature" into a recognized legal specialization (as asbestos did in the 1980s), individual plaintiffs' attorneys, who have necessarily invested and developed context-specific human capital in this field, will seek to exploit their expertise by searching nationwide for individual claimants to represent. Sometimes this search process can become extraordinarily institutionalized (as, for example, during the 1980s when asbestos plaintiffs' attorneys arranged with labor unions for portable x-ray trucks to screen union workers for telltale lung scars suggesting asbestos). [53]

Both because mass tort cases involve a high commonality of issues and because the mass tort bar is highly concentrated, monetary recoveries tend to be interdependent. [54] Here, the contrast between mass tort litigation and other forms of high volume litigation is important. For [*1360] example, a victory at trial in an automobile accident case does not significantly affect the negotiations in other pending auto accident cases, [55] whereas a litigated victory in a mass tort case, in contrast, markedly affects all other cases involving the same product. Thus, if plaintiffs can develop evidence to demonstrate a causal link between exposure to a particular product and a particular illness in one case, all similar cases will acquire an enhanced settlement value.

Another factor contributing to a high growth rate is the tendency for mass tort injuries to involve long latency periods (sometimes twenty-five years or more) before victims who have been exposed to a toxic product or substance exhibit symptoms or learn that they have been injured. From the defendants' perspective, this tendency means that, even after a dangerous product has been withdrawn from the market, the defendant will likely still face decades of continuing claims as new victims predictably develop illnesses. For plaintiffs' attorneys, this means that an annual crop of new clients is obtainable if they search diligently. Plaintiffs' firms specializing in the field also have a special incentive to search for claimants in order to realize continuing returns from their investment in human capital. The asbestos litigation illustrates this tendency. It has been estimated that fifty or fewer plaintiffs' firms specialize in asbestos litigation, but that they have represented hundreds of thousands of claimants in individual actions in state and federal courts. [56] Hence, the more success these firms have, the greater their incentive to invest in search costs to identify new claimants. [57]

The blunt implication for defendants of these linked factors - the commonality of the issues in mass tort cases, the interdependence of monetary recoveries, and the long latency periods associated with many mass torts - is that they should seek to reach a global settlement of any new mass tort as early as possible in its predictable developmental cycle. Assume, for example, that a new drug is thought to be responsible for a rare form of cancer and plaintiffs' attorneys have finally been able to develop sufficient evidence of causation to win their first litigated judgment [*1361] (for $ 500,000) in an individual case. At this point, few other victims have been identified and a lump-sum settlement of $ 50,000,000 (deposited with a newly established mass tort claims facility) might seem sufficient to provide for the letter, there is no intent to suggest any breach of judicial ethics or other impropriety; the point is rather the degree to which it shows that the bench has come to self-consciously see itself as an interest group, which needs to act (and bargain) collectively.

n186. See Andrew Blum, Asbestos Group Asks for Halt to MDL, Nat'l L.J., July 13, 1992, at 7 (reporting that a majority of the 13-member plaintiffs' steering committee appointed by Judge Weiner had filed a motion with the JPML asking that the MDL proceeding be dissolved, citing in part the alleged fact that fewer than a dozen federal cases had been fully resolved in the interim).

n187. In his deposition in Georgine, Mr. Lawrence Fitzpatrick, Chief Executive Officer of the CCR, testified that: "We decided to target two law firms for our initial settlement discussions. Those firms were the firms of Ness, Motley and Greitzer & Locks." Deposition of Lawrence Fitzpatrick, Chief Executive Officer of CCR, in Joint Appendix at 119194, Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., No. 94-1925 (3d Cir. Feb. 6, 1995) [hereinafter Joint Appendix] (on file with author).

n188. Mr. Fitzpatrick testified at his deposition in response to a question as to why CCR had targeted these two firms that "Ness Motley had probably the most number of cases" Id. at 1192. Other attorneys active in mass tort litigation have commented to the author that the firm of Ness, Motley, Loadholt, Richardson & Poole is generally recognized as the largest firm (in terms of cases handled) in the asbestos field and is also active in much other mass tort litigation. Mr. Gene Locks of Greitzer & Locks has described his firm to the author as having the largest inventory of cases in the Philadelphia region.

n189. The Ness, Motley firm (on behalf of itself and other firms that had referred asbestos cases to it) was to receive $ 138,077,100 for its clients, and the Greitzer & Locks firm was to receive $ 77,417,000 for its clients. See Exhibit SP303, Total Settlement Amounts Payable to Ness, Motley and Affiliated Counsel and to Greitzer and Locks, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 1399.

n190. See Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and the Defendants Represented By the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 324, 421.

n191. See Deposition of Michael Rooney, President of CCR, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 119798. For the district court's description of this "futures provision," see Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc, 157 F.R.D. 246, 299301 (E.D. Pa. 1994). There is a substantial question, nonetheless, whether this agreement violated ABA Model Rules of Professional Conduct Rule 5.6(b) (1992) ("A lawyer shall not participate in offering or making ... an agreement in which a restriction on the lawyer's right to practice is part of the settlement of a controversy between private parties."). See Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 142 nn.174 & 175, 19293) (analyzing this issue).

n192. In discussing this action (in which the author appeared as a pro bono expert witness), the author is deliberately refraining from commenting on the specific conduct of the settling parties or the legal ethics of any attorney. The focus is instead on those issues that have recurring significance. Others have examined the ethical issues in considerable detail. See Koniak, supra note 4. For the fullest journalistic account of Georgine, see Roger Parloff, The Tort that Ate the Constitution, Am. Law., JulyAugust 1994, at 75.

n193. Joint Motion of Plaintiffs and CCR Members for Conditional Class Certification, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 302, 303.

n194. See Order No. 11, Granting Joint Motion for Class Certification, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 112.

REV_00262253

n195. See Order No. 12, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 113.

n196. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 33738 (E.D. Pa. 1994).

n197. Preliminary Injunction, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 1049, 1050.

n198. Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 319.

n199. Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 324, 35556.

n200. See Testimony of Dr. Victor Roggli, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 1363 (stating that claims for pleural disease that would fail the settlement's criteria constitute at least a plurality, and probably a majority, of all asbestos-related diseases).

n201. See Testimony of Dr. Christine Oliver, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 1379.

n202. See Exhibit B to Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 438. This exhibit is reproduced in the court's opinion. See Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 337. Victims who were found by the CCR to have "extraordinary" claims could be awarded more than the "maximum" value specified above, but only a limited number of claims (no more than 3% of compensable cancer claims and no more than 1% of compensable asbestos claims) could be found to be "extraordinary" in any one year. See Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 324, 39293. Nor, of course, was there any obligation on CCR to consider any claim "extraordinary."

n203. A claimant who is dissatisfied with the settlement offered by CCR can reject the offer and pursue an individual action in the tort system - but this right to exit the settlement is limited to 2% of the lung cancer victims, 1% of the "other cancer" victims, and .5% of the "non-malignant" victims in any particular year. If more seek to exit the settlement, the excess above these levels must wait in line, possibly for years. See Amendment to the Stipulation of Settlement of January 15, 1993 Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 511, 51618.

n204. See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473, 49596 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1995). This decision notes that the settling parties "expect that most claimants will settle their claims at scheduled values." Id. at 495. Johns-Manville was responsible for a larger market share than any individual CCR defendant (and possibly than the aggregate of all CCR defendants), but it was bankrupt, while all CCR defendants remained highly solvent.

n205. See Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 324, 382; Exhibit A to Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 43637.

n206. These figures are the limitations on these specific categories. In addition, the CCR defendants were required to make additional, but smaller, payments to a residual category of "other" claimants. See Exhibit A to Stipulation of Settlement Between the Class of Claimants and Defendants Represented by the Center for Claims Resolution, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 43637. Cumulatively, the CCR defendants could not be required to pay more than 5755 mesothelioma cases, 4185 lung cancers, and 1445 "other cancers" over the first few years of the settlement (which could only be extended beyond that point with defendants' consent). See id.

REV_00262254

n207. See Center for Claims Resolution: All Filings By Calender Year By Disease, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 140001. The district court itself acknowledged that the CCR defendants had settled 128,000 claims from 19891993 and could expect to pay 225,000 claims over the next ten years. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 279 (E.D. Pa. 1994). These figures may understate the actual figures because much of the five-year prior period overlapped with the period of the federal court stay on asbestos litigation, during which the CCR defendants resisted settlements.

n208. See Exhibit 0-170, Comparison of Greitzer & Locks Inventory Settlements with Georgine Negotiated Average Value Range and Comparison of Ness Motley Inventory Settlements with Georgine Negotiated Average Value Range, Georgine v. Amchem Prods. Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (No. 93-0215) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). The author helped prepare this exhibit and testified at the settlement hearing with respect to it. For a fuller analysis of this point, see Koniak, supra note 4 (manuscript at 12237). The Georgine court found, however, that Exhibit 0-170 did not provide "sufficient information." Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 310.

n209. See supra note 189.

n210. Even this comparison understates the disparity because an unknown percentage of the class members would be disqualified under the strict medical and exposure criteria applicable to the settlement. For example, most persons with non-malignant conditions receive no cash compensation under the settlement, while a substantial percentage of the inventory settlements fall into this category and were compensated.

n211. To believe that individuals would willingly trade compensation for severe and often disabling illnesses for greater compensation to be received only in the case of usually fatal illnesses (i.e., mesothelioma and lung cancer) requires that we believe that they would display an extreme level of risk aversion and ignore the equivalent impact on their dependents of their long-term disability. Even if some individuals would behave in this fashion, it is unlikely that all or most would. The more logical premise is that, in making insurance decisions, class members who had been occupationally exposed to asbestos would consider the financial impact on their families if they were unable to work (and, even worse, the negative cash flow their long-term disability would represent).

n212. The district court found that "the fact that non-impaired pleural claimants in the inventory settlements received immediate cash compensation where similarly situated claimants under Georgine would receive a different bundle of rights, with no immediate cash payment, was not evidence that class counsel were burdened by an impermissible conflict of interest." Georgine, 157 F.R.D at 298. To justify this disparity, the court asserted that the present claimants had gone to class counsel with a " "realistic expectation that their cases were going to be resolved in the tort system,' " while future claimants had not. Id. (quoting testimony of Professor John P. Freeman). This statement leaves unanswered the critical question: why would future claimants ever want their claims to be settled at lower values outside the tort system (at least when the defendants were highly solvent, as the CCR defendants were agreed to be)?

n213. During the 1970s, the Consumer Price Index for urban consumers (CPI-U) increased 103.4%, and during the 1980s, this same rate of increase was 64.4%. See Request by White Lung Association, et al. To Take Judicial Notice of Consumer Price Index Statistics and Explanation of Relevance of Those Statistics at 56, Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (No. 93-0215) (on file with the Columbia Law Review)

REV_00262255

(memorandum filed by Public Citizen Litigation Group in Georgine). To understand the impact of this minimal 20% adjustment, it means that in year 20 (i.e., 2014) the maximum negotiated average value that could be paid to lung cancer victims would be $ 36,000. If, however, the inflation rate over the next 19 years were 100%, it would take $ 60,000 to hold constant the real dollar award of $ 30,000, which the same claimant would receive today. See id. at 8. Moreover, the 20% figure in the settlement is only a ceiling on what might be negotiated (or arbitrated) and not a guarantee. Finally, the cost of medical expenses has increased at an even faster rate than consumer prices, see Causey, supra note 122, at B2, and asbestos victims are uniquely exposed to increases in medical expenses. In short, Georgine presents a vivid illustration of the subtle ways in which mass tort settlements discriminate against future claimants.

n214. See Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 278. Nonetheless, the court added that the settlement did not have to be perfect to be approved.

n215. No. 6:93cv526, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11062 (E.D. Tex. July 27, 1995).

n216. See Report of the Guardian Ad Litem, Eric D. Green at 68, Ahearn (No. 6:93cv526) [hereinafter Report of the Guardian Ad Litem] (on file with the Columbia Law Review).

n217. See Ahearn Class Action Notice, supra note 163, at 16. Some 17,200 new actions were filed against Fibreboard in 1988 alone, the year it was spun off. See id.

n218. See supra text accompanying note 183.

n219. See Ahearn, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11062, at *10.

n220. Ahearn Class Action Notice, supra note 163, at 23.

n221. See id.

n222. This revised agreement was expressly made subject to approval by the federal court as fair and reasonable. See id. at 24.

n223. See supra text accompanying note 185. Like Philadelphia (the forum for Georgine), the Eastern District of Texas was a district inundated with asbestos litigation. See supra note 71. Judge Parker had previously tried Cimino v. Raymark, Indus., Inc., 751 F. Supp. 649 (E.D. Tex. 1990), an innovative approach to consolidating asbestos cases. See supra text accompanying notes 156158.

n224. Ahearn Class Action Notice, supra note 163, at 24.

n225. See id. at 27.

n226. Id. at 30.

n227. Id. It should be emphasized that this entire amount would not go to one firm because Ness, Motley handled cases on referral from over 100 co-counsel in Ahearn. See id.

n228. Alternatively, the inventory settlements became operative on a favorable outcome in an action that Fibreboard had filed against its insurance carriers. Still, the bottom line here is, as the Ahearn Class Action Notice states, "approval of the Global Settlement Agreement will operate to trigger payouts in excess of $ 300 million to present claimant clients of Global Health Claimant Class Counsel." Id. at 30.

n229. Judge Parker had had extensive experience in asbestos litigation and had been a member of the Ad Hoc Commission appointed by Chief Justice Rehnquist. See supra text accompanying notes 156158 and 184186. Parker also appointed Judge Patrick Higginbotham of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit to act as Settlement Facilitator. See Ahearn Class Action Notice, supra note 163, at 23. Judge Higginbotham recommended a mandatory class action covering future claimants. See id. at 24. Unlike Georgine, the Ahearn Trust will base compensation at least in part on historical settlement values for the category of injury, see id. at 40, and will not exclude lesser injuries (including pleural plaques). See id. at 39. Claimants who reject the compensation offered by the trust are permitted to sue the trust (but only after an extended mediation process and non-binding arbitration). In the event a litigant rejects the trust's offer and sues, damages are capped at $ 500,000 per claimant and punitive damages are disallowed. See id. at 4143.

REV_00262256

n230. See Report of the Guardian Ad Litem, supra note 216, at 6869.

n231. See id. at 68.

n232. See Standard & Poor's, Daily Stock Price Record: American Stock Exchange 53 (3d Qtr. 1993). On the date of the settlement's announcement, August 30, 1993, Fibreboard's stock gained $ 4.75 to close at $ 20.25 in heavy trading on the American Stock Exchange. Correspondingly, the stock of its principle insurers - Chubb and CNA - declined on the New York Stock Exchange. See Fibreboard Settles Asbestos Claims with Insurers, UPI, Aug. 30, 1993, available in LEXIS, News Library, UPI File; see also Peter Kerr, 2 Insurers Settle on Asbestos, N.Y. Times, Aug. 31, 1993, at D1, D2 (reporting that Chubb and CNA agreed to pay Fibreboard $ 3 billion to cover individual asbestos claims). This one-day trading gain of over 25% probably understates the total gain to Fibreboard's shareholders because the settlement was actually struck on August 27 and the deal had been in active negotiations for weeks.

n233. Fibreboard's high and low stock prices for July of 1993 had been 13 and 11 1/2, respectively. The settlement was announced to the market on August 30, and Fibreboard's low price in that month had been 11 7/8. See Standard & Poor's, supra note 232, at 53.

n234. See supra text accompanying notes 163171 (discussing Johns-Manville).

n235. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(1)(B) permits a mandatory class action to be certified where "the prosecution of separate actions ... would create a risk of ... adjudications with respect to individual members of the class which would as a practical matter be dispositive of the interests of the other members not parties to the adjudications or substantially impair or impede their ability to protect their interests." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(2)(A).

n236. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(c)(2)(A) provides that class members may choose to opt out of a Rule 23(b)(3) class action. No similar right to exit exists with regard to any other class action.

n237. The answer depends ultimately on how the Supreme Court chooses to interpret its decision in Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797 (1985); see also Brown v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 982 F.2d 386, 392 (9th Cir. 1992) (holding that allowing res judicata to bar plaintiff's claims for monetary damages would be a violation of due process because plaintiff had not had the opportunity to opt out of the settlement reached in an earlier class action), cert. dismissed, 114 S. Ct. 1359 (1994). For discussion of the right to opt out, see infra text accompanying notes 407439.

n238. Absent insurance coverage, Fibreboard's assets would have been clearly insufficient to pay all asbestos claims that it faced. But as discussed above, the Fibreboard settlement was virtually limited to its insurance policies with Fibreboard contributing an additional amount ($ 10 million) that represented about 4% of its net worth. See supra text accompanying note 230.

REV_00262257

n239. See supra text accompanying notes 146, 166167.

n240. See Report of the Guardian Ad Litem, supra note 216, at 40 (concluding that "the rights of some victims to full historic compensation are likely to be impaired, as the Trust attempts to respond to the claims of others"). The settlement itself contains "spendthrift" provisions that limit the proportion of trust assets that can be paid in any one year (to protect future claimants). See Ahearn v. Fibreboard Corp., No. 6:93cv526, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11532, at *142*43 (E.D. Tex. July 27, 1995). As in Georgine, the impact of these provisions is to subordinate the less severely injured to those with more serious injuries in the event that funds are insufficient to pay all claimants. See id. at *143. Again, this raises the issue of how a single plaintiff's attorney can prefer one client's interests to those of another client.

n241. For the decision approving the settlement of this class action, see In re Silicone Gel Breast Implants Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). For earlier decisions, see 837 F. Supp. 1128 (N.D. Ala. 1993); 793 F. Supp. 1098 (J.P.M.L. 1992).

n242. Under the settlement, claimants stood to receive between $ 105,000 and $ 1.4 million each, despite relatively little consensus as to the causal linkages between breast implants and disease. See David R. Olmos & Henry Weinstein, Breast Implant Settlement in Peril, L.A. Times, May 5, 1995, at A1.

n243. For the sensible distinction of "immature" from "mature" mass torts (and the suggestion that only the latter be resolved in class actions), see McGovern, supra note 51, at 659, 69094. Interestingly, the Seventh Circuit's recent mandamus decision in In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995), which reversed the certification of a mass tort class action, occurred in the context of an obviously immature mass tort. There, a class action was asserted on behalf of hemophiliacs infected by the AIDS virus as a consequence of using defendant's products. Yet, only 13 individual actions raising similar claims had reached trial, and defendants had won 12 of these. See id. at 1296. The Seventh Circuit panel justified its decision in terms of the "extortionate" leverage such a class action unjustifiably gave plaintiffs, see id. at 129899, but this factor may be present in many (and even most) mass tort class actions. A narrower rationale might have been its immaturity.

n244. See Daniel Wise, Bar Besieged with Queries on Breast Implant Claims, N.Y. L.J., Jan. 30, 1992, at 1.

n245. See Frankel, supra note 82, at 82.

n246. See id. at 82, 90.

n247. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implants Prods. Liab. Litig., 793 F. Supp. 1098, 1101 (J.P.M.L. 1992). Judge Pointer was also a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on Asbestos Litigation appointed in 1990 by Chief Justice Rehnquist. See supra note 69.

n248. See Andrew Blum, Committee Named, Nat'l L.J., Aug. 3, 1992, at 2.

n249. For descriptions of the settlement negotiations, see Frankel, supra note 82, at 9091; Henry Weinstein, When Law, Tragedy Intersect, L.A. Times, Mar. 26, 1994, at A1; Benjamin Weiser, Feud in Breast Implant Cases Stirs Debate on Tactics, Wash. Post, May 11, 1994, at D1.

REV_00262258

n250. See Alan B. Morrison & Brian Wolfman, Representing the Unrepresented in Class Actions Seeking Monetary Relief 6162 (March 1995) (unpublished manuscript, on file with the Columbia Law Review).

n251. The court describes the $ 4,225,070,000 settlement as "reputed to be the largest such settlement ever." In re Silicone Gel Breast Implants Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *1 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). The defendants are obligated to contribute approximately $ 4.23 billion over a 30-year period, of which amount $ 1.2 billion must be paid into the Current Disease Compensation Program. See id. at *21*22. Dow Corning was scheduled to contribute approximately $ 2 billion. See id. at *79; Judge Asks Lawyers to Renegotiate Breast Implant Suit, N.Y. Times, Aug. 2, 1995, at A14. From the outset, however, there were doubts about Dow Corning's financial ability to meet its commitment, as neither its insurance carriers nor its two parents had agreed to contribute or guarantee its contribution.

n252. Several epidemiological studies have failed to find a causal connection between breast implants and any specific illness, and an FDA Advisory Panel recommended in 1991 that implants should remain on the market. See Gina Kolata, Legal System and Science Come to Differing Conclusions on Silicone, N.Y. Times, May 16, 1995, at D6. The most recent of these studies, conducted by physicians at the Harvard Medical School, finds no association between implants and illness. See Gina Kolata, New Study Finds No Link Between Implants and Illness, N.Y. Times, June 22, 1995, at A18. It should be understood, however, that plaintiffs' legal theories were not limited to claims that breast implants caused illness, but also that they masked detection of other illnesses, such as breast cancer, by preventing detection through mammography. See Statement by David A. Kessler, Commissioner, Food and Drug Administration and D. Bruce Burlington, Director, Center for Devices and Radiological Health, Public Health Service, Department of Health and Human Services, Before the Subcomm. on Human Resources and Intergovernmental Relations, Comm. on Government Reform and Oversight, 104th Cong., 1st Sess., Federal Document Clearing House, Aug. 1, 1995, available in LEXIS, News Library, CURNWS File.

n253. To be sure, the settlement's size may also provide support for Judge Posner's thesis that mass tort class actions generate extortionate leverage. See In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 129899 (7th Cir. 1995). Another explanation is that the courts themselves were not under the same pressure to reach a global settlement (at any cost) in the Silicone Gel litigation as they were in asbestos cases, because individual suits were less likely to have a material impact on the federal docket. This forms the alternative hypothesis: that pressure on the judicial system yields poor settlements for victims.

n254. See Thomas M. Burton, Breast-Implant Claims Fund May Need $ 3 Billion More, Preliminary Study Says, Wall St. J., May 17, 1995, at A4.

n255. See Silicone Gel, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *5, *20; Olmos & Weinstein, supra note 242, at A1.

n256. See Barnaby J. Feder, Dow Corning's Bankruptcy: The Impact on Implant Suits, N.Y. Times, May 21, 1995, at F9. Of these approximately 400,000 claimants, some 137,000 claimed to have already experienced compensable illness. See Olmos & Weinstein, supra note 242, at A13.

n257. See Silicone Gel, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *17.

n258. See David S. Hilzenrath, Renegotiation Order May Undo $ 4 Billion Implant Settlement, Wash. Post, May 5, 1995, at F1.

n259. Thus, those expecting to receive the maximum ($ 1.4 million) or the minimum ($

REV_00262259

105,000) would now expect $ 70,000 or $ 5250, respectively. See Michael Unger, Breast Implant Claim Fund Falls Far Short, N.Y. Newsday, June 17, 1995, at A6.

n260. See Court Analysis: $ 4.25 Billion Inadequate for Implant Claims, Sacramento Bee, June 17, 1995, at A14 [hereinafter Court Analysis: $ 4.25 Billion Inadequate]. A month earlier, the additional contribution had been estimated at $ 3 billion. See Burton, supra note 254, at A4.

n261. See Barnaby J. Feder, Dow Corning in Bankruptcy Over Lawsuits, N.Y. Times, May 16, 1995, at A1.

n262. See 11 U.S.C. 362 (1994).

n263. Class members can, of course, opt out to file against co-defendants, but Dow Corning has long been the largest producer of silicone breast implants. See Feder, supra note 261, at A1.

n264. Just prior to its bankruptcy filing, Dow Corning estimated that there were 1500 individual actions pending against it by women who had opted out of the settlements. See Thomas M. Burton, Dow Corning Considers Filing for Chapter 11, Wall St. J., May 5, 1995, at A3, A4. Large as this number may seem, it pales in comparison to the number of asbestos actions pending against the CCR defendants (who did not elect to file for bankruptcy protection). Moreover, many of these implant cases probably had weak litigation merits. Judge Pointer found in approving the settlement that some 14,300 persons had opted out, of whom 6500 were outside the United States. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implants Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *17 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994). Such foreign claimants have little chance at a substantial recovery if foreign law is applicable to their claim. Hence, only the 7800 domestic opt outs could bring a viable action (if they became ill with a silicone-related illness). In short, the domestic opt outs were small in proportion to those who might opt out. The critical point is that if Dow Corning had delayed its bankruptcy petition until after benefits were scaled back or after it had become obvious that the class action settlement was about to "crater," then a much larger number of claimants would have opted out at that point and been swept into the bankruptcy reorganization process; this could have shifted control of Dow Corning away from its two parents if these tort claims were settled for stock (pursuant to the usual procedures in mass tort bankruptcies by which settlement trusts are created). See supra text accompanying notes 165166.

n265. Mass disaster class actions involving a single discrete explosion, crash or accident have in the past been more common than mass exposure class actions. Because a single accident usually involves greater homogeneity among the victims and is less likely to involve latency periods and future claimants, it is more susceptible to class treatment. For an example of a mass accident class action, see In re Shell Oil Refinery, 155 F.R.D. 552 (E.D. La. 1993) (settlement of $ 170 million approved for personal injury and property claims). A key reason that defendants prefer a class action in this context is that they can seek a mandatory, non-opt out class for punitive damages. For a recent example, see Notice of Class Action and Proposed Settlement, In Re GCC Richmond Works Cases, Judicial Council Coordination Proceeding No. 2906 (Cal. Super. Ct., Contra Costa County, Aug. 15, 1993) (on file with the Columbia Law Review) (certifying "Mandatory Punitive Damage Class" with regard to release of sulphuric gas by chemical plant).

n266. The facts discussed in the text are taken from the Notice of Pendency of Class Action, Proposed Settlement of Class Action, and Fairness Hearing, Hayden v. Atochem N. Am., Inc. (In re Bryan, Tex., Chem. Exposure Litig.), No. H-92-1054 (S.D. Tex. April 10, 1995) [hereinafter Hayden, Notice of Pendency] (on file with the Columbia Law Review). This litigation has been the subject of some press attention, largely because of the decision of Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, a public interest law firm, to oppose the proposed settlement. See Wade Lambert, Public-Interest Law Group Fights Some Class Settlements as Unfair, Wall St. J., Aug. 17, 1995, at B4.

REV_00262260

n267. The class periods for personal injuries, wrongful death and medical monitoring claims ran from January 1, 1973 to April 10, 1995. See Hayden, Notice of Pendency, supra note 266, at 1.

n268. See id. at 2. Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, the principal objector to the proposed settlement, pointed out in its amicus curiae brief that the First, Second, Third and Fourth Amended Complaints in Hayden sought class certification under Rule 23(b)(3) and did not include personal injury claims. Only the Fifth Amended Complaint, filed in 1995, alleged personal injuries. See Brief of Amicus Curiae Trial Lawyers For Public Justice In Opposition to the Proposed Class Settlement at 4 & n.4, Hayden (No. H-92-1054) [hereinafter Amicus Curiae Brief] (on file with the Columbia Law Review).

n269. See Amicus Curiae Brief, supra note 268, at 56. The class action was certified as a settlement class action under Rule 23(b)(2) on April 10, 1995. See Hayden, Notice of Pendency, supra note 266, at 3.

n270. The basic significance of a Rule 23(b)(2) class action is that there is no right to opt out (which exists only in the case of a Rule 23(b)(3) class action). Rule 23(b)(2) requires the parties seeking class certification to show that "the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class, thereby making appropriate final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2).

n271. For an early decision finding in the context of a labor and antitrust dispute that courts should prefer certification under Rule 23(b)(1) when injunctive relief is sought, see Robertson v. National Basketball Ass'n, 389 F. Supp. 867, 903 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (when a choice exists, court should certify class of present and future NBA basketball players under Rule 23(b)(1), and not Rule 23(b)(3), in order to ensure that there is no right to opt out), aff'd 556 F.2d 682 (2d Cir. 1977).

n272. See Stipulation of Settlement at 2223, Hayden (No. H-92-1054) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). Defendants also claimed that the principal defendant was on the brink of insolvency. This argument was highly debatable because an economist testified that the defendant (Elf Atochem North America, Inc.) had a net shareholder investment of $ 529 million, but it supplied the basis for a "limited fund" argument which, as in Ahearn, might independently support a mandatory class action. See Amicus Curiae Brief, supra note 268, at 78.

n273. See Lawrence J. Restieri, Jr., Note, The Class Action Dilemma: The Certification of Classes Seeking Equitable Relief and Monetary Damages After Ticor Title Insurance Co. v. Brown, 63 Fordham L. Rev. 1745, 1747 (1995). For decisions employing this predominance test, see Probe v. State Teachers' Retirement System, 780 F.2d 776, 780 (9th Cir.) (action should be certified under Rule 23(b)(2) where primary relief sought was injunctive even though money damages also sought), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1170 (1986); Duran v. Credit Bureau of Yuma, Inc., 93 F.R.D. 607, 609 (D. Ariz. 1982) (certifying action under Rule 23(b)(3) where primary motive was recovery of damages); see also 1 Newberg & Conte, supra note 96, 4.14, at 4-48 to 4-49 (discussing test).

n274. See Hayden, Notice of Pendency, supra note 266, at 1 (cash payments in settlement total $ 55,070,000 plus "possible additional funds derived from pending litigation against third parties"). The "possible additional funds" depend on the outcome of litigation brought against the defendants' insurance carriers. However, the settlement also provides that

REV_00262261

Atochem will keep 48 3/4% out of the first $ 90 million received from insurance carriers, even though future claimants may not have received anything. See id. at 4. Thus, it is possible that Atochem will be reimbursed nearly in full from its insurance while some claimants with "extraordinary claims" will receive nothing.

n275. Class counsel will seek attorneys' fees from the settlement fund in an amount not to exceed $ 18,358,333 and actual expenses in an amount not to exceed $ 3.25 million. See id. at 6. These two amounts, if received, would amount to slightly more than 39.7% of the $ 55,070,000 settlement fund.

n276. On April 10, 1995, United States District Court Judge Calvin Botley certified the class action under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) for settlement purposes. A fairness hearing was held on June 8, 1995, but no final decision had been rendered as of September 1, 1995. See id. at 3.

n277. Thirty percent of the settlement fund (after deduction of attorneys' fees and expenses) is allocated to a property damage fund. This amount cannot be reallocated to future personal injury if the personal injury settlement fund proves inadequate. See Exhibit A, Protocol for Distribution of the Settlement Fund at 5, in Hayden, Notice of Pendency, supra note 266.

n278. Section XII of the Protocol for Distribution of the Settlement Fund sets forth an elaborate formula to quantify the risk to present claimants based on the duration of their exposure and their relative proximity to the plant. See id. at 89. Actual injuries or illnesses resulting from arsenic exposure are treated as "extraordinary claims" by Section XIII and their handling is largely entrusted to the discretion of the special master. See id. at 11.

n279. See Amicus Curiae Brief, supra note 268, at 6 (citing affidavit of plaintiff's own expert Dr. Stuart Lloyd Shalat).

n280. See id. at 5 (citing plaintiffs' counsel's estimate than the class "has approximately 26,000 residents and somewhere around 5,300 residential properties and perhaps three thousand to thirty-five hundred other types of properties").

n281. Exhibit A, Protocol for Distribution of the Settlement Fund at 12, in Hayden, Notice of Pendency, supra note 266.

n282. See id.

n283. This is probably because such a class action would have great difficulty satisfying the "commonality" requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) or the "superiority" requirement of Rule 23(b)(3). See infra text accompanying notes 362382.

n284. See In re Ford Motor Co. Bronco II Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CA MDL-991, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3507 (E.D. La. Mar. 20, 1995).

n285. See In re General Motors Corp. Pick-up Truck Fuel Tank Prod. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768 (3d Cir. 1995) (overturning settlement approved by the district court). Earlier, a Texas appellate court rejected a parallel settlement involving only Texas residents who purchased GM pickup trucks. See Bloyed v. General Motors Corp., 881 S.W.2d 422 (Tex. Ct. App. 1994).

n286. See Settlement Agreement, Beeman v. Shell Oil Co., No. 93-47363 (Tex. Dist. Ct., Harris County 1994) [hereinafter Beeman Settlement Agreement] (undated draft, on file with the Columbia Law Review). Filed as a nationwide class action in a Texas state court in September 1993, this action was brought against Shell Oil, DuPont, and Hoechst, who were unknown number of future claimants. If, however, a global settlement is not reached at this point, the magnitude of the individual recovery and the estimates of future claimants may soon grow.

REV_00262262

Early in the "maturation" of a mass tort, defendants can economize on settlement costs by offering a reduced amount per known claim and by seeking to underestimate the number of future claimants expected to develop injuries and thus achieve a low-cost global settlement. Although actuarial techniques for estimation of future claimants exist and have been used in mass tort bankruptcies, different experts have produced widely varying estimates, [58] and even the projections of the most reliable experts come with a fifty percent margin of error. [59] Finally, the parties [*1362] have little incentive to use such techniques if they know that their use will only reveal underfunding of that portion of the settlement reserved for future claimants. [60] Both in the bankruptcy and class action contexts, this same tendency for underestimation (and hence undercompensation) of future claimants has been evident. [61]

Other reasons also make early settlements desirable for defendants. At an early stage in the development of a mass tort, the plaintiffs' bar may not have developed the expertise or financial resources that they will later assemble and hence will be at a greater disadvantage vis-a-vis defendants. The first litigated victories may be for amounts well below that which will be recovered once more evidence is uncovered (particularly if there is evidence that the defendants suppressed data and knew the risks). Psychological evidence also suggests that courts and fact-finders will feel comfortable in awarding far less in a lump-sum settlement to a "hypothetical" class of future claimants than they would award to actually injured victims appearing before them in individual cases. This phenomenon is known as the "vividness effect." [62] Finally, because only a relatively small percentage of individuals exposed to most toxic substances will actually develop compensable physical injuries, members of the future claimant class can be expected to be rationally apathetic about their future legal rights - until the point at which they themselves develop injuries. Put differently, a rational individual with less than a one percent risk of developing lung cancer from exposure to tobacco products, asbestos, or some other toxic product will understandably invest very little time, attention, or money to protect legal rights that he or she does not expect (or want) [*1363] to exercise. In any event, the early experience in both bankruptcy cases and class actions has been that future claimants do far less well than present claimants in terms of the per claimant recovery.

2. The Impact on the Judiciary. - The concentrated logistical impact of mass torts on the judiciary may be the most important factor in understanding the landscape of mass torts. During the mid- to late 1980s, the perception grew that, unless checked, mass tort cases would soon inundate the federal docket. [63] In some courts, mass tort claims accounted for over twenty-five percent of the entire civil caseload. [64] By 1990, asbestos litigation represented seventy-five percent of all new federal product liability filings [65] and had become the largest single category of personal injury litigation. [66] Little reason existed to believe that the rate of filings would decline substantially in the foreseeable future; rather, by 1990, two new asbestos cases were filed each year for every one case resolved. [67] A sense of crisis clearly pervaded the federal judiciary, [68] as multiple commissions and study groups warned of dire consequences unless the mass tort case explosion could be brought under control. [69] In such an envi [*1364] ronment, some judges and academics came to believe that emergency conditions justified an emergency solution - in short, that the end of saving the federal docket justified means that otherwise might seem improper. [70] In truth, the impact of asbestos litigation was highly uneven and localized. [71] But the decisions legitimizing the mass tort class action came from precisely those courts most under stress. [72]

REV_00262182

the principal makers of polybutylene plastic pipe, which had been installed in over six million American homes. See Adam Bryant, Plastic Pipe Makers Plan to Settle Lawsuit, N.Y. Times, Oct. 25, 1994, at D4. The action resulted in a settlement class and a proposed settlement under which the defendants would be obligated to pay eligible claims (if made) of up to $ 750 million. If claims exceed this amount, defendants could elect to pay additional claims, or, if they refuse, plaintiffs could sue in state court under a tolled statute of limitations. See Beeman Settlement Agreement, supra, at 1213, 1617. The actual payment by defendants would, of course, depend on the extent of the claims made, but the parties described this settlement as the largest property damage class action settlement in U.S. history. See Bryant, supra, at D4. Nonetheless, both the settlement agreement and the negotiation process leading up to it revealed some of the same suspicious features that have characterized mass tort personal injury class actions: namely, inventory settlements and severe eligibility restrictions. For example, the objectors to the Beeman settlement alleged that since January 1994, the defendants had paid "approximately $ 88 million to proposed plaintiff's counsel" with regard to the latter's individual cases, resulting in estimated contingency "fees of approximately $ 40 million" (in addition to the proposed class action attorney fee award of $ 24.25 million). Letter from Robert B. Gerard, Esq., Counsel to the Objectors in Beeman, to John C. Coffee, Jr. (Dec. 20, 1994) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). Allegedly, these inventory settlements were reached only with "proposed class counsel that support Beeman." Id. In addition, the settlement agreement, itself, contained a variety of technical exclusions that would disqualify an indeterminate number of potential class members from eligibility for full replumbing. For example, because polybutylene pipe is heat sensitive, it often fails near water heaters, but any failure within a specified distance of a water heater was expressly excluded by the settlement agreement from receiving full replumbing. See Beeman Settlement Agreement, supra, at 18. Objectors estimated that less than 17% of the individual clients that they represented would qualify under the "quirky" terms of the Beeman settlement agreement. See Letter from Robert B. Gerard, Esq., Counsel to the Objectors in Beeman, to John C. Coffee, Jr. (Dec. 22, 1994) (on file with the Columbia Law Review). Ultimately, after the usual war of recriminations between the opposing camps of plaintiffs' counsel, the court declined to approve the settlement in February 1995 (but did not write an opinion). See Maryann Haggerty, Settlement is Thrown Out in Suit Over Plastic Pipes, Wash. Post, Feb. 22, 1995, at F1.

n287. The Ford Bronco II litigation may represent the extreme example of a settlement offering only illusory benefits to class members. At issue was the alleged tendency of the utility vehicle "to roll over completely at relatively moderate speeds." Milo Geyelin & Neal Templin, Ford Attorneys Played Unusually Large Role in Bronco II's Launch, Wall St. J., Jan. 5, 1993, at 1. Under the proposed settlement, the class members would receive a "Utility Vehicle Package," consisting of (1) a video describing the vehicle and how it should be driven; (2) a sun-visor sticker that warned the driver how to operate the vehicle; and (3) an owner's guide supplement - and no cash. See Ford Bronco II, 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3507, at *2. In addition, each member of the settlement class was invited to receive a free inspection, but repairs were at the customer's expense. These "benefits" seem largely intended to give rise to an "assumption of risk" or contributory negligence defense in any subsequent personal injury litigation against Ford if the driver arguably failed to comply with the manufacturer's instructions.

Although the Ford Bronco II settlement was rejected, similar attempts persist to certify mass tort property damage class actions involving little or no discernible monetary benefit for class members. See Nichole M. Christian, Chrysler Pact Could Block Minivan Suits, Wall St. J., Sept. 28, 1995, at B3 (discussing proposed class action settlement that would require Chrysler to replace faulty door latch handles, as Chrysler had already ageed to do in voluntary settlement with a federal agency, but would not provide cash compensation, except for $ 5 million in requested plaintiffs' attorneys' fees).

n288. In the Beeman polybutylene litigation, discussed supra at note 286, the Texas court's rejection of the settlement led to the filing of a nationwide federal class action, which the plaintiffs claimed could result in an estimated $ 7 billion in damages. See Jenny Luesby, Shell & Hoechst to be Sued in U.S. Over House Pipes, Fin. Times, July 7, 1995, at 4. DuPont, which was scheduled to pay an estimated $ 70 million under the rejected settlement, quickly agreed to contribute up to $ 120 million to the revised settlement. See Peter Fairley, DuPont Gets Conditional Okay for Polybutylene Settlement, Chemical Wk., June 7, 1995, at 13. Such a $ 50 million increase within several months of the original settlement's rejection may suggest that the original settlement was cheap. Then, in August 1995, Hoechst Celanese and Shell Oil agreed to a class action settlement under which they agreed, apparently on terms similar to those of the earlier settlement, to pay eligible claims (if made) of up to $ 850 million. This settlement, in conjunction with the DuPont recovery, would imply a $ 970 million total settlement, or a seeming $ 220 million improvement in less than a year. See David Rotman, Hoechst Celanese, Shell Agree to $ 850-Million Pipe Settlement, Chemical Wk., Aug. 9, 1995, at 13.

REV_00262263

Assesments of the polybutylene litigation are complicated, however, by the fierce battle among the defendants. At the time that DuPont agreed to a revised $ 120 million settlement in Alabama state court, it also received as a condition of its settlement immunity from cross-claims by the other defendants. On this basis, objectors to this revised settlement argued that DuPont had effectively "capped" its liability at 8% of the cost of plumbing repairs and was liable for that amount only if the other defendants contributed the remaining 92%. See Letter from Arthur H. Bryant, Executive Director, Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, to John C. Coffee, Jr. 4 (Sept. 20, 1995) (on file with author). On this basis, DuPont would not have increased its contribution, but only reduced its maximum exposure, and class members would have gained little from this revised settlement.

This Article does not attempt to resolve the charges and countercharges among the parties in Beeman, but their disputes once again point out both the difficulties that courts face in monitoring mass tort settlements (where the parties alone possess the critical information) and the possibility of reverse auctions by which defendants may reach non-adversarial settlements with a "friendly" or dissident plaintiffs' attorney. Here, it is at least arguable that DuPont has cut a favorable deal with a cooperative plaintiffs' attorney that makes both class members and other defendants worse off.

n289. For a representative decision, expressing exactly this theme, see In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1995).

n290. See Feder, supra note 256, at F9.

n291. Of the 440,000 women who registered under the settlement, some 70,000 of them appeared "to qualify for immediate compensation, far beyond the 6,000 originally anticipated." Linda Himelstein et al., A Breast-Implant Deal Comes Down to the Wire, Bus. Wk., Sept. 4, 1995, at 88, 88. Thus, present claimants exceeded projections by more than tenfold and the number of eventual future claimants necessarily remains uncertain.

n292. See Court Analysis: $ 4.25 Billion Inadequate, supra note 260, at A14.

n293. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implants Prods. Liab. Litig., 793 F. Supp. 1098, 1098 n.1 (J.P.M.L. 1992).

n294. Interestingly, it was possibly easier to estimate the likely number of claims in Silicone Gel than in a mass exposure case (such as asbestos) because the approximate number of implants sold was known. See Morrison & Wolfman, supra note 250, at 28.

n295. Gina Kolata, A Case of Justice, or a Total Travesty?: How the Battle Over Breast Implants Took Dow Corning to Chapter 11, N.Y. Times, June 13, 1995, at D1.

REV_00262264

n296. Current estimates suggest that benefits under the settlement will be cut back so that class members will receive at most 12% to 16% and at worst less than 5% of the scheduled efforts. See Unger, supra note 259, at A6. Errors of this magnitude are difficult to attribute solely to negligence or poor judgment. Defendants may have been content to create an inadequate settlement fund, which terminated their liability, and plaintiffs' attorneys had only limited incentives to contest this inadequacy.

n297. As of early September 1995, the Silicone Gel settlement appeared to be headed in this direction as some corporate defendants had begun separate negotiations with the plaintiffs' attorneys. See Barry Meier, Risks in Separate Deals on Breast-Implant Suits, N.Y. Times, Sept. 1, 1995, at D3. For claimants, this involves two distinct risks. First, many may be unable to identify the maker of the implant they received, and thus individual defendant settlements effectively translate into increased eligibility requirements. Second, there is increased risk that an individual settlement fund may prove inadequate. In effect, industry-wide pooling protects claimants against disparities in outcomes because of the differing claims experiences of individual defendants. See infra note 299.

n298. See supra text accompanying notes 5862.

n299. The Silicone Gel experience may also teach defendants to arrange for "settlement class" actions to be filed against them alone and not against their entire industry. Both Georgine and Silicone Gel were industry-wide class actions, and in that context it is far less credible to claim that the entire industry's insurance resources constitute a "limited fund." In contrast, Ahearn may teach defendants to seek individual class settlements and then ask the court to certify the class as a mandatory class based on the individual corporation's "limited" assets. In addition, such individual settlements inherently tighten eligibility requirements as each claimant must prove that he or she purchased from that defendant. See supra note 297.

n300. The Silicone Gel breast implant settlement provided that no more than 24% of the total fund, or $ 1.01 billion, could be spent on administrative or legal costs. See Bordon, supra note 115, at A11. Uniquely, this provision required that all legal fees, including individual contingency fees, come from the separate fund, and not from individual clients. See McKee, supra note 115, at 4. In turn, this implied that, as the administrative costs of sending notice to class members or administering the settlement fund rose, fee awards to plaintiffs' attorneys would have to fall. See Bordon, supra note 115, at A11. Although the 24% ceiling applied to aggregate expenses only and Judge Pointer pledged himself to seek to honor private contingency contracts between attorney and client, the combination of high administrative costs plus the need to award a separate fee to class counsel (from this same fund) made some reduction in contingency fees likely. Indeed, the settlement agreement provided that the judge could "make appropriate reductions" in privately negotiated contingency fees in order to stay within the ceiling. See McKee, supra note 115, at 4. Plaintiffs' attorneys in the Silicone Gel case read the settlement as intending to limit most contingency fees to 24% (or less). As an inevitable result, an incentive arose for plaintiffs' attorneys to advise their clients to opt out from the class action in order to escape the settlement's 24% ceiling, even if the client would fare better under the class action.

n301. See Brickman, supra note 115, at 113.

n302. See supra notes 5859 and accompanying text (discussing Johns-Manville and National Gypsum mass tort reorganization proceedings). In part, this difference may reflect the bankruptcy courts' lesser concern with the status of the federal civil docket. Even more likely, it reflects the fact that future claimants must contend with other creditor classes in bankruptcy proceedings for shares of the same economic pie.

REV_00262265

n303. See supra text accompanying notes 163171.

n304. See infra note 468 and accompanying text.

n305. Commentators have long viewed the fee award standard as the court's primary weapon by which to regulate the private attorney general. See Coffee, Understanding the Plaintiff's Attorney, supra note 13, at 69092; John Leubsdorf, The Contingency Factor in Attorney Fee Awards, 90 Yale L.J. 473, 47374 (1981).

n306. Part II of this Article has hopefully illustrated this point. Both Georgine and Ahearn were framed as exclusively "future claims" class actions. See supra text accompanying notes 192204, 215240.

n307. See supra notes 145147, 163171 and accompanying text.

n308. The most recent example is National Gypsum Co., which emerged from an asbestos-related bankruptcy in July 1993. By the fall of 1994, the settlement trust created to resolve asbestos claims was asserting that its assets fell $ 160 million short of the level necessary to fund expected claims; its trustees are now seeking this amount from National Gypsum. See Martha Brannigan, National Gypsum Makes An Unlikely Takeover Target, Wall St. J., Mar. 6, 1995, at B4; see also In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473, 48587 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1995) (discussing insolvency of Johns-Manville Settlement Trust).

n309. There appears to be a conflict among the circuits on this point. See infra notes 337341 and accompanying text. At least in some circuits, only claims that have accrued under state or federal law are cognizable claims that may be discharged in a bankruptcy reorganization. See Schweitzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 758 F.2d 936, 94142 (3d Cir. 1985) (holding that since plaintiffs' injuries were not manifest until after the bankruptcy, their claims had not "accrued" under federal law and therefore could not be discharged); In re M. Frenville Co., 744 F.2d 332, 337 (3d Cir. 1984) (only claims that have accrued under state law may be discharged in bankruptcy), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 1160 (1985).

n310. See, e.g., Moore v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Bd. of Educ., 402 U.S. 47, 48 (1971); Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 95 (1968); United States v. Johnson, 319 U.S. 302, 305 (1943); Muskrat v. United States, 219 U.S. 346, 361 (1911); Pennsylvania Ass'n for Retarded Children v. Pennsylvania, 343 F. Supp. 279, 290 (E.D. Pa. 1972); Teamsters Local 513 v. Wojcik, 325 F. Supp. 989, 99192 (E.D. Pa. 1971).

n311. " "Concrete adverseness,' " the Court has said in this regard, " "sharpens the presentation of issues.' " Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 804 (1985) (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962)).

n312. See In re General Motors Corp. Pick-Up Truck Fuel Tank Prods. Liab. Litig., 55 F.3d 768, 790 n.10 (3d Cir. 1995) ("some courts have even expressed concern that ... [settlement class action] cases do not present a case or controversy for Article III purposes."); infra note 441 and accompanying text.

n313. See Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 55960 (1992); Flast, 392 U.S. at 95 (case or controversy requirement assures that "federal courts will not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of government").

n314. New Jersey, Dep't of Envt'l Protection & Energy v. Heldor Indus., Inc., 989 F.2d 702, 707 nn.67 (3d Cir. 1993).

n315. See Bender v. Williamsport Area Sch. Dist., 475 U.S. 534, 54142 (1986).

REV_00262266

n316. Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975) (quoting Baker, 369 U.S. at 204).

n317. See Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984).

n318. 504 U.S. 555 (1992); see also United States v. Hays, 115 S. Ct. 2431, 2435 (1995) (discussing Lujan standing doctrine).

n319. Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560.

n320. There is no standard definition of this term. Two recent commentators defined a future claim as "a claim against a debtor for an injury or disease that has not yet become manifest at the time the debtor has filed for bankruptcy, but is based upon the occurrence, prior to the bankruptcy, of one or more material events, acts, or failures to act." Ralph R. Mabey & Jamie A. Gavrin, Constitutional Limitations on the Discharge of Future Claims in Bankruptcy, 44 S.C. L. Rev. 745, 750 (1993). As discussed, some courts would not accept this definition.

n321. This category could be further subdivided into those who have suffered an injury, which is detectable (such as pleural plaques in the case of asbestos victims), but have no awareness of it, and those whose injuries are not yet detectable at all (but who simply have a statistically higher risk of future injury because of their exposure).

n322. This fact pattern arises inevitably in cases involving environmental contamination or latent property damage. If a community has been exposed to a contaminant involving a long-term risk (i.e., a pesticide or air pollution containing a toxic chemical), defendants may seek to structure a settlement that will apply to future homeowners as well who thereafter acquire property or move into homes within the affected location. In this author's view, such a future claim clearly flunks any acceptable Article III test.

n323. See Class Action Complaint, in Joint Appendix, supra note 187, at 267, 285.

n324. Generally, these cases require that there must be some physical injury to justify an award of damages for emotional distress. See Ball v. Joy Technologies, Inc., 958 F.2d 36, 3839 (4th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 1033 (1992); Sterling v. Velsicol Chem. Corp., 855 F.2d 1188, 120506 (6th Cir. 1988); Adams v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 783 F.2d 589, 593 (5th Cir. 1986); Werlein v. United States, 746 F. Supp. 887, 906 (D. Minn. 1990), vacated, 793 F. Supp. 898 (D. Minn. 1992); Maddy v. Vulcan Materials Co., 737 F. Supp. 1528, 1534 (D. Kan. 1990); In re Hawaii Fed. Asbestos Cases, 734 F. Supp. 1563, 1569 (D. Haw. 1990). On the other hand, some decisions dealing with insurance issues recognize that "the body incurs microscopic injury as asbestos fibers become lodged in the lungs and as surrounding tissue reacts to the fibers thereafter." Keene Corp. v. Insurance Co. of N. Am., 667 F.2d 1034, 1042 (D.C. Cir. 1981).

n325. 38 Am. Jur. 2d Fright, Shock and Mental Disturbance 55 (1968).

n326. Schweitzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 758 F.2d 936, 942 (3d Cir. 1985); see also Zulkowski v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 852 F.2d 73, 76 (3d Cir. 1988) (recognizing that Schweitzer held that a "manifest injury is a prerequisite for a FELA action for an asbestos-related injury"); Deleski v. Raymark Indus., 819 F.2d 377, 38081 (3d Cir. 1987) (noting that under New Jersey and Pennsylvania law neither the enhanced risk of disease nor the fear and emotional distress resulting therefrom are compensable unless accompanied by present physical symptoms of illness or injury).

n327. See Robinson v. Vaughn, No. 91-7646, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19518, at *4*5 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 2, 1992); Alim v. Vaughn, No. 91-4348, 1992 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12503, at *4 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 18, 1992); Hannibal v. Lyons, No. 89-5845, 1990 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 8261, at *2 (E.D.

REV_00262267

Pa. July 2, 1990).

n328. 397 U.S. 150 (1970); see also Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (noting that in order to confer standing, the injury must be "distinct and palpable" and not abstract, conjectural, or hypothetical). Data Processing is, of course, a decision primarily concerned with judicial review of federal administrative action, a context far removed from civil litigation for money damages.

n329. See Carlough v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 834 F. Supp. 1437, 144748, 1454 (E.D. Pa. 1993).

n330. 438 U.S. 59, 74 (1978). Another example of such an injunctive action is Helling v. McKinney, 113 S. Ct. 2475, 248081 (1993), where a prisoner successfully alleged that exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke amounted to an "injury-in-fact" for purposes of a cruel and unusual punishment claim.

n331. The statute (the Price-Anderson Act) limited the liability of a plant owner in the event of a nuclear accident, and, after addressing standing, the Court upheld the Act against all asserted constitutional infirmities. Addressing the standing issue, the Court said that "certainly the environmental and aesthetic consequences of the thermal pollution of the two lakes in the vicinity of the disputed power plants is the type of harmful effect which ... [satisfies] the "injury in fact' standard." Duke Power Co., 438 U.S. at 7374.

n332. Id. at 74.

n333. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(B), (b)(2), (c)(3). Nonetheless, some argue that future claimants should not even be included in Rule 23(b)(2) class actions. See Elizabeth R. Kaczynski, Note, The Inclusion of Future Members in Rule 23(b)(2) Class Actions, 85 Colum. L. Rev. 397, 403 (1985).

n334. U.S. Const. art. I, 8, cl. 4.

n335. See Hanover Nat'l Bank v. Moyses, 186 U.S. 181, 192 (1902).

n336. See Louisville Joint Stock Land Bank v. Radford, 295 U.S. 555, 589 (1935). There has been a lively debate on the nature and stringency of these Fifth Amendment limitations. Compare Anne Hardiman, Toxic Torts and Chapter 11 Reorganization: The Problem of Future Claims, 38 Vand. L. Rev. 1369, 137780, 139293 (1985) (characterizing constitutional difficulties facing use of representatives for future claimants in the bankruptcy context as "significant but not insurmountable") and Mabey & Gavrin, supra note 320, at 77184 (concluding that Fifth Amendment's substantive and procedural due process standards do not prohibit discharge of future claims) with Gregory A. Bibler, The Status of Unaccrued Tort Claims in Chapter 11 Bankruptcy Proceedings, 61 Am. Bankr. L.J. 145, 16875 (1987) (noting that "practical difficulties of identifying and giving constitutionally adequate notice to thousands of contingent future claimants are almost certainly insurmountable").

n337. See, e.g., Lemelle v. Universal Mfg. Corp., 18 F.3d 1268, 1277 (5th Cir. 1994); In re Chateaugay Corp., 944 F.2d 997, 1003 (2d Cir. 1991); In re Piper Aircraft Corp., 168 B.R. 434, 43940 (S.D. Fla. 1994). But see In re Jensen, 995 F.2d 925, 93031 (9th Cir. 1993) (rejecting Chateaugay Corp.'s "relationship" approach in favor of a "fair contemplation" test).

n338. See Jensen, 995 F.2d at 93031; Chateaugay Corp., 944 F.2d at 1005.

n339. In Chateaugay Corp., the Second Circuit reasoned that if the future claimant there (the EPA) could succeed in keeping its "claim outside of bankruptcy," it could thereafter present the same claim "against the reorganized company that it anticipates will emerge from bankruptcy." Chateaugay Corp., 944 F.2d at 1005. For the argument that "forseeability" is the appropriate standard for bankruptcy, see Kevin J. Saville, Note, Discharging CERCLA Liability in Bankruptcy: When Does A Claim Arise?, 76 Minn. L. Rev. 327 (1991).

REV_00262268

n340. A few decisions have adopted a "conduct" test that looks to the date of the misconduct. Under this standard, it would be enough that the defective or toxic product was produced prior to the time of the bankruptcy filing. See, e.g., Grady v. A.H. Robins Co., 839 F.2d 198, 199 (4th Cir.) (Dalkon Shield claims found cognizable because produced prior to filing), cert. dismissed, 487 U.S. 1260 (1988); In re Edge, 60 B.R. 690, 699 (Bankr. M.D. Tenn. 1986) (negligent dental treatment claims found cognizable because they arose at the "earliest point" in the relationship between the parties); In re Johns-Manville Corp, 36 B.R. 743, 750 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y.) (asbestos claims found cognizable on the basis of exposure alone), mandamus denied, 749 F.2d 3 (2d Cir. 1984). These decisions precede those employing the relationship test and have not been followed recently.

n341. A few (much criticized) decisions have used the point at which a claim would accrue under state law and thus typically require that some damage or injury have occurred to the victim. See, e.g., Schweitzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 758 F.2d 936, 94142 (3d Cir. 1985) (holding that because plaintiffs' injuries were not manifest until after the bankruptcy, their claims had not "accrued" under federal law and therefore could not be discharged); In re M. Frenville Co., 744 F.2d 332, 337 (3d Cir. 1984) (only claims that have accrued under state law may be discharged in bankruptcy). This standard does interfere with the power of a bankruptcy court to deal with contingent claims, but would make relatively greater sense when applied to the class action context. As noted earlier, Article III's standards can be interpreted more liberally in bankruptcy because it is specifically addressed by the Constitution. See supra text accompanying notes 334335.

n342. Given that the bankruptcy decisions do ultimately rest on constitutional concerns about the dischargeability of future claims, they should not be dismissed as mere statutory decisions. Most commentators have recognized the constitutional foundation of these decisions. See, e.g., Mabey & Gavrin, supra note 320, at 76089.

n343. See In re Piper Aircraft Corp., 168 B.R. 434, 43940 (S.D. Fla. 1994); see also Lemelle v. Universal Mfg. Corp., 18 F.3d 1268, 127576 (5th Cir. 1994) (dictum).

n344. A timing issue surrounds the point at which the relationship must be found to exist. If the law looked to the moment of the settlement's approval, this would permit consideration of publicity and other efforts at notice mandated by the court.

n345. In In re A.H. Robins Co., 880 F.2d 694 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 959 (1989), future claimants injured by the Dalkon Shield were found to be barred by the bankruptcy automatic stay. Although the case does not emphasize the nature of the relationship, it seems likely that the degree of exposure involved in this case would satisfy both the prior relationship and "fair contemplation" standards emphasized in Piper Aircraft, Lemelle, and Jensen. See supra notes 337338. Similarly, in Bowling v. Pfizer, 143 F.R.D. 141, 147 (S.D. Ohio 1992), appeal dismissed, 995 F.2d 1066 (6th Cir. 1993), the injured class members in that mass tort class action had received defective heart valves. A more substantial personal intrusion is difficult to imagine. Thus, the facts of many mass tort cases in which standing has been recognized in future claimants are consistent with this proposed standard.

n346. Besides employees who are occupationally exposed, immediate neighbors of a factory releasing a toxic emission or leaking toxic chemicals might also satisfy the requisite relationship test. The critical element would be that the possibility of injury from the release or emission be within their "fair contemplation." Secondary exposure to tobacco smoke presents a similar but even more extreme example in which exposure alone should not satisfy a "relationship" test.

REV_00262269

n347. The objectors in Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994), cited studies concluding that "probably everyone in the world" has been exposed to asbestos. Reply Brief of Appellants at 17, Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (No. 93-CV-0215).

n348. Wheeler v. Travelers Ins. Co., 22 F.3d 534, 538 (3d Cir. 1994) (quoting Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 804 (1985)).

n349. 996 F.2d 1425 (2d Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1125 (1994).

n350. See id. at 143435.

n351. 438 U.S. 59 (1978); see also supra notes 330332 and accompanying text (discussing Duke Power Co.).

n352. Some of these decisions declining to include future claimants raise due process concerns, while others rely more on prudential grounds for denying inclusion in the class to future claimants. See, e.g., Scott v. University of Delaware, 601 F.2d 76, 89 (3d Cir.) ("We do not think that future faculty members, whose possible claims are only speculative and can only be formulated in a highly abstract and conclusory fashion, should provide, and possibly be prejudiced by, membership in the class . ..."), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 931 (1979); Foster v. Bechtel Power Corp., 89 F.R.D. 624, 62627 (E.D. Ark. 1981) (noting that due process considerations preclude inclusion of future claimants in the class); Moore v. Western Pa. Water Co., 73 F.R.D. 450, 453 (W.D. Pa. 1977) (describing future claimants as "an amorphous, phantom group, incapable of identification" and declining to include them within class) (citation omitted); Freeman v. Motor Convoy, Inc., 68 F.R.D. 196, 200 (N.D. Ga. 1974) (refusing to include future claimants on fairness grounds); see also Kaczynski, supra note 333, at 398 n.7 (future claimants not includable in a Rule 23(b)(3) class action).

n353. See cases cited supra at note 341. As noted in the discussion at supra text accompanying notes 335336, Congress has power to define standing more broadly in the bankruptcy context. Hence, the more restrictive "accrued state claim" standard could apply only outside bankruptcy, with bankruptcy courts left free to use a more liberal standard under which to reorganize companies.

n354. See infra text accompanying notes 457470.

n355. The rhetorical differences between the bankruptcy decisions and the class action cases are also revealing. Consider the following language from Schweitzer v. Consolidated Rail Corp., 758 F.2d 936, 944 (3d Cir. 1985):

If contingent claims were held to include possible future tort claims, then every hypothetical chain of future events leading to liability, regardless of how likely or unlikely, might be the basis for a contingent claim .... Thus, in our case, every employee who had worked near asbestos and whose address was known would be a known creditor .... We believe that our interpretation, which avoids such thorny constitutional issues, is the proper view of Congressional intent.

n356. Phillips Petroleum Co. v. Shutts, 472 U.S. 797, 804 (1985) (quoting Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186, 204 (1962)).

n357. Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 751 (1984) (citation omitted).

n358. Nonetheless, some mass tort class actions have sought primarily to compensate class members for the risk to which they were exposed. See supra notes 266282 and accompanying text. This may again show the bias of plaintiffs' attorneys in favor of present claimants over future claimants.

REV_00262270

n359. In re UNR Indus., Inc., 725 F.2d 1111, 1120 (7th Cir. 1984). Judge Posner further noted that the rights of future claimants would be better protected if they were able to bring individual actions represented by "the very active plaintiffs' asbestosis bar." Id. at 1117.

n360. For example, when the Manville Personal Injury Settlement Trust was confirmed in 1986, it was estimated that the Trust would receive approximately 83,000 to 100,000 claims during the course of its lifetime (which was expected to extend well into the next century). See In re Joint E. & S. Dist. Asbestos Litig., 878 F. Supp. 473, 479 (E. & S.D.N.Y. 1995). However, by early 1994, some 240,000 claims had already been filed, and several hundred thousand more were expected. See id. Yet, more care was taken in this case to estimate future claimants than in any other asbestos case. For further evidence of the limited capacity of epidemiological studies to predict accurately, see supra notes 5860 and accompanying text.

n361. Moreover, in Silicone Gel the estimation problems were simpler than in most mass tort cases because the number of women with breast implants was known and fixed.

n362. Bailey v. Patterson, 369 U.S. 31, 3233 (1962) (citations omitted).

n363. National Super Spuds, Inc. v. New York Mercantile Exch., 660 F.2d 9, 17 (2d Cir. 1981).

n364. This "typicality" requirement is set forth explicitly in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(a)(3), which requires the court to find that "the claims ... of the representative parties are typical of the claims ... of the class." Some commentators, of course, view the class representative as a mere figurehead. See, e.g., Jean W. Burns, Decorative Figureheads: Eliminating Class Representatives in Class Actions, 42 Hastings L.J. 165 (1990). Conversely, others view the class representative as having a close relationship to the adequacy of representation issue. See, e.g., Howard M. Downs, Federal Class Actions: Due Process by Adequacy of Representation (Identity of Claims) and the Impact of General Telephone v. Falcon, 54 Ohio St. L.J. 607 (1993).

n365. The "adequacy" criterion is set forth in Rule 23(a)(4). In National Super Spuds, Judge Henry Friendly found that the two requirements overlapped. See National Super Spuds, 660 F.2d at 17 n.6.

n366. See supra note 323 and accompanying text.

n367. 660 F.2d at 1618.

n368. The class representative can, however, settle claims based on legal theories not pled in the complaint (and over which the court would even lack subject matter jurisdiction) if they arise out of the same predicate facts. See TBK Partners, Ltd. v. Western Union Corp., 675 F.2d 456, 460 (2d Cir. 1982).

n369. See National Super Spuds, 660 F.2d at 17 n.6.

n370. Although the case law has been fairly tolerant on the issue of typicality, even the most tolerant cases have required that "the interests of the class representative and the class are commonly held for purposes of receiving similar or overlapping benefits from a settlement." 2 Newberg & Conte, supra note 96, 11.28 at 11-58.

REV_00262271

The issue of typicality tends to overlap heavily with the issue of adequacy of representation. For the view that an "atypical" named plaintiff cannot be an adequate representative, see National Super Spuds, 660 F.2d at 17 n.6.

n371. See, e.g., Baby Neal v. Casey, 43 F.3d 48, 61 (3d Cir. 1994) (finding that "differing degree and nature" of plaintiffs' injuries does not undermine class certification); Hassine v. Jeffes, 846 F.2d 169, 17677 (3d Cir. 1988) (finding that named plaintiff may share common harm with class by virtue of personally facing "threat of injury").

n372. Indeed, exactly this point was made by the Third Circuit panel in the Baby Neal case, which noted that "the individual differences in the children's circumstances might indeed militate against certification if the action sought certification under 23(b)(3) because a court would need to evaluate those differences in the event that the plaintiffs prevailed and were entitled to monetary damages." Baby Neal, 43 F.3d at 63.

n373. The Silicone Gel present claimants provide such an example. See supra text accompanying notes 249251.

n374. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

n375. Id. 23(b)(3)(A), (D).

n376. See supra notes 208210 and accompanying text.

n377. Dunbar & Neumann, supra note 58, at 1.

n378. Precisely this protection in the form of a continuing right to opt out if benefits were reduced was provided in the Silicone Gel settlement, where the court was clearly aware that the fund might be inadequate. See In re Silicone Gel Breast Implant Prods. Liab. Litig., No. CV-92-P-10000-S, 1994 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12521, at *22*23 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 1, 1994).

n379. On this issue, the Georgine court sidestepped the problem by finding that even though claimants in individual actions would receive cash compensation when class members would not, this was not a barrier because future claimants had "different expectations" about their rights. See Georgine v. Amchem Prods., Inc. 157 F.R.D. 246, 298 (E.D. Pa. 1994). Finally, the Georgine court deemed the "superiority" requirement to be satisfied by its finding that the settlement provided class members with fair compensation. See id. at 316.

n380. The time delay pending recovery is a more problematic factor. Although it was heavily emphasized in Georgine, see id. at 310311, 316, 322, it seems a bootstrap argument in that case when the delay in getting to trial within the tort system was largely due to the federal stay order that enjoined all asbestos-related personal injury litigation in federal court. See supra note 185 and accompanying text.

n381. Ironically, in Georgine, the reverse was true: small claimants with pleural plaques received no cash compensation under the class action settlement, but would normally receive a cash payment in individual actions. See Georgine, 157 F.R.D. at 27273, 29192. Thus, the interests of small claimants can point in either direction.

n382. Again, insurance was not an issue in Georgine where the CCR defendants were all highly solvent. The court specifically found that the CCR defendants could meet their obligations under the settlement. See id. at 291.

n383. 51 F.3d 1293 (7th Cir. 1995).

n384. Id. at 1300. Of course, by the same token, the jury could also hold the fate of the

REV_00262272

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37

*52 Fordham L. Rev. 37, **

Copyright (c) 1983 Fordham Law Review
Fordham Law Review

October, 1983

52 Fordham L. Rev. 37

LENGTH: 39008 words

ARTICLE: PUNITIVE DAMAGES IN MASS TORT LITIGATION: ADDRESSING THE PROBLEMS OF FAIRNESS, EFFICIENCY AND CONTROL.

Richard A. Seltzer *

* Acting Professor of Law, University of California at Davis. The author wishes to acknowledge Gerald Hobrecht, Teresa Owens and Lori Sarner Smith, students at the University of California at Davis School of Law, for their valuable research assistance on all aspects of this article; Lynnda Borelli Pires, for typing and proofreading; and my colleagues, Alan Brownstein and Robert W. Hillman, for their helpful comments on an earlier draft.

SUMMARY:
... MASS tort litigation in the 1980's has reached unprecedented levels. ... Some commentators have assailed the doctrinal inconsistency of permitting a punitive damages claim (which must be based on the wrongful conduct of defendant) in an action based upon strict products liability (which focuses on the product itself). ... Of the three punitive damage awards, the award in Roginsky was reversed and the other two were significantly reduced. ... Another proposal would permit recovery only of the amount by which a punitive damages award exceeds the largest previous award against the defendant arising out of the same mass tort. ... In appropriate circumstances, a class action may provide the best means of resolving the problems presented by punitive damages in mass tort litigation. ... The brisk pace at which cases were being settled prior to the certification order was halted by the certification of the punitive damages class action. ... Certification by one court of a mandatory punitive damages class action will necessarily affect cases in other jurisdictions. ... The benefits of classwide adjudication of punitive damages claims may be outweighed, as they were in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases, by the detrimental impact that certification would have on the overall management of the litigation, including settlements of the underlying personal injury claims. ...

TEXT:

[*37] Introduction

MASS tort litigation in the 1980's has reached unprecedented levels. Thousands of personal injury lawsuits have been filed against manufacturers of such mass-marketed products as asbestos, [1] formaldehyde, [2] diethylstilbestrol (DES), [3] Agent Orange, [4] automobiles, [5] [*38] tampons [6] and intrauterine contraceptive devices (IUD's). [7] Many plaintiffs seek recovery of

1. Certification by the District Courts

Although different kinds of mass torts were involved -- a single disastrous occurrence in the Skywalk cases and the failure of a mass-marketed product in the Dalkon Shield cases -- the considerations that led each district court to certify a punitive damages class action [180] were much the same. Each court determined that individual recoveries of punitive damages by the first successful plaintiffs would either reduce or totally eliminate the funds available for recovery of damages by later plaintiffs, [181] and concluded that this constituted a limited [*73] fund which permitted certification of a class of plaintiffs under Rule 23(b)(1)(B). [182] The funds available for payment of punitive damages claims might be limited in one of two ways: (1) the financial resources of the defendants might simply be inadequate to satisfy all the claims; [183] or (2) if resources were adequate, the law would imply some limit on the extent to which a defendant can be punished for the same wrongful conduct. [184] In either situation, full punitive damages recoveries [*74] would be distributed only to the first plaintiffs who received favorable verdicts. Subsequent plaintiffs would recover little or no punitive damages. Each district court considered this unfair to those later plaintiffs and determined that equitable distribution to all deserving plaintiffs could be attained only through a mandatory class action in which all plaintiffs were represented, and in which none could choose to pursue claims individually. [185]

In each case, certification was opposed by an overwhelming majority of plaintiffs. [186] Several plaintiffs in the Skywalk cases argued that a class action was unnecessary and counterproductive in view of the rapid pace at which cases were being settled through the efforts of the state court. [187] Plaintiffs in the Dalkon Shield class action cited several [*75] reasons for opposing the action, including the impropriety of certification on the court's own initiative, [188] the lack of personal jurisdiction [*76] over non-California plaintiffs, [189] and the diversity of legal and factual questions presented by the multistate claims. [190]

[*77] 2. Reversals by the Courts of Appeals

Both certification orders were reviewed in interlocutory appeals. [191] In a two-to-one decision, the Eighth Circuit held that certification of a mandatory class of punitive damages claimants in the Skywalk case violated the Anti-Injunction Act. [192] A unanimous panel of the Ninth Circuit held that the Dalkon Shield class action failed to satisfy the general prerequisites of Rule 23(a) [193] and, in any event, did not involve circumstances which would permit certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(1)(B). [194] Although each court ostensibly relied upon different grounds, the fundamental rationale for each decision was the rejection of the lower court's conclusion that plaintiffs' recovery of [*78] punitive damages was jeopardized by either a lack of funds or an implied-in-law limit on aggregate punitive damages awards. [195]

a. The Eighth Circuit Decision

Surprisingly, the Eighth Circuit eschewed standard class action analysis and based its decision on the Anti-Injunction Act, [196] which, with certain exceptions, prohibits federal courts from enjoining proceedings pending in state courts. [197] Because the mandatory class certification had been ordered by the federal district court after lawsuits had been initiated in state court, the court of appeals reasoned that the order effectively enjoined the state court from continuing to adjudicate the punitive damages claims. [198] The court rejected the argument that this situation came within the Act's exception for injunctions "necessary in aid of [the federal court's] jurisdiction" because of the adverse effect independently pursued punitive damages claims might have on remaining claims. According to the majority, at this point there was no limited fund, but only "an uncertain claim for punitive damages against defendants who have not conceded liability." [199] Having so easily disposed of the lower court's primary basis for certification, the court of appeals held that the situation merely involved simultaneous in personam actions in state and federal courts regarding the same subject matter, a practice permitted under the dual federal-state system. [200]

REV_00262291

This rigid construction of the Anti-Injunction Act creates a potential barrier to class certification in mass tort cases. The Eighth Circuit, [*79] by holding the Anti-Injunction Act paramount, may effectively prevent certification of a Rule 23 mandatory class action whenever even a single case involving the same subject matter has been initiated previously in state court. [201]

b. The Ninth Circuit Decision

The Ninth Circuit's analysis of the Rule 23(a) criteria was essentially a prelude to its more definitive holding under Rule 23(b)(1)(B). Although the court held that the class action failed to satisfy the Rule 23(a) prerequisites of commonality, [202] typicality [203] and adequacy of representation, [204] the basis of this holding appeared to be the court's [*80] concern with the problem of managing a class action involving multistate claims of persons vehemently opposed to their forced membership in a class. [205] These management problems, however, are more appropriately analyzed in terms of the superiority of the class action to individual litigation. [206]

The more significant aspect of the Ninth Circuit's decision was its conclusion that the circumstances relied upon by the lower court did not constitute the kind of limited fund envisioned under Rule 23(b)(1)(B). [207] The court of appeals rejected both grounds for the lower court's finding of a limited fund -- the inability of defendants to satisfy potential judgments and the implied-in-law ceiling on punitive damages recoveries -- because the record did not establish that separate punitive damages awards would "inescapably" or "necessarily" affect later claims. [208] According to the court, the theoretical possibility that later plaintiffs' recoveries would be diminished or eliminated by earlier recoveries did not satisfy the requirements of Rule 23(b)(1)(B). [209] The court noted, however, that "[t]he detrimental effect of earlier claims upon later claims commends itself . . . as worthy of future judicial and legislative consideration." [210]

3. A Critical Analysis: Appellate Overkill

The problem with the appellate opinions in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases is not that they were wrongly decided, but rather [*81] that they went too far. In each case, the assertion of a limited fund was rejected as speculative. [211] Although both courts limited their holdings to the cases' factual circumstances, the likelihood in future cases that a similar assertion will be speculative renders these decisions broadly applicable. Therefore, punitive damages class actions may be precluded even when class actions provide the best means of adjudicating the claims.

This unsatisfactory result is due in part to the structure of Rule 23 itself, which by its terms does not permit a trial court or a court of review to consider whether a mandatory class action is the best means of adjudication in the particular circumstances. Only in Rule 23(b)(3) common question class actions are courts permitted to consider the relative superiority of the class action device to individual litigation. [212] The inquiry under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) is essentially confined to whether individual adjudications would somehow prejudice the rights of other members of the prospective class. [213] The district courts in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases correctly held that some class members would be prejudiced, [214] because it was clear that funds for payment of punitive damages would become more limited with each ensuing award, if for no other reason than the implicit limits on permissible aggregate punitive damages recoveries. The Eighth and Ninth Circuits, however, would require more concrete evidence before recognizing such a limited fund.

The chilling effect of the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield appellate decisions could be avoided by introducing qualitative criteria into the certification process in cases involving multiple punitive damages claims. Unlike the traditional Rule 23(b)(1)(B) situations, which always require classwide adjudication, multiple punitive damages claims should result in certification of a class action only when the benefits of the device outweigh the problems it would cause. Recognition of these claims as a hybrid of subsections (b)(1)(B) and (b)(3) would provide a way to distinguish those mass tort cases in which the punitive damages claims should be adjudicated in a single classwide proceeding from those not appropriate for class treatment. [215] Beyond [*82] the usual inquiry into the general class action prerequisites, courts faced with the question of certifying a punitive damages class action should be permitted to decide whether it is the best way under the circumstances to adjudicate the punitive damages claims.

REV_00262292

The use of this qualitative analysis in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases would have led to either the denial of certification by the district courts or the decertification of such actions by the courts of appeals without establishing barriers to future class actions. The unilateral usurpation of authority by each district court over the many cases pending outside its jurisdiction was unwarranted. In the Skywalk cases, most of the lawsuits were filed in the state court, which had administered the litigation, coordinated discovery and encouraged settlements. [216] The brisk pace at which cases were being settled prior to the certification order was halted by the certification of the punitive damages class action. [217] The anomalous result was that a class action aimed at expediting resolution of punitive damages claims actually delayed recovery of compensation for injuries. Compensation of the victims of a disaster should not be secondary to punitive damages claims. [218] A qualitative assessment of the foreseeable impact on the settlement process would certainly have led to denial of certification.

In the Dalkon Shield cases, the order certifying a nationwide punitive damages class amounted to a unilateral assumption of authority over thousands of cases pending in other jurisdictions. The fact that the court ordering certification had previously dismissed the punitive damages claims in a Dalkon Shield trial, [219] and that the defendant strongly supported the class action while all plaintiffs opposed it, gave [*83] the impression of unfairness to the plaintiff class. [220] The prospect of a nationwide class of unwilling plaintiffs bound by the result obtained by an attorney whom they did not trust provided a compelling reason for decertification.

IV. RECOMMENDED GUIDELINES FOR ADJUDICATING MASS TORT PUNITIVE DAMAGES CLAIMS

A. Class Actions

Courts should have the discretion to adjudicate all mass tort punitive damages claims in a single, classwide proceeding when a class action is superior to individual litigation. If class action treatment is otherwise appropriate in connection with these claims, certification should be granted under Rule 23(b)(1)(B), which precludes individual claimants from opting out. [221] This approach permits distribution of punitive damages far more equitably than the present system, which rewards plaintiffs on a first-come, first-served basis. All mass tort cases with multiple claims for punitive damages present a potential Rule 23(b)(1)(B) limited fund situation; early awards may affect later claims because of either the defendant's inability to pay or the implied-in-law limit on total awards.

Courts considering certification of punitive damages claims should initially focus on whether the Rule 23(a) general class action prerequisites are satisfied and, if they are, whether a mandatory class action is superior to individual adjudication under the circumstances. Because [*84] the Rule 23(a) prerequisites will be met in most mass tort situations, [222] the primary focus usually will be on the question of superiority. [223]

Courts should then focus on qualitative criteria in connection with the certification of punitive damages class actions under Rule 23(b)(1)(B), including (1) the pendency of punitive damages claims in other jurisdictions, (2) the foreseeable effect of a class action on the settlement process, and (3) the degree to which the prospective class members support or oppose the class action. These factors differ somewhat from the factors enumerated in Rule 23(b)(3) for common question class actions. [224]

REV_00262293

1. Pendency of Punitive Damages Claims in Other Jurisdictions

Mass tort litigation often takes place in more than one jurisdiction. Lawsuits based upon a defect in a mass-produced product, for example, are likely to be filed in each state where the injuries occur. A single disaster, such as the crash of a commercial airliner, will often spawn multistate and multidistrict litigation. [225] Certification by one court of a mandatory punitive damages class action will necessarily affect cases in other jurisdictions. While some intrusion upon the authority of other states and courts [226] is tolerable in the interests of justice and economy, there are limits that a court should not unilaterally exceed.

[*85] A court considering certification in these circumstances should first investigate the factual and evidentiary bases for the punitive damages claims to determine whether they would likely be submitted to a jury. If it appears probable that the court would eventually dismiss the punitive damages claims upon a motion for summary judgment or a directed verdict, the court should deny class certification without further inquiry. The decision on the merits of the claims would thus remain with the other courts in which the claims are pending. Otherwise, a mandatory certification order might effectively wrest jurisdiction of the punitive claims from other courts only to result eventually in their dismissal on the merits. This was a legitimate concern in the Dalkon Shield litigation because of the district court's dismissal of the punitive damage claims in an earlier trial. [227]

When a federal district court, however, concludes that the multistate punitive damages claims would probably reach the jury and that a class action is the best way to adjudicate them, [228] it should refer the [*86] case to the Judicial Panel for Multidistrict Litigation. The Judicial Panel is not empowered to decide the issue of class certification, but it can select an appropriate forum in which to consolidate all related actions pending in federal district courts. [229] This would provide an opportunity for all parties in those actions to support or oppose certification in a single proceeding. Ultimately, the court selected by the Judicial Panel would decide whether to certify the class. [230] This procedure would avoid the kind of forum-shopping, or at least the appearance of it, which became an issue in the Dalkon Shield case. [231] Even more important, reference to the Judicial Panel would prevent unwarranted unilateral intrusions by one court on other courts that are actively conducting the litigation. [232]

2. Effect on the Settlement Process

The primary goal in adjudicating mass tort cases should be to compensate deserving plaintiffs for their injuries as fairly and efficiently as possible. This is often achieved by settlements before trial.

[*87] Even when all other factors point toward a class action, certification should be denied when the court finds after a hearing that it would significantly impede or delay the resolution of the underlying disputes. [233] In those circumstances the benefits of resolving the punitive damages claims in one proceeding are outweighed by the adverse effect on the timely resolution of other proceedings concerned with compensatory claims for injuries or deaths. [234]

In any event, the impact of a mandatory class certification order on the settlement process and on punitive damages claims pending in other jurisdictions warrants adoption of a speedy interlocutory appellate procedure. Under current practice, such an order is reviewable on an interlocutory basis only when the district court specifically designates it for immediate appeal, [235] when the order is construed as an injunction of pending cases, [236] or upon a petition for a writ of mandamus alleging an abuse of judicial discretion. [237] The certification order should always be construed as an injunction of pending cases, ensuring the availability of interlocutory review. [238]

REV_00262294

[*88] 3. Degree of Support for or Opposition to the Class

While not controlling, the degree to which members of the class support or oppose class certification is a relevant consideration in the certification decision. Overwhelming opposition by the potential class, such as in the Dalkon Shield and Skywalk cases, [239] can result in a series of disputes as well as an appearance of unfairness or bias. [240] A procedural device aimed at streamlining litigation should not be used if it causes even more chaos. If all other factors, however, indicate that a class action is the best way to adjudicate the punitive damages claims, the opposition of the litigants should not be dispositive. This is particularly true when the opposition is based on the loss of fees that plaintiffs' attorneys hoped to recover by individual pursuit of the punitive damages claims. Courts considering certification should analyze the nature of the opposition after a full hearing. If the class action is well-founded and opponents understand the court's reasons for certification, continuing opposition can be reduced, especially when an immediate appeal is permitted and the class certification is upheld.

B. Bifurcated Trials and Increased Judicial Control

Although class actions provide the best way to adjudicate mass tort punitive damages claims in some circumstances, there are many instances [*89] in which the device is not superior to individual adjudication. Furthermore, consideration of the factors discussed earlier may reveal that one or more of the Rule 23(a) prerequisites are not met. In these circumstances, courts must be able to administer the individual claims so that appropriate punitive damages are assessed but overkill is avoided.

The proposals for accomplishing this that have received the most support include fixing limits on awards for a single wrong and removing the assessment function from the jury. [241] Despite support for these measures, arbitrary limits on aggregate awards based on dollar amounts and percentages of net worth should be rejected as needlessly inflexible and potentially overprotective of large corporations. [242] Moreover, removal of the jury's assessment function to prevent punitive damages overkill unnecessarily eliminates the jury's important role as the conscience of the community. [243]

The problems presented by multiple punitive damages claims in mass tort actions can be resolved by applying procedures already available without changing the jury's functions. Through early dismissal of unsupported claims, bifurcation of trials and close scrutiny of amounts awarded, courts can ensure the fair and effective punishment of outrageous conduct which results in mass injuries.

1. Dismissal of Unsupported Claims

As soon as possible after discovery has been completed, courts should rule on whether there is sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case for punitive damages. [244] If the claim survives a motion for summary judgment, the court should carefully assess the evidence presented at trial. If the evidence is insufficient to justify a punitive award, the court should direct a verdict on the issue. [245] This will ensure that only serious punitive damages claims will be considered by juries.

2. Bifurcation of Trials

Under procedures already available in federal courts [246] and in most states, [247] the trial judge may order separate trials of claims or issues [*90] when necessary to avoid confusion, prejudice or delay. A bifurcated trial procedure in cases involving punitive damages claims would permit a jury to receive all relevant evidence bearing on the amount of punishment without prejudicing the defendant on other issues in dispute. [248] In the first trial, the parties would present evidence relating to liability for compensatory damages. [249] The jury would be reconvened for a second trial only if it found the defendant liable for both compensatory and punitive damages. The second proceeding would be limited to evidence bearing on the proper amount of punitive damages, including other claims and awards arising out of the same mass tort and the financial condition of the defendant. The trial judge and appellate courts would continue to review these awards.

REV_00262295

Although in certain situations this procedure would be more time consuming than a single trial, in other circumstances it would actually save time. For example, a second trial would be necessary only if (1) [*91] the trial judge found that sufficient evidence had been presented to submit the punitive damages issue to the jury, (2) the jury found the defendant liable for compensatory damages and (3) the jury determined that punitive damages should be awarded. Moreover, in view of the historically large number of mass tort cases settled before trial, [250] the additional burden imposed by the bifurcation procedure on the judicial system would actually be quite small.

3. Close Scrutiny of Punitive Awards

Despite the existing procedural safeguards, a jury might occasionally return an exorbitant or vindictive punitive damages verdict in a mass tort case. Continuing the trend of active review of punitive awards, [251] trial and appellate courts can and should reduce or vacate such excessive penalties. Trial courts should be granted discretion to determine whether previous awards based on the same tortious conduct have reached a level at which any additional punishment is excessive.

CONCLUSION

The wave of mass tort litigation in the 1980's has again raised the spectre of repeated and excessive punitive damages awards for a single course of tortious conduct. Unless methods are found to adjudicate these claims fairly, efficiently and with proper controls, the doctrine of punitive damages stands to be weakened considerably by "reform" legislation. Proposals currently being considered would establish arbitrary limits on total awards and remove from the jury its traditional function of assessing the amount of punishment. These changes, however, would decrease the deterrent effect of punitive damages and might render civil punishment ineffectual.

The procedures recommended in this Article offer practical alternatives to current proposals for reform and are available under existing procedural rules. One procedure, attempted unsuccessfully in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases, combines all punitive damages awards arising out of the same tortious conduct into a single class action. Unlike other procedural devices, a mandatory class action can both control the amount of punishment and provide for distribution of [*92] the amount awarded among the insured plaintiffs on an equitable basis. While the limited fund provisions of Rule 23 provide a vehicle for such class actions, certification should not be granted automatically. The benefits of classwide adjudication of punitive damages claims may be outweighed, as they were in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases, by the detrimental impact that certification would have on the overall management of the litigation, including settlements of the underlying personal injury claims.

When class actions are inappropriate, the problem of punitive damages overkill can still be avoided through other procedural devices available in the federal and most state courts. Early dismissal of unsupported claims will save time and ensure that a jury considers punitive damages only when there is sufficient evidence of blatant misconduct. Bifurcation of trials will permit a jury to hear evidence bearing solely on the amount of punishment only after it first finds against a defendant on liability for compensatory and punitive damages. This procedure will eliminate the danger that such evidence might prejudice the jury with respect to other issues in the trial. Finally, close scrutiny by trial judges and appellate courts of punitive damages awards can prevent excessive punishment by a single jury or, in the aggregate, by several juries.

REV_00262296

Existing rules of civil procedure are flexible enough to accommodate punitive damages claims in mass tort cases. Under these rules, juries can still express society's outrage at egregious conduct without being permitted to destroy an otherwise worthy business entity for a single disastrous mistake.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 There have been approximately 20,000 personal injury lawsuits filed by workers in connection with exposure to asbestos. Congress Grapples with Toxic Torts, Nat'l L.J., Jan. 31, 1983, at 30, col. 1. Additionally, there are approximately 13,000 administrative claims pending against the federal government and 1,000 lawsuits brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act. Id. A recent study commissioned by the United States Department of Labor estimates that "there are presently more than 21 million American workers . . . who, in the past forty years, were significantly exposed to asbestos." Selikoff, Report to the U.S. Dep't of Labor, Disability Compensation for Asbestos-associated Disease in The United States 4 (1982). Asbestos has been linked to three diseases that become manifest only after periods of 10 to 40 years. They are: (1) asbestosis (non-malignant fibrous tissue growth in the lungs); (2) lung cancer; and (3) mesothelioma (diffuse cancer that spreads over the surface of either the lungs or the stomach lining). U.S. Att'y Gen., Asbestos Liability Report, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. 19-33 (Comm. Print 1981). Mortality estimates range from 8,200 to 9,700 deaths in workers from asbestos-related cancers in each of the next 20 years, aggregating over 200,000 deaths by the end of the century. Selikoff, supra, at 4. These projections do not include deaths from asbestosis. Id.

n2 It has been estimated that there are between 400 and 700 pending lawsuits involving exposure to formaldehyde. Ranii, Punitive Damages Given In Formaldehyde Verdict, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 20, 1982, at 7, col. 1. Formaldehyde foam insulation, now banned in conventional homes by the United States Product Safety Commission, is suspected of causing a variety of ailments, including respiratory problems, headaches and nausea. Id.

n3 In early 1981, there were an estimated 1,000 lawsuits pending against pharmaceutical manufacturers arising out of problems caused by prenatal exposure to DES. Note, Market Share Liability: An Answer to the DES Causation Problem, 94 Harv. L. Rev. 668, 669 (1981). Diethylstilbestrol is a synthetic estrogen which was approved in 1947 by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) for the prevention of miscarriages. Id. Several million women used DES before the FDA reversed itself in 1971 by banning the drug for the treatment of pregnancy problems. Id. The drug has been linked in prenatally exposed female offspring to a previously rare form of cancer known as clear-cell adenocarcinoma of the vagina and cervix. Bichler v. Eli Lilly & Co., 55 N.Y.2d 571, 577, 436 N.E.2d 182, 184, 450 N.Y.S.2d 776, 778 (1982).

n4 The principal litigation involving Agent Orange is a class action against the manufacturer, limited to common liability issues, brought on behalf of thousands of exposed veterans of the war in Vietnam. In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 506 F. Supp. 762 (E.D.N.Y. 1980). Between 1965 and 1970, United States Army planes sprayed approximately 10.65 million gallons of the defoliant Agent Orange on the jungles of Vietnam. Agent Orange: A problem of exposure, 117 Sci. News 55, 59 (1980). Dioxin, a poisonous contaminant of Agent Orange, has been tentatively linked to a wide range of conditions including chloracne, liver damage, muscular weakness, testicular cancer, numbness, loss of sex drive, wide swings in mood, headaches, nervous disorders, and birth defects in children. Search for an n5 Approximately 700 lawsuits have been filed against Ford Motor Company arising out of an alleged defect in the transmissions of Ford cars and trucks manufactured between 1966 and 1980. Sylvester, $ 280M Legal Bill for a 'Better Idea"?, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 27, 1982, at 18, col. 2. The Center for Auto Safety has predicted that Ford may eventually spend $ 280 million paying claims for damages resulting from this transmission defect. Id.; L.A. Daily J., Oct. 15, 1982, at 5, col. 2. The Center's Director, Clarence Ditlow, has called this problem "the most devastating auto defect I have ever seen." Branan, Running in Reverse, Mother Jones, June 1980, at 41, 42. Nearly 200 lawsuits have been filed arising out of a design defect in Jeeps that allegedly renders them prone to rolling over. Granelli, Settling for Secrecy?, Nat'l L.J., May 24, 1982, at 1, col. 1, 27, col. 3.

REV_00262297

Orange Thread, Newsweek, June 16, 1980, at 56.

n6 Hundreds of women have filed claims against manufacturers of tampons that allegedly caused toxic-shock syndrome (TSS). Ranii, Male Files Suit Over Toxic Shock, Nat'l L.J., July 4, 1983, at 47, col. 3. TSS is a bacterial infection that can result in fever, vomiting, diarrhea, and shock. Center for Disease Control, U.S. Dep't of Health & Human Services, Follow-up on Toxic-Shock Syndrome -- United States, 29 Morbidity & Mortality Weekly Rep. 297, 297 (1980). In some instances, TSS has resulted in death. Ranii, supra, at 3, col. 2.

n7 A.H. Robins, the manufacturer of the Dalkon Shield IUD, reported that a total of 3,258 lawsuits had been filed against it in connection with the Dalkon Shield; 1,685 of these had been resolved, most by settlement, several by dismissal and only nine by trial, of which seven resulted in judgments for the defendant and two resulted in judgments for the plaintiff. Affidavit of R.P. Wolf, Secretary and Assistant General Counsel of A.H. Robins Co., In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). As of May, 1981, an additional 2,309 claims had been brought against Robins, of which 2,003 had been resolved by settlement or abandonment. Id. Claims continued to be made and lawsuits to be filed at a high rate after that date. Affidavit of Robert G. Watts, Executive Vice President of A.H. Robins Co., In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). Between 1970 and 1974 approximately 2.2 million American women used the Dalkon Shield. 526 F. Supp. at 892-93. It was removed from the market due to numerous reports of untoward side effects and adverse reactions including infections, pregnancies, uterine perforations, spontaneous abortions and fetal injuries. Id. at 893.

n8 See infra notes 9-13 and accompanying text.

n9 See Wehrwein, Dalkon Case Nets $ 1.75M, Nat'l L.J., June 20, 1983, at 4, col. 2 (reporting two punitive damages awards totaling $ 7.7 million).

n10 See supra note 7.

n11 These awards were against Johns-Manville Corporation, the world's largest manufacturer of asbestos, and totaled over $ 3 million. See Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1982) ($ 500,000 upheld on appeal); Bunch v. Johns-Manville Corp. (D. Tenn.) ($ 220,000), discussed in 1982 Asbestos Litig. Rep. 4749; Hansen v. Johns-Manville Corp., No. G-79-124 (S.D. Tex.) ($ 1,000,000), discussed in 1982 Asbestos Litig. Rep. 4795; Noecker v. Johns-Manville Corp., No. 366 [118] (Pa. C.P.) ($ 50,000), discussed in 1982 Asbestos Litig. Rep. 4915; Dorell v. Johns-Manville Corp., No. C.A. 7809-88-123-18 (Pa. C.P.) ($ 1,000,000), discussed in 1982 Asbestos Litig. Rep. 4910. In Neal v. Carey Can. Mines, Ltd., 548 F. Supp. 357 (E.D. Pa. 1982), ten successful claimants were awarded a total of $ 343,000 in punitive damages against Johns-Manville and eight were awarded $ 95,000 against Celotex, another asbestos manufacturer. See id. at 366 n.4.

REV_00262298

n12 See Parnell, Asbestos Bankruptcies: Are They the Answer?, The Brief, Feb. 1983, at 5 (manufacturers filing for bankruptcy are Johns-Manville Corp., UNR Industries, Inc., and Amatex Corp.). The Manville bankruptcy was unusual because at the time of the filing the corporation was solvent with a net worth of $ 1.1 billion. See Granelli, Manville Bankruptcy: The Battle Is Beginning, Nat'l L.J., Sept. 6, 1982, at 5, col. 1. Manville, however, projected its potential liability at $ 2 billion based on an estimated 52,000 asbestos-related lawsuits at an average cost of $ 40,000. L.A. Daily J., Sept. 1, 1982, at 1, col. 6. Manville's president commented: "This is not a financial failure . . . . It is rather a failure of our court and legislative systems to provide an orderly way to compensate victims of an unexpected occupational health catastrophe." Granelli, supra, at 5, col. 1.

n13 See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981) ($ 3.5 million punitive damages award arising out of Pinto fuel system design defect upheld on appeal); Leichtamer v. American Motors Corp., 67 Ohio St. 2d 456, 424 N.E.2d 568 (1981) ($ 1.1 million punitive damages award arising out of Jeep design defect upheld on appeal); Ford Motor Co. v. Nowak, 638 S.W.2d 582 (Tex. Civ. App. 1982) ($ 4 million punitive damages award arising out of transmission design defect upheld on appeal).

n14 See supra notes 2-6 and accompanying text.

n15 See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1983). On July 17, 1981, 114 persons were killed and hundreds were injured by the collapse of the two skywalks. Id. at 1177. Approximately 140 personal injury and wrongful death lawsuits seeking recovery of both compensatory and punitive damages were filed against various defendants in federal and state courts. Id. at 1177 n.5.

n16 The fire on November 21, 1980 killed 85 people and resulted in over 500 suits for damages. These lawsuits were consolidated in the United States District Court for Nevada. L.A. Daily J., Jan. 5, 1983, at 5, col. 3. In January 1983, the hotel reached a tentative settlement of 450 of these suits with the Plaintiff's Legal Committee requiring the eventual payment of $ 75 million.Id.

n17 W. Prosser, Handbook of the Law of Torts § 2, at 13 (4th ed. 1971); see Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 838-39 (2d Cir. 1967) (discussing the difficulty of awarding punitive damages in a mass tort setting).

n18 W. Prosser, supra note 17, at 13 (These questions "might well lead to a re-examination of the whole basis and policy of awarding punitive damages.").

n19 See Szuch & Shelley, Time to Eliminate Punitive Damages?, Nat'l L.J., Feb. 28, 1983, at 13, col. 1 (compensatory damages sufficient to serve deterrence purpose in mass tort cases); Comment, Punitive Damages, the Common Question Class Action, and the Concept of Overkill, 13 Pac. L.J. 1273 (1982) (common question class actions on liability for mass torts serve purposes of punitive damages).

n20 See infra note 36.

n21 Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1, 48 & n.227 (1982) [hereinafter cited as Owen I]; Riley, Punitive Damages: The Doctrine of Just Enrichment, 27 Drake L. Rev. 195, 252 (1978); Comment, Mass Liability and Punitive Damages Overkill, 30 Hastings L.J. 1797, 1800-08 (1979) [hereinafter cited as Punitive Damages Overkill].

n22 See DuBois, Punitive Damages in Personal Injury, Products Liability and Professional Malpractice Cases: Bonanza or Disaster, 43 Ins. Couns. J. 344, 352-53 (1976); Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward a Principled Approach, 31 Hastings L.J. 639, 663-66

REV_00262299

(1980); Owen I, supra note 21, at 52-53. One state has already enacted legislation incorporating this type of proposal for products liability cases. See Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 52-240b (West Supp. 1982) ("If the trier of fact determines that punitive damages should be awarded, the court shall determine the amount of such damages not to exceed an amount equal to twice the damages awarded to the plaintiff."). A similar bill is pending in Congress. See S. 44, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (Comm. Print 1983).

n23 See infra pt. IV(B).

n24 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 419 (W.D.Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). To compel resolution of all claims in one proceeding, the district court certified two classes under provisions that precluded members from opting out. One was a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(1)(A) class action on the issue of liability for both compensatory and punitive damages. The other was a Rule 23(b)(1)(B) class action on the issues of liability for and amount of punitive damages. Id.

n25 In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 897 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The court certified a mandatory nationwide punitive damages class to resolve the thousands of punitive damages claims pending against the manufacturer. Id. The court certified the issues of liability for and amount of punitive damages pursuant to Rule 23(b)(1)(B). Id. at 895-96. The court also certified a statewide class limited to liability for punitive damages pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3), which permits unwilling plaintiffs to opt out and pursue their claims individually. Id. at 903.

n26 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 419 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 897 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n27 93 F.R.D. at 424-25; 526 F. Supp. at 897-98.

n28 In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); In re Federal Skywalk Cases 680, F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n29 See infra pt. III(C).

n30 Punitive damages are often referred to as "exemplary damages." In addition, they have been called "smart money," "punitory," "additional," and "aggravated" damages. See Freifield, The Rationale of Punitive Damages, 1 Ohio St. L.J. 5, 5 (1935); Mallor & Roberts, supra note 22, at 639 n.1.

n31 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908(1) (1979); Owen I, supra note 21, at 7-8.

n32 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908(1) & comment a (1979); Owen I, supra note 21, at 7-8. Although punishment and deterrence are the primary functions of punitive damages, several other purposes are also served. First, punitive damages encourage plaintiffs to press their claims and enforce the law by providing an incentive for bringing wrongdoers to justice. Second, punitive damages compensate plaintiffs for actual losses not ordinarily recoverable under law, such as the expense of bringing a suit. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1257, 1278, 1287-99 (1976) [hereinafter cited as Owen II]. Finally, punitive damages placate plaintiffs' desire for retribution and deter them from engaging in vengeful, illegal acts against defendants. Belli, Punitive Damages: Their History, Their Use and Their Worth in Present-Day Society, 49 UMKC L. Rev. 1, 5 (1980).

REV_00262300

punitive as well as compensatory [*39] damages, alleging gross misconduct by manufacturers. [8] Defendants in such cases face the unnerving prospect of repeated punishment for a design error, recurrent manufacturing mistake or inadequate warning. The manufacturer of the Dalkon Shield IUD, for example, has already been assessed over seven million dollars in punitive damages, [9] and thousands of additional claims are still pending in lawsuits throughout the country. [10] One asbestos manufacturer has been held liable for punitive damages to at least fifteen different plaintiffs. [11] That manufacturer and two others have sought protection under the bankruptcy laws as an alternative to defending thousands of pending claims for compensatory and punitive damages arising out of exposure to asbestos. [12]

The problem is not limited to manufacturers of asbestos and IUD's. Other manufacturers have been jolted by substantial punitive damages verdicts arising out of design errors in mass-marketed products. [13] They, too, face the threat of additional punishment in hundreds of [*40] other lawsuits arising out of the same defects. [14] Nor is the problem limited to products liability litigation. Disastrous occurrences other than product failures have also resulted in multiple punitive damages claims. Recent examples include the collapse of two skywalks in the lobby of the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City, Missouri, [15] and the fire at the MGM Grand Hotel in Las Vegas, Nevada. [16]

Punitive damages claims on this scale are a recent phenomenon. [17] Typically, punitive damages claims arose from a single incident involving only two parties, making it possible for a jury to determine an appropriate award without considering the possibility of additional awards by other juries. In modern mass tort cases, however, the responsibility for punishing a defendant is not limited to a single jury. Such decentralization raises important issues including the extent to which a defendant may be punished for a single course of tortious conduct, what the jury should be told about previous awards by other juries or about other punitive damages claims against the same defendant, and how awards should be distributed among the plaintiffs. [18]

Predictably, proposals have been made to abolish punitive damages in mass tort litigation. [19] Having withstood years of criticism aimed at the essence of the doctrine, [20] however, it is unlikely to be abandoned because a defendant's wrongful conduct injuries a large number of people instead of one or two. Proposals for changing the method of awarding punitive damages in mass tort litigation are now being given more serious consideration. These include establishing a ceiling on punitive damages awards against a defendant for a single course of [*41] conduct [21] and eliminating the jury's role in determining the amount of punitive damages. [22]

While adoption of these proposals might reduce the danger of excessive punishment, other procedures could be utilized without such wholesale changes in the way punitive damages are awarded. [23] One alternative is dismissal by the trial court of punitive damages claims not supported by solid evidence. Another is a bifurcated trial procedure in which the jury would be reconvened to consider evidence bearing on the proper amount of punishment only if it decided in the first trial that the defendant's conduct warranted imposition of punitive damages. A third procedure permits closer scrutiny of jury awards by trial judges and appellate courts. Implementation of these procedures would assure that juries have a continuing voice in the amount of punishment while providing the safeguards necessary to prevent unfairness to defendants.

Alternatively, to avoid the difficulties inherent in adjudicating multiple punitive damages claims on a case-by-case basis, a class action could be instituted. Two federal district courts recently tried this approach in litigation surrounding the Skywalk collapse in Kansas City [24] and the Dalkon Shield design defect. [25] These courts determined [*42] that a class action was the best method by which the hundreds of punitive damages claims could be adjudicated both fairly and expeditiously. [26] Any other approach might result in the recovery of punitive n33 A longstanding criticism of this doctrine has been that its purposes are inconsistent with those of traditional civil remedies. Justice Forter, sitting on the New Hampshire Supreme Court in 1873, wrote:

REV_00262283

What is a civil remedy but . . . compensation for damage sustained by the plaintiff? . . . Is not punishment out of place, irregular, anomalous, exceptional, unjust, unscientific, not to say absurd and ridiculous, when classed among civil remedies? What kind of a civil remedy for the plaintiff is the punishment of the defendant? The idea is wrong. It is a monstrous heresy. It is an unsightly and an unhealthy excrescence, deforming the symmetry of the body of the law.
Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342, 382 (1873). See Defense Research Inst., Inc., The Case Against Punitive Damages 9 (1969); W. Prosser, supra note 17, § 2, at 9; Ghiardi, Should Punitive Damages be Abolished? -- A Statement for the Affirmative, 1965 A.B.A. Sec. Ins. Negl. & Comp. L. Proc. 282; Long, Punitive Damages: An Unsettled Doctrine, 25 Drake L. Rev. 870, 888 (1976). The doctrine has also been criticized for permitting successful plaintiffs to receive a windfall. See Walker v. Sheldon, 10 N.Y.2d 401, 409, 179 N.E.2d 497, 501, 223 N.Y.S.2d 488, 494 (1961) (Van Voorhis, J., dissenting); Kink v. Combs, 28 Wis. 2d 65, 80, 135 N.W.2d 789, 797 (1965); Hodgin & Veitch, Punitive Damages -- Reassessed, 21 Int'l & Comp. L.Q. 119, 132 (1972); Long, supra, at 886.

n34 K. Redden, Punitive Damages § 2.4, at 33-34 (1980); Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 Harv. L. Rev. 517, 524 (1957) [hereinafter cited as Exemplary Damages]; Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 408, 412 (1967).

n35 See Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 331, 294 N.W.2d 437, 472 (1980) (Coffey, J., dissenting) ("The implications for the free enterprise system, and therefore the structure of our economy, are too disturbing to leave a decision of this magnitude to five jurists."); K. Redden, supra note 34, § 2.4, at 34 ("As the award is determined by a jury who arrive at a set figure by subjective rather than objective calculation, the amount of punishment is often not correlated with the amount of culpability exhibited.").

n36 K. Redden, supra note 34, § 2.4, at 33. The earliest recorded debate regarding the validity of the doctrine of punitive damages was between Greenleaf and Sedgwick. Compare 2 S. Greenleaf, The Law of Evidence § 253, at 240 n.2 (16th ed. 1899) (doctrine should be limited) with 1 T. Sedgwick, Measure of Damages § 354 (9th ed. 1912) (doctrine should be supported). See Walther & Plein, Punitive Damages: A Critical Analysis: Kink v. Combs, 49 Marq. L. Rev. 369, 379-80 (1965) (discussing the Greenleaf-Sedgwick debate over punitive damages). The debate continues today. Compare Ghiardi, supra note 33, at 284 (punitive damages should be judicially abolished), with Belli, supra note 32, at 23 (punitive damages perhaps more important in modern times).

n37 Multiple damages, punitive in nature, have been documented in the Babylonian Code of Hammurabi of 2000 B.C., G. Driver & J. Miles, The Babylonian Laws 500 (1952), in Hittite law dating from approximately 1400 B.C., 4 M. Belli, Modern Trials § 26, at 75 (1959), and in Hindu law of circa 200 B.C., id. at 84.

n38 Punitive damages existed in medieval English statutes, 2 F. Pollack & F. Maitland, The History of the English Law 522 & n.1 (2d ed. 1959), and at common law as a means of justifying excessive compensatory damages awards or to provide damages not otherwise compensable under the common law, J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, Punitive Damages Law and Practice § 1.02, at 3-5 (1981). In 1964, the House of Lords restricted the scope of actual punitive damages awards by limiting such awards to cases involving oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional acts of government servants, in which the tortfeasor sought to profit from the tort and for which punitive damages awards are expressly permitted by statute. Rookes v. Barnard, 1964 A.C. 1129, 1226-27. The practical effect of the decision is limited, however, because English courts still permit "aggravated damages," which are difficult to distinguish from exemplary damages in that they allow a jury awarding compensatory damages to consider conduct that is malicious, spiteful or injurious to a plaintiff's dignity. See J. Fleming, The Law of Torts 584-85 (5th ed. 1977); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra, § 1.03, at 7-8.

REV_00262301

American law incorporated the doctrine not only to punish and deter, but also to satisfy the desire for revenge, promote necessary litigation when compensatory damages are small and provide relief for emotional injuries incapable of meansurment. See Exemplary Damages, supra note 34, at 520-22; Comment, Punitive Damages Awards in Strict Product Liability Litigation: The Doctrine, The Debate, The Defenses, 42 Ohio St. L.J. 771, 772 (1981). By the middle of the 19th century, acceptance of the doctrine in the United States was such that the Supreme Court could state that the propriety of awarding punitive damages "will not admit of argument." Day v. Woodworth, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 363, 371 (1851) (dictum).

n39 See J. Ghiardi and J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 401. The states that prohibit punitive damages are: (1) Louisiana, Ricard v. State, 390 so. 2d 882, 884 (La. 1980); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 409; (2) Massachusetts, Caperci v. Huntoon, 397 F.2d 799, 801 (1st Cir.) (dictum), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 940 (1968); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 410; (3) Nebraska, Prather v. Eisenmann, 200 Neb. 1, 11, 261 N.W.2d 766, 772 (1978); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 411; and (4) Washington, Kammerer v. Western Gear Corp., 27 Wash. App. 512, 521-22, 618 P.2d 1330, 1337 (1980), aff'd, 96 Wash. 2d 416, 635 P.2d 708 (1981). At least two of these jurisdictions, however, permit punitive damages if they are explicitly provided for by statute. J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 409 (Lousiana); id. § 410 (Massachusetts).

Most states retain punitive damages as part of their common law, J. Ghiardi and J. Kircher, supra note 38, table 4-1, but some codify the remedy by statute in appropriate tort cases. See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code § 3294 (West Supp. 1983); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-21-102 (1973); Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5 (1982); Nev. Rev. Stat. § 42.010 (1965); N.D. Cent. Code § 32-03-07 (Supp. 1981); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, § 9 (West 1955); S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 21-3-2 (1979). See infra note 40.

n40 See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code § 3340 (West 1970) (exemplary damages may be awarded for wrongful injuries to animals); Iowa Code Ann. § 639.14 (West 1950) (punitive damages may be awarded for malicious attachment); S.C. Code Ann. § 39-5-140 (Law. Co-op. 1977) (treble damages may be awarded for unfair or deceptive trade practices); Tex. Rev. Civ. Stat. Ann. art. 8306, § 5 (Vernon 1967) (exemplary damages may be awarded for wrongful death of worker); Utah Code Ann. § 76-6-412 (1978) (treble damages may be awarded for receiving certain stolen property); Va. Code § 8.01-40 (1977) (punitive damages may be awarded for knowingly making unauthorized use of another's picture).

n41 See, e.g., Clayton Act § 4, 15. U.S.C. § 15 (1976) (treble damages may be awarded for injuries resulting from violation of antitrust laws); Fair Credit Reporting Act § 616, 15 U.S.C. § 1681(n) (1976) (punitive damages may be awarded for wilful noncompliance with Fair Credit Reporting Act); Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 § 802, 18 U.S.C. § 2520(b) (1976) (punitive damages may be awarded for interception of wire or oral communications); Civil Rights Acts of 1968 § 812, 42 U.S.C. §3612(c) (1976) (punitive damages not in excess of $ 1,000 may be awarded for violation of fair housing laws).

n42 See J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, §5.01, at 5-3 to 5-11 (1981); C. McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Damages § 79, at 280-82 (1935).

n43 Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 355, at 154 (1981) ("Punitive damages are not recoverable for a breach of contract unless the conduct constituting the breach is also a tort for which punitive damages are recoverable."); See 5 A. Corbin, Contracts § 1077, at 437 (1964); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.16, at 48; K. Redden, supra note 34, §

REV_00262302

2.5, at 41. There are exceptions to the general rule prohibiting punitive damages in contract actions:

[P]unitive damages may be awarded upon proof of the requisite wantonness of behavior in the following types of cases: fraud; breach of promise of marriage; breach of contract of service by a public utility or common carrier; wrongful failure by a bank to honor a depositor's check; breach of contract of employment; breach of fiduciary duty; interference with contractual relations of others; and breach of contract amounting to or accompanied by an independent tort.
Owen II, supra note 32, at 1272;see, e.g., Rosener v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 110 Cal. App.3d 740, 757, 168 Cal. Rptr. 237, 247 (1980) (punitive damages appropriate when breach of contract amounts to fraud); Jones v. Abriani, 169 Ind. App. 556, 580, 350 N.E.2d 635, 650 (1976) ("[P]unitive damages are particularly appropriate in proper cases involving consumer fraud."); Fletcher v. Aetna Casualty & Sur. Co., 80 Mich. App. 439, 444, 264 N.W.2d 19, 21 (1978) (Exemplary damages may be recovered from one who breaches a contract that concerns "matters of mental concern and solicitude.") (quoting Stewart v. Rudner, 349 Mich. 459, 471, 84 N.W.2d 816, 824 (1957)), (quoting Steart V. Rudener, 349 Mich. 459, 471, 84 Mich 1, 294 N.W. 2d 816, 824 (1957)), aff'd sub nom. Bradley v. Mid-Century Ins. Co., 409 Mich. 1, 294 N.W.2d 141 (1980).

n44 Eighteen states currently permit punitive damages for wrongful death while 31 states do not. K. Redden, supra note 34, § 4.2(A)(3), at 87. Jurisdictions that do not allow recovery of punitive damages rely on a narrow judicial construction of the state's wrongful death statute.Id. Other courts have construed such statutes to provide for punitive damages, and may jurisdictions have passed statutes specifically allowing punitive damages in wrongful death actions. Id. An excellent case in point is Robert v. Ford Motor Co., 100 Misc. 2d 646, 417 N.Y.S.2d 595 (1979), rev'd, 73 A.D.2d 1025, 424 N.Y.S.2d 747 (1980), in which a New York trial court held that denial of punitive damages in wrongful death actions, when they were available in other personal injury claims, was contrary to the state constitution. Id. at 655, 417 N.Y.S.2d at 601-02. Soon after this decision was reversed by the appellate division, the New York State Law Revision Commission proposed legislation specifically providing for punitive damages in wrongful death actions. New York Law Revision Commission, Memorandum Relating to the Assessment of Punitive Damages in Wrongful Death Actions or in Personal Injury Actions After the Death of the Victim, Leg. Doc. No. 65 [G] (1982). Subsequently, the state legislature enacted legislation permitting punitive damages in wrongful death actions. 1982 N.Y. Laws 100 (codified at N.Y. Est. Powers & Trusts Law § 11-3.2(b) (McKinney Supp. 1982-1983)). See generally McClelland, Survival of Punitive Damages in Wrongful Death Cases, 8 U.S.F.L. Rev. 585 (1974) (discussion of punitive damages in wrongful death actions); Note, Punitive Damages and Wrongful Death, 8 Cum. L. Rev. 567, 574077 (1978) (discussion and nationwide survey of punitive damages in wrongful death actions).

n45 The vast majority of states prohibit an award of punitive damages against a governmental body or agency, either by statute or by judicial interpretation of sovereign immunity. J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.13, at 39. The Federal Tort Claims Act, 28 U.S.C. §§ 2671-80 (1976 & Supp. V 1981), similarly prohibits assessment of punitive damages against the United States. Id. § 2674; See Hartz v. United States, 415 F.2d 259, 264 (5th Cir. 1969). Punitive damages are also precluded by federal statute in suits against foreign states. 28 U.S.C. § 1606 (1976). A minority of jurisdictions, however, has held or indicated that a governmental entity can be liable for punitive damages. Young v. City of Des Moines, 262 N.W.2d 612, 620-22 (Iowa 1978) (punitive damages recoverable against governmental subdivision, although not against the state); City of Covington v. Faulhaber, 177 Ky. 623, 625, 197 S.W. 1065, 1066 (1927) (punitive damages might be awarded in a proper case against the city); Ray v. City of Detroit Dep't of St. Rys., 67 Mich. App. 702, 707, 242 N.W.2d 494, 496 (1976) (punitive damages are compensatory, not penal, and may therefore be assessed against municipal corporation); Lochhaas v. State, 64 A.D.2d 816, 817, 407 N.Y.S.2d 298, 299 (1978) (punitive damages might be awarded in appropriate case against the state); Gigler v. City of Klamath Falls, 21 Or. App. 753, 763-64, 537 P.2d 121, 126 (1975) (punitive damages could be awarded in proper case against the city). In Vermont, damages, including punitive damages, may be assessed against the state within statutory limits. Vt. Stat. Ann. tit. 12, § 5601 (1973).

REV_00262303

n46 See J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.38, at 110, 111 n.1 (procedure with regard to punitive damages liability generally accepted).

n47 Id.; K. Redden, supra note 34, § 3.4, at 56.

n48 As used in this article, the word "jury" includes the court in a bench trial in its role as finder of fact.

n49 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment d (1979); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.38, at 110-11; W. Prosser, supra note 17, § 2, at 13; K. Redden, supra note 34, § 3.4(A), at 56. But see Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 52-240b (West Supp. 1983).

n50 E.g., Central Armature Works, Inc. v. American Motorists Ins. Co., 520 F.Supp. 283, 296 (D.D.C. 1980); Loch Ridge Constr. Co. v. Barra, 291 Ala. 312, 320, 280 So. 2d 745, 751 (1973); Riegel v. Aastad, 272 A.2d 715, 718 (Del. 1970); see J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.38, at 111.

n51 E.g., Loch Ridge Constr. Co. v. Barra, 291 Ala. 312, 320, 280 So. 2d 745, 751 (1973); Ayers v. Christiansen, 222 Kan. 225, 229, 564 P.2d 458, 461 (1977); First Sec. Bank & Trust Co. v. Roach, 493 S.W.2d 612, 619 (Tex. Civ. App. 1973); see J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.38, at 111.

n52 See, e.g., Sherrod v. Piedmont Aviation, 516 F.Supp. 46, 52-53 (E.D. Tenn. 1978); Wisner v. S.S. Kresge Co., 465 S.W.2d 666, 669 (Mo. App. 1971); First Sec. Bank & Trust Co. v. Roach, 493 S.W.2d 612, 619 (Tex. Civ. App. 1973).

n53 J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.36 ,at 105; see Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908(2) & comment e (1979); W. Prosser, supra note 17, § 2, at 14; K. Redden, supra note 34, § 3.5(C), at 61. The financial condition of a defendant should be considered because the same monetary punishment may be severe to a relatively poor defendant but only a slap on the wrist to a rich one. Nevertheless, discovery and disclosure at trial of evidence concerning a defendant's financial status have been among the most controversial aspects of punitive damages law. See Morris, Punitive Damages in Tort Cases, 44 Harv. L. Rev. 1173, 1191 (1931); Exemplary Damages, supra note 34, at 528. While a few states have enacted statutes that require a preliminary finding that punitive damages will probably be awarded before permitting discovery of a defendant's financial status, see Cal. Civ. Code § 3295(c) (West Supp. 1982); Wis. Stat. § 804.01 (1977), many states have left the issue to judicial decision, see J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 9.11, at 34-35.

n54 See K. Redden, supra note 34, § 3.6(c), at 63-64. As a practical matter, the reasonable relation rule has not been rigidly followed even by those jurisdictions which recognize it. See Pinckard v. Dunnavant, 281 Ala. 533, 538, 206 So. 2d 340, 344 (1968); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 48 (Alaska 1979), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); H.J. Miller v. Carnation Co., 39 Colo. App. 1, 6-7, 564 P.2d 127, 131 (1977).

n55 See supra note 49 and accompanying text.

n56 Ellis, Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, 38-39 (1982); see Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment d (1979); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.39; K. Redden, supra note 34, § 3.6(A), at 62.

REV_00262304

n57 Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment d (1979).

n58 The first reported instance of a punitive damages award sustained in a products liability case is Fleet v. Hollenkemp, 52 Ky. 175, 13 B. Mon. 219 (1852), in which a pharmacist's error led to the plaintiff's ingestion of traces of poison mixed with his medicine. The court held that awarding punitive damages should not depend on the form of action, but on the nature of the harm and the conduct which caused it. Id. at 180, 13 B. Mon. at 225-26.

n59 Products Liability suits filed in federal district courts increased by 134% between 1974 and 1976. 3 Research Group, Inc., Interagency Task Force on Product Liab., Product Liability: Final Report of the Legal Study 9 (1977).

n60 Ford Motor Company, for example, reported that less than 0.5% of the products liability complaints filed against it prior to 1970 contained claims for punitive damages, while 27.1% of all such complaints in 1980 sought punitive awards. See Owen I, supra note 21, at 54 n.258. If only personal injury lawsuits are considered, the 1980 percentage is higher. Id. One commentator notes that "whereas 25 years ago, the punitive damage case was a rarity, today it is an anomaly when one sees a complaint which does not seek punitive damages." Levit, Punitive Damages: Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow, 1980 Ins. L.J. 257, 259 (emphasis in original).

n61 Haskell, The Aircraft Manufacturer's Liability for Design and Punitive Damages -- The Insurance Policy and the Public Policy, 40 J. Air L. & Com. 595, 620 (1974) ("When a plaintiff relies on a strict liability theory, logic compels the conclusion that punitive damages are inappropriate."); Tozer, Punitive Damages and Products Liability, 39 Ins. Couns. J. 300, 301 (1972) ("Strict liability and punitive damages will not mix. In strict liability the character of the defendant's act is of no consequence; in the punitive danages claim the character of the act is paramount."); see Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 322, 294 N.W. 2d 437, 468 (1980) (Coffey, J., dissenting); Ghiardi & Koehn, Punitive Damages in Strict Liability Cases, 61 Marq. L. Rev. 245, 251 (1977).

n62 See e.g., Drake v. Wham-O Mfg. Co., 373 F. Supp. 608, 611 (E.D. Wis. 1974); Fleet v. Hollenkemp, 52 Ky. 175, 179-81, 13 B. Mon. 219, 225-26 (1852); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 275, 294 N.W. 2d 437, 446 (1980).

n63 See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 775, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 360 (1981) (Pinto fuel tank vulnerable to crash); Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 729 (Minn.) (pajamas catching on fire), cert. denied, 101 S.Ct. 320 (1980); Wangen .v Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis.2d 260, 263, 294 N.W.2d 437 447 (1980) (rupture of car fuel tank). Punitive damages have also been permitted in other types of strict liability actions. See, e.g., Reynolds v. Pegler, 123 F. Supp. 36, 37 (S.D.N.Y. 223 F.2d 429 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 846 (1955); Milford v. Tidwell, 276 Ala. 110, 112, 159 So. 2d 621, 623 (1963) (trespass to land and liability for ultra-hazardous activities); Nevada Cement Co. v. Lemler, 89 Nev. 447, 448-49, 514 P.2d 1180, 1181 (1973) (nuisance).

n64 See, e.g., Kappinger v. Cullen-Schlitz & Assocs., 513 F.2d 901, 906 (8th Cir. 1975) (defendants liable based on res ipsa loquitur for injuries and death resulting from gas explosion); Moore v. Jewel Tea Co., 116 Ill. App. 2d. 109 132 253 N.E.2d 636 647-48 (1969) (Drano manufacturer liable based on res ipsa loquitur for injuries resulting from explosion of Drano) aff'd 46 Ill. 2d 288, 263 N.E.2d 103 (1970); Rinker v. Ford Motor Co., 567 S.W.2d 655, 667-68 (Mo. App. 1978) (negligent failure to warn).

n65 See, e.g., Gillham v. Admiral, 523 F.2d 102, 107 (6th Cir. 1975) (defendant misrepresented safety of television), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 913 (1976); Campus Sweater & Sportswear Co v. M.B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 97 (D.S.C. 1979) (defendant misrepresented usable life of roofing), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981); Standard Oil Co. v. Gunn, 234 Ala. 598, 600, 176 So. 332, 333 (1937) (defendant liable for agent's deceitful sale of adulterated motor oil). Punitive damages have not been permitted, however, in actions for breach of express or implied warranties because of the longstanding general prohibition against the remedy in actions based on contracts. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 355 (1981); A. Corbin, supra note 43, § 1077. Describing warranty actions in products cases as "a synthesis of both tort law and the contract law of sales," Professor Owen argues that punitive damages should not be available in non-commercial actions for product injuries under any legal theory. Owen II, supra note 32, at 1274.

REV_00262305

n66 See Owen I, supra note 21, at 20.

n67 See id. at 10-11; Henderson, Judicial Review of Manufacturer's Conscious Design Choices: The Limits of Adjudication, 73 Colum. L. Rev. 1531 (1973) (courts are unsuited to implement standards for complex product liability issues); Twerski, Weinstein, Donaher & Piehler, Shifting Perspectives in Products Liability: From Quality to Process Standards, 55 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 347 (1980) (same).

n68 See Owen I, supra note 21, at 15.

Final "decisions" concerning a complex product are often the result of a splintered, bureaucratic process involving a complicated combination of human judgments made by scores of persons at different levels in the hierarchy who pass on different aspects of the problem at different times. Various engineers may have to rely upon the work of research chemists, physicists, and other scientists; input from the financial and marketing arms of the enterprise must be factored in along the way. The entire process may take years. Id.

n69 Corporate wealth, as a factor in the amount of punitive damages assessed, is usually proven by net worth. See, e.g., Richards Co. v. Harrison, 262 So. 2d 258, 264 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1972); Nevada Cement Co. v. Lemler, 89 Nev. 447, 453, 514 P.2d 1180, 1183 (1973); cf. Parrott v. Bank of Am. Nat'l Trust & Sav. Ass'n, 97 Cal. App. 2d 14, 25, 217 P.2d 89, 96 (1950) (capital surplus and undivided profits). Professor Owen suggests that in the case of large corporate defendants, a typical jury would "be receptive to an argument that anything less than $ 1 million would be but a drop in the bucket." Owen I, supra note 21, at 20.

n70 See DuBois, supra note 22, at 352-53; Mallor & Roberts, supra note 22, at 663-66; Owen I, supra note 21, at 52; Owen II, supra note 32, at 1320; Note, The Imposition of Punishment by Civil Courts: A Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, 41 N.Y.U.L. Rev. 1158, 1171 (1966) [hereinafter cited as Reappraisal of Punitive Damages].

n71 See supra note 22.

n72 See Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 52-240b (West Supp. 1983).

n73 Owen II, supra note 32, at 1320; see Reappraisal of Punitive Damages, supra note 70, at 1171. This is consistent with the argument that other complex litigation should be removed from the jury system, an issue which has recently received a great deal of attention. See, e.g., Arnold, A Historical Inquiry Into the Right to Trial by Jury in Complex Civil Litigation, 128 U. Pa. L. Rev. 829 (1980); Edquist, The Use of Juries in Complex Cases, 3 Corp. L. Rev. 277 (1980); Jorde, The Seventh Amendment Right to Jury Trial Antitrust Issues, 69 Calif. L. Rev. 1 (1981); Note, The Right to a Jury Trial in Complex Civil Litigation, 32 Stan. L. Rev. 99 (1979); Note, Complex Civil Litigation: Reconciling the Demands of Due Process with the Right to Trial by Jury, 42 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 693 (1981); Annot., 54 A.L.R. Fed. 733 (1981).

REV_00262306

n74 See, e.g., Johnson v. Husky Indus., 536 F.2d 645, 651 (6th Cir. 1976); Forrest City Mach. Works, Inc. v. Aderhold, 273 Ark. 33, 46, 616 S.W.2d 720, 726 (1981); Jones v. Fischer, 42 Wis. 2d 209, 224-27, 166 N.W.2d 175, 183-84 (1969); see also Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment f (1979) ("In many states there has been a tightening of control by the appellate courts over [the] discretion of the trier of fact."); Owen I, supra note 21, at 44 ("In practice . . . especially in cases against institutional defendants, there appears to be a growing trend to subject such awards to greater judicial scrutiny.").

n75 See supra notes 1-7 and accompanying text. The possibility of multiple punitive damages claims exists in other types of personal injury suits as well. The Skywalk collapse and MGM Grand fire are but two recent examples. See supra notes 15-16. Commercial airliner crashes are another. See In re Paris Air Crash of March 3, 1974, 427 F. Supp. 701 (C.D. Cal. 1977), rev'd 622 F.2d 1315 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 101 S. Ct. 387 (1980).

n76 Although insurance coverage might theoretically reduce the danger of financial disaster, the issue whether punitive damages may be insured against has not been resolved uniformly. See, K. Redden, supra, note 34, at 679. The approximately 36 jurisdictions that have considered the question are nearly evenly split. Annot., 16 A.L.R.4th 14-47 (1982). Compare Northwestern Nat'l Casualty Co. v. McNulty, 307 F.2d 432, 441 (5th Cir. 1962) ("[T]here are especially strong public policy reasons for not allowing socially irresponsible automobile drivers to escape the element of personal punishment in punitive damages.") with Lazenby v. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co., 214 Tenn. 639, 647, 383 S.W.2d 1, 5 (1964) (It is not contrary to public policy to hold that a private contract of insurance protects an insured against punitive damages.). Most of the jurisdictions that prohibit insurance coverage of punitive damages on public policy grounds provide an exception when the insured is vicariously liable. J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 7.15 (1981). Alternatively, many of the jurisdictions that allow insurance against punitive damages have refused to allow coverage when the insured's conduct is intentional. K. Redden, supra note 34, § 9.5, at 703; see Long, supra note 33 (discussing both the vicarious liability exception and the alternative intentional tort exception); Sprentall, Insurance Coverage of Punitive Damages, 84 Dick. L. Rev. 221 (1979-1980) (same); Note, An Overview of the Insurability of Punitive Damages Under General Liability Policies, 33 Baylor L. Rev. 203 (1981) (same); Note, Punitive Damages and Liability Insurance: Theory, Reality and Practicality, 9 Cum. L. Rev. 487 (1978) (same); Note, Insurance Coverage of Punitive Damages, 10 Idaho L. Rev. 263 (1974) (same).

n77 See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967). The drug was developed and tested by th William S. Merrell Company, a Cincinnati-based subsidiary of Richardson-Merrelol, Inc. of New York. See Rheingold, The MER/29 Story -- An Instance of Successful Mass Disaster Litigation, 56 Calif. L. Rev. 116, 117 (1968). MER/29 was approved for prescription sales by the FDA based on test data submitted by the manufacturers indicating that the drug was relatively nontoxic in animals and without serious side effects in humans. Id.

n78 Paul Rheingold, who conducted most of plaintiffs' discovery in the litigation, described the promotion as follows:

The initial advertising campaign for doctors included distribution of 100,000 copies of a Western Union manual about MER/29, publication of an eight-page advertisement in leading medical journals, and a series of monthly ads and direct-mail pieces. In true Madison Avenue form, all this material had one simple message: MER/29 had been proved safe, nontoxic and free of side effects. Salesmen on the routes and even a free handout movie repeated the message.
Rheingold, supra note 77, at 145.

n79 See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 836 (2d Cir. 1967); Toole v.

REV_00262307

Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 701, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 408 (1967). It has been estimated that over 5,000 people were injured by the drug. Rheingold, supra note 77, at 121.

n80 Rheingold, supra note 77, at 121. In addition, hundreds of claims were settled without lawsuits being filed. Id.

n81 Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 & n.9 (2d Cir. 1967). The company apparently concealed reports of side effects in humans from inquiring physicians as well as the FDA and continued to promote the drug as entirely safe even after strong evidence that it was not became available. See Toole v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 695-701, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 404-08 (1967); Rheingold, supra note 77, at 119. The Second Circuit held, however, that management's conduct did not amount to "deliberate disregard." 378 F.2d at 844-50. Prompted by charges that the company had submitted fraudulent test data to the FDA, the Department of Justice launched an investigation of all test data and reports of toxicity and side effects known to Richardson-Merrell. Rheingold, supra note 77, at 120. Indictments were returned by a Washington, D.C. grand jury in December, 1963, formally charging Richardson-Merrell, its subsidiary, Willaims S. Merrell, and three of the subsidairy's chemists withe submitting false test data to the FDA and withholding otehf test date and reports which diclosed toxicity and side effects. Id. at 120-21. After pleading nolo contendere in a prior criminal proceeding, the two corporate defendants were fined a total of $ 80,000. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 n.8 (2d Cir. 1967).

n82 254 F. Supp. 430 (S.D.N.Y. 1966), rev'd in part, 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967). Plaintiff alleged that he suffered skin disorders, hair loss and eventually developed cataracts from his use of the drug in 1961.378 F.2d at 836. His case was the first to be tried of 75 MER/29 cases then pending in the Southern District of New York. Id. at 834.

n83 378 F.2d at 834.

n84 Id. at 835.

n85 Id. at 840-41.

n86 Id. at 850. The court noted instances in the record demonstrating falsification and fraudulent omissions by chemists, but it did not find sufficient evidence of recklessness on the part of high level management to hold the corporation accountable for punitive damages. Purporting to follow New York's complicity rule, which holds the corporate master liable for punitive damages "only when superior officers either order, participate in or ratify outrageous misconduct," id. at 842 (quoting Morris, Punitive Damages in Personal Injury Cases, 21 Ohio St. L.J. 216, 221 (1960)), the court held that the executives were not aware of the danger of MER/29, id. at 850. In Toole v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398 (1967), however, the court reviewed a punitive damage verdict based on essentially the same evidence, applied the complicity rule, and concluded that there was "evidence from which the jury could conclude that [Richardson-Merrell] brought its drug to market, and maintained it on the market, in reckless disregard of the possibility that it would visit serious injury upon persons using it." Id. at 714, 60 Cal. Rptr. at 416. The careful scrutiny which was given to the evidence in Roginsky is closer than Toole to the approach of Professor Owen, who advocates tighter judicial control over punitive damages awards in products liability cases. Professor Owen would require clear and convincing evidence of "flagrant indifference to the public safety." Owen II, supra note 32, at 1368; see Owen I, supra note 21, at 59.

n87 E.g., Moran v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 691 F.2d 811, 817 (6th Cir. 1982); Neal v. Carey Can. Mines, Ltd., 548 F. Supp. 357, 376 (E.D. Pa. 1982); Froud v. Celotex Corp., 107 Ill. App. 3d 654, 660, 437 N.E.2d 910, 914-15 (1982) (Sullivan, J., concurring).

REV_00262308

n88 Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1967). Judge Friendly also expressed alarm at the impact that one mistake could have on an entire corporation, stating that a "sufficiently egregious error as to one product can end the business life of a concern that has wrought much good in the past and might otherwise have continued to do so in the future, with many innocent stockholders suffering extinction of their investments for a single management sin." Id. at 841.

Having identified the problem, the court considered three alternatives for resolving it, ultimately rejecting each as unworkable. The first alternative was an instruction to the jury, like that given by the trial judge, to consider the effect of other similar lawsuits pending against the defendant throughout the country. Id. at 839. The court concluded that such an instruction was so vague and uncertain that as a practical matter it could not be followed. Id. at 839. The court also expressed concern that local juries might demand that plaintiffs in their district receive awards comparable to those received by plaintiffs in other communities. Id. at 840. The second alternative was to place an arbitrary ceiling on punitive awards in mass tort cases. This, too, was dismissed as impracticable because there was no assurance that other states would follow suit. Id. at 840. Finally, the court mentioned the benefits of consolidating all pending cases in a single court and allowing a jury to make one award which would then be held for distribution to all successful plaintiffs. This solution was also rejected, however, because of the inability of a federal court or any state court to consolidate all of the cases filed in different states. Id. at 839-40 n.ll. Much earlier, Richardson-Merrell had proposed that the Coordinating Committee for Multiple Litigation of the United States District Courts (predecessor to today's Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation) assume control over all pretrial phases of the MER/29 litigation. Rheingold, supra note 77, at 126.The request was denied, presumably because the majority of the cases had been filed in state courts, and the federal courts therefore had no power to order consolidation. Id. at 126.

n89 Rheingold, supra note 77, at 137. All settlements were designated as payments for compensatory damages only, id. at 138-39, although some undoubtedly included payments beyond what would have been included in the absence of punitive damages claims.

n90 Id. at 133, 136.

n91 Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 851 (2d Cir. 1967).

n92 Toole v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689, 717, 60 Cal. Rptr. 398, 418 (1967) (trial judge reduced punitive damages from $ 500,000 to $ 250,000); Ostopowitz v. Wm. S. Merrell Co., No. 5879-1963 (N.Y. Sup. Ct.) (trial judge reduced punitive damages from $ 850,000 to $ 100,000), reported in N.Y.L.J., Jan. ll, 1967, at 21, col. 3.

n93 Owen II, supra note 32, at 1324-25. Professor Owen observed:

[I]f this is an example of the most crushing punishment that will befall a manufacturer guilty of flagrant marketing misbehavior -- and it is difficult to imagine a more extreme case of such misbehavior than that of Richardson-Merrell in marketing MER/29 -- then the threat of bankrupting a manufacturer with punitive damages awards in mass disaster litigation appears to be more theoretical than real.
Id. A federal district court reached the same conclusion in 1979 in a commercial products liability case involving two sizeable punitive damages verdicts against a supplier of roofing materials: "Twelve years have now passed, and many of the fears expressed by Judge Friendly have simply not been realized . . . . This court is unconvinced that the 'specter of overkill' is anything more than just that -- an unrealized phantom or mental image." Campus Sweater & Sportswear Co. v. M.B. Kahn Constr. Co., 515 F. Supp. 64, 109 (D.S.C. 1979), aff'd, 644 F.2d 877 (4th Cir. 1981).

REV_00262309

n94 See supra notes 9, 11, 13 and accompanying text.

n95 See supra note 12 and accompanying text.

n96 See, e.g., Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 852 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); deHaas v. Empire Petroleum Co., 435 F.2d 1223, 1231 (10th Cir. 1970); Globus v. Law Research Serv., Inc., 418 F.2d 1276, 1285 (2d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 913 (1970); Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1967); Maxey v. Freightliner Corp., 450 F. Supp. 955, 962 (N.D. Tex. 1978), aff'd in part, vacated in part on other grounds, 665 F.2d 1367 (5th Cir. 1980); Vollert v. Summa Corp., 389 F. Supp. 1348, 1351 (D. Hawaii 1975); Delos v. Farmer Ins. Group, 93 Cal. App. 3d 642, 667, 155 Cal. Rptr, 843, 859 (1979); Unified School Dist. No. 490 v. Celotex Corp., 6 Kan. App. 2d 346, 355, 629 P.2d 196, 206 (1981); State ex rel. Young v. Crookham, 618 P.2d 1268, 1274 (Or. 1980); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 291-92, 294 N.W. 2d 437, 454 (1980); see also Morris, supra note 53, at 1194-95 & n.39; Owen II, supra note 32, at 1325; Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1805.

n97 See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 297-98, 294 N.W.2d 437, 457 (1980); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 6.09, at 31.

n98 See infra notes 104-10 and accompanying text.

n99 See infra notes 111-14 and accompanying text.

n100 See infra notes 115-19 and accompanying text.

n101 See infra notes 120-27 and accompanying text.

n102 See infra notes 129-30 and accompanying text.

n103 See infra pt. III.

n104 Owen I, supra note 21, at 49 n.227. A similar approach was proposed in Riley, supra note 21, at 252.

n105 In Roginsky, Judge Friendly discussed setting a limit of $ 5,000-$ 10,000 in each individual case. Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 840 (2d Cir. 1967). One obvious problem with this approach is that it leaves open the possibility of an aggregate award that could destroy a smaller enterprise. Moreover, dollar limits are inherently inflexible and may often be unfair.

n106 Juries may find this argument particularly persuasive. See Owen I, supra note 21, at 51 n.243. In Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348 (1981), for example, the jury awarded $ 125 million in punitive damages based largely on plaintiffs' evidence that Ford had saved $ 100 million by not adopting a safer design for the Pinto fuel system. Wall St. J., Feb. 14, 1978, at 1, col. 4. The Wall Street Journal reported that the jury foreman "recalls bringing up the $ 125 million figure himself. He reasoned that if Ford had saved $ 100 million by not installing safe tanks, an award matching that wouldn't really be punitive. So he added $ 25 million." Id. at 17, col. 1. The trial judge reduced the award to $ 3.5 million. 119 Cal. App. 3d at 772, 174 Cal. Rptr. at 358.

n107 See Mallor & Roberts, supra note 22, at 669; Owen II, supra note 32, at 1325; Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1811-12 (1979).

REV_00262310

damages by only a few of many plaintiffs. [27]

In the face of overwhelming opposition to the class actions by the plaintiffs, however, both class actions were decertified on appeal. [28] The appellate decisions are particularly significant because the rationales espoused by the courts are capable of wide application. Therefore, they may inhibit the use of class actions even in circumstances in which they would provide the most practicable way to adjudicate multiple punitive damages claims. [29]

This Article delineates those circumstances in which punitive damages class actions should be certified and recommends other adjudicatory procedures that may be used when class actions are inappropriate. Part I traces the development of the punitive damages doctrine and reviews its growth in products liability litigation. Part II discusses the present state of the law regarding multiple punitive damages claims and examines proposals for legislative and judicial reform. Part III reviews class action procedures, discusses their applicability in mass tort litigation and provides a detailed examination of the Dalkon Shield and Skywalk class actions. Finally, Part IV recommends adjudicatory procedures that provide for the equitable distribution of punitive damages awards and retain the doctrine's deterrent impact without destroying ongoing business enterprises.

I. PUNITIVE DAMAGES: GENERAL PRINCIPLES AND RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

A. The Procedural Framework

The doctrine of punitive damages [30] permits a plaintiff in a civil lawsuit to recover a sum of money in addition to compensatory damages when the defendant's tortious conduct is determined to have been [*43] particularly outrageous. [31] These awards are not really damages at all. Rather, they are quasi-criminal sanctions imposed to punish defendants and to deter repetition of the offensive conduct by the defendant and other potential wrongdoers. [32] Unlike criminal fines and penalties, however, punitive damages are awarded directly to a successful plaintiff in a civil lawsuit [33] and are assessed without the procedural safeguards granted to criminal defendants. [34] These features, together with the unpredictability of punitive damages awards, [35] have sparked [*44] much criticism and debate. [36] The survival of the doctrine in modern tort litigation despite these recurring attacks is testimony to its four thousand years of historical precedent. [37]

Inherited by American courts from the English common law, [38] the doctrine of punitive damages is generally accepted in all but four states [39] and is specifically provided for in many state [40] and federal [41] [*45] statutes. In most jurisdictions, punitive damages may be assessed for conduct that is malicious, reckless, willful, wanton or in conscious disregard of the consequences. [42] They are generally unavailable in breach of contract actions, [43] wrongful death actions [44] and actions against governmental entities. [45]

[*46] The procedural framework for applying the doctrine is substantially the same in all jurisdictions. [46] First, the trial judge must make a [*47] preliminary determination that there is sufficient evidence of aggravated conduct to justify the imposition of punitive damages. [47] Then the jury [48] has discretion to make an award and to determine an amount. [49] In assessing the amount, the jury is usually instructed by the trial judge to consider the purpose of punitive damages, [50] the culpability of the defendant's conduct, [51] the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injuries [52] and the wealth of the defendant. [53] Several states also require that the punitive damages award bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages award. [54] Although the jury may choose not to award punitive damages, [55] any award it does make [*48] is subject to review by both the trial judge and the appellate courts. [56] Excessive verdicts may be reduced or may provide grounds for reversal, a new trial or the exercise of remittitur. [57]

B. Application in Products Liability Litigation

REV_00262284

n108 See infra note 183.

n109. Owen I, supra note 21, at 49 n.227; Riley, supra note 21, at 252.

n110. H.R. 5214, 97th Cong., 1st Sess. (1981) was substantially identical to Professor Owen's aggregate cap proposeal. compare id. § 11(d)-(e) (punitive damages limited to $ 1 million for each claimant; if aggregate sum of previous awards equal to lesser of $ 5 million of rive percent of net worth, punitive damages limited to lesser of litigation expenses or $ 1 million) with Owen I, supra note 21, at 48 & n.227 (punitive damages limited to $ 1 million for each claimant; if aggregate sum of previous awards equal to lesser of $ 5 million or five percent of net worth, punitive damages limited to litigation expenses). This bill, introduced by Rep. Norman D. Shumway (R. Cal.), was referred to teCommittee on Enerby and Commerce, 127 Cong. Rec. H 9529 (daily ed. Dec. 14, 1981), but was not reported out for consideration by the House of Representatives during the 97th Congress.

n111 Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1801.

n112 Id.

n113 Only the first plaintiff to secure a judicially-approved award would be assured of recovery. Smaller future awards, even if justified, would result in no recovery.

n114 The author of the "add-on" proposal suggests that enactment could be made under the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, U.S. Const., art. I, § 8, cl. 3. See Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1801.

n115 374 F. Supp. 850 (M.D. Pa. 1974).

n116 Id. at 857.

n117 Id. In rejecting plaintiff's argument that the jury should consider the impact of Aralen on the whole of society, the court stated:

Applying the plaintiff's rationale, each injured consumer of Aralen, using identical evidence regarding testing, notice, etc., could individually recover on behalf of "society" to punish the affront. Such a result would be ludicrous. Instead, we view the law to be that each Aralen consumer showing a bona fide injury may, if the evidence warrants, collect his reasonable proportion of the punitive damages the defendant owes to "society."
Id.

n118 Id. Professor Owen agrees with the court's view that the punitive damages verdict must be a reasonable sum in relation to the defendant's conduct vis-a-vis the plaintiff: "This view probably is correct in that it relates the punitive award to the plaintiff's injury consistent with traditional doctrine, reduces substantially the incentive to race to the courthouse, and anticipates a multiplicity of similar actions that together will result in many smaller 'stings' to the manufacturer." Owen I, supra note 21, at 51 n.243.

n119 See Restatement (Second) of Torts § 908 comment e (1979).

n120 Id.

n121 Unified School Dist. No. 490 v. Celotex Corp., 6 Kan. App. 2d 346, 355, 629 P.2d 196, 206 (1981); State ex rel. Young v. Crookham, 618 P.2d 1268, 1273 (Or. 1980); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 304, 294 N.W.2d 437, 459-60 (1980). Contra Lemer v. Boise Cascade, Inc., 107 Cal. App. 3d 1, 9-11, 165 Cal. Rptr. 555, 560-61 (1980). In Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839 (2d Cir. 1967), Judge Friendly commended the trial court for instructing the jury to consider the effect of other cases and potential cases against the defendant, but expressed uncertainty about the effect of such an instruction: "[I]t is hard to see what even the most intelligent jury would do with this, being inherently unable to know what punitive damages, if any, other juries in other states may award other plaintiffs in actions yet untried." Id. The court noted that the trial judge in Ostopowitz v. Wm. S. Merrell Co., No. 5879-1963 (N.Y. Sup. Ct.), reported in N.Y.L.J., Jan. 11, 1967, at 21, col. 3, refused to admit the same evidence. Id.

REV_00262311

n122 See Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.20(3) (West Supp. 1981); Or. Rev. Stat. § 30.925 (1979).

n123 See Morris, supra note 53, at 1195; Owen II, supra note 32, at 1319; Riley, supra note 21, at 213.

n124 There is a split of authority regarding the admissibility of criminal sanctions arising out of the same conduct. Compare Browand v. Scott Lumber Co., 125 Cal. App. 2d 68, 74-75, 269 P.2d 891, 896 (1954) (assault and battery conviction properly considered in civil action based on the altercation) and Wirsing v. Smith, 222 Pa. 8, 16, 70 A. 906, 909 (1908) (conviction admissible in aggravated assault and battery suit arising out of the same incident) with Irby v. Wilde, 155 Ala. 388, 391, 46 So. 454, 454 (1908) (not proper to introduce assault conviction in mitigation of punitive damages in civil trial) and C. McCormick, supra note 42, at § 82 (generally not proper to introduce evidence of criminal punishment in mitigation of punitive damages). See generally Annot., 98 A.L.R.3d 870 (1980) (criminal liability barring or mitigating recovery of punitive damages).

n125 See Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 304-05, 294 N.W.2d 437, 459-60 (1980). There is, however, no unanimity on this point. Some contend that the difficulties of keeping abreast of every case and of predicting the outcome of future cases, including claims not yet filed, make this proposal impracticable to administer. See Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 97 Wis. 2d 260, 325, 294 N.W.2d 437, 469 (1980) (Coffey, J., dissenting) ("Are the Wisconsin courts to monitor the courts of the other 49 states so as to insure that a Wisconsin court's award of punitive damages does not place an undue burden on the manufacturer and his employees?"); Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1806 (jury would be forced to predict outcome of subsequent actions as well as consider those being adjudicated or already adjudicated).

n126 See Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 840 (2d Cir. 1967); Punitive Damages Overkill, supra note 21, at 1806-07. Professor Morris recommended that the jury be apprised of such evidence, but cautioned:

This would not be without its dangers, for juries might assume that since the defendant has once been found guilty, their verdict must necessarily be against him. They might also fail to see that the defendant has already been punished in part, and might feel it their duty to punish him more severely because of the injury to others than the plaintiff.In other words, this evidence which is given to the jury on the theory that the defendant should have a comparatively lenient admonition, if any, might prejudice them in such a way that the defendant would be held liable regardless of a failure of the plaintiff to prove his case, and be given more severe admonition than he would receive without its admission.
Morris, supra note 53, at 1195 n.40.

n127 This seems particularly true in a close case when the question of a product's defectiveness is seriously disputed. Plaintiffs' attorneys might welcome this evidence to tip the scales on a complicated issue of liability. The fact that other juries have found the defendant's conduct in marketing the product outrageous in addition to finding the product defective might be an important consideration in the jury room. See J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.40, at 125-26; Mallor & Roberts, supra note 22, at 665.

REV_00262312

n128. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damages Procedure, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269, 295 (1983). Evidence of other punitive damages claims might otherwise be inadmissible. Id. The prejudicial character of prior judgments against the defendant may be exacerbated by the fact that different standards of proof obtained in the previous trial. J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.42, at 129.

n129 See supra notes 22, 71 and accompanying text.

n130 See supra text accompanying notes 50-53.

n131 See supra note 66.

n132 See Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522, 530 (1975); Duncan v. Louisiana, 391 U.S. 145, 156 (1968).

n133 Morris, supra note 53, at 1195.

n134 Id. Professor Morris, however, was discussing a situation like that presented by the twin cases of Luther v. Shaw, 157 Wis. 231, 147 N.W. 17 (1914), and Luther v. Shaw, 157 Wis. 234, 147 N.W. 18 (1914). In thosae cases, a man who failed to fulfil a promise of marriage was held liable for punitive damages both to the jilted woman for breach of promise, 157 Wis. at 233, 147 N.W. at 17, and to her father for "seduction" of his daughter, 157 Wis. at 235, 147 N.W. at 18. Professor Morris specifically limited his proposal to these and similar facts: "Such practice might not be advisable when it would result in the presentation to a court of evidence of a highly disparate mass of losses only tied together by the common factor of being caused by a single act." Morris, supra note 53, at 1195.

n135 Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832, 839-40 n.11 (2d Cir. 1967). The court ultimately rejected this procedure because it considered federal legislation the only practicable means of implementation: "[W]e perceive no way of accomplishing that except by legislation requiring all claims in respect of drugs supervised by the FDA tobe asserted in the Federal courts -- hardly a desirable course." Id n136 See, e.g., Fed. R. Civ. P. 20(a) (joinder); Fed. R. Civ. P. 22 (interpleader); Fed. R. Civ. P. 24 (intervention); Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(a) (consolidation).

n137 See F. James & G. Hazard, Civil Procedure § 12.10 (2d ed. 1977) (federal process can generally only be served within territorial limits of a state in which a court is sitting); C. Wright, Federal Courts 420-21 (4th 3d. 1983) (same).

n138 See C. Wright, supra note 137, at 420-21. See supra note 88.

n139 The Judicial Panel consists of seven circuit and district judges designated by the Chief Justice of the United States. 28 U.S.C. § 1407(d) (1976).

n140 Id. § 1407. The Judicial Panel, upon its own initiative or motion of a party, may order cases from various districts transferred to a convenient forum for pre-trial purposes. Id. § 1407(c). This procedure has been invoked in many instances of mass tort litigation. See, e.g., In re Cutter Labs., Inc. "Braunwald-Cutter" Aortic Heart Valve Prods. Liab. Litig., 465 F. Supp. 1295 (J.P.M.D.L. 1979); In re Multi-Piece Rim Prods. Liab. Litig., 464 F.Supp. 969 (J.P.M.D.L. 1979); In re Air Crash Disaster at Taipei Int'l Airport on July 31, 1975, 433 F. Supp. 1120 (J.P.M.D.L. 1977); In re Air Crash Disaster at Fla. Everglades on Dec. 29, 1972, 360 F. Supp. 1394 (J.P.M.D.L. 1973). Cases involving the Dalkon Shield IUD were transferred by the Judicial Panel in 1975 to the United States District Court for the District of Kansas for co-ordinated pre-trial proceedings. See In re A.H. Robins Co., "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods.

REV_00262313

Liab. Litig., 406 F. Supp. 540 (J.P.M.D.L. 1975).

n141 See 28 U.S.C. § 1407(a) (1976). Another limitation on the Judicial Panel is its inability to consolidate cases pending in both state and federal courts. In addition, even in the unlikely event that all mass tort law suits were brought in federal courts, consolidation within a single district could be achieved only with respect to the cases already pending. Therefore, when claims arise over an extended period of time, as do many that arise from a single design defect in a mass-produced product, consolidation would not prevent multiple punitive damages awards. See J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 5.42, at 128.

n142 28 U.S.C. § 1404(a) (1976); see In re Multidistrict Civil Actions Involving Air Crash Disaster near Hanover, N.H. on Oct. 25, 1968, 342 F. Supp. 907, 910 (D.N.H. 1971).

n143 See 7 C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1751 (1972 & Supp. 1980).

n144 See infra notes 216-20 and accompanying text.

n145 See infra pt. IV (A).

n146 For a detailed history of equitable class actions and their eventual application in damages cases, see Foster, The Status of Class Action Litigation, Research Contributions of the American Bar Foundation (No. 4 1974).

n147 The full text of original Rule 23 and advisory committee notes are reprinted in 3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, Moore's Federal Practice P 23.01 [1.-1], [2] (2d ed. 1982). Most states have some form of class action statute, several of them similar to Rule 23. Note, State Class Action Statutes: A Comparative Analysis, 60 Iowa L. Rev. 93, 102 (1974); Comment, Federal and State Class Actions: Developments and Opportunities, 46 Miss. L.J. 39, 74-76, 78-82 (1975); see Unif. Class Actions [Act] [Rule], 12 U.L.A. 21 (Supp. 1983) (act similar to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23).

n148 Original Rule 23 reflected Professor Moore's terminology and distinction between "true," "hybrid," and "suprious" class suits. It provided in relevant part:[One or more persons may bring suit on behalf of a class] when the character of the right sought to be enforced is

(1) joint, or common . . .

(2) several, and the object of the action is the adjudication of claims which do or may affect specific property involved in the action; or

(3) several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common relief is sought.
3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, supra note 147, at P 23.01 [1.-1], at 23-14. Criticism focused on the inability to comprehend the criteria. See note, Federal Class Actions: A Suggested Revision of Rule 23, 46 Colum. L. Rev. 818, 822 (1946) ("The federal courts have, in general, uncritically accepted Professor Moore's terminology and the analysis of representative actions in terms of jural relationships and joinder, to their own confusion and the frustration of the purpose of representative actions.").

n149 Rule 23(a), as amended, provides:

(a) Prerequisites to a Class Action. One or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all only if (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable, (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class, (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of th eclaims or defenses of the class, and (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

REV_00262314

(b) Class Actions Maintainable. An action may be maintained as a class action if the prerequisites of subdivision (a) are satisfied, and in addition:

(1) the prosecution of separate actions by or against individual members of the class would create a risk of

(A) inconsistent or varying adjudications with respect to individual memebers of the class which would establish incompatible standards of conduct for the party opposing the class, or

(B) adjudications with respect to individual members of the class which would as a practical matter be dispositive of the interests of the other members not parties to the adjudications or substantially impair or impede their ability to protect their interests; or

(2) the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class, thereby making appropriate final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief with respect to the class as a whole; or

(3) the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the class predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for the fair and efficient adjudication of the controversy. The matters pertinent to the findings include: (A) the interest of members of the class in individually controlling the prosecution or defense of separate actions; (B) the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already commenced by or against the members of the class; (C) the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; (D) the difficulties likely to be encountered in the management of a class action.

(c) Determination by Order Whether Class Action to be Maintained; Notice; Judgment; Actions Conducted Partially as Class Action.

(1) As soon as practicable after the commencement of an action brought as a class action, the court shall determine by order whether it is to be so maintained. An order under this subdivision may be conditional, and may be altered or amended before the decision on the merits.

(2) In any class action maintained under subdivision (b) (3), the court shall direct to the members of the class the best notice practicable under the circumstances, including individual notice to all members who can be identified through reasonable effort. The notice shall advise each member that (A) the court will exclude him from the class if he so requests by a specified date; (B) the judgment, whether favourable or not, will include all members who do not request exclusion; and (C) any member who does not request exclusion may, if he desires, enter an appearance through his counsel.

(3) The judgment in an action maintained as a class action under subdivision (b)(1) or (b)(2), whether or not favorable to the class, shall include and describe those whom the court finds to be members of the class. The judgment in an action maintained as a class action under subdivision (b)(3), whether or not favorable to the class, shall include and specify or describe those to whom the notice provided in subdivision (c)(2) was directed, and who have not requested exclusion, and whom the court finds to be members of the class.

(4) When appropriate (A) an action may be brought or maintained as a class action with respect to particular issues, or (B) a class may be divided into subclasses and each subclass treated as a class, and the provisions of this rule shall then be construed and applied accordingly.

REV_00262315

(d) Orders in Conduct of Actions. In the conduct of actions to which this rule applies, the court may make appropriate orders: (1) determining the course of proceedings or prescribing measures to prevent undue repetition or complication in the presentation of evidence or argument; (2) requiring, for the protection of the members of the class or otherwise for the fair conduct of the action, that notice be given in such a manner as the court may direct to some or all of the members of any step in the action, or of the proposed extent of the judgment, or of the opportunity of members to signify whether they consider the representation fair and adequate, to intervene and present claims or defenses, or otherwise to come into the action; (3) imposing conditions on the representative parties or on intervenors; (4) requiring that the pleadings be amended to eliminate therefrom allegations as to representation of absent persons, and that the action proceed accordingly; (5) dealing with similar procedural matters. The orders may be combined with an order under Rule 16, and may be altered or amended as may be desirable from time to time.

(e) Dismissal or Compromise. A class action shall not be dismissed or compromised without the approval of the court, and notice of the proposed dismissal or compromise shall be given to all members of the class in such manner as the court directs.
Fe. R, Civ. P. 23.

n150 See Walker v. Jim Dandy Co., 638 F.2d 1330, 1334 (5th Cir. 1981); Shapiro v. Midwest Rubber Reclaiming Co., 626 F.2d 63, 71 (8th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 101 S. Ct. 860 (1981); Rex v. Owens ex rel. State of Okla., 585 F.2d 432, 435-36 (10th Cir. 1978).

n151 See A. Miller, An Overview of Federal Class Actions: Past, Present, and Future 22-31 (1977). There are two additional general prerequisites which have been implied by the courts: that there be an actual identifiable class, 7 C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, supra note 143, § 1760, and that a class representative be a member of that class. Id. § 1761.

n152 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b). Rule 23(b)(2), which applies to actions in which the appropriate remedy is either injunctive or declaratory relief, is not generally pertinent to a discussion of mass tort litigation.

n153 The term "party opposing the class," although ambiguous, is construed to mean the party opposing the claims of the class, rather than a party opposing maintenance of the case as a class action. 3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, supra note 147, P23.35[1], at 23-266 n.5.

n154 See Dale Elec., Inc. v. R.C.L. Elec., Inc., 53 F.R.D. 531 (D.N.H. 1971) (patent infringment action against infringing class).

n155 The advisory committee note to the 1966 amendment of Rule 23(b)(1)(B) states:

In various situations and adjudication as to one or more members of the class will necessarily or probably have an adverse practical effect on the interests of other members who should therefore be represented in the lawsuits. This is plainly the case when claims are made by numerous persons against a fund insufficient to satisfy all claims. A class action by or against representative members to settle the validity of the claims as a whole, or in groups, followed by separate proof of the amount of each valid claim and proportionate distribution of the fund, meets the problem.
Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 advisory committee note to 1966 amendment.

n156 Although Rule 23 only provides for notice in Rule 23(b)(3) class actions, the modern trend is to require notice in subsection (b)(1) mandatory actions as well. See Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 391 F.2d 555, 564-65 (2d Cir. 1968); Richmond Black Police Officers Ass'n v. City of Richmond, 386 F. Supp. 151, 158 (E.D. Va. 1974); Bormann v. Long Island Press n157 3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, supra note 147, P 23.45[1], at 23-316.

REV_00262316

Publishing Co., 379 F. Supp. 951, 954 (E.D.N.Y. 1974); Lopez v. Wyman, 329 F. Supp. 483, 486 (W.D.N.Y. 1971), aff'd mem., 404 U.S. 1055 (1972).

n158 A Miller, supra note 151, at 40. Another distinguishing characteristic of Rule 23(b)(3) class actions is that they are not mandatory. Concerned about binding absent class members, the drafters of the 1966 amendments provided in Rule 23(c)(2) that the best practicable notice be given to all Rule 23(b)(3) class members informing them of their right to opt out of the class if they do not wish to be bound by the result.

n159 This goes well beyond the commonality prerequisite in Rule 23(a), which merely requires the existence of common questions of law or fact. Predominance, however, does not mean that every issue need be common to all class members. See Bryan v. Amrep Corp., 429 F. Supp. 313, 317 (S.D.N.Y. 1977); Contract Buyers League v. F & F Inv., 48 F.R.D. 7, 11 (N.D. Ill. 1969); 7A C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1778 (1972 & Supp. 1982).

n160 The determination of superiority requires a qualitative analysis based on the factors enumerated in Rule 23(b)(3), including the interest in individual control of the litigation, the extent and nature of cases already pending, the desirability of litigating, in the particular forum, and the difficulty of managing a class action.

n161 The 1938 predecessor of Rule 23(b)(3) was nothing more than a permissive joinder device by which similarly situated claimants meeting the prerequisites could opt into the class. See 3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, supra note 147, P23.45[1], at 23-314. The 1966 amendments changed the procedure so that all class members receiving adequate notice are bound unless they opt out. See supra note 149.

n162 Simon, Class Actions -- Useful Tool or Engine of Destruction, 55 F.R.D. 375, 377 (1972); see Miller, Of Frankenstein Monsters and Shining Knights: Myth, Reality, and the "Class Action Problem", 92 Harv. L. Rev. 664, 670 (1979). Professor Miller, however, argues that although the shift from an opt in to an opt out procedure made class actions more available in many cases, the large increase in consumer, antitrust, securities and environmental litigation would have occurred in any event because of the consumer and environmental movements, new legislation expanding private rights and remedies, and a growing pool of attorneys looking for new avenues of litigation. Miller, supra, at 669-76.

n163 Miller, supra note 162, at 665-66. "[Critics] also have charged widespread abuse of the rule by lawyers and litigants on both sides of the 'v.,' including unprofessional practices relating to attorneys' fees, 'sweetheart' settlement deals, dilatory motion practice, harassing discovery, and misrepresentation to judges." Id. see Federal Judicial Center, Manual for Complex Litigation § 1.41 (4th ed. 1977); DuVal, The Class Action as an Antitrust Enforcement Device: The Chicago Experience (pts. 1 & 2), 1976 Am. B. Found. Research J. 1021, 1273; Franks, Rule 23 -- Don Quixote Has a Field Day: Some Ethical Ramifications of Securities Fraud Class Actions, 46 Chi.[-]Kent L. Rev. 1 (1969); Handler, The Shift From Substantive to Procedural Innovations in Antitrust Suits -- The Twenty-Third Annual Antitrust Review, 71 Colum. L. Rev. 1, 9 (1971); Kirkham, Complex Civil Litigation -- Have Good Intentions Gone Awry?, 70 F.R.D. 199, 203 (1976); Simon, supra note 162, at 377.

n164 See In re Hotel Tel. Charges, 500 F.2d 86 (9th Cir. 1974); La Mar v. H & B Novelty & Loan Co., 489 F.2d 461 (9th Cir. 1973); Miller, supra note 162, at 679.

n165 See Miller, supra note 162, at 679.

n166 Id.

REV_00262317

n167 Zahn v. International Paper Co., 414 U.S. 291, 301 (1973); Snyder v. Harris, 394 U.S. 332, 339-40 (1969).

n168 Eisen v. Carlisle & Jaquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 177 (1974).

n169 Miller, supra note 162, at 680.

n170 3B J. Moore & J. Kennedy, supra note 147, P23.45[3], at 23-353 n.40 states:

[C]onsidering the wide-spread experience courts are gaining in the use of separate trials for the class issues of liability and individual issues of damage, a mass accident appears peculiarly appropriate for class treatment. Indeed, the question of liability to all those injured in a plane or train crash is more likely to be uniform than that of liability for manipulation of the price of securities; with the introduction of such large-scale public transportation facilities as the "jumbo jets," the ability to determine liability for an accident in one proceeding will be even more desirable.

n171 7A C. Wright, A. Miller & M. Kane, supra note 159, § 1783, at 116-17 states:

The central issue of liability . . . may be a difficult one that occasionally will require lengthy expert testimony, perhaps concerning the physical condition of a vehicle or the state of a technological art in a particular field of transportation or manufacturing. If the various tort claims were tried individually, the evidence would have to be repeated time and time again. . . . Absent other considerations, it seems wasteful to relitigate the same liability issue in different actions and before different courts. The argument for class action treatment is particularly strong in cases arising out of mass disasters such as an airplane crash in which there is little chance of individual defenses being presented.

n172 Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 advisory committee note to 1966 amendment. In a subsequent article, the reporter for the committee wrote that the committee's argument against mass accident class actions was not based on the presence of individual damage questions, a common situation in Rule 23(b)(3) class actions, but was based on the fact that often "the class [action] procedure is not 'superior' to more commonplace devices." Kaplan, Continuing Work of the Civil Committee: 1966 Amendments of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure (I), 81 Harv. L. Rev. 356, 393 (1967); see Weinstein, Revision of Procedure: Some Problems in Class Actions, 9 Buffalo L. Rev. 433, 438-46 (1960) (joinder, interpleader, intervention, consolidation, joint trials and stays are alternative mechanisms for handling mass accident litigation). The committee's reasoning is inapplicable to single event disasters such as commercial airline accidents or building collapses. The issues of liability and defenses to liability would always be common in such cases and a class action would therefore be the superior form of adjudication.

n173 Class actions have been rejected in the following personal injury cases:

(1) Involving the drug DES: Ryan v. Eli Lilly & Co., 84 F.R.D. 230 (D.S.C. 1979); Morrissy v. Eli Lilly & Co., 76 Ill. App. 3d 753, 394 N.E.2d 1369 (1979); Ferrigno v. Eli Lilly & Co., 175 N.J. Super. 551, 420 A.2d 1305 (Law Div. 1980).

(2) Involving the Dalkon Shield intrauterine device: In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir.) (certification reversed on appeal), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); Rosenfeld v. A.H. Robins Co., 63 A.D.2d 11, 407 N.Y.S.2d 196, appeal dismissed, 46 N.Y.2d 731, 385 N.E.2d 1301, 413 N.Y.S.2d Harville v. Johns-Manville Prods. Corp., No. 78-642 (S.D. Ala. Nov. 21, 1979); Yandle v. PPG Indus., Inc., 65 F.R.D. 566 (E.D. Tex. 1974).

REV_00262318

(4) Mass disaster/single occurence: In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.) (hotel skywalk collapse; certification reversed on appeal), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); McDonnel Douglas Corp. v. United States Dist. Court, 523 F.2d 1083 (9th Cir. 1975) (air crash; certification reversed on appeal), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 911 (1976); Marchesi v. Eastern Airlines, Inc., 68 F.R.D. 500 (E.D.N.Y. 1975) (air crash); Causy v. Pan Am. World Airways, Inc., 66 F.R.D. 392 (E.D. Va. 1975) (air crash); Daye v. Pennsylvania, 334 F.Supp. 1337 (E.D. Pa. 1972) (bus accident), aff'd on other grounds, 483 F.2d 294 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 946 (1974); Hobbs v. Northeast Airlines, Inc., 50 F.R.D. 76 (E.D. Pa. 1970) (air crash).

(5) Other: In re Three Mile Island Litig., 87 F.R.D. 433 (M.D. Pa. 1980) (Three Mile Island incident); Wright v. McMann, 321 F. Supp. 127 (N.D.N.Y. 1970) (prisoner injuries resulting from constitutional violations), aff'd in part, rev'd in part on other grounds, 460 F.2d 126 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 885 (1972); City of San Jose v. Superior Ct., 12 Cal. 3d 447, 525 P.2d 701, 115 Cal. Rptr. 797 (1974) (noise pollution from airport); D'Amico v. Sitmar Cruises, Inc., 109 Cal. App. 3d 323, 167 Cal. Rptr. 254 (1980) (food contamination on cruise ship); Snyder v. Hooker Chems. & Plastics Corp., 104 Misc. 2d 735, 429 N.Y.S.2d 153 (Sup. Ct. 1980) (toxic wastes).

n174 See, e.g., In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 850, 855 (9th Cir. 1982) (divergent legal standards; diverse proximate cause issues), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); Yandle v. PPG Indus., Inc., 65 F.R.D. 566, 570-71 (E.D. Tex. 1974) (diverse proximate cause issues); Daye v. Pennsylvania, 344 F. Supp. 1337, 1342-43 (E.D. Pa. 1972) (interest in individual control), aff'd on other grounds, 483 F.2d 294 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 946 (1974); Hobbs v. Northeast Airlines, Inc., 50 F.R.D. 76, 78-79 (E.D. Pa. 1970) (divergent legal standards; interest in individual control); Rosenfeld v. A.H. Robins Co., 63 A.D.2d 11, 16-17, 407 N.Y.S.2d 196, 199 (diverse proximate cause issues), appeal dismissed, 46 N.Y.2d 731, 385 N.E.2d 1301, 413 N.Y.S.2d 374 (1978); see also Comment, Mass Accident Class Actions, 60 U. Cal. L. Rev. 1615, 1638 (1972) ("[T]he three potential obstacles to a mass accident class action are the applicability of differing laws to individual class members, a strong individual interest in controlling separate actions, and the lack of a proper court in which to concentrate the litigation.") [hereinafter cited as Mass Accident Class Actions].

n175 Class actions are viewed more favorably when mass tort claims involve only economic losses, or when personal injuries are part of larger economic loss claims. Compare Ouellette v. International Paper Co., 86 F.R.D. 476 (D. Vt. 1980) (diminished property value and enjoyment of use caused by discharge of waste products into Lake Champlain) and Pruit v. Allied Chem. Corp., 85 F.R.D. 100 (E.D. Va. 1980) (commercial losses caused by discharge of toxic chemical into the James River) and American Trading & Prod. Corp. v. Fischbach & Moore, Inc., 47 F.R.D. 155 (N.D. Ill. 1969) (commercial losses to exhibition resulting from convention center fire) and Anthony v. General Motors Corp., 33 Cal. App. 3d 699, 109 Cal. Rptr. 254 (1973) (reversing denial of certification for owners of GM trucks or campers equipped with defective wheels) and State ex rel. Anaconda Aluminum Co. v. District Ct., 158 Mont. 228, 490 P.2d 351 (1971) (tree damage caused by floride plant emissions) and Hurt v. Midrex Div. of Midland Ross Corp., 276 Or. 925, 556 P.2d 1337 (1976) (denial of class action reversed as to plaintiffs whose automobiles suffered paint damage from particulates emitted from defendant's plants) with cases cited infra note 176.

n176 See, e.g., In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 506 F. Supp. 762 (E.D.N.Y. 1980) (Agent Orange exposure); Payton v. Abbott Labs., 83 F.R.D. 382 (D. Mass. 1979) (DES); Coburn v. 4-R Corp., 77 F.R.D. 43 (E.D. Ky. 1977) (fire at supper club); Bentkowski v. Marfuerza Compania Maritima, S.A., 70 F.R.D. 401 (E.D. Pa. 1976) (contaminated provisions served to cruise ship passengers); Hernandez v. Motor Vessel Skyward, 61 F.R.D. 558 (S.D. Fla. 1973) (same), aff'd, 507 F.2d 1278 (5th Cir. 1975); Stewart v. North Am. Asbestos Corp., No. 78-L201 (McClean Co., Ill. Cir. Ct. 1982) (asbestos-related illness). See infra note

REV_00262319

234 for a discussion of Skywalk state and federal class actions certified after the court of appeals reversed a previous federal certification.

n177 A few classes have been mistakenly certified under Rule 23(b)(1)(A), based on the possibility that individual litigation could result in inconsistent verdicts on the issue of liability for compensatory damages. E.g., In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 423-24 (W.D. Mo.), rev'd on other grounds, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); Coburn v. 4-R Corp., 77 F.R.D. 43, 46 (E.D. Ky. 1977); Hernandez v. Motor Vessel Skyward, 61 F.R.D. 558, 561 (S.D. Fla. 1973), aff'd, 507 F.2d 1278 (5th Cir. 1975); see In re Gabel, 350 F. Supp. 624, 630 (C.D. Cal. 1972), vacated sub nom. McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. United States Dist. Ct., 523 F.2d 1083 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 425 U.S. 911 (1976). Under the better and majority view, the possibility of inconsistent verdicts on liability in actions for personal injuries does not mean a defendant is faced with incompatible standards of conduct within the meaning of Rule 23(b)(1)(A). No inconsistent standards result from the fact that a defendant may win some of the cases and lose others. See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1187 n.8 (8th Cir.) (Heaney, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 342 (1982); McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. United States Dist. "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 506 F. Supp. 762, 789 (E.D.N.Y. 1980); Payton v. Abbott Labs, Inc., 83 F.R.D. 382, 389 (D. Mass. 1979); Causey v. Pan Am. World Airways, Inc., 66 F.R.D. 392, 398 (E.D. Va. 1975); Mass Accident Class Actions, supra note 174, at 1620.

n178 See, e.g., In re "Agent Orange" Prod. Liab. Litig., 506 F. Supp. 762, 790 (E.D.N.Y. 1980); Payton v. Abbott Labs., Inc., 83 F.R.D. 382, 386-87 (D. Mass. 1979); Bentkowski v. Marfuerza Compania Maritima, S.A., 70 F.R.D. 401, 404 (E.D. Pa. 1976); Hernandez v. Motor Vessel Skyward, 61 F.R.D. 558, 561 (S.D. Fla. 1973), aff'd, 507 F.2d 1278 (5th Cir. 1975). The extent and severity of injuries are also significant. Bentkowski v. Marfuerza Compania Maritima, S.A., 70 F.R.D. 401, 404 (E.D. Pa. 1976).

n179 See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981) ("Punitive damages are, to a large degree, a windfall to a plaintiff . . . exacted for the benefit of society . . . ."), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); D. Dobbs, Handbook on the Law of Remedies § 3.9, at 204 ("Punitive damages are not given as of right in any state . . . .").

n180 Each district court also certified classes concerning liability for compensatory damages. In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 419 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 903 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). These certifications were based on considerations different from those that supported adjudicating all the punitive damage claims in a single proceeding. Compare 93 F.R.D. at 422-24 (compensatory damages) with id. at 424-25 (punitive damages), and compare 526 F. Supp. at 894-96 (compensatory damages) with id. at 896-900 (punitive damages).

n181 See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 424 (W.D. Mo.) ("[M]embers of the class face a very real risk that the winner of the race to the courthouse might be awarded all of the monies available."), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 898 (N.D. Cal. 1981) ("It is almost certain that an award of punitive damages to a plaintiff in one case will alter the potential recovery of a plaintiff in a later filed suit."), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n182 93 F.R.D. at 424-25; 526 F. Supp. at 897-98.

n183 The Skywalk court stated: "Those persons who have filed lawsuits presently seek compensatory damage awards in excess of one billion dollars and punitive damage awards in

REV_00262320

Punitive damages have been awarded in products liability actions for over one hundred years. [58] A recent dramatic increase in both the number of cases [59] and the propensity of plaintiffs' lawyers to seek punitive awards, [60] however, has generated a new wave of criticism. Some commentators have assailed the doctrinal inconsistency of permitting a punitive damages claim (which must be based on the wrongful conduct of defendant) in an action based upon strict products liability (which focuses on the product itself). [61] Many courts have held, however, that the evidence necessary to justify a punitive damages award need not parallel that required to establish liability for [*49] compensatory damages. [62] Accordingly, verdicts assessing punitive damages have been upheld in products liability actions grounded in strict liability [63] as well as in negligence [64] and fraud and deceit. [65]

A more troublesome criticism is that juries in products liability cases are ill-equipped to mete out fair and effective punishment to large corporate defendants. [66] The complexity of product design cases, [67] the difficulty of discerning the "wrongfulness" of a corporate decision-making process [68] and the problem of ascertaining the real wealth of a [*50] modern corporation [69] are all factors that distinguish products liability cases from single-incident torts cases. A growing number of commentators [70] and members of Congress [71] and at least one state legislature [72] have taken the position that after a jury decides punitive damages should be imposed, the trial judge should assess the amount. Supporters of this position argue that the determination of appropriate punishment in these cases requires expertise and sophisticated insight into social policy more likely to be possessed by a dispassionate judge than by a jury. [73] While the jury's role in assessing punitive damages in products liability litigation has survived so far, there is a trend toward tighter judicial control over punitive awards. [74]

[*51] C. Mass Tort Punitive Damages Awards -- The MER/29 Cases

The emergence of modern mass tort litigation has caused special problems in assessing and controlling punitive damages awards. A single design error, inadequate warning or recurrent manufacturing mistake can permeate an entire product line, resulting in tens, hundreds or thousands of personal injury lawsuits with accompanying punitive damages claims. [75] Individual awards that appear reasonable can aggregate to threaten the very survival of a business entity. [76]

The first mass tort litigation that presented this problem involved an anti-cholestrol drug sold under the trade name MER/29. [77] Promoted as a safe way to prevent heart attacks, [78] the drug was used by [*52] about 400,000 persons before the manufacturer removed it from the market in response to reports of injurious side effects. [79] Between 1961 and 1967, more than 1500 personal injury lawsuits were filed against the manufacturer in state and federal courts. [80] Many of these actions included claims for punitive damages based upon allegations of fraud in connection with test data submitted by the manufacturer to the Food and Drug Administration. [81]

In Roginsky v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., [82] the plaintiff was awarded $ 17,500 in compensatory damages and $ 100,000 in punitive damages after a lengthy jury trial. [83] The Second Circuit affirmed the compensatory damages award but reversed the punitive damages award on the ground that the issue of punitive damages should not have been submitted to the jury. [84] Although the court recognized that [*53] more than one recovery of punitive damages against a tortfeasor is permissible, [85] it held that the evidence of high-level complicity in the fraudulent conduct was insufficient to justify such an award. [86] The appellate opinion has been cited frequently [87] for the dicta in which Judge Friendly warned of the danger of punitive damages "overkill" in mass tort cases: "The legal difficulties engendered by claims for punitive damages on the part of hundreds of plaintiffs are staggering . . . . We have the gravest difficulty in perceiving how claims for punitive damages in such a multiplicity of actions throughout the nation can be so administered as to avoid overskill." [88] excess of 500 million dollars." In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 419 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). The court observed that while the defendants' assets and liability insurance would be adequate to pay the compensatory damages claims, their ability to pay punitive damages awards was questionable, particularly if Missouri law permitted more than one award. Id. at 424. Even if Missouri law were construed to permit only one award of punitive damages, the court reasoned that a limited fund would still exist because all but the first successful plaintiff would be precluded from recovery. Id. at 425. Finally, the court noted the potential conflict of interest faced by attorneys representing more than one plaintiff if the cases were permitted to proceed individually. A victory by the plaintiff whose case was ready for trial first might preclude the attorney's other clients from recovering punitive damages. Id. at 425. The Dalkon Shield court noted:

REV_00262285

At the present time, some 1,573 suits involving claims for compensatory damages well over $ 500 million and claimed punitive damages in excess of $ 2.3 billion, are pending against A.H. Robins. The potential for the constructive bankruptcy of A.H. Robins, a company whose net worth is $ 280,394,000.00, raises the unconscionable possibility that large numbers of plaintiffs who are not first in line at the courthouse door will be deprived of a practical means of redress.
In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 893 (N.D. Cal. 1981) (footnote omitted), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n184 In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 898 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The Dalkon Shield court reasoned that at some point overlapping punitive damages awards "violate that sense of 'fundamental fairness' which lies at the heart of constitutional due process." Id. at 899. In those circumstances, the court observed:
If plaintiff No. 1 recovers one million dollars in punitive damages, plaintiff No. 2 runs a serious risk of being told that the amount awarded in the first suit represented an implied finding of the maximum amount the defendant should be punished. Obviously, the greater the number of plaintiffs, the more serious the risk becomes that the late plaintiff will find her demand for punitive damages dismissed. At the very least, the trial court may admit evidence as to the payment of prior awards working to the detriment of a party seeking additional punishment for the same misconduct.
Id. at 898 (footnotes omitted).

n185 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 424-25 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); In re Nothern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 897-98 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). According to the district court in the Dalkon Shield case, the representative parties would first present their compensatory damages cases and then proceed with the punitive damages phase of the trial. 526 F. Supp. at 920. If the jury determined that the defendant was liable to the nationwide class for punitive damages, it would be instructed to assess an amount which would punish the defendant once for all potential claimants. Id. The court suggested two alternative pro-rata distribution schemes -- one based on the total number of claimants, and the other based on the amount of compensatory damages awards. Id. at 920 n.183. Although beyond the scope of this Article, it is assumed that the proceeds of any classwide punitive damages recovery would be distributed in some equitable manner along the lines suggested by the district court.

n186 See In re Nothern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 849-50 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); In re Federal skywalk cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1178 (8th Cir), cert denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

REV_00262321

n187 The state court, in which all but 18 of the approximately 140 Skywalk lawsuits were filed, 680 F.2d at 1177 n.5, invested considerable time in the settlement process with remarkable success. Prior to the certification order of January 25, 1982, 121 injury and death claims had been settled for a total of more than $ 18.6 million. This represented 41% of the death claims, 35% of the minor personal injury claims and 26% of the injury claims by persons requiring hospitalization. See Petitioners' Reply to Class Counsel's Brief in Opposition to Petition for Mandamus at 13, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). In the order certifying the class, the district court expressly prohibited any further settlements of punitive damages claims while settlements of compensatory damages claims were permitted to continue. 93 F.R.D. at 428. The effect of this order was to halt the fast pace of settlements. Petitioners' Reply to Class Counsel's Brief in Opposition to Petition for Mandamus at 14, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). Defendants were understandably unwilling to settle just the compensatory damages claims while leaving unresolved the punitive damages claims. Brief of Appellant Jacqueline N. Rau at 36, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). The situation was aggravated when the lead counsel appointed for the class filed a motion to prohibit any action upon the announced intention of certain defendants to offer to settle with plaintiffs in return for full release of both compensatory and punitive damages claims. Id. at 18. Class counsel were concerned that additional settlements, should the jury be advised of them, might reduce the ultimate punitive damage award in the class action trial and result in "unfairness" to class counsel in connection with the fees to be awarded. Memorandum in Support of Plaintiff's Motion in Limine at 14 n.7, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982), cited in Brief of Appellant Jacqueline N. Rau at 36, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). The result was that counsel for the class, apparently in the interest of preserving a large fee, opposed the expeditous payment of claims of the class members it was appointed to represent. Id. at 38. One of the appellants' briefs put the situation in somewhat earthier terms:

> The various cases arising out of the skywalk collapse were proceeding expeditiously and efficiently, under the auspices of plaintiffs' and defendants' coordinating committees, in the Circuit Court for Jackson County, Missouri, well before the institution of the class action in federal court. That entire process is now disrupted. The punitive damage "tail" is wagging the compensatory damage "dog," and lawyers from the East with dollar signs in their eyes have hold of the leash.
> Id. at 43-44.

n188 Opening Brief for Appellant at 11-14, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), vacated, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). Although the court officially granted the defendant's motion for certification of the class, the facts indicated that as a practical matter the court acted sua sponte. Indeed the district court expressly held that it was proper for it to have done so. In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 894 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The Ninth Circuit, in reversing, did not address plaintiffs' argument that a sua sponte order was inconsistent with the traditionally passive role of the court. Compare In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983) with Opening Brief of Appellant at 11-14, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). See also Wilson v. Zarhadnick, 534 F.2d 55, 57 (5th Cir. 1976) ("The grant, sua sponte, of class action relief when it is neither requested nor specified, is an obvious error."); La Mar v. H & B Novelty & Loan Co., 489 F.2d 461, 463-64 (9th Cir. 1973) (judiciary has "fundamentally passive" role in class action litigation).

A court apparently may grant class certification sua sponte as part of its responsibility to administer litigation in a fair and efficient manner. Although the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure neither authorize nor preclude sua sponte class certification, such orders have been used in analogous contexts. See, e.g., Lead Indus. Ass'n v. Occupational Safety & Health Admin., 610 F.2d 70, 79 n.17 (2d Cir. 1979) (transfer pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1404 (a) (1976)); Cass v. Sonnenblick-Goldman Corp., 287 F. Supp. 815, 819 (E.D. Pa. 1968) (consolidation under Fed. R. Civ. P. 41(a)). Additionally, it has been held that when an action is brought as a class, a court need not wait for a motion by the parties before making the determination of certification. See Walker v. World Tire Corp., 563 F.2d 918, 921 (8th Cir. 1977); Senter v. General Motors Corp., 532 F.2d 511, 521-22 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 870 (1976).

REV_00262322

n189 See Opening Brief of Appellant at 14-18, In re Northern Dist. of Cal. Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The Ninth Circuit, however, denied class certification on other grounds and did not address this issue. There was no apparent jurisdictional bar to class certification in this case. Federal courts have indicated that jurisdiction can be exercised over both defendant and plaintiff nonresident class members, albeit in limited fact situations, without meeting the minimum contacts requirements set forth in International Shoe Co. v. Washington, 326 U.S. 310 (1945), provided due process is satisfied through notice and adequate representation. In re Gap Stores Sec. Litig., 79 F.R.D. 283, 291-92 (N.D. Cal. 1978); United States v. Trucking Employers, Inc., 72 F.R.D. 98, 99-100 (D.D.C. 1976).

While this approach to jurisdiction may be accepted in federal court, there is less agreement over whether a state court can exercise jurisdiction over absentee class members due to territorial limitations on its power. While some state courts have followed the federal approach by requiring notice and adequate representation, see Shutts v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 222 Kan. 527, 567 P.2d 1292 (1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1068 (1978); Schlosser v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., 86 Wis. 2d 226, 271 N.W. 2d 879 (1978), others have held that traditional minimum contacts analysis must be applied. See Miner v. Gillette Co., 89 Ill. App. 3d 315, 411 N.E.2d 1092 (1980), modified, 87 Ill. 2d 7 (1981), cert. dismissed, 103 S. Ct. 484 (1983); Spirek v. State Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co., 65 Ill. App. 3d 440, 382 N.E.2d 111 (1978); Feldman v. Bates Mfg. Co., 143 N.J. Super. 84, 362 A.2d 1177 (App. Div. 1976); Klemow v. Time, Inc., 466 Pa. 189, 352 A.2d 12, cert. denied, 429 U.S. 828 (1976). For further analysis of this issue, see Note, Multistate Plaintiff Class Actions: Jurisdiction and Certification, 92 Harv. L. Rev. 718 (1979); Note, Consumer Class Actions with a Multistate Class: A Problem of Jurisdiction, 25 Hastings L.J. 1411 (1974); Note, Toward a Policy-Based Theory of State Court Jurisdiction over Class Actions, 56 Tex. L. Rev. 1033 (1978); Comment, Civil Procedure: In Personam Jurisdiction over Nonresident Plaintiffs in Multistate Class Actions, 17 Washburn L.J. 382 (1978).

n190 See Brief of the Oregon Appellants at 15, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). Such differences, however, can generally be handled in a class action by the use of subclasses, as provided for in Rule 23(c)(4), if there are not so many subclasses that the jury would be unduly confused.

The plaintiffs also argued that a nationwide punitive damages class action raised insurmountable choice of law problems because each state in which cases were pending would apply its own standards for punitive damages. Brief of the Oregon Appellants at 8-13, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). California law, for example, requires that the evidence establish at a minimum that the defendant was reckless. See Taylor v. Superior Court, 24 Cal. 3d 890, 894-95, 598 P.2d 854, 856, 157 Cal. Rptr. 693, 696 (1979); G.D. Searle & Co. v. Superior Court, 49 Cal. App. 3d 22, 32, 122 Cal. Rptr. 218, 225 (1975); Cal. Civ. Code § 3294 (West Supp. 1983). Several other jurisdictions sanction punitive damages awards upon a finding of recklessness or gross negligence. See, e.g., Sturm, Ruger & Co. v.

REV_00262323

Day, 594 P.2d 38, 47 (Alaska 1979), modified on other grounds, 615 P.2d 621 (1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Smith v. Chapmin, 115 Ariz. 211, 214-15, 564 P.2d 900, 903-04 (1977); Kang v. Harrington, 59 Hawaii 652, 663, 587 P.2d 285, 293 (1978); Jolley v. Puregro Co., 94 Idaho 702, 708, 496 P.2d 939, 945 (1972); Lindquist v. Ayerst Labs., Inc., 227 Kan. 308, 316, 607 P.2d 1339, 1347 (1980); Butcher v. Petranek 181 Mont. 358, 361-62, 593 P.2d 743, 745 91979); Samedan Oil Corp. v. Neeld, 91 N.M. 599, 601, 577 P.2d 1245, 1247 91978); Pennsylvania Glass Sand Corp. v. Ozment, 434 P.2d 893, 898 (Okla. 1967). The resolution of these choice of law problems in connection with multistate claims for punitive damages is discussed infra note 226.

n191 The district court in the Dalkon Shield case requested interlocutory review pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1976). In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 919 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). In the Skywalk case, the Eighth Circuit agreed to hear the plaintiffs' appeal on the ground that the order was an injunction within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) (1976), which provides in pertinent part: "the courts of appeals shall have jurisdiction of appeals from: (1) Interlocutory orders of the district courts of the United States . . . granting, continuing, modifying, refusing or dissolving injunctions . . . ." In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1180 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). Certain plaintiffs also sought review of the district court's order on a petition for mandamus, asserting an abuse of judicial discretion. Id. at 1177. The court of appeals did not discuss the propriety of review on that basis.

n192 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1183 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982) (construing the Anti-Injunction Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2283 (1976)). The majority opinion did not distinguish between the subsection (b)(1)(A) class, which was certified on the issues of liability for compensatory and punitive damages, and the subsection (b)(1)(B) class, which was certified on the issues of liability for and amount of punitive damages. The dissent, however, correctly stated that the subsection (b)(1)(A) class was improper because the rule was not meant to require certification to avoid the possibility of inconsistent damages verdicts. Id. at 1187 n.8 (Heaney, J., dissenting). See supra note 177.

n193 In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 851 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n194 Id. at 852. The Ninth Circuit also decertified the statewide subsection (b)(3) class for compensatory damages because it failed to meet the typicality requirement of Rule 23(a) as well as the superiority requirement of subsection (b)(3). Id. at 854-56. This is consistent with the trend of cases in the Ninth Circuit and throughout the country concerning common question class actions on mass tort liability issues. See supra note 173.

n195 See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1182 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 851-52 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n196 28 U.S.C. § 2283 (1976). The Act provides that a "court of the United States may not grant an injunction to stay proceedings in a State court except as expressly authorized by Act of Congress, or where necessary in aid of its jurisdiction, or to protect or effectuate its judgments." Id.

n197 Id.

n198 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1180 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n199 Id. at 1182. In a strong dissent, Judge Heaney wrote that because the inevitable effect of a Rule 23(b)(1)(B) certification order is to preclude independent litigation in all other courts, it "seems self-evident that an injunction to protect the ordinary scope of a mandatory class action is 'necessary in aid of' the federal jurisdiction over such a class." Id. at 1191-92 (Heaney, J., dissenting).

REV_00262324

n200 Id. at 1182-83. The court cited Vendo Co. v. Lektro-Vend Corp., 433 U.S. 623 (1977), and Kline v. Burke Constr. Co., 260 U.S. 226 (1922), as support. Neither Vendo nor Kline, however, involved a class action, let alone a mandatory action grounded on the need to protect claimants to a limited fund.

n201 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1193 (8th Cir.) (Heaney, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n202 In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 850, cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The court of appeals determined that the factual and legal issues in the punitive damages claims were "not entirely common" to all plaintiffs. Id. With respect to various plaintiffs who began using the product at different times, the court was concerned that the culpability of Robins might vary depending on the information it had concerning side effects, its concealment of that information, and its advertising and promotion. Id. One who suffered injuries in 1974 might have an altogether different punitive damage case than one who was injured in 1970. The court also suggested that the legal standards to be applied in determing whether and to what extent punitive damages should be awarded might well differ among individual plaintiffs. 693 F.2d at 850. See supra note 190. The court's analysis of this issue, however, was inappropriate. The fact that some issues are not common does not mean that the commonality requirement is not met. See Moseley v. General Motors Corp., 497 F.2d 1330, 1334 (8th Cir. 1974). The inquiry under Rule 23(a) is whether there are questions of law and fact common to the class, not whether such questions predominate. Predomination is only required in connection with a Rule 23(b)(3) common question class action. The court essentially conceded this point by stating: "If commonality were the only problem in this case, it might be possible to sustain some kind of a punitive damage class." In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 850 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n203 In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 850 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The court noted in cursory fashion that no plaintiffs sought or accepted the role of representative parties and stated: "Typicality, while it may not be insurmountable, remains a significant problem." Id.

n204 Id. at 851. Opposition to the punitive damages class action was so vehement that some plaintiffs' attorneys threatened legal action against the firm appointed as lead counsel. Not only did that firm subsequently resign as lead counsel for the punitive damages class, but no other plaintiffs' attorneys expressed a willingness to serve as lead counsel. Interview with Rodney Klein, original lead counsel for punitive damages class, in Sacramento, California (June 14, 1982). Although the district court eventually appointed an attorney not previously connected with the Dalkon Shield litigation, who accepted the lead counsel position, the court of appeals was obviously troubled by the plaintiffs' hostility to a class action. See In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 851 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n205 See 693 F.2d at 850-51. The court stated: "We are not necessarily ruling out the class action tool as a means for expediting multi-party product liability actions in appropriate cases, but the combined difficulties overlapping from each of the elements of Rule 23(a) preclude certification in this case." Id. at 851.

n206 See infra pt. III(C)(2)(c).

REV_00262325

n207 In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 851-52 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n208 Id. at 851-52. While the likelihood of insufficient funds to pay all claims is a recognized ground for Rule 23(b)(1)(B) certification, see Coburn v. 4-R Corp., 77 F.R.D. 43 (E.D. Ky. 1977); Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 advisory committee note to 1966 amendment, the factual basis for such a finding was challenged by the plaintiffs. See Opening Brief for Appellant at 9-10, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). The Ninth Circuit was critical of the district court's denial of plaintiffs' motion to conduct limited discovery on the issue of Robins' ability to pay all claims in the litigation: "Rule 23(b)(1)(B) certification is proper only when separate punitive damages claims necessarily will affect later claims. The district court erred by ordering certification without sufficient evidence of, or even a preliminary fact-finding inquiry concerning Robins' actual assets, insurance, settlement experience and continuing exposure." In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 852 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n209 693 F.2d at 851-52.

n210 Id. at 851.

n211 See In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847, 851-52 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983); In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1182 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n212 See supra note 149.

n213 Id.

n214 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 93 F.R.D. 415, 424-25 (W.D. Mo.), vacated, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 342 (1982); In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 898 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n215 If the limited fund concept of Rule 23(b)(1)(B) were extended to cover class actions for punitive damages in products liability cases, a trial court considering certification under Rule 23(b)(1)(B) could properly imply a superiority requirement or otherwise consider superiority in addition to the Rule 23(a) prerequisites. In practice, reviewing courts have found an abuse of discretion only when the trial court incorrectly applied the specific criteria of Rule 23. See, e.g., Walker v. Jim Dandy Co., 638 F.2d 1330, 1335-36 (5th Cir. 1981) (numerosity and commonality); Livesay v. Punta Gorda Isles, Inc., 550 F.2d 1106, 1110 (8th Cir. 1977) (inadequate representation), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Coopers & Lybrand v. Livesay, 437 U.S. 463 (1978); Gay v. Waiters' & Dairy Lunchmen's Union, 549 F.2d 1330, 1332-33 (9th Cir. 1977) (numerosity); Carey v. Greyhound Bus Co., 500 F.2d 1372, 1380-81 (5th Cir. 1974) (numerosity and superiority).

n216 See supra note 187.

n217 Id.

n218 See Brief of Appellant Jaqueline N. Rau at 43-44, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n219 Opening Brief of Appellant at 7, In re Northern Dist. of Cal., Dalkon Shield IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982) (citing Breyer v. A.H. Robins Co., No. 75-1459 (N.D. Cal. 1980), which ruled as a matter of law that there was insufficient evidence to submit the issue of punitive damages to the jury), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 817 (1983).

REV_00262326

n220 These circumstances provided the basis for plaintiffs' argument that Robins had "forum shopped" for an anti-punitive damages court in which to dispose of all the punitive damages claims. Id. at 8.

n221 Another approach that might achieve the same result was recommended in Putz & Astiz, Punitive Damage Claims of Class Members Who Opt Out: Should They Survive?, 16 U.S.F.L. Rev. 1 (1981). The authors suggest that when a common question class action includes claims for punitive damages, those who opt out of the class should be precluded from recovering punitive damages. Id. at 27. Although the authors do not specifically address the problem of mass tort personal injury litigation, this approach could be used in those mass torts which are certifiable under Rule 23(b)(3). One problem, however, is that relatively few mass injury cases have been held to qualify for certification under the common question subsection. See supra note 173. Other problems are the statutory notice and opt out provisions of subsection (c)(2) which are specifically applicable to all Rule 23(b)(3) class actions. Punitive damages class actions pursuant to Rule 23(b)(1)(B), however, do not depend on the maintenance of a class action on the liability issues in the underlying personal injury cases. Therefore, the issue of punitive damages liability could be adjudicated in a single proceeding even if the other issues in the litigation are not appropriate for class action treatment. Moreover, the provisions prohibiting opting out of a Rule 23(b)(1)(B) class action are already in place. There is no need to revise statutory requirements in order to adjudicate all the claims in a single proceeding.

n222 Probably the most troublesome of the Rule 23(a) prerequisites in mass tort cases is "typicality." Plaintiffs will sometimes have claims against defendants not named by other plaintiffs. In the analogous case of LaMar v. H & B Novelty & Loan Co., 489 F.2d 461 (9th Cir. 1973), involving actions based on violations of the Truth in Lending Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1601-1677 (1976), the Ninth Circuit held that a class representative who was not injured by some of the defendants could not sue on behalf of persons with claims against those defendants, even though the representative had suffered identical injuries at the hands of other parties. Id. at 466.

n223 See supra note 215.

n224 See supra note 149.

n225 See S. Speiser, Lawsuit 450-51 (1980); Speiser, Resolving Foreign Air Crashes in the American Court System, Nat'l L.J., Oct 11, 1982, at 24, col. 1.

n226 Choice of law problems should not generally prevent certification if sensible procedures are utilized. A federal court in a diversity case must apply the choice of law rule of the forum. Klaxon Co. v. Stentor Elec. Mfg. Co., 313 U.S. 487 (1941); Strussberg v. New England Mut. Life Ins. Co., 575 F.2d 1262 (9th Cir. 1978). There are several different approaches to tort choice of law, and few judicial opinions that provide clear guidelines. Some states still follow the traditional rule, which applies the law of the place of injury. E. Scoles & P. Hay, Conflict of Laws § 17.7, at 560-61 (1982). Many jurisdictions, however, prefer more analytical choice of law methods such as "interest analysis," see id. §§ 17.11 to .17, the "better law" approach, see id. §§ 17.18 to .20, or the "most-significant-relationship test, see id. §§ 17.21 to .25; Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws § 145 (1971). These approaches require essentially that the forum court determine initially whether there is a true conflict between the substantive rules of two or more of the interested states, and, if there is such a conflict, to apply the rule of the state whose policy would be more adversely affected by the application of the other state's rule. See Bradley, After Hurtado and Bernhard: Interest Analysis and the Search for a Consistent Theory for Choice of Law Cases, 29 Stan. L. Rev. 127, 150 (1976).

When the conflict questions are merely procedural or involve only the standard of culpability for punitive damages liability, there either is no true conflict or the forum state has as much governmental interest in the application of its standard as does any other state. See In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 916-17 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983). In the Dalkon Shield case, defendant A.H. Robins went out of its way to avoid a true conflict situation by indicating that it might stipulate to the most "liberal" standard of punitive damages. Id. at 917. The situation is different if the law of another state with a significant interest does not permit punitive damages. See In re Air Crash Disaster Near Chicago, Ill., 644 F.2d 594, 605 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 878 (1981) (state in which disaster occurred had the most "legitimate interest" in litigation; law barring punitive damages in wrongful death actions prevailed); Sibley v. KLM-Royal Dutch Airlines, 454 F. Supp. 425, 427 (S.D.N.Y. 1978) (applying Dutch law barring punitive damages to claims of Massachusetts residents killed in air crash in Canary Islands).

n227 See supra note 219. The Supreme Court has precluded inquiry into the merits of a class action by a district court seeking to shift the cost of notice to the defendant. Eisen v. Carlisle & Jaquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 177-79 (1974). "[T]he plaintiff must pay for the cost of notice as part of the ordinary burden of financing his own suit. Id. at 179. This should not bar a preliminary assessment of the potential success of a class action by a district court seeking to avoid unnecessary intrusions on the jurisdiction of state courts. Cf. Toucey v. New York Life Ins. Co., 314 U.S. 118, 135 (1941) (The anti-injunction statute "expresses the desire of Congress to avoid friction between the federal government and the states resulting from the intrusion of federal authority into the orderly functioning of a state's judicial process.").

n228 Punitive damages claims arising out of product-related injuries will sometimes involve such divergent factual issues that trying them all in one proceeding would be unduly chaotic, even with the utilization of subclasses permitted by Rule 23(c)(4).

n229 28 U.S.C. § 1407(a) (1976) ("Such transfers shall be made by the judicial panel . . . upon its determination that transfers for such proceedings will be for the convenience of parties and witnesses and will promote the just and efficient conduct of such actions." (emphasis added)).

n230 See In re Bristol Bay, Alaska, Salmon Fishery Antitrust Litig., 424 F. Supp. 504, 507 (J.P.M.D.L. 1976); In re Plumbing Fixture Cases, 298 F. Supp. 484, 494-95 (J.P.M.D.L. 1968). The transferee court would have the power to vacate or modify a class action determination made previously by any of the transferor courts. Cf. In re Plumbing Fixture Cases, 298 F. Supp. at 489 ("The pretrial powers of the transferee court include the powers to modify, expand, or vacate earlier discovery orders.").

n231 See supra note 220. All parties must be notified of hearings on the issue of transfer and allowed to offer evidence on that issue. 28 U.S.C. § 1407(c) (1976). Furthermore, the Judicial Panel, not the parties, decides which court controls the class action proceedings. Id. § 1407(a). Therefore, no party will be able to choose a forum court because they believe the court may be predisposed to decide in their favor.The Judicial Panel, however, has authority to consolidate only cases pending in federal district courts. See 28 U.S.C. § 1407 (1976). The problem of forum-shopping may still exist when a class is certified by a state court.

n232 Certification by a federal district court, if viewed as enjoining actions initiated by class members in other courts, may present difficulties under the federal anti-injunction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2283 (1976). See supra pt. III(B)(2)(a). The use of the recommended three-step procedure (transferor court -- Judicial Panel -- transferee court) should minimize the potential for unwarranted intrusions and help to ensure that certification will only be granted when it is "necessary in aid of [the district court's] jurisdiction." 28 U.S.C. § 2283 (1976). By contrast, certification by a state court would not be considered an intrusion on the jurisdiction of other courts. See Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U.S. 107, 121 (1980).

REV_00262328

n233 To some extent, a temporary delay in settlements will be a natural byproduct of any certification of a mandatory class action for punitive damages arising out of a mass tort, particularly during the uncertain period while the order is appealed. Once the class action is approved on appeal, however, it should be settled or tried quickly. Settlements of compensatory damages claims should continue because the defendants will not have to fear the return of individual claimants for recovery of punitive damages.

n234 A Rule 23(b)(3) class action may actually encourage settlements. Following the reversal of the original class certification in the Skywalk cases, class actions were certified by both the federal district and state courts. Lauter, Hyatt Litigation Could Set Pattern for Disaster Cases, Nat'l L.J., Jan 24, 1983, at 3, col. 2, 26, col. 2. Settlement negotiations then resumed in full force and left only a few cases to be resolved by trial. Id. at 26, col. 3. The state court settlement package included a $ 20 million fund for "supplementary" payments, which have been viewed as "a form of a sub rosa punitive damages payment." Id. The federal court settlement package included a $ 3.5 million fund for attorneys' fees and similar "supplementary" payments, as well as a $ 6.5 million payment to a group of charities as a "healing gesture." Id.

n235 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b) (1976). The court of appeals may, in its discretion, entertain an interlocutory appeal "[w]hen a district judge . . . shall be of the opinion that such order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. Id. This was the procedure employed in the Dalkon Shield class certification appeal. In re Northern Dist. of Cal. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prods. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 919 (N.D. Cal. 1981), vacated, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 817 (1983).

n236 In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1180 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982); see 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) (1976).

n237 See In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1177 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982).

n238 See 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) (1976). In the Skywalk appeal, the Eighth Circuit assumed jurisdiction on the basis that the certification order effectively enjoined claims for punitive damages which were already pending in state court. In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1180 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). See supra note 191. These grounds for interlocutory appeal should be expanded in mandatory mass tort class actions so that certification orders can be reviewed on an interlocutory basis even if there are no pending claims in state courts. The fact that the claims could be made in state court or other federal district courts should be enough because the mandatory certification would preclude the litigation of these claims in all courts except the one which certified the class.

n239 See supra note 204.

n240 Id. In the Skywalk case, the appointment of Irving Younger as one of the lead counsel was particularly grating to other plaintiffs' attorneys because the client he represented, unlike other plaintiffs did not have significant injuries. Brief of Appellant Jacqueline N. Rau at 37, In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 103 S. Ct. 342 (1982). The resentment of plaintiffs' attorneys was compounded when the court permitted Younger to remain as lead counsel, see id. at 22-25, even when it became apparent that Younger's client could not qualify as class representative because she lacked diversity from all defendants. 680 F.2d at 1178-79. The district court's conduct resulted in a motion for disqualification based on demonstrated partiality and bias. Although the court's denial of the motion for disqualification was upheld on appeal, the court of appeals indicated that it did not condone the lower court's ex parte communications in search of a class representative. Id. at 1184. Attorneys representing clients with substantial compensatory damages claims may have had reason to doubt the adequacy of representation, given lead counsel's predominant concern with the punitive damages issue. See supra note 187. Lead counsel should scrupulously avoid giving even the appearance of placing the interest of his own client or his fees above the best interests of the class members.

REV_00262329

n241 See supra pt. II.

n242 See supra note 106 and accompanying text.

n243 See supra note 132 and accompanying text.

n244 See Owen I, supra note 21, at 57.

n245 See Knippen v. Ford Motor Co., 546 F.2d 993, 1003 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (affirming directed verdict on issue of punitive damages); Turney v. Ford Motor Co., 94 Ill. App. 3d 678, 686, 418 N.E.2d 1079, 1085 (1981) (affirming trial court's decision to strike punitive damages claim at conclusion of plaintiff's case).

n246 Fed. R. Civ. P. 42(b) provides, in relevant part: "The court, in furtherance of convenience or to avoid prejudice, or when separate trials will be conducive to expedition and economy, may order a separate trial of any claim . . . or of any separate issue or of any number of claims . . . always preserving inviolate the right of trial by jury . . ." Although no court has considered the type of bifurcation recommended in this Article, a more disruptive and time-consuming type of bifurcation has been employed. See Holben v. Midwest Emery Freight Sys., 525 F. Supp. 1224 (W.D. Pa. 1981) (separate trials ordered for underlying personal injury claims and punitive damages claims for negligent entrustment of truck to employee). But see United Air Lines, Inc. v. Weiner, 286 F.2d 302 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 366 U.S. 924 (1961) (reversal of trial court's decision to bifurcate issue of punitive damages in personal injury suit arising out of plane crash because of overlapping proof of underlying liability and punitive damages claims). Bifurcation of the punitive damages issue in mass tort litigation, however, is well within the discretion of trial courts pursuant to Rule 42(b) because it involves no duplication of evidence and no time-consuming impanelling of a second jury. See infra text accompanying note 249.

n247 J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 12.05, at 15 & n.1 (listing state statutes "identical or substantially similar to Federal Rule 42(b)"). Some states only allow bifurcation of separate claims, not separate issues. Id. at 15 & n.2. Punitive damages in these jurisdictions, however, may be considered "separate but dependent" claims and, therefore, subject to bifurcation. Id § 12.07, at 20. Only four states have no statutes dealing with bifurcation. Id § 12.05, at 15, 16 n.3 (Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, South Carolina). Bifurcation in these jurisdictions depends on a trial judge's inherent power, a question on which the authorities are split. Id.§ 12.08.

n248 Cf. Rupert v. Sellers, 48 A.D.2d 265, 272, 368 N.Y.S.2d 904, 912 (1975) (a defendant's wealth should not be discoverable until after a jury has found the defendant liable for compensatory and punitive damages in the first proceeding). The Rupert approach seems overly protective of a defendant's right to privacy. A better view would permit such discovery before trial upon some showing of support for the claim. See Cal. Civ. Code § 3295 (West Supp. 1983); J. Ghiardi & J. Kircher, supra note 38, § 12.10, at 26-31.

n249 This is a simpler and more time-saving procedure than that suggested by one commentator, who would require a separate trial on all punitive damages issues. See Fulton,

REV_00262330

[*54] Ultimately, no punitive damages overkill occurred in the MER/29 litigation; between 1962 and 1967 over ninety-five percent of the claims were settled. [89] In the eleven cases in which jury verdicts were returned there were four defense verdicts, four plaintiffs' verdicts for compensatory damages only, and three plaintiffs' verdicts that included punitive damages. [90] Of the three punitive damage awards, the award in Roginsky was reversed [91] and the other two were significantly reduced. [92] The fact that a manufacturer apparently guilty of criminal misconduct dodged the punitive damages bullet in all but two of over 1500 cases has led to speculation that the overkill threat is "more theoretical than real." [93]

The recent unprecedented number of multiple punitive damages verdicts in mass tort cases has raised again the spectre of overkill recognized by Judge Friendly in Roginsky. [94] Because of the threat to [*55] the continued economic viability of some defendants posed by these multiple punitive damages awards, [95] several proposals have been set forth to modify the structure and procedure for awarding punitive damages in mass tort litigation.

II. MULTIPLE PUNITIVE DAMAGES CLAIMS: PROPOSALS FOR REFORM

The courts that have considered the legality of multiple awards have generally acknowledged that a single punitive damages award against a defendant does not necessarily preclude additional awards based on the same outrageous conduct. [96] The aggregate amount of multiple awards, however, can reach a level so fundamentally unfair and destructive that any additional awards above that level should not be permitted. [97] At some point, justifiable punishment ends and overkill begins. Several proposals have been introduced to reform existing procedures to prevent such overkill, including an aggregate cap on awards, [98] and add-on system for distributing awards, [99] a limitation of punishment in each case to the wrong inflicted upon each plaintiff, [100] admission into evidence of other awards, [101] removal of the assessment function from the jury, [102] and litigation of all punitive damages claims in a single proceeding. [103]

A. Aggregate Cap Proposals

Professor David Owen has proposed that mass tort plaintiffs be permitted to recover punitive damages up to an aggregate amount, the lesser of either five million dollars or five percent of a defendant's [*56] net worth, after which punitive awards would be limited to an amount equal to attorney fees and other litigation costs. [104] While this approach is more flexible than a strict dollar limit, [105] it has disadvantages. First, five million dollars may not be enough to deter large corporations from profitable misconduct. [106] Indeed, the five million dollar limit benefits only those corporations that need protection the least because a company's net worth must exceed $ 100 million for the five million dollar limit to be less than five percent of its net worth. If there must be some arbitrary limit, it should be the same percentage of net worth for a large corporation as for a smaller business enterprise.

Second, the aggregate cap would reward those plaintiffs fortunate enough to get to trial early, undoubtedly encouraging a flood of early trial requests. It has been argued that the diligence of these earlybird plaintiffs should be rewarded because of the greater expenditures required to prove the initial punitive damages claims, which often benefit later plaintiffs by making it easier to establish subsequent claims. [107] It seems unfair, however, to permit a handful of plaintiffs and their attorneys to obtain substantial recoveries merely because they are in a position to finance the litigation, leaving subsequent plaintiffs with little or nothing. Moreover, when attorneys represent more than one plaintiff, as they often do in mass tort litigation, they may face the ethical dilemma of selecting which client's case to litigate first, possibly precluding their other clients from sharing in punitive damages awards. [108]

Finally, there is the problem of implementing the aggregate cap system. Federal legislation is one possibility, [109] but such proposals [*57] have not fared well in Congress. [110] Legislative

REV_00262286

Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases, 15 Forum 117, 129-30 (1979).

n250 See supra notes 7, 89 and accompanying text.

n251 E.g., Johnson v. Husky Indus., 536 F.2d 645, 651 (6th Cir. 1976) (reversing punitive damages award); Sturm, Ruger & Co. v. Day, 594 P.2d 38, 48-49 (Alaska 1979) (reducing amount of punitive damages award), modified on other grounds, 615 P.2d 621 (1980), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 894 (1981); Ellis v. Golconda Corp., 352 So. 2d 1221, 1225, 1228 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1977) (reversing punitive damages award); Moore v. Remington Arms Co., 100 Ill. App. 3d 1102, 1113-17, 427 N.E.2d 608, 616-19 (1981) (same); see Owen 11, supra note 32, at 1321.

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37
View: Full
Date/Time: Friday, September 27, 2002 - 3:43 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

REV_00262331

or judicial action on a state-by-state basis would solve the problem only if all states adopted a uniform cap system.

B. Add-on Awards

Another proposal would permit recovery only of the amount by which a punitive damages award exceeds the largest previous award against the defendant arising out of the same mass tort. [111] The first award sets the figure that subsequent awards must exceed for future plaintiffs to recover any punitive damages. All awards would also have to withstand the usual judicial scrutiny for fairness. [112]

This proposal improves only slightly upon present procedures for awarding punitive damages. Although the defendant would be protected from duplicative punitive damages assessments, the earliest plaintiffs would have even more of an advantage than under Professor Owen's proposal. This would result inevitably in a competitive race to trial. [113] Additionally, because enforcement in fewer than all states would destroy its effectiveness, implementation of this proposal, like other uniform solutions, would require federal legislation. [114]

C. Assessment of Award Vis-A-Vis One Plaintiff

A third approach to the problem of overkill is to limit the punishment in each case to the wrong inflicted on the particular plaintiff. In Hoffman v. Sterling Drug, Inc., [115] for example, the court issued pretrial rulings which excluded evidence of other persons similarly injured by the drug "Aralen," and also excluded evidence of the defendant's [*58] net worth. [116] In addition, the court barred the plaintiff from arguing that the jury should render an award that punishes the defendant for its conduct toward all injured plaintiffs. [117] The court stated that these rulings were mandated by Pennsylvania law which requires that any punitive damages award must bear a reasonable relationship to the compensatory damages award. [118]

This approach, however laudable in its objectives, prevents the jury's consideration of some of the essential criteria upon which punitive damages awards should be based. The moral turpitude of conduct should be judged, at least in part, by the extent of the harm that it causes. [119] A jury could not properly award a plaintiff's proportionate share of these punitive damages without first determining the aggregate award to all injured persons. To make this determination, the very evidence excluded by the court in Hoffman would have to be introduced. Moreover, refusing to admit evidence of a defendant's net worth precludes a jury from considering a key factor in determining when even an individual award would exceed the amount necessary to punish and deter. If every court adjudicating these multiple claims adopted this practice, the result might be a classic case of overkill.

D. Evidence of Other Punitive Damages Claims

Another way to prevent punitive damages overkill is to inform each jury of other punitive damages awards already imposed or that may be imposed in the future upon a mass tort defendant. This is the position taken by the Restatement, [120] several courts, [121] at least two [*59] state legislatures [122] and several commentators. [123] By considering other punishment for the same conduct, [124] along with evidence of the defendant's current financial status, a jury should be able to make a more informed judgment of the amount necessary for punishment and deterrence. [125]

Conversely, this same evidence could backfire against a defendant. A jury may be influenced unfairly by prior verdicts against the defendant; it may believe that previous awards of punitive damages justify a similar award in the case before it [126] and may even rely on [*60] such awards in determining the defendant's compensatory damages liability. [127] Such knowledge on the part of the jury might therefore be highly prejudicial to defendants, [128] who would probably prefer to take their chances with juries that are uninformed about other litigation arising out of the same conduct.

REV_00262287

E. Removal of the Assessment Function from the Jury

Many of the problems generated by multiple punitive damages claims might be avoided by authorizing the trial judge, rather than the jury, to determine the amount of punitive damages. [129] Under this approach, the jury would still decide whether punitive damages should be assessed without being apprised of either the findings of other juries or the defendant's net worth. If the jury determined that punitive damages should be awarded, the court would assess an appropriate award based on all the usual considerations, including evidence of other punitive damages claims and awards and evidence of the defendant's financial condition. [130] This approach is consistent with the view that judges will award punitive damages based on a more sophisticated understanding of the proper punishment for corporate defendants' misconduct. [131] It eliminates, however, the important function of the jury as the conscience of the community in assessing an [*61] amount of punitive damages that reflects the degree of the defendant's culpability. [132]

III. PUNITIVE DAMAGES AND CLASS ACTIONS

The problematic alternations in the mechanism for assessing punitive damages outlined above are not necessary to prevent punitive damages overkill. In appropriate circumstances, a class action may provide the best means of resolving the problems presented by punitive damages in mass tort litigation.

The idea of litigation all punitive damages claims in a single proceeding is not new. In a superb article published over fifty years ago, Professor Morris proposed that when there are multiple claims any assessment of punitive damages should be withheld until all compensatory damages claims are resolved. [133] Joinder of the punitive damages claims would then be appropriate. [134] In the Roginsky opinion discussed above, Judge Friendly envisioned a procedure by which "it might be possible for a jury to make one award to be held for appropriate distribution among all successful plaintiffs." [135]

While these approaches provide a theoretical basis for the resolution of many of the punitive damages problems, only class actions provide a practical means for doing so. The other procedural devices for consolidating multiple lawsuits [136] generally do not provide for a single trial on the punitive damages issue because they cannot affect actions [*62] pending in other jurisdictions. [137] For example, a state court in which a Dalkon Shield claim is pending could not consolidate cases pendin in federal courts or in the courts of sister states. Similarly, a federal district court could not unilaterally consolidate Dalkon Shield cases pending in state courts or other federal courts. [138]

The Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation [139] has the authority to transfer mass tort cases pending in various federal districts to a single federal district court, but these transfers are available only for the purpose of coordinating and economizing the discovery process and other pre-trial procedures. [140] When discovery and other pre-trial proceedings have been completed, the actions are generally remanded to the transferor courts for trial. [141]

Federal change of venue provisions provide a mechanism for transfer of cases between federal districts for trial, but only to a district where the action might originally have been brought. [142] This could result in a single punitive damages trial only in the unlikely event that all the cases were filed in federal courts and all the district courts in which the actions were brought agreed to the transfer.

In view of the problems associated with other procedural devices for combining multiple lawsuits, it was logical for the federal district [*63] courts in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases to use the class action as a means of adjudicating the punitive damages claims.By using representative parties, a class action can cut across jurisdictional lines and determine the rights of a large group of similarly interested claimants in a single proceeding. [143] Overkill would be avoided because the defendant's entire punitive damages liability would be determined in a single action. The amount awarded in a single trial could be distributed among claimants on a basis far more equitable than approaches that reward only the first few successful plaintiffs.

REV_00262288

The particular circumstances in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases, however, rendered them inappropriate for class certification. [144] Nevertheless, the cases presented the courts of appeals with an opportunity to offer guidelines on the appropriate use of class actions in connection with multiple punitive damages claims. The Eighth and Ninth Circuits instead severely restricted the circumstances in which a class action would be considered appropriate, thereby effectively discarding a procedural device that under certain conditions provides the best solution to the mass tort punitive damages problem. [145]

A. Federal Class Action Procedures

Tracing its origins to English equity practice, [146] federal class action procedure was codified in 1938 in Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. [147] Rule 23 was substantially revised in 1966 because of general confusion and dissatisfaction with the criteria for determining which cases were appropriate for class action treatment. [148] The 1966 [*64] amendments changed the structure of the rule and provided clearer guidelines for the certification and administration of class actions. [149]

[*65] The question of certification is addressed to the discretion of the district court, which must determine whether the provisions of Rule 23 have been met. [150] The four general prerequisites to any class action have come to be known as "numerosity" of class members, "commonality" of legal and factual questions, "typicality" of claims and defenses of the class representative and "adequacy of representation." [151] [*66] If these prerequisites are satisfied, the court's focus turns to whether the circumstances fit within a category of permissible class actions specified in Rule 23(b). [152]

Rule 23(b)(1) categories involve situations in which class actions are necessary to avoid prejudice that might otherwise result if the lawsuits were permitted to proceed individually. Rule 23(b)(1)(A) authorizes class actions to protect the party opposing the class [153] from the application of incompatible standards of conduct with respect to different members of the class. [154] Rule 23(b)(1)(B) specifically protects members of the class when individual litigation of some claims might substantially impair the ability of others to recover, such as when there is a limited fund. [155] These class actions are "mandatory" in the sense that once the class is certified, all class members are bound by the eventual result, whether or not individual members of the class object to being included, and often, whether or not they are even aware of the proceedings. [156]

Rule 23(b)(3), the "common question" class action, unlike its subsection (b)(1) and (b)(2) counterparts, does not require that the class [*67] comprise "all those who will share in or be directly affected by the grant or denial of relief." [157] The nexus between the class members may be simply that they claim to have been injured by the defendant in similar ways. [158] Because many litigants may have such a nexus, Rule 23(b)(3) imposes the additional prerequisites, absent from the "necessity" class action sections, that common questions of law or fact "predominate" over individual issues, [159] and that a class action be the "superior" method of handling the litigation. [160]

Rule 23(b)(3) not only involves the most substantive change from the old rule, [161] but was also responsible for most of the controversy following the 1966 amendments. Critics complained that the new common question class actions precipitated a burdensome increase in the volume of federal litigation [162] and resulted in many ethical abuses by attorneys. [163]

REV_00262289

[*68] By the early 1970's, the controversial nature of common question class actions began to take its toll. Courts became more prone to deny class certification, [164] petitions for attorney fees were subjected to greater scrutiny [165] and defendants were often permitted discovery on the issue of unprofessional conduct by class counsel in soliciting representative parties. [166] Finally, the Supreme Court significantly reduced the attractiveness of many class actions, particularly those of smallclaim consumers, by holding that each class representative must satisfy the amount in controversy requirement [167] and that the plaintiff must bear the expense of notice to the class in a suit for damages. [168]

Within the past few years, the class action pendulum appears to have returned to center. Plaintiffs' attorneys have generally been more selective in seeking class relief, defendants less intransigent in opposing class certification, and judges more adept at administering class litigation, particularly in the use of subclasses and certification limited to certain issues as provided in Rule 23(c). [169]

B. Mass Tort Class Actions

From their inception, the amendments to Rule 23 have provoked a split between leading commentators and the Advisory Committee concerning the propriety of certifying mass tort cases as class actions. Professors Moore, Kennedy, [170] Wright, Miller and Kane [171] view common [*69] question class actions as the most expeditious means of adjudicating the common liability issues in many mass tort personal injury situations, particularly those that arise out of a single disaster. Under Rule 23(c)(4), certification can be limited to those issues common to the entire class or common to subclasses. Individual compensatory damages claims, as well as non-common liability issues, can therefore be resolved individually outside the scope of the class action.

The Advisory Committee has taken a contrary position, stating:

A "mass accident" resulting in injuries to numerous persons is ordinarily not appropriate for a class action because of the likelihood that significant questions, not only of damages but of liability and defenses of liability, would be present, affecting the individuals in different ways. In these circumstances an action conducted nominally as a class action would degenerate in practice into multiple lawsuits separately tried. [172]
Most courts have concurred with the Advisory Committee and denied certification of mass tort personal injury cases brought as class actions. [173] Denials generally have been based on the strong interest of [*70] individual litigation in controlling their own litigation, the diversity of issues of proximate causation (particularly in products liability cases), and the divergence of legal standards in cases arising in different jurisdictions. [174]

A minority of courts has certified mass tort personal injury cases [175] as class actions based on issues concerning liability for compensatory [*71] damages. [176] Federal class actions in which Rule 23(b)(3) certification [177] has been granted have largely consisted of cases in which the classes were limited to carefully defined liability issues. [178]

[*72] C. The Skywalk and Dalkon Shield Class Actions

Most of the reasons for rejecting class actions in mass tort cases are absent when certification is limited to claims for punitive damages. Because plaintiffs have no right to recover punitive damages, [179] they lack the strong interest that they may have in pursuing their compensatory damages claims individually. Moreover, evidence of the aggravated nature of the defendant's conduct will generally not vary from victim to victim. Thus, the class certifications in the Skywalk and Dalkon Shield cases represent a a significant new approach to solving the problems presented by punitive damages claims in a mass tort context.

REV_00262290

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

↶Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*65 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1003, **

Copyright (c) 1999 Brooklyn Law School
Brooklyn Law Review

Winter, 1999

65 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1003

LENGTH: 12166 words

ARTICLE: REINING IN PUNITIVE DAMAGES "RUN WILD": PROPOSALS FOR REFORM BY COURTS AND LEGISLATURES*

* (c) 1999 Victor E. Schwartz, Mark A. Behrens, and Joseph P. Mastrosimone. All Rights Reserved.

Victor E. Schwartz+ and Mark A. Behrens++ and Joseph P. Mastrosimone+++

+ Victor E. Schwartz is a senior partner in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C. Mr. Schwartz is co-author of the most widely used torts casebook in the United States, Prosser, Wade and Schwartz's Cases and Materials on Torts (10th ed. 2000), and author of Comparative Negligence (3d ed. 1994 & Supp. 1999). He served on the Advisory Committee of the American Law Institute's Restatement of the Law of Torts: Products Liability project and has been appointed to the Advisory Committees of the Restatement of the Law of Torts: Apportionment of Liability and General Principles projects. Mr. Schwartz obtained his B.A. summa cum laude from Boston University in 1962 and his J.D. magna cum laude from Columbia University in 1965.

++ Mark A. Behrens is a partner in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C, and Adjunct Professorial Lecturer in Law at The American University, Washington College of Law. He received his B.A. in Economics from the University of WisconsinMadison in 1987 and his J.D. from Vanderbilt University in 1990, where he served as Associate Articles Editor of the Vanderbilt Law Review.

+++ Joseph P. Mastrosimone is an associate in the law firm of Crowell & Moring LLP in Washington, D.C. He received his B.A. in Political Science from the University of Rochester in 1995 and his J.D. from The George Washington University Law School in 1998, where he served as Notes Editor of the George Washington Law Review.

SUMMARY:
... [1] The Court has provided some general controls, holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes both substantive limits on the size of punitive damages awards [2] and procedural limits on when and how punitive damages may be awarded. ... [7] Courts and commentators alike have emphasized the "potentially devastating" ramifications of a punitive damages award on a civil defendant's character, reputation, business, and good will. ... The unpredictability of a prospective punitive damage award contributes significantly did not constitute an unfair trade practice.

The Alabama jury awarded Dr. Gore $ 4,000 as compensatory damages for the difference in the value of the car he "bargained for" and the car he received. [96] The jury also awarded $ 4 million in punitive damages, which the jury apparently calculated by multiplying Dr. Gore's damage estimate ($ 4,000) by 1,000, the number of cars BMW allegedly sold throughout the country under its nondisclosure policy. [97]

On appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court, BMW contended, among other things, that its out-of-state conduct was permissible under the disclosure statutes of other states and, therefore, could not serve to augment a punitive damages [*1025] award. The Alabama Supreme Court agreed, holding that the jury should not have been permitted to consider sales by BMW outside of Alabama. [98] Having found the verdict tainted, the court reduced the punitive damages award to $ 2 million, believing that this amount was "a constitutionally reasonable" punishment for BMW's conduct in Alabama. [99]

Ultimately, the United States Supreme Court decided that the $ 2 million award still left a punishment that exceeded Alabama's legitimate interests in protecting the rights of its citizens and was, therefore, unconstitutionally excessive. [100]

Before tackling the "excessiveness" issue, however, the Court commented at length on constitutional principles that are involved when a state attempts to punish out-of-state conduct, observing that the Constitution has a "special concern both with the maintenance of a national economic union unfettered by stateimposed limitations on interstate commerce and with the autonomy of the individual States within their respective spheres." [101] The Court outlined the following three basic principles.

Interstate Commerce: The Court noted that a defendant's participation in the "national economy implicates the federal interest in preventing individual States from imposing undue burdens on interstate commerce." [102] Congress is permitted to make nationwide rules involving interstate commerce, but "it is clear that no single State can do so, or even impose its policy choice on neighboring States." [103]

State Sovereignty and Comity: Next, the Court noted that "one State's power to impose burdens on interstate commerce is not only subordinate to the federal power over interstate commerce, but is also constrained by the need to respect the interests of other States." [104] The Court made the critical admonition that: "Principles of state sovereignty and comity demand that a State may not impose economic sanctions on [*1026]

violators of its laws with the intent of changing the tortfeasors' lawful conduct in other States." [105]

Due Process: Finally, the Court suggested that punishing a defendant for lawful extraterritorial conduct would violate due process. The Court stated:

Alabama may insist that BMW adhere to a particular disclosure policy in that State. Alabama does not have the power, however, to punish BMW for conduct that was lawful where it occurred and that had no impact on Alabama or its residents. Nor may Alabama impose sanctions on BMW in order to deter conduct that is lawful in other jurisdictions. [106]

Applying these fundamental principles, the Court approvingly concluded that the Alabama Supreme Court "properly eschewed reliance on BMW's out-of-state conduct and based its remitted award solely on conduct that occurred within Alabama." [107]

REV_00262341

Although BMW involved conduct (i.e., failure to disclose minor refinishing) that was permissible outside Alabama under the disclosure statutes of other states, the Supreme Court was careful to explain that its holding was not limited to instances of state legislation, but applied broadly to any form in which state power is exercised-specifically including state court decisions. The Court said: "State power may be exercised as much by a jury's application of a state rule of law in a civil lawsuit as by a statute." [108] Elsewhere in the opinion, the [*1027] Court again emphasized that "the economic penalties that a State . . . inflicts on those who transgress its laws, whether the penalties take the form of legislatively authorized fines or judicially imposed punitive damages, must be supported by the State's interest in protecting its own consumers and its own economy." [109]

Indeed, as a tort policy matter, a state court judgment that a defendant's conduct is not tortious provides a signal that the defendant's conduct does not justify the imposition of punitive damages in that state. Such a finding should be given equal (and perhaps greater) legal weight than a statutory "safe harbor," such as the disclosure laws at issue in BMW. The reason is that, in most jurisdictions, conduct comporting with a legislative or regulatory standard may still be found tortious by a jury asked to determine whether the defendant met applicable standards of care. [110] On the other hand, a finding of "no liability" in a tort action suggests strongly that, in that jurisdiction, the defendant's conduct was lawful. BMW says that it is unconstitutional for a jury in a forum state to consider lawful conduct in other states when deciding punitive damages issues. [111]

Precluding evidence of the defendant's out-of-state activity would prevent such due process violations. It also would prevent the possibility of due process violations that could arise if the forum state were examining conduct that occurred in jurisdictions that had not yet determined for themselves whether the defendant's conduct should subject it to liability. Tort law varies widely between states and one state cannot assume what the legislature or citizens (jurors) of other states may decide. [112] In that regard, if the forum state's court "guessed [*1028] wrong" and concluded that another state ("State X") would find the defendant's conduct to be unlawful, but State X later decides either through legislation or judicial decision that the conduct is lawful, the forum state's ruling would be violative of the principles set forth in BMW. [113]

Finally, it is important to note that precluding evidence of a defendant's conduct outside the forum state would not result in culpable defendants "escaping" appropriate punishment because those other states would be free to impose punishment on behalf of their own citizens if it was determined that the defendant's conduct should subject it to liability.

G. Compliance with FDA Pre-Market Approval Standards Defense

Punitive damages should not be permitted in cases alleging harms caused by FDA pre-market approved pharmaceuticals, vaccines, or medical devices, unless the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery. The public policy reason for this type of rule is that society should encourage companies to invest in and develop new and useful life-prolonging and life-saving products. This reform, which is already law in several states, [114] received strong support in a compre [*1029] hensive study of the civil justice system by the American Law Institute. The study's authors concluded:

We believe that the risk of overdeterrence of socially valuable activities through the imposition of tort liability on regulated products and activities merits more widespread recognition of a regulatory compliance defense.

. . . .

The strongest case for a regulatory compliance defense arises when punitive damages are sought. If a defendant has fully complied with a regulatory requirement and fully disclosed all material information relating to risk and its control, it is hard to justify the jury's freedom to award punitive damages. [115]

REV_00262342

If implemented, a compliance with FDA pre-market approval standards defense against punitive damages would provide a strong incentive for the innovation of products that may otherwise be withheld because of concerns about uncertain and arbitrary liability. At the same time, such a defense could punish manufacturers who intentionally withhold material information from the FDA by subjecting such manufacturers to punitive damages liability.

H. Limiting Multiple Punitive Damages Awards

The reforms that have been discussed in this Article could be accomplished at the state or federal level; many could be (and have been) accomplished by judicial decision. Because of the limits on the ability of individual states to control conduct in other states, however, and the United States Supreme Court's past unwillingness to clarify due process limits on multiple punitive damages awards, Congress should enact legislation making clear that defendants are not to be punished ad infinitum for a single act or course of conduct. [*1030]

1. Problems Caused by Multiple Punitive Damages

As a result of the expansion of punitive damages beyond the traditional intentional torts, courts in the 1970s began to apply punitive damages more than once against the same defendant, for example, in the developing field of products liability. As a result, defendants began to be punished over and over again for what was essentially a single act or course of conduct. [116]

Multiple punitive damages awards present significant problems for plaintiffs and defendants. For instance, multiple "windfall" recoveries of punitive damages can deplete a defendant's limited resources, endangering the ability of future claimants to recover even basic out-of-pocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering. [117]

Moreover, excessive imposition of awards may drive a company out of business. [118] When this occurs, the devastating "ripple" effect can extend far beyond the defendant company to injured persons who are thereafter unable to recover compensation for their injuries. There are concomitant losses suffered by the company's employees, who may lose their jobs, as well as by those other businesses that rely on the company or its employees for income. Economic harm to the company also affects shareholders, such as pension funds and ordinary citizens, and other investors who face the loss of their savings.

The detrimental impact of multiple punitive damages exists even in cases which are settled, rather than tried. A federal appellate judge astutely recognized this problem when he wrote: [*1031]

The potential for punitive awards is a weighty factor in settlement negotiations and inevitably results in a larger settlement agreement than would ordinarily be obtained. To the extent that this premium exceeds what would otherwise be a fair and reasonable settlement for compensatory damages, assets that could be available for satisfaction of future compensatory claims are dissipated. [119]

Multiple imposition of punitive damages also poses a significant obstacle to global settlement negotiations in repetitive litigation and blocks the ability of claimants to recover quickly for their injuries or the loss of loved ones. As one federal district judge wrote:

REV_00262343

"Barring successive punitive damages awards against a defendant for the same conduct would remove the major obstacle to settlement of mass tort litigation and open the way for the prompt resolution of the damage claims of many thousands of injured plaintiffs." [120]

Furthermore, federal and state courts have expressed strong concerns that multiple punitive damages awards may violate constitutionally protected due process rights. [121] Com [*1032] mentators in the field have expressed the same concerns. [122]

Lastly, multiple punitive damages awards undermine the integrity of the justice system by transforming it into a lottery where a few people collect arbitrary "wins" at the expense of everyone else-the company, its employees, its shareholders, and ordinary consumers. With the exception of those lawyers who reap windfalls from repetitive punitive damages, nobody can seriously argue that repeatedly punishing anyone for a single act makes sense or benefits society.

2. Uniform, National Legislative Action Is Needed

"Unquestionably, a national solution is needed" to the problem of multiple punitive damages awards. [123] The individual states are powerless to provide a comprehensive remedy because one state cannot dictate judicial or legislative policies to another state. [124] Thus, even though a state may act to con [*1033] trol the problems of multiple punitive damages awards within its borders, it cannot control the imposition of punitive damages awards in other jurisdictions. [125]

The clearest evidence of this weakness was described in an opinion written by former United States District Judge H. Lee Sarokin. In Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., [126] involving claims against an asbestos manufacturer, Judge Sarokin vacated an earlier order striking plaintiffs' punitive damages claims on the ground that multiple imposition of punitive damages imposed without guidelines violated due process, in part, because he believed that he was powerless to limit other courts from imposing punitive damages awards against the same defendant. [127]

Unfortunately, the United States Supreme Court has proven unwilling to solve the problem of multiple punitive damages and appears unlikely to do so at any time soon. [128] Indeed, the [*1034] Florida Supreme Court has asserted that "any realistic solution to the problems caused by [multiple punitive damages awards] in the United States . . . can only be effected by federal legislation." [129]

Congressional action is needed to "disallow[] the repeated sanction of punitive damages against the same defendant for one act." [130] This would "protect[] the due process rights of corporate defendants as well as the rights of injured plaintiffs to be compensated, rather than see money which is rightfully theirs be distributed as a windfall." [131]

Conclusion

Larger and larger punitive damages verdicts are being rendered based on weak burdens of proof, irrelevant and even prejudicial evidence, and often multiple times against the same defendant for the same activity. This has led the United States Supreme Court to express serious concern that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild." [132]

The civil justice system should not be a "litigation lottery" characterized by excessiveness and arbitrariness. Punitive damages reform is needed to restore balance, fairness, and predictability to the law. We recommend a number of reforms. While all of these could be achieved through legislation, many could be accomplished by courts through the development of the common law; only one would require federal action. Specifically, we recommend:

REV_00262344

(1) Establishing a liability "trigger" that reflects the intentional tort origins and quasi-criminal nature of punitive dam [*1035] ages awards-"clear and convincing evidence" of "actual malice."

(2) Requiring proportionality in punitive damages so that the punishment fits the offense.

(3) Permitting a defendant to request "bifurcation" of a punitive damages trial so that the proceedings on punitive damages would be separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages. The same jury would hear both phases of the case. This would prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability.

(4) Precluding plaintiffs from introducing prejudicial net worth evidence.

(5) Precluding evidence of a defendant's out-of-state conduct to award and calculate punitive damages.

(6) Encouraging the development and marketing of lifesaving and life-enhancing pharmaceuticals, vaccines, and medical devices by creating a defense to punitive damages based on compliance with FDA pre-market approval standards, except in cases where the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery.

(7) Federal legislation to address the special problem of multiple punitive damages awards; this would protect against unfair overkill, guard against possible due process violations, and help preserve the ability of future claimants to recover basic out-ofpocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering.

FOOTNOTES:

n1 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

n2 See BMW of North Am., Inc. v. Gore, 517 U.S. 559, 585-86 (1996); see also TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 458 (1993); Pacific Mutual, 499 U.S. at 23-24; cf. Pulla v. Amoco Oil Co., 72 F.3d 648, 661 (8th Cir. 1995) (opinion by retired Supreme Court Justice Byron White) (striking down punitive damages award as "excessive, unreasonable and violative of due process").

n3 See Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n4 See Punitive Damages Tort Reform: Hearing Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 104th Cong. (Apr. 4, 1995) (testimony of Theodore Olson, former Assistant United States Attorney for the Office of Legal Counsel); Special Report, The Top Ten Verdicts of 1999, Law. Wkly. USA, Jan. 10, 2000, at 2000 LWUSA 25.

n5 Browning-Ferris Indus. of Vt., Inc. v. Kelco Disposal, Inc., 492 U.S. 257, 297 (1989) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting Banker's Life & Casualty Co. v. Crenshaw, 486 U.S. 71, 87 (1988) (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and concurring in judgment)). All jurisdictions, except Louisiana, Nebraska, Massachusetts, Michigan and Washington state, permit the award of punitive damages. Michigan permits "exemplary" damages as compensation for mental suffering consisting of a sense of insult, indignity, humiliation, or injury to feelings, but does not permit punitive damages for purposes of punishment. See Product Liability Desk Reference-A Fifty State Compendium (Morton Daller ed., 2000).

REV_00262345

n6 City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247, 270 (1981) (Brennan, J., dissenting).

n7 Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 426 (1979).

n8 Browning-Ferris, 492 U.S. at 281 (Brennan and Marshall, J.J., concurring); see also International Bhd. of Elec. Workers v. Foust, 442 U.S. 42, 50 (1979) ("The impact of [a punitive damages award] is unpredictable and potentially substantial."); Comment, Criminal Safeguards and the Punitive Damages Defendant, 34 U. Chi. L. Rev. 408, 417 (1967) (Punitive damages awards have "'momentous and serious' . . . consequences" for civil defendants.) (citation omitted).

n9 See generally Victor E. Schwartz & Mark A. Behrens, Punitive Damages Reform-State Legislatures Can and Should Meet the Challenge Issued by the Supreme Court of the United States in Haslip, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1365 (1993).

n10 See James B. Sales & Kenneth B. Cole, Jr., Punitive Damages: A Relic That Has Outlived Its Origins, 37 Vand. L. Rev. 1117 (1984); see also Beardmore v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 790 (C.P. 1764) (illegal search and seizure); Bruce v. Rawlins, 95 Eng. Rep. 934 (C.P. 1770) (same); Sharpe v. Brice, 96 Eng. Rep. 557 (C.P. 1774) (same).

n11 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

n12 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763).

n13 Dorsey D. Ellis, Jr., Fairness and Efficiency in the Law of Punitive Damages, 56 S. Cal. Rev. 1, 14 (1982). In Wilkes, Lord Chief Justice Pratt announced: "A jury shall have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received . . . as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself." Wilkes, 98 Eng. Rep. at 498-99; see also Calvin R. Massey, The Excessive Fines Clause and Punitive Damages: Some Lessons From History, 40 Vand. L. Rev. 1233 (1987).

n14 See, e.g., Grey v. Grant, 95 Eng. Rep. 794 (C.P. 1764); Benson v. Frederick, 97 Eng. Rep. 1130 (K.B. 1766).

n15 See, e.g., Hewlett v. Cruchley, 128 Eng. Rep. 696 (C.P. 1813); Leith v. Pope, 96 Eng. Rep. 777 (C.P. 1779).

n16 See, e.g., Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 96 Eng. Rep. 549 (C.P. 1774).

n17 See, e.g., Merest v. Harvey, 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814); Sears v. Lyons, 171 Eng. Rep. 658 (K.B. 1818). Punitive damages also were allowed for seduction. See, e.g., Tullidge v. Wade, 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769). In addition, for a period, English courts permitted an award of punitive damages for criminal conversation (i.e., adultery). See Duberly v. Gunning, 100 Eng. Rep. 1226 (K.B. 1792).

n18 James B. Sales, The Emergence of Punitive Damages in Product Liability Actions: A Further Assault on The Citadel, 14 St. Mary's L.J. 351, 355 (1983).

n19 The use of "private attorneys general" to sanction antisocial conduct unregulated by the criminal law reached America in 1784. See Genay v. Norris, 1 S.C. 6 (1784); see also David G. Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 Mich. L. Rev. 1257, 1263, 1287-88 (1976).

n20 See, e.g., Ward v. Blackwood, 41 Ark. 295 (1883); Lyon v. Hancock, 35 Cal. 372

REV_00262346

(1868); Corwin v. Walton, 18 Mo. 71 (1853); Trogden v. Terry, 172 N.C. 540 (1916); Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. 424 (1854).

n21 See, e.g., Sheik v. Hobson, 64 Iowa 146 (1884); Louisville & Nashville R.R. Co. v. Ballard, 85 Ky. 307 (1887); Vanch v. Hall, 3 N.J.L. 814 (Sup. Ct. 1811).

n22 See, e.g., Brown v. McBride, 24 Misc. 235, 52 N.Y.S. 620 (Sup. Ct. Queens County 1898).

n23 See, e.g., Lake Shore & Mich. S. Ry. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U.S. 101 (1893); Green v. Southern Express Co., 41 Ga. 515 (1871); Schlencker v. Risley, 4 Ill. 483 (1842); Taber v. Hutson, 5 Ind. 322 (1854); Jackson v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., 51 S.E. 1015 (N.C. 1905); Parsons v. Harper, 57 Va. 64 (1860); Hamlin v. Spaulding, 27 Wis. 360 (1870).

n24 See, e.g., Dorsey v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 553 (1860); Treat v. Barber, 7 Conn. 274 (1828); Singer Mfg. Co. v. Holdfodt, 86 Ill. 455 (1877); Taylor v. Giger, 3 Ky. 586 (1808); Schindel v. Schindel, 12 Md. 108 (1858); Huling v. Henderson, 161 Pa. 553 (1894); Bradshaw v. Buchanan, 50 Tex. 492 (1878).

n25 See, e.g., Yazoo & Miss. Valley R.R. Co. v. Sanders, 87 Miss. 607 (1905); Schumacher v. Shawhan Distillery Co., 178 Mo. App. 361 (1914).

n26 See, e.g., Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225 (1842); Whipple v. Walpole, 10 N.H. 130 (1839); Pickett v. Crook, 20 Wis. 358 (1866). As in England, punitive damages were also awarded in cases involving seduction. See, e.g., Reutkemeier v. Nolte, 179 Iowa 342 (1917); Coryell v. Colbaugh, 1 N.J. 77 (1791).

n27 Ellis, supra note 13, at 2.

n28 See, e.g., Southern Kan. Ry. v. Rice, 38 Kan. 398 (1888) ($ 35 costs and fees, $ 10 injury to feelings, $ 71.75 punitive); Fay v. Parker, 53 N.H. 342 (1872) ($ 150 actual, $ 331.67 exemplary); Woodman v. Nottingham, 49 N.H. 387 (1870) ($ 578 actual, $ 100 exemplary); Taylor v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 48 N.H. 304 (1869) ($ 500 actual damages, $ 858.50 exemplary).

n29 In 1967, a California court of appeals held for the first time that punitive damages were recoverable in a strict products liability action. See Toole v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689 (Cal. Ct. App. 1967).

n30 "Mass tort" litigation began in the late 1960s with cases involving the sale of the anti-cholesterol drug MER/29. See Paul D. Rheingold, The MER/29 Story-An Instance of Successful Mass Disaster Litigation, 56 Cal. L. Rev. 116 (1968); Roginsky v. RichardsonMerrell, Inc., 378 F.2d 832 (2d Cir. 1967). See generally Richard A. Seltzer, Punitive Damages In Mass Tort Litigation: Addressing The Problems of Fairness, Efficiency And Control, 52 Fordham L. Rev. 37 (1983).

n31 See Victor E. Schwartz et al., Multiple Imposition Of Punitive Damages: The Case For Reform, Critical Legal Issues: Working Paper Series (Wash. Legal Found. Mar. 1995).

n32 See, e.g., Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1(1)(a) (West 1992) (malice or fraud or reckless indifference toward, and a disregard of, the rights of others).

n33 See e.g., Wisker v. Hart, 766 P.2d 168 (Kan. 1988) ("gross negligence").

n34 See Gillham v. Admiral Corp., 523 F.2d 102 (6th Cir. 1975) ($ 125,000 compensatory damages, $ 50,000 attorneys' fees, $ 100,000 punitive damages); Toole v. Richardson-

REV_00262347

Merrell, Inc., 251 Cal. App. 2d 689 (Cal. Ct. App. 1967) ($ 175,000 compensatory, $ 250,000 punitive damages); Moore v. Jewel Tea Co., 253 N.E.2d 636 (Ill. App. 1969) ($ 920,000 compensatory damages, $ 10,000 punitive damages), aff'd, 263 N.E.2d 103 (Ill. 1970).

n35 George L. Priest, Punitive Damages and Enterprise Liability, 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 123, 123 (1982).

n36 John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on The Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 142 (1986); see also Peter W. Huber, The Legal Revolution and its Consequences (1988); Walter K. Olson, The Litigation Explosion (1991).

n37 Malcolm Wheeler, A Proposal for Further Common Law Development of the Use of Punitive Damages in Modern Products Liability Litigation, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 919 (1989).

n38 512 U.S. 415 (1994).

n39 Id. at 432. Honda Motor involved an all terrain vehicle that flipped over when an inebriated plaintiff tried to drive it up a hill. See id. at 418. The Court struck down a punitive damages award on the ground that Oregon law violated due process because it did not provide an opportunity for meaningful appellate review of the size of punitive damages awards. See id. at 432. One year earlier, in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443 (1993), Justice O'Connor observed:

Corporations are mere abstractions and, as such, are unlikely to be viewed with much sympathy. Moreover, they often represent a large accumulation of productive resources: jurors naturally think little of taking an otherwise large sum of money out of what appears to be an enormously larger pool of wealth. Finally, juries may feel privileged to correct perceived social ills stemming from unequal wealth distribution by transferring money from "wealthy" corporations to comparatively needier plaintiffs.

Id. at 491 (O'Connor, J., dissenting) (citation omitted).

n40 See generally Bruce N. Kuhlik & Richard F. Kingham, The Adverse Effects of Standardless Punitive Damage Awards on Pharmaceutical Development and Availability, 45 Food Drug Cosm. L.J. 693, 693 (1990) ("There is a growing body of evidence that the threat of punitive damages deters the development and marketing of beneficial products.").

n41 See, e.g., Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 43 F.3d 1311 (9th Cir. 1995); Turpin v. Merrell Dow Pharm., Inc., 736 F. Supp. 737 (E.D. Ky. 1990), aff'd, 959 F.2d 1349 (6th Cir. 1992).

n42 See, e.g., Ealy v. Richardson-Merrell, Inc., 897 F.2d 1159 (D.C. Cir. 1990) (overturning $ 75 million punitive damages award).

n43 See S. Rep. No. 105-32, at 41-42 (1997) (Senate Commerce Committee Report on Product Liability Reform Act of 1997).

n44 See Michael Rustad, Demystifying Punitive Damages in Products Liability Cases: A Survey of a Quarter Century of Trial Verdicts (Roscoe Pound Found. 1991).

n45 Professor Rustad said in his report: "The actual number of punitive damages awards in product liability litigation is unknown and possibly unknowable because no comprehensive recording system exists." Id. at 2 (emphasis added).

n46 See Brian J. Ostrom & Neal B. Kauder, Examining the Work of State Courts, 1993: A National Perspective from the Court Statistics Project 24 (State Justice Inst. 1993).

REV_00262348

n47 See Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Myth and Reality in Punitive Damages, 75 Minn. L. Rev. 1, 28 (1990) (noting that "jury verdicts in the minority of matters actually adjudicated play an important role in determining the worth, or settlement value, or civil matters filed but not tried").

n48 George L. Priest, Punitive Damages Reform: The Case of Alabama, 56 La. L. Rev. 825, 830 (1996).

n49 Steven Hayward, The Role of Punitive Damages in Civil Litigation: New Evidence from Lawsuit Filings 8 (Pacific Research Inst. Public Pol'y Feb. 1996).

n50 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

n51 Actual malice is required in Maryland and the District of Columbia. See Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633 (Md. 1992), Jonathan Woodner, Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929 (D.C. 1995).

n52 See Malcolm E. Wheeler, The Constitutional Case for Reforming Punitive Damage Procedures, 69 Va. L. Rev. 269, 298 (1983).

n53 See Ala. Code § 6-11-20 (1993); Alaska Stat. § 09.17.020 (1998); Cal. Civ. Code § 3294(a) (West 1997); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73 (West 1997); Ga. Code Ann. § 51-12-5.1 (1999); Iowa Code Ann. § 668A.1 (1998); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3701(c) (1998); Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 411.184(2) (Michie/Bobbs-Merrill 1998); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.20 (West Supp. 1998); Miss. Code Ann. § 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1998); Mont. Code Ann. § 27-1-221(5) (1998); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:15-5.12 (1999); Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 42-005(1) (1998); N.C. Gen. Stat. 10-15(b) (1999); N.D. Cent. Code § 32-03.2-11 (Supp. 1999); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2307.80(A) (Anderson 1999); Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 23, § 9.1 (West Supp. 1998); Or. Rev. Stat. § 18.537 (1997); S.C. Code Ann. § 15-33-135 (Law. Co-op. Supp. 1998); S.D. Codified Laws Ann. § 21-1-4.1 (1999); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code § 41.003 (1999); Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-1 (1999); Linthicum v. Nationwide Life Ins. Co., 723 P.2d 675 (Ariz. 1986); Jonathan Woodner Co. v. Breeden, 665 A.2d 929 (D.C. App. 1995); Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P.2d 566 (Haw. 1989); Travelers Indem. Co. v. Armstrong, 442 N.E.2d 349 (Ind. 1982); Tuttel v. Raymond, 494 A.2d 1353 (Me. 1985); Owens-Illinois v. Zenobia, 601 A.2d 633 (Md. 1992); Rodriguez v. Suzuki Motor Corp., 936 S.W.2d 104 (Mo. 1996); Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992); Wangen v. Ford Motor Co., 294 N.W.2d 437 (Wis. 1980). One state, Colorado, requires proof "beyond a reasonable doubt" in punitive damages cases. See Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-25-127(2) (1987).

n54 See Punitive Damages: A Constructive Examination, 1986 A.B.A. Sec. Litig. Special Comm. on Punitive Damages 19 [hereinafter ABA Report]; Report on Punitive Damages of the Comm. on Special Problems in the Administration of Justice, Am. College of Trial Law. 15-16 (1989) [hereinafter ACTL Report]; Uniform Law Commissioners' Model Punitive Damages Act § 5 (approved July 18, 1996) [hereinafter Model Punitive Damages Act]; see also 2 Enterprise Responsibility for Personal Injury-Reporters' Study 248-49 (1991) [hereinafter ALI Reporters' Study].

n55 See Pacific Mutual, 499 U.S. at 23 n.11 (stating that "there is much to be said in favor of a State's requiring, as many do, . . . a standard of 'clear and convincing evidence'"). Congress has responded to the Court's observation by requiring plaintiffs to prove "clear and convincing evidence" of punitive damages liability before punitive damages can be imposed against volunteers of nonprofit organizations. See Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, Pub. L. No. 105-19, 111 Stat. 218.

n56 See Lane v. Hughes Aircraft Co., 993 P.2d 388 (Cal. 2000) (Brown, J., concurring).

REV_00262349

n57 See Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277, 284 (1983) ("The principle that a punishment should be proportionate to the crime is deeply rooted and frequently repeated in common-law jurisprudence."); Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 366-67 (1910) (It is "a precept of the fundamental law" as well as "a precept of justice that punishment for crime should be graduated and proportioned to the offense.").

n58 Some examples of federal criminal fines, even for particularly egregious crimes, do not exceed $ 250,000 and include: (1) tampering with consumer products ($ 250,000, if death results); (2) assault on the President ($ 30,000); (3) bank robbery ($ 75,000); (4) sexual exploitation of children ($ 100,000); and (5) treason ($ 10,000). See Federal Sentencing Guidelines § § 2N1.1, 5E1.2, 2A6.1, 2B3.1, 2G2.1, 2M1.1 (Phylis Skloot Bamberger & David J. Gottlieb eds., 3d ed. Supp. 1999).

n59 Lewis Powell, The "Bizarre" Results of Punitive Damages, Wall St. J., Mar. 8, 1995, at A21.

n60 See Ala. Code § 6-11-21 (1993); Alaska Stat. § 9.17.020(f)-(h) (1998); Colo. Rev. Stat. § 13-21-102(1)(a)(1998); Conn. Gen. Stat. § 52240b (1999); Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73 (1)(b) (West 1997); Ind. Code Ann. § 34-51-3-4 (1999); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60-3701 (1998); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:15-5.14 (West 1999); N.C. Gen. Stat. § 1D-25 (1999); N.D. Cent. Code § 32.03.2-11(4) (1999); 23 Okl. St. § 9.1 (1998); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 41.008 (West 1999); Va. Code Ann. § 8.01-38.1 (1999).

n61 See generally ACTL Report, supra note 54, at 15 (proposing that punitive damages be awarded up to two times a plaintiff's compensatory damages or $ 250,000, whichever is greater); ABA Report, supra note 54, at 64-66 (recommending that punitive damages awards in excess of three-to-one ratio to compensatory damages be considered presumptively "excessive"); ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 258-59 (endorsing concept of ratio coupled with alternative monetary ceiling).

n62 At the federal level, Congress included a cap on punitive damages for individuals and small businesses in the Year 2000 Readiness and Responsibility Act, Pub. L. 106-37, 113 Stat. 135 [hereinafter Y2K Act]. The Y2K Act established procedures and legal standards for lawsuits stemming from Year 2000 date-related computer failures. A bill to cap punitive damages for individuals and small businesses in all civil actions was reported out of the House Judiciary Committee in February of 2000 by voice vote. See H.R. Rep. No. 106-494 (2000). The House passed the bill on February 16, 2000.

n63 Thomas Jefferson, A Bill for Proportioning Crimes and Punishment in Cases Heretofore Capital (1779), in Papers of Thomas Jefferson 2:492, 493 (Julian P. Boyd ed., 1950).

n64 For example, in a 1999 products liability case arising out of an automobile accident involving a drunk driver, a California court left untouched a jury award of $ 107 million in compensatory damages; the court approved punitive damages in the case totaling $ 1.09 billion. See Frederic M. Biddle, GM Verdict Cut $ 3.8 Billion in Suit Over Explosion, Wall St. J., Aug. 27, 1999, at B5. In a 1996 case, an Alabama jury awarded $ 50 million in compensatory damages and $ 100 million in punitive damages. The automobile's manufacturer argued that the plaintiff had been intoxicated and lost control of his car after falling asleep at the wheel. See Hardy v. General Motors Corp., CV-93-56 (Ala. Cir. Ct. Lowndes County verdict June 3, 1996).

n65 See Edward Felsenthal, Punitive Awards Are Called Modest, Rare, Wall St. J., June 17, 1996, at B4.

n66 See W. Kip Viscusi, The Social Costs of Punitive Damages Against Corporations In to the uncertainty (and therefore the risk) of a court trial outcome. ... [62] This recommendation reflects the practical reality that a punitive damages award exceeding $ 250,000 would bankrupt most individuals and small businesses. ... [98] Having found the verdict tainted, the court reduced the punitive damages award to $ 2 million, believing that this amount was "a constitutionally reasonable" punishment for BMW's conduct in Alabama. ...

REV_00262350

TEXT: [*1003]

Introduction

The United States Supreme Court has expressed serious concern in recent years that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild," jeopardizing fundamental constitutional rights. [1] The Court has provided some general controls, holding that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes both substantive limits on the size of punitive damages awards [2] and procedural limits on when and how [*1004] punitive damages may be awarded. [3] Yet, excessive punitive damages awards continue to be a major problem in many states. [4] Reform is urgently needed to restore balance, fairness, and predictability to the law. Jackpot justice should not be permitted to replace fairness and rationality in punitive damages law.

Punitive damages are not normal civil or tort law damages. They are not awarded to compensate for a harm; that purpose is accomplished by compensatory damages, which provide compensation for both economic losses (e.g., lost wages, medical expenses, and substitute domestic services) and noneconomic losses (e.g., "pain and suffering"). Punitive damages are awarded "to further the aims of the criminal law: 'to punish reprehensible conduct and to deter its future occurrence.'" [5] They provide a "windfall recovery" for plaintiffs. [6]

Punitive damages, like many forms of punishment, are by their nature, designed to "engender adverse social consequences," including in many instances, debilitating stigma. [7] Courts and commentators alike have emphasized the "potentially devastating" ramifications of a punitive damages award on a civil defendant's character, reputation, business, and good will. [8] The problems created by this stigma are amplified by [*1005] the way the media reports on punitive damages awards. While a large initial punitive damages verdict may frequently make front page national news, an appellate decision reducing or reversing the award several years later usually gets little coverage, if it is reported at all. The truth often fails to catch up with the perception created about the defendant.

This Article traces the history of punitive damages awards from their early limited inception to the modern expansive trend. It will then describe the problems of runaway and unpredictable awards. Finally, the article will provide background and support for a number of needed reforms to our nation's punitive damages jurisprudence. Nearly all of these reforms could be accomplished both by courts through the development of the common law and by legislatures; a few would require legislation; one calls for congressional action. [9]

By way of summary, we propose establishing a "trigger," or standard, for punitive damages liability that reflects the intentional tort roots of punitive damages awards. We believe that punitive damages should only be awarded if there is "clear and convincing evidence" that the defendant acted with "actual malice" toward the claimant. We also propose limits on punitive damages awards so that the punishment fits the offense. This would help prevent due process violations and promote settlements.

We also call for a number of procedural and evidentiary changes in punitive damages law to safeguard fundamental due process rights. We believe that, at a defendant's request, a trial

Environmental and Safety Torts, 87 Geo. L.J. 285, 294 (1998).

n67 See Troy L. Cady, Disadvantaging the Disadvantaged: The Discriminatory Effect of Punitive Damage Caps, 25 Hofstra L. Rev. 1005 (1997).

n68 See U.S. Small Bus. Admin. (visited Mar. 7, 2000) <http://www.sba.gov/womeninbusiness>.

n69 See U.S. Small Bus. Admin., Minorities in Business iii (Office of Advocacy 1999).

n70 See id.

n71 See Hodges v. S.C. Toof & Co., 833 S.W.2d 896 (Tenn. 1992); Transportation Ins. Co. v. Moriel, 879 S.W.2d 10 (Tex. 1994).

n72 See, e.g., Cal. Civ. Code § 3295(d) (West Supp. 1999); Minn. Stat. Ann. § 549.20 (West Supp. 1999); Miss Code Ann. § 11-1-65(1)(a) (Supp. 1999).

n73 See ABA Report, supra note 54, at 19; ACTL Report, supra note 54, at 18-19; Model Punitive Damages Act, supra note 54, § 11; ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255 n.41.

n74 Strickland v. Owens Corning, 142 F.3d 353, 359 (6th Cir. 1998) (citations omitted). As one leading commentator noted:

Juries have a natural sympathy for injured persons and not infrequently a corresponding hostility to "big business." The notion that juror consideration of the multimillion, often multibillion, dollar figures on a corporate balance sheet would operate to protect such defendants against excessive liability is, in context, almost laughable.

John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139, 146-47 (1986) (citations omitted).

n75 Defendants, however, should be able to introduce net worth evidence to mitigate damages. When introduced for this purpose, net worth evidence is not likely to produce a verdict based on bias or prejudice.

n76 499 U.S. 1 (1991).

n77 Id. at 22.

n78 Id.

n79 509 U.S. 443 (1993).

n80 Id. at 464. The Court did not rule on this potential due process violation because TXO had not preserved the issue for appeal. See id.

n81 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n82 Id. at 574. In BMW, the United States Supreme Court established three guideposts to determine when a punitive award is excessive and violates due process. See infra Part III.F. Significantly, the Court did not even discuss wealth as a factor in developing its guideposts. That fact has led Judge Easterbrook to conclude that such evidence is irrelevant and inadmissible. See Pivot Point Int'l v. Charlene Prods., Inc., 932 F. Supp. 220 (N.D. Ill. 1996) (Easterbrook, J., sitting by designation).

REV_00262351

n83 BMW, 517 U.S. at 585; see also Landgraf v. USI Film Prods., 511 U.S. 244, 265 (1994) ("Elementary considerations of fairness dictate that individuals should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly . . . .").

n84 Dissenting in TXO, Justice O'Connor stated:

Corporations are mere abstractions and, as such, are unlikely to be viewed with much sympathy. Moreover, they often represent a large accumulation of productive resources; jurors naturally think little of taking an otherwise large sum of money out of what appears to be an enormously larger pool of wealth. Finally, juries may feel privileged to correct perceived social ills stemming from unequal wealth distribution by transferring money from "wealthy" corporations to comparatively needier plaintiffs.

TXO, 509 U.S. at 491 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). Justice O'Connor dissented because she believed that TXO had preserved the "wealth issue" for appeal. She would have overturned the punitive damages award on the ground that the jury was "unduly influenced by the fact that TXO was a very large, out-of-state corporation." Id. at 489; see also Dick Thornburgh, No End in Sight as Punitive Damages Go Up, Up, Up, Wall St. J., Mar. 13, 2000, at A47.

n85 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 254-55 (stating that "in determining the size of the award that is sufficient for deterrence, what is relevant is not the defendant's overall wealth, but rather the profit it realized from the particular tortious activity in question . . . . Use of evidence of the defendant's wealth in calculating punitive damages against organizational defendants therefore cannot be justified even by the rationale of economic deterrence, let alone of retributive punishment.") (second emphasis added); see also Victor Schwartz & Mark Behrens, The American Law Institute's Reporters' Study On Enterprise Responsibility For Personal Injury: A Timely Call For Punitive Damages Reform, 30 San Diego L. Rev. 263, 271-72 (1993) ("The Reporters' recommendation to exclude evidence of a defendant's total wealth represents sound public policy. When a jury is allowed to focus on a defendant's wealth, the jury is free to disregard what is really at issue in the case: whether and to what extent the defendant's conduct was wrongful.").

n86 Zazu Designs v. L'Oreal, S.A., 979 F.2d 499, 508 (7th Cir. 1992) (Easterbrook, J.).

n87 See ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255 n.40. The ALI Reporters also pointed to another reason that a defendant's assets are irrelevant to the issue of punitive damages:

The actual burden of imposing a higher legal penalty on account of size cannot be borne by the formal corporate entity and will rarely be borne by the officials actually responsible; instead, the burden ultimately falls on the shareholder, customer, or worker constituencies of the firm, who often are not especially wealthy.

ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 255.

n88 See Kemezy v. Peters, 79 F.3d 33, 35 (7th Cir. 1996) (Posner, J.) (The idea that a larger punishment is needed to deter a rich person than a person of modest means "does not apply to institutions as distinct from natural persons."). As Judge Easterbrook has explained:

Corporations . . . are not wealthy in the sense that persons are. Corporations are abstractions; investors own the net worth of the business. These investors pay any punitive awards (the value of their shares decreases), and they may be of average wealth. Pension trusts and mutual funds, aggregating the investments of millions of average persons, own the bulk of many large corporations. Seeing the corporation as wealthy is an illusion, which like other mirages frequently leads people astray.

REV_00262352

Zazu Designs, 979 F.2d at 508.

n89 Kenneth S. Abraham & John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., Punitive Damages and the Rule of Law: The Role of Defendant's Wealth, 18 J. Legal. Stud. 415, 417 (1989) (emphasis added).

n90 517 U.S. 559 (1996).

n91 Id. at 585.

n92 Id. at 563.

n93 Id. at 565.

n94 See id. at 563-64.

n95 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 565.

n96 Id.

n97 See id. at 567.

n98 See id.

n99 Id.

n100 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 585-86.

n101 Id. at 571-72 (quoting Healy v. Beer Inst., 491 U.S. 324, 335-36 (1989)).

n102 Id. at 585.

n103 Id. at 571.

n104 Id. (citation omitted).

n105 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572; see also Bigelow v. Virginia, 421 U.S. 809, 824 (1975) ("A State does not acquire power or supervision over the internal affairs of another State merely because the welfare and health of its own citizens may be affected when they travel to that State."); New York Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161 (1914) ("It would be impossible to permit the statutes of Missouri to operate beyond the jurisdiction of that State . . . without throwing down the constitutional barriers by which all the States are restricted within the orbits of their lawful authority and upon the preservation of which the Government under the Constitution depends. This is so obviously the necessary result of the Constitution that it has rarely been called into question and hence authorities directly dealing with it do not abound."); Bonaparte v. Tax Court, 104 U.S. 592, 594 (1881) ("No State can legislate except with reference to its own jurisdiction . . . . Each State is independent of all the others in this particular.").

n106 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572-73; see also Bordenkircher v. Hayes, 434 U.S. 357, 363 (1978) ("To punish a person because he has done what the law plainly allows him to do is a due process violation of the most basic sort.").

n107 BMW, 517 U.S. at 573-74.

n108 Id. at 572 n.17; see also Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 U.S. 504, 521 (1992) (holding that state regulation for preemption purposes can be as effectively exerted through an award of tort damages as through state administrative or legislative lawmaking processes); New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 265 (1964) ("The test is not the form in which state power has been applied but, whatever the form, whether such power has in fact been exercised."); San Diego Bldg. Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 247 (1959) ("Regulation can be as effectively exerted through an award of damages as through some form of preventative relief.").

REV_00262353

n109 BMW, 517 U.S. at 572.

n110 See generally Restatement (Third) Of The Law Of Torts: Products Liability § 4(b) (1998) (evidence of product's compliance with safety statutes or regulations "does not preclude as a matter of law a finding of product defect").

n111 See BMW, 517 U.S. at 572.

n112 See In re American Med. Sys., Inc., 75 F.3d 1069, 1085 (6th Cir. 1996) (decertifying class action, in part, because the trial court judge failed to consider how negligence law differed from jurisdiction to jurisdiction); Castano v. American Tobacco Co., 84 F.3d 734, 741 (5th Cir. 1996) (multistate class action decertified, because trial court failed to consider how variations in state law would affect federal rule requirements regarding class actions); In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1300 (7th Cir. 1995) (Posner, J.) (comparing differing state pattern instructions on negligence and differing formulations on the meaning of negligence).

n113 See Margaret Meriwether Cordray, The Limits of State Sovereignty and the Issue of Multiple Punitive Damages Awards, 78 Or. L. Rev. 275, 309 (1999) ("Constitutional principles of sovereignty and federalism thus forbid a state from imposing punitive damages based on the defendant's out-of-state conduct, regardless of whether the defendant's conduct was lawful or unlawful where it occurred. To allow an individual state to impose punitive damages based on conduct, lawful or unlawful, having no significant contacts with that state would indeed, 'throw down the constitutional barriers by which all the States are restricted within the orbits of their lawful authority and upon the preservation of which the Government under the Constitution depends.'" (quoting New York Life Ins. Co. v. Head, 234 U.S. 149, 161 (1914)).

n114 See Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 12-701 (West 1999); Mich. Stat. Ann. § 600.2946(5) (1999); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2A:58C-5(c) (West 1999); Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2307.801(c) (West 1999); Or. Rev. Stat. § 30.927(1) (1998); Utah Code Ann. § 78-18-2 (1999); see also Colo. Rev. Stat. § 1321-403(1)(b) (1999) (rebuttable presumption that product was not defective if it complied with federal or state standards); N.D. Cent. Code § 28-01.402 (1)(a) (1999) (same).

n115 ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 95, 101.

n116 See Victor E. Schwartz & Liberty Magarian, Multiple Punitive Damage Awards in Mass Disaster and Product Liability Litigation: An Assault on Due Process, 8 Adelphia L.J. 101 (1992).

n117 See Edwards v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 911 F.2d 1151, 1155 (5th Cir. 1990) ("If no change occurs in our tort or constitutional law, the time will arrive when [a defendant's] liability for punitive damages imperils its ability to pay compensatory claims . . . ."); Bishop v. General Motors Corp., 925 F. Supp. 294, 298 (D.N.J. 1996) ("Indeed, one of the many cogent criticisms of punitive damages is that multiple punitive damage liability can both bankrupt a defendant and preclude recovery for tardy plaintiffs.").

n118 See generally Froud v. Celotex Corp., 437 N.E.2d 910, 914 (Ill. 1982) (Sullivan, J., concurring) ("It cannot be denied that the spectre of the destruction of companies, and even individuals, as a result of punitive damage awards is a threatening, present reality.").

REV_00262354

n119 Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1398 (3d Cir. 1993) (Weis, J., dissenting), modified in part, 13 F.3d 58 (3d Cir. 1993).

n120 William Schwartzer, Punishment Ad Absurdum, 11 Cal. Law. 116 (Oct. 1991).

n121 See Racich v. Celotex Corp., 887 F.2d 393, 398 (2d Cir. 1989) ("We agree that the multiple imposition of punitive damages for the same course of conduct may raise serious constitutional concerns, in the absence of any limiting principle."); Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp., 705 F. Supp. 1053, 1064 (D.N.J. 1989) ("The court holds that due process places a limit on the number of times and the extent to which a defendant may be subjected to punishment for a single course of conduct. Regardless of whether a sanction is labelled 'civil' or 'criminal' in nature, it cannot be tolerated under the requirements of due process if it amounts to unrestricted punishment."), vacated, 718 F. Supp. 1233 (D.N.J. 1989), rev'd on other grounds sub nom., Juzwin v. Asbestos Corp., 900 F.2d 686 (3d Cir. 1990); In re Northern Dist. of Calif. "Dalkon Shield" IUD Prod. Liab. Litig., 526 F. Supp. 887, 899 (N.D. Cal. 1981) ("A defendant has a due process right to be protected against unlimited multiple punishment for the same act."), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 693 F.2d 847 (9th Cir. 1982); see also King v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 906 F.2d 1022, 1031 (5th Cir. 1990) ("It must be said that a strong arguable basis exists for applying the due process clause . . . to a jury's award of punitive damages in a mass tort context."), reh'g denied, 914 F.2d 251 (5th Cir. 1990); In re Federal Skywalk Cases, 680 F.2d 1175, 1188 (8th Cir. 1982) (Heaney, J., dissenting) (Unlimited punishment for one course of conduct "would violate the sense of 'fundamental fairness' that is essential to constitutional due process."); Morse v. Southern Union Co., 38 F. Supp. 2d 1120, 1126 n.12 (W.D. Mo. 1998) ("While the Missouri courts seem not to have considered whether the likelihood of multiple claims should limit punitive damages recovery, I believe such a factor may be required by Due Process."); McBride v. General Motors Corp., 737 F. Supp. 1563, 1570 (M.D. Ga. 1990) ("Due process may place a limit on the number of times and the extent to which a defendant may be subjected to punishment for a single course of conduct."); Magallanes v. Superior Ct., 167 Cal. App. 3d 878, 888, (Cal. Ct. App. 1985) ("It is also fair to ask whether a defendant who has been punished with punitive damages when the case is first tried should be punished again when the second, or the tenth, or the hundredth case is tried.").

n122 See Dan D. Dobbs, Law of Remedies § 3.11(8) (2d ed. 1993) ("If the first verdict for punitive damages . . . represents the appropriate level of punishment, it may be seriously unfair to inflict additional punishment in all subsequent cases. Besides the unfairness, such awards may destroy a valuable business and may exhaust its assets so that later victims of the same tort collect nothing at all."); John Calvin Jeffries, Jr., A Comment on the Constitutionality of Punitive Damages, 72 Va. L. Rev. 139 (1986); Dennis Jones et al., Multiple Punitive Damages Awards For A Single Course of Wrongful Conduct: The Need For A National Policy To Protect Due Process, 40 Ala. L. Rev. 1 (1991).

n123 Dunn v. Hovic, 1 F.3d 1371, 1399 (3d Cir. 1993) (Weis, J., dissenting); see also Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 781 F.2d 394, 415 (5th Cir. 1986) (en banc) (Clark, C.J., dissenting) ("The court is frustrated by the lack of congressional action [to solve the multiple punitive damages problem]. Clearly the powers of Congress to tax and regulate give that forum the interstate reach and flexibility needed to allocate the relatively scarce resources that must be available to present and future claimants to achieve the greatest good for society.").

n124 This problem was described by the ALI:

Single-state action . . . is an ineffectual response to the problem, because one state cannot control what happens in other jurisdictions. In fact, the state that acts alone may simply provide some relief to out-of-state manufacturers at the expense of its own citizen-victims, a situation that hardly provides much law reform incentive for state legislators.

REV_00262355

ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 261. Recognizing that a uniform remedy can only be achieved at the federal level, the ALI Reporters' Study recommended Congressional action. See ALI Reporters' Study, supra note 54, at 261.

n125 Florida does not permit punitive damages to be awarded more than once for the same act or course of conduct unless the court determines by clear and convincing evidence that the amount of punitive damages previously awarded was insufficient to punish the defendant. In that situation, the court may permit a jury to consider an award of subsequent punitive damages. Any subsequent awards must be reduced by the amount of any earlier punitive damages awards. See Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.73(2) (West 1997). Missouri passed a statute, applicable in most tort actions, that allows a defendant to file a post-trial motion requesting a credit for prior awards arising out of the same conduct. See Mo. Ann. Stat. § 510.263.4 (1999). A Georgia statute limiting punitive damages in product liability cases to a single award, see Ga. Code Ann. § 51-125.1(e) (1999), was declared unconstitutional. See McBride v. General Motors Corp., 737 F. Supp. 1563 (M.D. Ga. 1990).

n126 718 F. Supp. 1233 (D.N.J. 1989), rev'd on other grounds sub nom., Juzwin v. Asbestos Corp., 900 F.2d 686 (3d Cir. 1990).

n127 See id. at 1235 ("This court does not have the power or the authority to prohibit subsequent awards in other courts, notwithstanding its opinion that such subsequent awards violate the due process rights of the defendants . . . . Until there is uniformity either through Supreme Court decision or national legislation, this court is powerless to fashion a remedy which will protect the due process rights of this defendant or other defendants similarly situated."); see also Davis v. Celotex Corp., 420 S.E.2d 557, 566 (W. Va. 1992) (noting that, because punitive damages can be awarded "nationwide, it is doubtful that one state's ruling would necessarily bind other jurisdictions"); Fischer v. Johns-Manville Corp., 512 A.2d 466, 480 (N.J. 1986) ("At the state court level we are powerless to implement solutions to the nationwide problems created by [multiple punitive damages awards]."). See generally David Lafferty, Note, Juzwin v. Amtorg Trading Corp.: Multiple Assessments of Punitive Damages In Toxic Tort Litigation, 8 Pace Envtl. L. Rev. 647, 665 (1991) (concluding that the problem of multiple punitive damages awards "cries out for congressional action").

n128 See generally TXO Prod. Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp., 509 U.S. 443, 472 (1993) (Scalia and Thomas, J.J., concurring in the judgment) (indicating a belief that "any perceived 'unfairness' in the common-law punitive damages regime" should be fixed by legislatures).

n129 W.R. Grace & Co.-Conn. v. Waters, 638 So. 2d 502, 505 (Fla. 1994); see also Spaur v. Owens-Corning Fiberglas Corp., 510 N.W.2d 854, 865-66 (Iowa 1994) ("We do not disagree that the problem of successive punitive damages awards in mass tort cases arising from the same conduct is a serious one . . . . We believe neither our action nor legislative action in Iowa will curb the problem of multiple punitive damage awards in mass tort litigation.").

n130 140 Cong. Rec. S14835-6 (daily ed. Oct. 7, 1994) (statement of Sen. Danforth).

n131 Id.

n132 Pacific Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Haslip, 499 U.S. 1, 18 (1991).

REV_00262356

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:03 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

involving a punitive damages claim should be "bifurcated" so that the proceedings on punitive damages are separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages before the same jury. This would prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by the jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability. We also suggest that [*1006] evidence of a defendant's net worth should be excluded from consideration at trial. Further, we explain that evidence of a defendant's out-of-state activity should not be considered when determining an award of punitive damages.

Next, to encourage the innovation and distribution of lifesaving and life-enhancing products that are socially beneficial to society, we recommend that punitive damages should not be permitted in cases alleging harms caused by FDA pre-market approved pharmaceuticals, vaccines, or medical devices, unless the approval was obtained through fraud or bribery.

Finally, we argue for federal legislation to address the special problem of multiple punitive damages awards for a single act or course of conduct. Repetitive punishment is not only unfair overkill, but it can strip a company of assets and endanger the ability of future claimants to recover even basic out-of-pocket expenses and damages for their pain and suffering.

I. Background: The Development of Punitive Damages Law

A. The First 200 Years

Punitive, or exemplary, damages first received explicit recognition by the English common law in 1763 in two cases involving illegal searches and seizures by officers of the Crown. [10] In Huckle v. Money, [11] the first case to use the term "exemplary damages," and its companion case, Wilkes v. Wood, [12] English courts for the first time expressed that "the punitive and deterrent purposes of damage awards could be separated from their compensatory function." [13] [*1007]

Huckle and Wilkes were followed by cases approving punitive damages awards in a narrow category of torts involving conscious and intentional harm inflicted by one person on another. These "intentional torts" included assault and battery, [14] malicious prosecution, [15] false imprisonment, [16] and trespass. [17] Punitive damages were allowed in these cases as an auxiliary, or "helper," to the criminal law system, which in eighteenth century England "punished more severely for infractions involving property damage than for invasions of personal rights." [18]

As in England, punitive damages in colonial America (and through the nineteenth and well into the twentieth centuries) were available only in a comparatively small class of torts-"the traditional intentional torts." [19] These included: assault and battery, [20] libel and slander, [21] malicious prosecution, [22] false imprisonment, [23] and intentional interferences with property [*1008] such as trespass and conversion, malicious attachment, or destruction of property, [24] private nuisance, [25] and similar wrongful conduct. [26] In general, punitive damages "merited scant attention," because they "were rarely assessed and likely to be small in amount." [27] Typically, punitive damages awards only slightly exceeded compensatory damages awards, if at all. [28]

B. The Modern Era

Beginning in the late 1960s, American courts began to depart radically from the historical "intentional tort" moorings of punitive damages. [29] The advent of "mass tort" litigation resulted in an increase of punitive damages claims against manufacturers, [30] including the possibility of repeated imposition of punitive damages for an alleged risk in a single product line or a single decision. [31] [*1009]

"Reckless disregard" became a popular standard for punitive damages liability. [32] A number of states utilize a triple "trigger"-punitive damages can be awarded if the defendant engaged in either willful, wanton, or gross misconduct. The triple trigger approach gives plaintiffs three separate paths to obtain punitive damages. In some states, "gross negligence" can support a punitive damages award. [33]

Changes in punitive damages law and practice also impacted both the frequency and size of punitive damages awards. For example, until 1976, there were only three reported appellate court decisions upholding awards of punitive damages in product liability cases, and the punitive damages award in each case was modest in proportion to the compensatory damages awarded. [34] Then, in the late 1970s and 1980s, the size of punitive damages awards "increased dramatically" [35] and "unprecedented numbers of punitive awards in product liability and other mass tort situations began to surface." [36] "Today," as one respected commentator in the field has noted, "hardly a month goes by without a multi-million dollar punitive damages verdict in a product liability case." [37]

This phenomenon is fueled in part by evidentiary rules that permit a contingency fee plaintiff's lawyer to tell the jury not only about the profit the defendant made on a product, but also the general wealth of the corporation as a whole. Plaintiffs' lawyers argue to juries that large, wealthy corporations will "get the message" only if punitive damages are sub [*1010] stantial. As the United States Supreme Court noted in Honda Motor Co., Ltd. v. Oberg, [38] a products liability punitive damages case, "The presentation of evidence of a defendant's net worth creates the potential that juries will use their verdicts to express biases against big businesses, particularly those without strong local presences." [39]

II. Punitive Damages Reform Is Needed

A. The Problem with Runaway Punitive Damages

Reform is needed to address the chilling effect that the threat of runaway punitive damages can have on job-creators and the general public, who are denied socially beneficial products. Reform also would help prevent due process violations.

The chilling effect of punitive damages is illustrated by the litigation involving the drug Bendectin, an anti-nausea morning sickness drug once marketed by Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc. [40] Although the drug had been and still is approved by the Food and Drug Administration and is widely acclaimed by health care professionals worldwide, Merrell Dow withdrew Bendectin from the market in 1983, in part [*1011] from concerns about punitive damages liability. Merrell Dow has never lost a final judgment in any Bendectin case in the twenty-year history of the litigation; trial judges often dismiss these cases prior to trial. [41] The lack of any meaningful standards, however, has resulted in some substantial punitive damages verdicts, which eventually have been overturned by trial courts or on appeal. [42]

The sheer unpredictability of the current system has also resulted in overdeterrence. A Conference Board Study of corporate executives found that fear of liability suits had prompted thirtysix percent of the firms to discontinue a product and thirty percent to decide against introducing a new product. [43]

B. "Data Wars" and the In Terrorem Effect of Punitive Damages

Opponents of punitive damages reform have argued that changes in the law are not needed, because headline-grabbing awards are often reduced on appeal. For example, one study funded by plaintiffs' lawyers has suggested that there were only 355 punitive damages awards in products liability cases from 1965 to 1990. [44] While the author of this study has conceded that this number was only a "guesstimate," [45] the study also overlooked the practical reality that actual punitive awards represent just the tip of the iceberg in regard to their impact. They are dwarfed by the amounts paid out in settlements due to the in terrorem effect of punitive damages.

On average, over ninety percent of cases are settled out of court or otherwise disposed of without trial. [46] In many of [*1012] these cases, the threat of punitive damages may be abused as a "wild card" to force higher settlements. [47] As Yale law professor George Priest has observed:

The availability of unlimited punitive damages affects the 95% to 98% of cases that settle out of court prior to trial. It is obvious and indisputable that a punitive damages claim increases the magnitude of the ultimate settlement and, indeed, affects the entire settlement process, increasing the likelihood of litigation. [48]

Professor Priest's observation is supported by the findings of a 1996 Pacific Research Institute for Public Policy study, which concluded:

1. The unpredictability of a prospective punitive damage award contributes significantly to the uncertainty (and therefore the risk) of a court trial outcome.

2. Both the uncertainty posed by the prospect of unlimited punitive damages, combined with the relative probability of a punitive damage award if a case goes to jury trial, provide litigants who demand punitive damages with potent leverage against risk-averse defendants, and tip the balance in settlement bargains in favor of litigants with weak or frivolous cases. [49]

III. Proposals For Punitive Damages Reform

In order to address the United States Supreme Court's concern that punitive damages awards in this country have "run wild," [50] clear, rational rules are needed to protect fundamental constitutional rights, remove barriers to interstate commerce, and promote economic growth and innovation, while at the same time providing incentives for responsible business practices. Below, we discuss a number of proposals that find strong support in both the law and sound public policy. [*1013]

A. Actual Malice "Trigger"

Punitive damages should only be awarded if the defendant's conduct exhibited actual malice. This "trigger" reflects the roots of punitive damages law. At the time the Founding Fathers ratified the Constitution and until relatively recent times, punitive damages were reserved for clearly intentional torts such as assault, battery, trespass, and false imprisonment. While the actual malice standard is more conservative than the current law in most states, [51] we believe it is preferable to other standards, such as the "triple trigger" approach, because it would help separate conduct that is particularly reprehensible and worthy of punishment from that which is not.

B. "Clear and Convincing Evidence" Burden of Proof

A claimant should be required to establish proof of punitive damages liability by "clear and convincing evidence." The "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard reflects the quasi-criminal nature of punitive damages; it takes a middle ground between the burden of proof standard ordinarily used in civil cases (i.e., proof by a "preponderance of the evidence") and the criminal law standard (i.e., proof "beyond a reasonable doubt"). [52] The standard is now law in twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia, [53] and has been recom [*1014] mended by each of the principal academic groups to analyze the law of punitive damages over the past decade, including the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws. [54] The United States Supreme Court has specifically endorsed the "clear and convincing evidence" burden of proof standard in punitive damages cases. [55]

REV_00262336

C. Proportionality: Making the Punishment Fit the "Offense"

1. A Proposal for Reform

Reasonable parameters should be put on punitive damages awards to make the punishment fit the offense. [56] Proportionality has been an important part of the United States Supreme Court's consideration of the validity of criminal punishment. [57] Even very serious crimes such as larceny, robbery, and arson [*1015] have sentences defined by a statutory maximum. [58] As former Supreme Court Justice Lewis Powell wrote: "It is long past time to bring the law of punitive damages into conformity with our notions of just punishment." [59]

A number of states have enacted statutes to address excessiveness in punitive damages awards. [60] We support permitting punitive damages awards against larger businesses up to two times the amount awarded to the claimant for economic and noneconomic losses, or $ 250,000, whichever is greater. [61] This flexible approach accomplishes punishment and deterrence in the unusual situation where there is serious misconduct and relatively minor actual damages. We also support limiting the maximum single punishment against an individual or small business to two times the amount awarded to the claimant for economic and noneconomic losses, or $ 250,000, whichever is less (i.e., $ 250,000 would be the maximum). [62] [*1016] This recommendation reflects the practical reality that a punitive damages award exceeding $ 250,000 would bankrupt most individuals and small businesses.

2. Arguments Challenging Proportionality Are Unsupported

It has been argued that proportionality may result in inadequate deterrence. As Thomas Jefferson noted, however, "if the punishment were only proportional to the injury, men would feel that their inclination as well as their duty to see the laws observed." [63] Indeed, federal antitrust laws have worked well for decades with punishment set in proportion to actual losses.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that there is no limit on the number of times a business can be punished and that when a business engages in wrongful conduct it does not know how many people will be hurt and how much harm might occur. There is simply no way for a company to predetermine the actual damages of all persons who may be injured by its conduct. One also must remember that compensatory damages themselves can run very high, so they can definitely have a deterrent effect on wrongful behavior as well. [64]

The argument that proportionality may somehow result in inadequate deterrence has been rebutted by empirical fact. A study by two Cornell University Law School professors and the National Center for State Courts found that awards in product liability punitive damages cases, after all appeals were exhausted, have almost always been within two times compensatory damages. [65] [*1017]

We have been asked, in light of this report, why a so-called "cap" on punitive damages is needed. The answer is that the present system is time consuming and wasteful. It may take months or years until the final "appeal" is determined. It is our judgment that having a firm outer limit on punitive damages will reduce appeals and legal costs without sacrificing deterrence. This should benefit both plaintiffs and defendants.

In addition, it has been argued that totally unlimited punitive damages are needed to police corporate wrongdoing. This assertion is not supported by fact. There is no credible evidence that the behavior of businesses is less safe in either those states that have set limits on punitive damages or in the states that do not permit punitive damages at all. [66] Furthermore, plaintiffs in these states have no more difficulty obtaining legal representation than in those states where the "sky is the limit."

Finally, it has been suggested that a proportionality requirement for punitive damages could be unfair to women and other minority groups that tend to recover less in compensatory damages than other groups, because it may reduce the amount such individuals could recover in punitive damages. [67] First, this argument totally misapprehends the basic premise that punitive damages have absolutely nothing to do with compensating an individual for a loss; they are purely a "windfall" to the claimant.

Second, the argument ignores the needs of women and minority groups in business, particularly small businesses, who face threats to their enterprises as a result of unlimited punitive damages. The U.S. Small Business Administration's Office of Women's Business Ownership has reported that there are 8 million women-owned businesses in the United States. [68] In addition, the U.S. Small Business Administration's Office of Advocacy has reported that, by 1997, there were an estimated 3.25 million minority-owned businesses in the United States, [*1018] generating $ 495 billion in revenues, and employing nearly 4 million workers. [69] From 1987 to 1997, the number of minority-owned businesses increased 168%, while revenues grew twice as fast-343%. [70] Punitive damages reform would benefit these businesses greatly.

D. Bifurcation

At a defendant's request, a trial involving a punitive damages claim should be divided so that the proceedings on punitive damages are separate from and subsequent to the proceedings on compensatory damages. Judicial economy would be achieved by having the same jury determine both compensatory damages and punitive damages issues.

Bifurcated trials are equitable, because they prevent evidence that is highly prejudicial and relevant only to the issue of punishment from being heard by jurors and improperly considered when they are determining basic liability. For example, plaintiffs' lawyers like to introduce evidence of a company's net worth. Although a jury is often instructed to ignore such evidence unless it decides to punish the defendant, it is difficult, as a practical matter, for jurors to do so. The net result may be that jurors overlook key issues regarding whether a defendant is liable for compensatory damages; they may make an award simply because they believe that the defendant "can afford it." Bifurcation would help prevent that unfair result because evidence of the defendant's net worth would be inadmissible in the first part (i.e., compensatory damages phase) of the case.

Bifurcation also helps jurors "compartmentalize" a trial, allowing them to more easily separate the burden of proof that is required for compensatory damage awards (i.e., proof by a preponderance of the evidence) from a higher burden of proof for punitive damages (i.e., proof by clear and convincing evidence).

Recognizing the benefit of bifurcation, some courts have adopted the procedure as a matter of common law reform. [71] [*1019] Other states have made changes through court rules or legislation. [72] Bifurcation of punitive damages trials is supported by the American Bar Association, the American College of Trial Lawyers, and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, among other well-known organizations. [73]

REV_00262338

E. Excluding Evidence of a Defendant's Net Worth by Plaintiffs

Evidence of a defendant's net worth can lead to a punitive damages award based on bias, prejudice, or passion. Introduction of such evidence by plaintiffs is, at bottom, "an improper 'appeal to class prejudice and pandering to the perception that corporations wield disparate power,'" generally made for no reason "'other than to prejudice . . . the jury's sworn duty to reach a fair, honest and just verdict.'" [74] To reduce the possibility that quasi-criminal punishment could be meted out for improper purposes, plaintiffs should be precluded from making such "deep pockets" arguments. [75]

1. The United States Supreme Court Speaks and Leading Academics Agree

The United States Supreme Court has indicated that overreliance upon a corporate defendant's financial condition may violate due process. For example, one of the reasons the [*1020] Court gave for upholding Alabama's punitive damages scheme in Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Haslip [76] was the fact that Alabama does not permit introduction of the defendant's financial condition, and its juries therefore "must be guided by more than the defendant's net worth." [77] The Court stated: "Alabama plaintiffs do not enjoy a windfall because they have the good fortune to have a defendant with a deep pocket." [78]

Subsequently, the Court said in TXO Production Corp. v. Alliance Resources Corp. [79] that "the emphasis on the wealth of the wrongdoer increased the risk that the [punitive damages] award may have been influenced by prejudice against large corporations, a risk that is of special concern when the defendant is a nonresident." [80] Most recently, in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore [81] the Court expressed its strongest reservations about the use of wealth evidence in punitive damages cases. The Court stated that "elementary notions of fairness enshrined in our constitutional jurisprudence dictate that a person receive fair notice not only of the conduct that will subject him to punishment but also of the severity of the penalty that a State may impose." [82]

The defendant's right to notice would be a "phantom" right if a punitive damages award could be based on a defendant's net worth at the time of trial. Indeed, in BMW, the Supreme Court was careful to emphasize that "the fact that BMW is a large corporation rather than an impecunious individual does not diminish its entitlement to fair notice of the demands that the several States impose on the conduct of its business." [83] [*1021]

The risk of a punitive damages award reflecting jury bias is particularly great where the defendant is a large corporation. [84] For precisely this reason, a report prepared by tort scholars for the prestigious American Law Institute recommended that evidence of a corporation's net worth should "no longer be admissible in assessing punitive damages." [85] After all, as one respected federal appellate judge has noted, "having a large net worth [is not] the wrong to be deterred!" [86]

Furthermore, consideration of a corporate defendant's net wealth can lead to arbitrary awards. Corporations can incur proportionately more instances of punishment simply because of their greater volume of business. For example, in a given period there might be fifty punitive damages awards against a larger company and only five against a smaller company. If each punitive damages assessment is one percent of the [*1022] defendant's assets, the large company will have lost half its assets after this period. The smaller company, which behaved in exactly the same way, would still have ninety-five percent of its assets. [87]

2. Arguments for Net Worth Evidence Admissibility Are Ill-Considered

Plaintiffs generally argue that evidence of a defendant's overall financial condition is rationally related to the goals of punishment and deterrence, on the theory that the wealthier the defendant, the higher the financial penalty must be in order to give a culpable defendant both the punishment it deserves and the economic incentive not to repeat its wrongdoing.

While this may be true in the case of individual defendants acting personally out of malicious or spiteful motives-i.e., it may take a larger punishment to deter a millionaire from punching someone in the nose than to deter a person of modest means-it has no applicability to corporate behavior, which is almost invariably motivated by economics. [88] As two noted scholars on punitive damages awards have explained: [*1023]

Deterrence theory is based on the (usually and to one or another extent plausible) assumption that actors weigh the expected costs and benefits of their future actions. Specifically, a potentially liable defendant will compare the benefits it will derive from an action that risks tort liability against the discounted present expected value of the liability that will be imposed if the risk occurs. Whether a defendant is wealthy or poor, this cost-benefit calculation is the same. If, as is likely, a wealthy defendant derives no greater benefit from a given action than a poor defendant, then both will be equally deterred (or equally undeterred) by the threat of tort liability. A defendant's existing assets do not increase the expected value of a given future action. Therefore they do not require any adjustment in the level of sanction needed to offset that expected value. The defendant's wealth or lack of it is thus irrelevant to the deterrence of socially undesirable conduct. [89]

F. Excluding Evidence of Extraterritorial Conduct

Evidence of a defendant's out-of-state activity to award and calculate punitive damages can violate constitutional principals of interstate commerce, state sovereignty, comity, and due process. Plaintiffs should be precluded from admitting such evidence.

This issue was a principal focus of the Supreme Court's opinion in BMW of North America, Inc. v. Gore. [90] In BMW, the Court indicated that the Commerce and Due Process Clauses of the United States Constitution prohibit state courts from using the punitive damages mechanism as a means of regulating conduct in other states. In a crucial sentence, the Court said: "While each State has ample power to protect its own consumers, none may use the punitive damages deterrent as a means of imposing its regulatory policies on the entire Nation." [91]

Months after purchasing a new BMW sedan from an Alabama dealer, and without noticing any flaws in its appearance, Dr. Gore took his vehicle to a "detailer"-someone who would thoroughly clean the car inside and out to make it look "snazz [*1024] ier than it normally would appear." [92] The detailer noted that portions of Dr. Gore's car had been repainted and brought this to the doctor's attention. Dr. Gore sued the American distributor of BMW automobiles seeking both compensatory and punitive damages on the theory that BMW's failure to disclose the repainting constituted "gross, oppressive or malicious" fraud under Alabama law. [93]

At trial, BMW acknowledged that it had a national policy of repairing cars that were damaged in the course of manufacture or during shipment. If the cost of a repair exceeded 3% of the car's suggested retail price, it was placed in company service for a period of time and then sold as used. If the repair was less than 3% of the purchase price, however, BMW sold the car as "new" without advising the dealer or the customer that any repairs had been made. [94]

Because the cost of repainting Dr. Gore's car was only about 1.5% of the car's suggested retail price, BMW did not disclose its repair to the Alabama dealer or to Dr. Gore. BMW's nondisclosure policy was consistent with the statutory laws of approximately twenty-five states which define disclosure obligations of automobile manufacturers, distributors, and retailers. [95] Under these state laws, BMW's failure to disclose minor refinishing was lawful and

REV_00262340

Counsel's Office, White House

Kavanaugh, Brett

Subject Files

[Tort Reform Articles] [4]

OA/NARA#: 1646/1514
9597

Box 59
Folder 2

REV_00262358

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)

Select for FOCUS™ or Delivery

*87 Cornell L. Rev. 743, **

Copyright (c) 2002 Cornell Law Review
Cornell Law Review

March, 2002

87 Cornell L. Rev. 743

LENGTH: 10222 words

ARTICLE: JURIES, JUDGES, AND PUNITIVE DAMAGES: AN EMPIRICAL STUDY

Theodore Eisenberg, Neil LaFountain, Brian Ostrom, David Rottman & Martin T. Wells+

+ Theodore Eisenberg is the Henry Allen Mark Professor of Law, Cornell University; Brian Ostrom and David Rottman are Project Co-Directors of the Civil Trial Court Network Project at the National Center for State Courts (NCSC); Neil LaFountain is Court Research Analyst at the NCSC; and Martin Wells is Professor of Statistics, Department of Social Statistics, and Elected Member of the Law Faculty, Cornell University. The research that the NCSC conducted was supported by grant number BJS-96-BJ-CX-K012 from the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS). The points of view presented are those of the authors; they do not necessarily represent the policies or views of the BJS or the NCSC. We thank Kevin M. Clermont and Jeffrey J. Rachlinski for their comments.

SUMMARY:
... Concerns about juries dominate punitive damages reform debates. ... The data about each case include the subject matter, locale, prevailing party, type of litigants, and compensatory and punitive damage award levels. ... The explanatory variables of particular interest are a jury trial dummy variable, which assesses whether juries are more likely than judges to award punitive damages, and an interaction term consisting of the product of the jury trial dummy variable and the compensatory award. ... For example, Table 3 shows that the odds multiplier for motor vehicle tort cases (0.131) is substantially less than 1.0 and thus that, compared to the reference category (products liability), motor vehicle cases are much less likely to end with a punitive award. ... An interaction term between the jury trial dummy variable and the compensatory award (log) assesses whether the slope of the punitive-compensatory line changes in jury trials compared to judge trials. ... As was the case for the 1991-92 CTCN data, the compensatory award is the most powerful predictor of the punitive award. ... Table 5's third model changes the dependent variable from the punitive award (log) to the ratio of the punitive and compensatory award (logs), as described in Table 2 and Figure 2. ...

TEXT: [*744]

Introduction

Concerns about juries dominate punitive damages reform debates. Some observers before judges in their strongest cases on the merits.n82 Similarly, the plaintiff with a strong punitive damages case may opt for a judge trial to avoid the less reliable jury because the jury might refuse to grant a punitive award in a case that merits an award. If such routing occurs, then one might observe judges awarding punitive damages at a greater rate than juries and defendants opting for jury trials when the case for punitive damages is weakest. Absent some affirmative evidence of such routing, we are skeptical that it systematically occurs. Perceptions that juries are more likely to award punitive damages, and more likely to award more in punitive damages, are widespread.n83 Indeed, until the CTCN data were gathered, the surprisingly prominent role of judges in the punitive damages area was, we suspect, unknown. Systematically seeking the reliable judge to obtain a punitive damages award, when judges are not perceived as even awarding punitive damages, seems an unlikely effect. But we cannot eliminate this effect based on our data, and it could mask real judge-jury differences.

2. Selection Attributable to Case Settlement

Because juries are believed to be more unpredictable than judges, especially in high-award cases,n84 defendants may choose to settle cases that have high probabilities of large punitive awards. It is more difficult to account for this aspect of case selection.n85 Trials in cases in which jurors' propensity to award punitive damages is strongest may never be observed. Juries are viewed as so much wilder than judges that they only rarely get to act in those cases in which their behavior would be expected to be wildest.n86

[*768] The CTCN data's pattern should partially alleviate this concern. That judges award punitive damages as frequently as juries is surprising and has implications for the dogma of juror bias. Because judges award punitive damages at rates similar to juries, the simplest description of the data, admittedly ignoring case routing, is that juries and judges behave similarly, as Kalven and Zeisel found.n87 Even if they do not behave similarly, jurors' shadow effect on settlements cannot be based on the observed pattern of judge and jury trial outcomes. The presumed settlement behavior may be based on misperception.n88

Second, available data suggest that there is no hidden mountain of settlements involving punitive damages masking the ability of trial studies to detect punitive damages' true effects. Karpoff and Lott studied eleven years (1985-96) of lawsuits in which plaintiffs sought punitive damages from publicly traded businesses.n89 They found that settlement amounts (including both punitive and nonpunitive damages) constituted a near-trivial portion of awards paid, and that trial verdicts dwarfed settlements in both number and amount.n90 They also found no statistically significant abnormal stock returns and concluded that "the data from our sample do not support" the hypothesis that settlements shaped by punitive damages comprise the main effect of punitive damages.n91

The CTCN data allow further study of the settlement effect, albeit not as directly as the Karpoff-Lott study. The existence of statutory caps on punitive damages in several states allows for an empirical test of the settlement aspect of case selection. In states that cap punitive [*769] awards, plaintiffs' threat to go to the jury should not intimidate defendants into settling nearly as much as in states that do not cap awards. If defendants are only gambling against a punitive award of two or three times the compensatory award - the typical cap - the pressure to avoid the jury substantially diminishes. Therefore, in states that cap punitive awards we might expect defendants to press to jury trial potential punitive cases that they would settle in states without caps. The percentage of jury trials ending in punitive awards increases, but defendants know that the punitive award is substantially less likely to bankrupt them because of the caps. If defendants settle enough cases to call into question the implications of studies limited to trials, this effect should be substantial.n92

To explore this possibility, we introduce a dummy variable equal to one in states that cap punitive awards. The CTCN sample includes counties in twenty-one states, and several of these states cap punitive awards.n93 Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Texas, and Virginia did so for all or part of the period covered by the CTCN [*770] sample.n94 We set the dummy variable equal to one for cases decided at a time when state law imposed caps on punitive awards.

REV_00262368

Strong settlement selection effects may exist if this dummy variable correlates with punitive damages award frequency in jury trials. Table 4, however, shows that this is not the case. Limiting the sample to jury trials won by plaintiffs, Table 4 shows that the punitive award rate was lower in states with caps than in states without caps. If one includes jury trials won by defendants, the rates of punitive awards in capping states remain lower. Regression analysis of jury trial punitive awards using models similar to those in Table 3 yields insignificant results for the capping dummy variable. We thus find no evidence that caps which reduce the risk of ruinous punitive damages liability affect the rate of punitive awards in jury-tried cases.n95

There are, of course, other possible explanations for the absence of effect. Capping and noncapping states might differ in ways that our models do not capture. Studying punitive award patterns within capping states before and after enactment of punitive award caps might be revealing.n96

[*771]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

III

The Relation Between Punitive Damages and Compensatory Damages

This Part shifts the focus from the decision to award punitive damages and studies instead the level of punitive damages, given a punitive award. All studies confirm that juries' punitive damages awards correlate strongly with compensatory awards.n97 We now further assess Figure 1's indication that a similar relation exists in cases tried by judges, and Figure 2's and Table 2's indications that the punitive-compensatory ratio does not vary between judge and jury trials.

A. Modeling the Level of Punitive Damages Awards

Given a decision to award punitive damages, what should determine their level? Previous work outlines a model in which the most important influences on the punitive award level are the harm caused, the egregiousness of the misbehavior, and the amount needed to accomplish the goals of punishment or deterrence.n98 We therefore discuss the model only briefly here.

The punishment meted out in a punitive award ought to relate to the harm the defendant caused. We tend to regard behavior as worse when it causes more damage. The compensatory component of the damages award is a measure of the harm the defendant has caused. Thus, punitive damages ought to correlate positively with compensatory damages.n99 We therefore include the compensatory award level (log) in our model of punitive damages.

The punishment-deterrent rationale underlying punitive awards suggests that the level of punitive award ought to relate to the defendant's [*772] financial circumstances,n100 though the theoretical soundness of considering defendants' wealth is debated in the law and economics literature. We found evidence of this effect in the 1991-92 CTCN data.n101 We therefore include dummy variables representing the litigant pairs summarized in Table 1 in the punitive damages model.

REV_00262369

Independent of the harm caused, the defendant's degree of misbehavior ought to influence the punitive award level. Table 3 shows that case categories are useful proxies for punishable behavior. Fraud and intentional tort, which correlate positively with the decision to award punitive damages, represent intentional misbehavior. Given a decision to award punitive damages, however, a case's subject area should become less relevant to the award level.n102 "Intentional or egregious wrongdoers are more serious wrongdoers whether they produce products, publish newspapers, harm patients, or defraud contractual partners. They are united more by the nature of their wrongdoing than by the subject area of their wrong."n103 We thus expect, as found in the 1991-92 CTCN data, the subject matter of a case to play less of a role in explaining the size of punitive damages awards than it plays in explaining the decision to award punitive damages.

To these previously studied influences on punitive awards, we add variables to represent the adjudicator. As in our decision-to-award models, a jury trial dummy variable assesses whether the intercept for punitive awards changes in jury trials compared to judge trials. An interaction term between the jury trial dummy variable and the compensatory award (log) assesses whether the slope of the punitive-compensatory line changes in jury trials compared to judge trials. The direction and significance of the coefficients for these variables are of primary interest here.

B. Results

Table 5's first numerical column reports the results of the above model, in which the punitive award (log) is the dependent variable in a sample of 171 cases in which plaintiffs won a nonzero punitive award at trial.n104 This model includes all the variables and shows a strong, significant correlation between the compensatory award and the punitive [*773] award. As was the case for the 1991-92 CTCN data,n105 the compensatory award is the most powerful predictor of the punitive award. The compensatory award alone explains about half the variance in the punitive award. If the compensatory award is a rational measure of harm caused - and evidence exists to suggest that it isn106 - one can also use the compensatory award to partly control for differences across judge-jury cases, especially the greater tendency of higher stakes cases to go to juries.n107

Table 5's third model changes the dependent variable from the punitive award (log) to the ratio of the punitive and compensatory award (logs), as described in Table 2 and Figure 2. From one perspective, this is the variable of primary interest. Holding other factors constant, do judges and juries differ in the amount of punitive damages awarded per unit of compensatory damages? Except for the change in the dependent variable, the third model is the same as the first model. The litigant pair categories and case categories, reported in the Appendix,n108 behave about the same as in the first model. The model's explanatory power is substantially lower because the punitive-compensatory ratio is so unvarying.n109

The two jury trial variables are not statistically significant. In the first model, the jury trial dummy variable is negative and statistically insignificant.n110 The interaction term is positive but also statistically insignificant.n111 None of the models support the hypothesis that [*774]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

judges and juries differ in the way they set levels of punitive awards or in the amount of punitive damages awarded per unit of compensatory damages. The other variables in the fuller model - compensatory award, case category dummies, and litigant pair dummies - provide substantial control for the known principal differences between cases routed to juries and judges. That is, judges and juries are known to see cases with different stakes and with different distributions of case categories.n112 The insignificance of the judge-jury differences survives when we account for selectivity and is not sensitive to inclusion of Harris County, Texas.n113

REV_00262370

C. The Greater Spread in the Jury Regression Models

The preceding section addresses the question whether there is a mean effect between judges and juries. The regressions assume that [*775] the variability in the judge and jury regression models is the same. This section considers how juries and judges differ not in their mean behavior, but in their variability.

We study variability by analyzing the residuals of Table 5's two full regression models, those reported in the table's first and third numerical columns. Experimental research suggests that the regression models should be less able to explain jury awards than judge awards.n114 This weaker explanatory power should manifest itself in greater departures from the predicted regression values. Residuals measure the difference between predicted values and observed values of a regression model, and should be higher in jury-tried cases. Because we are interested in both larger positive and larger negative residuals, and residuals have a mean equal to zero, we analyze the absolute value of the residuals.

Table 6 presents the results. For Table 5's first model, the residuals in jury-tried cases are substantially and significantly higher than the residuals in judge-tried cases. This is consistent with Figure 1's scatterplot, which shows more jury-tried cases than judge-tried cases are distant from the best-fitting regression line, and which explains more of the variance in judge-tried cases than jury-tried cases.n115 It is also consistent with studies finding greater variability in jury awards.n116 But the significance of the difference in residuals is sensitive to the inclusion of Harris County, Texas, the county with the least complete sample of trials.n117 Excluding that county leaves the mean and median differences in judge-jury residuals far from significant.n118 In Table 5's third model, which uses the punitive-compensatory ratio as the dependent variable, differences between judge and jury residuals are at most marginally significant, even with the inclusion of Harris County. The statistically insignificant, or marginally significant, spread is consistent with Figure 2 and Table 2's analysis of the punitive-compensatory ratio. Jury punitive-compensatory ratios are more spread out than judge ratios but not dramatically so.

Because the hypothesis we explore is the absence of meaningful judge-jury differences, conservative data analysis counsels us to emphasize the model that maximizes the differences. That is, to include [*776]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

Harris County and to use the model with punitive damages (log) as the dependent variable instead of the ratio-based model. In addition to analyzing judge-jury differences using residuals, one can explore how many jury trial punitive damages awards are beyond what judges might have awarded. Jury trials within the expected range of judge awards cannot be viewed as serious impediments to financial planning. If judges gave all punitive awards, defendants would still have to plan on awards in this range.

How many jury punitive awards could be considered, with traditional statistical certainty, to be beyond the range of likely awards in judge-tried cases? To answer this question we calculate how many jury awards fall within the 95% prediction band of the judge awards. Figure 3 explores this topic through the same scatterplot as Figure 1, but with two new lines superimposed on the data. The central line in the figure is the regression line that best fits the data in judge-tried cases. The lines above and below that line, labeled "Upper 95% prediction line" and "Lower 95% prediction line," respectively, are the upper and lower 95% prediction lines for judge-tried cases. These lines provide a way to identify punitive awards by juries or judges that bear an extreme relation to compensatory awards.n119 Scatterplot points above the upper 95% line are extreme in the sense that they represent punitive awards that are above the judge-tried case upper 95% prediction line. Scatterplot points below the lower 95% line are extreme in the sense that they represent punitive awards that are below the judge-tried case lower 95% prediction line.

REV_00262371

[*777]

[SEE FIGURE IN ORIGINAL]

Figure 3. Punitive and compensatory damages by judge or trial status. The scatterplot reproduces the scatterplot in Figure 1. The lines summarize the relation between punitive and compensatory damages in judge trials. The top and bottom lines represent the upper and lower 95 percent prediction bands for the relation between punitive and compensatory awards in judge trials only. The center line represents the best-fitting regression line for judge trials only.

The figure shows seven cases above the upper 95% prediction line. Six of those cases are jury trials and one is a judge trial.n120 The figure also shows that seven awards are extremely low in that they fall below the lower 95% prediction line. Five of these are jury trials and two are judge trials. We combine the high and low outlying groups to consider whether jury trials are more likely than judge trials to produce extremely high or low awards. Three of 53 judge awards are either high or low compared to 11 of 118 jury awards. This difference is not statistically significant.n121 We cannot reject the hypothesis that jury-tried cases are no more likely than judge-tried cases to lead to an extreme award, as measured by the mass of judge-tried cases.

But even these differences in award patterns overstate the difference between judge and jury awards that one should expect to survive appeal. All but one of the cases that fall above the upper 95% prediction line have punitive awards that exceed ten times the compensatory award. Most such awards are known to have been justifiable or reduced.n122 [*778] A study that successfully explains appellate outcomes in punitive award cases shows that such awards are unlikely to survive appellate review.n123 After the appellate process, we would expect not more than about one or two awards above the upper 95% prediction line to survive.

So in one year of data covering a substantial fraction of the nation's litigation, in the model that most emphasizes judge-jury difference, we find trivially few cases with punitive-compensatory ratios greater than ten, and some of these are not extreme given their facts.n124 We expect a small handful of juries' punitive awards to survive appeal that exceed the range of what judges might have awarded. The greater spread in jury awards thus produces few outcomes that are beyond what one expects had all cases been tried to judges. Substantial reform to ameliorate such awards may be a solution in search of a problem. To the extent there is a problem, a cap on punitive damages of ten times the compensatory award would solve it.n125

D. Selection Effect Considerations

Accounting for what we know about case selection suggests even greater similarity in judge-jury decisionmaking. Case routing between judges and juries based on expected compensatory award size almost certainly exists.n126 Juries tend to see high-award cases, and the greater award potential of these cases creates greater potential variance. Thus, greater variability in the jury punitive-compensatory relation is to be expected. The difference in spread may result from differences [*779] in the cases judges and juries decide and not from differences in their treatment of those cases. If litigants select juries for higher stakes cases, our results may overstate judge-jury differences. Judges might appear to behave even more like juries if they were seeing the same cases as juries.n127

REV_00262372

Furthermore, real cases introduce variability that further suggests actual differences between judges and juries may be smaller than observed differences. Some extreme punitive awards may result from defendants' strategic choices. Defendants vigorously contest liability for punitive damages. But defendants often fail to introduce evidence to try to minimize the amount of punitive damages before juries,n128 leaving plaintiffs in control of the damage guidance presented to juries. People understandably tend to "anchor" on numbers presented to them.n129 If plaintiffs present large numbers and defendants present no numbers relating to award level, juries that apply the only numbers presented to them, as in the multibillion dollar punitive award in the Texaco-Pennzoil case,n130 should not necessarily be viewed as rendering highly variable awards.

Conclusion

Evidence from one year of trials suggests that substantial change in punitive award patterns would not result from shifting greater responsibility to judges. Juries and judges award punitive damages at about the same rate, and their punitive awards bear about the same relation to their compensatory awards. Jury punitive awards have a bit more spread than judge awards, but the effect is not robust and leads to few jury punitive awards outside the range of what judges are expected to award.

[*780]

Appendix Table 1: Trial Wins and Punitive Damages Awards by County and Trial Mode

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]
[*781]

Appendix Table 2: Regression Models of Punitive Damages Levels

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL] [*782]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

FOOTNOTES:

n1. See Reid Hastie & W. Kip Viscusi, What Juries Can't Do Well: The Jury's Performance as a Risk Manager, 40 Ariz. L. Rev. 901, 916 (1998); Paul Mogin, Why Judges, Not Juries, Should Set Punitive Damages, 65 U. Chi. L. Rev. 179 (1998); David Schkade et al., Deliberating About Dollars: The Severity Shift, 100 Colum. L. Rev. 1139, 1173 (2000); Cass R. Sunstein et al., Assessing Punitive Damages (with Notes on Cognition and Valuation in Law), 107 Yale L.J. 2071, 2078 (1998).

n2. See Marc Galanter & David Luban, Poetic Justice: Punitive Damages and Legal Pluralism, 42 Am. U. L. Rev. 1393, 1439 (1993); Richard Lempert, Juries, Hindsight, and Punitive Damage Awards: Failures of a Social Science Case for Change, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 867 (1999); cf. Michael L. Rustad, How the Common Good is Served by the Remedy of Punitive Damages, 64 Tenn. L. Rev. 793, 844-45 (1997) (arguing that punitive damages are not random or arbitrary, but predictable).

n3. See Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Trial by Jury or Judge: Transcending Empiricism, 77 Cornell L. Rev. 1124, 1151-56 (1992); Chris Guthrie et al., Inside the Judicial n4. See Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Appeal from Jury or Judge Trial: Defendants' Advantage, 3 Am. L. & Econ. Rev. 125 (2001) [hereinafter Clermont & Eisenberg, Appeals I]; Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Plaintiphobia in the Appellate Courts: Civil Rights Really Do Differ from Negotiable Instruments, 2002 U. Ill. L. Rev. (forthcoming April) [hereinafter Clermont & Eisenberg, Appeals II]; Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3.

REV_00262373

Mind, 86 Cornell L. Rev. 777, 827 (2001) (finding that "judicial decision making ... is influenced by ... cognitive illusions"); Neil Vidmar, The Performance of the American Civil Jury: An Empirical Perspective, 40 Ariz. L. Rev. 849, 868-70, 884-85 (1998); Neil Vidmar & Jeffrey J. Rice, Assessments of Noneconomic Damage Awards in Medical Negligence: A Comparison of Jurors with Legal Professionals, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 883, 896 (1993); Roselle L. Wissler et al., Decisionmaking About General Damages: A Comparison of Jurors, Judges, and Lawyers, 98 Mich. L. Rev. 751, 812 (1999); cf. Richard A. Posner, An Economic Approach to the Law of Evidence, 51 Stan. L. Rev. 1477, 1500-02 (1999) (asserting that there is only slight evidence of differences).

n5. E.g., Thomas A. Eaton et al., Another Brick in the Wall: An Empirical Look at Georgia Tort Litigation in the 1990s, 34 Ga. L. Rev. 1049, 1094 (2000) (finding that "punitive damages currently are not a significant factor in personal injury litigation in Georgia"); Theodore Eisenberg et al., The Predictability of Punitive Damages, 26 J. Legal Stud. 623, 633-37 (1997) (summarizing studies on the decision to award punitive damages); Neil Vidmar & Mary R. Rose, Punitive Damages by Juries in Florida: In Terrorem and in Reality, 38 Harv. J. on Legis. 487, 487 (2001) (reporting that, in Florida, the "frequency of punitive damages was strikingly low").

n6. E.g., Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 635-37 (summarizing studies of jury trial outcomes in these case categories); Deborah Jones Merritt & Kathryn Ann Barry, Is the Tort System in Crisis? New Empirical Evidence, 60 Ohio St. L.J. 315, 388 (1999) (finding no punitive awards in medical malpractice or products liability cases in a twelve-year period in Franklin County, Ohio); Vidmar & Rose, supra note 5, at 487 (reporting in a Florida study that, "with the exception of asbestos cases, punitive damages were almost never given in products liability cases"); J. Clark Kelso & Kari C. Kelso, An Analysis of Punitive Damages in California Courts, 1991-2000, at 8 tbl.3 (reporting eleven products liability punitive damages awards in ten years of California litigation), available at http://12.2.169.205/government law and policy/publications/ccglp pubs punitive damages report.pdf (last visited Jan. 22, 2002). Kelso and Kelso do not separately report on medical malpractice claims, perhaps because there were too few punitive awards to warrant separate reporting of that case category.

n7. See Rustad, supra note 2, at 809.

n8. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 637-39, 647-52; Theodore Eisenberg & Martin T. Wells, The Predictability of Punitive Damages Awards in Published Opinions, the Impact of BMW v. Gore on Punitive Damages Awards, and Forecasting Which Punitive Awards Will Be Reduced, 7 Sup. Ct. Econ. Rev. 59 (1999) [hereinafter Eisenberg & Wells, Predictability on Appeal]; Theodore Eisenberg & Martin T. Wells, Punitive Awards After BMW, a New Capping System, and the Reported Opinion Bias, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 387, 388-89 [hereinafter Eisenberg & Wells, Reported Opinions]; Jonathan M. Karpoff & John R. Lott, Jr., On the Determinants and Importance of Punitive Damage Awards, 42 J.L. & Econ. 527, 543 (1999); Erik K. Moller et al., Punitive Damages in Financial Injury Jury Verdicts, 28 J. Legal Stud. 283, 300 n.52 (1999); Vidmar & Rose, supra note 5, at 501 tbl.3 (finding that twelve years of Florida jury punitive awards had a median punitive-compensatory ratio of 0.7 to 1). Even Alabama's much-maligned system of punitive damages awards is less extreme than is widely believed. See Moller et al., supra, at 333-34 (finding that Alabama juries in financial injury cases award punitive damages in amounts smaller than and at rates similar to other states in study, but that punitive awards constitute a high proportion of amounts awarded and are a high multiple of compensatory damages).

REV_00262374

Schkade et al., supra note 1, at 1142 n.12, report an unpublished study "finding that compensatory and punitive damage awards are random in sexual harassment cases." The Columbia Law Review kindly furnished us with the manuscript on which this claim is based, and which provides citations to the cases involved in the study. Cass R. Sunstein & Judy M. Shih, Damage Awards in Sexual Harassment Cases (June 23, 1998) (unpublished manuscript, on file with authors). The randomness claim appears to depend on the extreme influence of a handful of observations. The mass of cases in the study show a statistically significant relation between punitive (log) and compensatory (log) awards. In addition, the study used published opinions, which tend to overstate punitive award levels and the ratio of punitive awards to compensatory awards, see Eisenberg & Wells, Reported Opinions, supra, at 413.

n9. See Schkade et al., supra note 1, at 1167-73; Sunstein et al., supra note 1, at 2142-45.

n10. W. Kip Viscusi, Why There Is No Defense of Punitive Damages, 87 Geo. L.J. 381, 395 (1998).

n11. See, e.g., Daniel Kahneman et al., Shared Outrage and Erratic Awards: The Psychology of Punitive Damages, 16 J. Risk & Uncertainty 49 (1998); Mogin, supra note 1; A. Mitchell Polinsky & Steven Shavell, Punitive Damages: An Economic Analysis, 111 Harv. L. Rev. 869 (1998); Schkade et al., supra note 1; Sunstein et al., supra note 1.

n12. For a summary of the data and methodology, see Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Bulletin No. NCJ-173426, Civil Trial Cases and Verdicts in Large Counties, 1996, at 1 (Sept. 1999) [hereinafter BJS 1996]. For a more complete description of the data from the related 1992 study, see Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Special Report No. NCJ-153177, Tort Cases in Large Counties 1, 6 (Apr. 1995). The BJS used a two-stage stratified sampling technique described in the 1992 special report. See id.

n13. See BJS 1996, supra note 12, app. B, at 20 (showing sampled counties' 1996 populations); Theodore Eisenberg et al., Litigation Outcomes in State and Federal Courts: A Statistical Portrait, 19 Seattle U. L. Rev. 433, 434 (1996).

REV_00262375

n14. See Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, 1992 (Inter-Univ. Consortium for Political and Soc. Research No. 6587, 3d ed. 2001).

n15. See BJS 1996, supra note 12, at 17. For sampling purposes, the seventy-five counties were divided into four strata. See id. The 1996 data are from Bureau of Justice Statistics, U.S. Dep't of Justice, Civil Justice Survey of State Courts, 1996 (Inter-Univ. Consortium for Political and Soc. Research No. 2993, 2d ed. 2001) [hereinafter 1996 Survey], available at http://www.icpsr.umich.edu.

n16. See BJS 1996, supra note 12.

n17. See Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 641 n.53; Merritt & Barry, supra note 6, at 324-26 (finding serious bias in commercial verdict reporter samples); Moller et al., supra note 8, app. at 335 (reporting reasonable levels of confidence in the jury verdict reporters used but acknowledging some possible bias).

n18. For a description of the sampling used, see BJS 1996, supra note 12, at 17-18. The statements in text are based on the authors' analysis of the data.

n19. In Harris County, sampling may have led to an extraordinary proportion of judge-tried punitive damages cases. See BJS 1996, supra note 12, app. E, at 23 (reporting sixty-seven bench trials with punitive awards, which exceeds the sum of bench trial punitive awards in all other counties in the sample). The sixty-seven trials reported reflect the county-level sampling. Twelve actual punitive awards were found in Harris County.

n20. Unless otherwise noted, simple descriptive tables use unweighted data. In regression analyses, unless otherwise noted, data are weighted to reflect the sampling in nine counties, and standard errors and significance levels are adjusted to reflect the stratified nature of the sample and the clustering of data at the county level. Our regression analyses account for the weighted sampling design in the data collection as well as the county-level clustering and stratification based on sampling patterns.

n21. See Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1177 app. B; Theodore Eisenberg & Kevin M. Clermont, Trial by Jury or Judge: Which Is Speedier?, 79 Judicature 176, 180 (1996).

n22. See Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1141 tbl.4; Eisenberg et al., supra note 13, at 443 tbl.4. Panel C's last two columns show that only three percent of medical malpractice trials were before judges.

REV_00262376

n23. This finding is consistent with federal court data in products liability and medical malpractice cases, Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, app. A, at 1175, but is more broad based in these state court cases. Panel C shows that in nearly all tort categories - including motor vehicle tort, premises liability, intentional tort, medical malpractice, professional malpractice, slander/libel, other negligence, and fraud - plaintiffs prevailed at a higher rate in judge trials than in jury trials. Either judges are more sympathetic to plaintiffs than juries or plaintiffs route their weaker cases to juries, probably based on the belief that juries will be biased toward harmed plaintiffs. When that belief turns out to be a misperception, the observed pattern of win rates results. Id. at 1174.

n24. BJS 1996, supra note 12, at 3 n.3.

n25. By statistical convention, the hypothesis being tested is called the null hypothesis. George W. Snedecor & William G. Cochran, Statistical Methods 64 (8th ed. 1989). Significance levels (also called p-values) are the probability of rejecting the null hypothesis when it is true. That is, the significance levels provide an inverse measure of the likelihood that the difference in punitive damages award rates shows a real difference rather than mere random variation. The smaller the significance level, the more surprised one would be to observe the difference if the tested hypothesis were true. See id. at 64-66. By arbitrary convention, results that are significant at or below the 0.05 level are described as statistically significant. See The Evolving Role of Statistical Assessments as Evidence in the Courts app. A, at 196-97 (Stephen E. Fienberg ed., 1988). Throughout this Article, we use the term significant in the statistical sense of significance level. For "individual only vs. individual only," the judge-jury punitive award rate difference is significant at the 0.126 level. For "individual only vs. corporation," the judge-jury punitive award rate difference is significant at the 0.175 level. The insignificance of these p-values (both being noticeably higher than 0.05) does not depend on the inclusion of Harris County, Texas. See supra note 19.

n26. Vidmar and Rose report similar results for Florida jury trials, except they find that motor vehicle cases involving impaired or reckless drivers constitute the leading source of punitive awards. Vidmar & Rose, supra note 5, at 494, 495 tbl.2. For evidence of the dominance of employment cases as a source of punitive damages in Florida federal court, see id. at 491 n.14.

n27. Combining the two employment categories yields a difference in judge-jury punitive award rates that is significant at the 0.062 level. See supra note 25.

n28. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 640-41; accord Stephen Daniels & Joanne Martin, Civil Juries and the Politics of Reform 69-72 (1995); Erik Moller, Trends in Civil Jury Verdicts Since 1985, at 33 (1996).

REV_00262377

suggest that allowing judges, not juries, to set punitive award levels will improve civil justice.n1 Others regard the juror's role as a strength of the system or question reducing jurors' power without evidence of judges' superiority.n2 Judge-jury differences, however, often are illusory or exaggerated - a fact that might give pause to juries' critics.n3 Misperceptions about juries help explain trial win rates and appellate outcome patterns.n4

[*745] Misperceptions about juries and punitive damages are especially strong. Contrary to popular belief, juries rarely award such damages,n5 and award them especially rarely in products liability and medical malpractice cases.n6 Rather, juries tend to award punitive damages in intentional misconduct cases.n7 When juries do award punitive damages, they do so in ways that relate strongly to compensatory awards.n8

[*746] Substantial evidence about juries' punitive damages performance has led some critics to shift from criticizing the absolute nature of juries' performance to arguing that, however well juries perform, judges will perform better.n9 Evaluating the propriety of reduced jury authority requires knowledge of judges' performance in punitive damages cases. Unstudied axioms relevant to a shift toward judges are that judges and juries systematically differ in (1) their inclinations to award punitive damages and (2) the levels of awards.

This Article explores these axioms with actual case data. Data covering one year of judge and jury trial outcomes from forty-five large trial courts, comprising nearly nine thousand trials, yield no evidence that judges and juries differ significantly in their rates of awarding punitive damages, or in the relation between the size of punitive and compensatory awards. Our primary results are descriptive and our primary claim is a negative one - the absence of evidence that judges and juries behave substantially differently. While it is tempting to make the positive assertion that judges and juries behave similarly, they do not see the same streams of cases and we cannot be sure how they would behave if they did. Nevertheless, the absence of a significant difference in the cases is noteworthy. Conventional wisdom about judges and juries - especially the claim that juries systematically impose punitive damages "in a random and capricious manner"n10 - would find more support if substantial differences emerged.

The issues addressed here transcend the usual debate about optimizing rules of civil adjudication. In academia, criticizing punitive damages has become the civil justice cause of recent years.n11 Outside academia, punitive damages reform is one of the main battlegrounds in the larger tort reform struggles.

Part I of this Article describes the data and reports descriptive statistics about punitive damages award frequencies and levels. Part II describes a model of the decision to award punitive damages and reports empirical results of tests of the model - tests that find no meaningful judge-jury differences. This Part also discusses the implications of case routing and case selection for interpreting the empirical results. Part III addresses the relation between punitive and compensatory damages awards and again finds no substantial difference between judge and jury adjudication.

[*747]

I

Background and Descriptive Data

The Civil Trial Court Network (CTCN), a project of the National Center for State Courts and the U.S. Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS), obtains data directly from state court clerks' offices. It covers state courts of general jurisdiction in a random sample consisting of forty-five of the seventy-five most populous counties in the United States.n12 The seventy-five n29. BJS 1996, supra note 12, app. E, at 23; infra Appendix Table 1.

REV_00262360

n30. The common method for testing such a hypothesis is to calculate the significance level of the common odds ratio. See Douglas G. Altman, Practical Statistics for Medical Research 270-71 (1991). The test for a common odds ratio across counties gives an exact p-value of p=0.331. For each county, we construct a table with two rows and two columns. The rows consist of judge and jury trials. The columns represent cases in which no punitive award was given and cases in which a punitive award was given. This yields forty-five 2 X 2 tables, one for each county, the entries of which can be computed from the Appendix Tables. One can think of each county's 2 X 2 table as exploring the difference between judge and jury punitive award rates within the county, a question we explore for all counties combined in the regression models that follow. We test whether the odds ratio for these forty-five 2 X 2 tables is equal across the forty-five counties. Rather than using the Mantel-Haenszel procedure, see id., we apply a test based on the conditional maximum likelihood estimate of the common odds ratio. A problem in directly applying the test is that many of the 2 X 2 tables are sparse (i.e., have cell counts of zero or one) and the asymptotic p-values may not be reliable. However, we use the results of Robert L. Strawderman & Martin T. Wells, Approximately Exact Inference for the Common Odds Ratio in Several 2 X 2 Tables, 93 J. Am. Stat. Ass'n 1294 (1998), to compute the exact p-value, thereby eliminating the sparseness problem.

n31. The figures reported in Table 1 yield slightly different results due to rounding. For judges, (2,295 trials) X (0.618 proportion won by plaintiffs) X (0.039 proportion plaintiff wins with punitive award) = 55.3. For juries, (6,429 trials) X (0.473 proportion won by plaintiffs) X (0.040 proportion plaintiff wins with punitive award) = 121.6.

n32. The 31.3% judge-trial share may understate the prominence of judge-awarded punitive damages. Accounting for the sampling methods used, the proportion of punitive awards that are made by judges is 44%, and judges award punitive damages in about 5.5% of successful trials compared to 4.4% for juries. But excluding Harris County, Texas, see supra note 19, gives judge trials a 25.7% share of all punitive damages awards, with judges giving punitive awards in 3.2% of plaintiff wins and juries giving punitive awards in 4.0% of plaintiff wins.

n33. Eaton et al., supra note 5, at 1094 (finding that judges awarded punitive damages more frequently than juries).

n34. For discussion of the need for logarithmic scales in other sets of punitive damages awards, see, for example, Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 638 figs.2-3, app. at 661 figs.A1-A2.

n35. Simple regression models of punitive damages (log) as the dependent variable and compensatory damages (log) as the explanatory variable, when run separately for judge and jury trials, yield the following results (the intercepts are not statistically significant in either equation):

REV_00262378

[tdi2m,m'Judge trials',ql [tcgp1,m'(log) coefficient',qc [tcgp1,m'Standard',qc [tcgp1,m'Intercept',qc [tcgp1,m'R-squared',qc [tcgp1,m'000',qc] [tu3;6] Compensatory (log) coefficient Standard error Intercept r-squared N [tu3;6] Judge trials.883.099-.155.67454 Jury trials.930.130-.395.459119 These models account for the sample stratification, weighting, and clustering by county. Models that combine the trial modes and use more explanatory variables are described in Table 3 infra. The greater dispersion around the regression line in jury trials, as evidenced by Figure 1 and the lower r-squared for jury trials, is discussed in Part III.C infra.

n36. E.g., Eisenberg, et al., supra note 5, at 638 fig.3; Moller et al., supra note 8, at 300 n.52.

n37. A test of the hypothesis that jury trial punitive awards (log) are normally distributed with the observed sample mean and standard deviation yields p=0.418. The same test of judge trial punitive awards (log) yields p=0.140. Thus, for both judges and juries, one cannot reject the hypothesis that punitive awards are log-normally distributed. In cases that yield positive punitive awards, a test of the hypothesis that jury trial compensatory awards (log) are normally distributed with the observed sample mean and standard deviation yields p=0.986. The same test of judge trial compensatory awards (log) yields p=0.093. See Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 638 figs.2-3 (indicating that the logarithm of punitive damages awards is close to being normally distributed, and showing the relationship between compensatory and punitive damages). In addition, one can firmly reject the hypotheses that the untransformed punitive and compensatory awards are normally distributed. A scatterplot of punitive awards in judge trials against compensatory awards without the log transformation is uninformative, as is a plot of untransformed punitive awards against the log of compensatory awards.

Implicitly we are assuming that the punitive damages are distributed as a log-normal distribution. A random variable has a log-normal distribution if its natural logarithm has a normal distribution. The log-normal distribution is common in financial modeling. For instance, the celebrated Black-Scholes pricing formula assumes that the evolution of the price stochastic process follows a geometric Brownian motion. Hence the individual prices are log-normally distributed. See Fischer Black & Myron Scholes, The Pricing of Options and Corporate Liabilities, 81 J. Pol. Econ. 637, 644 (1973).

n38. See Brief of Certain Leading Business Corporations as Amici Curiae in Support of Petitioner at 11 n.14, Cooper Indus., Inc. v. Leatherman Tool Group, Inc., 532 U.S. 424 (2001) (No. 99-2035); Schkade et al., supra note 1, at 1146 n.31; Sunstein et al., supra note 1, at 2076 n.21; Viscusi, supra note 10, at 386.

n39. The significance level is p=0.508.

n40. The significance level is p=0.924. A significance test of the entire untransformed ratio distributions yields p=0.425. The untransformed median ratio allows for comparison with

REV_00262379

Moller et al., supra note 8. In a study of financial injury cases, the Moller study reports a median punitive-compensatory ratio in jury trials of 1.4. Id. at 303 tbl.5. The 1991-92 CTCN data, limited to jury trials, have an untransformed punitive-compensatory ratio of 0.757. The substantially higher median in the Moller study may be a consequence of sample bias in jury verdict reporters. See supra notes 17-18 and accompanying text. The Moller study also shows some stability in the untransformed punitive-compensatory ratio. Its median does not vary in a statistically significant manner across jurisdictions in insurance cases or real property cases, or across plaintiff types in insurance cases. Id. at 310 tbl.9, 313 tbl.11, 318 tbl.16. The median punitive-compensatory ratio is significantly different across jurisdictions in employment cases, id. at 315 tbl.13, and across party types in a residual category of contract cases; id. at 324 tbl.21. It is marginally significantly different across jurisdictions in a residual category of contract cases. Id. at 322 tbl.19.

The absence of statistically significant effects is probably not a consequence of sample size. Perfectly executed studies may fail to reveal socially important differences "simply because the sample sizes are too small to give the procedure enough power to detect the effect." Stanton A. Glantz, Primer of Biostatistics 178 (4th ed. 1997). The power of a test refers to its likelihood of detecting an effect of a specified size at a specified significance level. Id. at 177-78. If a test is not very powerful, the likelihood of detecting the effect is small. A power calculation shows that to be 80% confident of detecting a 10% difference in the ratios' means, at a significance level of 0.05, requires 104 jury trials and 48 judge trials. The sample size exceeds these numbers. This power calculation employs the standard deviations observed in Table 2 and hypothesizes means that are 0.9 and 1.0. The sample is also large enough to detect a statistically significant difference in means of about 0.07 with 70% confidence.

n41. Three cases (one judge-tried and two jury-tried) involved zero compensatory awards so the punitive-compensatory ratio is not amenable to numerical analysis. See infra note 104.

n42. Margaret Zack, Man Awarded $ 2.6 Million for Coach's Abuse, but Probably Won't Receive Much, Star Trib. (Minneapolis-St. Paul), May 15, 1996, at B1.

n43. Draeger Martinez, Gamel, Firm Ordered to Pay "Lemon" Damages, Fresno Bee, Oct. 22, 1996, at B1.

n44. Verdict Reduced, Nat'l L.J., Apr. 8, 1996, at A11 (punitive award reduced from $ 138 million to $ 64.8 million, against three gas company defendants in an explosion case involving twenty plaintiffs).

n45. E-mail from Neil LaFountain to Theodore Eisenberg (Aug. 2, 2001, 09:27:34 EST) (on file with Theodore Eisenberg).

n46. Figure 2 employs what are known as kernel density estimates to portray the ratios' distributions. The more traditional way of portraying univariate statistical distributions, the histogram, can be thought of as a kind of kernel density estimator. Kernel density estimates have the advantages of being smooth (they do not require the box-like bins of histograms) and of being independent of bin location, a choice that can profoundly shape the appearance of a histogram. For discussion of kernel density estimation, see B.W. Silverman, Density Estimation for Statistics and Data Analysis 34-94 (1986).

REV_00262380

n47. Moller et al., supra note 8, at 284.

n48. Multivariate regression is a statistical technique that quantifies the influence of each of several factors (independent variables) on the phenomenon being studied (dependent variable). See generally Michael O. Finkelstein & Bruce Levin, Statistics for Lawyers 323-467 (1990) (discussing regression models); David W. Hosmer & Stanley Lemeshow, Applied Logistic Regression 31-90 (2d ed. 2000) (describing and applying logistic regression models). Because the dependent variable is dichotomous (because punitive damages either are or are not awarded), we use logistic regression. See Finkelstein & Levin, supra, at 447-52.

n49. Professor Viscusi's effort to detect interstate differences in accident deterrence based on whether states allow punitive damages was limited by, inter alia, sample size (the number of states). See Theodore Eisenberg, Measuring the Deterrent Effect of Punitive Damages, 87 Geo. L.J. 347, 349 (1998). Viscusi acknowledges this limitation. Viscusi, supra note 10, at 390. However, erroneous characterization of states' punitive damages rules also compromised the effort. Eisenberg, supra, at 348-49; Eisenberg & Wells, Predictability on Appeal, supra note 8, at 73 n.45. Viscusi notes that he relied on published sources. Viscusi, supra note 10, at 391.

n50. See supra note 40.

n51. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 644-47.

n52. See id. at 645 tbl.4.

n53. E.g., Jeffrey S. Parker & Raymond A. Atkins, Did the Corporate Criminal Sentencing Guidelines Matter? Some Preliminary Empirical Observations, 42 J.L. & Econ. 423, 448-49 (1999).

n54. E.g., Valerie P. Hans & William S. Lofquist, Jurors' Judgments of Business Liability in Tort Cases: Implications for the Litigation Explosion Debate, 26 Law & Soc'y Rev. 85 (1992); Robert J. MacCoun, Differential Treatment of Corporate Defendants by Juries: An Examination of the "Deep-Pockets" Hypothesis, 30 Law & Soc'y Rev. 121, 140 (1996). But this difference does not necessarily translate into juror hostility toward corporations. See

REV_00262381

Richard Lempert, Why Do Juries Get a Bum Rap? Reflections on the Work of Valerie Hans, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 453, 455 (1998). Jurors may react especially negatively to misbehavior by insurance companies. See Eisenberg & Wells, Predictability on Appeal, supra note 8, at 67, app. at 85 tbl.1 (showing that the median of punitive-compensatory damages ratios are highest in insurer misbehavior cases); Valerie P. Hans & Nicole Vadino, Whipped by Whiplash? The Challenges of Jury Communication in Lawsuits Involving Connective Tissue Injury, 67 Tenn. L. Rev. 569, 580-82 (2000). But juries generally are skeptical about plaintiffs' claims. See id. at 572-77.

n55. A fixed-effects model does not yield materially different results, but we had to drop several hundred observations due to lack of within-site variation.

n56. See supra note 48.

n57. In multivariate logistic regression, each estimated coefficient provides an estimate of the corresponding variable's effect on the logarithm of the odds of the dependent variable, adjusting for all other variables included in the model. The odds multiplier is obtained by taking the anti-log of the regression coefficient. Hosmer & Lemeshow, supra note 48, at 50; J. Scott Long, Regression Models for Categorical and Limited Dependent Variables 79-82 (1997).

n58. This description of the marginal effect of case category is slightly oversimplified. In the logistic model, the effect of a change in one variable on the dependent variable depends on the values of the other variables. Long, supra note 57, at 82. For a set of "average" values for the other variables, the presence of an intentional tort increases the probability of a punitive damages award by 0.082.

n59. The special sampling characteristics of Harris County, Texas, supra note 19, led us to run Table 3's full model with dummy variables for Harris County judge and jury trials. Each of the dummy variables is positive and significant, indicating that both Harris County judges and juries are more likely to award punitive damages than the reference category, which consists of judge trials in other counties. Harris County judges are significantly more likely to award punitive damages than Harris County juries. In this model, both the interaction term and the jury trial dummy variable become significant, but in opposite directions. The jury trial dummy variable's coefficient is 1.002 and the jury trial dummy compensatory damages interaction term's coefficient is -0.154. This suggests that juries are more likely to award punitive damages at the low end of compensatory awards, up through about $ 670,000, at which point judges become more likely to award punitive damages. In a model that excludes the interaction term, the jury trial dummy variable is positive, but not statistically significant.

n60. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 645 tbl.4. The low rate of punitive awards in cases involving government defendants is consistent with the common rule that punitive damages cannot be awarded against the government. See, e.g., Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. 12-820.04 (West 1992) (no punitive damages against public entity or employee); Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.28(5) n61. Coefficient = -1.182; p = 0.011. The coefficient is -0.905 (corresponding to an odds multiplier of less than 1.0) and the significance level is 0.050 in a model that includes dummy variables for Harris County, Texas judge and jury trials. See supra note 19.

REV_00262382

(West Supp. 2002) (government immune from punitive damages); Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. 662-2 (Michie 1995) (same); Ind. Code Ann. 34-13-3-4 (Michie 1998) (same); Minn. Stat. Ann. 3.736(3) (West 1997) (same); id. 466.04(1)(b) (West 2001) (no punitive damages against municipalities); Mo. Rev. Stat. 537.610(3) (2000) (no punitive damages against state and its public entities); Wis. Stat. Ann. 893.80(3) (West Supp. 2001) (same). The data include some cases in which the government is a defendant, presumably because other parties also are defendants.

n62. Schkade et al., supra note 1, at 1141; cf. Wissler et al., supra note 3, at 815 (concluding that, although high unpredictability exists when examining award patterns of individual jurors, jurors as a group "produce considerably more stable and predictable outcomes").

n63. Schkade et al., supra note 1, at 1152 & tbl.3.

n64. See Michelle Chernikoff Anderson & Robert J. MacCoun, Goal Conflict in Juror Assessments of Compensatory and Punitive Damages, 23 Law & Hum. Behav. 313, 326-28 (1999). But see Reid Hastie et al., Juror Judgments in Civil Cases: Effects of Plaintiff's Requests and Plaintiff's Identity on Punitive Damage Awards, 23 Law & Hum. Behav. 445 (1999) (finding that mock jurors award punitive damages when courts found them unwarranted).

n65. Guthrie et al., supra note 3, at 821; cf. Richard A. Posner, What Do Judges and Justices Maximize? (The Same Thing Everybody Else Does), 3 Sup. Ct. Econ. Rev. 1, 4 (1993) ("By treating judges and Justices as ordinary people, my approach makes them fit subjects for economic analysis; for economists have no theories of genius." (footnote omitted)).

n66. Hastie & Viscusi, supra note 1, at 916; see also Viscusi, supra note 10, at 387-88 (finding that judges "perform better than jurors with respect to hindsight bias").

n67. W. Kip Viscusi, Jurors, Judges, and the Mistreatment of Risk by the Courts, 30 J. Legal Stud. 107, 115 (2001) (comparing Hastie & Viscusi's mock jurors with judges).

n68. Harry Kalven, Jr. & Hans Zeisel, The American Jury 63-64 (Univ. of Chi. Press 1971) (1966).

REV_00262383

n69. Id. at 64. The jury but not the judge found for the plaintiff in 12% of the cases, while the jury but not the judge found for the defendant in 10% of the cases. See also Hans Zeisel, The American Jury, in The American Jury System (Final Report) 65, 69-70 (Annual Chief Justice Earl Warren Conference on Advocacy in the United States ed., 1977) (discussing analysis of judge and jury disagreement); Marc Galanter, The Civil Jury as Regulator of the Litigation Process, 1990 U. Chi. Legal F. 201, 204-05 (reporting more recent polls supporting similar results).

n70. As previous research has concluded:

When compared to other human decisionmakers, the rate of agreement is more impressive than it first appears. This 78% agreement rate is better than the rate of agreement between scientists doing peer review, employment interviewers ranking applicants, and psychiatrists and physicians diagnosing patients, and almost as good as the 79% or 80% rate of agreement between judges making sentencing decisions in an experimental setting.

Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1153; see also Wissler et al, supra note 3, at 814 tbl.5 (comparing reliability of various decisionmakers).

n71. See supra note 68 and accompanying text.

n72. See supra notes 66-67 and accompanying text.

n73. See Viscusi, supra note 67, at 113 tbl.4, 114 (comparing judges' and juries' results).

n74. "Considerable research indicates that juries are not substantially different from judges." Clermont & Eisenberg, Appeals I, supra note 4, at 145; see also supra note 3 (citing examples of such research). Indeed, "virtually no evidence exists to support the prevailing ingrained intuitions about juries"; instead "the evidence, such as it is, consistently supports a view of the jury as generally unbiased and competent." Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1151-52.

n75. Nevertheless the newer work would represent a useful addition to the study of differences between judges and juries. Comments about why their findings differ from findings of adjudicator similarity may be helpful. First, the experiments may elicit greater punitive damages rates from jurors because the experimenters offer jurors only punitive damages as a remedy. E.g., Hastie & Viscusi, supra note 1, at 905. A punitive award is the only way for the jurors to express disapproval of behavior. Judges would more likely understand that the existence of a compensatory award already expresses disapproval of the behavior.

REV_00262384

Second, the experimental scenarios yielding massive judge-jury differences in willingness to award punitive damages do not represent real-world punitive damages cases. In cases before both judges and juries, over 50% of punitive awards are in cases involving fraud, intentional tort, or employment matters. Products liability cases, which seem to be most analogous to the airplane scenario, constitute a trivially small fraction of punitive awards. See supra Table 1 and note 6. Railroad crossing cases are not numerous enough to be accounted for in the CTCN data. See supra Table 1.

Third, the sample of judges used in the experiments is not representative. The judges were attendees at a law and economics program. Viscusi, supra note 67, at 109. Such a group of judges seems more likely to respond based on economic efficiency than a random sample of judges, especially to questions whose "right" answers depend on the ability and willingness to engage in cost-benefit analysis. See Guthrie et al., supra note 3, at 818 n.201 (noting problems with the sample in the Hastie and Viscusi studies).

n76. See James S. Kakalik et al., Costs and Compensation Paid in Aviation Accident Litigation 27 (1988) ("Punitive damages were not paid on any of the 2,198 closed [aviation accident] cases in our study; in two cases, they were awarded in trial but reversed on appeal.").

n77. E.g., Kevin M. Clermont & Theodore Eisenberg, Do Case Outcomes Really Reveal Anything About the Legal System? Win Rates and Removal Jurisdiction, 83 Cornell L. Rev. 581, 588-91 (1998).

n78. Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1162-65. Conditional on plaintiff winning at trial, separate logistic regressions of the mode of trial (jury or judge) for each case category yield positive coefficients on the compensatory award (log) level. The other explanatory variables used are dummy variables for the litigant characteristics.

n79. Kelso & Kelso, supra note 6, at 21; Eric Helland & Alexander Tabarrok, Runaway Judges? Selection Effects and the Jury, 16 J.L. Econ. & Org. 306, 323-24 (2000).

n80. Cf. Helland & Tabarrok, supra note 79, at 325-27 & tbl.4, app. A, at 330 (finding differences in samples of cases routed to judges and juries).

n81. Separate logistic regression of judge-tried cases and jury-tried cases confirm this finding. The coefficient for compensatory damages (log) is noticeably higher in the judge-tried cases' regression.

REV_00262385

n82. See supra note 23. This effect, applied symmetrically to plaintiffs and defendants, should lead to all trials being jury trials because the party with the weaker case should opt for the adjudicator perceived to be less reliable. Yet we observe many judge trials, perhaps because parties differ in their evaluation of the merits of the same case.

n83. Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1127-28.

n84. See Helland & Tabarrok, supra note 79, at 306-08.

n85. See Thomas Koenig, The Shadow Effect of Punitive Damages on Settlements, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 169, 171-72 (noting that debate has shifted to this "shadow effect," and finding that fear of runaway damages is exaggerated); Herbert M. Kritzer & Frances Kahn Zemans, The Shadow of Punitives: An Unsuccessful Effort to Bring It into View, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 157, 157-59.

n86. See, e.g., David Segal, Tag-Team Lawyers Make Businesses Blink, Wash. Post, Nov. 12, 1999, at A1. Studies funded by industry or tort reform groups, which find evidence that punitive damages are often requested, conclude that the frequency of such requests poses a serious problem. See Kelso & Kelso, supra note 6, at 5 n.3; John H. Sullivan, New State Data Confirms [sic] Runaway Abuse of Punitive Damages (surveying incidence of punitive damage demands in various jurisdictions), http://www.cjac.org/research/punitivedamages.pdf (last visited Jan. 22, 2002). A study that followed up on the tallying of claims for punitive damages by studying whether awards were in fact obtained suggests the need for caution in interpreting the effect of punitive damages claim rates. The study found that 3,763 of 25,561 (14.7%) tort cases filed in Georgia state courts from 1994 to 1997 involved claims for punitive damages. These 3,763 cases yielded 15 punitive damages awards, with judges disproportionately making the awards, not juries. Eaton et al., supra note 5, at 1060, 1094. Sullivan, for example, reports high rates of claims for punitive damages but does not report the resulting yield in actual punitive awards. See Sullivan, supra.

n87. See Kalven & Zeisel, supra note 68, at 63-64.

n88. If defendants are rational economic actors, knowledge of the sober pattern of punitive awards should lead them to be less averse to pressing potentially damaging cases to trial. Punitive awards are rare; "bet-the-company" cases are also rare. The settlement selection effect could affect some potentially large cases, but might not be expected to influence the pattern observed in the mass of cases. Furthermore, plaintiffs may play on defendants' fears of juries to increase their settlement demands to the point where defendants must strongly consider taking a chance on trial.

n89. Karpoff & Lott, supra note 8, at 534-35.

REV_00262386

n90. See id. at 537.

n91. Id. at 562. But serious doubts exist about the representativeness of the Karpoff-Lott sample, and further study of this issue is warranted. Their data show 94 settlements and 1,595 plaintiff verdicts. Id. at 538 tbl.2. This settlement-verdict ratio suggests that the vast majority of plaintiff recoveries are via verdicts rather than settlements, which seems to contradict virtually every other study of civil litigation. In addition, their finding that 310 of 352 products liability verdicts were for plaintiffs, see id., contradicts all other studies of products liability litigation, as does their report that, across all lawsuit types, plaintiff verdicts were 85% of all verdicts. See id. Either suits seeking punitive damages against publicly traded corporations are shockingly different from other lawsuits or some further explanation of their data is needed.

n92. For a model of the effect of caps on awards on settlement rates, see Linda Babcock & Greg Pogarsky, Damage Caps and Settlement: A Behavioral Approach, 28 J. Legal Stud. 341, 368 (1999). The authors report experimental evidence that a cap on damages has a positive and marginally significant effect on settlement rates. Id. The caps they assess differ from punitive damages caps because punitive damages caps do not cap the total award. The compensatory award is still unlimited in most states in most classes of cases. The risk averseness of defendants who settle rather than take a chance before a jury without a cap on punitive awards suggests that imposing a punitive cap could promote trial rather than settlement of cases with large potential punitive awards. One study reports experimental evidence that capping punitive damages awards causes jurors to inflate compensatory awards and summarizes other studies on the subject. Edith Greene et al., The Effects of Limiting Punitive Damage Awards, 25 Law & Hum. Behav. 217 (2001).

n93. E.g., Conn. Gen. Stat. Ann. 52-240b (West 1991) (capping punitive damages at twice compensatory damages in products liability cases); Fla. Stat. Ann. 768.73(1) (West Supp. 2001) (generally capping punitive damages at three times compensatory damages); Ga. Code Ann. 51-12-5.1(g) (2000) (capping punitive damages at $ 250,000 in some tort actions); Ind. Code Ann. 34-51-3-4 (Michie 1998) (capping punitive damages at the greater of three times the amount of compensatory damages or $ 50,000); N.J. Stat. Ann. 2A:15-5.14 (West 2000) (capping punitive damages at five times the amount of compensatory damages or $ 350,000, whichever is greater); Tex. Civ. Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. 41.008 (Vernon 1997) (capping punitive damages at two times the amount of economic damages plus the greater of either $ 200,000 or an amount equal to any noneconomic damages found by the jury, not to exceed $ 750,000); Va. Code Ann. 8.01-38.1 (Michie 2000) (capping punitive damages at $ 350,000).

Illinois capped punitive damages at three times compensatory for other than "healing art or legal malpractice cases." 735 Ill. Comp. Stat. Ann. 5/2-1115.05(a) (West Supp. 2001). But the provision, which was effective March 9, 1995, was invalidated when the entire act of which it was a part was struck down on state constitutional grounds in Best v. Taylor Machine Works, 689 N.E.2d 1057 (Ill. 1997). Ohio capped punitive damages as of January 27, 1997, but the provision was struck down by the Ohio Supreme Court. State ex rel. Ohio Acad. of Trial Lawyers v. Sheward, 715 N.E.2d 1062, 1090-91 (Ohio 1999).

REV_00262387

counties include approximately 33% of the 1990 U.S. population and the forty-five counties actually sampled account for about 20% of the population.n13 The first CTCN trial data were limited to jury trials and covered fiscal year 1991-92.n14 New data, using the same stratified sampling methodology, cover judge and jury trials in calendar year 1996.n15 The 1996 data's inclusion of judge trials allows study of differences between judge and jury trial characteristics. The data about each case include the subject matter, locale, prevailing party, type of litigants, and compensatory and punitive damage award levels.n16

The CTCN data are the most representative sample of state court trials in the United States. With direct access to court clerks' offices and approximately one hundred trained coders recording the data, the information gathered does not depend on litigants or third parties to report and code cases. Such self-reporting in jury verdict reporters can lead to sample bias that overstates plaintiff win rates and award levels.n17 In several counties, CTCN case lists obtained from clerks' offices were compared with local jury verdict reporters. The [*748] jury verdict reporters sometimes failed to include approximately half the cases the CTCN found.

The CTCN data include all completed trials in thirty-six counties and a random sample of trials in nine counties.n18 In eight of the sampled counties, well over half the 1996 trials are included in the data. Appendix Table 1 lists summary statistics by county. In Harris County, Texas, which includes Houston, 352 judge and jury trials were randomly sampled out of approximately 1,500 trials, with jury trials somewhat more heavily sampled than judge trials. This is the only county in which sampling might distort the actual number of punitive awards in judge and jury trials.n19 The analyses reported here include Harris County, but we report throughout the Article whether inclusion of Harris County materially affects results.n20

A. Trial Outcomes Generally

Table 1 presents summary statistics of the variables in this study. Panel A's two rows show, for both compensatory and punitive damages, the mean and median awards in thousands of dollars and the number of plaintiff awards, all reported separately for jury and judge trials. Panel A's first row shows that the mean compensatory award in jury trials with an award is $ 1.047 million and the mean compensatory award in judge trials with an award is $ 152,000. The medians are also substantially different; the jury trial median is $ 45,000 while the judge trial median is $ 25,000. For both compensatory and punitive awards, panel A confirms the conventional wisdom that jury awards are higher than judge awards. But substantial non-random case routing occurs. Amounts plaintiffs demand in jury-tried cases are significantly higher than those they demand in judge-tried cases.n21 In addition, tort trials tend to be routed to juriesn22 while judges tend to adjudicate contract [*749]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL] [*750] cases. Plaintiffs tend to prevail in judge-tried cases significantly more often than in jury-tried cases. Table 1's "Totals" row shows that plaintiffs have an overall win rate of 62% in judge trials and 47% in jury trials.n23

Panel B reports award frequencies for each litigant pair; panel C does the same for each case category. Every case, regardless of the number of plaintiff or defendant types, is assigned one of four plaintiff and defendant designations: hospital, corporation, government, or individual. For cases involving more than one plaintiff or defendant type, the case is assigned to the type appearing first in the above listing. For example, a case with a hospital defendant is characterized as a hospital defendant case even if the case also included business, individual, and government defendants.n24 The litigant characterization hierarchy tries to capture the most salient characteristic of the litigants, though the hierarchy cannot assure capture of the most salient litigant characteristic in each case. We further refine litigant pair categories to identify cases in which only individuals sued other individuals and cases in which only individuals sued corporations, and we also create some smaller related categories.

REV_00262361

n94. Connecticut, Georgia, Indiana, and Virginia capped punitive damages throughout the period covered by the CTCN sample. See supra note 93. Texas enacted meaningful caps during the period, see supra note 93, so not all Texas sample cases are subject to caps. Texas earlier capped punitive damages at the greater of four times the compensatory award or $ 200,000, but excepted intentional torts and malicious behavior. 1987 Tex. Gen. Laws ch. 2, 2.12. This earlier cap affected one Harris County, Texas jury trial in our sample, see Verdict Reduced, supra note 44, but the uncapped amount is used in the data. Florida changed the way it capped during the sample period. We have repeated our analysis excluding Florida cases with no material change in results. New Jersey enacted caps effective for cases filed after October 27, 1995, see supra note 93, too late in the CTCN period to materially affect results. Illinois imposed caps early in 1995 but they were invalidated in 1997, see supra note 93, and defendants might not yet have come to rely on them to a degree sufficient to affect results. We have repeated the analysis treating Illinois as an uncapped state without material effect on the results.

n95. We do find a positive, significant correlation between the existence of caps and punitive awards in judge-tried cases. However, this effect is not robust to the exclusion of Harris County, Texas. See supra note 19. The insignificance of the jury trial effect is not sensitive to inclusion of Harris County. The increasing use of statutory caps on punitive damages awards raises the question whether a variable should account for the existence of caps. Except for an earlier capping statute that later affected a Texas award, see supra notes 44, 94, all of the capping systems in the states studied here either took effect after the decisions were rendered or imposed limits that were not reached in any case subject to them. Thus, the caps did not directly affect punitive award levels even if they might have affected settlement behavior. Knowledge of a cap, however, might affect an adjudicator who knows of its existence even if an award does not exceed the cap. See Greene et al., supra note 92; Hastie et al., supra note 64.

n96. See Albert Yoon, Damage Caps and Civil Litigation: An Empirical Study of Medical Malpractice Litigation in the South, 3 Am. L. & Econ. Rev. 199 (2001) (studying the effect of Alabama's cap on medical malpractice awards).

n97. See Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 650-51.

n98. See id. at 637-40.

n99. This harm-measuring use of compensatory damages in setting a punitive award is distinct from the use of compensatory damages to compensate victims. Id. at 639.

n100. See id. at 639-40.

REV_00262388

n101. See id. at 648 tbl.5.

n102. Id. at 630.

n103. Id.

n104. Table 5 excludes three punitive damages cases in which the compensatory award was zero. For discussion of punitive awards in cases with zero or nominal damages awards, see Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 629-30. For a notable such case, see Tronzo v. Biomet, Inc., 236 F.3d 1342 (Fed. Cir. 2001), a patent infringement case that, after a remand and partial reversal on appeal, resulted in a $ 20 million punitive award and a $ 526 compensatory award.

n105. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 648 tbl.5.

n106. See Merritt & Barry, supra note 6, at 364-65; Frank A. Sloan & Chee Ruey Hsieh, Variability in Medical Malpractice Payments: Is the Compensation Fair?, 24 Law & Soc'y Rev. 997, 1025 (1990); Vidmar, supra note 3, at 868-70.

n107. Other variables, reported in Appendix Table 2, yield results generally similar to those in the 1991-92 data but with some differences worth noting. The coefficient on the dummy variable "individual only vs. corporation" is positive, as was the most analogous variable in the 1991-92 data, and their 95% confidence intervals overlap. Eisenberg et al., supra note 5, at 648 tbl.5. But the effect is statistically significant in the 1991-92 data and is not statistically significant in the 1996 data.

Case category effects initially appear to be stronger in the 1996 data than in the 1991-92 data, as evidenced by significant differences between the reference case category, products liability, and many other case categories. But using products liability as the reference category tends to overstate the importance of case category effects because it has only one punitive award, and that award is relatively high. Using motor vehicle tort, a more middle-of-the-road case category with respect to punitive award levels, shows that only products liability cases, which are higher, and slander/libel cases, which are lower, differ at the 0.05 level from motor vehicle cases. A Bonferroni correction to the test of the hypothesis that all case category coefficients are jointly zero yields p=0.175. See Jason C. Hsu, Multiple Comparisons: Theory and Methods 175-80 (1996) (discussing abuses in multiple comparisons). Case category remains a weak force in explaining the level of punitive awards.

n108. See infra Appendix Table 2.

REV_00262389

n109. See supra Table 2.

n110. p=0.726.

n111. p=0.918.

n112. See supra notes 21-23, 51-52 and accompanying text.

n113. See supra note 19 and accompanying text. We accounted for selectivity by using two Heckman models in which the decision to award punitive damages is estimated jointly with the level of damages for those cases in which punitive damages are awarded. In both models the selection equation included the jury trial dummy variable, the compensatory award, the litigant pair dummy variables, and the case category dummy variables. In both models we accounted for county-level clustering and for the sampling pattern used. In one model, the punitive award level equation used the jury trial dummy variable, the interaction term, the compensatory award, and the litigant pair dummy variables. In the second model, the punitive award level equation included the case category dummy variables instead of the litigant pair dummy variables.

n114. See Wissler et al., supra note 3, at 783-87.

n115. See supra note 35.

n116. Wissler et al., supra note 3, at 783-87. For debate and evidence about whether the group deliberating process of juries will increase or decrease awards, and increase or decrease their variability, see Shari Seidman Diamond et al., Juror Judgments About Liability and Damages: Sources of Variability and Ways to Increase Consistency, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 301 (1998); Guthrie et al., supra note 3, at 827; Stephan Landsman et al., Be Careful What You Wish For: The Paradoxical Effects of Bifurcating Claims for Punitive Damages, 1998 Wis. L. Rev. 297, 322-23; Schkade et al., supra note 1; and Wissler et al., supra note 3, at 801-04.

n117. See supra note 19 and accompanying text.

n118. p=0.567 (mean) and p=0.355 (median).

REV_00262390

n119. See Eisenberg & Wells, Predictability on Appeal, supra note 8, at 61, 81.

n120. Note that three of the high punitive awards occupy the extremely low end of the compensatory award range. One does not expect a strong correlation between punitive and compensatory awards in that range. Supra note 104.

n121. p=0.553.

n122. Supra notes 42-45 and accompanying text.

n123. Eisenberg & Wells, Predictability on Appeal, supra note 8, at 80-83. More generally, appellate courts are especially likely to reverse jury trial verdicts for plaintiffs. See Clermont & Eisenberg, Appeals I, supra note 4, at 141-44; Clermont & Eisenberg, Appeals II, supra note 4, at 2.

n124. See, e.g., supra note 42 and accompanying text.

n125. Jury critics fail to address another method to reduce variance in punitive awards. Floors as well as caps reduce variability. With respect to low-end punitive-compensatory ratios, a system of minimum punitive damages awards would decrease variability. For example, a system that requires punitive awards to at least equal compensatory awards would reduce the variance in punitive award patterns. Critics' failure to propose floors suggests that reducing variability may be less of a goal than reducing high awards. Imposing a system of floors has a cost, namely, the loss of the ability to show mercy in punishing by imposing a low punitive award. This practice may be expected when the wrongdoer is in a precarious financial condition. The level of corporate criminal fines is significantly and negatively correlated with corporate-defendant bankruptcy. Cindy R. Alexander et al., Regulating Corporate Criminal Sanctions: Federal Guidelines and the Sentencing of Public Firms, 42 J.L. & Econ. 393, 412 tbl.5 (1999). We may have to tolerate a tradeoff between allowing mercy and increased variability. See Stephen P. Garvey, "As the Gentle Rain from Heaven": Mercy in Capital Sentencing, 81 Cornell L. Rev. 989, 991-92 (1996).

n126. See supra Part II.D. Such routing is consistent with the finding that high-stakes cases tend to go to juries. Clermont & Eisenberg, supra note 3, at 1164-65; Helland & Tabarrok, supra note 79, at 323-25.

n127. To the extent caps on punitive awards lead to trial of high-risk cases for defendants (cases that would likely settle in states without caps), we might expect to see a positive correlation between the capping dummy variable and the size of the punitive award. In models that include the capping variable, the variable is insignificant.

REV_00262391

n128. See Andrew L. Frey & Evan M. Tager, Punitive Damages, in 3 Business and Commercial Litigation in Federal Courts 40.2(g) (Robert L. Haig ed., 1998); Joseph Sanders, From Science to Evidence: The Testimony on Causation in the Bendectin Cases, 46 Stan. L. Rev. 1, 55-56 (1993).

n129. E.g., Hastie et al., supra note 64, at 449.

n130. Thomas Petzinger, Jr., Oil & Honor: The Texaco-Pennzoil Wars 403-04 (1987); Theodore Eisenberg, Damage Awards in Perspective: Behind the Headline-Grabbing Awards in Exxon Valdez and Engle, 36 Wake Forest L. Rev. 1129, 1153-54 (2001) (noting possible effect of defense trial strategy on punitive award levels).

Source: Legal > Secondary Legal > Law Reviews & Journals > Law Reviews, Combined ⓘ
Terms: "punitive damages" /10 reform and settlement and threat or induce and posner (Edit Search)
View: Full
Date/Time: Tuesday, October 1, 2002 - 12:04 PM EDT

About LexisNexis | Terms and Conditions

Copyright © 2002 LexisNexis, a division of Reed Elsevier Inc. All rights reserved.

B. Punitive Damages Award Patterns

Given a plaintiff victory at trial, punitive award decisionmaking can be divided into two separate decisions: the decision to award punitive damages, and the decision setting the level of the punitive award.

1. Frequency of Punitive Awards

With respect to punitive damages award frequency, Table 1's two largest litigant pair categories - "individual only vs. individual only" and "individual only vs. corporation" (reported in panel B's first and third rows) - account for over 75% of the trial outcomes. Both categories show a higher rate of punitive damages awards in judge trials than in jury trials. Panel B's fifth and sixth numerical columns show that when individuals sue individuals, punitive damages are awarded in 3.5% of the jury trials won by plaintiffs and in 5.3% of the judge trials won by plaintiffs. However, the difference is not statistically significant.n25 [*751] The single highest rate of punitive damages awards occurs when individuals sue corporations in judge trials; punitive damages awards occur in 6.7% of the successful plaintiff cases in this category. These simple descriptive statistics provide no evidence that juries are more inclined than judges to award punitive damages.

Panel C also shows that punitive damages award rates vary more across case categories than they do across litigant pairs. Intentional tort, fraud, and employment casesn26 are sizeable case categories in which punitive award rates are much higher than the four percent average for all plaintiff trial wins. Fraud and intentional tort cases yield punitive awards at a high rate regardless of whether the adjudicator is judge or jury, and together they account for about one-third of all punitive awards. Employment cases show a noticeably higher rate of punitive awards before juries than before judges.n27

Prior CTCN data and other data confirm geographical variation in award frequencies.n28 The new CTCN data replicate this finding with substantial intercounty differences in punitive award rates.n29 These differences exist whether one considers only judge-tried cases or only jury-tried cases. But we are interested in the relation between the frequency of punitive awards and the mode of trial - judge or jury. Even if judges and juries award punitive damages at different rates, one still wants to know whether that difference varies across the forty- [*752] five different counties observed in the study. Statistical analysis reveals that one cannot reject the hypothesis of no county-level effect on the relation between frequency of punitive damages awards and mode of trial.n30

The numbers in Table 1 allow us to calculate the percent of punitive award cases decided by judges. Judges gave 55 of the 176 (31.3%) punitive damages awards.n31 Given the overwhelming focus on jury punitive awards in the literature and policy debate, this share is surprisingly high.n32 A detailed study of Georgia tort cases confirms the surprisingly high fraction of punitive awards made by judges.n33

2. The Relation Between Punitive and Compensatory Awards

With respect to punitive award levels, Figure 1 shows the relation between punitive and compensatory awards in cases with punitive awards. Figure 1 is a scatterplot of punitive damages (log) and compensatory damages (log), with judge (bench) and jury trials separately indicated by "B" and "J," respectively. The logarithmic scales are used because, as is often the case with award amounts, linear scales do not [*753] reveal the relation between the variables.n34 Figure 1 also shows the best-fitting simple linear regression lines for judge and jury trials.n35 The lines, which best describe the relation between compensatory and punitive awards, are similar in slope and intercept. We defer detailed statistical analysis of judge-jury differences to Parts II and III. The punitive-compensatory patterns in Figure 1 are similar to those in earlier studies,n36 and the pattern in judge-tried cases is consistent with the pattern in jury-tried cases.

REV_00262362

Figure 1. Punitive and compensatory damages by judge or jury trial status. The figure displays both a scatterplot and the best fitting regression lines.

[SEE FIGURE IN ORIGINAL]

Figure 1 shows that the simple log transformation that describes the relation between punitive and compensatory jury awards also describes judge awards. Both compensatory and punitive awards are approximately log-normally distributed for judges and juries.n37 This result addresses a concern about jury punitive awards - that a logarithmic [*754] scale is needed to reveal the relation between punitive and compensatory awards, and that the scale understates variation in punitive awards.n38 The same logarithmic transformation illuminates the relation between punitive and compensatory awards in judge trials.

3. The Punitive-Compensatory Ratio

Figure 1 shows no judge-jury difference in the relation between punitive and compensatory awards. To summarize that relation in a single number to facilitate further comparison, we use punitive damages (log) divided by compensatory damages (log) to construct the ratio of the two damages measures.

Table 2 reports statistics summarizing the punitive-compensatory ratio in judge and jury trials. The table's last row shows that the means, medians, and standard deviations do not differ significantly across trial modes. A statistical test of the difference between the entire distributions does not allow us to reject the hypothesis that they are the same.n39 The 95% confidence intervals for the means of the ratios are narrow for both judge and jury trials. For judge trials the interval ranges from 0.882 to 0.981. For jury trials, the interval ranges [*755] from 0.907 to 0.983, slightly narrower than the judge trial range, presumably because of the greater number of jury trials. Surprisingly, the median punitive-compensatory ratio without transforming to logs is higher in judge trials than in jury trials. This ratio also does not significantly differ between judge and jury trials.n40

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL]

The untransformed mean ratio is greater in jury trials. But this statistically insignificant difference is a consequence of a handful of awards, most of which are known to have been reduced or are justifiable. Follow-up study of the most extreme punitive-compensatory ratiosn41 [*756] suggests the distortion introduced by relying on extreme awards without further inquiry. Five of seven cases with punitive-compensatory ratios greater than ten were clearly justifiable or later resulted in a reduced punitive award. One case with an extreme ratio involved sexual abuse of a child by a sports coach and led to a $ 2.6 million punitive damages award that no one expected to actually be paid.n42 Another extreme case involved a $ 300,000 punitive award against a wealthy car dealer who had failed to disclose a vehicle's history of defects and had rolled back a car's odometer by nearly 40,000 miles.n43 The largest award was substantially reduced due to a then-existing cap on punitive damages.n44 One case with an extreme ratio is known to have been reduced but the amount of reduction is not known, and another case's punitive award was reduced by 90% to reflect that the plaintiff was 90% at fault.n45 No information was found on two of the cases.

Figure 2 presents the distributions of the punitive-compensatory ratio for judge trials and for jury trials.n46 Although Table 2 shows that the differences between the distributions are not statistically significant, the jury trial punitive-compensatory ratios are more "spread" than the judge trial punitive-compensatory ratios. Both the left and right tails of the jury trial distribution are larger than those of the judge trial distribution. We address this greater spread in Part III.C.

REV_00262363

Figure 2. Kernel density estimates of the ratio of punitive and compensatory damages in cases containing both kinds of awards, by judge or jury trial status. Jury trials show greater "spread" than judge trials.

[SEE FIGURE IN ORIGINAL]

Together, Table 1's descriptive statistics, Figure 1, and Table 2's and Figure 2's analyses of punitive-compensatory ratios show that judge-jury rates of awards do not differ substantially and that their levels of punitive awards bear a similar relation to levels of compensatory awards. The remainder of this Article employs more comprehensive statistical methods to further probe the absence of evidence of judge-jury differences. [*757]

II

The Decision to Award Punitive Damages

Differences in types of cases routed to judges and juries suggest the need for analysis beyond Table 1's simple comparison of punitive award rates. It may be that cases with punitive damages potential tend to be routed to one decisionmaker. For example, punitive damages tend to be awarded more frequently in financial injury cases,n47 which judges tend to receive more often than juries. Such case routing may mask a judge-jury difference, rendering Table 1's similar rates of awarding punitive damages misleading. A more detailed analysis should help account for routing of cases by subject area and other factors. Multivariate regression works to segregate the effects of various factors, such as case category.n48

[*758] Preliminarily, one must consider whether the sample is large enough to detect meaningful differences between judge and jury punitive award rates, even if they do exist.n49 Specifying what degree of difference is meaningful is a subjective judgment. Suppose one accepts that a meaningful difference is a 3% punitive award rate in plaintiff victories in judge trials compared to a 5% punitive award rate in plaintiff victories in jury trials. Both assumed rates are reasonably close to Table 1's observed rate of punitive awards in about 4% of plaintiff trial wins. Using these rates, there is almost a 90% chance of detecting such a difference, or a larger difference, at a statistically significant level.n50

A. Modeling the Decision to Award Punitive Damages

According to a simple model of the decision to award punitive damages presented in our earlier work, the decision is linked to the nature of the defendant's behavior.n51 The best available proxy for such behavior is the type of case. On average, for example, one expects defendant behavior to have been worse in an intentional tort case than in a case involving mere negligence. Table 1 and prior empirical work confirm this pattern.n52 Therefore, in modeling the decision to award punitive damages, we include dummy variables (variables equal to zero or one) for each case category and expect case categories involving intentional misbehavior to yield the highest punitive award rates, as Table 1 suggests. This also helps control for the routing of cases between judges and juries based on subject areas.

A second behavior-related measure is the level of the compensatory award. Other things being equal, we regard behavior that causes more harm as worse than behavior that causes less harm and as deserving of more severe punishment.n53 We use the compensatory damages awarded in each case to approximate the degree of harm caused.

[*759] Evidence exists that jurors react differently to corporate and individual defendants.n54 Table 1 reports summary statistics for several litigant pairs, including two of particular interest: actions by individuals only versus individuals only, and actions by individuals only versus corporations. We include dummy variables for these and for Table 1's other litigant pairings. We use statistical models that account for the clustering of the sample at the county level.n55

REV_00262364

B. Empirical Results

Because the decision to award punitive damages is dichotomous, we employ logistic regression analysis.n56 The dependent variable is whether the plaintiff received a punitive damages award. The sample consists of over 4,300 trials with plaintiff victories. The explanatory variables include dummy variables for case categories and litigant characteristics, and a continuous variable for the size of the compensatory award (log). The explanatory variables of particular interest are a jury trial dummy variable, which assesses whether juries are more likely than judges to award punitive damages, and an interaction term consisting of the product of the jury trial dummy variable and the compensatory award. The interaction term monitors whether, as compensatory awards increase, juries are more likely than judges to award punitive damages.

Table 3 reports two models. The first includes the above-described explanatory variables. The second limits the explanatory variables to three: the compensatory award, the jury trial dummy variable, and the interaction term.

The first and third numerical columns show a variable's "odds ratio" or "odds multiplier," a way of expressing the size of a variable's influence on whether punitive damages were awarded.n57 For the case [*760]

[SEE TABLE IN ORIGINAL] [*761] category variables and the litigant pair variables, the odds multiplier is the amount by which the odds of a case having a punitive damages award should be multiplied compared to a reference category, holding all other variables constant. For the case categories, Table 3 shows that "products liability" is the reference category. An odds multiplier of 1.0 for a case category (the "other contract" category, for example, has an odds multiplier close to 1.0) indicates that, compared to products liability cases, the case category does not change the odds of receiving a punitive award. An odds multiplier greater than 1.0 indicates case categories with chances of a punitive award that are greater than the chances in products liability cases. An odds multiplier of less than 1.0 indicates case categories with chances of a punitive award that are less than the chances in products liability cases. For example, Table 3 shows that the odds multiplier for motor vehicle tort cases (0.131) is substantially less than 1.0 and thus that, compared to the reference category (products liability), motor vehicle cases are much less likely to end with a punitive award. Similarly, the large odds ratio for intentional tort cases (5.130) indicates that they are unusually likely to have a punitive award.

The odds of a punitive damages award should be distinguished from the probability of a punitive damages award, even though the terms "odds" and "probability" are often used interchangeably in informal conversation. For example, Table 3 shows that the intentional tort case category has an odds multiplier of 5.130. Assume that the odds of a punitive damages award (based on all of the other factors about a case) are 1:1, corresponding to a 50% probability of a punitive award. The odds multiplier of 5.130 means that the classification of the case as one of intentional tort changes the odds of a punitive damages award from 1:1 to 5.130:1, corresponding to a probability of punitive damages award of approximately 84%.n58

The interpretation of the compensatory damages variable, which is continuous, differs from the interpretation of the case category and litigant pair variables, which are dichotomous. For the compensatory damages variable, the odds multiplier represents the effect of a unit increase in the variable. For example, an increase in the compensatory award (log) from 1.0

REV_00262365

to 2.0 would require multiplying the odds of a punitive award by 1.37. The second and fourth columns in Table 3 [*762] show significance levels for each odds multiplier: the probability that the observed result would occur by chance.

In the full model, the jury trial dummy variable's odds multiplier is greater than one, but is not statistically significant. The effect changes direction (from greater than one to less than one) in the simpler of the two models. One cannot reject the hypothesis that juries are no more likely than judges to award punitive damages. The odds multiplier on the interaction term, consisting of the jury trial dummy variable and the compensatory award, is less than one and is statistically significant in one model and of borderline statistical significance in the simpler model. Thus, judges, more than juries, display a tendency to award punitive damages as the stakes increase.n59

Table 3 confirms Table 1's evidence that certain classes of tried cases - intentional tort, fraud, and employment cases - are more likely than other classes of tried cases to lead to punitive awards. The odds multipliers for these variables are all large and statistically significant. These results are similar to findings from the 1991-92 CTCN data.n60

Another noteworthy result in Table 3 is the absence of support for the belief that adjudicators are more likely to award punitive damages against corporate defendants. The odds multiplier for the "individual only vs. corporation" dummy variable is less than 1.0. Compared to the reference category of cases involving "individuals only vs. individuals only," plaintiffs are more likely to obtain punitive awards against individual defendants than against corporate defendants, [*763] though the effect is not statistically significant. Because businesses' concern focuses especially on juries' tendency to award punitive damages, we have run a model similar to the large model in Table 3, but adding an interaction term to explore the differences between judges and juries. That model, not reported here, includes an interaction term equal to the product of the jury trial dummy variable and the individual only vs. corporation dummy variable. The odds multiplier for the interaction term is less than one and is statistically significant.n61 Thus, compared to judges, our models suggest that, conditional on a case being tried, juries are significantly less likely than judges to award punitive damages in cases involving individual plaintiffs and corporate defendants.

C. Interpreting the Results in Light of Other Recent Studies

The absence of significant difference between judge and jury decisions to award punitive damages is consistent with experimental evidence comparing groups of adjudicators. Researchers report finding "a remarkable consensus in the judgments of individual jurors, made on a rating scale, about a series of personal injury cases."n62 They also report strong agreement among sets of juries when judging punishmentn63 and a strong correlation between the egregiousness of behavior and the decision to award punitive damages.n64 These experiments do not involve judges. But judges, like jurors, are people responding to stimuli. If many individual judgments reflect a "remarkable consensus," some of that consensus ought to survive when the individual judgments are those of judges. As Guthrie, Rachlinski, and Wistrich state, "Judges, it seems, are human."n65

Our results are less consistent with judge-jury punitive damages experiments of Hastie and Viscusi. They report that mock jurors were much more likely than judges to impose punitive sanctions in a hypothetical [*764] railroad accident case.n66 Similarly, in experiments involving airplane repair scenarios, Viscusi reports evidence that "judges are much more willing than jurors ... to refrain from imposing punitive damages."n67

Unlike the classic Kalven and Zeisel judge-jury study, these researchers did not study actual judges and juries. Kalven and Zeisel's questionnaires to presiding judges in about 4,000 actual civil jury trials in the 1950's yielded data showing a 78% agreement between judge and jury on liability.n68 In the cases of disagreement, there was a very small tendency of juries to favor plaintiffs.n69 And the rate of agreement, although not 100%, is high compared to other human endeavors.n70

REV_00262366

The vast difference between experimental punitive damages results and real case evidence of absence of disagreement between judges and juries is worth addressing. It is theoretically possible that real-world judges and juries could so substantially agree on liability, as Kalven and Zeisel found,n71 and yet, as the recent experimental evidence might suggest, so massively disagree on the decision to award punitive damages.n72 But experiments searching for substantial disagreement between judges and juries on punitive damages might try to replicate the real world rate of agreement between judges and juries about liability. Otherwise, a risk exists that the experiments' judge-jury difference in awarding punitive damages results from an experimental design that artificially inflates the differences.

[*765] Unlike Kalven and Zeisel's experiments, the recent experiments do not achieve substantial judge-jury agreement on liability. In an airplane accident scenario, judges and mock jurors were asked whether a firm should undertake a repair that was constructed to be economically inefficient. Judges and experimental jurors disagreed massively on this basic liability question, with nearly 90% of the jurors requiring repair of the plane compared to less than 50% of the judges.n73 The vast judge-jury difference on liability in the new studies calls into question the experimental designs' ability to detect socially meaningful punitive damages differences between judges and juries. If the Kalven and Zeisel and other resultsn74 are valid, the new experiments may employ scenarios and assumptions that occur too rarely to be of social significance.n75 The airplane scenarios seem especially questionable as evidence exists that punitive awards are unusually rare in such accidents.n76

[*766]

D. Selection Effect Considerations

A remaining issue is the need to account for the nonrandom routing of cases between judges and juries. Interpreting empirical legal findings requires caution about accepting results at face value where strong selection effects may be at work.n77 Table 1 suggests that juries tend to adjudicate large-stakes cases, as measured by both compensatory and punitive damages. Federal data confirm this,n78 as do studies using jury verdict reporter data.n79 This skewed routing of cases to juries cannot conclusively be proven from our data, which lack the ex ante characteristics of the cases. But given perceptions about jurors' greater inclination to award punitive damages, one expects juries to see a sample of cases biased in favor of strong candidates for punitive awards.n80 Looked at differently, a study in which the higher-stakes cases that are more prone to punitive damages are in fact being routed to judges would be more remarkable than any of our findings.

1. Selection Attributable to Case Routing Between Judge and Jury

The most realistic assumption is that what are perceived as high-stakes cases with punitive damages potential are more likely to be routed to juries than judges. If plaintiffs select juries for cases with high probabilities of punitive awards, Table 3 may overstate the differences between judges' and juries' tendencies to award punitive damages and could be interpreted as precluding rejection of the hypothesis that judges are more likely than juries to award punitive damages. If judges saw the same group of high-punitive-probability cases that we believe juries see, a model similar to that depicted in Table 3 might reveal a greater tendency by judges to award punitive damages. Table 3's interaction term already suggests that judges are more likely than juries to award punitive damages as compensatory awards increase.n81

Another possible routing effect relates to the perceived greater reliability of judges compared to juries. Plaintiffs may regard judges [*767] as more reliable, and thereby opt for trial

REV_00262367

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1,AT 34

*56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1, **

Copyright (c) 1982 Southern California Law Review
University of Southern California

November, 1982

56 S. Cal. L. Rev. 1

LENGTH: 45958 words

SYMPOSIUM: PUNITIVE DAMAGES: ARTICLE: FAIRNESS AND EFFICIENCY IN THE LAW OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

DORSEY D. ELLIS, JR. *

* Professor of Law, University of Iowa; Visiting Professor of Law, Emory University Law School and Law and Economics Center, 1981-82. B.A. 1960, Maryville College (Tenn.); J.D. 1963, University of Chicago. This paper was presented, in slightly different form, at the Liberty Fund, Inc., Seminar on Punitive Damages in Tort Law, administered by the Law and Economics Center of Emory University (February 12-14, 1982). Earlier versions of parts of the paper were presented at Law and Economics Workshops at the University of Miami and Emory University, and at a faculty seminar at the University of Iowa College of Law. The paper benefited immensely from the contributions of participants in those workshops and seminars, as well as from critical readings of earlier drafts by Peter Aranson, William Carney, David Haddock, Richard Kuhns, and Timothy Terrell, and from the research assistance provided by William Collins, Emory Law School class of 1983.

SUMMARY:
... Reparative (or compensatory) damages assessed against wrongdoers in private civil suits complement public enforcement measures. ... Restricting punitive damage assessments to cases in which an injury was purposefully caused, or in which the aggregate expected loss from the conduct was greater than the expected compensatory damage recovery, would limit punitive damages to situations where they are supported by considerations of fairness and efficiency. ... Furthermore, without certain standards for determining the magnitude of an assessment, the defendant's wealth provides the only effective upper limit on punitive damage awards, and there is some probability that any amount up to that limit will be assessed. ... Nor does vicarious punitive damage liability seem appropriate in the second situation -- where expected damages are less than expected loss. ... Vicarious punitive damage liability thus attracts resources, not to cases in which an egregious act was committed, but to those where an injury was caused by an employee or agent, under circumstances making vicarious liability potentially available. ... In summary, vicarious punitive damage liability cannot be justified as deserved punishment. ... Thus, from the fairness standpoint, insurability is inconsistent with the goals of punitive damage liability because it reduces the punishment of the wrongdoer and imposes it on all other policyholders through higher premiums. ...

REV_00262393

recklessness will be unlikely to command anything approaching unanimity [*23] unless reckless conduct is narrowly defined to exclude reasonable disagreement over the relative danger and utility of an act and to limit it to acts committed with subjective awareness of the consequences.

B. EFFICIENCY

When appraising malicious and reckless conduct from the standpoint of efficiency, we confront quite different issues. Efficiency analysis should begin with the assumption that compensatory damages ordinarily will produce efficient results. Under Judge Hand's formula, equilibrium will be achieved when the expected loss (probability of occurrence times cost) equals the cost of loss avoidance. [115] Figure 1 illustrates this point.

In Figure 1, expected loss is plotted on the vertical axis; cost of avoidance on the horizontal. Assume that a person (Malficio) is engaged in an activity (driving an automobile) that creates an expected [*24] loss PL (the probability of a pedestrian being injured times the cost of the injury). Assume also that the expected loss can be reduced by additional preventative measures (driving more slowly) with a cost, C. The ray, e, locates the equilibrium at which the expected loss, PL, equals the cost of avoidance, C. If, as illustrated in panel A of Figure 1, an injury caused by Mal had a probability P[1] of producing loss L[1], and could have been avoided by additional precautions costing C[1], liability for compensatory damages will be imposed under Hand's negligence theory. Since the expected damages exceed the cost of avoiding them, Mal (and others engaged in the activity) will have an incentive to undertake additional precautions up to the equilibrium. On the other hand, if, as illustrated in panel B, the injury caused by the activity had a probability P[2] of producing loss L[2], which could be avoided only by precautions with a cost of C[2], liability for compensatory damages may be imposed under strict liability rules, but will not provide an incentive to avoid the loss because the cost of avoidance, C[2], exceeds the expected cost of the injury, P[2]L[2]. [116]

Malice and reckless conduct, as defined in this Section, are represented in Figure 2 where the expected loss exceeds the cost of avoidance by a substantial margin. Malice produces this state of affairs because it is characterized by a purposefully injurious act, which implies that the probability of harm, P, is much greater than in the case of an unintentional act. If the magnitude of the harm caused, L, is held constant, and if the cost of avoidance, C, is low relative to the extent of the harm (for reasons that will be considered below), then a relationship such as that shown on Figure 2 will result from malice. The same relationship results from reckless conduct, because by definition the expected loss substantially outweighs the utility of the act. Here again, Mal's liability for compensatory damages would appear to provide ample incentive for avoiding the loss; doing so would leave him considerably better off. How, then, could efficiency require punitive damages in addition to the compensatory damages? [117]

[*25] There are three situations in which punitive damages might produce efficient outcomes: (1) when the ex ante probability of Mal being held liable for the loss is less than the actual probability of the harm; (2) when the compensatory damages for which Mal is held liable are less than the actual amount of the loss; and (3) when the subjective cost of avoidance (the cost as Mal appraises it) is greater than the cost recognized by the law. Situations (1) and (2) would cause Mal's expected liability to be less than the expected loss. In either situation, Mal would not have adequate incentive to avoid the loss, even though the expected loss actually exceeded the cost of avoidance. In situation (3), expected liability equals the expected loss, but is less than Mal's subjective assessment of the cost of avoidance, again producing insufficient avoidance incentives.

The following subsections compare seriatim the foregoing situations with the legal concepts of malice and reckless conduct as defined above. They indicate that there is some correlation, but that it is far from perfect.

REV_00262402

1. Probability of Liability Less Than Probability of Loss

The first situation, in which the probability of liability P[m] is less than the probability of loss P (see Figure 2), explains why punitive damages may be assessed for some types of conduct that fall within the definitions of malice or reckless conduct. [118] Fraud provides a good example. Even where it is uncovered, its elements, especially scienter, are difficult [*26] to prove and victims may be reluctant to sue and thereby disclose to the world that they were successfully duped. [119] Embezzlement presents similar problems. [120] Oppression may also fit within this situation because the propriety of acts by public officials often must be proven by evidence that depends on the relative credibility of conflicting testimony. [121] If, for example, police officers were more successful at defeating valid damage claims by lying than plaintiffs were in prosecuting false claims by the same means, then the probability of loss caused by official misconduct, P, would exceed the probability of liability, P[m]. Other intentional torts involving actual malice or reckless indifference to the victim's interests, such as robbery, conversion, and rape, [122] present difficulties in identifying and apprehending the perpetrator. [123] Without a punitive damage assessment, the expected liability in such cases (PmL in Figure 2) would be less than the expected loss, PL. In situations where PmL is less than the cost of avoidance (C in Figure 2), Mal would have no incentive to avoid expected loss PL, even though it would be efficient for him to do so. [124]

2. Damages Less Than Loss

In the second situation, the probability of loss and the probability of Mal being held liable are the same, but the damages assessed are systematically less than the value of the loss. In this situation, Mal again would be given insufficient incentive to avoid the injury (PDm in Figure 3). [*27] This state of affairs may result from one of three causes: either (a) the law does not recognize and provide a remedy for the loss; (b) part of the loss falls on persons other than the immediate victim; or (c) the value of the loss is difficult to translate into monetary terms. These causes are discussed in sequence below.

a. No legal remedy: The absence of a legal remedy was once more important than it is now. Only recently has the law recognized emotional distress as a compensable injury. [125] As we have seen, emotional distress associated with insult played a major role in the origin of punitive damages. [126] The association of punitive damages with emotional distress continued to be a close one thereafter, and still survives in the law of some states. [127] Today, however, compensatory damages for emotional distress may be recovered in most states, especially if the emotional distress was intentionally inflicted, and punitive damages may be assessed in addition to the compensatory award if the requisite [*28] punitive damage criteria are met. [128]

b. Losses falling on persons other than the victim: The second source, losses falling on persons other than the immediate victim, also is generally of less importance than it once was. Increasingly, spouses, children, and parents are allowed to recover damages for intangible losses under the rubrics of loss of consortium, loss of parentage, loss of society, and loss of companionship. [129] In specific cases, there may still be losses to others (siblings, more distant relatives, friends, colleagues, employers) that remain uncompensated under present damage rules. Derivative losses such as these, however, are functions of factors such as the nature and extent of the resulting injury and the status of the relationships to the immediate victim. There is no apparent correlation between these derivative losses and the presence of malice or reckless conduct.

There are two types of losses to others that are not redressed by compensatory damages and that may be associated with malice or reckless conduct. First, injurious acts animated by malice or resulting from reckless conduct may contribute to a sense of unease or insecurity in society generally, with a resulting diminution in social welfare. The existence and cause of such losses are difficult to identify and impossible to value in monetary terms. Without better empirical evidence, I would conjecture that they are real losses, and that they predominantly result from public perceptions of "street crime," [130] which can be included within the definitions of malice and reckless conduct set forth above. But these social losses are rarely the object of punitive damage [*29] assessments. [131]

REV_00262403

Second, losses to the public caused by breaches of the peace also may be included within the category of societal losses for which compensatory damages provide no remedy. Injuries animated by malice, and even some that result from reckless conduct, may provoke a sense of outrage and induce victims or others to seek revenge against the malefactor if not requited by legal institutions. [132] Again, this problem is less important than it may have been at one time. Dueling is no longer a fashionable response to insult, [133] although the "tavern brawl" may be an alternative in some communities. But punitive damage assessments are not the only, nor indeed the primary, means of discouraging violent self-help. To the extent that self-help is motivated by the victim's desire for vindication or vengeance, [134] the criminal law's sanctions against wrongdoers and civil suits for compensatory damages provide alternatives. [135] Moreover, the combined threat of compensatory damage liability and criminal law sanctions against self-helping victims tends to dissuade those who might otherwise resort to self-help. [136] A compelling case for punitive damages as an efficient means of preserving the peace, that their marginal contribution to that goal equals their cost. The one situation where that calculus may be plausible is when a wrongful act is committed by a government official whose conduct may be viewed by those controlling the invocation of the criminal law as the result of an excusable excess of zeal. [137]

[*30] c. The loss cannot be translated into monetary terms: The third situation in which compensatory damages may provide inadequate compensation is when the loss suffered cannot be accurately quantified. [138] Emotional distress produced by the insult of malicious injury is one example. Other examples include some losses associated with reckless conduct. [139] But the difficulty of valuing intangible losses such as pain and suffering, enjoyment of life, sex, society, and companionship, is endemic to negligence and strict liability cases as well. [140] Similar arguments also can be made with regard to losses resulting from defamation, where punitive damages are available only if the defamatory statement was made with knowledge of its falsity or with reckless disregard for the truth. [141] Difficulty in measuring losses, therefore, is not an effective means of discriminating between the cases in which punitive damages are available, and the cases in which they are not.

The implicit assumption of the argument that punitive damages are necessary to an efficient outcome when a loss cannot be accurately measured, is that inaccuracy in measurement produces a downward bias. The argument assumes that compensatory damage awards systematically undervalue actual losses, and hence, that expected liability is lower than expected loss. Historically, there may have been a basis for this argument; the law formerly placed a greater burden on plaintiffs [*31] to prove damages with certainty than it does today. [142] But the very factor that produces the uncertainty -- the absence of a market -- makes it impossible to resolve this issue. But unless difficulties in loss measurement produce a net downward bias, they cannot support an efficiency argument for punitive damages. [143]

Moreover, the argument that efficient deterrence requires punitive damage assessments because losses cannot be accurately measured is logically defective. If the absence of a market makes it impossible for courts to determine the value of a loss, it likewise makes it impossible for them to determine the amount of punitive damages that would produce an efficient level of deterrence by inducing avoidance up to, but not beyond, the magnitude of the expected loss.

3. Subjective cost of avoidance greater than cost recognized by law

The third situation in which punitive damages may be thought to promote efficiency assumes that the expected loss and the expected liability are identical, but that the real cost to the actor of avoiding the injury, Cm, is greater than the cost recognized by the law, C, as shown in Figure 4. A two stage analysis is necessary in this situation. First, one must make a normative determination of the legitimacy of the satisfaction the actor derives from the act and must forego to avoid the expected loss. Second, one must compare the expected loss, PL, to the legally recognized "legitimate" cost of avoidance.

REV_00262404

[*32] This situation describes many of the punitive damage cases falling within the malice and reckless conduct categories and suggests an answer to the otherwise perplexing question of why Mal would act in a manner that results in an expected loss far exceeding the cost of avoidance. If, for example, Mal broke into his girlfriend's home and deliberately injured her after learning that she was having an affair with another man, [144] or battered a friend with a piece of pipe after learning that he was pursuing an adulterous affair with Mal's wife, [145] it could be argued that the cost of avoiding such injuries was low relative to the expected loss, or even negative, because some real resources were consumed in effecting the injury. [146] That argument, however, ignores the satisfaction Mal anticipated from inflicting the injury. That Mal himself valued the satisfaction (and therefore the cost of foregoing the act) higher than the expected loss is indicated, though not conclusively, by the fact that he inflicted the injury. Only by ignoring Mal's satisfaction, or refusing to recognize its legitimacy, could a court arrive at the conclusion that the expected loss far exceeded the burden of avoidance. Of course, Mal is not bound by society's appraisal of his satisfaction. Therefore, if only compensatory damages were assessed, he would not be induced to avoid the loss. [147] In order to persuade him to avoid the loss and forego the satisfaction from the act, his expected liability must be raised to a level that exceeds his own valuation of the cost of avoidance, Cm. Thus, it is a normative decision -- the refusal to count as a cost of avoidance the foregone satisfaction that one person obtains from injuring another -- that explains the otherwise inexplicable: why punitive damages are necessary to obtain the desired level of deterrence when the expected loss greatly exceeds the cost of avoidance. [148]

[*33]

To summarize, if the concepts of malice and reckless conduct are narrowly and consistently defined, as stipulated at the beginning of this Section, assessing punitive damages in cases where they are present may be viewed as deserved or fair retribution. Moreover, punitive damages may also promote efficiency in at least some cases that fall within those concepts: cases where expected liability is less than expected loss. Cases involving fraud, embezzlement, oppression, and conversion are prime examples. In such cases, the probability of an actor being held liable for causing an injury is less than the probability of an injury actually occurring. There also may be a few situations involving malicious or reckless conduct where compensatory damages would be less than the actual loss. These situations are limited to cases where failure to assess more than compensatory damages would lead either to a general sense of insecurity or to breaches of the peace. Finally, in cases where a malicious actor's subjective cost of avoidance exceeds the cost of avoidance recognized by the law, punitive damages appear to promote an efficient level of deterrence. A positive analysis alone, however, does not lead to that conclusion. One must first stipulate that the satisfaction the actor obtains from injuring another is not to be counted in comparing the cost of avoidance with the expected loss. Given that stipulation, the expected loss may exceed the legitimate cost of avoidance. Punitive damages further the goal of efficiently deterring malicious and reckless conduct by raising expected damage liability above the actor's subjective, but illegitimate, appraisal of the cost of avoidance.

IV. UNCERTAINTY IN THE CRITERIA FOR THE ASSESSMENT OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

In the preceding Section, punitive damages were analyzed under the [*34] assumption that the circumstances in which they are appropriate could be defined with reasonable precision and consistency. In reality, however, the criteria for assessing punitive damages are imprecise. In this Section, therefore, the highly artificial assumption of precision is discarded, and the sources and effects of uncertainty are considered. First, this Section discusses the variety and vagueness of the terminology adopted by courts to describe circumstances in which punitive damages are appropriate. The broad discretion accorded to the jury or other factfinder is then considered as a second source of uncertainty. The remainder of the Section analyzes the effects of uncertainty from the standpoints of fairness and efficiency.

A. VAGUENESS OF STANDARDS

One source of tort law's enduring vitality and resilience is the use of terminology possessing great elasticity. Ineffably vague terms such as negligence, duty, and the reasonable person, serve to minimize or at least to mask the inevitable tension between the often conflicting objectives the law seeks to further. The punitive damages area, as a number of commentators have observed, [149] exhibits this characteristic to a heightened degree. Malice, for example, not only carries the meaning attributed to it in the preceding Section (a meaning that at least is close to the lay understanding), sometimes distinguished as "express" or "actual" malice, [150] but also carries the Pickwickian meaning of "implied" or "legal" malice. [151] Implied malice may be either "implied in fact" or "implied in law." The former is similar to express or actual malice. Malice "implied in fact" assumes that "the devil himself knoweth not the thought of man," [152] and hence, allows inferences drawn from the [*35] actor's conduct as proof of a requisite state of mind. [153] Malice "implied in law," on the other hand, has nothing to do with the actor's mental state. It is synonymous with "legal malice" and is simply a legal characterization of the conduct itself. [154] That the defendant's thoughts may have been as innocent as those of the aboriginal parents before the fall provides no defense to the doctrine of legal malice.

Terms such as "willful," "wanton," "conscious indifference," "reckless disregard," and "recklessness" are overlapping and to a substantial extent redundant. Accordingly, they will be referred to collectively as the recklessness group. They may denote a mental state accompanying a defendant's act, but that mental state is different from that of actual malice. They do not suggest that the actor was motivated by a desire to harm anyone; in the usual case falling within the recklessness group, it is not the actor's objective that is questioned, but the means of achieving it. Moreover, in contrast with most cases involving express malice, the identity of the actual victim often will have been unknown to the defendant in advance of the injury. At times the notion conveyed by the recklessness group is similar to that attributed to reckless conduct in Section III: the actor knew or should have known that the contemplated conduct endangered a class of persons that included the actual victim and the burden of avoiding the harm was slight in comparison to the expected loss. On the other hand, some of the terms in the recklessness group may carry subtly different connotations regarding the actor's state of mind. For example, "conscious indifference" suggests actual knowledge of the risk at the time the act was committed. "Reckless disregard" connotes the existence of facts that should have alerted the actor to the risks the act entailed, whether or not the actor was consciously aware of the risks. It suggests that an act was committed by a person who was oblivious to the risks. "Recklessness" subsumes both reckless disregard and conscious indifference, while "wantonness" seems to connote extreme recklessness. [155] To compound [*36] the confusion further, the combination of "willful and wanton" in a single category is not uncommon, and the terms "malice" or "aggravated circumstances" frequently are used to encompass this entire set of connotations. [156]

Conventionally, courts have viewed negligence, or "mere negligence," as an insufficient basis for awarding punitive damages. [157] But in some states, if a defendant's conduct can be characterized as "gross negligence," punitive damages may be assessed. [158] If this "unhappy term of ill-defined content" [159] represents something other than negligence "with the addition of a vituperative epithet," [160] it suggests that the foreseeable risk of harm exceeded the cost of avoidance by a greater margin than that which defines negligence, but by less than that which defines recklessness. [161] Alternatively, some courts use gross negligence, at least in the context of punitive damages, as a synonym for terms in the recklessness group. [162] Gross negligence thus embodies two sources [*37] of uncertainty: whether it is synonomous with other terms in the recklessness group; and, if not, whether it can be distinguished from ordinary negligence.

REV_00262406

Finally, the recklessness group also may be used to denote only the actor's state of mind or awareness, without regard to any disproportion-ality that may exist between the expected harm and the cost of avoidance. Conduct that otherwise might be negligent at worst, may be characterized as reckless, grossly negligent, or as accompanied by malice, based solely upon a finding that the actor was or ought to have been aware of the resulting risk of harm. [163] "Recklessness," defined as an awareness that there is some risk of harm, appears with increasing frequency as a standard for punitive damage liability in cases where the defendant would not necessarily have been found negligent in the absence of such awareness. This is particularly true of products liability cases [164] where liability for compensatory damages is based on a theory of strict liability for defective products. [165] This single-dimension interpretation of the recklessness group may be encompassed within the terms "legal malice" [166] or "aggravated circumstances."

B. JURY DISCRETION

The variety and vagueness of the terms used to characterize the criteria for punitive damage liability would create confusion and uncertainty if used by judges alone. Judges do communicate with one another, however, both within and across jurisdictional boundaries. Hence, over [*38] time one might expect that uncertainty and inconsistency would diminish. But judges are not the only nor even the primary decisionmakers who must apply these terms. The initial, and most important, decision is usually made by a jury, an ad hoc body whose knowledge of the applicable legal standards is limited to that which is communicated during a trial. Judges communicate authoritative information regarding applicable legal standards through jury instructions. But jury instructions on the standards for assessing punitive damages are unilluminating. [167] Typically, the jury is told that they may assess punitive damages if the defendant's conduct was "malicious," "willful," "wanton," or "in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights." [168] With few exceptions, those terms are not defined by the court. [169] Thus, the jury effectively is given a dual role: it must determine on an ad hoc basis the content of the standard to be applied; and it must decide whether the specific conduct at issue falls within that standard. As a result, juries have broad de facto discretion in deciding whether to assess punitive damages.

Juries are accorded substantial be jure discretion as well. Jury [*39] decisions are subject to review and may be set aside by a trial judge or an appellate court. But judicial review is less of a constraint on jury discretion in the punitive damages area than in other areas for two reasons. First, a decision not to assess punitive damages is entirely within the discretion of the jury. [170] Second, although courts still sometimes state that punitive damages are disfavored by the law, appellate courts tend to defer to jury discretion in reviewing punitive damage assessments. [171] To reverse a jury decision assessing punitive damages, the reviewing court must conclude that, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the decision, [172] a reasonable person could not have found that the defendant's conduct fell within the applicable standard. [173] Since the standards themselves are vague, this threshold is difficult to overcome.

C. FAIRNESS

When viewed from the standpoint of fairness, the combination of vague terminology and jury discretion has several ramifications. There is little assurance that those upon whom punitive damages are assessed [40] committed a wrongful act, or that those not assessed therein did not, however "wrongful act" may be defined. Those who are punished do not receive effective notice that an act is wrongful and that punishment may follow its commission. [174] These effects are illustrated in Figure 5. The horizontal axis represents degrees of culpability increasing from the origin. The vertical axis represents the probability of punitive damages being assessed. Cases falling in the shaded area to the right of X^ in panel A are those in which the defendant deserves to be punished beyond the punishment that is a byproduct of compensatory damage assessments. Panel B contains a distribution of punishments that realistically might be achieved through a retributive scheme, under which few persons who deserve punishment escape it (represented by the unshaded area to the right of X^) and few who do not deserve punishment are punished (represented by the shaded area to the left of X^). [175] Uncertainty over the location of the standard, X^*, increases the chance of erroneous verdicts. Panel C depicts symmetrical uncertainty. The extent of error is greater than in panel B; more "guilty" persons are not punished and more "innocent" persons are punished.

REV_00262407

Uncertainty over the legal standard of punitive damage liability thus should trouble rational retributionists, even if erroneous results were symmetrically distributed, that is, if false positive decisions were offset by an equal number of false negative decisions. Prevailing [*42] principles of public morality assert that it is morally desirable to reduce the number of "innocent" persons punished even at the cost of allowing more "guilty" persons to escape punishment. [176] This principle explains the procedural protections governing criminal prosecutions. [177] The distribution morally preferable to that of panel C would look something like panel D of Figure 5. It is unlikely, however, that the distribution of punitive damage assessments displays the characteristics of panel D. In the emotionally charged context of a civil trial, which lacks the procedural safeguards of a criminal proceeding, where the jury is invited to assess punitive damages with little guidance and less constraint, decisions will be affected by latent biases or redistributional inclinations. [178] If juries dislike or do not understand cost-benefit analyses, [179] distrust corporations, [180] or are offended by some publications, [181] [*43] those factors are likely to bias their decisions. [182] Since those factors more often weigh against defendants, [183] a greater number of false positive than false negative outcomes is predictable. [184] Thus, more "innocent" persons will be punished than "guilty" persons not punished, reversing the conventional adage. This situation is depicted in panel E of Figure 5.

D. EFFICIENCY

Although the outcome depicted in panel E of Figure 5 may be offensive from a fairness perspective, it nevertheless may be tolerable if there are offsetting benefits such as efficiency gains. [185] But the uncertain application of nebulous punitive damage standards proves equally disturbing from an efficiency standpoint. The allocative effects will be analyzed in two areas: (1) the resources consumed in punitive damage litigation; and (2) the incentive effects that result. [186]

1. Effects on Litigation Costs

The effects on litigation costs are depicted in Figure 6. The vertical [*44] axis again represents the probability of punitive damages being assessed. The egregiousness of the acts of defendants is measured on the horizontal axis, increasing from the origin. We assume that punitive damages are appropriate in cases where a defendant deserves to be punished and where punishment will promote an efficient level of deterrence.

If X^* is assumed to be a proper standard for imposing punitive damages, then conduct for which punitive damages are appropriate falls to the right of X^. When uncertainty exists as to the proper location of X^, however, the defendants upon whom punitive damages are actually assessed will be those who fall in the shaded area to the right of a line $YX[1]$. [187] As uncertainty increases, ceteris paribus so also does the probability of error, with the result that $X[1]$ moves to the left and the slope of line $YX[1]$ becomes more horizontal. It is apparent from Figure 6 that resources are consumed by plaintiffs in seeking, defendants in avoiding, and the judicial system in imposing punitive damages upon defendants falling within the area *X, X[1], a, with no resulting social benefit. This would be true even under the assumption that deserved punishment ipso facto confers a benefit on society. These resources are offset by the resources saved in not imposing punitive damages on those defendants within the area a, c, Y. It seems likely, however, that the area *X, X[1], a, exceeds that of a, c, Y, because of the probable jury [*45] biases discussed above. [188] Any offset, therefore, is likely to be incomplete.

REV_00262408

Moreover, punitive damages are not assessed against all defendants from whom they are sought. If defendants to the right of the line YX[2] are those from whom punitive damages are sought in litigation, then the resources consumed in the process of assessing punitive damages also include those expended by plaintiffs in seeking, defendants in avoiding, and the courts in deciding not to assess them against defendants falling within the area Y, X[1], X [2]. [189] Again, as uncertainty increases, the slope of line YX[2] will become more horizontal, as X[2] moves further to the left. The resources consumed in proceedings involving defendants against whom punitive damages should not be assessed, represented by the area *X, X[2], b, is unlikely to be offset by those saved by not assessing punitive damages against wrongdoers who deserve to incur them, represented by area Y, b, c. The increase in real costs represented by *X, X[2], b, is likely to exceed the avoided costs represented by Y, b, c, due to jury bias. Furthermore, this disparity can be expected to increase as the uncertainty of the legal standard increases.

The analysis up to this point indicates that uncertainty over the legal standard for assessing punitive damages increases litigation costs, even assuming that the cost per case is unaffected. These cost increases are compounded by another factor: the effect of uncertainty on the costs of individual cases. Whether a case will be settled, litigated to judgment, or the judgment appealed, is a function of the distance between each party's subjective evaluation of the probability of a favorable outcome. [190] As legal rules become more uncertain, there is more room for divergence in the parties' expectations. Thus, as uncertainty over legal standards increases, so also does the likelihood that cases will not be settled without litigation and appeal, [191] thereby increasing [*46] the amount of resources consumed in resolving the dispute. [192]

Uncertainty over the standards for assessing punitive damages thus results in an increase in the resources consumed in litigation on two different levels. First, plaintiffs, defendants, and the judiciary incur costs in determining whether to impose punitive damages on defendants against whom they should not be assessed, and in determining not to impose them on some defendants against whom they should be assessed. Second, uncertainty permits greater divergence in subjective estimations of the probability of a favorable outcome and, therefore, provides an incentive to litigate cases and to appeal judgments. These increases in litigation costs do not provide conclusive proof, however, that allowing punitive damages to be assessed under uncertain standards necessarily results in inefficiency. That conclusion depends upon whether the resulting social benefits are greater than the litigation costs incurred, and whether those costs could be reduced without an equivalent reduction in benefits.

2. Effects on Incentives

An evaluation of the social benefits of punitive damages requires an analysis of the second category of allocative effects, namely, incentive effects on persons within society. Net social benefits are the gross benefits to society resulting from changes in behavior less the real costs incurred. Two types of social benefits may accrue from punitive damages: those that result from a reduction in wrongful acts and those that result from a reduction in harmful acts. These categories are not mutually exclusive. In theory at least, society may be better off if people are persuaded not to commit wrongful acts for which they would deserve punishment; a less sinful society is arguably a better one. For want of a reliable means of valuing such benefits, however, the following analysis passes over the possibility that moral benefits may outweigh the cost of achieving them. It is limited instead to an examination of whether the benefits stemming from a reduction in harmful acts outweigh the costs of imposing punitive damages.

REV_00262409

Figure 6 again is helpful. Assume that acts committed by defendants to the right of *X are harmful. A reduction in their incidence, therefore, would confer benefits on society by increasing aggregate welfare. [*47] Assume also that the threat of punitive damages would deter the commission of harmful acts. As the location of *X becomes less certain because of indeterminate criteria for the assessment of punitive damages, the threat of punitive damage liability is reduced, fewer harmful acts are deterred, and gains to aggregate welfare become correspondingly lower. [193]

Moreover, uncertainty causes direct as well as indirect social losses. Since punitive damages threaten to reduce the wealth of those upon whom they may be assessed, potential defendants will undertake costly efforts to reduce uncertainty, perhaps by obtaining more legal advice. A rational wealth-maximizer will seek to ascertain, not the location of *X, but the location of lines YX[1] and YX[2]. The verbal camouflage that obfuscates judicial decisions will be disregarded and efforts will be directed to predicting the actual outcomes of proceedings. As the contours of de facto liability are discerned by potential defendants, the threat of punitive damage claims will provide incentives for altering behavior. To the extent that these adjustments produce a reduction in conduct to the right of *X, benefits to society will offset the costs incurred in reducing uncertainty; to the extent that they cause a reduction in conduct to the left of *X, the effect on aggregate welfare will be adverse. [194]

The adverse effects on aggregate welfare result from the deterrence of socially beneficial acts that fall within the area *X, X[2], b, in Figure 6. Moreover, since the exact locations of the lines YX[1] and YX[2] are uncertain, risk aversion on the part of potentially affected persons [195] may cause the deterrence of acts that fall in the area left of the line bX[2]. For example, an auto manufacturer observing decisions such as Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., [196] and Dorsey v. Honda Motor Co., [197] may conclude [*48] that the production of small, light, fuel-efficient, aesthetically attractive, inexpensive cars increases its exposure to punitive damage liability. Passengers in such cars are twice as likely to be killed in a crash as they are in a larger car. [198] It is, therefore, probable that more lawsuits per car will result from smaller cars than from larger ones. It is also probable that evidence will be available to show that, using present technology, any car, but especially small cars, could be made safer for occupants. [199] Although the production of small cars confers benefits on society when measured by consumer preference, [200] cases such as Grimshaw and Dorsey increase the probability that a court will find that small car production falls to the right of the line YX[1]. These cases also increase the probability that occupants injured in a crash will place small car production to the right of the line YX[2]. Since a manufacturer's expected punitive damage liability is a function of the number of personal injury lawsuits and of the technological feasibility of making safer cars, reducing small car production will reduce the probability of punitive damage assessments.

An automobile manufacturer, therefore, must include the expected value of punitive damage claims, including the expected litigation costs of defending against them, as a private cost of producing small, light, fuel-efficient, inexpensive cars. [201] But the private cost of punitive damages cause manufacturers to internalize the social costs of producing such cars only if producing them is conduct that falls to the right of *X; that is, only if a manufacturer in comparing the costs and benefits of producing such cars in the absence of expected punitive damage liability, [*49] would, for one of the reasons discussed in Section III, undervalue expected injuries to occupants. The existence of such undervaluation by automobile manufacturers is not obvious. This is not a situation such as fraud -- where the probability of liability is significantly less than the probability of loss. The fact of injury in an automobile crash is patent and the identity of the manufacturer is known. [202] The primary losses -- personal injuries -- are tangible and not uniquely difficult to value; derivative losses in automobile cases are no more difficult to recover than in other personal injury cases; and breach of the peace is hardly a serious threat. Finally, it is doubtful that automobile manufacturers derive illicit satisfaction from contemplating the casualties caused by their design decisions.

REV_00262410

Although expected punitive damage liability may not reflect the social cost of producing small cars, manufacturers must include such potential liability as a production cost, attempt to minimize it, and recover the residue from purchasers. Minimization may entail producing cars that are larger, heavier, less fuel-efficient, and less aesthetically attractive, in order to make them safer. Thus, more resources will be consumed in automobile manufacturing, and the price of cars will be increased to cover these additional costs and the residual cost of expected punitive damage liability. [203] Purchasers will get safer cars, but not by choice. Many automobile purchasers have regularly revealed their preference for small, light, fuel-efficient, aesthetically pleasing, lower-priced, less safe cars. [204] Punitive damage liability will result in more resources being consumed to produce and operate fewer small cars. Prices will be higher, consumers will be limited to purchasing cars that are safer than they desire, net revenues to manufacturers will be lower, and capital will be diverted to other activities. As a consequence, aggregate welfare will be reduced.

Manufacturers of other products that carry some risk of physical harm, [205] as well as writers and publishers of realistic fiction, [206] and [*50] others engaged in activities where punitive damages are assessed under the prevailing nebulous criteria, will face similar predicaments. [207] Uncertain standards increase the probability that, sometime in the future, a court will assess punitive damages against such persons. Accordingly, they must take into account as a cost of their activities their subjective estimates of that probability. As in the automobile example, prices will increase and resources will be diverted to the production of other products. The result will not necessarily be an improvement in resource allocation.

Basing punitive damage liability on the defendant's knowledge of the probability of loss and on the technological availability of means to reduce expected loss -- as a number of cases do [208] -- has a perverse effect on incentives for yet another reason: it reduces the marginal product of resources committed to ascertaining the relative harm that would result from alternative product designs and to exploring means of reducing expected loss. Punitive damages thus deter the very activities that efficient liability rules promote.

Uncertain standards for assessing punitive damages, therefore, cause more resources to be consumed by the litigation process and by persons who must adjust to resulting incentives. Some of these activities fall to the left of X^* in Figure 6; by definition they should not trigger punitive damage assessments. One might argue, however, that no misallocation results because changes in the law to reduce uncertainty would result in even greater social loss. That would occur if more certain standards would entail greater litigation costs or would cause losses to society through reduced deterrence of harmful acts, and if these increased costs taken together would exceed the costs of the present system. There is good reason to believe, however, that that is not the case.

[*51] If the applicable legal standard for assessing punitive damages were more certain, subjective predictions of the outcome of litigation would be closer, settlement would be more likely, [209] and litigation costs would decline. The question, then, is whether greater certainty can be achieved without an unacceptable reduction in deterrence. Several proposals for reducing uncertainty have been made in the legal literature. Some have suggested, for example, that another term, such as "outrageous" [210] or "flagrant" [211] conduct should be substituted for the plethora of vague and overlapping terms currently used. Although I have previously subscribed to this approach, [212] I am now persuaded that the proposed terms possess as much potential elasticity as those presently in use. [213] Accordingly, their adoption

REV_00262411

TEXT:

[*1] Economists have debated the relative merits of private and public law enforcement. [1] They have used economic models to investigate whether, under strong assumptions regarding the certainty and consistency of legal rules, [2] the substitution of private for public law enforcement can produce efficient levels of compliance. Reparative (or compensatory) damages assessed against wrongdoers in private civil suits complement public enforcement measures. [3] In some instances, however, courts have concluded that even the combination of criminal prosecution and civil damage liability produces a suboptimal level of enforcement [4] and have assessed punitive (or exemplary) damages in [*2] addition to compensatory damages.

The concept of punitive damages lies in the borderland that both bridges and separates criminal law and torts. Even the few torts books that devote significant attention to the subject of damages in general, [5] relegate punitive damages to a footnote. Perhaps in the past the issue merited scant attention. Punitive damages were rarely assessed and likely to be small in amount. But today punitive damage liability can no longer be dismissed as a curious artifact of the common origins of tort and criminal law. Punitive damages are being sought and awarded in a growing number of cases, [6] often for substantial amounts. [7] Only recently, however, have legal commentators addressed the causes and [*3] implications of the substantial increase in the number and magnitude of punitive damage awards. [8] This Article furthers that inquiry by addressing two questions: whether the law of punitive damages in its current form accords with intuitive notions of fairness, and whether it promotes allocative efficiency. [9]

Section I analyzes the legal theories that have been offered to support imposing punitive damage liability. In Section II, these theories are tested against the cases out of which the doctrine of punitive damages arose. Section III analyzes the criteria currently used by courts in assessing punitive damages in light of the legal theories examined in Section I. The analysis in Section III assumes that the criteria used by courts are sufficiently precise to identify discrete classes of conduct. That assumption is relaxed in Section IV, which considers how uncertainty affects the meaning and scope of the criteria governing punitive damage liability. Section V examines the factors that are considered relevant in determining the size of punitive damage assessments. Finally, the effects of vicarious liability and insurance are assessed in Sections VI and VII, respectively.

I. LEGAL THEORIES

At least seven purposes for imposing punitive damages can be gleaned from judicial opinions and the writings of commentators: (1) punishing the defendant; (2) deterring the defendant from repeating the offense; (3) deterring others from committing an offense; (4) preserving the peace; (5) inducing private law enforcement; (6) compensating victims for otherwise uncompensable losses; and (7) paying the plaintiff's attorneys' fees. [10] Each of these purposes will be analyzed in turn.

[*4] A. PUNISHMENT

The use of the term "punishment" to denote imposing a detriment upon someone implies a retributive aim and, therefore, a notion of desert. [11] When a detriment is deserved, the imposition of the detriment is itself the "good" being sought, and it is not necessary that any other good consequences result. Desert is necessary and sufficient, and provides a complete answer to the question, "Why should X be punished?" [12] Since the answer to that question depends upon a moral theory, it cannot be tested empirically, although there may be relevant intermediate questions that can be. [13] To explicate the concept of desert and its implications one must construct a comprehensive moral theory, a task not to be undertaken here. [14] For the purposes of this Article, it is sufficient if we can agree on the minimum content of the principle of desert currently prevailing in society. We need only agree that would not produce, ipso facto, a significant increase in certainty. Moreover, the effectiveness of procedural changes, such as adopting a higher evidentiary standard, [214] depends upon whether courts would interpret them as a mandate to dispose more freely of marginal punitive damage claims through summary judgment, dismissal, or directed verdicts. [215] If the criteria for assessing punitive damages remain as vacuous as they are [*52] now, such procedural changes are unlikely to improve the situation significantly.

The meaningful specification of the situations in which punitive damage assessments will promote efficiency is possible. If coupled with a judicial reining-in of the jury's discretion to decide whether to assess punitive damages, the clearer specification of criteria could lead to greater certainty in result. As discussed in Section III, [216] there are two types of cases in which punitive damages may be necessary to achieve optimal deterrence: (1) those in which the harm is purposefully caused; [217] and (2) those in which compensatory damage recoveries are significantly less than the losses caused by the defendant's conduct. The first category of cases would require proof of what the criminal law refers to as "specific intent" and would encompass most of the traditional intentional torts such as assault, battery, and deceit. The second category would encompass wrongful acts such as fraud, where the elements of the offense are difficult to prove, or where the identity and apprehension of the offender is problematic. Injurious acts committed by government agents might be added to the second category because criminal law sanctions may be invoked against law-breaking officials less often than against private individuals. A number of cases would fall within both categories. The cases that would not fall within either of the two suggested categories include many of those now included within the "recklessness" group. As shown in Section III, [218] however, those are cases in which punitive damages are not necessary to achieve efficient levels of deterrence. If the expected loss greatly exceeds the cost of avoidance, compensatory damages alone will provide sufficient deterrence. If the expected loss slightly exceeds or is less than the cost of avoidance, imposing punitive damages would produce excessive deterrence. [219]

In summary, the law of punitive damages is characterized by a [*53] high degree of uncertainty that stems from the use of a multiplicity of vague, overlapping terms and the extraordinary deference accorded to juries who receive little meaningful guidance. As a result, the biases and inclinations toward wealth redistribution exhibited by triers of fact are permitted to influence decisions on punitive damage issues. Accordingly, there is little reason to believe that only deserving defendants are punished, or that fair notice of punishable conduct is provided.

Rather than furthering efficient deterrence, current punitive damage law produces additional litigation costs and inefficient incentives. But this situation need not prevail. Restricting punitive damage assessments to cases in which an injury was purposefully caused, or in which the aggregate expected loss from the conduct was greater than the expected compensatory damage recovery, would limit punitive damages to situations where they are supported by considerations of fairness and efficiency.

V. AMOUNTS OF PUNITIVE DAMAGE ASSESSMENTS

In the preceding Section, the effects of uncertain criteria for assessing punitive damages were scrutinized. This Section considers the determination of the amounts of punitive damage assessments, once it has been decided to assess some amount. The determination of the magnitude of awards is another aspect of the law governing punitive damages that is plagued by uncertain standards. [220]

A. UNCERTAINTY

Jury instructions on the permissible magnitude of punitive damage assessments generally provide even less guidance than do those that purport to explain the bases of punitive damage liability. At the time of the Grimshaw decision, California's pattern instruction was among the more general: it stated simply that "[t]he law provides no fixed standard as to the amount of such punitive damages, but leaves the amount to the jury's sound discretion, exercised without passion or prejudice." [221] Pattern instructions in some states at least direct the [*54] jury's attention to the purposes of punitive damages, by requiring "an amount which will serve to punish the defendant and to deter others from the commission of like offenses." [222] But none of the pattern instructions reviewed for this Article remind the jury that compensatory damages themselves have retributive and deterrent effects. Some specifically state that actual or compensatory damages are a prerequisite to punitive damages. [223] Others expressly refer to the financial condition of the defendant as a circumstance that the jury may consider. [224] But with few exceptions, [225] no further guidance is given. [226] Thus, juries not only have great discretion in determining the standard of liability for [*55] punitive damages, but also in determining the amount to be assessed. The predictable result of this discretion has been a wide variance in the magnitude of punitive damage awards. [227] Indeed, some awards have reached surprisingly high levels. [228]

REV_00262412

There is one difference, however, between the effective discretion given to juries in deciding punitive damage liability and the discretion given to juries in determining punitive damage amounts: trial judges and appellate courts have been more willing to exercise ex post constraints, using remittitur to reduce assessments that are "excessive." [229] Without agreed standards to guide judges as to the appropriate magnitude of assessments, however, judicial decisions reducing large awards make little contribution to consistency and certainty; they merely reduce the probability that very large awards will be upheld. Some courts have stated that assessments will be reduced if they appear to have been influenced by the jury's "passion and prejudice." [230] But that criterion is tautological at best because it relies on the size of the assessment to provide primary evidence of the influence of jury bias. [231] Moreover, courts have reduced assessments that were arrived at through unquestionably rational means, [232] and upheld awards that had [*56] no apparent basis. [233]

From a fairness perspective, uncertain criteria for determining the magnitude of punitive damage assessments exacerbates the problems caused by vague liability standards. Juries are free to base their decisions on preexisting biases or redistributional inclinations, [234] subject only to the uncertain constraint of judicial review. Such ad hoc decisionmaking invariably results in the disparate treatment of similarly situated defendants, thereby frustrating the goals of equal treatment, proportionality, and fair notice. [235] Consequently, some morally "innocent" defendants are assessed large amounts, while some "guilty" defendants are assessed little. [236]

The effects on efficiency are similar to those associated with uncertain liability rules. Litigation costs are higher because the differences in the parties' subjective predictions of the outcome of a case are increased, making settlement less feasible. In addition, litigation costs increase with the amount at stake. [237] As the stakes in a lawsuit rise, the [*57] marginal product of resources invested in litigation also increases. Furthermore, without certain standards for determining the magnitude of an assessment, the defendant's wealth provides the only effective upper limit on punitive damage awards, [238] and there is some probability that any amount up to that limit will be assessed. That probability is unknowable, however, so expenditures made by each party will be a function of their respective subjective estimations. Litigation resources will be attracted to cases involving wealthy defendants [239] and, in the short run, away from cases involving less wealthy defendants who, on the basis of desert or expected harm, should be assessed larger amounts. [240]

Uncertainty as to the amount of punitive damages that may be assessed also has incentive effects on the behavior of potential defendants. Some will overestimate not only the likelihood but also the amount of potential punitive damage assessments, and incur excessive avoidance costs; others will underestimate potential liability and under-invest in the avoidance of conduct that merits punitive damage liability. Because of their greater exposure, wealthier persons or firms are more likely to overinvest. Moreover, if knowledge of some likelihood of harm is equated with recklessness [241] by triers of fact, greater knowledge may be viewed as meriting more severe punishment, thereby increasing disincentives to ascertain the relative harm that may result from various contemplated activities.

REV_00262413

[*58] B. REASONABLE RELATIONSHIP TO COMPENSATORY AWARD

Some jurisdictions attempt to reduce uncertainty about the amount of punitive damages that may be assessed by requiring that assessments bear a "reasonable relationship" to the compensatory damages awarded. [242] This principle is not expressed in any of the pattern jury instructions surveyed for this Article, [243] but is used by trial and appellate judges in their review of jury verdicts and is sometimes offered as an explanation for reducing jury assessments. [244] The principle has historical antecedents [245] and contemporary statutory parallels. [246] It has been commended by some scholars troubled by the effects of standardless decisionmaking in this area. [247]

The "reasonable relationship" principle does appear to offer some guidance to decisionmakers and to enhance predictability. [248] But from the standpoint of fairness, the adverse effects of this approach outweigh its advantages. The actual harm that occurred is at best a crude measure of the moral egregiousness of a defendant's conduct and, hence, of the punishment deserved. If degrees of egregiousness were ranked along a scale ranging from accidental "acts of God" through negligence to deliberately injurious acts, one would not expect to find any correlation between egregiousness and the gravity of the injury sustained by an individual plaintiff. Death, disabling physical injury, or substantial economic loss may result from acts that fall at any point on the egregiousness scale. The same is true for minor physical or psychic injury and petty economic loss. Nevertheless, the criminal law recognizes the [*59] principle of "aggravated harm," [249] under which the punishment prescribed by statutes and imposed by courts is often a function of the resulting harm as well as the nature of the act causing it. For example, attempts typically are punished less severely than successfully completed acts. [250] But scholars have been unable to reconcile the disparate treatment of attempts and completed acts with principles of retribution and moral desert. [251]

Making the size of punitive damage assessments a function of the compensatory damages also has adverse effects on the objective of promoting allocative efficiency, because it substitutes the harm that occurred in one case for expected harm as the independent variable. If cases in which large compensatory awards are expected are also those in which large punitive assessments are also expected, the costs of litigating "big cases" will increase. Additional resources will be attracted to cases where the injury to a particular plaintiff is substantial and the magnitude of the detriment to the defendant from large compensatory damages is correspondingly great, even when the aggregate social loss is small because the probability of the harm occurring is small. Those resources will be attracted away from cases where the harm to a particular plaintiff is small (and the corresponding detriment and deterrence produced by compensatory damages are small) although the aggregate social loss is great because the probability of the harm is high. Instead of inducing plaintiffs to engage in private law enforcement by bringing suit when their expected recovery of compensatory damages alone is too small to cover litigation expenses, [252] the reasonable relationship principle induces plaintiffs to increase the stakes in cases that would have been litigated anyway. [253]

This principle also has adverse effects on the goal of efficient deterrence. Persons whose acts carry a risk of harm, the gravity of which is substantial but the probability of which is low, are induced to overinvest in harm avoidance. On the other hand, persons whose activities [*60] carry a risk of harm, the gravity of which is low but the probability of which is high, receive insufficient incentive to avoid it. To illustrate, assume Mal's activities [254] created an expected loss of $ 1.00, where $P[a] = 0.000001$ and $L[a] = $ 1{,}000{,}000$. Assume Deceiver's activities [255] created an expected loss of $ 10, where $P[b] = 1.0$ and $L[b] = $ 10$. Assume further that the relevant jurisdiction has in force a reasonable relationship rule under which punitive damages are always twice the actual damages. Mal would be induced to spend up to $ 3 per unit of activity in loss avoidance, although by doing so he would avoid only $ 1 of harm. Mal would do so because, for each 1,000,000 units of activity, he would expect to be assessed $ 1,000,000 in actual and $ 2,000,000 in punitive damages. Deceiver's incentives depend upon the suits successfully brought per unit of activity. Unlike Mal, Deceiver will not expect a law suit to be brought for each injury, since the costs to each victim of prosecuting a suit would exceed their expected recovery. If Deceiver expected less than one suit per three units of activity, she would not be deterred from continuing to engage in harmful conduct.

The foregoing discussion assumes that the reasonable relationship principle provides a standard for determining the amount of punitive damages. In fact, it neither provides meaningful guidance to decisionmakers nor increases certainty. This is so because the principle does not imply a "mathematical ratio." [256] As a result, there are enormous variations in the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages. [257] The "principle" thus is vacuous. It provides no rational basis for deciding whether the size of a punitive damage assessment is appropriate. Rather, it serves to disguise the bases on which decisions by reviewing courts are reached. [258]

[*61] C. DEFENDANT'S WEALTH AS A FACTOR

The defendant's wealth is a factor that juries and reviewing courts consider in deciding on an appropriate punitive damage assessment. The wealthier the defendant, the larger the permissable assessment. [259] This approach appears to make punishment depend on status: the wealthy are punished more severely than the poor. So viewed, it cannot be reconciled with principles of fairness, especially equal treatment and proportionality. However, this approach is premised on the declining marginal utility of money: the disutility caused by the loss of $ 1 is assumed to be less for a wealthy defendant than for a poor one. [260] If the validity of the assumption is accepted, [261] then taking the defendant's wealth into account is theoretically consistent with principles of fairness in that it seeks to equilibrate -- however crudely -- the amount of disutility imposed.

Whether or not using wealth as a factor in determining the size of punitive damage assessment is theoretically justifiable, its practical effects are objectionable. It invites otherwise unguided juries to indulge any redistributive inclinations they may have. [262] It also produces inefficient [*62] incentives. Plaintiffs are given an incentive to claim punitive damages in cases where the return is greater, that is, cases against wealthier defendants. [263] Because of the increased expectation of larger assessments against wealthy defendants, the resources consumed by both parties in such cases increase. [264] Some are consumed directly in proving defendants' wealth; most courts allow the introduction of such evidence. [265] If the defendant is relatively wealthy, the plaintiff has an incentive to seek and introduce evidence of that fact; if the defendant is relatively poor, the plaintiff has no such incentive. Although poorer defendants may introduce evidence of their poverty, they may be tactically constrained from doing so, as evidence of wealth is relevant only to the magnitude of a punitive damage assessment. Defendant's introduction of evidence of its wealth may be seen as a concession that some assessment is appropriate.

Finally, relating the magnitude of punitive damage awards to defendants' wealth sends erroneous signals to other actors. Relatively wealthy potential defendants will be induced by their greater exposure to overinvest in avoidance; poorer potential defendants will be induced to underinvest.

To summarize, the lack of functional criteria for determining the appropriate size of punitive damage assessments compounds the effects of uncertain standards of liability. Juries are given no effective guidance and are constrained only by the possibility that a reviewing court will exercise its discretion to reduce an excessive verdict. As a result, there is wide variance in the magnitude of assessments, with no apparent correlation between the amounts assessed and defendants' desert. Uncertainty also increases litigation costs and provides undesirable incentives.

REV_00262415

The admonition that punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to actual damages is not supported by considerations of either desert or efficiency and may have perverse effects on the latter. [*63] Moreover, the principle itself is vacuous and serves only to obfuscate the actual bases for judicial decisions.

Theoretically, relating the size of assessments to a defendant's wealth may be reconcilable with fairness. But in operation, it invites juries to engage in wealth redistribution and exacerbates the perverse incentives already created by uncertain standards of punitive damage liability and the lack of functional criteria for the magnitude of assessments.

VI. VICARIOUS LIABILITY

Punitive damage liability is not limited to those who commit wrongful or harmful acts. Under the doctrine of vicarious liability, principals and employers may be liable for punitive damages as a result of acts committed by their agents or employees. The courts are almost evenly divided over the proper basis for vicarious punitive damage liability. Half follow the respondeat superior rule and hold that an employer may be liable for punitive damages for wrongful acts committed by employees in the course of their employment. [266] The other half follow the "complicity rule" and limit vicarious punitive damage liability to those situations where wrongful acts were committed or specifically authorized or ratified by a managerial agent, or were committed by an unfit employee who was recklessly employed or retained. [267] Legal scholars also disagree as to the appropriate rule. [268]

The difference between the two approaches is one of degree only; both rules authorize vicarious punitive damage liability on the basis of [*64] conduct by persons who are not the employer in persona, but who are employees. [269] Under the complicity rule, they must be managerial level employees, but this category may encompass persons as far down the managerial ladder as the shop foreman. Hence, for the purpose of analyzing the fairness and efficiency of vicarious punitive damage liability in this Section, no distinction is made between the two approaches.

Vicarious liability for compensatory damages has existed for centuries, [270] but it remains a rule in search of a rationale. [271] A variety of justifications have been offered, but each has proven inadequate upon close scrutiny. [272] The most influential factor in the expansion of vicarious liability appears to have been the desire to insure that victims of tortious injury can reach a defendant with sufficient wealth to provide adequate compensation. [273] Courts have assumed that employers generally have a "deeper pocket" and that, with more potential defendants available to an injured plaintiff, the probability increases that one [*65] among them will have the wealth to provide compensation. [274] An additional factor has been the desire to locate someone who can spread the loss, through insurance or otherwise. [275] Other justifications include the internalization of the costs of injuries associated with the activities of an enterprise [276] and concern that a victim might be unable to identify the specific person or persons who committed the act that caused the injury and therefore left without a remedy. [277]

Each of these justifications is subject to criticism in the context of compensatory damages. Whatever their merit, however, they offer little or no support for vicarious punitive damage liability. Those that are grounded in concerns about the possibility of uncompensated victims obviously do not apply, as punitive damages are not intended to perform direct compensatory functions. [278] The loss-spreading rationale contradicts the underlying theory of punitive damages. By definition, it would spread punishment among large numbers of nonwrongdoers who do not deserve punishment [279] and weaken the deterrent effect of damage assessments. The cost internalization argument, to the extent that it operates on valid assumptions, is applicable only in those situations where punitive damages are assessed because the expected liability for compensatory damages is less than the expected loss. [280] Even in those situations, however, cost internalization cannot entirely explain vicarious punitive damage liability. An employer or principal is vicariously liable only for the amount of compensatory damages for which the employee or agent is primarily liable. But as noted in the preceding Section, [281] the wealth of the defendant is a major factor in determining the size of punitive damage assessments. It is the wealth of the vicariously liable employer or principal, not the wealth of the wrongdoing employee or agent, that is determinative. [282] Vicarious liability thus increases [*66] the upper boundary of potential assessments.

REV_00262416

The arguments used to justify vicarious compensatory damages are, therefore, inapplicable or lamentably weak when applied to vicarious punitive damage liability. But the question remains whether the justifications for primary punitive damage liability are applicable to vicarious liability. In analyzing this question, it is useful to assume once again that punitive damages are assessed only in cases where an employee acted either maliciously or recklessly, and that "malice" and "reckless conduct" are narrowly defined, as they were in Section III. [283] If the arguments for vicarious punitive damages are not compelling under these assumptions, their weaknesses will be exacerbated by the uncertainty that characterizes the current law.

A. FAIRNESS

Vicarious liability is strict liability; no wrongdoing or shortcoming on the part of the vicarious defendant need be shown. Indeed, the employer may have taken every reasonable step to avoid the harm and nevertheless be held liable for compensatory and punitive damages. Although vicarious defendants are often artificial persons such as municipalities or business corporations, that serves only to disguise the fact that the punishment ultimately falls upon natural persons who have not committed wrongful or harmful acts. [284] In the case of municipalities, the loss falls upon taxpayers, employees, and consumers of the goods and services the city dispenses. [285] In the case of business corporations, punishment falls upon stockholders, creditors, employees, suppliers, sellers of complementary products, consumers of goods and services, and taxpayers. [286] None of these persons meet the first requirement of deserved punishment: the commission of a wrongful act. It is not surprising, therefore, that proponents of vicarious punitive damage liability have difficulty arguing that employers deserve to be punished for the wrongful acts of their employees. [287] Rarely does one see a positive [*67] assertion to that effect. [288]

Moreover, vicarious punitive damage liability imposes retribution ex ante on innocent employers of innocent employees, employers whose employees have committed no wrongful or harmful acts. Employers cannot perfectly forecast and prevent acts by employees that may result in punitive damages. Anticipating that such acts may occur, they must incur costs to reduce the likelihood and to insure against the possibility of having to pay punitive assessments. [289] While these costs lack the stigma of punitive damage assessments, they are nonetheless detriments imposed upon persons who have not been found to be deserving of punishment.

B. EFFICIENCY

The major justification offered for vicarious punitive damage liability is its deterrent effect. [290] In appraising this argument, it is necessary to recall the situations in which efficient levels of deterrence will be promoted by imposing punitive damages: where the injury is purposefully done or where the expected compensatory damage liability is less than [*68] the expected loss caused by the activity. [291]

REV_00262417

The first situation, injury purposefully inflicted, is included as a separate category to encompass situations where the actor obtains "illicit" satisfaction from injuring another. But presumably employers derive no vicarious satisfaction from the wrongful acts of their employees. Indeed, employers may suffer psychic and business losses as a result of such acts. There is no reason to assume, therefore, that compensatory damages alone -- for which employers are ex hypothese vicariously liable -- provide insufficient incentives for employers to undertake efficient safeguards in selecting, monitoring, and disciplining employees.

Nor does vicarious punitive damage liability seem appropriate in the second situation -- where expected damages are less than expected loss. The cases that typically fall within this category involve offenses, such as fraud and intentional torts, that cause employers to suffer losses beyond potential legal damages. For example, it is not ordinarily in the self-interest of a profit-maximizing firm to employ persons who abuse customers. [292] And in cases where an employee acts "recklessly," vicarious liability for compensatory damages ordinarily will provide an adequate incentive for employers to undertake efficient levels of prevention.

Even assuming, however, that punitive damage liability promotes efficient levels of harm avoidance, the question arises whether it is more efficient to assess them against employers rather than employees. Vicarious liability is usually in lieu of, rather than in addition to, assessments against employees. [293] As a matter of law, a vicariously liable employer ordinarily has the right of indemnity from an employeewrongdoer. But indemnity is almost never sought nor obtained, even [*69] for compensatory damage assessments. [294] Where the magnitude of a punitive damage assessment is based upon the wealth of an employer, it is unrealistic to expect that reimbursement will occur. [295] As a result, vicarious punitive damages do not directly deter potential wrongdoers. Other disciplinary measures are available to the vicariously liable employer, but there are constraints on the employer's ability to invoke them. Ordinarily, an employer's vicarious punitive damage liability is determined through litigation, the outcome of which may not be known until years after an employee's wrongful act. [296] By that time, the wrongdoing employee may no longer be employed. Moreover, even if the likelihood of vicarious punitive damage liability could be foreseen earlier, employers may wish to avoid alienating employees whose evidence might directly affect the probability and amount of any assessment.

The principal deterrence argument for vicarious punitive damage liability, however, is not that it will cause employers to discipline employees after they commit wrongful acts, but that it will encourage employers to improve their selection and monitoring procedures, and thereby reduce the incidence of harmful acts. [297] Employers can also reduce the likelihood of vicarious liability by substituting capital for labor, [298] employing independent contractors, [299] insuring, [300] or ceasing [*70] business. Employers will choose from among these alternatives based on estimates of their cost effectiveness. Whether the added cost will be offset by a reduction in affected injury costs is indeterminate. It seems intuitively unlikely, however, that the aggregate cost increase for all employers will be offset. That conclusion is reinforced by the use of wealth as a factor in determining the size of punitive damage awards, with the result that wealthier employers are induced to invest in greater avoidance than less wealthy employers whose activities may be more harmful.

It seems more likely that efficient levels of deterrence would be achieved by imposing punitive damages on employees alone. The threat of punitive damages would then operate directly on those who know of their own potential for committing harmful acts and who control their own actions. Almost invariably, employers are in a worse position to anticipate which employee will commit an act for which punitive damages may be assessed and to prevent its occurrence.

The primary argument against limiting punitive damage liability to employees is that it may be costly for the plaintiff to identify the particular individual who committed a harmful act, especially in large, bureaucratic entities where many individuals may have participated in a decision that resulted in harm. [301] But vicarious punitive damage liability has not been limited to such situations. [302] Moreover, the costs of identifying responsible individuals may well be exaggerated. [303] If courts limited vicarious liability for punitive damages to situations where wrongdoers were difficult to identify, then employers, who presumably have a cost advantage in identifying the responsible individuals, would have an incentive to obtain and disclose that information.

REV_00262418

Vicarious punitive damage liability also increases litigation costs [*71] by injecting an additional issue into the dispute: whether the act was committed by an employee acting in the course of employment or, alternatively, whether the elements of the "complicity rule" were present. Ordinarily, increased litigation costs would decrease the plaintiff's incentive to seek vicarious punitive damages. But vicarious liability also increases the potential magnitude of punitive damage assessments by providing wealthier defendants, thereby providing sufficient incentive for plaintiffs and employers to incur higher litigation costs. [304] Vicarious punitive damage liability thus attracts resources, not to cases in which an egregious act was committed, but to those where an injury was caused by an employee or agent, under circumstances making vicarious liability potentially available.

In summary, vicarious punitive damage liability cannot be justified as deserved punishment. Indeed, it is usually conceded to be unfair. Deterrence alone is thus relied upon to justify it. The foregoing analysis indicates, however, that efficient levels of deterrence are unlikely to be promoted by vicarious punitive damage liability, even assuming that the criteria for assessing punitive damages can be made certain and predictable. When that assumption is dropped, it becomes apparent that the combination of vicarious liability with the prevailing uncertain criteria for determining liability and magnitude serves to diminish rather than to increase aggregate welfare.

VII. INSURABILITY

The courts are split over whether punitive damages are insurable, although a majority have concluded that they are. [305] Courts that deny insurability do so on the public policy ground that it defeats the purposes of punitive damages. [306] Almost all courts, however, permit insurance for vicarious punitive damage liability. [307]

[*72] Liability insurance serves two functions. First, it allows the insured to substitute a present, certain payment for the risk of large future losses that are contingent on claims by other persons. While there are numerous means of achieving that result, [308] the specific issue considered here is the availability of formal insurance through the purchase of a policy from an underwriter, which spreads the expected cost of future losses through the payment of premiums by a large number of persons. [309] For insurance to operate efficiently, there must be (1) a large number of more or less homogeneous participants; (2) losses that have a definite time and place of occurrence; (3) losses that are accidental in that they are beyond the control of the insured and their occurrence is not highly probable; and (4) a minimal hazard of catastrophe. [310] The cost of insurance against any given risk depends upon the expected number and magnitude of losses sustained by policyholders. Insurance influences the conduct of policyholders by reducing the cost to them of the risk of future loss, thereby reducing incentives to take steps to avoid such loss. [311]

The second function of liability insurance, and one that has become an increasingly important public policy concern, is to assure that funds will be available to provide compensation when a person is injured under circumstances that make another party liable. [312] Thus, in many states, motorists are required by law to carry liability insurance as a prerequisite to operating an automobile. [313] Plaintiffs are sometimes allowed to bring suits directly against defendants' insurance companies. [314] And decisions on liability rules often are influenced by the presence of insurance. [315]

REV_00262419

[*73] As should be apparent from their descriptions, the two functions of liability insurance are inharmonious with punitive damages: the first is inconsistent with the objectives of punitive assessments; the second is irrelevant.

Figure 7 depicts a hypothetical distribution of payments made by an insurer during one time period. The horizontal axis represents the number of claims paid; the vertical axis maps the dollar value of each claim. Point f on the vertical axis indicates the face amount of a hypothetical policy, that is, the maximum amount the insurer has agreed to pay for each occurrence. The curve labelled CC represents amounts actually paid out. [316] It extends above point f on the vertical axis because, in addition to agreeing to pay the damages for which the insured may become liable, liability insurance policies also commit the insurer to defend any claim against the insured. Litigation defense costs, therefore, must be added to the face amount of any policy. The insurer must set premiums at a level that allows it to recover the losses represented by CC, together with its cost of capital and operating expenses. [317]

[*74] Insurability of punitive damages increases the expected losses. This increase is represented by curve PP in Figure 7, which is shifted to the right to reflect increased underwriting costs, both from increased payments and the increased expenses associated with litigating punitive damage claims. The shift is larger than it might otherwise be, because the nebulous criteria for the assessment of punitive damages and the enormous variation in the amounts awarded make the underwriting process highly uncertain. Where claim distributions are characterized by large variances and instability over time, underwriting uncertainty is increased, the possibility of underwriting error is magnified, and premiums must be set at a sufficiently high level to offset potential error. [318] A large single claim or some other dramatic event can trigger a general rate increase within a line of risks. [319] Such increases result in higher premiums for all policyholders. Thus, from the fairness standpoint, insurability is inconsistent with the goals of punitive damage liability because it reduces the punishment of the wrongdoer and imposes it on all other policyholders through higher premiums.

Insurability of punitive damages also conflicts with the goal of efficient deterrence. Insurance reduces incentives to engage in loss avoidance [320] and, in the case of wrongs falling within the categories of malice and reckless conduct as defined in Section III, [321] increases moral hazard. [322] These effects, together with the uncertain criteria for assessing punitive damages and the absence of consistent standards for determining an appropriate punitive amount, increase insurance costs for all purchasers. Such costs increase the private costs of engaging in socially beneficial activities that carry some risk of harm. Moreover, to the extent that there is justification for considering a defendant's wealth in determining the magnitude of punitive damage assessments, [323] the availability of insurance undermines that justification. The degree of [*75] disutility incurred by individuals possessing the same wealth who are assessed identical amounts of punitive damages will vary with the extent to which the assessment is covered by insurance.

Recognizing that insurance is inconsistent with the goals of punitive damage liability, some courts have nonetheless upheld insurability because of doubts about the effectiveness of punitive damages as a deterrent under present law. [324] But, as the Court of Appeals of New York has observed, that argument "essentially address[es] not whether there should be coverage but whether there should be punitive damages at all." [325] Other courts have manifested concern about the crushing effects of punitive damage assessments "upon business and professional persons, firms and corporations, as well as upon ordinary persons when engaged in a wide variety of activities." [326] Similarly, in vicarious liability cases, courts have reasoned that "innocently condemned" persons should not be prevented from shifting liability through insurance. [327] Again these arguments attack punitive damages, not insurance, because they imply that punitive damages are unfairly assessed in excessive amounts against underserving defendants.

REV_00262420

Some courts have upheld the insurability of punitive damages on the theory that the person against whom they are assessed will experience higher rates in the future and thereby be punished and deterred. [328] That assumption, however, is not an affirmative argument for insurability, but a partial rejoinder to the arguments against it. Moreover, even if it were valid to assume that wrongdoers will be "punished" by higher future rates, [329] the present value of such rates invariably will be less than the amount assessed as punitive damages. [330] To achieve a [*76] given level of punishment or deterrence, therefore, it will be necessary to assess larger punitive damage amounts. Thus, insurability will tend to increase the magnitude of punitive damage awards [331] and thereby increase the costs of both litigation and insurance.

VIII. CONCLUSION

The case for punitive damages is a limited one. Although a number of objectives have been suggested for punitive damages, only two survive scrutiny: retribution and deterrence. Retribution implies desert, which is controlled by the broader principle of fairness. Deterrence seeks to provide a better state of the world through efficient means.

Principles of fairness justify punitive damages only when a wrongful act has been committed with the objective of harming another or when the utility of an act was unequivocally known by the actor to fall far short of the danger created. The vagueness of the criteria for determining punitive damage liability and the attendant discretion accorded to juries extend liability far beyond that justified by fairness. Notice of activities that will be punished is obscured, and juries are left free to exercise biases and indulge in wealth redistribution. Rather than foregoing the punishment of some guilty persons to avoid punishing the innocent, punishment is imposed on more of the latter group.

These effects are exacerbated by the lack of coherent standards for determining the size of punitive damage assessments. Because courts [*77] have recognized the defendant's wealth as a proper factor for jury consideration, that becomes the effective upper boundary of punitive damage awards. Redistributional tendencies thus are reinforced, biases countenanced, and disproportional punishments encouraged. The principle that punitive damages should bear some relationship to the harm actually caused cannot be reconciled with the fairness principle that the punishment should be proportional to the egregiousness of the act. Moreover, the "reasonable relationship" principle is meaningless, because any relationship may be held reasonable. It serves at most to transfer unconstrained discretion from juries to reviewing judges and to disguise the actual bases for decisions.

Vicarious liability and insurability of punitive damages cause detriments to be imposed on unarguably innocent people, in amounts that far exceed, at least in the aggregate, the amount that the guilty actors could have been assessed.

Without better empirical evidence, it is impossible definitively to establish that the present law of punitive damages does not promote efficiency. The most that can be said is that there is no empirical basis for believing that it does and that the intuitive arguments supporting the proposition are weaker than those against it. Punitive damages can be shown to promote efficient levels of deterrence only in those cases where expected liability for compensatory damages is less than expected harm to society or where harm is deliberately caused and the satisfaction obtained by the actor is "illicit." Present punitive damage law extends far beyond these categories, however, and imposes additional costs on society. The uncertainty of the criteria, the lack of standards for determining the magnitude of damage assessments, the use of the defendant's wealth as a variable, the principle that punitive damages must bear a reasonable relationship to the actual harm caused, vicarious liability, and insurability each result in increased litigation costs. Uncertainty causes litigants and courts to consume additional resources. These resources are expended both in cases where punitive damages there are notions of public morality that are widely shared in late twentieth [*5] century America and that these notions justify punishment. [15]

REV_00262421

While the public morality prevailing at other times or in other places might support the idea that one deserves to be punished because of race, beliefs, status, [16] physical attributes, or any number of things, the dominant view in contemporary western society is that the only justification for imposing punishment is that one has unjustifiably or inexcusably committed a wrongful act. [17] Other reasons may support requiring a person to internalize the cost of an activity, to compensate another for a loss, to pay a fine, to pay taxes, or otherwise to incur a detriment. [18] But when the object of imposing the detriment is to punish the recipient, only the commission of a wrongful act will support the notion of desert.

The difficult task of defining a morally wrongful act can be avoided for present purposes because of the principle that one does not deserve to be punished for an act unless it has been authoritatively declared to be wrongful before its commission or unless the actor has otherwise been given prior notice that the act is wrong. [19] This principle relates to the equally important precept that an offender must have [*6] chosen to commit the prohibited act to be deserving of punishment. [20] This in turn requires the offender to have had and exercised some meaningful choice, a requirement that is fulfilled if the offender willed the result or if it was the natural and probable outcome of the act and the offender was aware of that probability. [21]

The principle of desert requires that the punishment be proportional to the wrong in an absolute sense, that is, that "the punishment fit the crime." [22] Punishment that is excessive is not deserved. [23] Desert requires proportionality of punishment in a relative sense as well: greater wrongs should be punished more severely than lesser transgressions. [24] But attempts to determine objectively the severity of punishment that particular wrongs merit present questions over which philosophers, politicians, and jurists cannot agree. [25] Efforts to give substance to the abstract principles of absolute and relative proportionality [*7] have been unavailing in all but the easiest cases. We have resorted, therefore, to a second-best principle, that of specifying in advance the punishment or range of punishments to be imposed for a particular wrong. [26]

Desert is part of the broader principle of fairness, and as such it is constrained by other aspects of fairness. For example, the fairness principle of equal treatment implies that, ceteris paribus, one person does not deserve greater (or lesser) punishment than another for the same wrong. [27] Similarly, the principle of fair procedure requires that the guilt of the offender be established by procedures that reduce "false positive" outcomes -- punishing the innocent -- to a tolerable level. [28]

The foregoing effort at outlining the minimum content of desert purposely is cast at a high level of generality. The principles of desert are notoriously open-textured; even if agreement is reached as to their identity, ample opportunity remains for disagreement over their interpretation and application. Moreover, there are numerous instances in which the principles themselves conflict. For example, expansive interpretation of the principle of fair procedure may constrict the application of the principles of proportionality and equal treatment. [29] Such shortcomings, however, do not pose insuperable obstacles to an appraisal of the law of punitive damages from the standpoint of desert. Obviously the stated principles underlying desert are not uniformly adhered to. But if they approximate a statement of the common understanding of the notion of desert, then deviations are vulnerable to criticism unless justified by other principles. [30]

[*8] Punishment in the form of retribution thus implies desert, which in turn requires that the person being punished must, by a fair procedure, be found to have chosen to commit an act that has been authoritatively declared wrongful. Punishment of proportionally appropriate severity must be prescribed beforehand and applied on an equal basis to all offenders.

REV_00262395

are appropriate and in cases where they are not. The other factors mentioned increase the stakes at risk and, therefore, also increase litigation costs. In tandem, their adverse effects on litigation costs are compounded. Litigation resources are attracted to cases involving large actual damages and wealthy, insured, vicarious defendants.

The same factors have adverse effects on efficient harm avoidance as well. Uncertainty as to the actual liability standard causes some actors [*78] to overinvest and others to underinvest in injury avoidance. The use of knowledge of the potential harm as a basis for punitive damage liability creates a disincentive to investigate the relative harm-creating potential of other products or activities. The lack of coherent standards for determining the magnitude of assessments and the use of defendants' wealth as a factor induce wealthier defendants to overinvest in harm avoidance. The reasonable relationship principle induces overinvestment in avoiding harms that are substantial when they occur, but low in probability. Vicarious liability reduces the deterrent effect of punitive damages on persons who may commit harmful acts and induces employers to incur greater costs in selecting, monitoring, and disciplining employees or to substitute other factors of production for labor. Insurability reduces the deterrent effect of potential liability while spreading the costs of wrongdoing to persons engaged in socially beneficial acts. All of these effects combine to increase the costs of socially beneficial activities.

Not surprisingly, there is substantial concurrence between the arguments from fairness and the efficiency analysis as to acts that should result in punitive damage liability and those that should not. Acts that are inefficient and hence wasteful are likely to be viewed as wrongful and deserving of punishment. Conversely, when there is substantial consensus within a community over what conduct is wrongful, predictability and efficiency goals are enhanced. The weaknesses of the fairness and efficiency arguments supporting the present direction of the law, combined with the strengths of the arguments against it, demonstrate that the current expansive judicial attitude toward punitive damages is decidedly misguided.

GRAPHIC:
FIGURES 1 through 7, no caption

FOOTNOTES:
n1 See, e.g., Becker & Stigler, Law Enforcement, Malfeasance, and Compensation of Enforcers, 3 J. LEGAL STUD. 1 (1974); Landes & Posner, The Private Enforcement of Law, 4 J. LEGAL STUD. 1 (1975); Polinsky, Private Versus Public Enforcement of Fines, 9 J. LEGAL STUD. 105 (1980). See also K. ELZINGA & W. BREIT, THE ANTITRUST PENALTIES: A STUDY IN LAW AND ECONOMICS 81-96, 112-38 (1976) (treble damages and fines as law enforcement devices); Private Alternatives to the Judicial Process, 8 J. LEGAL STUD. 231 (1979) (symposium on private alternatives to adjudication with principal paper by Landes & Posner); Stigler, The Optimum Enforcement of Laws, 78 J. POL. ECON. 526 (1970) (discussing enforcement theory).

n2 See, e.g., Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 26-29 (discussing errors in enforcement as a possible source of uncertainty over legal rules).

n3 R. POSNER, ECONOMIC ANALYSIS OF LAW 122-24, 142-43 (2d ed. 1977).

n4 See, e.g., Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 820, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 389 (1981), where the court stated: "It is precisely because monetary penalties under government regulations prescribing business standards or the criminal law are so inadequate and ineffective as deterrents against a manufacturer and distributor of mass produced defective products that punitive damages must be of sufficient amount to discourage such practices." See also Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 Ill. 2d 172, 186, 384 N.E.2d 353, 359 (1979) (where criminal sanctions "would do little to discourage the practice of retaliatory discharge," punitive damages are appropriate). Cf. Taylor v. Superior Court of Los Angeles, 24 Cal. 3d n5 See K. REDDEN, PUNITIVE DAMAGES § 1.1, at 1 (1980) (discussing the neglect of damages in legal scholarship).

REV_00262422

890, 897, 157 Cal. Rptr. 693, 697, 598 P.2d 854, 857 (1979) (seriousness of the drunk driving problem supports the use of punitive damages as another means of deterrence).

n6 More Punitive Damage Awards, BUS. WK., Jan. 12, 1981, at 86; Rand Corp. Units's 'Startling' Find, Nat'l; Underwriter (Prop. & Cas.), Mar. 6, 1981, at 2, col. 1, 6, col. 1; 'Large-Loss' Claims up 68% Since '75, Nat'l Underwriter (Prop. & Cas.), Sept. 26, 1980.

Reliable empirical data in this area are presently unavailable, although George Priest's study of Chicago verdicts for the Rand Corporation may generate useful data in the near future. A preliminary analysis of that data shows a sharp rise in numbers of punitive damage awards since 1976. Indirect evidence of the rising number of punitive damage awards is provided by the increased incidence of the terms "punitive" and "exemplary" damages in Lexis files. The terms appeared in 0.007% of all civil cases in 1960; 0.011% in 1970; and 0.19% in 1980.

See also In re Merry Shipping, Inc., 650 F.2d 622, 624-26 (5th Cir. 1981) (following the trend in other circuits, punitive damages may be recovered under maritime law in the Fifth Circuit); Baptiste v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. App. 3d 87, 97, 100-02, 164 Cal. Rptr. 789, 794, 795-97 (1980) (recognizing that substantial inroads had been made upon the prior reluctance to impose punitive damages in admiralty cases), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1124 (1981); Rinker v. Ford Motor Co., 567 S.W.2d 655, 669 (Mo. Ct. App. 1978) (acknowledging trend toward allowing punitive damages in products liability cases); Owen, Problems in Assessing Punitive Damages Against Manufacturers of Defective Products, 49 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 3-7 (1982) (discussing the increased availability of punitive damages in products liability cases); Riley, Punitive Damages: When and When Not to Claim, 1 TRIAL DIPL. J. 26, 26 (1978) (suggesting that punitive damages should be sought ordinarily "whenever you have a defendant who is wealthy or has a liability insurance policy with high limits . . . .").

n7 See e.g., Ashland Oil Co. v. Bi Petro, Inc., Nat'l L.J., Nov. 24, 1980, at 10, col. 1 (S.D. Ill. 1980) (jury assessment of $ 300 million in punitive damages set aside by the trial judge); Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 821-24, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 389-91 (1981) (affirming trial judge's reduction of jury awarded punitive damages from $ 125 million to $ 3.5 million; Pring v. Penthouse Magazine, N.Y. Times, Feb. 21, 1981, at 18, col. 4, id. Mar. 28, 1981, at 9, col. 2, id. Apr. 5, 1981, at 8E, col. 3 (D. Wyo. 1981) (jury award of $ 25 million in punitive damages reduced by the trial judge to $ 12.5 million), rev'd on other grounds, No. 81-1480, slip op. (10th Cir. Nov. 5, 1982).

n8 See K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at 15; Ellis, Punitive Damages in Iowa Law: A Critical Assessment, 66 IOWA L. REV. 1005, 1005-06 (1981); Mallor & Roberts, Punitive Damages: Toward A Principled Approach, 31 HASTINGS L.J. 639, 640-42 (1980); Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, 74 MICH. L. REV. 1257, 1261 (1976); Owen, supra note 6, at 6-7. See also J. GHIARDI & J. KIRCHNER, PUNITIVE DAMAGES LAW AND PRACTICE (1981) (a volume devoted almost exclusively to punitive damages).

n9 This Article assumes that punitive damages, being a detriment imposed on an individual by an agency of the state, require justification. Cf. Mundle, Punishment and Desert, in THE PHILOSOPHY OF PUNISHMENT 65, 68 (H. Acton ed. 1969) ("the reason why moralists have felt that punishment requires to be justified . . . [is] that punishment may be said to involve 'deliberate infliction of pain.'"). Hence, this Article also assumes that the burden of persuasion lies with the proponents of imposing punitive damages; if the question of whether imposing punitive damages promotes valid objectives cannot be persuasively answered in the affirmative, the damages are not justifiable and should not be imposed.

n10 See D. DOBBS, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF REMEDIES § 3.9, at 205 (1973); W.

REV_00262423

PROSSER, HANDBOOK OF THE LAW OF TORTS § 2, at 9 (4th ed. 1971); K. REDDEN, supra note 5, at 26-32; RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TORTS § 908 (1977); Ellis, supra note 8, at 1006-13; Owen, supra note 6, at 7-10; Owen, Punitive Damages in Products Liability Litigation, supra note 8, at 1287-97. Cf. T. BATY, VICARIOUS LIABILITY 148 (1916) (any legal doctrine accounted for on numerous grounds "may reasonably be suspected of resting on no very firm basis in policy"). But cf. P. ATIYAH, VICARIOUS LIABILITY IN THE LAW OF TORTS 15 (1967) (the combined effect of numerous justifications may be "overwhelming," even when no single justification by itself, is adequate). An additional purpose of punitive damages suggested by one commentator is revenge. Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 521-22 (1957).

n11 Lewis, The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment, 6 RES JUDICATAE 224, 225 (1952) ("[T]he concept of Desert is the only connecting link between punishment and justice."). See also Rawls, Two Concepts of Rules, 1 PHIL. REV. 3, 4 (1955) ("What we may call the retributive view is that punishment is justified on the grounds that wrongdoing merits punishment."). There has been a recent resurgence of philosophical interest in constructing deontological (nonconsequential) theories of rights, reminiscent of the natural rights theories of the Enlightenment. See, e.g., R. DWORKIN, TAKING RIGHTS SERIOUSLY (1977); C. FRIED, RIGHT AND WRONG (1978); A. GEWIRTH, REASON AND MORALITY (1978); R. NOZICK, ANARCHY, STATE, AND UTOPIA (1974); J. RAWLS, A THEORY OF JUSTICE (1971); Perspectives on Rights, 13 GA. L. REV. 1117 (1979). There has been a corresponding shift in theories of punishment, favoring retribution and de-emphasizing rehabilitation. F. ALLEN, THE DECLINE OF THE REHABILITATIVE IDEAL (1981); N. MORRIS, THE FUTURE OF IMPRISONMENT 14 (1974); Cederblom, Introduction to JUSTICE AND PUNISHMENT at 1 (J. Cedarblom & W. Blizek eds. 1977).

n12 Gryc v. Dayton-Hudson Corp., 297 N.W.2d 727, 741 (Minn. 1980) (punitive damages imposed even though manufacturer had ceased production of dangerous product, in order to deter future misconduct and "to punish past misconduct"), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 921 (1980); Wussow v. Commercial Mechanisms, Inc., 97 Wis. 2d 136, 155-56, 293 N.W.2d 897, 907 (1980) (punishment of past conduct is a sufficient basis for assessing punitive damages).

n13 For example, one can empirically determine on whom a sanction would ultimately fall and the fundamental nature of conventional morality.

n14 When constructing a comprehensive moral theory, one must confront such philosophically important questions as whether moral precepts are absolute or dependent on circumstance, whether they are theologically based, innate in nature or intuitive, and whether they are ultimately founded on perceptions of long-term consequences. For an analysis of anthropological evidence supporting a social basis for retribution, see Posner, Retribution and Related Concepts of Punishment, 9 J. LEGAL STUD. 71 (1980).

n15 The approach taken here is similar to that taken by Professor Greenawalt in analyzing the moral context of the "right of silence." See Greenawalt, Silence as a Moral and Constitutional Right, 23 WM. & MARY L. REV. 15, 18-19 (1981). See also Barry, Book Review, 88 YALE L.J. 629, 656 (1979) ("the value of fairness calls for doing good to others insofar as there exists widely practiced social norms that one should do that kind of good"). But cf. Allen, The Law as a Path to the World, 77 MICH. L. REV. 157, 163 (1978) (cautioning that "ambiguity, contradiction, conflict of social purpose, compromise, and incoherence" inherently characterize modern day discussions of moral culpability).

n16 See, e.g., Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660, 666 (1962) (California statutory offense of being a narcotics addict held to be a status offense in violation of the eighth amendment).

REV_00262424

n17 Mundle, supra note 9, at 65, 71 (a moral offense is an essential element of retributive theory); Quinton, On Punishment, in THE PHILOSOPHY OF PUNISHMENT 56, 58 (H. Acton ed. 1969) (retributivist thesis is that only the guilty may be punished).

n18 The furtherance of such social objectives as minimizing costs, avoiding free riding or spreading losses may entail imposing a detriment on some or all members of a society, but the resulting detriments would not be punishments.

n19 This notion is captured by the maxim, nullum crimen, nulla poena, sine lege, "without a law, there is no crime and no punishment," also known as the "principle of legality." See J. HALL, GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW 27-55 (2d ed. 1960); S. KADISH & M. PAULSEN, CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS PROCESSES 167-201 (3d ed. 1975 & Supp. 1979). See also Mabbot, Punishment, in THE PHILOSOPHY OF PUNISHMENT 39, 49 (H. Acton ed. 1969) ("[p]unishment is a corollary of law-breaking"); Mundle, supra note 9, at 78-79 (punishment is justified only if the law is broken). The principle has been given constitutional status under the "void for vagueness" principle. See, e.g., Bouie v. City of Columbia, 378 U.S. 347, 362-63 (1964). But see Nash v. United States, 229 U.S. 373, 376-78 (1912) (upholding the Sherman Act prohibitions against conspiracies in restraint of trade and conspiracies to monopolize trade). See generally Note, The Void-for-Vagueness Doctrine in the Supreme Court, 109 U. PA. L. REV. 67 (1960) (discussing the use of vagueness as a vehicle for achieving other judicial ends). Cf. Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 Ill. 2d 172, 188-89, 384 N.E.2d 353, 360 (1979) (overturning punitive damage award in case recognizing a novel cause of action, where defendant had no reason to believe such conduct was actionable).

n20 Allen, supra note 15, at 161; Kneale, The Responsibility of Criminals, in THE PHILOSOPHY OF PUNISHMENT 172, 185 (H. Acton ed. 1969). See also O.W. HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 107-10 (1881) (no liability under tort law for unintentional, unforseeable injury).

n21 See, e.g., MODEL PENAL CODE § 2.02(2)-(3) (Proposed Official Draft 1962) (unless otherwise specified, culpability requires that a person act purposely, knowingly, or recklessly; recklessly defined as "consciously disregard[ing] a substantial and unjustifiable risk").

n22 Cf. W. GILBERT, The Mikado or The Town of Titipu, in THE MIKADO AND OTHER PLAYS 42 (1917):

My object all sublime --
I shall achieve in time -- To let the punishment fit the crime

n23 See N. MORRIS, supra note 11, at 59-61. Morris argues for a "principle of parsimony," under which "the least restrictive (punitive) sanction necessary to achieve defined social purposes should be imposed." Id. at 59. He contends that this principle "is utilitarian and humanitarian . . . since any punitive suffering beyond societal need is . . . what defines cruelty." Id. at 61. See also Mundle, supra note 9, at 71, 72 (suffering imposed ought to be proportionate to offense); Wittman, Two Views of Procedure, 3 J. LEGAL STUD. 249, 252 (1974) (the law reflects commonly held attitudes toward punishment deserved for offenses of differing gravity). See generally S. KADISH & M. PAULSEN, supra note 19, at 155-67 (cases and authorities discussing the proportionality requirement). Excessive punishment may also be "cruel and unusual" and thereby offend the eighth amendment. U.S. CONST. amend. VIII.

n24 A. EWING, THE MORALITY OF PUNISHMENT 41 (1929) ("If we are sure that a crime deserves a punishment just because it is a crime, we are equally sure that a decidedly worse crime deserves a severer punishment just because it is worse."); Wittman, supra note 23, at 254 ("The more serious the crime, the greater the deserved punishment."). H.L.A. Hart refers to this principle as "retribution in distribution." H.L.A. HART, punishment and responsibility/ 9, 25 (1968).

REV_00262425

n25 See generally S. KADISH & M. PAULSEN, supra note 19, at 155-67 (discussion of the justifications for making the degree of punishment fit the crime); A. EWING, supra note 24, at 15 (discussing Kant's answer to the proportionality problem); Mabbot, supra note 23, at 50 (crimes and punishment can be graded on a rough scale).

n26 But see Grimshaw v. Ford Motor Co., 119 Cal. App. 3d 757, 810, 174 Cal. Rptr. 348, 382-83 (1981); Kelsay v. Motorola, Inc., 74 Ill. 2d 172, 186-87, 384 N.E.2d 353, 359 (1979). In both cases, courts held that low penalties prescribed by the legislatures for safety statute violations necessitated additional penalties in the form of punitive damages.

n27 Constitutional recognition of this principle can be found in the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. U.S. CONST. amend. XIV. Some retributivists have argued, however, in the face of uneven application of the death penalty, that "it is better that some receive their just deserts . . . than that none do." Lempert, Desert and Deterrence: An Assessment of the Moral Bases of the Case for Capital Punishment, 79 MICH. L. REV. 1177, 1178-79 (1981). See also M. FRANKEL, CRIMINAL SENTENCES passim (1973) (criticism of the criminal justice system for the broad discretion allowed in sentencing).

n28 See, e.g., U.S. CONST. amends. V, XIV. Cf. P. ARANSON, AMERICAN GOVERNMENT: STRATEGY AND CHOICE 530-31 (1981) (procedural protections in criminal cases reflect concern over deadweight losses resulting from imprisonment); R. POSNER, supra note 2, at 333-34 (economic justification for procedural safeguards).

n29 Thus, application of the exclusionary rule in criminal cases satisfies the principle of fair procedure at the expense of proportionality and equal treatment.

n30 The most commonly adopted alternative principle is deterrence. See, e.g., United States v. Park, 421 U.S. 658, 670-73 (1975) (corporate officers may be held criminally liable under some circumstances without proof of conscious wrongdoing); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 259-60 (1952) (recognizing the constitutionality of crimes without intent where they "serve as an effective means of regulation"); Allen, The Morality of Means: Three Problems in Criminal Sanctions, 42 U. PITT. L. REV. 737, 747 (1981) ("the defense of strict liability is made to rest on the argument of deterrence"). See also Atlas Roofing Co. v. Occupational Safety & Health Review Comm'n, 518 F.2d 990, 1000-11 (5th Cir. 1975) ("civil penalty" assessed by administrative agency did not require the procedural protections required in criminal prosecutions), aff'd on other grounds, 430 U.S. 442 (1977); N. MORRIS & C. HOWARD, STUDIES IN CRIMINAL LAW 197, 198-99 (1964) (strict criminal responsibility is based on the need for "the highest degree of care to be exercised by those who follow certain pursuits").

n31 I pass over the possibility that society may be attempting to deter wrongdoing without regard to the effects of the wrongdoing, that is, deterring wrongdoing for its own sake.

n32 "[I]t is never worth spending more on enforcement than the benefits from deterrence . . . ." Polinsky, supra note 1, at 112. See also Mundle, supra note 9, at 68 (under utilitarian principles, justification of punishment depends on the net value of all consequences); Quinton, supra note 17, at 61 ("[u]tilitarialism holds that punishment must always be justified by the value of its consequences").

n33 The efficiency criterion used here is that adopted by Posner: "'Efficiency' . . . means exploiting economic resources in such a way that human satisfaction as measured by aggregate consumer willingness to pay for goods and services is maximized." R. POSNER, supra note 3, at 4. See also Brown, Toward an Economic Theory of Liability, 2 J. LEGAL

REV_00262426

STUD. 323, 325 (1974) (defining social optimum as the combination of avoidance measures which minimizes the cost of controls and the cost of accidents); Tullock, Negligence Again, 1 INT'L REV. L. & ECON. 51, 51 (1981) (pareto optimality occurs when resources invested in prevention and cost of accidents are minimized). In making an efficiency calculation, it is also necessary to include the procedural costs of imposing a detriment on defendants. See Stigler, supra note 1, at 531-32.

n34 This proposition, however, assumes that the probability of damages being assessed is unity. In the real world it is invariably less. In the ordinary case, the principal reason it is less is that victims incur costs in recovering damages. See Schwartz & Tullock, The Costs of a Legal System, 4 J. LEGAL STUD. 75, 78-79 (1972) (discussing fixed enforcement costs, monitoring costs, and communication costs). But costs are imposed on defendants as well, including such nonlitigation costs as loss of goodwill from attendant undesirable publicity. Therefore, it seems reasonable to assume that the difference between the actual probability of damages being assessed (<1.0) and the ideal probability (=1.0) is offset in the typical case by the defendant's detriment being greater than the amount of damages assessed. Cf. id. at 77 (expected costs to defendant of proceedings determining liability act as a deterrent); Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 31 (probability of "apprehension and conviction" approaches unity in typical tort cases).

n35 The effort to maintain peace played a major role in the development of legal institutions. Holdsworth characterized the suppression of self-help as "[t]he first business of the law, and more especially of the law of crime and tort." 3 W. HOLDSWORTH, HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 278 (1923). Pound observed that in early law a defendant who injured a plaintiff "aroused in the injured person a desire for vengeance which would lead to private war and disturbance of the peace of society. One who thus endangered the general security [had to] buy off the desire for vengeance he had awakened." R. POUND, JUSTICE ACCORDING TO LAW 10 (1951). Discouragement of private enforcement occasionally has been cited as an express objective of punitive damages. See, e.g., Scott v. Plante, 641 F.2d 117, 135 (3d Cir. 1981), vacated and remanded on other grounds, 102 S. Ct. 3474, 73 L.Ed. 2d 1362 (1982). See also A. EWING, supra note 24, at 71 ("[Vindictive] desires . . . ought to be satisfied to some extent by State punishment, not because the vindictive pleasure is an end-in-itself, but in order to avert the satisfaction of these desires by illegal means in the absence of legal.").

n36 "Bribery" in this context is nonpejorative. See, e.g., G. CALABRESI, THE COSTS OF ACCIDENTS 135 n.2 (1970) (incentive effect of liability is a bribe in the sense that it provides a "legitimate inducement"); Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 43 (tort settlement is "perfectly lawful bribery").

n37 The law rewards those who engage in private law enforcement by offering a legitimate "bribe." See supra note 36.

n38 Cf. Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 31, 42 (concluding that public enforcement may produce a more efficient outcome than private enforcement in situations where the wrongdoer lacks resources).

n39 Two states, Connecticut and Michigan, regard compensation for otherwise uncompensable losses or attorneys' fees as the primary objective of punitive damages. Triangle Sheet Metal Works, Inc. v. Silver, 154 Conn. 116, 127, 222 A.2d 220, 225 (1966); Peisner v. Detroit Free Press, 68 Mich. App. 360, 371, 242 N.W.2d 775, 780 (1976). Georgia treats "compensation for wounded feelings of the plaintiff" as one of its objectives. GA. CODE ANN. § 105-2002 (1968). New Hampshire does not allow punitive damages per se but does allow compensatory damages to be increased to reflect aggravating circumstances. Vratsenes v. N.H. Auto, Inc., 112 N.H. 71, 72-73, 289 A.2d 66, 67-68 (1972).

REV_00262427

n40 See, e.g., Katko v. Briney, 183 N.W.2d 657, 662 (Iowa 1971) (plaintiff injured by spring gun while breaking into defendants' premises with intent to steal was not barred from recovering punitive damages from defendants).

n41 Cf. Becker & Stigler, supra note 1, at 13-16 (concluding that, with proper economic inducements, private law enforcement can produce optimal results); Landes & Posner, supra note 1, at 23 (use of "bounty" to induce efficient private enforcement). But cf. Polinsky, supra note 1, at 107 (public enforcement of fines leads to the socially optimal result).

n42 This appears to be the role of attorneys' fees in Connecticut and uncompensable losses in Michigan. See Triangle Sheet Metal Works, Inc. v. Silver, 154 Conn. 116, 127, 222 A.2d 220, 225 (1966); Hayes-Albion Corp. v. Kuberski, 108 Mich. App. 642, 656-57, 311 N.W.2d 122, 129 (1981). But see Connecticut Products Liability Act, 1979 Conn. Acts 483 § 8 (Reg. Sess.) (punitive damages may be awarded up to "an amount equal to twice the [compensatory] damages awarded to plaintiff" if injury resulted from "seller's reckless disregard for the safety of product users").

n43 See, e.g., Rookes v. Barnard, [1964] A.C. 1129, 1221; 1 T. SEDGWICK, A TREATISE ON THE MEASURE OF DAMAGES §§ 348-352 (9th ed. 1912); Ellis, supra note 8, at 1006-07; Friedman, Punitive Damages in Tort, 48 CANADIAN B. REV. 373, 374-78 (1970); Rice, Exemplary Damages in Private Consumer Actions, 55 IOWA L. REV. 307, 308-12 (1969); Sullivan, Punitive Damages in the Law of Contract: The Reality and the Illusion of Legal Change, 61 MINN. L. REV. 207, 208-14 (1977); Note, Exemplary Damages in the Law of Torts, 70 HARV. L. REV. 517, 518-20 (1957).

n44 Earlier examples can be found in the Old Testament and in Roman Law. See K. REDDEN, supra note 5, § 2.2, at 24-25.

n45 Jury misconduct previously had been dealt with through the process of attaint, whereby a second jury was convened to inquire into the conduct of the first. If it found the original verdict improper, it could set aside the verdict and fine the members of the original jury. By the seventeenth century, however, this cumbersome procedure had fallen into disuse. See T. PLUCKNETT, A CONCISE HISTORY OF THE COMMON LAW 1-31 (5th ed. 1956); Washington, Damages in Contract at Common Law, 47 LAW Q. REV. 345, 349-50 (1931). The system of attaint ceased to make sense when jurors ceased to be witnesses of fact and became evaluators of evidence. See S. MILSOM, HISTORICAL FOUNDATIONS OF THE COMMON LAW 366 (1969); 1 W. HOLDSWORTH, HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW 341-42 (3d ed. 1922).

n46 Hawkins v. Sciet, 81 Eng. Rep. 1099, 1099 (K.B. 1622).

n47 Id. In Bonham v. Sturton, 73 Eng. Rep. 230, 230 (K.B. 1554), the court denied that it had the authority to "mitigate" damages in an action for slander in which the jury had awarded 500 marks to plaintiff.

n48 82 Eng. Rep. 867, 867 (Banc. Sup. 1655).

n49 Townsend v. Hughes, 86 Eng. Rep. 994, 994-95 (C.P. 1649).

n50 Ash v. Ash, 90 Eng. Rep. 526, 526 (K.B. 1701).

n51 See, e.g., Chambers v. Robinson, 93 Eng. Rep. 787, 788 (K.B. 1726) (asserting power to order new trial where damages excessive); Beardmore v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 790, 793 (C.P. 1764) (Chambers criticized; power to order new trial doubted unless damages "monstrous and enormous"); Fabrigas v. Mostyn, 96 Eng. Rep. 549, 549 (C.P. 1773) (because damages are difficult to measure, deference to jury unless award is monstrous and excessive); Ducker v. Wood, 99 Eng. Rep. 1092, 1092 (K.B. 1786) (court may grant new trial in any case where damages are excessive); Duberley v. Gunning, 100 Eng. Rep. 1226, 1226 (K.B. 1792) (courts have general power to order new trial if damages are excessive, but ought not to exercise it where there are no "criteria by which the propriety of the damages given may be estimated").

REV_00262428

n52 Sharpe v. Brice, 96 Eng. Rep. 557, 557 (C.P. 1774).

n53 Pleydell v. Earl of Dorchester, 101 Eng. Rep. 1115, 1115 (K.B. 1798).

n54 Cf. Bonham v. Sturton, 73 Eng. Rep. 230, 230 (K.B. 1554) (court may not disturb verdict for slander on grounds of excessiveness; cases involving mayhem distinguished because wound "was a matter apparent to the Court, and the offense and trespass was carried about with the person"); Beardmore v. Carrington, 95 Eng. Rep. 790, 792 (K.B. 1764) (damages may be lessened or increased "upon view of plaintiff's mayhem").

n55 See, e.g., Duberley v. Gunning, 100 Eng. Rep. 1226, 1228 (K.B. 1792) (Chief Justice Kenyan left undisturbed a jury award he thought excessive so as not to substitute his opinion for that of the jury). See also Sullivan, supra note 43, at 214:

The early decisions show that the acceptance of punitive damages in English law was not the product of any deliberate judicial design. Some courts simply observed that in tort actions large verdicts would be sustained because the character of tort rules allowed greater jury discretion. Only in the later cases such as [Merest v. Harvey, 128 Eng. Rep. 761 (C.P. 1814)] did courts begin to justify large tort awards which had no pecuniary basis by reference to the defendant's egregious conduct or the principle that such judgments might serve as warning symbols to potential tortfeasors. (citations omitted).
See also 1 T. SEDGWICK, supra note 43, at § 350, at 689 ("[N]othing was further from the idea of the judges than that they were establishing a new doctrine . . . .").

n56 98 Eng. Rep. 489 (C.P. 1763).

n57 Id. at 498-99.

n58 Id. at 499.

n59 95 Eng. Rep. 768 (C.P. 1763).

n60 Id. at 769. This appears to be the first judicial use of the term "exemplary damages."

n61 See, e.g., Wood v. Gunston, 82 Eng. Rep. 867 (Banc. Sup. 1655); Townsend v. Hughes, 86 Eng. Rep. 994 (C.P. 1677).

n62 See, e.g., Tullidge v. Wade, 95 Eng. Rep. 909 (C.P. 1769).

n63 See, e.g., Benson v. Frederick, 97 Eng. Rep. 1130 (K.B. 1766); Ash v. Ash, 90 Eng. Rep. 526 (K.B. 1701); Grey v. Grant, 95 Eng. Rep. 794 (C.P. 1764).

n64 See, e.g., Duberley v. Gunning, 100 Eng. Rep. 1226 (K.B. 1792). Subsequently, the English courts decided that punitive damages were not available in actions for adultery (criminal conversation). Butterworth v. Butterworth & Englefield, 1920 P. 126; A. OGUS, THE LAW OF DAMAGES 29 n.6 (1973).

n65 See, e.g., Hewlett v. Cruchley, 128 Eng. Rep. 696 (K.B. 1813); Leith v. Pope, 96 Eng. Rep. 777 (C.P. 1780); Chambers v. Robinson, 93 Eng. Rep. 787 (K.B. 1726).

REV_00262429

Retribution is backward-looking (ex post) and provides a complete reason for imposing a detriment.

B. DETERRENCE AND OTHER INSTRUMENTAL OBJECTIVES

The next four stated objects of punitive damages -- deterring the defendant, deterring others, preserving the peace, and inducing private law enforcement -- are all instrumental; the good sought is separate from the detriment imposed on the defendant. The answer they provide (or seem to provide) to the question, "Why should X be punished?" is that a better world will be brought about. [31] They are forward looking (ex ante) and, therefore, require us to address questions not about desert, but about effectiveness. They form hypotheses that can be empirically tested.

If the purpose of punitive damages is to bring about a better world by punishing defendants, one must consider the costs of imposing that punishment. Hence, instrumental objectives require an assessment of the state of the world that will result net of the costs of imposing punishment [32] and of the detrimental incentives it creates. The first two instrumental objectives, deterring the defendant and deterring others, require an assessment of whether the costs incurred by imposing a detriment on a defendant will be offset by a reduction in the expected losses to society from future harmful acts. In other words, does imposing [*9] a detriment on the defendant promote the efficient use of society's resources? [33] Compensatory damages ordinarily would appear to be sufficient to promote efficient levels of deterrence. [34] Accordingly, deterrence objectives justify imposing punitive damages only in cases where compensatory damages alone produce less than optimal deterrence.

The third instrumental objective -- preserving the peace -- raises a similar but narrower issue: whether imposing a detriment on defendants, by channelling more disputes into the courts, [35] will result in a reduction in the social costs ("breach of the peace") associated with self-help. The outcome of this inquiry depends in part on whether victims are induced to forego private vengeance by the satisfaction they gain from (1) the official declaration that they were wronged by the defendant (vindication); (2) the knowledge that the defendant has been made to suffer a detriment (vengeance); or (3) the wealth that is transferred [*10] to them (bribery). [36]

The fourth instrumental objective -- inducing private law enforcement -- is premised on the wealth incentive alone. [37] It provides an argument for rewarding plaintiffs, but it provides no justification for imposing a detriment on defendants. It cannot alone answer the question, "Why should X be punished?" Inducing private law enforcement is thus a dependent purpose at best. It presupposes that imposing a detriment on defendants is warranted by desert, deterrence, or some other consideration. It does raise a question that lies below the surface of all the other arguments offered in favor of punitive damages: whether assessing punitive damages against a defendant and awarding them to a plaintiff in a private action is the most efficacious strategy for achieving the objective sought, be it retribution, deterrence, preserving the peace, or something else. It would not be surprising, of course, if we arrived at different answers depending on the circumstances of any particular case. [38]

C. INCOMPLETE JUSTIFICATIONS

The two remaining justifications -- compensating victims for otherwise uncompensated injuries and paying plaintiffs' attorneys' fees -- likewise cannot answer the question "Why should X be punished?" [39] Of course, the presence of losses not compensable by reparative damages may explain why reparative damages alone do not achieve optimal levels of deterrence, and the prospect of recovering attorneys' fees may induce plaintiffs to undertake private law enforcement. These justifications might be answers to the question, "Why should Y be benefitted?" but they do not tell us why one plaintiff should receive compensation [*11] for otherwise uncompensable losses or reimbursement of attorneys' fees and another plaintiff should not. The answer to that question requires either an inquiry into the relative entitlements of plaintiffs (a subject usually deemed not material to punitive damage assessments), [40] an inquiry into the nature and extent of the harm that a defendant has done (which resurrects the issues of desert and deterrence), or an instrumental analysis of whether benefiting plaintiffs would induce them to engage in private law enforcement. [41] Alternatively, compensating some plaintiffs for otherwise uncompensable losses or attorneys' fees may be viewed, not as justification for, but as a byproduct of punitive damages. If wealth is taken from a defendant to achieve retribution or deterrence or for other reasons, we must do something with the money. It could be destroyed as is often done with confiscated contraband, deposited in the public treasury as are fines, donated to an object of our benevolence, or randomly distributed. That none of these uses has been chosen may reflect society's decision that the best use of the wealth acquired through punitive damages -- the use that will result in the greatest increase in welfare, utility, or happiness -- is to compensate plaintiffs for losses or attorneys' fees. On the other hand, the compensation of otherwise uncompensable losses and the payment of attorneys' fees may be measures for calculating the size of punitive damage awards, once it has been determined (based on other factors) that some award is appropriate. [42]

REV_00262396

The preceding discussion implies that the seven justifications offered for punitive damages can be reduced to two: (1) that wrongdoers deserve punishment, beyond that provided by reparative damages; and (2) that imposing a detriment on defendants promotes efficiency by deterring loss-creating conduct. Three of the stated justifications -- inducing private enforcement, compensating victims for uncompensable losses, and compensating plaintiffs for attorneys' fees -- provide incomplete [*12] explanations for punitive damages. They are either premised on one of the two primary justifications or they perform alternative functions such as providing "just compensation," establishing a basis for the distribution of wealth extracted from defendants, or supplying a measure for calculating damage assessments.

II. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The origin of punitive damages in Anglo-American law is well documented. [43] It is worth repeating, however, to determine whether the underlying justifications for punitive damages set forth in the preceding Section can explain their origin.

The common law authority for courts to award punitive damages originated in eighteenth-century England, [44] in cases in which defendants challenged and sought to have set aside large, arguably excessive, jury verdicts. [45] The first reported case in which a court implicitly recognized the power to set aside a jury verdict occurred in 1622 when counsel for a losing defendant in an action for slander nearly persuaded the Court of King's Bench to reduce a jury verdict. [46] Upon reflection, however, the court let the verdict stand on the ground that the jury knew better ("mieux conusant") the quality and estates of the parties and the damage that the plaintiff had sustained from the defendant's disgraceful act. [47] In 1655, the "Supreme Bench," which replaced the King's Bench during the Interregnum, acceded to the apparently novel suggestion that an excessive jury verdict should be set [*13] aside and a new trial ordered in Wood v. Gunston, [48] another slander suit. After the Restoration, however, courts were slow to accept the authority to override jury discretion, and in a subsequent slander case in which a jury had awarded a plaintiff £ 4,000, Chief Justice North of the Court of Common Pleas held that a court could not interfere with a jury's power to determine damage awards. [49] But before the end of the century, the Court of King's Bench set aside a £ 2,000 verdict in favor of a daughter against her mother, on the curious ground that the "jury were very shy of giving a reason of their verdict." [50]

Throughout the eighteenth century and into the nineteenth, the English courts continued to debate whether they had the authority to interfere with a jury's verdict and whether it was appropriate to do so when a plaintiff's losses were not readily calculable. [51] The cases in which defendants sought to set aside large verdicts -- and there were increasing numbers of them -- are important in two respects. First, they bring to light the types of cases in which juries most frequently awarded amounts unrelated to tangible losses. Second, they compelled courts, once they had accepted the notion that it was within their power to question jury decisions, to consider and articulate the bases for upholding or setting aside such verdicts. The Court of Common Pleas observed in 1780 that the measure of damages in contract cases is generally a matter of account that could be reviewed and verified. [52] Similarly, tort cases involving only the destruction of property presented few difficulties because the deterioration of the property itself provided a workable measure of damages. [53] Even cases of mayhem provided sensorily observable evidence and thus gave the appearance of being susceptible to objective monetary valuation. [54]

REV_00262397

[*14] The valuing of intangible losses, on the other hand, presented perplexing difficulties, which some judges sought to avoid by simply deferring to jury discretion. [55] Judicial deference, however, gradually gave way under the persistent importunities from defendants' counsel to set aside allegedly excessive damage awards. This inexorable pressure to find some rational basis for awards of hundreds or thousands of pounds in cases in which no tangible loss had occurred resulted in judicial recognition that damage awards not only compensate the injured but also punish wrongdoers and deter wrongdoing.

The suggestion that the punitive and deterrent purposes of damage awards could be separated from their compensatory function first received judicial expression in two cases where damages were sought against agents of the Secretary of State for illegal searches and seizures under general warrants. In Wilkes v. Wood, [56] Lord Chief Justice Pratt announced his view that:

[A] jury have it in their power to give damages for more than the injury received. Damages are designed not only as a satisfaction to the injured person, but likewise as a punishment to the guilty, to deter from any such proceeding for the future, and as a proof of the detestation of the jury to the action itself. [57]

The jury awarded the plaintiff £ 1,000. [58] In Huckle v. Money, [59] a related case in which a £ 300 verdict was unsuccessfully challenged as excessive, Chief Justice Pratt stated that "the jury have done right in giving exemplary damages." [60]

The reported cases from roughly the first quarter of the seventeenth century through the first quarter of the nineteenth century, in [*15] which juries awarded damages in large amounts unrelated to tangible loss, fell into a variety of legal categories. They included cases of slander, [61] seduction, [62] assault and battery in humiliating circumstances, [63] criminal conversation, [64] malicious prosecution, [65] illegal intrusion into private dwellings and seizure of private papers, [66] trespass onto private land in an offensive manner, [67] and false imprisonment. [68] Diverse as they may have been, all of these cases share one common attribute: they involved acts that resulted in affronts to the honor of the victims. The defendants' acts were insults that were likely to provoke reactions of outrage.

Insult provided a sufficient basis for awarding exemplary damages for two reasons. First, affronts to honor cause a loss of welfare on the part of the dishonored. "Honour is the value of a person in his own eyes," as well as "in the eyes of his society." [69] Honor may be less highly esteemed in contemporary western society, but it was of compelling importance in the status-oriented society that typified England well into the nineteenth century. Hence, as Maitland observed of the thirteenth century, "shame was keenly felt." [70] Not surprisingly, therefore, from a very early date plaintiffs demanded and courts awarded "compensation, not only for the damages (damnum) but also for the shame (huntage, hontage, dedecus, pudor, vituperium) that [had] been done." [71]

[*16] Many of the judicial opinions out of which the concept of exemplary or punitive damages arose explicitly reflect the belief that the welfare losses in insult cases must be redressed if plaintiffs are to be fully compensated and defendants are to bear the social costs of their acts. For example, in Grey v. Grant, [72] the Court of Common Pleas upheld a £ 200 jury verdict for a battery that caused no apparent physical harm, because "the plaintiff [had] been used unlike a gentleman by the defendant in striking him, withholding his property and insisting upon his privilege." [73] An unlawful whipping administered to a militiaman justified a £ 150 verdict in Benson v. Frederick, [74] where "the man, though not much hurt indeed, was scandalized and disgraced by such a punishment." [75] The seduction of a plaintiff's daughter was held to merit a £ 50 award in Tullidge v. Wade, [76] because the plaintiff had "received this insult in his own house." [77] And the illegal search of a plaintiff's house by customs officers, who "did little or no damage," was nevertheless found to justify a £ 100 damage award in Bruce v. Rawlins, [78] because "suspicion of having run-goods in his house [was] very injurious" to the plaintiff. [79]

REV_00262398

The recognition of insult as a compensable injury led courts to consider the personal characteristics of the parties. In Huckle v. Money, [80] the court observed that, "in cases of criminal conversation, battery, imprisonment, slander, malicious prosecutions &c. the state, degree, quality, trade or profession of the party injured, as well as of the person who did the injury, must be and generally are, considered by a jury in giving damages." [81] Insult also explains the importance given to intent and motive in cases involving intangible loss. "[I] ntention is a necessary component of the competition for honour expressed in the challenge; the essence of an affront is that another should dare to affront one." [82] Thus, in Sears v. Lyons, [83] a case in which the defendant had scattered poisoned barley on his own land and the plaintiff's adjoining [*17] land (with the consequent death of some of the plaintiff's poultry), the jury was instructed that it "might consider not only the mere pecuniary damage sustained by the plaintiff, but also the intention with which the fact had been done, whether for insult or injury." [84] Similarly, a jury was instructed in a later case, Forde v. Skinner, [85] that cutting off the hair of female paupers in a poor house against their will constituted a trespass under any circumstances; but if done, not for hygienic purposes, but "with the malicious intent imputed [by the evidence] of 'taking down their pride,' . . . that will be an aggravation and ought to increase the damages." [86]

The second characteristic of insult cases that makes exemplary damages seem appropriate is that they evoke a compelling desire for redress or satisfaction on the part of the victim, a desire often lacking in cases of physical -- even disabling -- injury not associated with insult. [87] Indeed, this vindictive reaction may be endemic to the notion of honor, for an "affront is a dishonour . . . [that] creates a situation in which the honour of the affronted person is in jeopardy and requires 'satisfaction' if it is to return to its normal condition." [88]

The desire for revenge or satisfaction leads to disorder if the victim resorts to self-help rather than to the judicial process. Avoidance of the social disorder caused by duels, feuds, and the more extreme forms of self-help that historians denominated "bastard feudalism," [89] was a major influence in the establishment and maintenance of an effective judicial mechanism and a motivating force behind the continuing efforts of the Crown to channel disputes into officially countenanced processes. Reactions to affronts proved especially intractable when victims perceived that "to have recourse to justice was to abnegate one's claim to settle one's debts of honour for oneself, the only way in which they can [*18] be settled. . . ." [90] Thus, Coke argued early in the seventeenth century that libel against a private person deserves a severe punishment, for although the libel be made against one, yet it incites all those of the same family, kindred, or society to revenge, and so tends per consequens to quarrels and breach of the peace, and it may be the cause of shedding of blood, and of great inconvenience. . . . [91]

Holdsworth found that in cases of defamation against private persons, the Court of Star Chamber not only punished defendants, but often gave large damage awards to victims in contrast to their practice regarding other offenses. [92] Punishing personal defamation was justified on the ground that libels "tended to provoke breaches of the peace." [93] "Indeed," Holdsworth concluded, "it was clearly necessary for the Star Chamber thus to punish libels against private persons, if it was to succeed in its attempt to put down duelling." [94]

REV_00262399

Similar concerns are echoed in eighteenth and early nineteenth century cases in which courts assessed large damage awards for insulting acts. In Grey v. Grant, [95] the court observed that "when a blow is given by one gentleman to another, a challenge and death may ensue, and therefore the jury have done right in giving exemplary damages" for a battery that caused no physical injury. [96] The court added that insulting acts tend "to provoke [the victim] to seek his revenge in another way than by law, and therefore we think the [£ 200] damages are not excessive." [97] In a later case, a £ 500 verdict was upheld when an inebriated defendant, disregarding "every principle which actuates the conduct of a gentleman," forced himself on plaintiff's hunting party. [98] The court concluded, "It goes to prevent the practice of duelling, if juries are permitted to punish insult by exemplary damages." [99]

The justifications for punitive damages set forth in Section I are consistent with the factual setting of the cases out of which the doctrine arose. With few exceptions, [100] the question whether a defendant deserved [*19] punishment under the prevailing standards of desert was settled once the factual issues were resolved. Almost all of the early cases involved acts that were not only wrong but likely to be adjudged "outrageous" by social consensus. That consensus provided sufficient notice to potential offenders, at least according to the public morality of the period, to support a conclusion that the actor chose to commit a wrongful act, for which punishment likely would follow. That conclusion was reinforced by the intentional nature of the defendants' acts.

The more interesting question is whether the objective of achieving an efficient level of deterrence was promoted in the early cases. Although the lawyers, judges, and jurors of the period did not speak or necessarily think in terms of efficiency, [101] they recognized that damage awards simultaneously compensate the injured and punish the defendant, and that the anticipated detriment provided a disincentive to other wrongdoers. They also recognized that if the prevailing legal standards for measuring damages -- which did not ordinarily include compensation for wounded feelings -- were applied in cases involving insult, the victim's recovery would be less than the total loss sustained. Furthermore, they recognized that compensatory damages would not redress losses, such as breach of the peace, that are sustained by persons other than the immediate victim. Thus, they intuitively recognized that optimum deterrence would not be achieved if the damages assessed against the defendant were less than the sum of the losses caused by the defendant's wrongful act. That outcome was especially likely when the act was done for the purpose of insulting or otherwise intangibly injuring the victim (that is, with "malice").

The courts had three alternatives for achieving a more efficient level of deterrence: to invoke the criminal law; to change the rules for awarding compensatory damages; or to assess some amount in addition to the allowable compensatory damages in the form of punitive, exemplary, or vindictive damages. Each of these approaches has been adopted, [102] but it is the continued use of the punitive damage approach [*20] that the remainder of this Article will discuss.

III. CRITERIA FOR THE ASSESSMENT OF PUNITIVE DAMAGES

Punitive damages may be assessed when the defendant acted out of malice, willfully, wantonly, recklessly, or with conscious disregard or indifference toward the interests of others. [103] Other terms, such as aggravated circumstances, [104] are sometimes used as surrogates for one or more of these characteristics, and gross negligence, [105] fraud, [106] and oppression [107] may be added to the list. All of these terms attempt to express the conditions necessary for an injured plaintiff to receive an award of punitive damages and necessary and sufficient for a judge or jury to assess them against a defendant. Even when one of the listed conditions is found to be present, however, punitive damages are not mandatory, and the factfinder retains unconstrained discretion to assess them or not. [108]

REV_00262400

The various terms used to denominate the conditions that determine the appropriateness vel non of punitive damages present two sets of issues. First, assuming that the terms provide cogent and discriminating criteria for imposing punitive damage liability and that they are [*21] capable of being consistently applied, do they provide a fairness basis for assessing punitive damages, and will such assessments promote an efficient allocation of resources? Second, relaxing the consistency assumption, are the conclusions reached under the assumption of consistency affected by the vagueness and variety of the criteria for assessment and by the discretion accorded to finders of fact? The first set of issues is discussed in this Section. The latter issues are addressed in the succeeding Section.

For present purposes, assume that punitive damages may be assessed if and only if one person injures another with "malice" or as a result of "reckless conduct." Further assume that malice and reckless conduct are defined as follows:

malice: a state of mind; the desire to harm another that accompanies and provides a reason for an intentional act; [109] reckless conduct: conduct involving a conscious choice of a course of action entailing a disproportionately great risk of harm to another relative to the utility of the conduct, and undertaken with knowledge of the danger or of facts that would disclose the danger to a reasonable person. [110]

A. FAIRNESS

Applying the concept of desert specified in Section I, [111] we can locate malice on a scale of culpability that probably would accord with the moral intuitions of most reflective retributionists. At least in the absence of some overriding principle or policy, [112] most would view one [*22] who purposefully injures another as having committed a wrongful act with a culpable mental state and, therefore, as deserving punishment. Moreover, if most members of society agree that the deliberate infliction of harm should be punished, it seems likely that offenders will have notice of that fact. Other elements of desert -- proportionality, prior notice of the magnitude of the penalty, and equal treatment -- are supplied by the malice criterion only under heroic assumptions regarding the actor's state of mind, the susceptibility of degrees of malice to consistent evaluation, and the existence of a social consensus as to the punishment merited by various malicious acts. Such difficulties, however, may be regarded as peripheral to the primary issue of the use of malice as a criterion for punitive damage liability.

On the other hand, disagreements are likely to exist that go to the very core of using reckless conduct as a measure for punitive damage liability. The definition of reckless conduct requires a weighing of matters that may be incommensurable, such as the risk of harm and the utility of dangerous conduct. The definition of reckless conduct also entails an objective standard of awareness: knowledge of facts that would have communicated potential danger to a reasonable person. If there is good faith disagreement over the relative danger and utility of an action, the fairness requirement of adequate notice of wrongfulness may not be satisfied. [113] If an actor lacks subjective awareness of the disproportionate danger accompanying an act, the requirement of meaningful choice may be unfulfilled. In the latter case, punitive damages punish actors for not having the percipience of the objective reasonable person, a shortcoming in mental attributes rather than a wrongful act, and a condition or status that may not be regarded universally as deserving of punishment. [114]

Thus, even assuming that the conditions for assessing punitive damages can be tightly and consistently defined, once we move away from purposeful harm we encounter problems in justifying their imposition from the standpoint of desert. Deserved punishment for

REV_00262401

Service: Get by LEXSEE®
Citation: 1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 879

*1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 879, **

Copyright (c) 1995 Brigham Young University Law Review
Brigham Young University Law Review

1995

1995 B.Y.U.L. Rev. 879

LENGTH: 24026 words

ARTICLE: Confronting The Consolidation Conundrum

Richard L. Marcus *

* Professor of Law, University of California, Hastings College of the Law. I was a member of the Members' Consultative Group of the American Law Institute that commented on the ALI Complex Litigation Project. I was also Associate Reporter to the Federal Courts Study Committee, whose recommendations regarding consolidation are discussed in this Article. See infra text accompanying notes 88-89. The views expressed in this Article are mine alone.
I would like to thank Ed Brunet, Mary Kay Kane, Tom Rowe and Joan Steinman who read a draft of this Article and offered comments. I am indebted for research assistance to Sarah Colby and Hasan Shafiqullah, members of the Hastings class of 1997.

SUMMARY:
... At least it has become considerably more important in recent years as courts have increasingly sought to use the power to consolidate and sever to design cures for the stresses of modern multiple litigation. ... Part IV also evaluates both the Project's reliance on a newly created Complex Litigation Panel to make the initial decision whether to consolidate, and its propulsion toward fragmenting cases by severance. ... Nevertheless, the court held that consolidation was an abuse of discretion, reasoning that the varied work histories of the plaintiffs had presented the jury with a "dizzying amount" of evidence and that the case was therefore distinguishable from the 1992 case quoted above, which upheld the judgment of a consolidated trial of asbestos claims for workers at a shipyard. ... In sum, as others have noted, consolidation can leave claimants with as little control over their cases as unnamed class members in a class action. ... As in Bendectin, consolidation and bifurcation may undermine that tradition. ... But that prong of section 3.01 also omits an important directive that the Reporters included in Appendix B - that consolidation of the cases be "superior to their separate adjudication." ... A transferee judge may similarly approach the transfer/consolidation question with indifference to party interests. ... Without any further action by Congress, as we have seen, transfer and consolidation decisions are repeatedly and increasingly made, and related severance orders are often entered. ...

TEXT:
[*879]

I. Introduction

The Project's varied standards apply to different circumstances in which the Project proposes to authorize consolidation. The general standard for cases pending in federal court is embodied in section3.01, which is a watered down version of Rule 23(b)(3). In contrast, the standard found in Reporters' Study in Appendix B, for consolidation pursuant to the novel proposed interstate compact, is a relatively direct adoption of the Rule 23(b)(3) standard for class certification. In between, section5.01 articulates the standard for removal and adds a "same transaction" test to the common question standard that is embodied in section3.01. [119] These differences are justified on [*904] the ground that jurisdiction and other factors extrinsic to the pure consolidation decision mandate different treatment. [120] Without focusing on the justifications offered for different treatment, this Article questions the departures from the Rule 23(b)(3) model on the grounds (1) that the class action standard is sufficiently flexible for consolidation, and (2) that lowering the threshold below that standard would be unwise.

Rule 23(b)(3) directs the court to certify a class only if it finds that common questions predominate and that a class action would be superior to other modes of adjudication. Certainly the same basic approach could be utilized to bring consolidation into parallel treatment with class actions. As the Reporters of the Project recognized in emulating Rule 23 (b)(3) in Appendix B, however, the class certification standard "is more demanding than that set forth in 28 U.S.C. 1407 and proposed [in section3.01 of the Project] for the consolidation and transfer of lawsuits within the federal system." [121] Section3.01 requires only that there be one common question of fact and that transfer "promote the just, efficient and fair conduct of the actions." [122] Yet the commentary to section3.01 begins with the following explanation:

> The underlying premise of the consolidation standard set forth in this section is that a series of related claims will not be transferred for consolidated treatment unless the parties [*905] and the judicial system will realize a significant savings in time and resources ... and those savings can be achieved in a manner that is fair to the litigants. [123]

In terms of both sensitivity and selectivity, the adoption of a full-fledged Rule 23(b)(3) standard for consolidation by the Reporters in Appendix B better serves these goals than the watered-down version in section3.01.

1. Predominance of common questions

The Reporters label Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirement that common questions predominate a "super-commonality" criterion that is "more demanding" than the requirement of section3.01 that there be a common question of fact. [124] But the Reporters also recognize that predominance is "fairly specific and objective," [125] and make forceful arguments in commentary to Appendix B that underscore the usefulness of the predominance requirement in achieving the goals they set for section3.01. [126] Looking beyond the Project, it is useful to recall what the Reporters say in their treatise on federal practice about the Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement:

> The predominance test really involves an attempt to achieve a balance between the value of allowing individual actions to be instituted so that each person can protect his own interests and the economy that can be achieved by allowing a multiple party dispute to be resolved on a class action basis. [127]

[*906] This sounds almost exactly like the goal the Reporters set for section 3.01. [128] Moreover, there is some language in the commentary to section 3.01 itself that suggests that even under the proposed formulation of section 3.01, predominance should be important. [129] Indeed, the recently released Manual for Complex Litigation, Third, cautions that "unless common evidence predominates, consolidated trials may lead to jury confusion while failing to improve efficiency." [130]

REV_00262439

The sticking point, it seems, is the one the Reporters make in Appendix B - that the predominance standard is fairly specific and objective. [131] Much as that might seem a selling point to one concerned about controlling use of consolidation, the commentary to section3.01 emphasizes that for cases in federal court section 3.01 allows "maximum discretion" to consolidate and thereby makes the commonality standard "so minimal" that it "rarely will be dispositive." [132] The Reporters reason that a predominance requirement would create a risk that the standard would err on the side of specificity and unduly diminish sensitivity, precluding consolidation in some cases where it should be employed. [133] But experience under Rule 23 suggests that its predominance requirement has not hamstrung courts; there the courts have treated the predominance standard as satisfied if the common questions "represent a significant aspect of the case and they can be resolved for all members of the class in a single adjudication." [134] They have not automatically interpreted "predominance" to mean "determinative" or even "significant." [135] Even the Multidistrict Litigation Panel, op- [*907] erating under a statute with a minimal commonality requirement, has sometimes used predominance as a criterion for transfer, [136] and predominance has also been invoked in Rule 42 consolidation decisions. [137]

Other cases handled by the Multidistrict Litigation Panel provide grounds for uneasiness about a minimalist approach to commonality. That Panel rarely makes the common question requirement determinative, [138] but "simply identifies the common questions that exist and orders transfer without analyzing their relation to the overall litigation to any great degree." [139] At least in some cases, the commonality found sufficient seems [*908] almost nonexistent. For example, in In re Aviation Products Liability Litigation [140] the Panel was presented with a series of cases pending in districts in seven states and involving malfunctioning helicopter engines. The helicopters in question were made by two different manufacturers, and the claims were quite disparate. A number of the cases presented claims by corporate helicopter owners for damages to the helicopters and their businesses due to malfunctioning of the engines. Other cases involved personal injury claims by people injured in helicopter crashes. Still other cases involved claims that the helicopter frames had been improperly designed and that certain helicopters had not been properly maintained. The only link among the cases was that each helicopter had the same make of engine, although different components of that engine were cited as responsible for different incidents. Despite vigorous opposition from many parties, the Panel ordered transfer, reasoning that "although the specific defects alleged in each separate case may not be identical they are all interwoven so as to cover the engine's general condition and airworthiness." [141]

It may be that the Panel's action in Aviation Products was appropriate since the consolidation there was purely pretrial. But if the ALI Project's goal in requiring only minimal commonality is to facilitate consolidation in cases like Aviation Products, [142] the predominance requirement seems an important [*909] limitation. [143] In essence, the Project's rejoinder appears to be that the primary protection against improper consolidation in section 3.01 is provided by the other element of its test, which directs that consolidation be ordered only where it "will promote the just, efficient, and fair conduct of the actions." [144] But that prong of section 3.01 also omits an important directive that the Reporters included in Appendix B - that consolidation of the cases be "superior to their separate adjudication." [145]

2. Superiority

The superiority requirement also comes from Rule 23(b)(3) and also appears well-crafted to ensure that consolidation is used only when it is appropriate. Here again, the difference between section3.01 and Appendix B appears to be designed to emphasize the Project's resolve that a more demanding standard be met before consolidation is effected only in situations governed by Appendix B. [146] This has resulted in an unnecessary watering down of the standard for consolidation within the federal system. Rule 23(b)(3)'s superiority requirement does not impose undue burdens. Instead, the requirement only directs the court to verify that a class action would be "sufficiently effective to justify the expenditure of the judicial time and energy that is necessary to adjudicate a class action and to assume the risk of prejudice to the rights of those who are not directly before the court." [147] The commentary on section 3.01 suggests that section 3.01 is designed to ensure that courts follow the same analysis before approving consolidation, [148] and it may be essential to upgrade the black letter of section3.01 to avoid making the consolidation standard spineless.

REV_00262440

As Professor Brunet has cogently noted, there is a pervasive tendency for efficiency to trump competing policies in aggregation decisions, [149] and a spineless consolidation standard [*910] enables judges to succumb to that tendency. The experience of the current Multidistrict Litigation Panel provides substantial evidence to support this concern and should give Congress pause when it evaluates section3.01. As originally proposed to Congress by the judiciary, the multidistrict transfer statute did not even call for attention to party interests in the decision whether to transfer, but Congress inserted party interests as a criterion under the Act. [150] Nevertheless, it seems to be generally recognized that party interests have not been given significant weight by the current Panel, [151] and one commentator has accused the Panel of "failure to heed this congressional admonishment." [152]

Whatever the propriety of disregarding party interests when transfer is ostensibly for pretrial purposes only, the practice seems contrary to what the Project says it is doing in creating authority for the new Complex Litigation Panel to consolidate for trial. The factors that govern transfer under section3.01 clearly include party interests, [153] and the Project's commentary takes account of such interests as well. [154] In order [*911] to put teeth into the commitment to party interests, a superiority requirement is preferable. Whether a superiority requirement would be sufficient remains debatable. Although the Project does recognize party interests, it also emphasizes in the commentary to section3.01 that "the decision whether to transfer and consolidate remains discretionary," [155] using language virtually identical to the commentary to Appendix B, [156] which does require a finding of superiority. Ultimately some discretion seems inevitable for, as Professor Brunet has noted, both fairness and efficiency are multifaceted concepts. [157] But if Appendix B really is to be as elastic as section3.01, there is reason to suspect that it is not sufficiently strict.

One step toward confining the latitude is, as mentioned above, to require predominance of common questions as a prerequisite to consolidation. Additionally insisting on a finding of superiority, and treating that as a serious requisite, appears a further positive step. In essence the superiority reasoning calls for the court to examine the pros and cons of consolidating the cases or leaving them to proceed separately. Although by no means a straightjacket, the balancing can be considerably more than a meaningless exercise. Consolidation need not be denied merely because the consolidated action would be ungainly or hard to manage, but consolidation must be justified by findings based on an actual comparison between consolidated and individual handling of the litigation. Such a comparison gives effect to the Project's objective that consolidation only occur when it actually is preferable to individual litigation. More precise requirements on the superiority prong are probably undesirable. The Project itself examines a variety of considerations, and there will be instances in which some of these favor consolidation while others do not. In such circumstances, it will be up [*912] to the Panel to balance the various factors and decide whether to consolidate.

3. Same transaction

The Project's consolidation standard offers yet another wrinkle in section 5.01, which proposes a new removal jurisdiction that would allow the Panel to combine cases pending in state court with cases pending in federal court. Besides invoking the standard of section3.01 and requiring "consideration of whether removal will unduly disrupt or impinge upon state court or regulatory proceedings," section 5.01 removal is available only if the state cases "arise from the same transaction, occurrence, or series of transactions or occurrences" as the cases pending in federal court. [158] It appears that the same transaction provision, which is similar to that in Federal Rule 20(a), was added because there is a jurisdictional aspect to section 5.01. [159] But the operation of the Rule 20 provision tends to devolve into a variant of the commonality principle. [160] Although consolidation based on common question is said to be broader than joinder under Rule 20, [161] and the commentary to the Project strives valiantly to show that the same transaction test is an important addition to section5.01, [162] the Reporters' Notes acknowledge that situations will rarely satisfy the commonality prong but fail to satisfy the same transaction test as well. [163] [*913]

REV_00262441

4. A reprise on the standard

Despite endorsing full-fledged invocation of both the predominance and superiority standards borrowed from Rule 23(b)(3), this section should end with a recognition of the importance of the Project's contribution to resolving the consolidation conundrum. In an aggressively standardless area, the Project has provided an analytical format that identifies and is sensitive to the competing considerations. In order to ensure that the overall standard in fact constrains consolidation decisions, it would be better to fortify it to equal the one in Appendix B. But any sensible standard will have significant flexibility. The recommended one would be neither self-executing nor scalpel-like.

B. The Panel as Implementor

Besides articulating a standard for consolidation, the Project seeks to regulate its use by assigning primary, or at least initial, authority for the consolidation decision to the Complex Litigation Panel it proposes to establish. [164] This sort of expanded authority to consolidate for trial has been proposed in the past for the current Multidistrict Litigation Panel, [165] and it seems clearly preferable to the alternatives of conferring the authority entirely on the transferor or transferee judge, or leaving it to the parties' preferences. [166] Placing consolidation authority in the Complex Litigation Panel would mark a change from the current arrangement in which transferee judges often exercise such authority under the guise of 28 U.S.C. 1404(a). Reliance on the Panel would foster consistency in handling consolidation and ensure that judges fully familiar with the Project's textured consolidation standard would, at least initially, make the decision whether that standard is satisfied. [167] [*914]

Sensible though it is, relying on the Panel to decide consolidation issues is not a cure-all for the difficulties that attend consolidation. To begin with, timing creates a serious problem for the Panel. For good reasons, the Panel's decision whether to consolidate should ordinarily be made as early as possible. [168] But at that time there may be significant uncertainty about critical aspects of the litigation that bear on the wisdom of consolidation, so that the Panel will have to rely on an informed guess. The Project's commentary suggests that the Panel can delegate fact-gathering responsibility to a "special master" if it does not know enough about the cases, [169] but this option would rarely be helpful since it would only delay matters. At least one piece of information that is often important - the law to be applied - will by definition be unavailable to the Panel when its consolidation decision must be made. The Project authorizes the transferee judge to select governing principles of law in some circumstances, [170] but of necessity that decision can only be made after transfer. The choice of law decision could, however, have a significant bearing on whether there are common questions, and whether those predominate. More generally, owing to the need to adjust the nature of consolidation in the face of later developments, or to undo consolidation entirely, the transferee judge has authority to reconsider or revise a consolidation order of the Panel. [171] Hence, although the Panel should be a better arbiter, it cannot be a final arbiter, and considerable power must continue to reside in the transferee judge.

REV_00262442

In addition, there is room for skepticism about the enthusiasm the Panel will bring to some of the consolidation criteria, particularly those that deal with fairness and litigant interests. As noted above, the current Multidistrict Panel has been notably indifferent to Congress' insistence that litigants' interests be a coequal factor in making transfer decision for pretrial purposes. [172] Perhaps there is something in the implicit mission [*915] statement for the Panel that accelerates the tendency Professor Brunet notes to exalt efficiency over litigant interests and other considerations. [173] A Chief Justice may be expected to select judges for such a Panel who support the idea of aggregated treatment, or at least to pass over judges who are distinctly skeptical about it (if any still exist). The dynamics of the Panel itself may tend to reinforce this likely initial preference for aggregation. Hence, although the Panel would have a "national focus and overview" that would put it in an "optimal position to consider the interests of the entire judicial system," [174] it is less clear that the Panel would be "relatively neutral in making the transfer for consolidation decision." [175] To the contrary, although the Panel might be expected to approach the selection of a transferee district neutrally, it would probably have a distinct bent in favor of transfer. A transferee judge may similarly approach the transfer/consolidation question with indifference to party interests. [176]

In sum, the fact that consolidation decisions are initially to be made by the Complex Litigation Panel does not substantially lessen the need to fortify the standard for consolidation, as urged above. Particularly given the experience under the current Multidistrict Litigation Panel, a clear declaration of the prerequisites to transfer is in order.

C. Fragmentation of Cases

The natural tendency of consolidation toward bifurcation, trifurcation, and beyond would be further fueled were the Project's proposals adopted. The Project's black letter suggests that the transferee judge consider "structuring of the litigation by separating the issues into those common questions that should be treated on a consolidated basis and those individual questions that should not." [177] The Project further directs that [*916] the transferee judge prepare a plan for the disposition of the litigation that "shall specify whether the entire action or only specified issues shall be determined in the transferee district and also shall provide for the disposition of the issues not to be determined in the transferee court." [178] To implement this trial plan, the judge has "broad discretion" to return "individual issues" to the court from which the case originated or to transfer them to yet another transferee district. [179] When cases are removed from state court pursuant to the Project's new removal jurisdiction, this power to decide which issues will be consolidated for trial could lead to issues in the same case being resolved in different court systems. [180] As we have seen, such fragmented litigation is not cost free. [181] But since bifurcation is more a by-product than the primary goal of the Project, it will not be examined in detail here.

The starting point in assessing the bifurcation issue is to recognize that, despite the rather longstanding debate about the desirability of bifurcation under Rule 42(b), there has been rather little direction on when bifurcation should be employed. [182] The Project does not stop at creating expanded authority to fragment cases, however; it also provides a detailed analysis of the issues bearing on the use of the severance power that is unequalled in any similar source. The commentary identifies and addresses several important problems and supplies guidance on dealing with these issues even for those who disagree with the Project's position on some of the problems. Although the best way to obtain insight into the severance issues addressed is to read the pertinent portions of the Project, a canvass here identifies the matters covered.

First, the Project categorizes and chronicles the types of issues that might usefully be severed according to case type. For example, it identifies four determinations that need to be made in

REV_00262443

"antitrust, securities, products liability and mass disaster litigation," suggesting that general causation and liabili- [*917] ty can often be separated from specific causation and damages. [183] It offers similar analyses of copyright, patent and contract litigation [184] and supports consolidation of punitive damages. [185] It also offers guidance on whether the transferee court should retain or transfer individual issues after severing them. [186]

Second, the Project recognizes that severance conflicts with the tradition of a unitary trial and insists that this consequence of severance be considered before the procedure is employed. [187] But it properly goes on to note that the principal problem area for severance is in personal injury litigation and that "issue severance has operated without any real problem or challenge in the securities and antitrust fields." [188] In the same vein, the Project identifies the prodefendant shift in results that seems to attend bifurcation between liability and damages in personal injury cases [189] and recognizes that there is an "important philosophical issue" [190] about whether the breed of jury nullification of liability rules that seems to occur in unitary trials should be fostered. The Reporters' Notes suggest that, at least in complex litigation, there is no alternative to severance despite the nullification effect. [191]

Third, the Project identifies the sterile trial problem and explores the Sixth Circuit's grappling with that problem. [192] It suggests that allowing plaintiffs to introduce some evidence of their injuries during the liability portion of the trial could ameliorate the sterile trial problem, although this strategy will not entirely eliminate the problem. [193] Conceding that the cure is [*918] incomplete, the Project nevertheless recommends bifurcation because the advantages are likely to outweigh the disadvantages, and because "judicious use of separate trials is essential to the effective functioning of the jury system." [194] But it cautions that "trifurcation is more questionable than bifurcation." [195]

Fourth, it argues that severance will actually improve the fairness of consolidated proceedings by preserving the plaintiffs' control over litigation of individual issues. [196] Of course, severance does involve the left hand giving back some of what the right hand took away, since consolidation caused the loss of control in the first place. Moreover, this restoration of control may be less significant than the Project suggests unless accompanied by a return of the case to the original court, where the lawyers initially retained by the plaintiffs can more conveniently participate.

Fifth, the Project offers some commonsense tips on employing severance. Thus, it suggests that putting simple issues first may avoid undue expense if more cumbersome issues can thereby be avoided. [197] It also suggests that the "judge may empanel multiple juries to see whether" they reach conflicting outcomes in order to protect against the possibility of an anomalous verdict. [198]

Finally, the Project proposes to create special appellate avenues to provide early review of certain aspects of severed proceedings, recognizing that special treatment should be accorded severance orders. It would authorize the Complex Litigation Panel to review the transferee judge's orders to transfer issues. [199] Although the Panel's authority does not extend to all severance decisions made by the transferee judge, [200] the very existence of review authority recognizes the special impact that [*919] severance decisions can have on cases. [201] In addition to Panel review of certain severance orders, the Project would authorize immediate review of liability determinations by an appellate court when the question of liability has been separately adjudicated, even though damages issues remain to be determined. [202]

Perhaps other, more precise guidelines for severance might be proposed. [203] Certainly transferee judges will have significant latitude in shaping cases, and the Project's overall orientation is sympathetic to the use of transferee discretion. But the commentary does catalogue and take seriously the potential drawbacks, as well as offering some particulars such as the comment that trifurcation is more dubious than bifurcation. [204] One idea that might help in the decision to bifurcate, as with the initial decision to consolidate, [205] is superiority; the black letter could direct that bifurcation only be used if superior to unitary trial. In a consolidation situation, however, a superiority requirement in the bifurcation analysis would seem to add little to the superiority requisite in the consolidation itself, were that vigorously applied. Neither in Rule 42(b) nor elsewhere in procedural law is there a source for borrowing guidelines on fragmentation as there is in Rule 23(b)(3) for the question of consolidation. [206] Accordingly, despite concern about over-fragmen- [*920] tation of cases, this Article does not propose fortifying the Project's provisions on bifurcation as it does urge for the consolidation standard.

REV_00262444

D. The Question Before Congress

By assessing the value of consolidation in dealing with complex litigation, this Article illuminates whether Congress should embrace the Project's effort to facilitate consolidation. Although it urges fortifying the standard for consolidation by making that standard more directly parallel to the handling of class actions under Rule 23(b)(3), on balance the Article finds that the Project provides a thorough and balanced examination of the consolidation conundrum. Does that mean that Congress should embrace the Project's central goal of facilitating consolidation?

The answer is uncertain. For one thing, there are a variety of federalism and other objections to the Project's proposals that other scholars have addressed. Beyond that, there is what might be called empirical uncertainty about consolidation itself. This Article has approached the question almost entirely on the doctrinal level. The issues raised by consolidation that were identified in Part III, [207] however, really cannot be quantified in a way susceptible to doctrinal prescription. [208] The Project's approach is to identify the issues and propose consideration of them by the Panel and later by the transferee judge. Judges have an experiential basis for such determinations, but one might conclude that their information base is too limited, or that they are too likely to be seduced into disregarding any counterbalances against consolidation in their quest for efficiency and broad-gauge disposition of litigation. [*921]

Under these circumstances, it may not be enough to point out that the Project's effort to overcome the obstacles to consolidation "hardly reflects focused consideration of the desirable scope of possible consolidation." [209] Even arbitrary limits can look attractive when they confine a disquieting, unknown force. The Project has not dispelled all misgivings about aggressive use of consolidation and severance of issues. Indeed, to a substantial extent the Project seems tempted to fall back on the argument not that consolidation is desirable, but that it is the only stopgap available to prevent chaos. [210] That is hardly a positive argument for consolidation and may be insufficient to carry the day for the Project's aggressive reforms designed to make consolidation more readily available.

V. The Role of the Project's Consolidation Provisions, Assuming Congress Does Not Act

The ALI has not had great success in the past in prodding Congress into action. Its 1969 Study of the Division of Jurisdiction Between State and Federal Courts proposed a number of statutory changes, but none were enacted until the Federal Courts Study Committee recommended some of them in 1990. [211] Assuming that Congress responds to the Project as it did to the Study, one would not expect to see the jurisdictional and other innovations recommended by the Project enacted in the near future. These striking ideas about jurisdiction and choice of law will (as did the 1969 Study) serve principally as fodder for law school classes. Some, therefore, criticize the Project because it is directed only at Congress. [212]

Relegation to law school curriculum need not be the fate of the Project's analysis of consolidation, however. Without any [*922] further action by Congress, as we have seen, [213] transfer and consolidation decisions are repeatedly and increasingly made, and related severance orders are often entered. That is the reason why the Federal Courts Study

REV_00262445

Committee also recommended in 1990 that guidelines for consolidation and bifurcation be promulgated. [214] Perhaps the Project can be used as a source of the kind of guidance for judges that the Committee desired.

The ALI's work product has proved much more influential with judges than with Congress. Its restatements have proved enormously successful in influencing the law, [215] sometimes too much so in the view of some critics. [216] The restatements have become almost an art form that can serve as a vehicle for all purposes. [217] Like the restatements, the Project may influence judges confronting consolidation decisions even though its jurisdictional and choice of law proposals have not been enacted. [218] One important influence would be on the members of the current Multidistrict Litigation Panel; in making their transfer decisions under the current statute they could find much of use in the Project's discussion of transfer and consolidation. Similarly, transferee judges could find in the Project exactly the sort of blueprint for handling consolidation and severance decisions that the Federal Courts Study Committee urged. Outside the transfer context altogether, the growing importance of con- [*923] solidation and severance of issues provides a ready market for the learning offered by the Project. Unlike the 1969 study of federal jurisdiction, then, the Project may become a vital part of the litigation scene.

Given this prospect, the diversity of consolidation standards contained in the Project is particularly unfortunate. For one thing, the existence of three standards is simply confusing. [219] More significant, however, is the fact that the Project principally relies on a watered-down shadow of Rule 23(b)(3)'s requirements. At least one may hope that judges will, as recommended in this Article, actually embrace the more vigorous requirements of Appendix B when confronted with the question whether to consolidate cases for purposes of adjudication.

VI. Conclusion

Complex litigation sometimes does seem to resemble Wonderland, but consolidation pursuant to Federal Rule 42 presents many more challenges than Wonderland's Rule 42. This Article has tried to demonstrate that the ALI Complex Litigation Project contains important insights on the proper use of consolidation while also criticizing the Project's unwillingness to tighten up the test for consolidation. Given the limited probability that Congress will soon undertake the reforms the Project proposes to foster consolidation, we may hope that the ALI's work in directly confronting the consolidation conundrum will nevertheless serve to improve and focus the judiciary's use of consolidation in the future.

To best fulfill that objective, however, the judiciary should embrace the more forceful provisions of Appendix B rather than the open-textured directives of section3.01. Whether judges might do so is, at best, uncertain. Not only does adherence to Appendix B exalt the commentary over the black letter, it also cuts against the judicial tendency to maximize the courts' discretion. This temptation to expand discretion may even lead to relaxation of the provisions of Rule 23, from which this Article has borrowed to fortify the Project's proposals. The Advisory Committee on the Civil Rules has for several years been considering changes in the class action rule that would make it more open-textured. [220] If the committee's class action initiatives her- [*924] ald a general trend to relax constraints on aggregation, the prognosis for the Project as a device for confining and focusing the use of consolidation is poor indeed. We may hope that another course will prevail with regard to both class actions and consolidation.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. Lewis Carroll, Alice in Wonderland 132 (1986).

n2. "Due largely to caseload pressures, the federal courts are consolidating increasing numbers of cases...." Joan Steinman, The Effects of Case Consolidation on the Procedural Rights of Litigants: What They Are, What They Might Be, Part I: Justiciability and Jurisdiction (Original and Appellate), 42 UCLA L. Rev. 717, 718 (1995). Unfortunately, exact figures are not available. "The Administrative Office of the United States Courts has not gathered statistics on the number of cases consolidated pursuant to [Rule 42]." Id. at 718 n.1.

REV_00262446

n3. See American Law Institute, Complex Litigation: Statutory Recommendations and Analysis 24-26 (1994) [hereinafter Complex Litigation Proposal].

n4. See id. at 26-27.

n5. See id. at 27-34.

n6. See id. at 34-35.

n7. See id. at 35-36.

n8. Linda S. Mullinex, Unfinished Symphony: The Complex Litigation Project Rests, 54 La. L. Rev. 977, 979 (1994).

n9. Gene R. Shreve, Reform Aspirations of the Complex Litigation Project, 54 La. L. Rev. 1139, 1143-44 (1994).

n10. See H.R. 3406, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1989); H.R. 4807, 100th Cong., 2d Sess. (1988); H.R. 3152, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. (1987); H.R. 4315, 99th Cong., 2d Sess. (1986); H.R. 3690, 98th Cong., 1st Sess. (1983). H.R. 3406 passed the House of Representatives without opposition, but the Senate did not act on it. For a review of the legislative process of these proposals, including analysis of the fate of H.R. 3406 and attention to the role of academic commentary, see Charles G. Geyh, Complex-Litigation Reform and the Legislative Process, 10 Rev. Litig. 401 (1991).

n11. Consolidation pursuant to Rule 42 can be solely for pretrial purposes and, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. 1407 (1988), transfer and consolidation are supposed to be limited to such purposes. The reality, however, is that consolidation that is initially designated "pretrial" is often never unscrambled because there is a global settlement, because the consolidated cases are resolved by pretrial motion, or because the cases are later formally consolidated for trial. For a thorough exploration of these realities and their ramifications, see Steinman, supra note 2.

Whatever the present reality, it is evident that the thrust of the ALI Project is to facilitate consolidation for disposition of the actions, whether by settlement, pretrial ruling, or trial. A by-product of this effort may be severance of cases into constituent parts, such as liability and damages, and resolution of only some issues on a consolidated basis. See infra text accompanying notes 68-83, 177-206. But that does not change the basic thrust toward consolidated resolution. Some are quite overt about this objective:

As somebody who has been involved in these mass torts over the last twelve years on a regular basis, I want to make an additional point. What is the single most important feature of these mass torts in terms of getting them resolved? What ultimate issue holds the key to the resolution of these claims in an efficient way? The answer is aggregation. Aggregation. You must get all of the cases in one forum. Until you do that, any piecemeal solution, however beneficial it may be, does not offer either the plaintiff or the defendant global peace.

Kenneth R. Feinberg, Response to Deborah Hensler, A Glass Half Full, a Glass Half Empty:

REV_00262447

The Use of Alternative Dispute Resolution in Mass Personal Injury Litigation, 73 Tex. L. Rev. 1647, 1648 (1995).

Consolidation for trial or other resolution is therefore the focus of this Article. Accordingly, the cautions about consolidation in this Article may not apply to coordinating discovery to avoid duplication of effort.

n12. See Steinman, supra note 2, at 720 & n.10; see also Joan Steinman, The Effects of Case Consolidation on the Procedural Rights of Litigants: What They Are, What They Might Be, Part II: Non-Jurisdictional Matters, 42 UCLA L. Rev. 967 (1995).

n13. See Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U.S. 285, 292 (1892) (explaining that Lord Mansfield introduced the consolidation rule to "avoid the expense and delay attending the trial of a multiplicity of actions upon the same question").

n14. Act of July 22, 1813 3, 3 Stat. ch. 14. The statute provided in pertinent part:

Whenever causes of like nature, or relative to the same question shall be pending before a court of the United States or of the territories thereof, it shall be lawful for the court to make such orders and rules concerning proceedings therein as may be conformable to the principles and usages belonging to courts for avoiding unnecessary costs or delay in the administration of justice, and accordingly causes may be consolidated as to the court shall appear reasonable.

This statute, and its successors, remained on the books until 1948, although effectively superseded by Rule 42 in 1938. See Gregory R. Harris, Note, Consolidation and Transfer in the Federal Courts: 28 U.S.C. Section 1407 Viewed in Light of Rule 42(a) and Section 1404 (a), 22 Hastings L.J. 1289, 1290 n.6 (1971).

n15. Daniel J. Meador, Inherent Judicial Authority in the Conduct of Civil Litigation, 73 Tex. L. Rev. 1805, 1807 (1995).

n16. See generally Robert Bone, Mapping the Boundaries of a Dispute: Conceptions of Ideal Lawsuit Structure from the Field Code to the Federal Rules, 89 Colum. L. Rev. 1 (1989) (cautioning against the assumption that 19th century proceduralists embraced the same attitude toward joinder as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure).

n17. 145 U.S. 285 (1892).

n18. Hillmon probably appears as a principal case in every American evidence casebook. When the Federal Rules of Evidence were adopted in 1974, it was so widely recognized that the Advisory Committee Notes to Rule 803(3) satisfied themselves with the comment that "the rule of Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon allowing evidence of intention as tending to prove the doing of the act intended, is, of course, left undisturbed." Fed. R. Evid. 803(3) advisory committee's note.

n19. Hillmon, 145 U.S. at 285-86.

n20. Id. at 286.

n21. Id. at 289-92. The Court went on to reverse the judgment for plaintiff due to the trial judge's limitation on defendant's peremptory challenges, and then volunteered its answer to the evidence question that has transfixed evidence scholars by holding that the insurance companies should be allowed to offer letters written by another man in support of their claim that the dead body that had been found was really his. The letters indicated that their author

REV_00262448

"Rule Forty-two. All persons more than a mile high to leave the court."

"I'm not a mile high," said Alice.

"You are," said the King.

"Nearly two miles high," added the Queen.

"Well, I shan't go, at any rate," said Alice; "besides, that's not a regular rule; you've invented it just now."

"It's the oldest rule in the book," said the King.

"Then it ought to be Number One," said Alice. [1]

Perhaps Rule 42 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure - dealing with consolidation of cases and severance of issues for trial - should be number one. At least it has become considerably more important in recent years as courts have increasingly sought to use the power to consolidate and sever to design cures for the stresses of modern multiple litigation. [2] There can be no doubt that the American Law Institute's Complex Litigation Project has thrust consolidation [*880] center stage. Although it canvassed a variety of procedural devices for dealing with the challenges of complex litigation, including party joinder under Rules 19 and 20, [3] intervention pursuant to Rule 24, [4] class actions, [5] interpleader, [6] and bankruptcy, [7] the Project's principal thrust was to remove obstacles to consolidation.

For the ALI Project, consolidation is Rule 1, although it is hard to predict the impact of the Project's proposals on the law. The Project has already been criticized by academics for trying to do too much and for failing to do enough. One professor has lambasted it because it "fails to deal in a holistic fashion with the interrelated consequences of complex cases," thus leaving too much undone. [8] Another reacts that the framers of the Project sought to "use the occasion of complex litigation reform to overhaul as much of the law of American civil procedure as possible," and describes a number of the Project's proposals as "sweeping" and "radical." [9]

Under these circumstances, the prospects for quick adoption by Congress of the Project's statutory proposals appear small. Indeed, much less ambitious statutory initiatives have been introduced in Congress, but have not been adopted. [10] Logically, if not politically, a central concern for Congress should be the Project's treatment of consolidation; unless consolidation is suited to the task of harnessing complex litigation, there would seem to be little reason to embrace other procedural reforms - be they aggressive or incomplete - to increase opportunities for consolidation. [*881]

This Article therefore focuses on consolidation itself, emphasizing the use of consolidation for combined disposition, which is a principal objective of the Project. [11] The Article builds on Professor Steinman's recent and very substantial work on the implications of consolidation and examines the standards and methods for deciding whether cases should be consolidated, a topic which she did not address. [12] As Professor Steinman's work has revealed, consolidation presents a conundrum which surfaces in a number of jurisdictional and jurisdiction-related procedural puzzles. Whether consolidation should be employed in complex litigation seems the central question, but it has been little examined in the literature. The Complex Litigation Project provides a careful examination of the propriety and methods of consolidation. Evaluating the adequacy of this treatment thus provides the means through which this Article [*882] will address the question whether consolidation should be used in complex litigation.

To put the question in context, the Article begins in Part II with a review of the evolution of consolidation, stressing its increasing importance. Part III identifies the sometimes troubling intended to accompany plaintiff's alleged decedent on the trip that allegedly led to his death. Plaintiff had objected to introduction of these letters on hearsay grounds, but the Court held that they could nevertheless be admitted to prove that the author acted as the letters said he intended to act. Id. at 295-300.

REV_00262431

n22. Johnson v. Manhattan Ry., 289 U.S. 479, 496 (1933). In Johnson, the Court said that the consolidation of cases does not "merge the suits into a single cause." Id. at 496-97; see also Steinman, supra notes 2 and 12 (discussing these issues in more detail). The statement caused much uncertainty that remains unresolved.

In reality, the situation in Johnson was so peculiar that it does not seem to justify generalization. The problem in Johnson seems to have developed from a disagreement between Judge Martin Manton of the Second Circuit and the judges of the Southern District of New York about which trust company to appoint in receivership situations. Relying on a statute that allowed the senior circuit judge to assign a judge to serve on a district court, Judge Manton assigned himself to sit on the district court, had an action involving the Manhattan Railway Co. filed before him, and promptly appointed a trustee. Johnson later filed a second action, which was assigned to a district judge in the normal course. The district judge appointed a different trustee and invalidated Judge Manton's order of appointment, declaring that he was consolidating the two cases. The Supreme Court held the district judge's order invalid because the district judge did not acquire authority over Judge Manton's case by declaring it consolidated with the case the judge was presiding over. The basic difficulty was thus a problem of case assignment, not consolidation; had Judge Manton's case been assigned to the district judge he could have revoked the earlier order whether or not the two cases were consolidated.

n23. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 42 advisory committee's notes (stating that the rule's provisions are comparable to those adopted in Arkansas, California, New Mexico, and New York).

n24. "It would be a mistake to assume that the standard for consolidation is the same as that governing the original joinder of parties or claims." 9 Charles A. Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure 2382, at 432 (2d ed. 1994).

n25. For example, in Clark v. Elgin, 25 F.R.D. 248 (N.D. Ohio 1960), four suits arising from a single auto accident were consolidated, but the court declined to combine them with a fifth arising out of the same accident because it involved an issue of contributory negligence. Under Rule 20, joinder of these claims in a single suit would of course have been permissible since all arose out of the same occurrence.

n26. See Proceedings of the Seminar on Protracted Cases for United States Circuit and District Judges Held at N.Y.U. Law Center, Aug. 26-30, 1957, 21 F.R.D. 395; Proceedings on the Seminar on Protracted Cases for United States Judges Held at Stan. L. Sch., Aug. 25-30, 1958, 23 F.R.D. 319.

n27. 28 U.S.C. 1407(a).

n28. John F. Cooney, Comment, The Experience of Transferee Courts Under the Multidistrict Litigation Act, 39 U. Chi. L. Rev. 588, 589 (1972) ("Transfer for the limited purpose of pretrial proceedings has become functionally equivalent to transfer for all purposes, including trial on substantive legal issues."). This does not mean that transfer for pretrial purposes could not have such effects absent a later follow-up transfer under 1404(a). Section 1407 only requires re-transfer for trial, and most cases (including those transferred pursuant to 1407) don't reach trial. Thus, many cases would be concluded by settlement or dispositive pretrial motions after a 1407 transfer even without the subsequent 1404(a) transfer.

n29. Comment, Consolidation in Mass Tort Litigation, 30 U. Chi. L. Rev. 373 (1963).

REV_00262449

n30. See Samuel Issacharoff, Administering Damage Awards in Mass-Tort Litigation, 10 Rev. Litig. 463, 493 (1991) (referring to "the mass-tort litigation that has placed the courts under siege").

n31. See generally Richard L. Marcus, They Can't Do That, Can They? Tort Reform Via Rule 23, 80 Cornell L. Rev. 858 (1995).

n32. Mining the interaction between class actions and consolidations, courts can use consolidation to capture the claims of class members who opt out of Rule 23(b)(3) class actions. See, e.g., In re Corrugated Container Antitrust Litigation, 659 F.2d 1341, 1349 (5th Cir. 1981) ("The district judge ... was, and perhaps still is, contemplating consolidation of all the opt-out cases for trial...."); Lailhengue v. Mobil Oil Corp., 775 F. Supp. 908, 914 n.8 (E.D. La. 1991) ("Any opt-out plaintiffs would be consolidated with the class under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure Rule 42(a) for trial on punitive damages."); Eastern Brewing Corp. v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 1989 WL 158752 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (class action and four similar actions brought by opt-out plaintiffs consolidated); Manual for Complex Litigation, Second, 21.631 (1985) ("Class actions may be consolidated with cases instituted by opt-outs or others.") [hereinafter Manual, Second]; William W Schwarzer, Managing Antitrust and Other Complex Litigation 183 (1982) ("Individual actions ancillary to the class action should be managed so as to minimize duplication of activity. Consolidating them with the main action for pretrial and trial reduces such duplication of effort.").

The Manual for Complex Litigation, Third, continues to recognize the power to consolidate the cases of opt-out plaintiffs, but cautions:

Care should be taken in such situations to ensure that counsel for the parties in the nonclass actions are given a fair opportunity to participate in the presentation of evidence and arguments at trial, particularly when their clients are particularly affected.

Manual for Complex Litigation, Third, 21.631 (1995) [hereinafter Manual, Third].

n33. Linda S. Mullenix, Beyond Consolidation: Postaggregative Procedure in Asbestos Mass Tort Litigation, 32 Wm. & Mary L. Rev. 475, 504 (1991); see also id. at 489 (reporting that earlier Judge Parker had "believed he had reached the maximum consolidation feasible" with consolidated trials of 30 plaintiffs).

n34. In re Asbestos Prod. Liab. Litig. (No. VI), 771 F. Supp. 415, 418 (J.P.M.L. 1991). The Panel had previously refused to transfer asbestos cases on the ground that they did not present common questions. In re Asbestos & Asbestos Insulation Material Prod. Liab. Litig., 431 F. Supp. 906 (J.P.M.L. 1977). In 1991, it explained that developments since 1977 promoted the difference in outcome: "We are persuaded that this litigation has reached a magnitude, not contemplated in the record before us in 1977, that threatens the administration of justice...." 771 F. Supp. at 418. Recognizing the potential drawbacks of consolidation, however, it assured claimants that the transfer would not "result in their actions entering some black hole, never to be seen again." Id. at 423 n.10.

n35. Judith Resnik, From "Cases" to "Litigation", 54 Law & Contemp. Probs., Summer 1991, at 5, 22; see also Charles Silver, Comparing Class Actions and Consolidations, 10 Rev. Litig. 495 (1991).

n36. As Professor Steinman explains:

Even persons who are well educated in the law and have years of experience are largely oblivious to the effects of consolidation upon the procedural rights of litigants. The general belief seems to be that consolidation does not affect litigants' procedural rights. Invariably, when I told friends - law professors, practitioners, magistrate judges - what I was writing about, their response was, "Can you give me an example?"

REV_00262450

Steinman, supra note 2, at 721 n.11.

n37. In re Brooklyn Navy Yard Asbestos Litig., 971 F.2d 831, 853 (2d Cir. 1992) (citations omitted).

n38. Malcolm v. National Gypsum Co., 995 F.2d 346, 348 (2d Cir. 1993).

n39. Id. at 350.

n40. Id. at 349, 353 (citing In re Brooklyn Navy Yard Asbestos Litig., 971 F.2d 831 (2d Cir. 1992), quoted in text accompanying note 37 supra). In Malcolm, the Second Circuit said Brooklyn Navy Yard was different due to the similarity of experience of those workers because the employer there was the military, and "uniformity is a way of life with the military." Malcolm, 995 F.2d at 353.

n41. Malcolm, 995 F.2d at 354-55 (Walker, J., dissenting).

The Second Circuit is not oblivious to those concerns. Thus, in Consorti v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 64 F.3d 781, 785 (2d Cir. 1995), it emphasized that "consolidation is a valuable and important tool of judicial administration," and that "without consolidation the courts are simply incapable of handling of such volume" as the 200,000 asbestosis cases filed in state and federal courts. The district judge there had consolidated four separate asbestosis claims for trial, and defendant appealed from the verdict in favor of one plaintiff on the ground that Malcom announced a "strong anti-consolidation bias." Citing the ALI Project, id. at 786, the court affirmed. It explained the outcome in Malcom as due to "factors unique to that case." Id. at 785. In particular, it turned out at trial in Malcom that the district court was wrong in believing that all plaintiffs had spent most of their work history at power plant work sites, and there were also serious problems caused by the addition on the eve of trial of over 200 companies as third-party defendants. Id. at 786-87. Because the district judge in the case before it took pains to distinguish the various consolidated cases for the benefit of the jury, the court concluded that the combination might have improved the quality of the decision in the case. Id.

n42. In re Repetitive Stress Injury Litig., 11 F.3d 368 (2d Cir. 1993).

n43. Id. at 371, 373-74.

n44. In re Repetitive Stress Injury Prod. Liab. Litig., 1992 WL 403023 (J.P.M.L. 1992).

n45. Repetitive Stress Injury, 11 F.3d at 373 (alteration in original).

n46. For a similar examination, see William W Schwarzer et al., Judicial Federalism: A Proposal to Amend the Multidistrict Litigation Statute to Permit Discovery Coordination of Large-Scale Litigation Pending in State and Federal Courts, 73 Tex. L. Rev. 1529, 1546-50 (1995).

n47. 5 James W. Moore, Moore's Federal Practice P42.02[5], at 42-36-37 to 42-37 (2d ed. 1995).

n48. Id. at 42-37, citing Farber v. Riker-Maxson Corp., 442 F.2d 457 (2d Cir. 1971) (refusing to consider a motion for summary judgment filed by nonlead counsel).

REV_00262451

n49. Manning v. Mercantile Trust Co., 57 N.Y.S. 467, 468 (1899).

n50. Thus, an experienced antitrust lawyer summarized the situation on the defense side of antitrust class actions as follows:

> Even where the court does not formally appoint liaison counsel or lead counsel, everything in an antitrust class action is handled by committee anyway. Those of you who have participated in meetings of counsel in such cases know that your experience in the courtroom does you precious little good; what you would need, ideally, is experience in a state legislature. In fact, it is often the best trial lawyers who have the hardest time adapting to what have become the accepted procedures for handling antitrust class actions. A good trial lawyer's tenacious pursuit of his own theory of the case and his unwillingness to compromise his client's interest in the slightest respect for the good of the majority are almost immediately taken as signs of pigheadedness on the part of his fellow counsel. The result is that he is quickly ostracized from the decision-making inner circle of lawyers on his side of the case, thereby further diminishing his ability to influence the course of the proceedings.

Dando Cellini, An Overview of Antitrust Class Actions, 49 Antitrust L.J. 1501, 1505 (1980).

n51. The Manual for Complex Litigation, Third includes a sample order designating lead counsel to determine the position of the plaintiffs on all matters arising in the cases, to coordinate the discovery, to conduct settlement negotiations, and to delegate responsibilities to other lawyers whom lead counsel is to "monitor." Manual, Third, supra note 32, 41.31. The Manual, Second, further urged that counsel seek accord, but added that if consensus could not be achieved, "and if a single position need not be taken by all members of the group, members may proceed on that matter individually or by sub-groups." Manual, Second, supra note 32, 20.222 (emphasis added). The Manual, Third, softens this provision, saying that if consensus is not achieved "members of the group may have to proceed on the matter individually or by subgroups." Manual, Third, supra note 32, 20.222.

n52. See Vincent v. Hughes Air West, Inc., 557 F.2d 759 (9th Cir. 1977); see also supra note 48.

n53. See, e.g., Katz v. Realty Equities Corp., 521 F.2d 1354, 1361 (2d Cir. 1975) (noting that defendants who were "actors on the periphery" found themselves potentially facing expanded claims under consolidated complaint); Waldman v. Electrospace Corp., 68 F.R.D. 281, 284 n.4 (S.D.N.Y. 1975) (finding that plaintiffs are more likely to add defendants in consolidated complaint); see also Diana E. Murphy, Unified and Consolidated Complaints in Multidistrict Litigation, 132 F.R.D. 597, 598 (1991) ("Despite the procedural label, a decision regarding the use of a unified or consolidated complaint may well have implications for other aspects of the case, such as class certification and choice of law questions.").

n54. As Judge Murphy noted in her article on consolidated complaints:

> Plaintiffs traditionally seek to maintain the maximum degree of control over their cases, and multidistrict cases produce more than the usual amount of tension among counsel regarding case management issues.... [A] court order requiring the filing of a unified complaint, even one limited to pretrial proceedings, may be viewed by counsel as an intrusion on their right to conduct their case as they see fit.

Murphy, supra note 53, at 601-02. See also Steinman, supra note 12, at 973-76.

n55. See In re Storage Tech. Corp. Sec. Litig., 630 F. Supp. 1072, 1074 (D. Colo. 1986).

REV_00262452

n56. See In re Wirebound Boxes Antitrust Litig., 128 F.R.D. 262, 264-65 (D. Minn. 1989) (including additional defendants in consolidated complaint over objection of some plaintiffs). But cf. Garber v. Randell, 477 F.2d 711, 716 (2d Cir. 1973) (holding that consolidated complaint including law firm as a defendant is inappropriate because all plaintiffs but one disavowed claim against law firm and that one plaintiff appeared to lack standing to sue firm).

n57. In Katz v. Realty Equities Corp., 521 F.2d 1354 (2d Cir. 1975), the district judge said that the use of a consolidated complaint during pretrial "could be without prejudice to unfurling the separate flags at trial." Id. at 1358.

n58. See, e.g., Roger H. Trangsrud, Joinder Alternatives in Mass Tort Litigation, 70 Cornell L. Rev. 779, 816-24 (1985); Joan Steinman, Reverse Removal, 78 Iowa L. Rev. 1029, 1042 (1993) ("After consolidation, the procedural safeguards that due process and codified rules demand in class actions of similar magnitude often do not counterbalance the litigant's loss of control."); cf. Silver, supra note 35, at 497-98 (arguing that consolidations are unlike class actions because they are not representational actions, and "parties and lawyers who stand at the head of a consolidation lead not as a dictator leads a people, but as an explorer leads a group of settlers into a new land - by going first").

n59. See Roger H. Trangsrud, Mass Trials in Mass Tort Cases: A Dissent, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 69, 70-76.

n60. See Deborah R. Hensler, Resolving Mass Toxic Torts: Myths and Realities, 1989 U. Ill. L. Rev. 89.

n61. Cf. Spencer Williams, Mass Tort Class Actions: Going, Going, Gone? 98 F.R.D. 323, 329-30 (1983) (criticizing plaintiff lawyers' opposition to class certification in mass tort cases as self-interested).

n62. See Hensler, supra note 60, at 104 ("Faced with the realities of modern mass tort litigation, courts - and legal scholars - should be open to the possibility that expanding the use of formal aggregative procedures may provide more litigant control over the litigation process, more opportunity for litigant participation in the process, and a better match between victims' losses and compensation in those cases."); see also E. Allan Lind et al., The Perception of Justice: Tort Litigants' Views of Trial, Court-Annexed Arbitration and Judicial Settlement Conferences 79-80 (1989) (reporting that litigants surveyed preferred arbitration to court-promoted settlements because they felt more involved in the former).

n63. "Courts' attempts to manage mass torts efficiently often further increase the commonality among mass tort claims." Deborah R. Hensler & Mark A. Peterson, Understanding Mass Personal Injury Litigation: A Socio-Legal Analysis, 59 Brook. L. Rev. 961, 967 (1993).

n64. See generally David F. Herr, Multidistrict Litigation 9.7.3 at 204-07 (1986) (focusing on common discovery with special provision for individual issues). This orientation lies behind the effort to separate the common issues for initial decision that the Project seeks to promote. See Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, 112-16.

n65. See, e.g., Windham v. American Brands, Inc., 565 F.2d 59, 65-72 (4th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 968 (1978) (holding that need for individualized proof of impact and damages doomed antitrust class action).

n66. See, e.g., Blackie v. Barrack, 524 F.2d 891 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 816 (1976) (employing fraud on the market theory in a securities fraud class action to obviate individualized proof of reliance). Related but more difficult issues arise when state-law claims are within the supplemental jurisdiction of the court, and the court seeks to blend the provisions of the law of several states, or to focus on the law of a single state, to facilitate aggregated resolution of cases using a class action or other procedural devices. For discussion of these problems, see Complex Litigation Proposal, supra note 3, at 347-49.

REV_00262453

n67. See Hensler, supra note 60, at 100-03. To a substantial extent this batching may result from the practices of plaintiffs' counsel. At least in asbestos personal injury litigation, some plaintiff lawyers carry large "portfolios" of litigation and some seek what are called "inventory settlements" applying to large numbers of clients. See, e.g., Georgine v. Amchen Prod., Inc., 157 F.R.D. 246, 294 (E.D. Pa. 1994). More generally, in mass tort litigation there have emerged two categories of attorneys known as the "wholesalers" and the "retailers," indentified by their preference for either individual litigation or group resolution of claims. See Richard Sobol, Bending the Law: The Story of the Dalkon Shield Bankruptcy 73 (1991) (describing emergence of two groups of plaintiff lawyers representing women claiming injury due to Dalkon Shield).

n68. 9 Wright & Miller, supra note 24, 2381, at 427.

n69. Louis Harris & Assoc., Inc., Judges' Opinions on Procedural Issues 58-65 (1987) (study No. 87017).

n70. E.g., Symbolic Control, Inc. v. International Business Mach. Corp., 643 F.2d 1339 (9th Cir. 1980) (reversing the judgment for the defendant in an antitrust case because the district court, as a result of its bifurcation order, improperly truncated the causation inquiry).

n71. In re Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 51 F.3d 1293, 1302 (7th Cir. 1995).

n72. For a more detailed examination of the arguments related to issue separation, see James A. Henderson et al., Optimal Issue Separation in Modern Products Liability Litigation, 73 Tex. L. Rev. 1653, 1675-94 (1995).

n73. 857 F.2d 290 (6th Cir. 1988).

n74. The plaintiffs had consented to be bound by Ohio law, thus eliminating the possibility that different legal rules would preclude presentation of a single, common issue.

n75. In re Bendectin Litig., 857 F.2d at 315.

n76. Id. (quoting In re Beverly Hills Fire Litig., 695 F.2d 207, 217 (6th Cir. 1982)).

