

Question for The Panel

Would transparency help?

Two witnesses at this hearing pointed in their testimony to a lack of publicly available information on nonimmigrant worker programs. In fact, some of the analysis discussed at the hearing involved data that was available only through FOIA, a process I know can be slow, difficult, and expensive.

The hearing discussed a number of incidents of apparent abuse of nonimmigrant visa programs for high-skilled workers. These abuses raise the obvious question of whether the American people are seeing an indication of systemic problems or a small number of unscrupulous companies abusing fundamentally sound programs. And it is worth pointing out that the potential for abuse goes beyond visa programs targeted at high-skilled workers. If anything, visa programs that allow employers to bring in workers without significant skills lend themselves even more to abuse.

Whether your goal is reforming nonimmigrant visa programs or simply rebuilding Americans' confidence in these programs, increased transparency could be an important part of the solution.

- a. In your view, would it help to make more information regarding nonimmigrant worker visa programs available to the public without the need to rely on the FOIA process? The FIOA process is long and is NOT transparent. The public has a right to see this information in a raw format- meaning – as it comes to the Gov.

b. Can you talk about what kinds of data should be made available and how such data could be used?

Data should include but not limited too- Total visa applications for the past 5 years. Total number of visas granted and if they displaced an American Worker. Also educational credentials not to mention where the workers are and the salaries
